

VOLUME 1 • A–J
INDEX

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE
BLUES

EDWARD KOMARA
EDITOR

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE
BLUES

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF THE
BLUES

VOLUME 1

A–J
INDEX

EDWARD KOMARA
EDITOR

Published in 2006 by Routledge
Taylor & Francis Group
270 Madison Avenue
New York, NY 10016

Published in Great Britain by Routledge
Taylor & Francis Group
2 Park Square
Milton Park, Abingdon
Oxon OX14 4RN

© 2006 by Taylor & Francis Group, LLC
Routledge is an imprint of Taylor & Francis Group

Printed in the United States of America on acid-free paper
10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

International Standard Book Number-10: 0-415-92699-8 (Hardcover)
International Standard Book Number-13: 978-0-415-92699-7 (Hardcover)
Library of Congress Card Number 2005044346

No part of this book may be reprinted, reproduced, transmitted, or utilized in any form by any electronic, mechanical, or other means, now known or hereafter invented, including photocopying, microfilming, and recording, or in any information storage or retrieval system, without written permission from the publishers.

Trademark Notice: Product or corporate names may be trademarks or registered trademarks, and are used only for identification and explanation without intent to infringe.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Encyclopedia of the blues / Edward Komara, editor.
p. cm.

Includes bibliographical references and index.

ISBN 0-415-92699-8 (set : alk. paper)--ISBN 0-415-92700-5 (v. 1 : alk. paper)--ISBN 0-415-92701-3 (v. 2 : alk. paper)

1. Blues (Music)--Encyclopedias. 2. Blues musicians--Biography--Dictionaries. I. Komara, Edward M., 1966-

ML102.B6E53 2005
781.643'03--dc22

2005044346

Taylor & Francis Group is the Academic Division of T&F Informa plc.

Visit the Taylor & Francis Web site at <http://www.taylorandfrancis.com> and the Routledge Web site at <http://www.routledge-ny.com>

ASSOCIATE EDITOR

Daphne Duval Harrison
University of Maryland, Baltimore County

CONSULTING EDITOR

Greg Johnson
J.D. Williams Library, University of Mississippi

BOARD OF ADVISERS

Scott Barretta
University of Mississippi

Billy Branch
Chicago, Illinois

Samuel Floyd
Center for Black Music Research Columbia College, Chicago, Illinois

Bruce Iglauer
*Alligator Records
Chicago, Illinois*

Yves Laberge
Institut Québécois des Hautes Études Internationales

Roger Misiewicz
Pickering, Ontario, Canada

Jim O'Neal
*Bluesoterica
Kansas City, Missouri*

Ann Rabson
Hartwood, Virginia

Richard Shurman
Warrenville, Illinois

Lorenzo Thomas
University of Houston

Billy Vera
Los Angeles, California

TABLE OF CONTENTS

List of Entries A–Z	ix
Thematic List of Entries	xxxi
List of Contributors	liii
Introduction	lix
Frequently Cited Sources	lxiii
Entries A–Z	1
Index	II

LIST OF ENTRIES A–Z

A

ABC-Paramount/Bluesway

Abner, Ewart

Abshire, Nathan

Accordion

Ace (United Kingdom)

Ace (United States)

Ace, Buddy

Ace, Johnny

Aces, The

Acey, Johnny

Acklin, Barbara

Adams, Alberta

Adams, Arthur

Adams, Dr. Jo Jo

Adams, Faye

Adams, John Tyler “J. T.”

Adams, Johnny

Adams, Marie

Adams, Woodrow Wilson

Adelphi Records

Adins, Joris “Georges”

Admirals, The

Advent Records

A.F.O.

Africa

Agee, Raymond Clinton “Ray”

Agram Blues/Old Tramp

Agwada, Vince

Ajax

Akers, Garfield

Alabama

Aladdin/Score

Alert

Alexander, Algernon “Texas”

Alexander, Arthur

Alexander, Dave (Omar Hakim Khayyam)

Alix, May

Allen, Annisteen

Allen, Bill “Hoss”

Allen, Lee

Allen, Pete

Allen, Ricky

Alligator

Allison, Bernard

Allison, Luther

Allison, Mose

Allison, Ray “Killer”

Allman Brothers Band

Alston, Jamie

Alzheimer, Joshua “Josh”

American Folk Blues Festival (AFBF)

Amerson, Richard

Ammons, Albert

Anderson, Alvin “Little Pink”

Anderson, Bob “Little Bobby”

Anderson, Elester

Anderson, Jimmy

Anderson, Kip

Anderson, “Little” Willie

Anderson, Pinkney “Pink”

Animals

Antone’s

Apollo/Lloyds/Timely

ARC (American Record Corporation)

Arcenaux, Fernest

Archia, Tom

Archibald

Archive of American Folk Song

Ardoin, Alphonse “Bois Sec”

Ardoin, Amédé

Arhoolie/Blues Classics/Folk Lyric

Arkansas

Armstrong, Howard “Louie Bluie”

Armstrong, James

Armstrong, Louis

Armstrong, Thomas Lee “Tom”

Arnett, Al

Arnold, Billy Boy

Arnold, Jerome

Arnold, Kokomo

Arrington, Manuel

Asch/Disc/Folkways/RBF

Ashford, R. T.

Atlanta

Atlantic/Atco/Spark

Atlas

AudioQuest

August, Joe “Mr. Google Eyes”

August, Lynn

LIST OF ENTRIES A–Z

Austin, Claire
Austin, Jesse “Wild Bill”
Austin, Lovie

B

Baby Please Don’t Go/Don’t You Leave Me Here

Bailey, Deford
Bailey, Kid
Bailey, Mildred
Bailey, Ray
Baker, Etta
Baker, Houston
Baker, LaVern
Baker, Mickey
Baker, Willie
Baldry, “Long” John
Ball, Marcia
Ballard, Hank
Ballou, Classie
Bandera
Bands
Banjo
Bankhead, Tommy
Banks, Chico
Banks, Jerry
Banks, L. V.
Bankston, Dick
Banner
Baraka, Amiri
Barbecue Bob
Barbee, John Henry
Barker, Blue Lu
Barker, Danny
Barksdale, Everett
Barner, Wiley
Barnes, George
Barnes, Roosevelt Melvin “Booba”
Barrelhouse
Bartholomew, Dave
Barton, Lou Ann
Bascomb, Paul
Basie, Count
Bass
Bass, Fontella
Bass, Ralph
Bassett, Johnnie
Bastin, Bruce
Bates, Lefty
Batts, Will Bayou
Bea & Baby

Beacon
Beaman, Lottie
Bear Family
Beard, Chris
Beard, Joe
Beasley, Jimmy
Beauregard, Nathan
Belfour, Robert
Bell, Brenda
Bell, Carey
Bell, Earl
Bell, Ed
Bell, Jimmie
Bell, Lurrie
Bell, T. D.
Below, Fred
Below, LaMarr Chatmon
Belvin, Jesse
Bender, D. C.
Bennet, Bobby “Guitar”
Bennett, Anthony “Duster”
Bennett, Wayne T.
Benoit, Tab
Benson, Al
Bentley, Gladys Alberta
Benton, Brook
Benton, Buster
Bernhardt, Clyde (Edric Barron)
Berry, Chuck
Berry, Richard
Bibb, Eric
Big Bad Smitty
Big Boss Man (Hi-Heel Sneakers)
Big Doo Wopper
Big Lucky
Big Maceo
Big Maybelle
Big Memphis Ma Rainey
Big Three Trio
Big Time Sarah
Big Town
Big Twist
Bigeou, Esther
Billington, Johnnie
Binder, Dennis “Long Man”
Biograph
Bishop, Elvin
Bizor, Billy
Black & Blue/Isabel/Riverboat
Black & White
Black Ace
Black Angel Blues (Sweet Little Angel)
Black Bob
Black Magic
Black Newspaper Press

Black Patti
 Black Sacred Music
 Black Swan Records
 Black Top
 Blackwell, Otis
 Blackwell, Robert “Bumps”
 Blackwell, Scrapper
 Blackwell, Willie “61”
 Blake, Cicero
 Bland, Bobby “Blue”
 Blanks, Birleanna
 Blaylock, Travis “Harmonica Slim”
 Blind Blake
 Blind Pig
 Block, Rory
 Bloomfield, Michael
 Blue Horizon
 Blue Lake
 Blue, Little Joe
 Blue Moon (Spain)
 Blue Smitty
 Blue Suit
 Blue Thumb
 Bluebird
 Blues
 Blues and Rhythm
 Blues Ballad
 Blues Boy Willie
 Blues Boy’s Kingdom
 Blues Brothers
 Blues Connoisseur
 Blues Folklore
 Blues in the Night
 Blues Incorporated
 Blues Project
 Bluesbreakers
 Bo, Eddie
 Bobbin
 Bogan, Lucille
 Bogan, Ted
 Bogart, Deanna
 Bohee Brothers
 Boines, Sylvester
 Boll Weevil Bill
 Bollin, Zuzu
 Bond, Graham
 Bonds, Son
 Bonner, Weldon H. Phillip “Juke Boy”
 Boogie Chillen’
 Boogie Jake
 Boogie Woogie Red
 Book Binder, Roy
 Booker, Charlie (Charley)
 Booker, James
 Booze, Beatrice “Wee Bea”
 Borum, “Memphis” Willie
 Bostic, Earl
 Boston Blackie
 Bouchillon, Chris
 Bowman, Priscilla
 Bowser, Erbie
 Boy Blue
 Boyack, Pat
 Boyd, Eddie
 Boyd, Louie
 Boykin, Brenda
 Boyson, Cornelius “Boysaw”
 Boze, Calvin B.
 Bracey, Ishmon
 Bracken, James C.
 Bradford, Perry
 Bradshaw, Evans
 Bradshaw, Myron “Tiny”
 Braggs, Al “TNT”
 Brainstorm
 Bramhall, Doyle
 Branch, William Earl “Billy”
 Brandon, Skeeter
 Brenston, Jackie
 Brewer, Clarence “King Clarentz”
 Brewer, Jim “Blind”
 Brewster, Reverend William Herbert
 Bridges, Curley
 Brim, Grace
 Brim, John
 Brim, John Jr.
 Britton, Joe
 Broadway
 Brockman, Polk
 Bronze
 Brooks, “Big” Leon
 Brooks, Columbus
 Brooks, Hadda
 Brooks, Lonnie
 Broonzy, Big Bill
 Brown, Ada
 Brown, Andrew
 Brown, Arelean
 Brown, Bessie (Ohio)
 Brown, Bessie (Texas)
 Brown, Buster
 Brown, Charles
 Brown, Clarence “Gatemouth”
 Brown, Cleo
 Brown, Dusty
 Brown, Gabriel
 Brown, Hash
 Brown, Henry “Papa”
 Brown, Ida G.
 Brown, J. T.

LIST OF ENTRIES A–Z

Brown, James
 Brown, John Henry “Bubba”
 Brown, Lillyn
 Brown, Nappy
 Brown, Olive
 Brown, Oscar III “Bobo”
 Brown, Pete
 Brown, Richard “Rabbit”
 Brown, Roy James
 Brown, Ruth
 Brown, “Texas” Johnny
 Brown, Walter
 Brown, Willie Lee
 Brozman, Bob
 Brunswick
 Bruynoghe, Yannick
 Bryant, Beulah
 Bryant, Precious
 Bryant, Rusty
 Buchanan, Roy
 Buckner, Willie (Willa) Mae
 Buckwheat Zydeco
 Buford, George “Mojo”
 Bull City Red
 Bullet
 Bunn, Teddy
 Burks, Eddie
 Burley, Dan
 Burns, Eddie
 Burns, Jimmy
 Burnside, R. L.
 Burnside Records
 Burrage, Harold
 Burris, J.C.
 Burrow, Cassell
 Burse, Charlie
 Burton, Aron
 Butler, George “Wild Child”
 Butler, Henry
 Butler, Jerry
 Butler Twins
 Butterbeans and Susie
 Butterfield, Paul
 Byrd, John

C

Cadillac Baby
 Caesar, Harry “Little”
 Cage, James “Butch”
 Cain, Chris
 Cain, Perry
 Callender, Red

Callicott, Joe
 Calloway, Cab
 Calloway, Harrison
 Cameo
 Campbell, “Blind” James
 Campbell, Carl
 Campbell, Eddie C.
 Campbell, John
 Canned Heat
 Cannon, Gus
 Cannonball Records
 Capitol
 Carbo, Hayward “Chuck”
 Carbo, Leonard “Chick”
 Careless Love
 Carmichael, James “Lucky”
 Carolina Slim
 Caron, Danny
 Carr, Barbara
 Carr, Leroy
 Carr, Sam
 Carradine, William “Cat-Iron”
 Carrier, Roy Jr. “Chubby”
 Carson, Nelson
 Carter, Betty
 Carter, Bo
 Carter, Goree
 Carter, Joe
 Carter, Levester “Big Lucky”
 Carter, Vivian
 Casey Jones
 Casey, Smith
 Caston, Leonard “Baby Doo”
 Castro, Tommy
 Catfish
 Catfish Blues
 Catfish Keith
 Cava-Tone Recording
 C.C. Rider
 Cee-Jay
 Celeste
 Cephas, John
 Chamblee, Edward Leon “Eddie”
 Champion (Indiana)
 Champion (Tennessee)
 Chance
 Chandler, Gene
 Charity, Pernell
 Charles Ford Band, The
 Charles, Ray
 Charles, Rockie
 Charly
 Chart
 Charters, Samuel Barclay
 Chatmon, Sam

Chavis, Boozoo
 Cheatham, Jimmy and Jeannie
 Cheeks, Reverend Julius
 Chenier, C. J.
 Chenier, Cleveland
 Chenier, Clifton
 Chenier, Morris "Big"
 Chenier, Roscoe
 Chess/Aristocrat/Checker/Argo/Cadet
 Chicago
 Chief/Profile/Age
 Chitlin Circuit
 Christian, Charlie
 Christian, Johnny "Little"
 Chudd, Lewis Robert "Lew"
 Church, Eugene
 Cincinnati
 C.J.
 Clapton, Eric
 Clark, "Big" Sam
 Clark, Dave
 Clark, Dee
 Clark, W. C.
 Clarke, William
 Class
 Classics
 Clay, Francis
 Clay, Otis
 Clayton, Peter Joe "Doctor"
 Clayton, Willie
 Clearwater, Eddy
 Cleveland, Reverend James
 Clovers, The
 Club 51
 Coasters, The Cobb, Arnett
 Cobbs, Willie
 Cobra/Artistic
 Cohn, Larry
 Cole, Ann
 Cole, Nat King
 Coleman, Deborah
 Coleman, Gary "B. B."
 Coleman, Jaybird
 Coleman, Michael
 Coleman, Wallace
 Collectables
 Collins, Albert
 Collins, Little Mac
 Collins, Louis "Mr. Bo"
 Collins, Sam
 Columbia
 Combo
 Conley, Charles
 Connor, Joanna

Conqueror
 Convict Labor
 Cooder, Ry
 Cook, Ann
 Cooke, Sam
 Cooper, Jack L.
 Copeland, Johnny "Clyde"
 Copeland, Shemekia
 Copley, Al
 Corley, Dewey
 Cosse, Ike
 Costello, Sean
 Cotten, Elizabeth
 Cotton, James
 Council, Floyd "Dipper Boy"
 Coun-tree
 Country Music
 Courtney, Tom "Tomcat"
 Cousin Joe
 Covington, Robert
 Cow Cow Blues
 Cox, Ida
 Crafton, Harry "Fats"
 Crawford, James "Sugar Boy"
 Cray, Robert
 Crayton, Connie Curtis "Pee Wee"
 Crazy Cajun Records
 Creach, Papa John
 Cream
 Crippen, Katie
 Crochet, Cleveland
 Crockett, G. L.
 Crothers, Benjamin "Scatman"
 Crown
 Crudup, Arthur William "Big Boy"
 Crump, Jesse "Tiny"
 Cuby and the Blizzards
 Curtis, James "Peck"
 Cusic, Eddie

D

Dale, Larry
 Dallas, Leroy
 Dallas String Band
 Dance: Artistic
 Dance: Audience Participation
 Danceland
 Dane, Barbara
 Daniels, Jack
 Daniels, Julius
 Darby, Ike "Big Ike"
 Darby, Teddy

LIST OF ENTRIES A–Z

Darnell, Larry
 Davenport, Cow-Cow
 Davenport, Jed
 Davenport, Lester “Mad Dog”
 Davies, Cyril
 Davies, Debbie
 Davis, “Blind” John
 Davis, Carl
 Davis, Cedell
 Davis, Eddie “Lockjaw”
 Davis, Geater
 Davis, Guy
 Davis, James “Thunderbird”
 Davis, Katherine
 Davis, Larry
 Davis, “Little” Sammy
 Davis, Mamie “Galore”
 Davis, Maxwell
 Davis, “Maxwell Street” Jimmy
 Davis, Quint
 Davis, Reverend Gary
 Davis, Tiny
 Davis, Tyrone
 Davis, Walter
 Dawkins, James Henry “Jimmy”
 Day, Bobby
 De Luxe/Regal
 Dean, Joe “Joe Dean from Bowling Green”
 Decca
 Decca/Coral/MCA
 Dee, David
 Delafosse, Geno
 Delafosse, John
 Delaney, Mattie
 Delaney, Thomas Henry “Tom”
 DeLay, Paul
 Delmark
 Derby (New York)
 DeSanto, Sugar Pie
 DeShay, James
 Detroit
 Detroit Junior
 Dial
 Dickerson, “Big” John
 Diddley, Bo
 Diddley Bow
 Dig/Ultra
 Dillard, Varetta
 Dirty Dozens
 Discography
 Dixie Hummingbirds
 Dixieland Jug Blowers
 Dixon, Floyd
 Dixon, Willie James
 Dizz, Lefty
 Document
 Doggett, Bill
 Dollar, Johnny
 Dolphin, John
 Domino, Fats
 Donegan, Dorothy
 Dooley, Simmie
 DooTone/DooTo/Authentic
 Dorsey, Lee
 Dorsey, Mattie
 Dorsey, Thomas A.
 Dot Records
 Dotson, Jimmy “Louisiana”
 Douglas, K. C.
 Down Home Blues
 Doyle, Charlie “Little Buddy”
 Dr. Daddy-O
 Dr. Hepcat
 Dr. John
 Drain, Charles
 Drifters
 Drifting Blues
 Drummond
 Drums
 Duarte, Chris
 Duke
 Duke/Peacock/Back Beat
 Dukes, Laura
 Dunbar, Scott
 Duncan, Al
 Duncan, Little Arthur
 Dunn, Roy Sidney
 Dunson, Johnnie Mae
 Dupont, August “Dimes”
 Dupree, Al “Big Al”
 Dupree, Champion Jack
 Dupree, Cornell
 Durham, Eddie
 Duskin, Big Joe
 Dyer, Johnny

E

Eaglin, Snooks
 Ealey, Robert
 Earl, Ronnie
 Earwig
 Easton, Amos
 Easy Baby
 Ebony (1)
 Ebony (2)
 Eckstine, Billy

Edison
 Edmonds, Elga
 Edsel
 Edwards, Archie
 Edwards, Bernice
 Edwards, Chuck
 Edwards, Clarence
 Edwards, David “Honeyboy”
 Edwards, Frank
 Edwards, “Good Rockin’” Charles
 Edwards, Willie
 Egan, Willie Lee
 El Bee (El + Bee)
 El, Edward H. “Eddie”
 Electric Flag
 Electro-Fi
 Elektra Records
 Elem, Robert “Big Mojo”
 11-29
 Elko
 Ellis, Big Chief
 Ellis, Tinsley
 Embry, “Queen” Sylvia
 Emerson, William Robert “Billy the Kid”
 Erby, Jack
 Esquerita
 Estes, John Adam “Sleepy John”
 Evans, David Huhne, Jr.
 Evans, Margie
 Everett, Betty
 Evidence
 Excello/Nashboro
 Excelsior/Exclusive
 Ezell, Will

F

Fabulous Thunderbirds
 Fahey, John
 Fairfield Four
 Fame
 Fantasy/Prestige/Bluesville/Galaxy/
 Milestone/Riverside Record Companies
 Farr, Deitra
 Fattening Frogs for Snakes
 Feature
 Fedora
 Ferguson, Robert “H-Bomb”
 Fiddle
 Field Hollers
 Fields, Bobby
 Fields, Kansas

Fieldstones
 Fife and Drums
 Films
 Finnell, Doug
 Fire/Fury/Enjoy/Red Robin
 Five Blind Boys of Alabama
 Five (“5”) Royales
 Flash
 Fleetwood Mac
 Flemons, Wade
 Flerlage, Raeburn
 Flower, Mary
 Floyd, Frank “Harmonica”
 Flying Fish
 Flynn, Billy
 Foddrrell, Turner
 Foghat
 Foley, Sue
 Fontenot, Canray
 Ford, Clarence J.
 Ford, James Lewis Carter “T-Model”
 Ford, Robben Lee
 Forehand, A. C. and “Blind” Mamie Formal
 Forms
 Forsyth, Guy
 Fortune/Hi-Q
 Fortune, Jesse
 Foster, “Baby Face” Leroy
 Foster, Little Willie
 Foster, Willie James
 Fountain, Clarence
 Four Brothers
 Fowler, T. J.
 Foxx, Inez and Charlie
 Fran, Carol
 Francis, David Albert “Panama”
 Frank, Edward
 Frankie and Johnny
 Franklin, Guitar Pete
 Frankin, Reverend C. L.
 Frazier, Calvin
 Freedom/Eddie’s
 Freeman, Denny
 Freund, Steve
 Frisco
 Frog/Cygnnet
 Frost, Frank Otis
 Fuller, Blind Boy
 Fuller, Jesse “Lone Cat”
 Fuller, Johnny
 Fulp, Preston
 Fulson, Lowell
 Funderburgh, Anson
 Funk

LIST OF ENTRIES A–Z

G

Gaddy, Bob
Gaillard, Bulee “Slim”
Gaines, Earl
Gaines, Grady
Gaines, Roy
Gaither, Bill (1)
Gaither, Bill (2) “Leroy’s Buddy”
Gales Brothers
Gallagher, Rory
Gandy Dancers
Gant, Cecil
Garcia, Jerome John “Jerry”
Garibay, Randy Jr.
Garland, Terry
Garlow, Clarence “Bon Ton”
Garner, Larry
Garon, Paul
Garrett, Robert “Bud”
Garrett, Vernon
Gary, Indiana
Gary, Tommy
Gates, Reverend James M.
Gayles, Billy
Gayten, Paul
Geddins, Bob
Gennett
Georgia
Geremia, Paul
Giant/Gamma/Globe
Gibson, Clifford
Gibson, Jack
Gibson, Lacy
Gillum, Jazz
Gilmore, Boyd
Gipson, Byron “Wild Child”
Glenn, Lloyd
Glover
Glover, Henry
Going Down Slow (I’ve Had My Fun)
Gold Star
Goldband Records
Golden Gate Quartet
Goldstein, Kenneth
Goldwax
Gooden, Tony
Goodman, Shirley
Gordon, Jay
Gordon, Jimmie
Gordon, Rosco(e)
Gordon, Sax
Gotham/20th Century
Granderson, John Lee

Grant, Leola “Coot”
Graves, Roosevelt
Gray, Arvella “Blind”
Gray, Henry
Great Depression
Great Migration
Green, Al
Green, Cal
Green, Charlie
Green, Clarence
Green, Clarence “Candy”
Green, Grant
Green, Jesse
Green, Lil
Green, Norman G. “Guitar Slim”
Green, Peter
Greene, L. C.
Greene, Rudolph Spencer “Rudy”
Greer, “Big” John Marshall
Grey Ghost
Griffin, Bessie
Griffin, “Big” Mike
Griffin, Johnny
Griffin, Raymond L. “R. L.”
Griffith, Shirley
Grimes, Lloyd “Tiny”
Griswold, Art and Roman
Grossman, Stefan
Guesnon, George “Curley” “Creole”
Guitar
Guitar Crusher Guitar Gabriel
Guitar Jr.
Guitar Kelley
Guitar Nubbitt
Guitar Shorty
Guitar Slim
Guitar Slim Jr.
Gunter, Arthur Neal
Guralnick, Peter
Guthrie, Woodrow Wilson “Woody”
Guy, George “Buddy”
Guy, Phil
Guy, Vernon

H

Haddix, Travis
Hairston, “Brother” Will
Hall, René (Joseph)
Hall, Vera
Hamilton, Larry
Hammond, Clay

Hammond, John Henry, Jr.
 Hammond, John Paul
 Hampton, Lionel
 Handy, William Christopher “W. C.”
 Hare, Auburn “Pat”
 Harlem Hamfats
 Harman, James
 Harmograph
 Harmonica
 Harmonica Fats
 Harney, Richard “Hacksaw”
 Harper, Joe
 Harpo, Slim
 Harrington/Clearwater Family
 Harris, Corey
 Harris, Don “Sugarcane”
 Harris, Hi Tide
 Harris, Homer
 Harris, Kent L. “Boogaloo”
 Harris, Peppermint
 Harris, Thurston
 Harris, Tony
 Harris, William “Big Foot”
 Harris, Wynonie
 Harrison, Wilbert
 Hart, Alvin “Youngblood”
 Hart, Hattie
 Harvey, Ted
 Hatch, Provine, Jr. “Little Hatch”
 Hawkins, Ernie
 Hawkins, Erskine
 Hawkins, Screamin’ Jay
 Hawkins, Ted
 Hawkins, Walter “Buddy Boy”
 Hayes, Clifford
 Hayes, Henry
 Hazell, Patrick
 Healey, Jeff
 Heartsman, Johnny
 Hegamin, Lucille
 Helfer, Erwin
 Hemphill, Jessie Mae
 Hemphill, Julius Arthur
 Hemphill, Sid
 Henderson, Bugs
 Henderson, Duke “Big”
 Henderson, Katherine
 Henderson, Mike (I)
 Henderson, Mike (II)
 Henderson, Rosa
 Hendrix, Jimi
 Henry, Clarence “Frogman”
 Henry, Richard “Big Boy”
 Hensley, William P. “Washboard Willie”
 Herald/Ember
 Heritage
 Herwin (1943 and Before)
 Herwin (1967 and After)
 Hesitation Blues
 Hess, Chicago Bob
 Hi Records
 Hicks, Charlie
 Hicks, Edna
 Hide Away
 Higgins, Charles William “Chuck”
 Higgins, Monk
 Higgs, George
 High Water
 HighTone
 Highways
 Hill, Bertha “Chippie”
 Hill, Jessie
 Hill, Joseph “Blind Joe”
 Hill, King Solomon
 Hill, Michael
 Hill, Raymond
 Hill, Rosa Lee
 Hill, Z. Z.
 Hillery, Mabel
 Hinton, Algia Mae
 Hinton, Edward Craig “Eddie”
 Hispanic Influences on the Blues
 Historiography
 Hite, Les
 Hite, Mattie
 Hoeke, Rob
 Hogan, Silas
 Hogg, John
 Hogg, Smokey
 Holder, Ace
 Hole, Dave
 Holeman, John Dee
 Holiday, Billie
 Hollimon, Clarence
 Hollins, Tony
 Holloway, Red
 Hollywood Fats
 Holmes Brothers
 Holmes, Wright
 Holmstrom, Rick
 Holt, Nick
 Holts, Roosevelt
 Home Cooking
 Homesick James
 Hoochie Coochie Man
 Hoodoo
 Hooker, Earl Zebedee
 Hooker, John Lee
 Hopkins, Joel
 Hopkins, Linda

LIST OF ENTRIES A-Z

Hopkins, Sam "Lightnin'"
Hornbuckle, Linda
Horton, Big Walter
House, Eddie "Son"
House of Blues Records
House-Rent Parties
Houston, Edward Wilson "Bee"
Houston Guitar Slim
Houston, Joe (Joseph Abraham)
Hovington, Franklin "Frank"
How Long How Long (Sitting on Top of the World)
Howard, Camille
Howard, Rosetta
Howell, Joshua Barnes "Peg Leg"
Howlin' Wolf
Huff, Luther and Percy
Hughes, Joe "Guitar"
Humes, Helen
Hummel, Mark
Humor
Hunt, Daniel Augusta "D. A."
Hunt, Otis "Sleepy"
Hunt, Van Zula Carter
Hunter, Alberta
Hunter, Ivory Joe
Hunter, Long John
Hurt, John Smith "Mississippi John"
Hutto, Joseph Benjamin "J.B."
Hy-Tone

I

I Believe I'll Make a Change (Dust My Broom)
I Just Want to Make Love to You
Ichiban Records
I'm a Man (Mannish Boy)
I'm Gonna Move to the Outskirts of Town Imperial Instant
Irma
Ironing Board Sam
Ivory Records

J

Jackson, Armand "Jump"
Jackson, Benjamin Clarence "Bullmoose"
Jackson, Bill
Jackson, Bo Weavil
Jackson Brothers

Jackson, Calvin (1)
Jackson, Calvin (2)
Jackson, Charles "Papa Charlie"
Jackson, Cordell "Guitar Granny"
Jackson, Fruteland
Jackson, George Henry
Jackson, Grady "Fats"
Jackson, Jim
Jackson, John
Jackson, Lee
Jackson, Lil' Son
Jackson, Little Willie
Jackson, Mahalia
Jackson, Vasti
Jackson, Willis "Gator" "Gator Tail"
Jacque, Beau
Jacquet, Illinois
James, Clifton
James, Elmore
James, Etta
James, Jesse
James, Nehemiah "Skip"
James, Steve
Japan
Jarrett, James "Pigmeat"
Jarrett, Theodore "Ted"
Jaxon, Frankie "Half Pint"
Jaxyson
Jazz
Jefferson, Blind Lemon
Jefferson, Bonnie
Jeffrey, Robert Ernest Lee "Bob"
JEMF (John Edwards Memorial Foundation)
Jenkins, Bobo
Jenkins, Duke
Jenkins, Gus
Jenkins, Johnny
Jesus Is a Dying Bed Maker (In My Time of Dying)
Jewel/Paula/Ronn
JOB (J.O.B.)
Joe Davis/Davis/Beacon
John Henry
John, Little Willie
Johnny Nocturne Band
Johnson, Alvin Lee
Johnson, Al "Snuff"
Johnson, Big Jack
Johnson, Blind Willie
Johnson, Buddy
Johnson, Conrad
Johnson, Earnest "44 Flunkey"
Johnson, Edith North
Johnson, Ernie

Johnson, Henry "Rufe"
 Johnson, Herman E.
 Johnson, James Price
 Johnson, James "Steady Roll"
 Johnson, James "Stump"
 Johnson, Joe
 Johnson, Johnnie
 Johnson, L. V.
 Johnson, Larry
 Johnson, Lemuel Charles "Lem"
 Johnson, Lonnie
 Johnson, Louise
 Johnson, Luther "Georgia Boy" "Snake"
 Johnson, Luther "Houserocker"
 Johnson, Margaret
 Johnson, Mary
 Johnson, Pete
 Johnson, Plas
 Johnson, Robert Leroy
 Johnson, Syl
 Johnson, Tommy
 Johnson, Wallace
 Johnson, Willie Lee
 Joliet
 Jones, Albennie
 Jones, Andrew "Junior Boy"
 Jones, Bessie
 Jones, Birmingham
 Jones, Calvin "Fuzzy"
 Jones, Carl
 Jones, Casey
 Jones, Clarence M.
 Jones, Curtis
 Jones, Dennis "Little Hat"
 Jones, Eddie "One-String"
 Jones, Floyd
 Jones, James "Middle Walter"
 Jones, Joe
 Jones, "Little" Johnny
 Jones, Little Sonny
 Jones, Maggie
 Jones, Max
 Jones, Moody
 Jones, Paul "Wine"
 Jones, Tutu
 Jones, Willie
 Joplin, Janis
 Jordan, Charley
 Jordan, Louis
 Jordan, Luke
 JSP
 Jubilee/Josie/It's a Natural
 Jug
 Juke Joints
 JVB

K

Kane, Candye
 Kansas City
 Kansas City Red
 Kaplan, Fred
 Katz, Bruce
 Kazoo
 K-Doe, Ernie
 Keb' Mo'
 Kellum, Alphonso "Country"
 Kelly, Jo Ann
 Kelly, Paul
 Kelly, Vance
 Kelton, Robert "Bob"
 Kemble, Will Ed
 Kennedy, Jesse "Tiny"
 Kenner, Chris
 Kent, Willie
 Key to the Highway
 Keynote
 Kid Stormy Weather
 Killing Floor (The Lemon Song)
 Kimbrough, David, Jr.
 Kimbrough, Junior
 Kimbrough, Lottie
 King, Al
 King, Albert
 King, Bnois
 King, Bobby
 King, Chris Thomas
 King Curtis
 King, Earl
 King, Eddie
 King Ernest
 King/Federal/Queen
 King, Freddie
 King, "Little" Jimmy
 King, Riley B. "B. B."
 King, Saunders
 King Snake
 Kinsey, Lester "Big Daddy"
 Kinsey Report
 Kirk, Andrew Dewey "Andy"
 Kirkland, Eddie
 Kirkland, Leroy
 Kirkpatrick, Bob
 Kittrell, Christine
 Kizart, Lee
 Kizart, Willie
 K.O.B. (Kings of The Blues)
 Koda, Michael "Cub"
 Koerner, Ray & Glover
 Kokomo

LIST OF ENTRIES A–Z

Kolax, King
 Korner, Alexis
 Kubek, Smokin' Joe

L

L + R

Lacey, Rubin "Rube"
 Lacey, William James "Bill"
 Lambert, Lloyd
 Lance, Major
 Landreth, Sonny
 Lane, Mary
 Lang, Eddie
 Lang, Jonny
 Lanor Records
 Larkin, Milton "Tippy"
 LaSalle, Denise
 Lastie, David
 Latimore, Benny
 Laury, Booker T.
 Lawhorn, Samuel "Sammy"
 Lawlars, Ernest "Little Son Joe"
 Laws, Johnny
 Lay, Sam
 Lazy Lester
 Leadbelly
 Leadbitter, Michael Andrew "Mike"
 Leake, Lafayette
 Leaner, George and Ernest
 Leary, S. P.
 Leavy, Calvin
 Leavy, Hosea
 Led Zeppelin
 Lee, Bonnie
 Lee, Frankie
 Lee, John Arthur
 Lee, Julia
 Lee, Lovie
 Leecan, Bobby
 Left Hand Frank
 Legendary Blues Band
 Leiber and Stoller
 Leigh, Keri
 Lejeune, Iry
 Lembo, Kim
 Lenoir, J.B.
 Leonard, Harlan
 Let the Good Times Roll
 Levee Blues
 Levy, Louis "Lou"
 Levy, Morris
 Levy, Ron

Lewis, Bobby
 Lewis, Furry
 Lewis, Johnie (Johnny)
 Lewis, Meade "Lux"
 Lewis, Noah
 Lewis, Pete "Guitar"
 Lewis, Smiley
 Libraries
 Liggins, Jimmy
 Liggins, Joe
 Liggions, Dave
 Lightfoot, Alexander "Papa George"
 Lightnin' Slim
 Lincoln, Charlie
 Linkchain, Hip
 Lipscomb, Mance
 Liston, Virginia
 Literature, Blues in Little, Bobby
 Little Buster
 Little Charlie
 Little Mike
 Little Milton
 Little Miss Cornshucks
 Little Richard
 Little Sonny
 Little Walter
 Littlefield, "Little" Willie
 Littlejohn, John
 Lockwood, Robert, Jr.
 Lofton, "Cripple" Clarence
 Logan, John "Juke"
 Lomax, Alan
 Lomax, John Avery
 London-American
 Lonesome Sundown
 Long, James Baxter "J. B."
 Lornell, Christopher "Kip"
 Louis, Joe Hill
 Louisiana
 Louisiana Red
 Love, Clayton
 Love, Coy "Hot Shot"
 Love, Preston
 Love, Willie
 Lowe, Sammy
 Lowery, Robert "Bob"
 Lowry, Peter B. "Pete"
 Lucas, William "Lazy Bill"
 Lumber Camps
 LuPine
 Lusk, "Professor" Eddie
 Lutchter, Joe
 Lutchter, Nellie
 Lynching and the Blues

Lynn, Barbara
 Lynn, Trudy
 Lyons, Lonnie

M

M & O Blues
 Mabon, Willie
 Mack, Lonnie
 MacLeod, Doug
 Macon, Albert
 Macon, John Wesley “Mr. Shortstuff”
 Macon, Q. T.
 Macy’s
 Mad/M&M
 Maghett, Samuel Gene “Magic Sam”
 Magic Slim
 Maiden, Sidney
 Maison du Soul
 Make Me a Pallet on Your Floor
 Malaco/Waldoxy
 Mallard, Sax
 Malo, Ron
 Malone, “John Jacob” J. J.
 Mama Talk to Your Daughter
 Mamlish Records
 Mandolin
 Mapleshade Records
 Mardi Gras
 Margolin, Bob
 Marketing
 Mars, Johnny
 Martin, Carl
 Martin, “Fiddlin’” Joe
 Martin, Sallie
 Martin, Sara
 Matchbox
 Matchbox Blues
 Maxwell, David
 May, Roosevelt
 Mayall, John
 Mayes, Pete
 Mayfield, Curtis
 Mayfield, Percy
 Mays, Curley
 Mayweather, “Earring” George
 McCain, Jerry “Boogie”
 McCall, Cash
 McClain, Mary “Diamond Teeth”
 McClain, “Mighty” Sam
 McClennan, Tommy
 McClinton, Delbert

McClure, Bobby
 McCoy, Charlie
 McCoy, George and Ethel
 McCoy, “Kansas” Joe
 McCoy, Robert Edward
 McCoy, Rose Marie
 McCoy, Viola
 McCracklin, Jimmy
 McCray, Larry
 McDaniel, Clara “Big”
 McDaniel, Floyd
 McDaniel, Hattie
 McDowell, Fred
 McGee, Cleo “Big Bo”
 McGee, Reverend F. W.
 McGhee, Brownie
 McGhee, Granville “Sticks”
 McGill, Rollee
 McGuirt, Clarence “Candyman”
 McIlwaine, Ellen
 McKune, James
 McMahan, Andrew “Blueblood”
 McMullen, Fred
 McNeely, Cecil James “Big Jay”
 McPhatter, Clyde Lensley
 McPhee, Tony “T. S.”
 McShann, James Columbus “Jay”
 McTell, Blind Willie
 McVea, John Vivian “Jack”
 Mean Mistreater Mama
 Meaux, Huey P.
 Medwick, Joe
 Melodeon Records
 Melotone
 Melrose, Lester
 Memphis
 Memphis Blues, The (“Mama Don’ ’low” or “Mister Crump”)
 Memphis Jug Band
 Memphis Minnie
 Memphis Piano Red
 Memphis Slim
 Mercury/Fontana/Keynote/Blue Rock
 Merritt
 MGM (55000 R&B series)
 Mickle, Elmon “Drifting Slim”
 Mighty Clouds of Joy
 Milburn, Amos
 Miles, Josephine “Josie”
 Miles, Lizzie
 Miles, Luke “Long Gone”
 Miller, Clarence Horatio “Big”
 Miller, Jay D. “J. D.”
 Miller, Polk

LIST OF ENTRIES A–Z

Millet, McKinley “Li’l”
 Millinder, Lucky
 Milton, Roy
 Miltone
 Minner, D. C.
 Miracle/Premium
 Miss Rhapsody
 Mississippi
 Mississippi Jook Band
 Mississippi Matilda
 Mississippi Sheiks
 Mitchell, Bobby
 Mitchell, George
 Mitchell, “Little” Walter
 Mitchell, McKinley
 Mitchell, Willie
 Modern Blues Recordings
 Modern/Flair/Meteor/Kent/RPM
 Molton, Flora
 Montgomery, Eurreal “Little Brother”
 Montgomery Ward
 Montoya, Coco
 Montrell, Roy
 Mooney, John
 Moore, Aaron
 Moore, Alexander “Whistlin’ Alex”
 Moore, Alice “Little”
 Moore, Dorothy
 Moore, Gary
 Moore, Johnny
 Moore, Johnny B.
 Moore, Monette
 Moore, Oscar
 Moore, Reverend Arnold Dwight “Gatemouth”
 Moore, Samuel David “Sam”
 Moore, William “Bill”
 Morello, Jimmy
 Morgan, Mike
 Morgan, Teddy
 Morganfield, “Big” Bill
 Morisette, Johnny “Two-Voice”
 Morton, Jelly Roll
 Mosaic
 Moss, Eugene “Buddy”
 Moten, Benjamin “Bennie”
 Motley, Frank Jr.
 Motown
 Mr. R&B Records
 Murphy, Matt “Guitar”
 Murphy, Willie
 Murray, Bobby
 Musselwhite, Charlie
 Mustang Sally
 My Black Mama (Walking Blues)
 Myers, Bob

Myers, Dave “Thumper”
 Myers, Louis
 Myers, Sam

N

Naftalin, Mark
 Napier, Simon
 Nappy Chin
 Nardella, Steve
 Nashville
 Neal, Kenny
 Neal, Raful
 Neely, “Little” Bobby
 Negro Art
 Nelson, Chicago Bob
 Nelson, Jimmy “T-99”
 Nelson, Romeo
 Nelson, Tracy
 Nettles, Isaiah
 Neville Brothers
 Newbern, Willie “Hambone Willie”
 Newborn, Calvin
 Newborn, Phineas, Jr.
 Newell, “Little” Eddie
 Nicholson, James David “J. D.”
 Nighthawk Records
 Nighthawk, Robert
 Nighthawks
 Nix, Willie
 Nixon, Elmore
 Nixon, Hattie
 Nolan, Lloyd
 Nolen, Jimmy
 North Mississippi AllStars
 Norwood, Sam
 Nulisch, Darrell

O

Oakland
 Oden, “St. Louis” Jimmy
 Odetta
 Odom, Andrew “Big Voice” “Little B. B.”
 Offitt, Lillian
 Oh Pretty Woman (Can’t Make You Make Love Me)
 OJL (Origin Jazz Library)
 O’Keh
 Old Swing-Master/Master
 Old Town
 Oldie Blues

Oliver, Paul
 Omar and the Howlers
 One Time Blues/Kokomo Blues (Sweet Home
 Chicago)
 O’Neal, Winston James “Jim”
 One-derful/M-Pac/Mar-V-lus/Toddlin Town Opera
 Ora Nelle
 Oriole
 Orioles
 Orleans
 Oscher, Paul
 Otis, Johnny
 Otis, Shuggie
 Overbea, Danny
 Overstreet, Nathaniel “Pops”
 Owens, Calvin
 Owens, Jack
 Owens, Jay
 Owens, Marshall

P

Page, Oran Thaddeus “Hot Lips”
 Palm, Horace M.
 Palmer, Earl
 Palmer, Robert
 Palmer, Sylvester
 Paramount
 Parker, Charlie
 Parker, Herman, Jr.
 “Little Junior” “Junior”
 Parker, Sonny
 Parkway
 Parr, Elven “L. V.”
 Pathé
 Patt, Frank “Honeyboy”
 Patterson, Bobby
 Pattman, Neal
 Patton, Charley
 Payne, John W. “Sonny”
 Payne, Odie Jr.
 Payton, Asie
 Peebles, Ann
 Peeples, Robert
 Peg Leg Sam
 Pejoe, Morris
 Perfect
 Periodicals
 Perkins, Al
 Perkins, Joe Willie “Pinetop”
 Perry, Bill (Mississippi)
 Perry, Bill (New York)
 Perry, Oscar Lee
 Peterson, James
 Peterson, Lucky
 Petway, Robert
 Phelps, Kelly Joe
 Phelps, Walter
 Phillips, Brewer
 Phillips, Earl
 Phillips, Gene
 Phillips, Little Esther
 Phillips, Washington
 Piano
 Piano C. Red
 Piano Red
 Piazza, Rod
 Piccolo, Greg
 Pichon, Walter G. “Fats”
 Pickens, Buster
 Pickett, Dan
 Piedmont (label)
 Piedmont (region)
 Pierce, Billie
 Pierson, Eugene
 Pierson, Leroy
 Ping
 Pinson, Reverend Leon
 Pitchford, Lonnie
 Pittman, Sampson
 Pittsburgh
 Plunkett, Robert
 Pomus, Jerome “Doc”
 Poonanny
 Popa Chubby
 Porter, David
 Porter, Jake
 Porter, King
 Portnoy, Jerry
 Powell, Eugene
 Powell, Vance “Tiny”
 Prater, Dave
 Presley, Elvis Aron
 Preston, Jimmy
 Prez Kenneth
 Price, “Big” Walter “The Thunderbird”
 Price, Lloyd
 Price, Sammy
 Primer, John
 Primich, Gary
 Professor Longhair
 Pryor, James Edward “Snooky”
 Prysock, Arthur
 Prysock, Wilbert “Red”
 Pugh, Joe Bennie “Forrest City Joe”
 Pullum, Joe
 Puritan

LIST OF ENTRIES A–Z

P-Vine Special
Pye/Nixa

Q

QRS
Qualls, Henry
Quattlebaum, Doug

R

R and B (1)
R and B (2)
Rachell, Yank
Racial Issues and the Blues
Radcliff, Bobby
Radio
Railroads
Rainey, Gertrude “Ma”
Rainey, Willie Guy
Raitt, Bonnie
Rankin, R. S.
Rap
Rapone, Al
Rascoe, Moses
Rawls, Johnny
Rawls, Louis Allen “Lou”
Ray, Floyd
Ray, Harmon
Ray, Kenny “Blue”
RCA/Victor/Bluebird/Camden/Groove/X/Vik
Recorded in Hollywood/Hollywood/
Cash/Lucky/Money
Recording
Rector, Milton
Red Lightnin’
Red Rooster, The
Reed, A. C.
Reed, Dalton
Reed, Francine
Reed, Jimmy
Reed, Lula
Reed, Mama
Reynolds, Big Jack
Reynolds, Blind Joe
Reynolds, Theodore “Teddy”
Rhino
Rhodes, Sonny
Rhodes, Todd
Rhodes, Walter “Lightnin’ Bug”

Rhumboogie
Rhythm
Rhythm and Blues
Rhythm Willie
Ric
Rice, “Sir Mack” Bonny
Richard, Rudolph “Rudy”
Richardson, C. C.
Richardson, Mona
Richbourg, John
Ricks, “Philadelphia” Jerry
Ridgley, Thomas “Tommy”
Riedy, Bob
Riggins, Richard “Harmonica Slim”
Riley, Judge Lawrence
Rishell, Paul
Rivers, Boyd
Roberts, Roy
Robicheaux, Coco
Robillard, Duke
Robinson, Alvin “Shine”
Robinson, Arthur Clay “A. C.”
Robinson, Bobby
Robinson, Elzadie
Robinson, Fenton
Robinson, Freddy
Robinson, James “Bat The Hummingbird”
Robinson, Jessie Mae
Robinson, Jimmie Lee
Robinson, L. C. “Good Rockin”
Robinson, Tad
Rochester, NY
Rock ‘n’ Roll
Rockin’ Dopsie
Rockin’/Glory
Rodgers, James Charles “Jimmie”
Rodgers, Sonny “Cat Daddy”
Rogers, Jimmy
Rogers, Roy
Roland, Walter
Roll and Tumble Blues
Rolling Stones
Romeo
Ron Roomful of Blues
Rooster Blues
Roots/Paltram/Truth/For Specialists Only
Rosetta Records
Ross, Doctor Isaiah
Rothchild, Paul A.
Roulette, Freddie
Roulette/Rama
Rounder
Rounds, Ernestine Smith
Roy, Earnest “Guitar”

Royal, Marshal
 RST/RST Blues Document/Fantasy By Rubboard
 Rush, Bobby
 Rush, Otis
 Rushing, James Andrew "Jimmy"
 Russell, Tommie Lee
 Rykodisc

S

Sadler, Haskell Robert "Cool Papa"
 Saffire-The Uppity Blues Women
 Sain, Oliver
 Salgado, Curtis
 Samples, John T.
 San Francisco
 Sanders, Will Roy "Wilroy"
 Sane, Dan
 Sanford, Amos "Little"
 SAR/Derby
 Satherly, Art
 Saunders, Red
 Savoy Brown
 Savoy/National/Regent/Acorn
 Saxophone
 Saydak, Ken
 Sayles, Charlie
 Sayles, Johnny
 Scales
 Scales, Alonzo "Lonnie" Scepter/Wand
 Scott, Buddy
 Scott, Clifford
 Scott, Ecrettia Jacobs "E. C."
 Scott, Esther Mae "Mother"
 Scott, James, Jr.
 Scott, Joe
 Scott, "Little" Jimmy
 Scott, Marylin
 Scott, Sonny
 Scott-Adams, Peggy
 Scruggs, Irene
 SD (Steiner Davis)
 Seals, Son
 Sears, "Big" Al
 Sease, Marvin
 See That My Grave Is Kept Clean
 Seeley, Bob
 Sellers, Brother John
 Semien, "King Ivory" Lee
 Senegal, Paul "Lil' Buck"
 Sensation

Sequel
 7-11
 Seward, Alexander T. "Alec"
 Sex as Lyric Concept
 Seymour
 Shad
 Shake 'Em on Down
 Shakey Jake
 Shama
 Shanachie/Yazoo/Belzona/Blue Goose
 Shannon, Mem
 Shannon, Preston
 Shaw, Allen
 Shaw, Eddie
 Shaw, Eddie "Vaun," Jr.
 Shaw, Robert
 Shaw, Thomas "Tom"
 Shepherd, Kenny Wayne
 Sheppard, Bill "Bunky"
 Shields, Lonnie
 Shines, Johnny
 Shirley & Lee
 Short, J. D.
 Shower, "Little" Hudson
 Siegel-Schwall Band
 Signature
 Signifying Monkey, The
 Simien, "Rockin'" Sidney
 Simmons, Malcolm "Little Mack"
 Sims, Frankie Lee
 Sims, Henry "Son"
 Since I Met You Baby
 Singer, Hal
 Singing
 Singleton, T-Bone
 Sirens
 Sista Monica
 Sittin' In With/Jade/Jax/Mainstream
 Sloan, Henry
 Small, Drink
 Smith, Albert "Al"
 Smith, "Barkin'" Bill
 Smith, Bessie
 Smith, Boston
 Smith, Buster
 Smith, Byther
 Smith, Carrie
 Smith, Clara
 Smith, Clarence "Pine Top"
 Smith, Effie
 Smith, Floyd
 Smith, George "Harmonica"
 Smith, Huey "Piano"
 Smith, J. B.
 Smith, John T.

LIST OF ENTRIES A–Z

Smith, Lucius
 Smith, Mamie
 Smith, Moses “Whispering”
 Smith, Robert Curtis
 Smith, Talmadge “Tab”
 Smith, Trixie
 Smith, Willie “Big Eyes”
 Smith, Willie Mae Ford “Mother”
 Smither, Chris
 Smokestack Lightning
 Smokey Babe
 Smothers, Abraham “Little Smokey”
 Smothers, Otis “Big Smokey”
 Snow, Eddie
 Soileau, Floyd
 Solberg, James
 Solomon, Clifford
 Sons of Blues, The (The S.O.B. Band)
 SONY/Legacy/Columbia/Epic/OKeh
 Soul
 Sound Stage 7
 Spady, Clarence
 Spain
 Spand, Charlie
 Spann, Lucille
 Spann, Otis
 Spann, Pervis
 Sparks Brothers
 Specialty/Fidelity/Juke Box
 Speckled Red
 Specter, Dave
 Speir, H.C.
 Spencer, Evans
 Spire
 Spires, Arthur “Big Boy”
 Spires, Bud
 Spirit of Memphis Quartet
 Spivey, Addie “Sweet Pease”
 Spivey, Elton “The Za Zu Girl”
 Spivey Records
 Spivey, Victoria
 Spoonful (A Spoonful Blues)
 Spoons
 Sprott, Horace
 Spruell, Freddie
 Spruill, James “Wild Jimmy”
 St. Louis Blues
 St. Louis, Missouri
 Stack Lee
 Stackhouse, Houston
 Staff/Dessa
 Staples, Roebuck “Pops”
 Star Talent/Talent
 Stark, Cootie
 Starr Piano Company
 Stash Records
 Stax/Volt
 Steiner, John
 Stephens, James “Guitar Slim”
 Stepney, Billie
 Stidham, Arbee
 Stinson Records
 Stokes, Frank
 Stone, Jesse
 Stormy Monday
 Storyville Records
 Stovall, Jewell “Babe”
 Stovepipe No. 1
 Straight Alky Blues
 Strehli, Angela
 Stroger, Bob
 Strother, James “Jimmie”
 Strother, Percy
 Stuckey, Henry
 Studebaker John
 Sue (1)
 Sue (2)
 Sugar Blue
 Sultan
 Sumlin, Hubert
 Sun/Phillips International/Flip
 Sunbeam
 Sunnyland Slim
 Sunrise (postwar)
 Sunrise (prewar)
 Super Chikan
 Super Disc
 Superior
 Supertone
 Supreme
 Swan Silvertone Singers
 Sweden
 Sweet Honey in the Rock
 Sweet Miss Coffy
 Swing Time/Down Beat
 Sykes, Roosevelt
 Sylvester, Hannah

T

Taggart, Blind Joe
 Tail Dragger
 Taj Mahal
 Takoma
 Talbot, Johnny
 Talty, Don
 Tampa Red

Tangerine Records
 Tarheel Slim
 Tarnopol, Nat
 Tarrant, Rabon
 Tarter and Gay
 Tasby, Finis
 Tate, Buddy
 Tate, Charles Henry “Baby”
 Tate, Tommy
 Taylor, Eddie
 Taylor, Eva
 Taylor, Hound Dog
 Taylor, Johnnie Harrison
 Taylor, Johnny Lamar “Little”
 Taylor, Koko
 Taylor, Melvin
 Taylor, Montana
 Taylor, Otis
 Taylor, Sam “Bluzman”
 Taylor, Sam “The Man”
 Taylor, Ted
 Tedeschi, Susan
 Telarc
 Television
 Temple, Johnny “Geechie”
 Tempo-Tone
 Ten Years After
 Tennessee
 Terry, Cooper
 Terry, Doc
 Terry, Sonny
 Testament
 Texas
 Thackery, Jimmy
 Tharpe, Sister Rosetta
 Theard, Sam “Spo-Dee-O-Dee”
 Theater, Blues in
 Theron
 Thierry, Huey Peter “Cookie”
 This Train (My Babe)
 Thomas, Blanche
 Thomas, Earl
 Thomas, Elmer Lee
 Thomas, Frank, Jr.
 Thomas, George
 Thomas, Henry “Ragtime Texas”
 Thomas, Hersal
 Thomas, Hociel
 Thomas, Irma
 Thomas, James “Son” “Ford”
 Thomas, Jesse “Babyface”
 Thomas, Joe
 Thomas, Lafayette Jerl “Thing”
 Thomas, Leon
 Thomas, Robert
 Thomas, Rufus
 Thomas, Tabby
 Thomas, Willard “Rambling”
 Thomas, Willie B.
 Thompson, Alphonso “Sonny”
 Thompson, David “Little Dave”
 Thompson, Mac
 Thompson, Odell
 Thompson, Ron
 Thornton, Willie Mae
 “Big Mama”
 Thorogood, George
 Tibbs, Andrew
 Tight Like That
 Timmons, Terry
 Tinsley, John E.
 Tip Top
 Tisdorn, James “Smokestack”
 TOBA
 Tomato Records
 Tone-Cool
 Too Tight Henry
 Top Cat
 Topical Blues: Disasters
 Topical Blues: Sports
 Topical Blues: Urban Renewal
 Toure, Ali Farka
 Toussaint, Allen
 Townsend, Henry
 Townsend, Vernell Perry
 Transatlantic
 Transcription
 Treniers
 Tribble, Thomas E. “TNT”
 Trice, Richard
 Trice, William Augusta “Willie”
 Trilon
 Tri-sax-ual Soul Champs
 Trix
 Trout, Walter
 Trucks, Derek
 Trumpet Records/Globe Music/Diamond
 Record Company
 Tucker, Bessie
 Tucker, Ira Tucker, Luther Tucker, Tommy
 Turner, Ike
 Turner, Joseph Vernon “Big Joe”
 Turner, Othar
 Turner, Troy
 Turner, Twist
 TV Slim
 Twinnight/Twilight
 Tyler, Alvin “Red”

LIST OF ENTRIES A–Z

U

United Kingdom and Ireland
 United States
 United/States
 Upchurch, Phil
 USA

V

Valentine, Cal
 Van Ronk, Dave
 Van Singel, Amy
 Vanguard
 Vanleer, Jimmy
 Varsity
 Vaughan, Jimmy
 Vaughan, Stevie Ray
 Vaughn, Jimmy
 Vaughn, Maurice John
 Vault
 Vee-Jay/Abner/Falcon
 Venson, Tenner “Playboy” “Coot”
 Verve
 Vicksburg Blues
 Victor
 Vinson, Eddie “Cleanhead”
 Vinson, Mose
 Vinson, Walter
 Violence as Lyric Concept
 Vita
 Vitacoustic
 Vocalion
 Vogue

W

Walker, Blind Willie
 Walker, Charles
 Walker, Dennis
 Walker, George “Chicken George”
 Walker, Jimmy
 Walker, Joe Louis
 Walker, Johnny Mayon “Big Moose”
 Walker, Junior
 Walker, Phillip
 Walker, Robert “Bilbo”
 Walker, T-Bone
 Wallace, Sippie
 Wallace, Wesley

Walls, Harry Eugene Vann “Piano Man”
 Walton, Mercy Dee
 Walton, Wade
 Ward, Robert
 Wardlow, Gayle Dean
 Warren, Robert Henry “Baby Boy”
 Washboard Doc
 Washboard Sam
 Washboard Slim
 Washboard Willie
 Washington (state)
 Washington, Albert
 Washington, Dinah
 Washington, Isidore “Tuts”
 Washington, Leroy
 Washington, Marion “Little Joe”
 Washington, Toni Lynn
 Washington, Walter “Wolfman”
 Waterford, Charles “Crown Prince”
 Waterman, Richard A. “Dick”
 Waterman, Richard Alan
 Waters, Ethel
 Waters, Mississippi Johnny Waters, Muddy
 Watkins, Beverly “Guitar”
 Watkins, John “Mad Dog”
 Watson, Johnny “Daddy Stovepipe” Watson, Johnny “Guitar”
 Watson, Mike “Junior”
 Watts, Louis Thomas
 Watts, Noble “Thin Man”
 Weathersby, Carl
 Weaver, James “Curley”
 Weaver, Sylvester
 Webb, “Boogie” Bill
 Webb, Willie “Jitterbug”
 Webster, Katie
 Weepin’ Willie
 Welch, “Monster” Mike
 Welding, Pete
 Weldon, Casey Bill
 Wellington, Valerie
 Wells, Junior
 Wells, Michael “Lightnin’”
 West, Charlie
 Weston, John
 Westside
 Wheatstraw, Peetie
 Wheeler, Golden “Big”
 Wheeler, Thomas James “T.J.”
 Whistler’s Jug Band
 Whitaker, “King” Herbert
 White, Artie “Blues Boy”
 White, Bukka
 White, Cleve “Schoolboy Cleve”

White, Georgia
 White, Joshua Daniel “Josh”
 White, Lynn
 White, Miss Lavelle
 Wiggins, Phil
 Wilborn, Nelson
 (“Red Nelson,” “Dirty Red”)
 Wiley, Geechie
 Wilkins, Joe Willie
 Wilkins, Lane
 Wilkins, Reverend Robert Timothy “Tim”
 Williams, Andre “Mr. Rhythm”
 Williams, Andy “Too-Hard”
 Williams, Arbess
 Williams, Arthur Lee “Oscar Mississippi”
 Williams, “Big” Joe Lee
 Williams, Bill
 Williams, Charles Melvin “Cootie”
 Williams, Clarence
 Williams, Ed “Lil’ Ed”
 Williams, George “Bullet”
 Williams, Henry “Rubberlegs”
 Williams, J. Mayo
 Williams, Jabo
 Williams, Jimmy Lee
 Williams, Joe
 Williams, Johnny (1)
 Williams, Johnny (2)
 Williams, Joseph “Jo Jo”
 Williams, Joseph Leon “Jody”
 Williams, L. C.
 Williams, Larry
 Williams, Lee “Shot”
 Williams, Lester
 Williams, Nathan
 Williams, Paul “Hucklebuck”
 Williams, Robert Pete
 Williams, Willie “Rough Dried”
 Williamson, Sonny Boy I (John Lee Williamson)
 Williamson, Sonny Boy II (Aleck Miller)
 Willis, Harold “Chuck”
 Willis, Ralph
 Willis, Robert Lee “Chick”
 Willis, Willie
 Willson, Michelle
 Wilmer, Val

Wilson, Al
 Wilson, Charles
 Wilson, Edith
 Wilson, Harding “Hop”
 Wilson, Jimmy
 Wilson, Kim
 Wilson, Lena
 Wilson, Quinn
 Wilson, Smokey
 Wilson, U. P.
 Winter, Johnny
 Withers, Earnest
 Witherspoon, Jimmy
 Wolf/Best of Blues
 Wolfman Jack
 Women and the Blues
 Woodfork, “Poor” Bob
 Woods, Johnny
 Woods, Mitch
 Woods, Oscar “Buddy”
 Work with Me Annie
 World War II
 Wrencher, “Big” John Thomas
 Wright, Billy
 Wright, Early
 Wright, Marva
 Wright, Overton Ellis “O. V.”

Y

Yancey, James Edward(s) “Jimmy”
 Yancey, Mama Estelle
 Yardbirds
 Young, Johnny
 Young, “Mighty” Joe
 Young, Zora

Z

Ziegler, John Lee
 Zinn, Rusty
 ZZ Top

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Biographical Entries

Abner, Ewart
Abshire, Nathan
Ace, Buddy
Ace, Johnny
Aces, The Acey, Johnny
Acklin, Barbara
Adams, Alberta
Adams, Arthur
Adams, Dr. Jo Jo
Adams, Faye
Adams, John Tyler "J. T."
Adams, Johnny
Adams, Marie
Adams, Woodrow Wilson
Adins, Joris "Georges"
Admirals, The
Agee, Raymond Clinton "Ray"
Agwada, Vince
Akers, Garfield
Alexander, Algernon "Texas"
Alexander, Arthur
Alexander, Dave (Omar Hakim Khayyam)
Alix, May
Allen, Annisteen
Allen, Bill "Hoss"
Allen, Lee
Allen, Pete
Allen, Ricky
Allison, Bernard
Allison, Luther
Allison, Mose
Allison, Ray "Killer"
Allman Brothers Band
Alston, Jamie
Alzheimer, Joshua "Josh"
Amerson, Richard
Ammons, Albert
Anderson, Alvin "Little Pink"
Anderson, Bob "Little Bobby"
Anderson, Elester
Anderson, Jimmy
Anderson, Kip
Anderson, "Little" Willie
Anderson, Pinkney "Pink"
Animals
Arcenaux, Fernest
Archia, Tom
Archibald
Ardoin, Alphonse "Bois Sec"
Ardoin, Amédé
Armstrong, Howard "Louie Bluie"
Armstrong, James
Armstrong, Louis
Armstrong, Thomas Lee "Tom"
Arnett, Al
Arnold, Billy Boy
Arnold, Jerome
Arnold, Kokomo
Arrington, Manuel
Ashford, R. T.
August, Joe "Mr. Google Eyes"
August, Lynn
Austin, Claire
Austin, Jesse "Wild Bill"
Austin, Lovie
Bailey, Deford
Bailey, Kid
Bailey, Mildred
Bailey, Ray
Baker, Etta
Baker, Houston
Baker, LaVern
Baker, Mickey
Baker, Willie
Baldry, "Long" John
Ball, Marcia
Ballard, Hank
Ballou, Classie
Bankhead, Tommy
Banks, Chico
Banks, Jerry
Banks, L. V.
Bankston, Dick
Baraka, Amiri
Barbecue Bob
Barbee, John Henry
Barker, Blue Lu

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Barker, Danny
Barksdale, Everett
Barner, Wiley
Barnes, George
Barnes, Roosevelt Melvin “Booba”
Bartholomew, Dave
Barton, Lou Ann
Bascomb, Paul
Basie, Count
Bass, Fontella
Bass, Ralph
Bassett, Johnnie
Bastin, Bruce
Bates, Lefty
Batts, Will
Beaman, Lottie
Beard, Chris
Beard, Joe
Beasley, Jimmy
Beauregard, Nathan
Belfour, Robert
Bell, Brenda
Bell, Carey
Bell, Earl
Bell, Ed
Bell, Jimmie
Bell, Lurrie
Bell, T. D.
Below, Fred
Below, LaMarr Chatmon
Belvin, Jesse
Bender, D. C.
Bennet, Bobby “Guitar”
Bennett, Anthony “Duster”
Bennett, Wayne T.
Benoit, Tab
Benson, Al
Bentley, Gladys Alberta
Benton, Brook
Benton, Buster
Bernhardt, Clyde (Edric Barron)
Berry, Chuck
Berry, Richard
Bibb, Eric
Big Bad Smitty
Big Doo Wopper
Big Lucky
Big Maceo
Big Maybelle
Big Memphis Ma Rainey
Big Three Trio
Big Time Sarah
Big Twist
Bigeou, Esther
Billington, Johnnie
Binder, Dennis “Long Man”
Bishop, Elvin
Bizer, Billy
Black Ace
Black Bob
Blackwell, Otis
Blackwell, Robert “Bumps”
Blackwell, Scrapper
Blackwell, Willie “61”
Blake, Cicero
Bland, Bobby “Blue”
Blanks, Birleanna
Blaylock, Travis “Harmonica Slim”
Blind Blake
Block, Rory
Bloomfield, Michael
Blue, Little Joe
Blue Smitty
Blues Boy Willie
Blues Brothers
Blues Incorporated
Blues Project
Bluesbreakers
Bo, Eddie
Bogan, Lucille
Bogan, Ted
Bogart, Deanna
Bohee Brothers
Boines, Sylvester
Boll Weevil Bill
Bollin, Zuzu
Bond, Graham
Bonds, Son
Bonner, Weldon H. Phillip “Juke Boy”
Boogie Jake
Boogie Woogie Red
Book Binder, Roy
Booker, Charlie (Charley)
Booker, James
Booze, Beatrice “Wee Bea”
Borum, “Memphis” Willie
Bostic, Earl
Boston Blackie
Bouchillon, Chris
Bowman, Priscilla
Bowser, Erbie
Boy Blue
Boyack, Pat
Boyd, Eddie
Boyd, Louie
Boykin, Brenda
Boyson, Cornelius “Boysaw”
Boze, Calvin B.
Bracey, Ishmon
Bracken, James C.

Bradford, Perry
 Bradshaw, Evans
 Bradshaw, Myron "Tiny"
 Braggs, Al "TNT"
 Bramhall, Doyle
 Branch, William Earl "Billy"
 Brandon, Skeeter
 Brenston, Jackie
 Brewer, Clarence "King Clarentz"
 Brewer, Jim "Blind"
 Brewster, Rev. William Herbert
 Bridges, Curley
 Brim, Grace
 Brim, John
 Brim, John Jr.
 Britton, Joe
 Brockman, Polk
 Brooks, "Big" Leon
 Brooks, Columbus
 Brooks, Hadda
 Brooks, Lonnie
 Broonzy, Big Bill
 Brown, Ada
 Brown, Andrew
 Brown, Arelean
 Brown, Bessie (Ohio)
 Brown, Bessie (Texas)
 Brown, Buster
 Brown, Charles
 Brown, Clarence "Gatemouth"
 Brown, Cleo
 Brown, Dusty
 Brown, Gabriel
 Brown, Hash
 Brown, Henry "Papa"
 Brown, Ida G.
 Brown, J. T.
 Brown, James
 Brown, John Henry "Bubba"
 Brown, Lillyn
 Brown, Nappy
 Brown, Olive
 Brown, Oscar III "Bobo"
 Brown, Pete
 Brown, Richard "Rabbit"
 Brown, Roy James
 Brown, Ruth
 Brown, "Texas" Johnny
 Brown, Walter
 Brown, Willie Lee
 Brozman, Bob
 Bruynoghe, Yannick
 Bryant, Beulah
 Bryant, Precious
 Bryant, Rusty
 Buchanan, Roy
 Buckner, Willie (Willa) Mae
 Buckwheat Zydeco
 Buford, George "Mojo"
 Bull City Red
 Bunn, Teddy
 Burks, Eddie
 Burley, Dan
 Burns, Eddie
 Burns, Jimmy
 Burnside, R. L.
 Burrage, Harold
 Burris, J.C.
 Burrow, Cassell
 Burse, Charlie
 Burton, Aron
 Butler, George "Wild Child"
 Butler, Henry
 Butler, Jerry
 Butler Twins
 Butterbeans and Susie
 Butterfield, Paul
 Byrd, John
 Cadillac Baby
 Caesar, Harry "Little"
 Cage, James "Butch"
 Cain, Chris
 Cain, Perry
 Callender, Red
 Callicott, Joe
 Calloway, Cab
 Calloway, Harrison
 Campbell, "Blind" James
 Campbell, Carl
 Campbell, Eddie C.
 Campbell, John
 Canned Heat
 Cannon, Gus
 Carbo, Hayward "Chuck"
 Carbo, Leonard "Chick"
 Carmichael, James "Lucky"
 Carolina Slim
 Caron, Danny
 Carr, Barbara
 Carr, Leroy
 Carr, Sam
 Carradine, William "Cat-Iron"
 Carrier, Roy Jr. "Chubby"
 Carson, Nelson
 Carter, Betty
 Carter, Bo
 Carter, Goree
 Carter, Joe
 Carter, Levester "Big Lucky"
 Carter, Vivian

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Casey, Smith
 Caston, Leonard "Baby Doo"
 Castro, Tommy
 Catfish Keith
 Cephas, John
 Chamblee, Edward Leon "Eddie"
 Chandler, Gene
 Charity, Pernell
 Charles Ford Band, The
 Charles, Ray
 Charles, Rockie
 Charters, Samuel Barclay
 Chatmon, Sam
 Chavis, Boozoo
 Cheatham, Jimmy and Jeannie
 Cheeks, Reverend Julius
 Chenier, C. J.
 Chenier, Cleveland
 Chenier, Clifton
 Chenier, Morris "Big"
 Chenier, Roscoe
 Christian, Charlie
 Christian, Johnny "Little"
 Chudd, Lewis Robert "Lew"
 Church, Eugene
 Clapton, Eric
 Clark, "Big" Sam
 Clark, Dave
 Clark, Dee
 Clark, W. C.
 Clarke, William
 Clay, Francis
 Clay, Otis
 Clayton, Peter Joe "Doctor"
 Clayton, Willie
 Clearwater, Eddy
 Cleveland, Reverend James
 Clovers, The
 Coasters
 Cobb, Arnett
 Cobbs, Willie
 Cohn, Larry
 Cole, Ann
 Cole, Nat King
 Coleman, Deborah
 Coleman, Gary "B. B."
 Coleman, Jaybird
 Coleman, Michael
 Coleman, Wallace
 Collins, Albert
 Collins, Little Mac
 Collins, Louis "Mr. Bo"
 Collins, Sam
 Conley, Charles
 Connor, Joanna
 Cooder, Ry
 Cook, Ann
 Cooke, Sam
 Cooper, Jack L.
 Copeland, Johnny "Clyde"
 Copeland, Shemekia
 Copley, Al
 Corley, Dewey
 Cosse, Ike
 Costello, Sean
 Cotten, Elizabeth
 Cotton, James
 Council, Floyd "Dipper Boy"
 Courtney, Tom "Tomcat"
 Cousin Joe
 Covington, Robert
 Cox, Ida
 Crafton, Harry "Fats"
 Crawford, James "Sugar Boy"
 Cray, Robert
 Crayton, Connie Curtis "Pee Wee"
 Creach, Papa John
 Cream
 Crippen, Katie
 Crochet, Cleveland
 Crockett, G. L.
 Crothers, Benjamin "Scatman"
 Crudup, Arthur William "Big Boy"
 Crump, Jesse "Tiny"
 Cuby and the Blizzards
 Curtis, James "Peck"
 Cusic, Eddie
 Dale, Larry
 Dallas, Leroy
 Dallas String Band
 Dane, Barbara
 Daniels, Jack
 Daniels, Julius
 Darby, Ike "Big Ike"
 Darby, Teddy
 Darnell, Larry
 Davenport, Cow-Cow
 Davenport, Jed
 Davenport, Lester "Mad Dog"
 Davies, Cyril
 Davies, Debbie
 Davis, "Blind" John
 Davis, Carl
 Davis, Cedell
 Davis, Eddie "Lockjaw"
 Davis, Geater
 Davis, Guy
 Davis, James "Thunderbird"
 Davis, Katherine
 Davis, Larry

Davis, "Little" Sammy
 Davis, Mamie "Galore"
 Davis, Maxwell
 Davis, "Maxwell Street" Jimmy
 Davis, Quint
 Davis, Reverend Gary
 Davis, Tiny
 Davis, Tyrone
 Davis, Walter
 Dawkins, James Henry "Jimmy"
 Day, Bobby
 Dean, Joe "Joe Dean from Bowling Green"
 Dee, David
 Delafosse, Geno
 Delafosse, John
 Delaney, Mattie
 Delaney, Thomas Henry "Tom"
 DeLay, Paul
 DeSanto, Sugar Pie
 DeShay, James
 Detroit Junior
 Dickerson, "Big" John
 Diddley, Bo
 Dillard, Varetta
 Dixie Hummingbirds
 Dixieland Jug Blowers
 Dixon, Floyd
 Dixon, Willie James
 Dizz, Lefty
 Doggett, Bill
 Dollar, Johnny
 Dolphin, John
 Domino, Fats
 Donegan, Dorothy
 Dooley, Simmie
 Dorsey, Lee
 Dorsey, Mattie
 Dorsey, Thomas A.
 Dotson, Jimmy "Louisiana"
 Douglas, K. C.
 Doyle, Charlie "Little Buddy"
 Dr. Daddy-O
 Dr. Hepcat
 Dr. John
 Drain, Charles
 Drifters
 Duarte, Chris
 Dukes, Laura
 Dunbar, Scott
 Duncan, Al
 Duncan, Little Arthur
 Dunn, Roy Sidney
 Dunson, Johnnie Mae
 Dupont, August "Dimes"
 Dupree, Al "Big Al"

Dupree, Champion Jack
 Dupree, Cornell
 Durham, Eddie
 Duskin, Big Joe
 Dyer, Johnny
 Eaglin, Snooks
 Ealey, Robert
 Earl, Ronnie
 Easton, Amos
 Easy Baby
 Eckstine, Billy
 Edmonds, Elga
 Edwards, Archie
 Edwards, Bernice
 Edwards, Chuck
 Edwards, Clarence
 Edwards, David "Honeyboy"
 Edwards, Frank
 Edwards, "Good Rockin'" Charles
 Edwards, Willie
 Egan, Willie Lee
 El, Edward H. "Eddie"
 Electric Flag
 Elem, Robert "Big Mojo"
 Ellis, Big Chief
 Ellis, Tinsley
 Embry, "Queen" Sylvia
 Emerson, William Robert "Billy the Kid"
 Erby, Jack
 Esquerita
 Estes, John Adam "Sleepy John"
 Evans, David Huhne, Jr.
 Evans, Margie
 Everett, Betty
 Ezell, Will
 Fabulous Thunderbirds
 Fahey, John
 Fairfield Four
 Farr, Deitra
 Ferguson, Robert "H-Bomb"
 Fields, Bobby
 Fields, Kansas
 Fieldstones
 Finnell, Doug
 Five Blind Boys of Alabama
 Five ("5") Royales
 Fleetwood Mac
 Flemons, Wade
 Flerlage, Raeburn
 Flower, Mary
 Floyd, Frank "Harmonica"
 Flynn, Billy
 Foddrell, Turner
 Foghat
 Foley, Sue

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Fontenot, Canray
 Ford, Clarence J.
 Ford, James Lewis Carter "T-Model"
 Ford, Robben Lee
 Forehand, A. C. and "Blind" Mamie
 Forsyth, Guy
 Fortune, Jesse
 Foster, "Baby Face" Leroy
 Foster, Little Willie
 Fountain, Clarence
 Fowler, T. J.
 Foxx, Inez and Charlie
 Fran, Carol
 Francis, David Albert "Panama"
 Frank, Edward
 Franklin, Guitar Pete
 Frankin, Reverend C. L.
 Frazier, Calvin
 Freeman, Denny
 Freund, Steve
 Frost, Frank Otis
 Fuller, Blind Boy
 Fuller, Jesse "Lone Cat"
 Fuller, Johnny
 Fulp, Preston
 Fulson, Lowell
 Funderburgh, Anson
 Gaddy, Bob
 Gaillard, Bulee "Slim"
 Gaines, Earl
 Gaines, Grady
 Gaines, Roy
 Gaither, Bill (1)
 Gaither, Bill (2) "Leroy's Buddy"
 Gales Brothers
 Gallagher, Rory
 Gant, Cecil
 Garcia, Jerome John "Jerry"
 Garibay, Randy Jr.
 Garland, Terry
 Garlow, Clarence "Bon Ton"
 Garner, Larry
 Garon, Paul
 Garrett, Robert "Bud"
 Garrett, Vernon
 Gary, Tommy
 Gates, Reverend James M.
 Gayles, Billy
 Gayten, Paul
 Geddings, Bob
 Geremia, Paul
 Gibson, Clifford
 Gibson, Jack
 Gibson, Lacy
 Gillum, Jazz
 Gilmore, Boyd
 Gipson, Byron "Wild Child"
 Glenn, Lloyd
 Glover, Henry
 Golden Gate Quartet
 Goldstein, Kenneth
 Gooden, Tony
 Goodman, Shirley
 Gordon, Jay
 Gordon, Jimmie
 Gordon, Rosco(e)
 Gordon, Sax
 Granderson, John Lee
 Grant, Leola "Coot"
 Graves, Roosevelt
 Gray, Arvella "Blind"
 Gray, Henry
 Green, Al
 Green, Cal
 Green, Charlie
 Green, Clarence
 Green, Clarence "Candy"
 Green, Grant
 Green, Jesse
 Green, Lil
 Green, Norman G. "Guitar Slim"
 Green, Peter
 Greene, L. C.
 Greene, Rudolph Spencer "Rudy"
 Greer, "Big" John Marshall
 Grey Ghost
 Griffin, Bessie
 Griffin, "Big" Mike
 Griffin, Johnny
 Griffin, Raymond L. "R. L."
 Griffith, Shirley
 Grimes, Lloyd "Tiny"
 Griswold, Art and Roman
 Grossman, Stefan
 Guesnon, George "Curley" "Creole"
 Guitar Crusher
 Guitar Gabriel
 Guitar Jr.
 Guitar Kelley
 Guitar Nubbitt
 Guitar Shorty
 Guitar Slim
 Guitar Slim Jr.
 Gunter, Arthur Neal
 Guralnick, Peter
 Guthrie, Woodrow Wilson "Woody"
 Guy, George "Buddy"
 Guy, Phil
 Guy, Vernon
 Haddix, Travis

Hairston, "Brother" Will
 Hall, René (Joseph)
 Hall, Vera
 Hamilton, Larry
 Hammond, Clay
 Hammond, John Henry, Jr.
 Hammond, John Paul
 Hampton, Lionel
 Handy, William Christopher "W. C."
 Hare, Auburn "Pat"
 Harlem Hamfats
 Harman, James
 Harmonica Fats
 Harney, Richard "Hacksaw"
 Harper, Joe
 Harpo, Slim
 Harrington/Clearwater Family
 Harris, Corey
 Harris, Don "Sugarcane"
 Harris, Hi Tide
 Harris, Homer
 Harris, Kent L. "Boogaloo"
 Harris, Peppermint
 Harris, Thurston
 Harris, Tony
 Harris, William "Big Foot"
 Harris, Wynonie
 Harrison, Wilbert
 Hart, Alvin "Youngblood"
 Hart, Hattie
 Harvey, Ted
 Hatch, Provine Jr. "Little Hatch"
 Hawkins, Ernie
 Hawkins, Erskine
 Hawkins, Screamin' Jay
 Hawkins, Ted
 Hawkins, Walter "Buddy Boy"
 Hayes, Clifford
 Hayes, Henry
 Hazell, Patrick
 Healey, Jeff
 Heartsman, Johnny
 Hegamin, Lucille
 Helfer, Erwin
 Hemphill, Jessie Mae
 Hemphill, Julius Arthur
 Hemphill, Sid
 Henderson, Bugs
 Henderson, Duke "Big"
 Henderson, Katherine
 Henderson, Mike (I)
 Henderson, Mike (II)
 Henderson, Rosa
 Hendrix, Jimi
 Henry, Clarence "Frogman"
 Henry, Richard "Big Boy"
 Hensley, William P. "Washboard Willie"
 Hess, Chicago Bob
 Hicks, Charlie
 Hicks, Edna
 Higgins, Charles William "Chuck"
 Higgins, Monk
 Higgs, George
 Hill, Bertha "Chippie"
 Hill, Jessie
 Hill, Joseph "Blind Joe"
 Hill, King Solomon
 Hill, Michael
 Hill, Raymond
 Hill, Rosa Lee
 Hill, Z. Z.
 Hillery, Mabel
 Hinton, Algia Mae
 Hinton, Edward Craig "Eddie"
 Hite, Les
 Hite, Mattie
 Hoeke, Rob
 Hogan, Silas
 Hogg, John
 Hogg, Smokey
 Holder, Ace
 Hole, Dave
 Holeman, John Dee
 Holiday, Billie
 Hollimon, Clarence
 Hollins, Tony
 Holloway, Red
 Hollywood Fats
 Holmes Brothers
 Holmes, Wright
 Holmstrom, Rick
 Holt, Nick
 Holts, Roosevelt
 Homesick James
 Hooker, Earl Zebedee
 Hooker, John Lee
 Hopkins, Joel
 Hopkins, Linda
 Hopkins, Sam "Lightnin'"
 Hornbuckle, Linda
 Horton, Big Walter
 House, Eddie "Son"
 Houston, Edward Wilson "Bee"
 Houston Guitar Slim
 Houston, Joe (Joseph Abraham)
 Hovington, Franklin "Frank"
 Howard, Camille
 Howard, Rosetta
 Howell, Joshua Barnes "Peg Leg"
 Howlin' Wolf

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Huff, Luther and Percy
 Hughes, Joe "Guitar"
 Humes, Helen
 Hummel, Mark
 Hunt, Daniel Augusta "D. A."
 Hunt, Otis "Sleepy"
 Hunt, Van Zula Carter
 Hunter, Alberta
 Hunter, Ivory Joe
 Hunter, Long John
 Hurt, John Smith "Mississippi John"
 Hutto, Joseph Benjamin "J.B."
 Ironing Board Sam
 Jackson, Armand "Jump"
 Jackson, Benjamin Clarence "Bullmoose"
 Jackson, Bill
 Jackson, Bo Weavil
 Jackson Brothers
 Jackson, Calvin (1)
 Jackson, Calvin (2)
 Jackson, Charles "Papa Charlie"
 Jackson, Cordell "Guitar Granny"
 Jackson, Fruteland
 Jackson, George Henry
 Jackson, Grady "Fats"
 Jackson, Jim
 Jackson, John
 Jackson, Lee
 Jackson, Lil' Son
 Jackson, Little Willie
 Jackson, Mahalia
 Jackson, Vasti
 Jackson, Willis "Gator" "Gator Tail"
 Jacque, Beau
 Jacquet, Illinois
 James, Clifton
 James, Elmore
 James, Etta
 James, Jesse
 James, Nehemiah "Skip"
 James, Steve
 Jarrett, James "Pigmeat"
 Jarrett, Theodore "Ted"
 Jaxon, Frankie "Half Pint"
 Jefferson, Blind Lemon
 Jefferson, Bonnie
 Jeffrey, Robert Ernest Lee "Bob"
 Jenkins, Bobo
 Jenkins, Duke
 Jenkins, Gus
 Jenkins, Johnny
 John, Little Willie
 Johnny Nocturne Band
 Johnson, Alvin Lee
 Johnson, Al "Snuff"
 Johnson, Big Jack
 Johnson, Blind Willie
 Johnson, Buddy
 Johnson, Conrad
 Johnson, Earnest "44 Flunkey"
 Johnson, Edith North
 Johnson, Ernie
 Johnson, Henry "Rufe"
 Johnson, Herman E.
 Johnson, James Price
 Johnson, James "Steady Roll"
 Johnson, James "Stump"
 Johnson, Joe
 Johnson, Johnnie
 Johnson, L. V.
 Johnson, Larry
 Johnson, Lemuel Charles "Lem"
 Johnson, Lonnie
 Johnson, Louise
 Johnson, Luther "Georgia Boy" "Snake"
 Johnson, Luther "Houserocker"
 Johnson, Margaret
 Johnson, Mary
 Johnson, Pete
 Johnson, Plas
 Johnson, Robert Leroy
 Johnson, Syl
 Johnson, Tommy
 Johnson, Wallace
 Johnson, Willie Lee
 Jones, Albennie
 Jones, Andrew "Junior Boy"
 Jones, Bessie
 Jones, Birmingham
 Jones, Calvin "Fuzzy"
 Jones, Carl
 Jones, Casey
 Jones, Clarence M.
 Jones, Curtis
 Jones, Dennis "Little Hat"
 Jones, Eddie "One-String"
 Jones, Floyd
 Jones, James "Middle Walter"
 Jones, Joe
 Jones, "Little" Johnny
 Jones, Little Sonny
 Jones, Maggie
 Jones, Max
 Jones, Moody
 Jones, Paul "Wine"
 Jones, Tutu
 Jones, Willie
 Joplin, Janis
 Jordan, Charley
 Jordan, Louis

Jordan, Luke
 Kane, Candye
 Kansas City Red
 Kaplan, Fred
 Katz, Bruce
 K-Doe, Ernie
 Keb' Mo'
 Kellum, Alphonso "Country"
 Kelly, Jo Ann
 Kelly, Paul
 Kelly, Vance
 Kelton, Robert "Bob"
 Kemble, Will Ed
 Kennedy, Jesse "Tiny"
 Kenner, Chris
 Kent, Willie
 Kid Stormy Weather
 Kimbrough, David, Jr.
 Kimbrough, Junior
 Kimbrough, Lottie
 King Curtis
 King Ernest
 King, Al
 King, Albert
 King, Bnois
 King, Bobby
 King, Chris Thomas
 King, Earl
 King, Eddie
 King, Freddie
 King, "Little" Jimmy
 King, Riley B. "B. B."
 King, Saunders
 Kinsey, Lester "Big Daddy"
 Kinsey Report
 Kirk, Andrew Dewey "Andy"
 Kirkland, Eddie
 Kirkland, Leroy
 Kirkpatrick, Bob
 Kittrell, Christine
 Kizart, Lee
 Kizart, Willie
 Koda, Michael "Cub"
 Koerner, Ray & Glover
 Kolax, King
 Korner, Alexis
 Kubek, Smokin' Joe
 Lacey, Rubin "Rube"
 Lacey, William James "Bill"
 Lambert, Lloyd
 Lance, Major
 Landreth, Sonny
 Lane, Mary
 Lang, Eddie
 Lang, Jonny
 Larkin, Milton "Tippy"
 LaSalle, Denise
 Lastie, David
 Latimore, Benny
 Laury, Booker T.
 Lawhorn, Samuel "Sammy"
 Lawlars, Ernest "Little Son Joe"
 Laws, Johnny
 Lay, Sam
 Lazy Lester
 Leadbelly
 Leadbitter, Michael Andrew "Mike"
 Leake, Lafayette
 Leaner, George and Ernest
 Leary, S. P.
 Leavy, Calvin
 Leavy, Hosea
 Led Zeppelin
 Lee, Bonnie
 Lee, Frankie
 Lee, John Arthur
 Lee, Julia
 Lee, Lovie
 Leecan, Bobby
 Left Hand Frank
 Legendary Blues Band
 Leiber and Stoller
 Leigh, Keri
 Lejeune, Iry
 Lembo, Kim
 Lenoir, J.B.
 Leonard, Harlan
 Levy, Louis "Lou"
 Levy, Morris
 Levy, Ron
 Lewis, Bobby
 Lewis, Furry
 Lewis, Johnie (Johnny)
 Lewis, Meade "Lux"
 Lewis, Noah
 Lewis, Pete "Guitar"
 Lewis, Smiley
 Liggins, Jimmy
 Liggins, Joe
 Liggions, Dave
 Lightfoot, Alexander "Papa George"
 Lightnin' Slim
 Lincoln, Charlie
 Linkchain, Hip
 Lipscomb, Mance
 Liston, Virginia
 Little, Bobby
 Little Buster
 Little Charlie
 Little Mike

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Little Milton
 Little Miss Cornshucks
 Little Richard
 Little Sonny
 Little Walter
 Littlefield, "Little" Willie
 Littlejohn, John
 Lockwood, Robert, Jr.
 Lofton, "Cripple" Clarence
 Logan, John "Juke"
 Lomax, Alan
 Lomax, John Avery
 Lonesome Sundown
 Long, James Baxter "J. B."
 Lornell, Christopher "Kip"
 Louis, Joe Hill
 Louisiana Red
 Love, Clayton
 Love, Coy "Hot Shot"
 Love, Preston
 Love, Willie
 Lowe, Sammy
 Lowery, Robert "Bob"
 Lowry, Peter B. "Pete"
 Lucas, William "Lazy Bill"
 Lusk, "Professor" Eddie
 Lutcher, Joe
 Lutcher, Nellie
 Lynn, Barbara
 Lynn, Trudy
 Lyons, Lonnie
 Mabon, Willie
 Mack, Lonnie
 MacLeod, Doug
 Macon, Albert
 Macon, John Wesley "Mr. Shortstuff"
 Macon, Q. T.
 Maghett, Samuel Gene "Magic Sam"
 Magic Slim
 Maiden, Sidney
 Mallard, Sax
 Malo, Ron
 Malone, "John Jacob" J. J.
 Margolin, Bob
 Mars, Johnny
 Martin, Carl
 Martin, "Fiddlin'" Joe
 Martin, Sallie
 Martin, Sara
 Maxwell, David
 May, Roosevelt
 Mayall, John
 Mayes, Pete
 Mayfield, Curtis
 Mayfield, Percy
 Mays, Curley
 Mayweather, "Earring" George
 McCain, Jerry "Boogie"
 McCall, Cash
 McClain, Mary "Diamond Teeth"
 McClain, "Mighty" Sam
 McClennan, Tommy
 McClinton, Delbert
 McClure, Bobby
 McCoy, Charlie
 McCoy, George and Ethel
 McCoy, "Kansas" Joe
 McCoy, Robert Edward
 McCoy, Rose Marie
 McCoy, Viola
 McCracklin, Jimmy
 McCray, Larry
 McDaniel, Clara "Big"
 McDaniel, Floyd
 McDaniel, Hattie
 McDowell, Fred
 McGee, Bo Cleo "Big Bo"
 McGee, Reverend F. W.
 McGhee, Brownie
 McGhee, Granville "Sticks"
 McGill, Rollee
 McGuirt, Clarence "Candyman"
 McIlwaine, Ellen
 McKune, James
 McMahan, Andrew "Blueblood"
 McMullen, Fred
 McNeely, Cecil James "Big Jay"
 McPhatter, Clyde Lensley
 McPhee, Tony "T. S."
 McShann, James Columbus "Jay"
 McTell, Blind Willie
 McVea, John Vivian "Jack"
 Meaux, Huey P.
 Medwick, Joe
 Melrose, Lester
 Memphis Jug Band
 Memphis Minnie
 Memphis Piano Red
 Memphis Slim
 Mickle, Elmon "Drifting Slim"
 Mighty Clouds of Joy
 Milburn, Amos
 Miles, Josephine "Josie"
 Miles, Lizzie
 Miles, Luke "Long Gone"
 Miller, Clarence Horatio "Big"
 Miller, Jay D. "J. D."
 Miller, Polk
 Millet, McKinley "Li'l"
 Millinder, Lucky

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Milton, Roy
 Minner, D. C.
 Miss Rhapsody
 Mississippi Jook Band
 Mississippi Matilda
 Mississippi Sheiks
 Mitchell, Bobby
 Mitchell, George
 Mitchell, "Little" Walter
 Mitchell, McKinley
 Mitchell, Willie
 Molton, Flora
 Montgomery, Eurreal "Little Brother"
 Montoya, Coco
 Montrell, Roy
 Mooney, John
 Moore, Aaron
 Moore, Alexander "Whistlin' Alex"
 Moore, Alice "Little"
 Moore, Dorothy
 Moore, Gary
 Moore, Johnny
 Moore, Johnny B.
 Moore, Monette
 Moore, Oscar
 Moore, Reverend Arnold Dwight "Gatemouth"
 Moore, Samuel David "Sam"
 Moore, William "Bill"
 Morello, Jimmy
 Morgan, Mike
 Morgan, Teddy
 Morganfield, "Big" Bill
 Morisette, Johnny "Two-Voice"
 Morton, Jelly Roll
 Moss, Eugene "Buddy"
 Moten, Benjamin "Bennie"
 Motley, Frank Jr.
 Murphy, Matt "Guitar"
 Murphy, Willie
 Murray, Bobby
 Musselwhite, Charlie
 Myers, Bob
 Myers, Dave "Thumper"
 Myers, Louis
 Myers, Sam
 Naftalin, Mark
 Napier, Simon
 Nappy Chin
 Nardella, Steve
 Neal, Kenny
 Neal, Raful
 Neely, "Little" Bobby
 Nelson, Chicago Bob
 Nelson, Jimmy "T-99"
 Nelson, Romeo
 Nelson, Tracy
 Nettles, Isaiah
 Neville Brothers
 Newbern, Willie "Hambone Willie"
 Newborn, Calvin
 Newborn, Phineas, Jr.
 Newell, "Little" Eddie
 Nicholson, James David "J. D."
 Nighthawk, Robert
 Nighthawks
 Nix, Willie
 Nixon, Elmore
 Nixon, Hammie
 Nolan, Lloyd
 Nolen, Jimmy
 North Mississippi All Stars
 Norwood, Sam
 Nulisch, Darrell
 Oden, "St. Louis" Jimmy
 Odetta
 Odom, Andrew "Big Voice" "Little B. B."
 Offitt, Lillian
 Oliver, Paul
 Omar and the Howlers
 O'Neal, Winston James "Jim"
 Orioles
 Oscher, Paul
 Otis, Johnny
 Otis, Shuggie
 Overbea, Danny
 Overstreet, Nathaniel "Pops"
 Owens, Calvin
 Owens, Jack
 Owens, Jay
 Owens, Marshall
 Page, Oran Thaddeus "Hot Lips"
 Palm, Horace M.
 Palmer, Earl
 Palmer, Robert
 Palmer, Sylvester
 Parker, Charlie
 Parker, Herman, Jr. "Little Junior" "Junior"
 Parker, Sonny
 Parr, Elven "L. V."
 Patt, Frank "Honeyboy"
 Patterson, Bobby
 Pattman, Neal
 Patton, Charley
 Payne, John W. "Sonny"
 Payne, Odie Jr.
 Payton, Asie
 Peebles, Ann
 Peebles, Robert
 Peg Leg Sam
 Pejoe, Morris

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Perkins, Al
Perkins, Joe Willie "Pinetop"
Perry, Bill (Mississippi)
Perry, Bill (New York)
Perry, Oscar Lee
Peterson, James
Peterson, Lucky
Petway, Robert
Phelps, Kelly Joe
Phelps, Walter
Phillips, Brewer
Phillips, Earl
Phillips, Gene
Phillips, Little Esther
Phillips, Washington
Piano C. Red
Piano Red
Piazza, Rod
Piccolo, Greg
Pichon, Walter G. "Fats"
Pickens, Buster
Pickett, Dan
Pierce, Billie
Pierson, Eugene
Pierson, Leroy
Pinson, Reverend Leon
Pitchford, Lonnie
Pittman, Sampson
Plunkett, Robert
Pomus, Jerome "Doc"
Poonanny
Popa Chubby
Porter, David
Porter, Jake
Porter, King
Portnoy, Jerry
Powell, Eugene
Powell, Vance "Tiny"
Prater, Dave
Presley, Elvis Aron
Preston, Jimmy
Prez Kenneth
Price, "Big" Walter "The Thunderbird"
Price, Lloyd
Price, Sammy
Primer, John
Primich, Gary
Professor Longhair
Pryor, James Edward "Snooky"
Prysock, Arthur
Prysock, Wilbert "Red"
Pugh, Joe Bennie "Forrest City Joe"
Pullum, Joe
Qualls, Henry
Quattlebaum, Doug
Rachell, Yank
Radcliff, Bobby
Rainey, Gertrude "Ma"
Rainey, Willie Guy
Raitt, Bonnie
Rankin, R. S.
Rapone, Al
Rascoe, Moses
Rawls, Johnny
Rawls, Louis Allen "Lou"
Ray, Floyd
Ray, Harmon
Ray, Kenny "Blue"
Rector, Milton
Reed, A. C.
Reed, Dalton
Reed, Francine
Reed, Jimmy
Reed, Lula
Reed, Mama
Reynolds, Big Jack
Reynolds, Blind Joe
Reynolds, Theodore "Teddy"
Rhodes, Sonny
Rhodes, Todd
Rhodes, Walter "Lightnin' Bug"
Rhythm Willie
Rice, "Sir Mack" Bonny
Richard, Rudolph "Rudy"
Richardson, C. C.
Richardson, Mona
Richbourg, John
Ricks, "Philadelphia" Jerry
Ridgley, Thomas "Tommy"
Riedy, Bob
Riley, Judge Lawrence
Rishell, Paul
Rivers, Boyd
Roberts, Roy
Robicheaux, Coco
Robillard, Duke
Robinson, Alvin "Shine"
Robinson, Arthur Clay "A. C."
Robinson, Bobby
Robinson, Elzadie
Robinson, Fenton
Robinson, Freddy
Robinson, James "Bat The Hummingbird"
Robinson, Jessie Mae
Robinson, Jimmie Lee
Robinson, L. C. "Good Rockin'"
Robinson, Tad
Rockin' Dopsie
Rodgers, James Charles "Jimmie"
Rodgers, Sonny "Cat Daddy"

Rogers, Jimmy
 Rogers, Roy
 Roland, Walter
 Rolling Stones
 Roomful of Blues
 Ross, Doctor Isaiah
 Rothchild, Paul A.
 Roulette, Freddie
 Rounds, Ernestine Smith
 Roy, Earnest "Guitar"
 Royal, Marshal
 Rush, Bobby
 Rush, Otis
 Rushing, James Andrew "Jimmy"
 Russell, Tommie Lee
 Sadler, Haskell Robert "Cool Papa"
 Saffire-The Uppity Blues Women
 Sain, Oliver
 Salgado, Curtis
 Samples, John T.
 Sanders, Will Roy "Wilroy"
 Sane, Dan
 Sanford, Amos "Little"
 Satherly, Art
 Saunders, Red
 Savoy Brown
 Saydak, Ken
 Sayles, Charlie
 Sayles, Johnny
 Scales, Alonzo "Lonnie"
 Scott, Buddy
 Scott, Clifford
 Scott, Ecrettia Jacobs "E. C."
 Scott, Esther Mae "Mother"
 Scott, James Jr.
 Scott, Joe
 Scott, "Little" Jimmy
 Scott, Marylin
 Scott, Sonny
 Scott-Adams, Peggy
 Scruggs, Irene
 Seals, Son
 Sears, "Big" Al
 Sease, Marvin
 Seeley, Bob
 Sellers, Brother John
 Semien, "King Ivory" Lee
 Senegal, Paul "Lil' Buck"
 Seward, Alexander T. "Alec"
 Shakey Jake
 Shannon, Mem
 Shannon, Preston
 Shaw, Allen
 Shaw, Eddie
 Shaw, Eddie "Vaun," Jr.
 Shaw, Robert
 Shaw, Thomas "Tom"
 Shepherd, Kenny Wayne
 Sheppard, Bill "Bunky"
 Shields, Lonnie
 Shines, Johnny
 Shirley & Lee
 Short, J. D.
 Shower, "Little" Hudson
 Siegel-Schwall Band
 Simien, "Rockin'" Sidney
 Simmons, Malcolm "Little Mack"
 Sims, Frankie Lee
 Sims, Henry "Son"
 Singer, Hal
 Singleton, T-Bone
 Sista Monica
 Sloan, Henry
 Small, Drink
 Smith, Albert "Al"
 Smith, "Barkin'" Bill
 Smith, Bessie
 Smith, Boston
 Smith, Buster
 Smith, Byther
 Smith, Carrie
 Smith, Clara
 Smith, Clarence "Pine Top"
 Smith, Effie
 Smith, Floyd
 Smith, George "Harmonica"
 Smith, Huey "Piano"
 Smith, J. B.
 Smith, John T.
 Smith, Lucius
 Smith, Mamie
 Smith, Moses "Whispering"
 Smith, Robert Curtis
 Smith, Talmadge "Tab"
 Smith, Trixie
 Smith, Willie "Big Eyes"
 Smith, Willie Mae Ford "Mother"
 Smither, Chris
 Smokey Babe
 Smothers, Abraham "Little Smokey"
 Smothers, Otis "Big Smokey"
 Snow, Eddie
 Soileau, Floyd
 Solberg, James
 Solomon, Clifford
 Sons of Blues, The (The S.O.B. Band)
 Spady, Clarence
 Spand, Charlie
 Spann, Lucille
 Spann, Otis

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Spann, Pervis
 Sparks Brothers
 Speckled Red
 Specter, Dave
 Speir, H.C.
 Spencer, Evans
 Spires, Arthur "Big Boy"
 Spires, Bud
 Spirit of Memphis Quartet
 Spivey, Addie "Sweet Pease"
 Spivey, Elton "The Za Zu Girl"
 Spivey, Victoria
 Sprott, Horace
 Spruell, Freddie
 Spruill, James "Wild Jimmy"
 Stackhouse, Houston
 Staples, Roebuck "Pops"
 Stark, Cootie
 Steiner, John
 Stephens, James "Guitar Slim"
 Stepney, Billie
 Stidham, Arbee
 Stokes, Frank
 Stone, Jesse
 Stovall, Jewell "Babe"
 Stovepipe No. 1
 Strehli, Angela
 Stroger, Bob
 Strother, James "Jimmie"
 Strother, Percy
 Stuckey, Henry
 Studebaker John
 Sugar Blue
 Sumlin, Hubert
 Sunnyland Slim
 Super Chikan
 Swan Silvertone Singers
 Sweet Honey in the Rock
 Sweet Miss Coffy
 Sykes, Roosevelt
 Sylvester, Hannah
 Taggart, Blind Joe
 Tail Dragger
 Taj Mahal
 Talbot, Johnny
 Talty, Don
 Tampa Red
 Tarheel Slim
 Tarnopol, Nat
 Tarrant, Rabon
 Tarter and Gay
 Tasby, Finis
 Tate, Buddy
 Tate, Charles Henry "Baby"
 Tate, Tommy
 Taylor, Eddie
 Taylor, Eva
 Taylor, Hound Dog
 Taylor, Johnnie Harrison
 Taylor, Johnny Lamar "Little"
 Taylor, Koko
 Taylor, Melvin
 Taylor, Montana
 Taylor, Otis
 Taylor, Sam "Bluzman"
 Taylor, Sam "The Man"
 Taylor, Ted
 Tedeschi, Susan
 Temple, Johnny "Geechie"
 Ten Years After
 Terry, Cooper
 Terry, Doc
 Terry, Sonny
 Thackery, Jimmy
 Tharpe, Sister Rosetta
 Theard, Sam "Spo-Dee-O-Dee"
 Thierry, Huey Peter "Cookie"
 Thomas, Blanche
 Thomas, Earl
 Thomas, Elmer Lee
 Thomas, Frank, Jr.
 Thomas, George
 Thomas, Henry "Ragtime Texas"
 Thomas, Hersal
 Thomas, Hociel
 Thomas, Irma
 Thomas, James "Son" "Ford"
 Thomas, Jesse "Babyface"
 Thomas, Joe
 Thomas, Lafayette Jerl "Thing"
 Thomas, Leon
 Thomas, Robert
 Thomas, Rufus
 Thomas, Tabby
 Thomas, Willard "Rambling"
 Thomas, Willie B.
 Thompson, Alphonso "Sonny"
 Thompson, David "Little Dave"
 Thompson, Mac
 Thompson, Odell
 Thompson, Ron
 Thornton, Willie Mae "Big Mama"
 Thorogood, George
 Tibbs, Andrew
 Timmons, Terry
 Tinsley, John E.
 Tisdom, James "Smokestack"
 Too Tight Henry
 Toure, Ali Farka
 Toussaint, Allen

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Townsend, Henry	Washboard Willie
Townsend, Vernell Perry	Washington, Albert
Treniers	Washington, Dinah
Tribble, Thomas E. "TNT"	Washington, Isidore "Tuts"
Trice, Richard	Washington, Leroy
Trice, William Augusta "Willie"	Washington, Marion "Little Joe"
Tri-sax-ual Soul Champs	Washington, Toni Lynn
Trout, Walter	Washington, Walter "Wolfman"
Trucks, Derek	Waterford, Charles "Crown Prince"
Tucker, Bessie	Waterman, Richard A. "Dick"
Tucker, Ira	Waterman, Richard Alan
Tucker, Luther	Waters, Ethel
Tucker, Tommy	Waters, Mississippi Johnny
Turner, Ike	Waters, Muddy
Turner, Joseph Vernon "Big Joe"	Watkins, Beverly "Guitar"
Turner, Othar	Watkins, John "Mad Dog"
Turner, Troy	Watson, Johnny "Daddy Stovepipe"
Turner, Twist	Watson, Johnny "Guitar"
TV Slim	Watson, Mike "Junior"
Tyler, Alvin "Red"	Watts, Louis Thomas
Upchurch, Phil	Watts, Noble "Thin Man"
Valentine, Cal	Weathersby, Carl
Van Ronk, Dave	Weaver, James "Curley"
Van Singel, Amy	Weaver, Sylvester
Vanleer, Jimmy	Webb, "Boogie" Bill
Vaughan, Jimmy	Webb, Willie "Jitterbug"
Vaughan, Stevie Ray	Webster, Katie
Vaughn, Jimmy	Weepin' Willie
Vaughn, Maurice John	Welch, "Monster" Mike
Venson, Tenner "Playboy" "Coot"	Welding, Pete
Vinson, Eddie "Cleanhead"	Weldon, Casey Bill
Vinson, Mose	Wellington, Valerie
Vinson, Walter	Wells, Junior
Walker, Blind Willie	Wells, Michael "Lightnin'"
Walker, Charles	West, Charlie
Walker, Dennis	Weston, John
Walker, George "Chicken George"	Wheatstraw, Peetie
Walker, Jimmy	Wheeler, Golden "Big"
Walker, Joe Louis	Wheeler, Thomas James "T.J."
Walker, Johnny Mayon "Big Moose"	Whistler's Jug Band
Walker, Junior	Whitaker, "King" Herbert
Walker, Phillip	White, Artie "Blues Boy"
Walker, Robert "Bilbo"	White, Bukka
Walker, T-Bone	White, Cleve "Schoolboy Cleve"
Wallace, Sippie	White, Georgia
Wallace, Wesley	White, Joshua Daniel "Josh"
Walls, Harry Eugene Vann "Piano Man"	White, Lynn
Walton, Mercy Dee	White, Miss Lavelle
Walton, Wade	Wiggins, Phil
Ward, Robert	Wilborn, Nelson
Wardlow, Gayle Dean	("Red Nelson," "Dirty Red")
Warren, Robert Henry "Baby Boy"	Wiley, Geechie
Washboard Doc	Wilkins, Joe Willie
Washboard Sam	Wilkins, Lane
Washboard Slim	Wilkins, Reverend Robert Timothy "Tim"

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Williams, Andre “Mr. Rhythm”
Williams, Andy “Too-Hard”
Williams, Arbess
Williams, Arthur Lee “Oscar Mississippi”
Williams, “Big” Joe Lee
Williams, Bill
Williams, Charles Melvin “Cootie”
Williams, Clarence
Williams, Ed “Lil’ Ed”
Williams, George “Bullet”
Williams, Henry “Rubberlegs”
Williams, J. Mayo
Williams, Jabo
Williams, Jimmy Lee
Williams, Joe
Williams, Johnny (1)
Williams, Johnny (2)
Williams, Joseph “Jo Jo”
Williams, Joseph Leon “Jody”
Williams, L. C.
Williams, Larry
Williams, Lee “Shot”
Williams, Lester
Williams, Nathan
Williams, Paul “Hucklebuck”
Williams, Robert Pete
Williams, Willie “Rough Dried”
Williamson, Sonny Boy I (John Lee Williamson)
Williamson, Sonny Boy II (Aleck Miller)
Willis, Harold “Chuck”
Willis, Ralph
Willis, Robert Lee “Chick”
Willis, Willie
Willson, Michelle
Wilmer, Val
Wilson, Al
Wilson, Charles
Wilson, Edith
Wilson, Harding “Hop”
Wilson, Jimmy
Wilson, Kim
Wilson, Lena
Wilson, Quinn
Wilson, Smokey
Wilson, U. P.
Winter, Johnny
Withers, Earnest
Witherspoon, Jimmy
Wolfman Jack
Woodfork, “Poor” Bob
Woods, Johnny
Woods, Mitch
Woods, Oscar “Buddy”
Wrencher, “Big” John Thomas

Wright, Billy
Wright, Early
Wright, Marva
Wright, Overton Ellis “O. V.”
Yancey, James Edward(s) “Jimmy”
Yancey, Mama Estelle
Yardbirds
Young, “Mighty” Joe
Young, Johnny
Young, Zora
Ziegler, John Lee
Zinn, Rusty
ZZ Top

Cultural Entries

Blues Folklore
Convict Labor
11-29
Gandy Dancers
Highways
Hispanic Influences on the Blues
Hoodoo
House-Rent Parties
Juke Joints
Levee Blues
Lumber Camps
Lynching and the Blues
Racial Issues and the Blues
Railroads
Sex as Lyric Concept
Topical Blues: Disasters
Topical Blues: Sports
Topical Blues: Urban Renewal
Violence as Lyric Concept
Women and the Blues

Geographical Entries

Africa
Alabama
Arkansas
Atlanta
Chicago
Cincinnati
Detroit
Gary, Indiana
Georgia
Japan
Kansas City
Louisiana

Memphis
 Mississippi
 Nashville
 Oakland
 Piedmont (region)
 Pittsburgh
 Rochester, New York
 San Francisco
 Spain
 St. Louis, Missouri
 Sweden
 Texas
 United Kingdom and Ireland
 United States
 Washington (state)

Historiography

Discography
 Great Depression
 Great Migration
 Historiography
 Libraries
 Periodicals
 World War II

Instruments

Accordion
 Bands
 Banjo
 Bass
 Diddley Bow
 Drums
 Fiddle
 Fife and Drums
 Guitar
 Harmonica
 Jug
 Kazoo
 Mandolin
 Piano
 Rubboard
 Saxophone
 Singing
 Spoons

Music Business

American Folk Blues Festival (AFBF)
 Chitlin Circuit

Marketing
 Radio
 Recording
 TOBA

Musical Styles

Black Sacred Music
 Blues
 Blues Ballad
 Country Music
 Field Hollers
 Funk
 Jazz
 Rap
 Rhythm and Blues
 Rock 'n' Roll
 Soul

Musical Techniques

Forms
 Scales
 Transcription

Record Labels

ABC-Paramount/Bluesway
 Ace (United Kingdom)
 Ace (United States)
 Adelphi Records
 Advent Records
 A.F.O.
 Agram Blues/Old Tramp
 Ajax
 Aladdin/Score
 Alert
 Alligator
 Antone's
 Apollo/Lloyds/Timely
 ARC (American Record Corporation)
 Archive of American Folk Song
 Arhoolie/Blues Classics/Folk Lyric
 Asch/Disc/Folkways/RBF
 Atlantic/Atco/Spark
 Atlas
 AudioQuest
 Bandera
 Banner

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Barrelhouse
Bayou
Bea & Baby
Beacon
Bear Family
Big Town
Biograph
Black & Blue/Isabel/Riverboat
Black & White
Black Magic
Black Patti
Black Swan Records
Black Top
Blind Pig
Blue Horizon
Blue Lake
Blue Moon (Spain)
Blue Suit
Blue Thumb
Bluebird
Blues and Rhythm
Blues Boy's Kingdom
Blues Connoisseur
Bobbin
Brainstorm
Broadway
Bronze
Brunswick
Bullet
Burnside Records
C.J.
Cameo
Cannonball Records
Capitol
Catfish
Cava-Tone Recording
Cee-Jay
Celeste
Champion (Indiana)
Champion (Tennessee)
Chance
Charly
Chart
Chess/Aristocrat/Checker/Argo/Cadet
Chief/Profile/Age
Class
Classics
Club 51
Cobra/Artistic
Collectables
Columbia
Combo
Conqueror
Coun-tree
Crazy Cajun Records
Crown
Danceland
De Luxe/Regal
Decca
Decca/Coral/MCA
Delmark
Derby (New York)
Dial
Dig/Ultra
Document
DooTone/DooTo/Authentic
Dot
Drummond
Duke
Duke/Peacock/Back Beat
Earwig
Ebony (1)
Ebony (2)
Edison
Edsel
El Bee (El + Bee)
Electro-Fi
Elektra Records
Elko
Evidence
Excello/Nashboro
Excelsior/Exclusive
Fame
Fantasy/Prestige/Bluesville/Galaxy/Milestone/
Riverside Record Companies
Feature
Fedora
Fire/Fury/Enjoy/Red Robin
Flash
Flying Fish
Formal
Fortune/Hi-Q
Four Brothers
Freedom/Eddie's
Frisco
Frog/Cygnnet
Gennett
Giant/Gamma/Globe
Glover
Gold Star
Goldband Records
Goldwax
Gotham/20th Century
Harmograph
Herald/Ember
Heritage
Herwin (1943 and Before)
Herwin (1967 and After)
Hi Records
High Water

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

HighTone	One-derful/M-Pac/Mar-V-lus/Toddlin Town
Home Cooking	Opera
House of Blues Records	Ora Nelle
Hy-Tone	Oriole
Ichiban Records	Orleans
Imperial	Paramount
Instant	Parkway
Irma	Pathé
Ivory Records	Perfect
Jaxyson	Piedmont (label)
JEMF (John Edwards Memorial Foundation)	Ping
Jewel/Paula/Ronn	Puritan
JOB (J.O.B.)	P-Vine Special
Joe Davis/Davis/Beacon	Pye/Nixa
Joliet	QRS
JSP	R and B (1)
Jubilee/Josie/It's a Natural	R and B (2)
JVB	RCA/Victor/Bluebird/Camden/Groove/X/Vik
Keynote	Recorded in Hollywood/Hollywood/ Cash/Lucky/Money
King/Federal/Queen	Red Lightnin'
King Snake	Rhino
K.O.B. (Kings of The Blues)	Rhumboogie
Kokomo	Rhythm
L + R	Ric
Lanor Records	Rockin'/Glory
London-American	Romeo
LuPine	Ron
Macy's	Rooster Blues
Mad/M&M	Roots/Paltram/Truth/For Specialists Only
Maison du Soul	Rosetta Records
Malaco/Waldoxy	Roulette/Rama
Mamlish Records	Rounder
Mapleshade Records	RST/RST Blues Document/Fantasy By
Mardi Gras	Rykodisc
Matchbox	SAR/Derby
Melodeon Records	Savoy/National/Regent/Acorn
Melotone	Scepter/Wand
Mercury/Fontana/Keynote/Blue Rock	SD (Steiner Davis)
Merritt	Sensation
MGM (55000 R&B series)	Sequel
Miltone	7-11
Miracle/Premium	Seymour
Modern Blues Recordings	Shad
Modern/Flair/Meteor/Kent/RPM	Shama
Montgomery Ward	Shanachie/Yazoo/Belzona/Blue Goose
Mosaic	Signature
Motown	Sirens
Mr. R&B Records	Sittin' In With/Jade/Jax/Mainstream
Negro Art	SONY/Legacy/Columbia/Epic/OKeh
Nighthawk Records	Sound Stage 7
OJL (Origin Jazz Library)	Specialty/Fidelity/Juke Box
OKeh	Spire
Old Swing-Master/Master	Spivey Records
Old Town	Staff/Dessa
Oldie Blues

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

Star Talent/Talent
Starr Piano Company
Stash Records
Stax/Volt
Stinson Records
Storyville Records
Sue (1)
Sue (2)
Sultan
Sun/Phillips International/Flip
Sunbeam
Sunrise (postwar)
Sunrise (prewar)
Super Disc
Superior
Supertone
Supreme
Swing Time/Down Beat
Takoma
Tangerine Records
Telarc
Tempo-Tone
Tennessee
Testament
Theron
Tip Top
Tomato Records
Tone-Cool
Top Cat
Transatlantic
Trilon
Trix
Trumpet Records/Globe Music/Diamond
Record Company
Twilight/Twilight
United/States
USA
Vanguard
Varsity
Vault
Vee-Jay/Abner/Falcon
Verve
Victor
Vita
Vitacoustic
Vocalion
Vogue
Westside
Wolf/Best of Blues

Related Art Forms

Black Newspaper Press
Dance: Artistic

Dance: Audience Participation
Films
Humor
Literature, Blues in Television
Theater, Blues in

Song Titles

Baby Please Don't Go/Don't
You Leave Me Here
Big Boss Man (Hi-Heel Sneakers)
Black Angel Blues (Sweet Little Angel)
Blues in the Night
Boogie Chillen'
C.C. Rider
Careless Love
Casey Jones
Catfish Blues
Cow Cow Blues
Dirty Dozens
Down Home Blues
Drifting Blues
Fattening Frogs for Snakes
Frankie and Johnny
Going Down Slow (I've Had My Fun)
Hesitation Blues
Hide Away
Hoochie Coochie Man
How Long How Long (Sitting
on Top of the World)
I Believe I'll Make a Change (Dust My Broom)
I Just Want to Make Love to You
I'm A Man (Mannish Boy)
I'm Gonna Move to The Outskirts of Town
Jesus Is a Dying Bed Maker (In My Time of Dying)
John Henry
Key to the Highway
Killing Floor (The Lemon Song)
Let the Good Times Roll
M & O Blues
Make Me a Pallet on Your Floor
Mama Talk to Your Daughter
Matchbox Blues
Mean Mistreater Mama/Blues Before
Sunrise (Kindhearted Woman)
Memphis Blues, The ("Mama Don' 'low"
or "Mister Crump")
Mustang Sally
My Black Mama (Walking Blues)
Oh Pretty Woman (Can't Make You Make Love Me)

THEMATIC LIST OF ENTRIES

One Time Blues/Kokomo Blues (Sweet Home Chicago)
Red Rooster, The
Roll and Tumble Blues
See That My Grave Is Kept Clean
Shake 'Em on Down
Signifying Monkey, The
Since I Met You Baby
Smokestack Lightning

Spoonful (A Spoonful Blues)
St. Louis Blues
Stack Lee
Stormy Monday
Straight Alky Blues
This Train (My Babe)
Tight Like That
Vicksburg Blues
Work with Me Annie

LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS

Rick Anderson
Sparks, Nevada

Peter Aschoff
University of Mississippi

Ray Astbury
Dublin, Ireland

Ace Atkins
University of Mississippi

Joe Atkins
University of Mississippi

Anthony Barnett
Lewes, East Sussex, England

Scott Barretta
Oxford, Mississippi

Mathew J. Bartkowiak
Lansing, Michigan

David Beaudouin

Daniel Beaumont
University of Rochester

Debbie Bond
The Alabama Blues Project

Robert Bowman
Toronto, Ontario

George Boziwick
The New York Public Library

John Broven
Cold Spring Harbor, New York

Monica J. Burdex
California State University, Northridge

Lenny Carlson
San Francisco, California

Patrice Champarou
Draveil, France

Steve Cheseborough
Greenwood, Mississippi

Joe Clark
University of Maryland,
Baltimore County

Andrew M. Cohen
Memphis, Tennessee

Nadine Cohodas
Washington, D.C.

Scott Dirks
Forest Park, Illinois

Tina Spencer Dreisbach
Hiram College

Robert Eagle
Victoria, Australia

Phil Earhart
Music City Blues Society,
Nashville, Tennessee

Michael Farley
St. Lawrence University

Joseph Filisko
Joliet, Illinois

Meg Fisher
New York, New York

Tom Fisher
Lawrence, Kansas

Kevin Fontenot
Tulane University

Robert Webb Fry II
Florida State University

LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS

Steven Galbraith
The Ohio State University

Jim Gallert
Ferndale, Michigan

Paul Garon
Beasley Books, Chicago, Illinois

John Garst
University of Georgia

Deborah Gillaspie
Chicago Jazz Archive

Leonard Goines
New York, New York

Wayne Goins
Kansas State University

Robert Gordon
Memphis, Tennessee

Bill Graves
San Antonio, Texas

Michael Gray
Kirkbymoorside, York, England

Bryan Grove
The Pennsylvania State University

Frank-John Hadley
Newton, MA

Bob Hall
Prospect Music, Sheffield, England

Jeff Harris
Rochester, New York

David Harrison
Bristol, England

Trevor S. Harvey
Florida State University

Fred J. Hay
Appalachian State University

G rard Herzhaft
Villeurbanne, France

Yasufumi Higurashi
Blues Interaction Inc., Tokyo, Japan

Thorsten Hindrichs
Johannes Gutenberg-University Mainz

Michael Hoffheimer
Oxford, Mississippi

Mark Hoffman
Bainbridge Island, Washington

Steve Hoffman
Takoma Park, Maryland

Robert Horn
Washington Blues Society, University Place,
Washington

Elliott S. Hurwitt
New York, New York

John F. Jakubs
University of South Carolina

Greg Johnson
University of Mississippi

Maria Johnson
Southern Illinois University

Jeffrey A. Jones
Florida State University

Gregg Kimball
Library of Virginia

John Kimsey
DePaul University

Edward Komara
State University of New York at Potsdam

Yves Laberge
Institut Qu b cois des Hautes Etudes Internationales

Joseph LaRose
The University of Akron

Andrew Leach
Center for Black Music Research,
Columbia College

LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS

Morris Levy
Harvard University

Anders Lillsunde
Scandinavian Blues Association

Rainer E. Lotz
Birgit-Lotz-Verlag, Bonn, Germany

Donna Lowe
Brandon, Manitoba

Peter B. Lowry
Austinmer, New South Wales, Australia

Wolf Marshall
Solana Beach, California

Dean A. Masullo
Vanderbilt University

Olivia Carter Mather
University of California at Los Angeles

Kenny Mathieson
Strathspey, Scotland

Jennifer Mathieu
Houston Press

Barry Mazor
Nashville, Tennessee

Ben McCorkle
The Ohio State University

Chris McDonald
York University

Fred R. McIntosh II
Pittsburgh Blues Society

Luigi Monge
Liguria Blues, Genova, Italy

Rochelle Montagne
Tucson, AZ

Brian Moon
University of Arizona

Tom Morgan
New Orleans, Louisiana

Craig Morrison
Outremont, Québec

Peter Muir
The City University of New York

Bill Munson
Toronto, Ontario

Jennifer Nardone
Durham, North Carolina

Peter Narváez
St. John's, Newfoundland

David Nelson
Snow Camp, North Carolina

Justin O'Brien
Chicago, Illinois

Ryan Olsen
Pawling, New York

Jim O'Neal
Kansas City, Missouri

John Otis
Strawberry Fields Music, Potsdam, New York

David Penny
London, England

Adam Perlmutter
Guitar One, New York, New York

Heather Pinson
Ohio University

Michael Point
Austin, Texas

Stephanie Poxon
Library of Congress

Valerie Sweeney Prince
Hampton, Virginia

Robert Pruter
Lewis University

Daniel M. Raessler
Randolph-Macon Woman's College

LIST OF CONTRIBUTORS

Lawrence N. Redd

Tearland, Texas

Bob Riesman

Oak Park, Illinois

Guido van Rijn

Overveen, Netherlands

Jason Robinson

University of California, San Diego

Fred Rothwell

Aylesbury, England

Dave Rubin

New York, New York

Tony Russell

London, England

Howard Rye

London, England

Robert Sacré

University of Liège

James Salem

The University of Alabama

David Sanjek

BMI Archives, New York, New York

Phoenix Savage-Wiseman

New Orleans, Louisiana

Ed Schenk

Detroit Blues Heritage Series

James Segrest

Notasulga, Alabama

John Sinclair

Detroit, Michigan

Jared Snyder

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

Robert Soricelli

State University of New York at Potsdam

R. J. Spangler

Detroit Blues Society

Richard Spottswood

Naples, Florida

Erin Stapleton-Corcoran

University of Chicago

Denise Tapp

Baltimore, Maryland

Dennis Taylor

Nashville, Tennessee

Jim Thomas

San Jose, California

John J. Thomas

State University of New York at Oswego

Gene Tomko

Charlotte, North Carolina

Steven C. Tracy

University of Massachusetts

Jim Trageser

Escondido, California

Paul Vernon

Falls Church, Virginia

Gayle Wald

The George Washington University

Jeff Wanser

Hiram College

Robert Washburn

Potsdam, New York

Gaile Welker

Greensboro, North Carolina

Justin Wert

College of Charleston

David Whiteis

Chicago, Illinois

Roger Wood

Houston Community College

Ron Wynn

Nashville City Paper

Alan R. Young
Auckland, New Zealand

Jerry Zolten
The Pennsylvania State University

Vicente Zúmel
Radio PICA, Barcelona, Spain

INTRODUCTION

The Encyclopedia of the Blues provides a historical, musical, and cultural foundation for the study of blues music. It traces musical and cultural trends engendered by the blues and the aspects of the music industry and of American society that helped to nurture those trends. The blues is a uniquely American form, and thus the majority of the individuals discussed are American; however, as many entries will address, the blues has grown far beyond its regional origins to become a form of entertainment and self-expression for all races, classes, and nationalities. (For an overview of the blues as a musical genre, see the “Blues” entry in volume one.) The Encyclopedia of the Blues is a multidisciplinary project, combining the work of approximately 140 scholars of music, bibliography, and American history and culture. Many of the contributors count musicianship as part of their scholarship, and they bring to the project a first-hand knowledge of the rich heritage of the blues; many have been involved in groundbreaking recordings such as the Library of Congress sessions; and many bring experience in music journalism to the project.

How to Use This Book

The Encyclopedia of the Blues, the first multivolume reference work devoted to the blues, consists of approximately 2100 entries, which range from brief, fact-based summaries of 50 words to comprehensive analytical articles of 5000 words or more. The two volumes encompass the whole history of the blues, from its antecedents in African and American traditional music, through its late 19th century beginnings among African Americans, the classic pre-World War II era, the influential postwar era, to the contemporary styles performed today for audiences of all races and classes. The Encyclopedia of the Blues features profiles of artists and other persons influential to the development of the genre, such as historians, songwriters, and label owners. It also discusses the business of the blues, including its marketing as well as its presentation on film, television, radio, and recorded media. Lastly, many entries discuss the music itself:

musical forms, characteristics, instruments, and individual songs. Rounding out the work are entries on race, gender, culture, and the blues as a whole.

Perhaps the most significant feature of the encyclopedia is the easily accessible A to Z format. Cross-referencing in the form of See Alsos at the end of most entries refer the reader to other related entries. Each article contains a bibliography and discography. The citations include sources used by the writer and editor as well as additional items that may be of interest to the reader. Most books or articles cited are easily available through interlibrary loan services in libraries. LP and CD notes are cited when used by the entry author. Songs, first album issues, and LP or CD reissues suggested by the entry writer are also included. There are several widely used reference works to which bibliographies and discographies refer. Because they are so frequently cited, we have used abbreviations within the entries, but provide the full citations in the list “Frequently Cited Sources” following this introduction. Blind Entries direct readers to essays listed under another title. For example, the blind entry “Morganfield, McKinley” refers the reader to the article on Muddy Waters. A thorough, analytical index complements the accessibility of the entries, easing the reader’s entry into the wealth of information provided. A thematic list of entries is also included to assist readers with research in particular subjects.

Coverage

The encyclopedia includes:

- Biographies – Birth and death dates are provided, many discovered through research exclusive to this project, as well as up-to-date career histories. Biographical entries will include the individual’s performing name or best-known nickname as well as the birth name, if applicable, and any additional pseudonyms. Longer entries include sections on music and influence. Readers should be aware that many musicians came from non-literate or semi-literate cultural backgrounds, often in regions and eras where vital records were kept erratically if at all. Thus, some dates are simply unknown, while others are indicated as uncertain.

- Culture – Cultural entries treat issues of race, gender, and culture, including topics such as Blues Folklore, the Great Migration, House Rent Parties, Highways, Racial Issues and the Blues, Women and the Blues, and Hoodoo.
- Geographic regions – Entries in this category focus on specific American cities, states, and regions, as well as foreign countries in which a blues culture has developed. Some of the regions treated are the Piedmont, Chicago, Detroit, Texas, St. Louis, Louisiana, Oakland, San Francisco, Memphis, and Japan.
- Historiography – Entries in this category address the study, criticism, and archiving of the blues. Discography, Libraries, Periodicals, and a general entry on historiography, among other subjects, are included.
- Instruments – Entries examine the adaptation and role of specific instruments in the development of the blues, as well as the influence of the blues form on the use of the instrument. Entries include Singing, Guitar, Drums, Bass, Piano, Saxophone, Fife and Drums, Diddley Bow, Accordion, and Jug.
- Music business – This category discusses the business of the blues: its marketing, distribution, and commercial performance. Entries include topics such as the American Folk Blues Festival, Chitlin Circuit, Marketing, Radio, and Recording.
- Music styles – Entries in this category examine the influence of certain styles of music on the blues—for example, Black Sacred Music and Field Hollers—as well as the influence of the blues on other forms and its role in the development of later styles such as Jazz, Soul, Rock-and-Roll, and Rap.
- Music technique – Discussion of the technical and theoretical aspects of the music of the blues forms an important component of the encyclopedia. Entries include such topics as Forms, Scales, and Transcription.
- Record labels – These entries provide overviews of labels, including both active labels and those no longer in business, which have been influential in the development and dissemination of the blues. Years of operation are provided, as is information on mergers and other shifts in the music industry. As with biographical entries, longer articles include sections on specific influence.
- Related Arts – Other art forms have had a significant influence on the blues, and its styles and themes emerge in many types of artistic expression. Entries include Dance: Artistic, Films, Literature, Television, and Theatre.

- Song Titles – These entries consider the treatments of lyrics and melodies by various musicians through successive generations. Entries include such significant songs as “Frankie and Johnny,” “Hoochie Coochie Man,” “I’m A Man (Mannish Boy),” “John Henry,” “Mean Mistreater Mama”/“Blues Before Sunrise (Kindhearted Woman),” “Mustang Sally,” and “Red Rooster.”

Acknowledgements

As to be expected in a publication of this size, the editor is indebted to a great number of people:

At Routledge: Kevin Ohe, who conceived of the project, asked me to be editor, and acted as initial liaison with the publisher; Marie-Claire Antoine, who succeeded Kevin and who provided guidance at several critical times; and Sylvia Miller at the overall management level for sustaining the project. I worked closely with Mark O’Malley during the intermediate stages of assigning entries. Deborah Stein provided timely and much-needed clerical help in the summer and fall of 2003. Rachel Granfield was indispensable during the remaining year of editorial preparation.

I am indebted to my editorial team for their work, suggestions, and the writers they brought to the project. Peter Redvers-Lee established the biographical entry component and enlisted many writers. Eric Leblanc, Dave Rubin, David Nelson, and Bob Eagle advised during the planning and assignment stages. Eric especially was a crucial contact in securing several important writers for the label entries, and he was a source of advice and information regarding name authority work. Dave Rubin helped me shape the instrumental entries, and he submitted the “Guitar” entry as a lead example. The Associate Editor, Daphne Duval Harrison, was of enormous help through all stages of work, especially during the editing phase in 2004–2005. Her editorial advice on several major entries was much needed, and my conversations with her helped to steer the orientation of this encyclopedia. Greg Johnson, Blues Archivist at the University of Mississippi Blues Archive, served as Consulting Editor in 2004–2005, helping me read the longer entries in draft and providing editorial comments and bibliographic citations. Scott Barretta was added to the Advisory Board in 2004, and I called upon him to read and comment on the longer subject entries. His comments on the entries “Recording” and “Blues” were invaluable. I would like to thank the rest of the Advisory Board—Billy Branch, Samuel Floyd, Bruce Iglauer, Yves Laberge, Roger Misiewicz, Jim O’Neal, Ann Rabson, Richard Shurman, Lorenzo Thomas, and Billy Vera – for their assistance.

I am grateful to all of our contributors for their participation and enthusiasm, and for their encouragement to me at the various times when my energies were temporarily depleted. They and the editorial team were committed to the scholarship of this project, and they have done all they could to make it possible.

I would like to mention a few additional people who assisted me. Peter B. Lowry, Tom Reed, and Gary Galo read through selected entries and made informed comments. Individual conversations with Stanley Sadie, Paul Oliver, Lawrence Cohn, Mary Katherine Aldin, Paul Garon, and Alan Balfour resulted in general principles and a few needed details for the encyclopedia. I would like to thank Howard Rye for granting permission to Routledge for use of the October 1924 Ma Rainey session data from Blues and Gospel Records 1890–1943 as an example in the “Discography” entry. The project is also greatly indebted to Frank Driggs and Gene Tomko, who graciously supplied the cover photos and the great majority of the interior images. I would also like to thank my parents and my brother’s family for their support, however bogged they were sometimes by the immensity of the task.

If a dedication is appropriate, it is to the men and women in the blues, whether as musicians, venue owners, label owners, media professionals, or front-line journalists and writers. Without their activity and their written reports, there would be no encyclopedia.

In closing, I view this encyclopedia not as an editorial accomplishment, but as a rare gift bestowed by a community of blues performers and listeners. May we continue to nurture them and their art to the utmost of our abilities.

Edward Komara

FREQUENTLY CITED SOURCES

- AMG All Music Guide to the Blues, 3rd edition, edited by Vladimir Bogdanov, Chris Woodstra, and Stephen Thomas Erlewine (San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2003)
- DGR Dixon, Robert M.W., John Godrich, and Howard W. Rye. Blues & Gospel Records, 1890–1943. 4th edition. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997.
- Gospel Records 1943–1969 Cedric Hayes and Robert Laughton, Gospel Records 1943–1969. 2 volumes. London: Record Information Services, 1993.
- Harris Sheldon Harris, Blues Who's Who (New Rochelle, NY: Arlington House, 1979) Five editions.
- Herzhaft Gérard Herzhaft, Encyclopedia of the Blues (Fayetteville AR: University of Arkansas Press, 1992); an English language edition of his Encyclopédie du Blues (Lyon: Federop, 1979; Paris: Seghers, 1990). An enlarged French edition, La Grande Encyclopédie du Blues, was published by Editions Fayard in 1997.
- Larkin Colin Larkin, The Encyclopedia of Popular Music, 3rd edition (London; New York: Muze, 1998), 8 volumes.
- Lord Tom Lord, The Jazz Discography. 26 volumes. Vancouver, BC; Redwood, NY: Lord Music Reference/Cadence Jazz Books, 1992–2002.
- LSFP Mike Leadbitter, Neil Slaven, Les Fancourt, and Paul Pelletieir, compilers. Blues Records 1943–1970. 2 volumes. A Selective Discography: vol. 1: A–K (London: Record Information Services, 1987); “The Bible of the Blues”: vol. 2: L–Z (Record Information Services, 1994).
- McGrath Bob McGrath, The R&B Indies. 2 volumes. West Vancouver, BC: Eyeball, 2000.
- New Grove Jazz Barry Kernfeld, editor, The New Grove Dictionary of Jazz, second edition, two volumes, London: Macmillan; New York: Grove's Dictionaries, 2002.
- Santelli Robert Santelli, The Big Book of Blues: A Biographical Encyclopedia (New York: Penguin, 1993).
- Southern Eileen Southern, Biographical Dictionary of Afro-American and African Musicians (Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1982).
- Sutton Sutton, Allan. American Record Labels and Companies, An Encyclopedia. Denver, CO: Mainspring Press, 2000.
- Whitburn Whitburn, Joel. Billboard Top R&B Singles 1942–1999. Menomonee Falls, WI: Record Research, Inc., 2000.

A

ABC-PARAMOUNT/BLUESWAY

Formed in Hollywood in 1956 as a branch of the film corporation, ABC-Paramount's first artists were post-Elvis rock 'n' roll acts (such as Paul Anka and Danny and the Juniors) and R&B singer Lloyd Price. The label surrounded Price's voice with big band arrangements and white choruses and made him a star with "Stagger Lee" and "Personality". In 1959, ABC-Paramount lured Ray Charles from Atlantic Records, and the next three years brought Charles three #1 records: "Georgia on My Mind", "Hit the Road, Jack", and "I Can't Stop Loving You". The subsidiary BluesWay was founded in 1966 and some of the greatest blues performers recorded for the label, including Jimmy Reed, B. B. King, John Lee Hooker, Otis Spann, Jimmy Rushing, and T-Bone Walker. ABC acquired other labels in the late 1960s, including Dot and Blue Thumb, but in 1978, Paramount sold all of its music interests to MCA.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

Gillett, Charlie. The Sound of the City: The Rise of Rock 'n' Roll. New York: Dell, 1972.
Southall, Brian. The A-Z of Record Labels. London: Sanctuary, 2003.

Discography

Edwards, David, Patrice Eyrie, and Mike Callahan. "ABC-Paramount Records Story." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/abc/abestory.html> (accessed December 17, 2004).

ABNER, EWART

b. 11 May 1923; Chicago, IL
d. 27 December 1997; Los Angeles, CA

Record executive of the post-World War II era, heading at different times two of the biggest black-owned labels of all time, Vee-Jay and Motown. With owner Art Sheridan, he first ran the Chance label (1950-1954) and then served as the general manager and part owner at Vee-Jay beginning in 1955, running the company for founders Vivian Carter and James Bracken. In 1961 he became president. Under his stewardship, Vee-Jay (and its subsidiary label Abner) became a major independent by not only getting hits on such blues acts as Jimmy Reed and John Lee Hooker, but also such soul acts as Jerry Butler, Gene Chandler, Dee Clark, Betty Everett, and such rock 'n' roll acts as the Beatles and the Four Seasons. Abner owned and headed Constellation (1963-1966), and then joined Motown, where he served as its president from 1973 to 1975. Abner continued to work with Motown's Berry Gordy in various capacities until his death.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. Chicago Soul. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

See also Bracken, James C.; Carter, Vivian; Chance; Motown; Vee-Jay/Abner/Falcon

ABSHIRE, NATHAN

b. 27 June 1913; near Gueydan, LA

d. 13 May 1981; Basile, LA

Cajun vocalist and accordionist, noted for his “Pine Grove Blues,” which he first recorded in 1949 for the OT label run by Virgil Bozeman. For many years he was active mostly in south Louisiana, although in the 1970s he performed widely at festivals and colleges.

RYAN OLSEN/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: Lord

See also Louisiana

ACCORDION

The accordion reached its peak popularity with African American musicians between the end of Reconstruction (1865–1877) and the early twentieth century. Clarence Tross, a West Virginian musician, reported that it was “mostly the colored man” playing accordions in that period, and a contemporary from coastal Virginia remembered that accordions were “the only kind of music we had back then.” In Mississippi, some of the earliest ensembles playing blues used accordions, and one accordionist, Walter “Pat” Rhodes, was among the earliest Delta blues singers to make records.

As the first mass-produced instrument marketed to rural blacks, the accordion served as the precursor to the mass marketing of guitars that fueled the growth of rural blues. Even so, few early blues musicians played accordions and by the mid-1930s a number of factors combined to bring about the demise of its use in almost any popular black music. With the emergence of zydeco—the blues-influenced music of the French-speaking African American population of southwest Louisiana—in the late 1950s a new bluesy accordion sound emerged. Zydeco showcased accordion virtuosity the way blues bands featured the electric guitar. In the hands of master accordionist Clifton Chenier, the accordion achieved unprecedented credibility as a blues instrument.

Types of Accordions

Two types of accordions concern us here: the diatonic button accordion and the piano accordion. All accordions are two rectangular boxes connected by a bellows with the melody notes on the right side and the accompaniment chords on the left side. As the name implies, the button accordion has buttons for both melody and accompaniment. The diatonic scale is the same scale found on the single-key harmonicas (such as the Marine Band) commonly played by blues harpists. Like the slots on those harmonicas, each button on the accordion produces a different tone depending on whether the bellows are pushed or pulled. The original design was for a single row in a single key, but later models featured two and three rows in related keys allowing the accordionist to play in multiple keys. The accompaniment may have as few as two buttons or up to twenty-four in various configurations. This single-row design is the model still popular with the Cajuns of southwest Louisiana.

Diatonic accordions dominated sales to the general populace from the 1840s to 1925 when sales of the piano accordion began to dominate. This instrument offered several immediate advantages over the button accordion. First, the piano keyboard offered a full chromatic scale that sounded the same note regardless of the bellows direction. Secondly, the accompaniment provided up to 128 buttons arranged in bass-chord combinations to allow playing of almost any chord progression. The button accordion was reduced to a niche instrument while the piano accordion became wildly popular in America and remained so until the advent of rock ‘n’ roll.

Pre-Blues Usage

One of the earliest photographic images of an American accordionist is a daguerreotype from 1850 of a black man from a southeast Louisiana plantation playing a button accordion. The slave narratives collected by the Works Progress Administration in the 1930s contain recollections of accordions being played as accompaniment for dancing. The largest concentration of accordion players occurred in the post-Civil War period, a time referred to as Reconstruction (1865–1877). The newly emancipated slaves purchased instruments with their own earnings and they seem to have bought accordions in significant numbers. Accordions were cheap, lightweight, durable, loud, and provided built-in accompaniment.

Mississippi Blues

In Mississippi, older relatives of Big Joe Williams, K. C. Douglas, Jim Brewer, Eli Owens, and Henry

Townsend all played accordion. Two of the most important Mississippi accordionists were Homer Lewis and Walter “Pat” Rhodes. Lewis performed with blues guitarist Charley Patton at Dockery’s plantation in the early part of the twentieth century in an ensemble made up of one or two guitarists, Lewis, and a fiddler. It was likely a popular sound—Rhodes, a street singer from nearby Cleveland, regularly played in an ensemble with similar instrumentation. In 1927 he became the first Sunflower County musician to record. His recording of “Crowing Rooster Blues” accompanied by Richard “Hacksaw” and Mylon Harney on guitars precedes Patton’s own more famous recording of “Banty Rooster Blues” by two years. This record, backed with “Leaving Home Blues,” is the only commercial blues recording in English that used the accordion until the emergence of zydeco. Folklorist John Lomax did record another Mississippi accordionist in 1937 for the Library of Congress. Blind Jesse Harris sang ballads and reels for the most part, but did perform a memorable version of the popular blues tune “Sun Gonna Shine in My Door Someday.”

Both the Harris and Rhodes recordings show how hard it is to play blues on the diatonic button accordion. The instrument is incapable of playing many of the slides, glissandos, and flatted notes that are dominant features of blues music. Both men stop playing while they sing and play simple melodic lines using only bellows shakes to emulate the vocal line. These shortcomings made it easy for a number of musicians who started on the accordion to decide to switch to guitar as soon as one became available. Some of those young musicians included Big Joe Williams, Blind Willie McTell, and McKinley Morganfield, aka Muddy Waters. Huddie Ledbetter or “Leadbelly” was born in 1885 in the far northwest corner of Louisiana where he learned to play the button accordion for the local dances called “Sukey Jumps” with the older musicians in the area. As a young adult he switched to the twelve-string guitar, but continued to play the accordion, eventually recording four tunes on it for various small New York record companies in the early 1940s.

Amédé Ardoin and Creole Blues

A unique blues accordion tradition, unrelated to the northwest Louisiana style played by Leadbelly, developed in southwest Louisiana among the French-speaking people of African descent. Their music synthesized elements of the French Caribbean, Cajun, American Indian, French, and African (Wolof and Bambara) cultures. The music of English-speaking African Americans made a relatively late entrance into this mix. For example, accordionist Sidney Babineaux recalled first hearing the blues on a Bessie Smith record in the late 1920s. Blues were considered risqué and crude and were banned from Creole dances. Still the most influential musician of the period, Amédé Ardoin, recorded a handful of “blues” songs. These did not follow the chord structure common to the twelve-bar format, but instead followed the harmonic pattern caused by the left-hand accompaniment of the accordion. Ardoin played his blues in the “cross position” that blues harmonica players commonly use and this caused the instrument’s standard accompaniment to be reversed. Accordionists cannot play the critical fifth chord; they can merely imply it, leaving the blues with an unresolved feel.

Ardoin’s blues conceded structure to this harmonic reality, but not to the spirit of the blues. His vocals are blues inflected, full of flatted thirds and sevenths and the slurs and glissandos associated with the best Delta blues singing. His most distinct blues records include “Blues de Basile,” “Les Blues de Voyage,” and “Les Blues de Crowley.” Ardoin’s playing career ended in late 1930s when he was beat up by a group of white patrons at a dance, run over, and left for dead. The incident caused Ardoin to lose his mind and led to his eventual commitment to a Louisiana asylum for the insane where he eventually died. His two steps and waltzes are still performed by both Cajuns and Creoles, but it is his blues in particular that influenced zydeco pioneer Clifton Chenier.

Zydeco

Ardoin’s final recordings made in December 1934 were the last by a Creole musician until 1954. During this undocumented period, musical influences from the greater English-speaking African American culture became more important in Creole music. Blues, which had often been taboo even in Ardoin’s time, became an integral part of the repertoire of younger Creoles. The “rub board” or “frattoir” became the standard for accompaniment of the accordion and accordionists began to favor multiple-row accordions. In 1954 a Lake Charles appliance dealer named Eddie Shuler recorded one of these younger accordionists, Boozoo Chavis. Shuler recruited Houston-based bandleader Classie Ballou to accompany Chavis and the resulting record, “Paper in My Shoe,” became a huge regional hit. Chavis’s success gave a visibility to this new music outside of the French-speaking community. The success of “Paper in My Shoe” was partially responsible for getting Clifton Chenier signed by Specialty Records in 1955.

Clifton Chenier

Clifton Chenier has the distinction of being the first Creole musician to master the piano accordion. With a full four-octave piano keyboard, Chenier could emulate the licks of any blues pianist, but the bellows-driven free reeds created a much more nuanced, vocal quality similar to that of blues harpists. Chenier also used the full 128 accompaniment buttons to approximate the left hand of boogie-woogie and blues pianists. His recordings for Specialty Records such as “Boppin’ the Rock” and “All the Things I Did for You” display the masterful blues playing that garnered him a large regional audience throughout the Gulf Coast.

While other Creole musicians remained local or, like Chavis, retired, Chenier embarked on endless touring, both nationally and internationally, and slowly developed a following for his style, which was now labeled zydeco. The name derived from the title of a traditional Creole dance “Les Haricots Sont Pas Sale” (“The Snap Beans Are Not Salty”) cut to a phonetic spelling of the Creole pronunciation of haricots (snap beans). Chenier, billed as the “King of Zydeco,” scored his largest regional hits with his blues tunes: “Louisiana Blues,” “Black Gal,” and “Black Snake Blues.” As a national presence, he performed at venues that commonly presented blues performers, which created a large crossover audience for zydeco. For Americans he presented a completely new image of the accordion as a soulful instrument that contrasted greatly with their preconceptions of saccharine sweet accordion music that were drawn from Lawrence Welk’s popular TV show.

Chenier’s talent combined with tireless touring and consistent recordings brought zydeco a national popularity that allowed other zydeco performers to follow on the path that he had blazed. This included Chavis, who returned from retirement to have enormous success with his own more rural version of the music. Still Chenier remained the King until his death in 1987. His legacy is heard in the playing of his son, C. J. Chenier; Stanley Dural, aka “Buckwheat Zydeco,” his former organist; and Nathan Williams. All play piano accordion in a blues style that owes greatly to Chenier. The success of zydeco and quality of Chenier’s blues performances have inspired many to pick up the accordion and will continue to inspire more.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

- Savoy, Ann Allen. Cajun Music: A Reflection of a People. Vol. 1. Eunice, LA: Bluebird Press, 1984.
- Snyder, Jared. “Boozoo Chavis, His Own Kind of Zydeco Man.” Sing Out! 44, no. 1 (Fall 1999): 34–41.
- . “Breeze in the Carolinas: The African American Accordionists of the Upper South.” The Free-Reed Journal 3 (Fall 2001): 19–45.
- . “Leadbelly and His Windjammer: Examining the African American Button Accordion Tradition.” American Music 12 (1994): 148–166.
- . “The Legacy of the Afro-Mississippi Accordionists.” Black Music Research Journal 17, no. 1 (Spring 1997): 37–58.
- Tisserand, Michael. The Kingdom of Zydeco. New York: Arcade Press, 1998.

Discography

Virginia Traditions: Non-Blues Secular Music (1978, Blue Ridge Institute BRI 001). (This recording includes non-blues accordion by Isaac “Boo” Curry and Clarence Waddy.)

Ardoin, Amédé

Amédé Ardoin: Pioneer of Louisiana French Blues 1930–1934 (1995, Arhoolie Folklyric 7007).

Chavis, Boozoo

Refer to The Kingdom of Zydeco and Boozoo Chavis, His Own Kind of Zydeco Man for a more complete discography. The Lake Charles Atomic Bomb (1990, Rounder 2097). (Contains some of his earliest hits.)

Chenier, Clifton

Refer to Cajun Music: A Reflection of a People for a more complete discography. Some of his earliest recordings and greatest hits include the following:

- Bayou Blues* (1970, Specialty Records SPCD-2139-2).
- Zydeco, Volume One: The Early Years* (1989, Arhoolie Folklyric CD-307).
- 60 Minutes with the King of Zydeco* (1994, Arhoolie Folklyric CD-301).

Harris, Blind Jesse

“Sun Gonna Shine in My Door Some Day.” LC-1331-A-1. Reissued on Field Recordings, Volume 4, Mississippi & Alabama 1934–1942 (1998, Document DOCD-5578).

Leadbelly

Each of Leadbelly’s accordion pieces are on different records:

- A Leadbelly Memorial Volume, Volume II* (1963, Stinson Records SLP 19).
- Take This Hammer* (1968, Folkways FTS 31019).
- Global Accordion: Early Recordings (2001, Wergo SM 1623).

Rhodes, Walter “Pat”

“The Crowing Rooster” (Columbia 14289-D). Leaving Home Blues (Columbia 14289-D).

See also Louisiana; Mississippi; Williams, Nathan

ACE (UNITED KINGDOM)

London-based British record label, started in 1978 as a division of Chiswick Records, founded in 1975 by Ted Carroll and Roger Armstrong, as the imprint for the company's reissue catalog. Ace soon became the principal label and grew into one of the most important sources of reissues of blues and R&B recordings from the 1940s onward. A&R consultants prominent in programming blues and R&B releases have included John Broven, Ray Topping, and Tony Rounce.

Striking licensing deals with American labels, Ace was prominent in the LP era both for high-quality reissues of mainstream blues artists such as B. B. King, Elmore James, and Smokey Hogg and for systematic reissues of many R&B artists including Maxwell Davis, Floyd Dixon, Gene Phillips, Pee Wee Crayton, Jimmy McCracklin, Joe Houston, Saunders King, Little Willie Littlefield, Jimmy Nelson, and Joe Lucher. In pursuit of this endeavor, the company briefly revived the long-defunct ten-inch LP and further pursued the idea in 2003 by issuing a series of CDs called "The Ace 10" Series," that catered to situations in which the intended program made for a short CD. The Modern and associated labels, whose masters Ace acquired in the CD era, have figured largely among the sources drawn on for reissues and have been repackaged systematically on CDs in the twenty-first century. Such CDs include lavishly annotated boxed sets by B. B. King and Elmore James. Similar access to Detroit's Sensation label has allowed releases by John Lee Hooker and Todd Rhodes.

Significant blues releases have been licensed from Excello and from Specialty, including releases from Joe and Jimmy Liggins, Roy Milton and Camille Howard. These releases were unusual in that they used American-compiled packages; most Ace issues are assembled in house. Other labels that have been drawn on include Decca, Combo, Bandera, Bobbin, Peacock, King/Federal, Old Town, Goldband, Stax, Dig, and other labels associated with Johnny Otis. In 1995 the catalog included eleven CDs by John Lee Hooker, six CDs and a seven-CD boxed set by Sam "Lightnin'" Hopkins, and ten CDs by B. B. King. In 2003 there were twenty CDs in the catalog by Albert King alone. These statistics exemplify the lavish scale of Ace's operations.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Ace Records website, <http://www.acerecords.co.uk/>.

ACE (UNITED STATES)

Jackson, Mississippi, label founded in 1955 by Johnny Vincent, who held nearly all of his recording sessions in New Orleans, especially at Cosimo Matassa's recording studio. Hits include Huey "Piano" Smith's "Rocking Pneumonia and the Boogie Woogie Flu" and Frankie Ford's "Sea Cruise." Releases slowed to a trickle after the mid-1960s, but in 1971 Vincent reactivated it to reissue classic performances and some new material.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Mabry, Donald J. "The Rise and Fall of Ace Records: A Case Study in the Independent Record Business," Business History Review 64, no. 3 (Autumn 1990): 411-450.

Discography: McGrath

Edwards, David, Mike Callahan, and Patrice Eyries. "Ace/Teem Records (US) Album Discography." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/ace.html> (accessed February 15, 2005).

ACE, BUDDY

b. James L. Land, 11 November 1936; Jasper, TX
d. 24 December 1994; Waco, TX

Singer. The "Silver Fox of the Blues" grew up in Houston, singing in a gospel group with Joe Tex before beginning his R&B and blues activities. After touring with Bobby "Blue" Bland and Junior Parker, he was signed to the Duke/Peacock label in 1955. Ace had a few hits, such as "Nothing In the World Can Hurt Me (Except You)" in the 1960s before relocating to Los Angeles and then Oakland in 1970 where he built up a following with his soul-drenched live shows. His most prolific recording period came shortly before his death as "Silver Fox" and "Don't Hurt No More" were released in 1994. He was also represented by several posthumous releases, most notably "From Me to You," his Bobby "Blue" Bland tribute.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Santelli
Bonner, Brett J. "Buddy Ace" (obituary). Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 92.

Discography

"Buddy Ace, Silver Fox" (1994. Evejim Records 2040).
"Don't Hurt No More" (1994. Evejim Records 2018).
"From Me to You" (1995. Evejim Records 2048).
"The Real Thing" (1996. Jewel 5054).

ACE, JOHNNY

ACE, JOHNNY

b. John Marshall Alexander, Jr., 9 June 1929; Memphis, TN

d. 25 December 1954; Houston, TX

Ace served in the U.S. Navy during World War II and returned to Memphis in 1946 to perform with several groups, including the B. B. King and the Beale Street Boys group. After King and Bobby Bland left the group, Ace renamed the group the Beale Streeters. He joined the Duke label in 1952 and scored a #1 hit with his first release, "My Song." Following releases were hits as well: "Cross My Heart," "The Clock," "Never Let Me Go," "Please Forgive Me," and "Saving My Love for You."

Ace died tragically at the age of twenty-five. His death was attributed to Russian Roulette, despite widely circulated rumors of murder and career manipulation, and came at the peak of his career. That year, he had been voted most programmed artist of the year by a Cashbox magazine poll.

Following his death, his career culminated with the release of "Pledging My Love." It is an anthem to love and youthful angst; its success was fueled partially by the mystique surrounding his tragically young death and its soulful rendition of what would turn out to be an R&B standard.

Unfortunately, few recordings exist for Ace. In his brief career, virtually everything was released in the months following his death. The limited amount of material does not, however, diminish his role as an essential troubadour of this phase of R&B music in America.

TOM FISHER

Bibliography

Salem, James M. The Late Great Johnny Ace. Urbana-Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 1984.

Discography

My Song (1952, Duke-102).

Anymore (1955, Duke-136).

Johnny Ace Memorial Album (1955, Duke LP-70).

Memorial Album for Johnny Ace (1957, Duke DLP-71).

Johnny Ace Memorial Album (1974, Duke X-71).

See also Duke; Duke/Peacock/Back Beat; Memphis; Rhythm and Blues

ACES, THE

Also known as the Jukes. Members consisted of Louis Myers (guitar, harmonica, and vocals), Dave Myers (bass guitar), and Fred Below (drums). They were the backing band for Little Walter in the early 1950s, and as such they are considered by historians to be one of first Chicago blues bands to venture on tours outside their native city. In the 1970s they toured Europe, recording on the European labels Vogue, Black and Blues, and MCM.

RYAN OLSEN/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG; Larkin; Santelli

See also Below, Fred; Chicago; Little Walter; Myers, Dave "Thumper"; Myers, Louis

ACEY, JOHNNY

b. 1925

Pianist and vocalist active in the 1950s and 1960s; also performed and recorded with Paul "Hucklebuck" Williams. His best known solo songs are "You Walked Out" and "Stay Away Love." Recorded for the DJL, Flyright, and Falew labels.

RYAN OLSEN/EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: Lord, LSFP

See also Interstate/Flyright/Krazy Kat/Magpie/Harlequin/Heritage/Texas Blues; Williams, Paul "Hucklebuck"

ACKLIN, BARBARA

b. 28 February 1943; Oakland, CA

d. 27 November 1998; Omaha, NE

An R&B singer from Chicago whose vulnerable soprano voice typified the city's brand of soft soul during the 1960s and 1970s. After Acklin joined Brunswick Records in 1966, her first singles did not meet major success, but when she teamed up with Gene Chandler in 1968, the duo scored two hits: "Show Me the Way to Go" and "From the Teacher to the Preacher." Her solo career was also established in 1968 with two big hits, "Love Makes a Woman" and "Just Ain't No Love." Acklin was a valuable songwriter for Brunswick, achieving her first big success in 1966 by cowriting one of Jackie Wilson's best hits, "Whispers (Gettin' Louder)." Collaborating with the company's ace songwriter, Eugene Record, she contributed "Have I Seen Her," "Let Me Be the Man My Daddy Was," and "Toby" for the Chi-Lites.

Acklin moved to Capitol Records in 1974 and, working with producer Willie Henderson, created the hit called “Raindrops.” Her last chart record was in 1975. Acklin performed at the 1994 Chicago Blues Festival.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. “Barbara Acklin.” Goldmine (July 1983): 169–170.

See also Brunswick; Capitol; Chicago

ADAMS, ALBERTA

b. Roberta Louise Osborn, 26 July 1917; Indianapolis, IN Vocalist. Santelli gives a birth date of July 26, 1923. Adams moved to Detroit before age five and began her career in the late 1930s as a tap dancer. She started to sing at Club B&C in 1942, worked steadily as a vocalist from 1942 onward, and then began incorporating blues into her repertoire. By 1944 she was billed locally as “Queen of the Blues.” Adams toured with Lionel Hampton, Louis Jordan, and T-Bone Walker and recorded for Chess in 1952 and under her own name for Cannonball.

JIM GALLERT/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Santelli

Discography: LSFPSelected Recordings

“Say Baby Say” (Cannonball CBD 29114).

“Born with the Blues” (Cannonball CBD 29106).

See also Cannonball Records; Chess/Aristocrat/Checker/Argo/Cadet; Detroit

ADAMS, ARTHUR

b. 25 December 1940; Medon (near Jackson), TN

Adams learned to play his uncle’s Silvertone guitar. Gospel music shaped his first interest in music, but he soon switched to blues. In the early 1960s, Adams moved to Los Angeles where he became a top studio guitarist, writing songs for television movies and touring the United States and Europe with soul divas (Nina Simone, Diana Ross, Maria Muldaur, and others) before achieving a dream and becoming head of the house band at B. B. King’s club in Los Angeles in 1995. In 1999 he recorded his first blues album and started an unending series of gigs in clubs and festivals throughout the world.

ROBERT SACRÉ

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)

Bock, Scott M. “Arthur Adams: I’m workin’, I’m workin’” Juke Blues (London) no. 49 (Spring 2001): 12–16.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Back on Track (1999, Blind Pig CD-5055).

Soul of the Blues (2003, PMRC PM2–60301).

ADAMS, DR. JO JO

b. 1918; Alabama

d. 27 February 1988; Chicago, IL

Vocalist in the style of Cab Calloway, active especially during the 1940s and 1950s. Recorded six sides with Tom Archia for Aristocrat in Chicago, and also for the ML, Ald, Hy, Change, and Parrot labels. In his later years, he occasionally performed in small neighborhood venues in Chicago.

RYAN OLSEN/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Josephic, Beth. “Jo Jo Adams.” Living Blues no. 87 (July/August 1989): 34.

Discography: Lord; LSFP

See also Archia, Tom; Blue Lake; Calloway, Cab; Chess/Aristocrat/Checker/Argo/Cadet; Chicago

ADAMS, FAYE

b. ca. 1932; Newark, NJ

Aka Faye Scruggs, Fayle Tuell. Larkin gives birth year as circa 1925. Blues, R&B, and “pre-soul” singer who gained fame for such hits on the Herald label as “Shake A Hand,” “I’ll Be True” (which were #1 hits in 1953), and “Hurts Me to My Heart” (reached #1 in 1954). Also recorded on the Lido, Warwick, Savoy, and Prestige labels in the early 1960s. In later years she devoted her time to church activities.

RYAN OLSEN/EDWARD KOMARA

ADAMS, FAYE

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

Discography: LSFP

See also Fantasy/Prestige/Bluesville/Galaxy/Milestone/Riverside; Herald/Ember; Rhythm and Blues; Savoy/National/Regent/Acorn

ADAMS, JOHN TYLER “J. T.”

b. 17 February 1911; Morganfield, KY

Learned guitar from his father. Moved to Indianapolis in 1941, where he met Scrapper Blackwell. His main musical partner was Shirley Griffith, with whom he made the Bluesville album J. T. Adams and Shirley Griffith (Bluesville BVLP-1077). Activity not known after 1977.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

“J. T. Adams.” Cadence 3 no. 3 (September 1977): 10.

Discography: LSFP

See also Blackwell, Scrapper; Fantasy/Prestige/Bluesville/Galaxy/Milestone/Riverside; Griffith, Shirley

ADAMS, JOHNNY

b. Latham John Adams, 5 January 1932; New Orleans, LA

d. 14 September 1998; Baton Rouge, LA

Singer. The “Tan Canary” of New Orleans, often considered the musicians’ favorite Crescent City vocalist, began his career with a decade of gospel, singing with the Soul Revivers and the Soul Consolators before crossing over to the secular side and signing with the New Orleans-based Ric label in 1959. The Adams vocal style, at once both urbane and intense, proved to be immediately popular as he recorded a series of regional hits, the first, “I Won’t Cry,” produced by a teenage Mac “Dr. John” Rebennack. Adams, who recruited longtime associate and swamp soul guitar star Walter “Wolfman” Washington for his live act, scored his biggest hit, “Reconsider Me,” in 1969.

Adams, however, soon dropped out of the national scene, performing almost exclusively in New Orleans, primarily at his regular gig at Dorothy’s Medallion

Lounge, and also making an annual appearance at the Heritage & Jazz Festival. Adams reappeared in 1984 when he resumed recording, beginning a long affiliation with Rounder Records on the release of “From the Heart,” an album featuring Washington leading his working band in the only time it was recorded. A series of critically acclaimed albums, including After Dark, Room with a View of the Blues, I Won’t Cry Now, One Foot in the Blues; the Percy Mayfield tribute Walking on a Tightrope followed. Adams emphasized his jazzier side on “Good Morning Heartache” in 1993 and on “The Verdict,” which featured hometown fan Harry, Connick, Jr., on piano in 1995. He also recorded a duet on an album by R&B legend Ruth Brown. “Man of My Word” in 1998, which reunited him with Washington, was his final recording.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG; Larkin; Santelli
Hannusch, Jeff, and Sebastian Danchin. “Johnny Adams” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 142 (November/December 1998): 50–53.

Discography: AMG

See also Louisiana; Ric; Rounder; Washington, Walter “Wolfman”

ADAMS, MARIE

b. Ollie Marie Givens, 19 October 1925; Linden, TX
d. 23 February 1998; Houston, TX (?)

Vocalist who was a highlight of the Johnny Otis Show lineups of the 1950s. She began her recording career on the Peacock label, accompanied by the Cherokee Conyers Orchestra. Remained with the Jimmy Otis band until the late 1950s. Recorded for Capitol, Sure Play, Vended, and Encore Artists. Reported to have died in Houston, Texas, on February 23, 1998.

RYAN OLSEN/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
Burke, Tony. “Marie Adams.” Blues and Rhythm no. 129 (April 1998): 12.

Discography: LSFP

See also Capitol; Duke/Peacock/Back Beat; Otis, Johnny

ADAMS, WOODROW WILSON

b. 9 April 1917; Tchula, MS

Performed on guitar and harmonica. Worked with Howlin' Wolf from the late 1940s through the early 1950s. Known for "Baby You Just Don't Know," "Pretty Baby Blues," and "The Train Is Coming." Adams earned his living driving a tractor throughout life.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSPF

See also Howlin' Wolf

ADELPHI RECORDS

Adelphi Records was founded by siblings Gene and Carol Rosenthal, who were country blues enthusiasts. The Adelphi crew made extensive field recordings in 1969, from Chicago to St. Louis, Memphis, and the Mississippi Delta, in search of prewar blues artists. A few of these were released as compilations representing talent recorded at each major stop: Really Chicago's Blues, The Memphis Blues Again, and Things Have Changed, which featured the artists from St. Louis. Individual albums by Eurreal "Little Brother" Montgomery, George and Ethel McCoy, and Furry Lewis with Bukka White and Gus Cannon were released in the early 1970s, as were recordings by folk artists, including Roy Book Binder, Paul Geremia, and Chris Smither.

In the 1970s, Adelphi released albums by regional blues rock pioneers: the Nighthawks, Catfish Hodge, the Charlottesville Allstars, and Roy Buchanan. The Nighthawks, led by guitarist Jimmy Thackery, recorded "Jacks and Kings" with members of Muddy Waters's band: Pinetop Perkins, Bob Margolin, Guitar Junior, David Maxwell, and Calvin "Fuzzy" Jones.

In the early 1990s, Adelphi announced an 80+ CD release schedule of blues recordings made during the 1960s, marketed as the Blues Vault Series™. The line opened with material by Mississippi John Hurt, Nehemiah "Skip" James, Reverend Robert Wilkins, and Bukka White; in recent years, releases have slowed from the pace first set. Noteworthy additions during the late 1990s and early 2000s include those by R. L. Burnside, Furry Lewis, and David "Honeyboy" Edwards.

DENISE TAPP

Bibliography

Adelphi Records website, <http://www.adelphirecords.com/>.

See alsoADINS, JORIS "GEORGES"

b. 16 October 1932; Kortrijk, Belgium

d. 5 May 1999; Kortrijk, Belgium

Author, blues photographer. Georges Adins was a Belgian blues fan who made pioneering trips to the United States in 1959, 1962, 1966, 1968, and 1969. His fame rests on the photos (particularly of Elmore James) and recordings from those journeys.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

Sacré, Robert. "Georges Adins: A La Recherche Du Blues Perdu." Soul Bag no. 94 (May/June 1983): 24–27.

ADMIRALS, THE

Doo-wop vocal group active in 1955, consisting of Gene McDaniels, Wesley Devereaux, Will Barnes, James Farmer, and Richard Beasley. Previously known as the Sultans, the Admirals recorded for King Records in Cincinnati; the releases were not successful. After the group's breakup, McDaniels went on to a songwriting career.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Marion, J. C. "The Sultans, the Admirals, and Gene McDaniels." Doo-Wop Nation no. 35 (2004), <http://home.earthlink.net/~v1tiger/genemac.html> (accessed November 5, 2004).

See also Cincinnati; King/Federal/Queen

ADVENT RECORDS

Label owned and operated by Frank Scott from approximately 1972 through 1978, releasing at least nine LP issues. Among its artists were Robert Jr. Lockwood, Johnny Shines, Thomas Shaw, Sonny Rhodes, and Eddie Taylor. Many Advent albums have been reissued through HighTone Records.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography

Stefan Wirz. "Illustrated Advent Records Discography."
<http://www.wirz.de/music/advent.htm> (accessed September 27, 2004).

A.F.O.

Record label operating in Louisiana from 1961 to 1963 owned by Harold Raymond Battiste Jr. (b. November 28, 1931; New Orleans, LA). Funded and distributed by Sue Records, A.F.O. artists included Barbara George ("I Know [You Don't Love Me No More]"), Wallace Johnson, Prince La La ("She Put the Hurt on Me"), Ellis Marsalis, Mac "Dr. John" Rebennack, and Willie Tee.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

McGrath

Broven, John. "All for One: The AFO Label of New Orleans." Blues and Rhythm no. 76 (February 1993): 12–13.

See also Dr. John; Johnson, Wallace

AFRICA

A familiarity with Africa is necessary to reach a full appreciation of African American music, especially of the blues and black sacred music. In recordings of blues through 1970, including the 1933–1942 Library of Congress field recordings of black southern singers and instrumentalists, listeners hear a number of vocal inflections and effects, and instrumental rhythms and timbral colors, that do not fit within Anglo-American culture. These include vocal growls and moans; poly-rhythmic (if not polyphonic) percussion; vocal calls and responses or, for that matter, vocal calls and instrumental responses; or the percussive ax-fall rests at the beginning of a field-holler or work-song phrase. Such characteristics may be retentions from African music, passed across generations to the present.

Africa is an unfathomably large continent, and casual references to it are hardly mindful of this expanse and diversity. It is the second largest continent in the world. It is about 8,000 kilometers (5,000 miles) long and 7,000 kilometers (4,375 miles) wide, encompassing 28 million square kilometers (17.5 million square miles). The Sahara Desert takes up much of north Africa, and the Kalahari much of the south. Yet a staggering array of regions can be found: Morocco and Algeria to the northeast, the west coast including Senegal, Guinea, Sierra Leone, Liberia, Ivory Coast, Ghana, Togo, Nigeria, Congo, and Angola. The south tip is south Africa, with Zimbabwe and Mozambique just north. The further north one travels along the west coast, from Mozambique, Tanzania, and Kenya, through Somalia, to Sudan and Egypt, the greater the impact of Arabian trade and culture.

The heart of the continent includes Chad, Central African Republic, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo (formerly Zaire), with Rwanda and Uganda among the countries just east. Reciting these countries' names hints at the diversity of the languages spoken on the continent, the number of which is estimated to be around 1,000. Among the peoples are various cultures and histories, far more than can be packed into any one state in the United States.

Some areas of Africa are more likely than others to be relevant to African American blues. Of obvious pertinence are the west African countries whose Atlantic coastline faces North and South America, especially those from Ghana east to Gabon along which lies the Guinea Coast (also known as the Slave Coast), with Mali lying some ways inland north of that coast. Less obvious, but argued for by Paul Oliver in Savannah Syncopators, is the savanna north of that coast where African Arabian traders from the east may have had some cultural influence. For example, the griots and jali of the western Sudan were itinerant musicians, many from the Hausa ethnic group in the sahel and savanna belt of the southern Sahara in northern Mali and Nigeria. They traveled throughout west Africa performing songs of praise, organizing festivals, and carrying the news. Some researchers believe that some African musical practices were strongly influenced by the Arabic-Islamic music they heard as the result of the conversion to Islam of the area and the "Arabization" of many of its customs. It is likely that it was, in turn, adapted by the people of other villages and tribes that they visited on their musical travels throughout much of west Africa.

Even if west Africa and western Sudan were the primary areas where slaves were taken and sent to the Americas, it must be acknowledged that there were large multitudes of villages where they had once lived, each with its own history and customs, and there would have been many dialects. The gathering of such diverse people into a small area, even a holding dungeon such as those on Goree Island or at Elmina Castle, Ghana, did not automatically mean their cultures instantly meshed into one. Also, the African slave trade was conducted for several centuries through 1860, during which an estimated 10 million Africans were captured, sold, and led away. So in addition to the variety of local languages and customs, generational beliefs and customs changed every 15 years or so.

If the Africans sent to the Americas were far from homogeneous, then it is equally difficult today to make sweeping generalizations about the Africans whose ancestors were not captured, and who exercised their particular languages and customs according to their village and to their surrounding land. To state clearly: Not all Africans, then or now, share the same customs, nor do they all, then or now, speak the same language. Even how one language may be spoken is subject to misunderstanding by those marginal or outside to that culture. For example, some west African languages are “tonal” languages, that is, the meaning of a word or syllable can have as many as four different meanings, depending on the pitch in which it is spoken. How well someone understands a speaker depends on one’s familiarity with the “how” as well as the “what” of an utterance that is being spoken. There is also the possibility that Africans of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, including those captured as slaves, were accustomed to “micro-tonal inflections” and probably used them in normal speech and perhaps also in their music, including the antecedents to the blues.

If similarities in African speech are subject to misunderstanding, even among two Africans of different cultures, they are even more subject to misunderstanding between an African and an African American. With regard to music in particular, most if not all similarities between African American blues and African music may be regarded simply as similarities, with no direct or even indirect connection between the similar things. For example, the pentatonic scale (see figure), C–D–E–G–A, is very widely used in blues, and this is found in much African vocal music. Whether the scale is retained from African practice is subject to research. Another African characteristic found in blues is the call-and-response pattern of much African vocal music, with the first two lines of the blues verse resembling the call and the third the response. This too would have to be subject to scholarly affirmation.

Much research would be needed to demonstrate that such a similarity is the result of an African American retention of an antecedent African practice. From the end of American slavery in 1865 to the earliest datable blues songs stretch 30 to 40 years of oral, informal retention of African practice, years that possibly entail distortions of memory and oral communication. When the time period is extended to the initial period of blues sound recordings (1920–1932), then there are at least 70 years of African retention, and the oldest and earliest African American musicians on 78-rpm records were Daddy Stovepipe no. 1 (born 1867) and Henry Thomas (born 1874), both of whom were born in the United States. If one were to extend the period of retention to 1801, when the cotton gin enabled the increase of cotton production and hence raised the demand for slaves on cotton plantations, then there are 140 years from then to the end of the pre–World War II era. Over such a range, the transmission of African practices becomes more subject to distortion of memory or of communication.

In recent decades, especially since 1945, the influence on the blues has gone in the opposite direction, from African American to African. When big band swing, boogie-woogie, jive, progressive jazz, bebop, soul, disco, rock and its various derivatives, and R&B became popular and in turn faded in their popularity in the United States, recordings of them were imported to Africa, where they were widely distributed and consequently heard in urban centers. As of the mid-2000s, huge numbers of pirated audio cassettes of numerous American and English rock groups are widely available in west Africa at surprisingly low cost.

Blues, especially southern acoustic guitar blues, has had some impact on African musicians. For example, Ali Farka Toure, a contemporary guitarist and singer from Mali, has shown much interest in blues singing and playing since the 1960s as evidenced in his CD African Blues (1990, Shanachie). He popularized the idea that the roots of the blues were in the western Sudanic belt, that is, the sahel. As a youngster he was discouraged from becoming a working musician because music was considered to be inappropriate other than for young people and griots, traveling professional music makers somewhat similar to the troubadours of the Middle Ages. The griots were held in low social esteem. However, after hearing recordings of American blues singers such as John Lee Hooker, Albert King, Otis Redding, James Brown,

Pentatonic scale on C

Wilson Pickett, and Ray Charles, he became deeply involved in the idiom and made it his life's work. But in African Blues, he does not use standard blues harmonies and rarely twelve-bar phrases although he does use the pentatonic scale. The African-music scholar Gerhard Kubik says in his book Africa and the Blues that he feels Toure's music is only vaguely related to any type of blues. But he captures the vocal and guitar style of African American blues musicians and his lyrics reflect similar feelings. He has toured the United States as the "Malian Bluesman." His popularity has motivated the production of recordings by other musicians from the savanna and the sahel such as Kankan Blues by Kante Manfila & Kalla (Popular African Music, Out of Africa Series OA 201, Frankfurt, through World Circuit), and Desert Blues—Ambiances du Sahara (Network LC 6795).

Yet many purported blues in present-day Africa turn out to be anything but the blues on examination. "Ebony" from the LP Voices of Africa (Nonesuch Explorer Series) by Saka Acquaye and his African Ensemble from Ghana is called "blues" in Acquaye's liner notes, but the only slight resemblance to blues is a short passage in the middle of the piece when the winds (trumpets and saxophones) briefly play a progression of repeated I-IV-V-I block chords over which the vibraphone performers improvise, but without the characteristic "blue notes." From his perspective, Kubik feels that the label "blues" seems to be used for anything that comes from the west central African Sudanic belt, regardless of any link with the blues. This appears to be a valid judgment considering the large number of recording artists from Mali and Sudan, including such names as Abdel Gadir Salium, Afel Boucoum, Bajourou, and Habib Koite who have recorded "blues." A promotional statement for Distance Music's CD African Blues states after its subtitle, "Color in Rhythm Stimulates Mind Freedom" and that the album "showcases a deep, moody sound. It is a very personal project aimed at the mature open-minded listener, utilizing live percussion & keys and combining vocal, spoken word and instrumental tracks for an organic, earthy feel. Music with longevity & soul in the true sense of the word." This would appear to be stretching the traditional meaning of "blues" considerably, even in Africa.

There is a belief that the blues have made a "round trip" from Africa to the Western nations and back to their perceived homeland in a more or less unaltered state. Although there may be elements of truth in this belief, the diverse roots of blues and jazz are geographically and sociologically complex, and the manner of their "return" to the African continent is equally so. Various writers on the subject have oversimplified the characteristic and histories of these styles in the United States, and they have drawn superficial conclusions based on skimming the surface of the evidence of their "return" to various African nations through recordings and festival concerts in Africa.

On other matters, individual authors disagree on assumptions and conflicting use of scholarly language. An example is in Oliver's epilogue to the reprint of Savannah Syncopators, where he contrasts his word "acculturation" with Evans's preferred term "syncretion" with regard as to how individual practices could have been retained in a culture.

Confusion in discussion and application sometimes prevails over disagreement on semantic matters. One example is scale. African melodic practices, including the widely used pentatonic scale, when superimposed on European-style harmonies, seem to produce the flatted (by a half-step scale degree) third and seventh steps of the diatonic scale. Blues and jazz are often characterized with this scale. However, we should observe, and be mindful, that the folk and traditional music of several other cultures also employs variable pitched scale thirds and sevenths, notably that of India, the Arab world, and Great Britain; in these settings the major and minor thirds and sevenths are not simultaneously sounded as they are in blues, but in immediate melodic juxtaposition. Some scholars have even disagreed on the African provenance of the flatted-seventh diatonic scale tone. The African music authority Kwabena Nketia, a native African, says in his African Music in Ghana, "The flatted seventh is frequent and well established in Akan vocal music." To the contrary, Bruno Nettl, a widely recognized ethnomusicologist, says in his Folk and Traditional Music of the Western Continents, "A frequently mentioned characteristic of U.S. Negro songs is the so called 'blue note,' the flatted or slightly lowered third and seventh degrees in a major scale. The origin of this phenomenon is not known, but it probably cannot be traced to Africa."

Because of these disagreements among expert scholars, it is difficult to state any research finding with certainty. Such ambiguity and scholarly diplomacy are illustrated by Kubik's statement in Africa and the Blues that "blues is an African-American tradition that developed under certain social conditions on U.S. American soil, in the Deep South. It did not develop as such in Africa. And yet it is a phenomenon belonging essentially to the African culture world."

The bibliography at the end of this article offers to the interested reader citations of various books and articles about African music and its likely retentions in African American blues. We should be thankful that we have as much research in general about African music as we do. In addition to the excellent items cited here, various sound recording series and videotape resources can be found in libraries. Although the amount of scholarship regarding African retentions in the blues in particular is fairly limited, the most encompassing of them are Oliver's Savannah Syncopators, Gerhard Kubik's Africa and the Blues, and selected articles by David Evans and Richard A. Waterman.

EDWARD KOMARA/ROBERT WASHBURN

Bibliography

- Bailey, Francis. African Music: A People's Art. London: George G. Harrup and Co., 1975.
- Evans, David. "Africa and the Blues," Living Blues no. 10 (1972): 27–29.
- . "African Contributions to America's Musical Heritage," The World and I 5, no. 1 (January 1990): 628–639.
- Kebede, Ashenafi. Roots of Black Music. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1982.
- Kubik, Gerhard. Africa and the Blues. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999.
- Manuel, Peter. Popular Musics of the Non-Western World. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Nettl, Bruno. Folk and Traditional Music of the Western Continents. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1965.
- Nketia, J. H. Kwabena. The Music of Africa. New York: W. W. Norton, 1974.
- Oliver, Paul. Savannah Syncopators: African Retentions in the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970. Reprinted with an afterword in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Roberts, John Storm. Black Music of Two Worlds. New York: Praeger, 1972.
- Schuller, Gunther. Early Jazz. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Stone, Ruth M., ed. Africa. Vol. 1 of Garland Encyclopedia of World Music. New York: Garland Publishing, 1998.
- Summers, Lynn S. "African Influence and the Blues: An Interview with Richard A. Waterman," Living Blues no. 6 (1971): 30–36.
- Waterman, Richard A. "African Influence on the Music of the Americas." In Acculturation in the Americas, edited by Sol Tax, 207–218. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1952.
- . "On Flogging a Dead Horse: Lessons Learned from the Africanisms Controversy." Ethnomusicology 7, no. 2 (May 1963): 83–87.

AGEE, RAYMOND CLINTON "RAY"

b. 10 April 1930; Dixons Mills, AL
d. ca. 1990 (?)

A fine singer, even though he never achieved more than local success. After moving with his family to Los Angeles in the late 1930s he sang with the family gospel group, then from 1951 to the mid-1970s recorded more than a hundred titles for a myriad of West Coast labels.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Hanley, Bob. "Ray Agee." Whiskey, Women and . . . 10 (November 1982): 19–21.

Discography: LSFP; AMG

AGRAM BLUES/OLD TRAMP

Agram is a Dutch label that mainly reissues prewar blues. It was founded by Dutch blues scholar Guido van Rijn in 1978 and has released fifteen LPs and three CDs, beginning with a deluxe Barbecue Bob box set (ABLP 2001) that also contains a booklet by Dave Moore. Agram albums are known for their thoroughly researched liner notes. Another noteworthy release is ABLP 2009 by Algernon "Texas" Alexander, which features the first published life story of this renowned Texas blues singer. Recent productions include Guido van Rijn's books Roosevelt's Blues (ABCD 2017) and The Truman and Eisenhower Blues (ABCD 2018).

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Discography

- Agram Blues website, <http://presidentblues.talkin.nl/index.htm> (accessed November 9, 2004).

AGWADA, VINCE

Chicago blues guitarist, active since the 1980s. He got his start at the Checkerboard Lounge after sitting in with Lefty Dizz. Has played behind Son Seals, Valerie Washington, and Koko Taylor. Leads his own trio, One Eyed Jax.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

- Bonner, Brett J., et al. "40 Under 40." Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 77–90.

See also Chicago; Dizz, Lefty; Seals, Son; Taylor, Koko

AJAX

Record label of the Ajax Record Company of Chicago, a subsidiary of the Compo Company of Lachine, Quebec. Despite registration of the trademark in 1921, issues did not begin until October 1923 and continued until summer 1925 in a 17000 Race series which ended at 17136. African American artists accounted for ninety percent of the output, most recorded in New York. Although the records were pressed in Canada, they were not issued there. The label's blues catalog included Edna Hicks, Viola McCoy, Hazel Meyers, Rosa Henderson, Helen Gross, Josephine Miles, Monette Moore (usually disguised as Susie Smith), and three issues by Mamie Smith after she left OKeh. A&R supervision was carried out by music publisher and promoter Joe Davis and by Herbert Berliner of Compo, son of recording pioneer Emile Berliner. A blues piano issue by Millard G. Thomas was recorded in Montreal. After its demise, a few of Ajax's blues masters appeared on Pathé and Perfect labels.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

- DGR; Sutton
 Allen, Walter C. "Discomania, 53: Ajax." Jazz Journal no. ix (1956): 7, 56; 8, 30; no. x (1957): 7–8; 10, 29; no. xi (1958): 3, 7.
 Bastin, Bruce. Never Sell a Copyright, Joe Davis and His Role in the New York Music Scene 1916–1978. London: Storyville Publications, 1990.
 Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Oliver, Paul, Tony Russell, Robert M. W. Dixon, and Howard Rye. Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
 Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

AKERS, GARFIELD

- b. ca. 1900; Brights, MS
 d. late 1950s; perhaps Memphis, TN

Akers, a first-generation bluesman, had a repetitive, percussive guitar style that reached a new sense of urgency on duets with Joe Callicott and influenced other musicians from Memphis and beyond. He had an expressive, high-pitched voice, danced, and was a popular entertainer. Akers recorded four sides for Vocalion in 1929 and 1930 with Callicott, including his noted "Cottonfield Blues Parts 1 and 2" but remained essentially a local musician.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

- Larkin; Santelli
 O'Neal, Jim. "Garfield Akers: To Beale Street and the Juke Joints." Living Blues no. 50 (Spring 1981): 27–28.
 Wardlow, Gayle Dean. "Garfield Akers and Mississippi Joe Callicott: From the Hernando Cottonfields." Living Blues no. 50 (Spring 1981): 26–27.

Discography: DGR

See also Callicott, Joe; Memphis; Stokes, Frank; Vocalion; Wilkins, Rev. Robert Timothy "Tim"

ALABAMA

Alabama's 1819 constitution designated the state's land boundaries:

Beginning at the point where the thirty-first degree of north latitude intersects the Perdido River; thence, east, to the western boundary line of the State of Georgia; thence, along said line, to the southern boundary line of the State of Tennessee; thence, west, along said boundary line, to the Tennessee River; thence, up the same, to the mouth of Bear Creek; thence, by a direct line, to the northwest corner of Washington county; thence, due south, to the Gulf of Mexico; thence, eastwardly, including all Islands within six leagues of the shore, to the Perdido River; and thence, up the same, to the beginning; subject to such alteration as is provided in the third section of said act of Congress, and subject to such enlargement as may be made by law in consequence of any cession of territory by the United States, or either of them.

The House of Representatives of the United States used the above boundaries when it declared in the spring of 1817 that the eastern-most part of the Mississippi Territory "shall for the purpose of a temporary government, constitute a separate Territory, and be called 'Alabama'." By 1818, the General Assembly of the Alabama Territory petitioned the U.S. Congress for its inclusion into the confederacy. As sufficient cause for this change, the petition cited the continual population growth of "free men" numbering in the area of sixty thousand persons, an increase of nearly forty-one thousand "souls" in just two years owing to the "general fertility of our soil and the happy temperature of our Climate." The dramatic increase of "free men," however, was likely due far more to the acquisition of the Louisiana Territory and to the practice of westward manifest destiny with the forced removal of the territory's native populations.

According to the Alabama Department of Archives and History website, the etymology of the word "Alabama" is still under debate. The word, which was in use as far back as the Desoto expedition of the 1500s, underwent some spelling changes due to the confluence of Europeans in the area, but the actual meaning remains disputed. At times the word is attributed to the languages of the Chickasaws, the Muskogee, and the Choctaw as well as being the name of a Central Alabama native tribe, with the meaning of the word being either "Here we rest" or "thicket clearers."

From 1819 through 1945, Alabama's economy, society, and politics were shaped by agriculture, especially by cotton. Three important factors led to the settlement of Alabama: the depletion of lands east of Alabama, due to overcultivation; the forceful removal of the area's Native American populations; and Napoleon's sale of the Louisiana Territory. As white farmers moved into the Alabama territory, many of them brought slaves. After the Civil War and the ensuing Reconstruction, black labor on white-owned lands continued, especially in the "Black Belt," a stretch of land ending along Alabama's central western border with the eastern boarder of Mississippi and cutting through the lower region of the state to its most southeastern edge. This Black Belt belongs to a larger land mass that is crescent shaped and cuts across the heart of the southern United States. Originally named for its deep dark-colored soil, which was rich in minerals and ideal for agricultural harvest, the name later denoted a sense of politics because the majority of the land, which had once been populated by Native Americans, became populated by African American descendants of former slaves. Hence, sharecropping environments and Jim Crow society prevailed in the Black Belt region of Alabama in much the same way it prevailed in the Mississippi Delta. Alabama's 1900 census reports that blacks comprised nearly two hundred persons short of one million persons within its population, whereas whites tipped the scales at just one thousand persons above a million. That same census reflects that the cotton crop, grown mainly within the Black Belt region of the state, consisted of more than a million bales.

During the prewar era of the blues through 1941, Alabama produced a number of blues figures. The most famous of them was W. C. Handy, "The Father of the Blues," who was born in Florence, Alabama, in 1873. Although he was raised by a Baptist minister who had higher hopes for his son than being a musician, Handy nevertheless pursued a career as musician, bandleader, composer, and music entrepreneur in Mississippi, Memphis, and ultimately New York City.

During the 1920s a number of rural bluesmen and guitarists made records, including Ed Bell, Pillie Bolling, Daddy Stovepipe, Clifford Gibson, and Ed Thompson, as well as Buddy Boy Hawkins, who had more of a city style. There were also several excellent, evocative harmonica players such as Jaybird Coleman and George "Bullet" Williams. Other nonblues artists whose records are treasurable are the notable jazz group from Birmingham, the Black Birds of Paradise, and the sanctified preacher D. C. Rice, who for a time ran a church in Chicago before returning to Alabama in later years.

The employees of the steel mills in Huntsville and Birmingham supported a number of public establishments that had pianos. One of the earliest, and best, boogie-woogie pianists was Cow Cow Davenport, whose "Cow Cow Blues" of 1925 was a much-imitated standard. Another great pianist of the era was Jabo Williams, who recorded a pounding two-part rendition of "Ko-Ko-Mo Blues" in 1932. A Williams protégé was Walter Roland, who shared a piano repertoire. Roland made several excellent records on his own, but he remains best known for his performances with singer Lucille Bogan.

Bogan herself had been a remarkable singer since the early 1920s, but her best-selling, most famous, and most ribald records were made from 1933 through 1935. The guitarist Sonny Scott performed with Roland and Bogan during one set of ARC label sessions. Another remarkable guitarist of the 1930s and later was Marshall Owens. Bogan, Roland, Scott, and Owens all sang songs about the Red Cross stores that existed in poor neighborhoods during the Depression. One unrecorded black musician was "Tee Tot" Rufe Payne of Montgomery, Alabama, who made a great impression on the future country star Hank Williams during the 1930s and early 1940s.

Postwar musicians in Alabama performed mostly locally. One example was John Lee. Lee recorded several knife-slide guitar numbers for the Federal subsidiary of King Records in 1951, and for many years afterward record collectors thought perhaps Lee was a pseudonym for John Lee Hooker. Jerry McCain began his long career as blues harmonica player in the early 1950s, making his first records for the Trumpet label in Jackson, Mississippi, a few hours drive due west across the western Alabama border. Another fine harmonica player was George "Wild Child" Butler, who was born in Autaugaville, Alabama, in 1936.

Two of the most famous and enduring Alabama-born singers have been Dinah Washington, who began in gospel music in the 1940s, then became the leading rhythm and blues singer of the 1950s and early 1960s, and Willa Mae "Big Mama" Thornton, famous for her first recordings of "Hound Dog" and "Ball and Chain." Another great singer is Clarence Carter, who has been a fan favorite since the 1970s with hits like "Patches." Two more are Lynn White, whose raucous soul blues have been well known to black southern audiences since the 1980s, and Peggy Scott-Adams, whose career rebounded from obscurity when she made recordings with Ray Charles and garnered a topical hit song “Bill.”

ALABAMA

There was also a phenomenon of notable musicians having been born in Alabama, then moving north or west while young, growing up, and having remarkable careers in blues and folk music. Electric guitarist Jody Williams was in Howlin’ Wolf’s first Chicago band, drummer Sam Lay would play in various Chicago blues bands including the integrated Paul Butterfield Blues Band in the 1960s, and folk singer/guitarist Odetta was raised in California but built her career on performing traditional African American folk music.

However, some talent came to north Alabama to record, especially with the remarkable horn sections in the Muscle Shoals Sound studio in Muscle Shoals and the Fame studio. In two instances of reverse migration, Tennessee-born bluesman Johnny Shines moved from Chicago to Holt, Alabama, in the mid-1970s, and Mississippi-born topical blues composer and guitarist Willie King moved from Chicago to Old Memphis, Alabama, in the late 1960s.

Several excellent white blues musicians were from or were based in Alabama, including Keri Leigh (who would establish her career in Austin, Texas), “Little Charlie” Baty with the Nightcats, harmonica player and composer James Harman, and soul composer Dan Penn, who made his impact in Memphis during the 1960s and 1970s.

Although Alabama’s blues history seems meager compared to those of its neighboring states Mississippi and Georgia, it is celebrated by many of its institutions and residents. Two notable museums are the Alabama Music Hall of Fame in Tuscumbia, and the W. C. Handy Birthplace, Museum, and Library in Florence. Birmingham hosts several music festivals featuring blues talent, including the City Stages Festival every June.

PHOENIX SAVAGE-WISEMAN/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Alabama Blues Project website, <http://www.alabamablues.org> (accessed February 4, 2005).
- Alabama State Senate. s.v. “An Overview of Alabama’s Six Constitutions.” <http://www.legislature.state.al.us/index.html>.
- Courlander, Harold. Negro Songs from Alabama. New York: Courlander, 1960.
- Eagle, Bob. “The Alabama Blues” [part 1]. Alley Music 1, no. 2 (First Quarter 1968): 12–13; “The Alabama Blues” [part 2]. Alley Music 1, no. 3 (Winter 1968): 4–5; “The Alabama Blues” [part 3]. Alley Music 1, no. 4 (August 1969): 8–11.

Institute for Rural Health Research. “Black Belt Fact Book,” s.v. “Alabama’s Black Belt.” <http://irhr.ua.edu/blackbelt/index.html>.

Kustner, Axel. “Goin’ Down South.” Juke Blues no. 32 (Winter/Spring 1995): 10–13.

Rogers, Williams Warren, Robert David Ward, and Leah Rawls Atkins. Alabama: The History of a Deep South State. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1994.

ALADDIN/SCORE

Founded in Beverly Hills, California, in 1945 by brothers Edward and Leo Mesner as Philo Records, the independent label had substantial hits within its first few months of business with releases by Illinois Jacquet (“Flying Home”), Wynonie Harris (“Around the Clock Blues”), Helen Humes (“Be-Baba-Leba”), and Johnny Moore’s Three Blazers (“Drifting Blues”). However the Mesner brothers were soon forced to change the label name because of the similarity to the major household appliance company, Philco. The Philo name was discontinued and Aladdin Records was launched in April 1946, to become one of the major independent record labels of the late 1940s, finding commercial success with black blues, R&B, jazz, and gospel artists such as Amos Milburn, Charles Brown, Sam “Lightnin’” Hopkins, Lester Young, and the Soul Stirrers. During the 1950s, Aladdin Records went on to corner the market in male/female duets, having hits with Shirley & Lee and Gene & Eunice.

Primarily a gospel label to showcase the vocal group the Trumpeteers, the Score subsidiary was launched in 1948, but included a short-lived 4000 R&B and jazz series, featuring Lightnin’ Hopkins, Lonnie Johnson, Calvin Boze, Red Saunders, and the Robins vocal group. Score remained sporadically active until 1954. The Aladdin label—along with its subsidiaries Score, Intro (launched 1950), 7-11 (1952), Ultra (1955), Jazz West (1955), and Lamp (1956)—was sold to Imperial in 1961, following its final release, “One Scotch, One Bourbon, One Beer” by Thurston Harris.

DAVID PENNY

Bibliography

- McGrath
- Burke, Tony. “The Score Label—The Rhythm and Blues Sides.” Blues & Rhythm 31 (September 1987): 14.
- Burke, Tony, and Tony Watson. “The 7-11 Label.” Blues & Rhythm 29 (June 1987): 20.
- Ruppli, Michel. The Aladdin/Imperial Labels. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1991.

Discography

The Aladdin Records Story (1994, EMI CD E2-30882).

See also 7-11

ALERT

Label founded in Brooklyn, New York, by Solly Abrams in 1946, lasting through 1950. Most of its 400 series releases were by Brownie McGhee; the 600 series was devoted to gospel. The 200 series released urban blues, including jump blues. Champion Jack Dupree was one of Alert's recording artists.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrathALEXANDER, ALGERNON "TEXAS"

b. 12 September 1900; Jewett, TX

d. 16 April 1954; Richards, TX

Texas Alexander began recording for OKeh in 1927, recording 56 sides for them. He played no instrument, but from 1927 to 1930 he was accompanied by Lonnie Johnson, Eddie Heywood, Eddie Lang, King Oliver, Little Hat Jones, the Mississippi Sheiks, Carl Davis, or Willie Reed, among others. Alexander often carried a guitar with him in case there was a guitarist around when he sang on the street. His records sold well, and new versions of "Range in My Kitchen" were recorded by William Harris and Rinehart & Stubblefield, and Lightnin' Hopkins and Smokey Hogg both remade "Penitentiary Moan Blues," now a classic of Texas blues.

Alexander's style, so often consisting of lengthy moans and hums, often drawn out over unevenly spaced measures, sounds very close to the field holler. Indeed, combining a field holler with the shouts of the section gang caller—where Alexander once worked—and tailoring it into a recordable blues song would produce a sound very similar to Alexander's. He recorded for Vocalion in 1934, backed either by a small jazz group or two guitars. He was passed over by an Aladdin scout in favor of Amos Milburn and Lightnin' Hopkins in 1946 or 1947. His last recording was for the Freedom label in Houston in 1950.

PAUL GARON

Bibliography

Van Rijn, Guido, and Hans Vergeer. Sleeve notes for Alger "Texas" Alexander, Texas Troublesome Blues. 1982. Agram AB 2009.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

"Range in My Kitchen Blues" (1927, OKeh 8528).

"Penitentiary Moan Blues" (1928, OKeh 8640).

See also Field Hollers; Freedom/Eddie's; Okeh; Texas; Vocalion

ALEXANDER, ARTHUR

b. 10 May 1940; Florence, AL

d. 9 June 1993; Nashville, TN

Southern soul singer whose ballads were especially popular during the early 1960s with the rock 'n' roll audience. Alexander first recorded for the Judd label in 1960. He was one of the first artists to record for Rick Hall's studio in Florence, Alabama. Hall placed Alexander's first records with Dot Records. His initial record, "You Better Move On," became a pop and R&B hit in early 1962; the flip, "A Shot of Rhythm and Blues," received heavy airplay as well. He followed with another ballad, "Where Have You Been (All My Life)," also a pop and R&B success in 1962. His third single from 1962 was the ballad "Anna (Go to Him)," a top ten R&B hit and a pop hit as well. He also recorded the well-regarded but unreleased "Every Day I Have to Cry." These songs were influential and were frequently remade by other acts. "Anna" was subsequently recorded by the Beatles and Humble Pie, "You Better Move On" was recorded by the Rolling Stones and the Hollies, and "Everyday I Have to Cry" by Steve Alaimo and Joe Stampley.

After Dot, Alexander recorded for the Sound Stage 7 subsidiary of Monument (1965–1969) and then for Warner Brothers (1971–1972). Neither label affiliation produced any hits, however. In 1975, Alexander rerecorded "Everyday I Have to Cry Some" (note the slight change in the title), and he got a hit on Buddah. The following year he charted with "Sharing the Night Together." In 1977 Alexander retired, but revived his career in 1990, after he was inducted into the Alabama Music Hall of Fame. Just prior to his death he recorded an album for Electra.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Younger, Richard. Get a Shot of Rhythm and Blues: The Arthur Alexander Story. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2000.

See also Dot; Soul; Sound Stage 7

ALEXANDER, DAVE (OMAR HAKIM KHAYYAM)

b. Dave Alexander Elam; 10 March 1938; Shreveport, LA

Alexander began playing piano professionally in 1954 and served in the U.S. Army from 1955 to 1958. He recorded with Albert Collins under the World Pacific Label in 1969, then recorded for himself for Arhoolie during the early 1970s. In 1976 he changed his name to Omar Khayyam and since then has performed as Omar the Magnificent.

ALEXANDER, DAVE (OMAR HAKIM KHAYYAM)

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG, Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

See also Arhoolie/Blues Classics/Folk Lyric; Collins, Albert

ALIX, MAY

b. Liza Mae (or May) Alix, 31 August 1902; Chicago, IL

Vocalist; birth year of 1904 also given in some sources. Early career was in Chicago clubs and cabarets. Recorded "Big Butter and Egg Man" and "Sunset Café Stomp" with Louis Armstrong's Hot Five (1926). Recorded six titles with Jimmie Noone (1929–1930) for the Vocalion label. From 1931 through 1941, her base of activity was New York City.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Santelli
Chilton, John. Who's Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street, 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.

Discography: Lord (see entries for Louis Armstrong and Jimmie Noone)

See also Armstrong, Louis; Vocalion

ALLEN, ANNISTEEN

b. Ernestine Letitia Allen, 11 November 1920; Champaign, IL
d. August 10, 1992; New York City, NY

Singer with the Lucky Millinder band from 1945 to 1951, recording for Queen/King, Decca, and RCA Victor. Her rhythm and blues hits with Millinder include "More, More, More," "Let It Roll," "Moanin' the Blues," and "I'll Never Be Free." She was a solo artist through the early 1960s, making more records with King/Federal, Capitol Records, and Tru-Sound (with the King Curtis band).

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

See also Capitol; Decca/Coral/MCA; King Curtis; King/Federal/Queen; Millinder, Lucky; RCA/Victor/Bluebird/Camden/Groove/X/Vik; Rhythm and Blues

ALLEN, BILL "HOSS"

b. 1922 or 1923

d. 25 February 1997; Nashville, TN

One of three legendary white DJs who reached millions of listeners of all races with black blues and R&B through nightly broadcasts on WLAC (1510 AM) in Nashville, Tennessee, during the 1950s and 1960s. The station's fifty thousand watts and clear-channel status after sundown enabled Allen (known as "Hoss" or "Hossman") and his station-mates Gene Nobles and John R (Richbourg) to reach broad swaths of the United States, Canada, and the Caribbean, introducing authentic blues and R&B to millions of young listeners at the dawn of rock 'n' roll.

Like John R, Hoss not only played black music but talked on the air in a black dialect, using black street slang, which he absorbed through interracial friendships dating back to his childhood in Gallatin, Tennessee. A Vanderbilt University graduate, he spent a year at WIHN, Gallatin, hosting a show called "Harlem Hop" before joining WLAC in 1949 as a salesman and part-time announcer. In the early 1950s, he often substituted for Nobles, and took over Nobles's 10 p.m. to midnight DJ slot in 1955. From 1960 to 1963, Hoss left radio to work as a southern promo man for Chess Records, then returned to WLAC. In 1966, he hosted the syndicated TV series "The Beat," which presented blues and soul performers like Bobby Bland, Junior Parker, Freddie King, Little Milton, and Etta James.

Allen had a well-deserved reputation as a heavy drinker and carouser until going sober in the early 1970s, after which he broadcast gospel music on WLAC. In 1994, along with Nobles and John R, Allen was inducted into the Blues Hall of Fame.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

Barlow, William. Voice Over: The Making of Black Radio. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1999.
Smith, Wes. The Pied Pipers of Rock 'n' Roll: Radio Deejays of the 50s and 60s. Marietta, GA: Longstreet, 1989.

ALLEN, LEE

b. 2 July 1927; Pittsburg, KS

d. 18 October 1994; Los Angeles, CA

One of the foremost tenor sax players in R&B, and part of the nucleus of the classic New Orleans R&B sound, Allen was not a Louisiana native. Raised in Denver, he came to the Crescent City to attend Xavier University in 1943, but got his music education in the city's clubs and by 1947 had joined the Paul Gayten Band. This association led to a long-running association with Dave Bartholomew's band, regularly backing artists like Fats Domino, Smiley Lewis, Lloyd Price, Little Richard, and many others at Cosimo Matassa's studio. He played on hundreds of hits recorded at Cosimo's for labels such as Imperial, Specialty, and Aladdin, working out horn arrangements on the spot with fellow reed-men Alvin "Red" Tyler and Herb Hardesty in return for session fees but no royalties, even though their intense rhythm riffs (often tracking the bass lines) and robust solos helped sell the records.

His only major hit under his own name was the instrumental "Walkin' with Mr. Lee" on Ember (1957); he also produced other New Orleans artists for Ember and its sister label, Herald. In the early 1960s he rejoined Fats Domino's band, but in 1965 he relocated to Los Angeles, working in an aerospace factory while doing session and club work. After a return stint with Domino in the early 1970s, Allen capped an illustrious career in R&B by hooking up with the young retro-rock groups the Blasters and Stray Cats in the 1980s.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Santelli

Bonner, Brett J. "Lee Allen" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 119 (January/February 1995): 67.Broven, John. Walking to New Orleans: The Story of New Orleans Rhythm & Blues. East Sussex, England: Flyright, 1977. Published in United States as Rhythm and Blues in New Orleans. Gretna, LA: Pelican, 1983.Hannusch, Jeff. I Hear You Knockin': The Sound of New Orleans Rhythm 'n' Blues. Ville Platte, LA: Swallow, 1985.Discography: AMG; LSFP*ALLEN, PETE

b. 11 August 1949; McComb, MS

Guitarist, singer. Allen's career took off in the late 1980s. He was involved with spiritual music. Allen has worked with B. B. King, Albert Collins, and Mick Jagger, and has recorded with Buddy Guy and Junior Wells among others.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE

BibliographySharp, Steven. "Chicago Special." Living Blues no. 123 (September/October 1995): 36–43.ALLEN, RICKY

b. 6 January 1935; Nashville, TN

Chicago blues singer who briefly made a name for himself in the early 1960s recording hard soul and blues. Allen started his singing in church choirs in his native Nashville, but after he came to Chicago in 1960 he immersed himself in the West Side blues scene. He began recording for Mel London's Age label in 1961 and attained success with a local hit, "You Better Be Sure," a fast blues tune with a rock 'n' roll feel. Allen scored his only national R&B hit in 1963 with the driving blues, "Cut You A-Loose." His subsequent recording successes remained largely local, with such standouts as "It's a Mess I Tell You" (1966) and "I Can't Stand No Signifying" (1967) both issued on Willie Barney's Bright Star label. These soulfully sung numbers presaged the later soul-blues style that emerged in the 1970s. He retired from the music business in the early 1970s to run a laundry and later a limousine service. In 2001, Allen was lured out of retirement to perform in Sweden at the Monsteras Festival; a live CD recording was released of his performance.

ROBERT PRUTER

BibliographyLillsunde, Anders. "Ouch!—The Return of Ricky Allen." Blues & Rhythm: The Gospel Truth 168 (April 2002): 14–17.Discography: LSFP*See also Chicago; Four Brothers; Soul*ALLIGATOR

Founded in 1971 in Chicago. Alligator Records, with its trademarked "Genuine Houserockin' Music" slogan, is one of the best-known independent blues labels and in many cases is more influential in shaping musical trends within blues than the major labels.

ALLIGATOR

Bruce Iglauer was in his early twenties and working for Bob Koester at Delmark Records in Chicago in 1971 when he suggested recording local musician Hound Dog Taylor. Koester was not interested in the idea, so Iglauer decided to issue it on his own. He reportedly named his new label after his own nickname, acquired from a habit of clicking his teeth.

Within a year, Iglauer had left Delmark to handle both his fledgling label and Taylor's career. Selling records from his car trunk, Iglauer managed to make enough money to finance the next recording, Big Walter Horton with Carey Bell, released a year later. During the next few years, Alligator added recordings by Son Seals and Fenton Robinson and another Hound Dog Taylor release to its catalog.

Chicago blues singer Koko Taylor's 1975 debut with the label, I Got What It Takes, earned Alligator its first Grammy nomination. In 1978, Alligator was nominated for three Grammys, including one for the first of a series of albums with Albert Collins. That same year, Alligator issued the first volumes of the Living Chicago Blues anthology series, which highlighted some of the city's best musicians for a national audience and earned another of the label's Grammy nominations.

Multiple Grammy nominations in 1980 and 1981 finally led to Alligator's first Grammy Award in 1982 for zydeco pioneer Clifton Chenier's I'm Here! Three years later, the label won its second Grammy for Showdown!, an all-star recording with Albert Collins, Johnny Copeland, and Robert Cray that went on to become one of the biggest selling blues records ever.

In the mid-1980s, Alligator recorded three all-blues albums by onetime rock star Johnny Winter, who wanted to return to the blues music he had played in his youth. In the years to follow, Alligator continued helping veteran musicians reestablish their careers by issuing "comeback" albums by artists ranging from Charles Brown to Elvin Bishop and Lonnie Mack, while still introducing popular new artists such as Kenny Neal, Saffire: the Uppity Blues Women, and Corey Harris.

A short experiment with issuing reggae albums in the early and mid-1980s did not last long, but did produce what is considered one of the best albums of reggae pioneer Joe Higgs's career.

Throughout the 1990s and early 2000s, Alligator continued in its role as one of the top blues labels on the scene, still discovering new artists while also mining its extensive catalog to issue various compilations and anthologies.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Alligator Records website, <http://www.alligator.com>.
Iglauer, Bruce. "The Alligator Story" [part 1]. Juke Blues no. 1 (Summer 1982): 32–35; "The Alligator Story" [part 2]. Juke Blues no. 2 (Winter 1983): 32–35.

Discography

Hound Dog Taylor & The Houserockers (1971, Alligator AL-4701).
Showdown! (1984, Alligator AL-4743).
The Alligator Records 20th Anniversary Tour (1992, Alligator AL-107/108).
The Alligator Records 25th Anniversary Collection (1996, Alligator AL-110/111).
The Alligator Records 30th Anniversary Collection (2001, Alligator AL-112/113).

ALLISON, BERNARD

b. 26 November 1965; Chicago, IL

Guitarist and vocalist. Son of bluesman Luther Allison, he joined Koko Taylor's Blues Machine after graduating from high school. Two years later, he toured with his own group, Bernard Allison and Backtalk. Allison then rejoined Taylor for another year in the late 1980s before moving to Europe to serve as bandleader for his father's Paris-based group. Allison recorded several albums on foreign labels, including Next Generation, Hang On, No Mercy, and Funkifino. His U.S. debut, Keepin' the Blues Alive, was released on Cannonball Records in 1997. Despite critical acclaim and successful tours in the United States, Allison remains based in Paris.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Sinclair, John. "Bernard Allison: Keeping the Flame." Living Blues no. 167 (March/April/May 2003): 35–41.

Discography: AMG

See also Allison, Luther; Cannonball Records; Taylor, Koko

ALLISON, LUTHER

b. 17 August 1939; Widener, AR
d. 12 August 1997; Madison, WI

Singer, songwriter, guitarist, harmonica player. One of many great Chicago bluesmen to emerge from the Chicago club scene of the 1950s and 1960s, Allison found considerable local success, which translated into a more wide-ranging popularity during the late 1960s and early 1970s with a reemergence in the mid-1990s after some time spent touring in Europe. Some resources give his birthplace as Mayflower, Arkansas. Allison was the fourteenth of fifteen children born into a family of cotton farmers that moved to Chicago in 1951. At the age of eighteen, he learned the basics of guitar playing from his older brother, Ollie. Eventually, Allison met Freddie King, who encouraged the fledgling musician.

Allison cut his first album with Delmark in 1969 then headlined the Ann Arbor Blues Festival in 1969, and subsequently signed with Berry Gordy's Motown Records. His debut record on Motown, Bad News Is Coming (1972), showcases his vocal intensity and instrumental virtuosity on blues standards such as "The Little Red Rooster," "Rock Me Baby," and "Dust My Broom." On these tunes, and on "Sweet Home Chicago" and the instrumental "The Stumble" (bonus tracks on the 2001 reissue), some of Allison's primary influences are apparent: Magic Sam, Freddy King, Muddy Waters, Elmore James, and B. B. King.

His subsequent Motown release, Luther's Blues (1974), is an album that further demonstrates Allison's blues influences: Magic Sam's double-note rhythm/solo progressions and vocal blends of soulful crooning and piercing falsetto on "Easy Baby" and "Someday Pretty Baby"; Freddy King's shuffle-rhythms on the bonus track "San-Ho-Zay"; Elmore James's searing slide-work on "Driving Wheel"; and B. B. King's tremolos "Someday Pretty Baby" and the live bonus "Medley" track.

After a third release on Motown, Night Life (1975), Allison began playing extensively in Europe. During the late 1970s when blues music waned in popularity, Allison left the United States, toured in Europe, and then settled in Paris in 1984. During this period, Allison made a handful of European recordings on minor labels with one exception: Serious (1987) on Blind Pig Records, featuring Allison's songwriting abilities, guitar work, and vocals on songs such as "Backtrack," "Life Is a Bitch," and "Reaching Out."

In the mid-1990s, Allison returned to the United States for some gigs at festivals such as the Chicago Blues Festival and made several excellent studio recordings: Soul Fixin' Man (1994), which displays Allison's solid songwriting (along with band member/guitarist James Solberg) and powerful guitar work/vocals on "Bad Love," "Soul Fixin' Man," and "Nobody But You"; Blue Streak (1995), featuring a version of Magic Sam's "What Have I Done Wrong?" and numerous Allison/Solberg originals; and Reckless (1997), which was nominated for a Grammy Award, highlighted by the raucous "Low Down and Dirty," the social criticism of "Will It Ever Change," and two powerful ballads—"Just As I Am" and "Drowning at the Bottom."

Allison received many awards for his recording/performing efforts in the 1990s, including five W. C. Handy Awards. Allison's return to America was bitter-sweet, however, as he succumbed to cancer in 1997. Live in Chicago (1999) is a testament to Allison's remarkable live performances and to Allison's stature as a vibrant blues performer. His son Bernard Allison continues Luther's blues legacy and can be heard on his own recordings and in collaboration with Luther on the all-acoustic Hand Me Down My Moonshine (1998).

JUSTIN WERT

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
 "Bad News Is Coming: Luther Allison!" Living Blues no. 14 (Autumn 1973): 23–25.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Love Me Mama (1969, Delmark LP 625).
Bad News Is Coming (1972, Gordy LP 9462).
Luther's Blues (1974, Gordy LP 967).
Serious (1987, Blind Pig 72287).
Soul Fixin' Man (1994, Alligator LP 4820).
Blue Streak (1995, Alligator 4834).
Reckless (1997, Alligator 4849).
Hand Me Down My Moonshine (1998, Ruf 161413).
Live in Chicago (1999, Alligator 4869).

See also Allison, Bernard; Blind Pig; Chicago; Delmark; I Believe I'll Make a Change (Dust My Broom); James, Elmore; King, Riley B. "B. B."; King, Freddie; Maghett, Samuel Gene "Magic Sam"; Motown; One Time Blues/Kokomo Blues (Sweet Home Chicago); Solberg, James; Waters, Muddy

ALLISON, MOSE

b. 11 November 1927; Tippo, MS

Pianist, singer, and songwriter. Allison grew up in Mississippi, where the blues and related styles like stride and boogie-woogie became the bedrock of his musical style. He learned to play both piano and trumpet before leaving high school. He graduated from Louisiana State University in 1952, then moved to New York, where he established himself on the jazz scene, working with Zoot Sims, Stan Getz, and Gerry Mulligan, among others. He made his debut album as a leader, Back Country Suite, for Prestige in 1957.

ALLISON, MOSE

He led his own trio from 1958, and developed an idiosyncratic vocal and piano style that was more dependent on evoking moods and exercising his sly, ironic humor than on technical wizardry. Both his piano playing and his vocal phrasing were predicated on a quirky, occasionally wayward individuality. Nonetheless, his approach influenced many singers, particularly in the United Kingdom, where Georgie Fame was the most notable example.

He recorded extensively for Prestige, Columbia, Atlantic, Elektra, and Blue Note. His many compositions include a widely covered modern blues song, "Parchman Farm," which was first recorded on Local Color (Prestige, 1957).

He is an intriguing artist who seems to inhabit the space between genres, rather than belonging firmly to any particular style. His approach is far from the conventional model of the Mississippi Delta blues singer, but the influences he absorbed in that heartland of the blues have always been strongly evident in his music, both in his use of blues form and in less overt blues inflexions and feeling within his music.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Enstice, Wayne, and Paul Rubin. Jazz Spoken Here: Conversations with Twenty-Two Musicians. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1992.

Jones, Patti. One Man's Blues: The Life and Times of Mose Allison. London: Quartet, 1995.

Discography: AMG; Lord

Back Country Suite (1957, Prestige 7091).
Local Color (1957, Prestige, 7121).
Creek Bank (1958, Prestige 7152).
Transfiguration of Hiram Brown (1960, Columbia CS8248).
Mose Alive! (1966, Atlantic 1450).
Western Man (1971, Atlantic SD1584).
Middle Class White Boy (1982, Elektra 60125).
Ever Since the World Ended (1987, Blue Note B21Y-48015).
The Earth Wants You (1993, Blue Note B21Z-27640).
Gimcracks and Gewgaws (1997, Blue Note 23211).

See also Atlantic/Atco/Spark; Fantasy/Prestige/Bluesville/Galaxy/Milestone/Riverside; Mississippi; SONY/Legacy/Columbia/Epic/Okeh; United Kingdom and Ireland

ALLISON, RAY "KILLER"

b. 20 June 1956; Chicago, IL

Drummer and percussionist. Recorded the album Spider in My Stew. Allison worked with Muddy Waters and freelanced in Europe for several years where he recorded many albums and did session work.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE

Bibliography

Lazar, Helen Doob. "Ray 'Killer' Allison." Living Blues no. 77 (December 1987): 52.

ALLMAN BROTHERS BAND

A major name in 1970s blues-rock. Duane Allman (b. 1946; d. 1971) (guitar) formed the band in Macon, Georgia, in 1969, with Gregg Allman (b. 1947) (keyboards, vocals), Dickey Betts (b. 1943) (second lead guitar), Berry Oakley (b. 1948; d. 1972) (bass), and two drummers, Jai "Johanny" Johansson and Butch Trucks. Although essentially a southern rock band, blues played a major role in their music, alongside country, soul, and jazz. The death of Duane Allman in a motorcycle accident in 1971, and the loss of his distinctive slide guitar playing, led to a more country-rock direction. They split and subsequently reformed twice, in 1978 and 1989.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Freeman, Scott. Midnight Riders: The Story of the Allman Brothers Band. Boston: Little Brown, 1995.

Swensson, John. Booklet essay in LP/CD anthology, The Allman Brothers Band: Dreams. New York: Polydor Records, 1989.

Selected Recordings

The Allman Brothers Band (1969, Capricorn 308).
Idlewild South (1970, Capricorn 342).
At Fillmore East (1971, Capricorn 802).
Eat A Peach (1972, Capricorn 0102).
Brothers and Sisters (1973, Capricorn 0111).
Enlightened Rogues (1979, Capricorn 0218).
Dreams (1989, Polydor 839417).
Seven Turns (1990, Epic 46144).

See also Guitar; Rock-and-Roll

ALSTON, JAMIE

b. James Lenny Alston, 18 October 1907; Orange County, NC

d. August 1978; Orange County, NC

Drummer and percussionist in North Carolina blues and dance music. Recorded tracks in 1973 on Fly-right's Orange County Special LP.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

“Obituaries.” Living Blues no. 41 (November/December 1978): 40.

See also Interstate/Flyright/Krazy Kat/Magpie/Harlequin/Heritage/Texas Blues

ALTHEIMER, JOSHUA “JOSH”

b. 17 May 1910; Pine Bluff, AR

d. 18 November 1940; Chicago, IL

Alzheimer’s piano backed many of the most prominent Chicago blues stars of the late 1930s on the Bluebird label, including Big Bill Broonzy, John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson, Washboard Sam, and Jazz Gillum. Along with Black Bob, Bob Call, and “Blind” John Davis, he was an active member of the set of blues pianists used by producer Lester Melrose. Although he never recorded on his own, some of his best work can be heard on recordings by Broonzy and Williamson made in the 1938–1940 period. After Alzheimer’s death at age thirty, Memphis Slim replaced him as Broonzy’s primary pianist.

ROBERT RIESMAN

Bibliography

Santelli

Demètre, Jacques. “‘Joshua était le meilleur!’ selon Big Bill Broonzy.” Soul Bag no. 161 (Winter 2001): 22–25.

Selected Recordings in Reissue

Big Bill Broonzy. Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vol. 10 (26 January to 17 December 1940). 1993. DOCD-5132.

Sonny Boy Williamson. Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vol. 3 (21 July 1939 to 4 April 1941). 1991. DOCD-5057.

See also Broonzy, Big Bill; Gillum, Jazz; Melrose, Lester; RCA/Victor/Bluebird/Camden/Groove/X/Vik; Washboard Sam; Williamson, Sonny Boy I (John Lee Williamson)

AMERICAN FOLK BLUES FESTIVAL (AFBF)

From 1962 to 1972, the American Folk Blues Festival, featuring no less than eighty different artists, popularized blues music all over Europe. The project initiated by German jazz critic Joachim-Ernst Berendt came to life thanks to Willie Dixon who recruited most of the musicians and mentored them for the first three years. The tour was produced by two blues enthusiasts from Hamburg, Horst Lippman and Fritz Rau.

The show met with instant success, and in three years’ time the number of countries toured was extended to fifteen, from the United Kingdom, France, and Germany to Sweden or Poland. Each tour lasted about twenty days, often including several concerts on the same day, sometimes in different locations. A variety of styles were presented, from country blues to the modern Chicago sound; guitar instrumentals, boogie-woogie piano, and performances by some urban pre–World War II celebrities such as Victoria Spivey or Lonnie Johnson were part of a ritual event that always ended in a jam session.

The AFBF opened the European scenes to blues performers. John Lee Hooker, Sam “Lightnin’” Hopkins, Sonny Boy Williamson, and Howlin’ Wolf became quite popular, and the new market for blues records stayed ahead of the American market for several years.

But criticism soon arose from the growing audience for blues. The shows were often improvised, country singers like Sleepy John Estes and Robert Pete Williams did not perform at their best in large concert halls, most musicians were disconcerted by the silent and respectful attitude of the audience, and a pedagogic purpose somewhat forced musicians like Hubert Sumlin and Muddy Waters into acoustic playing. Efforts were made to feature young artists such as Buddy Guy, Junior Wells, and Otis Rush in 1965 and 1966, efficient sidemen Jack Myers and Fred Below, and some of the greatest rediscoveries in 1967: Eddie “Son” House, Nehemiah “Skip” James, and Bukka White. Yet the heteroclit AFBF could not compete with new festivals that featured complete sets of blues musicians, or the historical B. B. King show in 1968.

Thanks to “The Original” Festival, Europe discovered that blues was more than a mythical source of jazz music. The most obvious impact was the birth of British Blues, and another unexpected result was encouragement for performers such as J. B. Lenoir to adopt acoustic styles. Both effects took the music out of its original context, but the artists themselves gained international recognition that helped the blues to revive in its own birthplace.

PATRICE CHAMPAROU

Bibliography

Dixon, Willie, and Don Snowden. I Am the Blues. London: Da Capo Press, 1989.

Videography

American Folk Blues Festival 1962–1969. 2 vols. DVD. Santa Monica CA: Universal Music & VI, 2003–2004.

AMERICAN FOLK BLUES FESTIVAL (AFBF)

Discography

American Folk Blues Festival 1962–1965 (Evidence ECD 26100; 5 audio CDs, boxed set).

See also Sweden; United Kingdom and Ireland

AMERSON, RICHARD

b. ca. 1887; Livingston, AL

Harmonica, singer of blues, dances, and sacred material. Amerson recorded for the Library of Congress in the 1930s, and for the Folkways label in the early 1950s.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE

Bibliography

Harris; Santelli

Discography: DGR; LSFP

Gospel records, 1943–1969.

AMMONS, ALBERT

b. 23 September 1907; Chicago, IL

d. 2 or 3 December 1949; Chicago, IL

A pianist, Ammons was one of the major figures in the development and popularization of the piano style known as boogie-woogie. He drew on the example of slightly older players like Jimmy Yancey in developing his own approach. As a teenager, he practiced with his friend Meade “Lux” Lewis using a mechanical player piano for guidance, and developed a notably powerful tremolo as a result. He began to perform in Chicago and elsewhere during the mid-1920s.

He met Pine Top Smith in Chicago in 1927, and later recorded a version of Smith’s “Pine Top’s Boogie-Woogie” called “Boogie-Woogie Stomp” in 1936. He worked in a variety of settings in Chicago, from solo piano to his Rhythm Kings sextet, formed in 1934.

He made his New York debut in the “Spirituals to Swing” concert at Carnegie Hall on December 23, 1938, in which he accompanied Big Bill Broonzy and played in a boogie-woogie piano trio with Meade “Lux” Lewis and Pete Johnson.

His success led to a long-running engagement at Café Society, initially in a duo with Lewis, and subsequently with Johnson and singer Big Joe Turner added. He recorded for Vocalion and Blue Note in 1939, and later for Commodore, Victor, and Decca. The foursome was featured at the Sherman Hotel in Chicago and became known nationally through broadcasts.

A hand problem left him unable to play for a period in the mid-1940s, but he recovered. He continued to perform throughout the decade, and was briefly a member of the Lionel Hampton Band in 1949. Jazz saxophonist Gene Ammons was his son.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Page, Christopher I. Boogie-Woogie Stomp: Albert Ammons and His Music. Cleveland: Northeast Ohio Jazz Society, 1997.

Silvester, Peter. A Left Hand Like God: The Story of Boogie Woogie. London: Quartet Books, 1988.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

“Boogie-Woogie Stomp” (1936, Decca 749).

“Boogie-Woogie Stomp”/“Boogie-Woogie Blues” (1939, Blue Note 2).

“Shout for Joy” (1939, Vocalion).

“Suitcase Blues”/“Bass Goin’ Crazy” (1939, Blue Note 21).

“Albert’s Special Boogie”/“The Boogie Rocks” (1944, Commodore 617).

See also Chicago; Decca; Hampton, Lionel; Lewis, Meade “Lux”; Piano; RCA/Victor/Bluebird/Camden/Groove/X/Vik; Smith, Clarence “Pine Top”; Vocalion; Yancey, James Edward “Jimmy”

ANDERSON, ALVIN “LITTLE PINK”

b. 13 July 1954; Spartanburg, NC

Guitarist and singer. Alvin “Little Pink” Anderson sees himself straddling two worlds: an older one of medicine shows versus a newer one of clubs and festivals. Combining older material, contemporary blues, and his own compositions, Alvin seeks to play for the same audience as his father, the legendary Pink Anderson, did during his six-decade career.

Little Pink, a big guy who plays solo, has released his own albums as well as recording a track on one of his father’s albums for the Prestige label. His electric guitar technique has been heavily influenced by Albert Collins. Other influences include B. B. King, Gary Moore, Cool John Ferguson, Bobby Gaines, Marshall Tucker, and Mark Ford of the Black Crows.

Acoustically, his style is similar to Pink’s, but with his own twist. Little Pink’s first teacher, Simmie Dooley, was his dad’s partner; he has known Roy Book Binder and Paul Geremia almost from birth. Nappy Brown was a mentor to him, as was the late Frank Edwards.

Little Pink typically opens shows acoustically and finishes electrically. He estimates that his shows are acoustic about thirty percent of the time, electric fifty percent. His performances, acoustic or electric, are usually comprised of about twenty percent of his own material. He has plenty to write about: He has been in jail and has had numerous family tragedies. But he is his own man now, and in the expression of his own history, he has found freedom.

ANDREW M. COHEN

Bibliography

Corron, Linda. "Alvin Anderson: Little Pink's Blues." Living Blues no. 137 (January/February 1998): 26–29.
 Stiles, Ray M. "Alvin 'Little Pink' Anderson." <http://www.geocities.com/BourbonStreet/Delta/1915/littlepink.html> (accessed November 5, 2004).

See also Anderson, Pinkney "Pink"; Collins, Albert

ANDERSON, BOB "LITTLE BOBBY"

b. 18 April 1934; Bolivar, TN
 d. 2 January 1985; Chicago, IL

Bassist who moved from Tennessee to Chicago in 1952. Performed with Howlin' Wolf, James Cotton, Koko Taylor, Eddy Clearwater, and Junior Wells. His bass playing may be heard to advantage on Cotton's 1960s Verve recordings and on Charlie Musselwhite's LP Stand Back! (Vanguard, 1967).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

"Bob Anderson" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 64 (March/April 1985): 67.

ANDERSON, ELESTER

b. 25 October 1925; near Conetoe, NC
 d. 9 May 1980; Tarboro, NC

Guitarist. In 1973 he performed at the University of North Carolina Fine Arts Festival blues weekend. Recorded the LP Carolina Country Blues under the Flyright label.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE

Bibliography

"Elester Anderson" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 47 (Summer 1980): 33.

ANDERSON, JIMMY

b. 1934; Natchez, MS

Harmonica player and singer in the style of Jimmy Reed, active mostly in south Mississippi and Louisiana. His 1960s recordings were made with producer Jay Miller in Crowley, Louisiana, and were released on the Zynn and Excello labels. His subsequent activity is little documented, but it appears he recorded with the Mojo Blues Band in 1992 for the Austrian group's CD Blues Roll On (EMI Austria 830319 2/C7777035).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: LSFP

See also Reed, Jimmy

ANDERSON, KIP

b. 24 January 1941; Anderson, SC

Vocalist in the "deep" soul style of the 1960s and 1970s. His birth year has also been cited as 1938. His better known performances are those recorded for Checker in the 1960s, including "Without a Woman" and "A Knife and a Fork." Two CDs for Ichiban Records in the 1990s revived his visibility with record buyers.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Mohr, Kurt. "Kip Anderson" [with discography]. Soul Bag no. 131 (Summer 1993): 9–10.

Discography: Larkin; LSFP

See also Soul

ANDERSON, "LITTLE" WILLIE

b. 21 May 1920; West Memphis, AR
 d. 20 June 1991; Chicago, IL

Harmonica player. He released an album in 1979 for the B.O.B. label. Anderson worked with Jimmy Johnson, Smokey Smothers, Johnny Young, and Muddy Waters.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE

Bibliography

AMG; Santelli

ANDERSON, PINKNEY "PINK"

b. 12 February 1900; Laurens, SC

d. 12 October 1974; Spartanburg, SC

Pink Anderson's family moved to Greenville, South Carolina, when he was one year old but the family eventually settled in Spartanburg, South Carolina. Anderson began his musical career in the first decade of the twentieth century by entertaining on the streets of Spartanburg. He learned the harmonica and, by the age of seventeen, he was on the road, performing with Dr. Frank "Smiley" Kerr's Medicine Show. Kerr sold "medicine" (better known as "snake oil") made by the Indian Remedy Company.

Pink buckdanced and performed on the streets and at parties and picnics in Spartanburg with other entertainers when he wasn't working for Dr. Kerr. Although he learned guitar basics from a neighbor as a child, Pink became much more proficient after he became the protégé of Georgia-born guitarist Simeon "Blind Simmie" Dooley. In April 1928, Columbia Records recorded four songs by the duo in Atlanta, Georgia.

Around the same time he met Dooley, Anderson also became acquainted with Arthur Jackson (later known as "Peg Pete" and "Peg Leg Sam") and they became lifelong friends. Eventually they worked together on the Kerr show. Both later worked on Leo Kahdot's shows. Kahdot, a Potawatomie Indian, was known as Chief Thundercloud and started his career as a musician in vaudeville.

Folklorist Paul Clayton recorded Anderson at the Virginia State Fair in May 1950. Samuel Charters began recording him at his home in Spartanburg in 1962. This eventually led to a short film called The Bluesmen, which also featured Charles "Baby" Tate, another close friend of Anderson's. The film featured Pink's young son, Alvin, known today as "Little Pink." Charters also recorded three albums of music by the elder Anderson.

Forced to stop playing due to a 1964 stroke, Anderson lived until 1974. He is buried at Lincoln Memorial Gardens in Spartanburg.

GAILE WELKER

Bibliography

AMG; Harris; Santelli

Discography: DGR; LSPF

The Blues of Pink Anderson: Ballad & Folksinger, Vol. 3 (Prestige/Bluesville OBCCD 577-1).

Carolina Blues Man, Vol. 1 (Prestige/Bluesville OBCCD-504-2).

Gospel, Blues and Street Songs (Original Blues Classics 524).

Medicine Show Man, Vol. 2. (Prestige/Bluesville OBCCD-587-2).

See also Anderson, Alvin "Little Pink"; Charters, Samuel Barclay; Dooley, Simmie; Peg Leg Sam

ANIMALS

British rhythm and blues band. Formed in 1962 in Newcastle-upon-Tyne, the Animals featured Eric Burdon as lead vocalist and Alan Price on organ. (Bass player Chas Chandler later managed Jimi Hendrix.) The Animals backed visiting blues artists in the northeast, including Sonny Boy Williamson. They had an international hit with their version of "House of the Rising Sun" in 1964. Several hit singles followed with producer Mickie Most, including a version of John Lee Hooker's "Boom Boom" (1964). The group became Eric Burdon and the Animals in 1966-1968 and the musical direction changed to rock. Occasional partial reunions occurred in later years. Burdon and Price went on to establish solo careers, often in blues contexts.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Brunning, Bob. Blues in Britain: The History, 1950s to the Present. London: Blandford, 1995.

Egan, Sean. Animal Tracks: The Story of the Animals. London: Helter Skelter, 2001.

Discography

Animals (1964, Columbia 33SX 1669).

Animal Tracks (1965, Columbia 33SX 1708).

Animalisms (1966, Decca LK4797).

ANTONE'S

Founded in 1987 in Austin, Texas. Austin businessman Clifford Antone already owned a legendary blues nightclub, as well as a record store dedicated to the blues (located across the street from each other), when he decided to also start a record label to capture some of the music heard in his club.

While the nightclub and label are based in Texas, much of the music heard from both is Chicago-style blues—Cliff Antone's personal favorite style of music. Chicago blues legends Jimmy Rogers, James Cotton, Eddie Taylor, Matt "Guitar" Murphy, and Snooky Pryor have all recorded albums for Antone's. At the same time, the label has also helped launch the careers of Canada's Sue Foley and San Diego's Candy Kane, while revitalizing the careers of Texans Angela Strehli and Lou Ann Barton.

The label suffered a setback in 2000, however, when Antone went to prison on a drug conviction; he was released in 2002. Antone's has survived, though, and is continuing to issue new albums in an arrangement with the Texas Music Group.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Antone's website, <http://www.txmusicgroup.com/>.
Skelly, Richard. "Antone's Nightclub Celebrates Silver Anniversary in a Precarious Business." Goldmine 26 (October 6, 2000): 12.

Discography

Dreams Come True (Marcia Ball, Lou Ann Barton, and Angela Strehli) (1990, ANT-0014).
Antone's Women: Bringing You the Best in Blues (1992, ANT-99020).
Antone's 10th Anniversary Anthology, Vol. 1 (1986, ANT-0004).
Antone's 10th Anniversary Anthology, Vol. 2 (1991, ANT-0016).

APOLLO/LLOYDS/TIMELY

Founded in New York City in 1942 by husband and wife team Ike and Bess Berman and by Hy Siegel, Apollo Records' first releases ran the gamut from jazz and calypso to country music and gospel. In 1945 another partner, Sam Schneider, was taken on to oversee a new West Coast office, which was responsible for the recordings of Wynonie Harris, Duke Henderson, Jack McVea, and Dinah Washington, while back in New York the Bermans were recording blues artists such as Champion Jack Dupree, Jerome "Doc" Pomus, and Louis "Jelly Belly" Hayes's and Alec Seward's "The Back Porch Boys." Following a split with Ike in 1948, Bess Berman acquired the shares of the other partners. Hy Siegel went on to launch Timely Records in 1953 at the same time that Apollo launched its own short-lived R&B subsidiary, Lloyds Records. The company ceased business around 1962.

DAVID PENNY

Bibliography

McGrath
"Apollo Label List" [part 1]. Soul Bag no. 118 (Winter 1989): 32-35; "Apollo Label List" [part 2]. Soul Bag no. 119 (Spring 1990): 23-24.

Discography

West Coast Jive (1992, Delmark CD DD-657).
East Coast Jive (1994, Delmark CD DE-669).

ARC (AMERICAN RECORD CORPORATION)

Record company formed in August 1929 incorporating the labels of the Plaza Music Company (Jewel, Domino, Oriole, Banner, Regal), Pathé Phonograph and Radio Corporation (Pathé Actuelle, Perfect), and Cameo Record Corporation (Cameo, Romeo, Lincoln). All had been active in blues recording, though only Pathé had the Race series (the Pathé 7500 and Perfect 100 series, which had reached 7540/140 at the time of the merger). The Perfect series was continued and many issues, for example, 1930 sides by Big Bill Broonzy as Sammy Sampson, appeared also on Oriole and Romeo (sometimes also Banner and Jewel) for different markets.

ARC was acquired in October 1930 by Consolidated Film Industries, which in December 1931 also bought Brunswick from Warner Brothers. Though formally distinct, ARC and Brunswick/Vocalion became a single enterprise. In August 1934 the company acquired Columbia and Okeh, but soon discontinued these labels, terminating the Okeh 8000 Race series at 8966 in April 1935. Blues issues henceforth appeared mainly on Vocalion or on cheaper records on the so-called dime-store labels, Perfect, Oriole, Romeo, Banner, and Melotone, which used a coordinated system of issue numbers. The assumption often consequently made by discographers that all issues appeared on all of these labels throughout the period of issue may well be false. Some artists, such as Blind Boy Fuller and Robert Johnson, had records issued in both the Vocalion and dime-store series; others, such as Buddy Moss and Joshua White (Pinewood Tom), appeared only on the dime-store labels. ARC/Brunswick was purchased by the Columbia Broadcasting System in February 1938. CBS dropped the dime-store labels in April 1938 and in 1940 discontinued the Brunswick and Vocalion labels in favor of Columbia and Okeh. The ARC name itself appeared only on record labels in a few special series.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR; Sutton
Allen, Walter, Perry Armagnac, and Carl Kendziora. "Plaza-A.R.C.: A Clarification." Matrix 70 (1967): 4.
Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

See also Brunswick; Columbia; Melotone; Okeh; Vocalion

ARCENAU, FERNEST

ARCENAU, FERNEST

b. 27 August 1940; Lafayette, LA

A versatile accordion player who first recorded with Fernest and the Thunders on the Blues Unlimited label in the 1970s. He has performed Louisiana dance music, New Orleans-style R&B, and blues.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

AMG; Larkin

ARCHIA, TOM

b. Ernest Alvin Archie, Jr., 26 November 1919; Groveton, TX

d. 16 January 1977; Houston, TX

Tenor sax jazz musician of the big band era who built a second career as a rhythm and blues session man after World War II. Archia moved from Texas to Chicago in 1942 as a member of the Milt Larkin Band (1940–1943), then served in Roy Eldridge's band and the Rhumboogie Club house band. In 1945, Archia moved to Los Angeles, working with Howard McGhee and recording with Illinois and Russell Jacquet and Helen Humes. Back in Chicago in 1946, he recorded with Eldridge's band, and then from 1947 to 1950 he led the house band at Leonard and Phil Chess's legendary Macomba Lounge. Chess put out eight sides on Archia on Aristocrat (which in 1950 would become Chess Records), and used Archia to back blues singer Andrew Tibbs. Archia's blowing was robust and suffused with blues feeling, which is why he was also used in 1947 to back such blues artists as Marion Abernathy, Big Maybelle, and Wynonie Harris for King Records. He did two sessions with Dinah Washington in 1952–1953. Archia returned to Houston in 1968.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)

Campbell, Robert L., Leonard J. Bukowski, and Armin Buettner. "Tom Archia: The Forgotten Texas Tenor" [part 1]. Blues & Rhythm: The Gospel Truth 140 (June 1999): 8–13; "Tom Archia: The Forgotten Texas Tenor" [part 2]. Blues & Rhythm: The Gospel Truth 141 (August 1999): 8–13.

Discography: AMG; Lord; LSFP

ARCHIBALD

b. Leon T. Gross, 14 September 1912; New Orleans, LA

d. 8 January 1973; New Orleans, LA

Sometimes a musician becomes permanently associated with a particular selection, and that alone certifies their longevity. In Archibald's case, that benchmark is the 1950 release "Stack-a-Lee." Most people associate the composition with Lloyd Price's 1958 release entitled "Stagger Lee." Archibald's version appeared on an Imperial single and reached the R&B top ten. Subsequently, the pianist, born Leon T. Gross, aka "Archie Boy," returned to national anonymity, although he continued to record for Imperial through 1958. He made his living through residences at New Orleans venues such as the Poodle Patio Club and the Court of Two Sisters, his recording career known only to the cognoscenti of the city's musical culture.

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSFP

ARCHIVE OF AMERICAN FOLK SONG

Founded by the Library of Congress in 1928. The first archivist, Robert W. Gordon, made cylinder recordings of African Americans. In 1933, John A. Lomax and Alan Lomax made the first of many trips covering most southern states during the next ten years. Their many discoveries included Huddie Ledbetter ("Leadbelly"), James "Iron Head" Baker, and Vera Hall. A 1938 trip to Detroit yielded important recordings by Calvin Frazier and Sampson Pittman. In the same year, W. C. Handy and Jelly Roll Morton made documentary recordings in Washington, D.C. In the late 1930s other collectors also worked for the archive, often under W.P.A. sponsorship. A trip to Mississippi in 1941–1942 jointly sponsored by Fisk University famously led to new recordings by Son House and the discovery of David "Honeyboy" Edwards and McKinley Morganfield ("Muddy Waters"). The library has issued records drawn from its holdings and there have been many other issues of important blues material.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR

ARDOIN, ALPHONSE “BOIS SEC”

b. 16 November 1915; Duralde, LA

Alphonse “Bois Sec” Ardoin is the nephew of legendary Creole accordionist and singer Amédé Ardoin and the grandfather of zydeco performers Chris and Shawn Ardoin. He plays one-row button accordion in a style that is strongly traditional Creole with Cajun influence. For almost forty years he played duets with fiddler Canray Fontenot until Fontenot’s death in 1996.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)
Savoy, Ann Allen, ed. Cajun Music: A Reflection of a People. Vol. 1. Eunice, LA: Bluebird Press, 1988.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Ardoin, Amadie; Arhoolie/Blues Classics/Folk Lyric; Fontenot, Canray

ARDOIN, AMÉDÉ

b. 11 March 1896; L’Anse Rougeau, LA
d. 9 November 1941, Alexandria, LA

First name sometimes shown as Amadie. Ardoin was an accordionist and one of the pioneers of black Cajun music on records. From 1921 on he often performed with white fiddler Denis McGee. In 1928 he signed with Columbia Records. Also recorded with Brunswick, Decca, and Bluebird, including the songs “La Valse De Gueydan,” “Les Blues De Voyages,” and “Oberlin.” From the late 1930s until his death, he was committed to the Louisiana State Institution for the Mentally Ill.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

See also Louisiana

ARHOOLIE/BLUES CLASSICS/FOLK LYRIC

Legendary record collector and producer Chris Strachwitz started Arhoolie in 1960 as a means of recording a session featuring the Texas blues singer and guitarist Mance Lipscomb. Strachwitz had long been a noted enthusiast and fan of every genre comprising American vernacular music. Traditional jazz, blues, R&B, Cajun, zydeco, Conjunto/Norteno, gospel, bluegrass, and country acts are among the types of music that have made it into Arhoolie releases. Artists such as Clifton Chenier, Flaco Jimenez, Sam “Lightnin’” Hopkins, “Mississippi” Fred McDowell, and Big Mama Thornton arguably made their greatest releases for Arhoolie.

Strachwitz is also noted for cutting many of the label’s best releases in live, regional settings. Arhoolie albums and CDs have also appeared in several movies, most notably Les Blank’s Chulas Fronteras and Lone Star. But Strachwitz’s tastes are not limited or restricted to domestic sounds. The company has issued several albums of traditional and popular Mexican music, Hawaiian sounds, and material from Africa, the Caribbean, Cuba, and Latin America.

Strachwitz began the Down Home Music Store in 1976. It soon expanded into the Down Home Music Mail Order service (later Roots & Rhythm), arguably the country’s finest mail-order service for roots music. Strachwitz has also enjoyed success as a song publisher, thanks to his Tradition Music Company, which has published material from Country Joe & the Fish, “Mississippi” Fred McDowell, and K. C. Douglas that has subsequently been rerecorded and turned into huge hits. The Rolling Stones and country star Alan Jackson are among artists utilizing songs through the Tradition Music Company.

Strachwitz even expanded into distribution in the 1980s as well, establishing Bay Side Record Distributors, which he later sold. Arhoolie’s vinyl catalog is increasingly being reissued on special two albums on one CD releases, but the company also sells some vinyl and recently expanded into vintage 78s. In addition, there are new Arhoolie reissues and recordings from such artists as Santiago Jimenez, Jr., Big Joe Williams, and Big Mama Thornton. Arhoolie imports releases from Document, an Austrian company that specializes in prewar blues and gospel recordings as well as early country. They also import world music releases from the Pan label, a Dutch company.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Larkin

Alarik, S. “Chris Strachwitz: Mining America’s Roots: His 40-Year Odyssey with Arhoolie Records,” Sing Out! 45, no. 1 (Spring 2001): 60–67.

Arhoolie website, <http://www.arhoolie.com/> (accessed December 17, 2004).

ARKANSAS

The role that Arkansas played in blues history has been obscured by the better-known contributions of its neighbors the Mississippi Delta and Memphis. But the Arkansas Delta, a musically rich area that includes all or part of twenty-seven counties in the state's eastern region, has produced an incredible array of blues talent.

ARKANSAS

Helena

Located on a high bluff on the Mississippi River, Helena was the most important river port between Memphis and Vicksburg. A center for the local cotton trade and a key point for the distribution of goods into the surrounding countryside, Helena attracted thousands of black people to work on riverboats and on shore. In a region where money was scarce, these workers attracted many bluesmen to the juke joints along Elm and Walnut Streets. Nearby West Helena also overflowed with clubs. Barrelhouse pianists and itinerant blues musicians with guitars and harps filled Helena's joints with raucous music. Piano legend Roosevelt Sykes learned much of his technique as a teenager in the early 1920s by observing the piano players in Helena.

On November 19, 1941, radio station KFFA went on the air in Helena. A few days later, Sonny Boy Williamson II (Rice Miller) asked if he could perform on the station. The station's owners agreed that he could if he found his own sponsor. Sonny Boy quickly signed with the Interstate Grocer Company, whose owner, Max Moore, wanted to promote his local King Biscuit flour. Thus was born the King Biscuit Time radio show, featuring Sonny Boy's dynamic blues harp and sardonic singing, coupled with the innovative guitar playing of Robert Lockwood, Jr. Lockwood developed his skills under the tutelage of Delta blues legend Robert Johnson, who had been romantically involved with Lockwood's mother.

King Biscuit Time was an instant success and aired from 12:15 p.m. to 12:30 p.m. each weekday. The show also went on the road, airing live on Saturdays from many Delta towns in Arkansas and Mississippi. In 1947, Interstate Grocer Company introduced Sonny Boy Corn Meal—with a picture of Sonny Boy sitting on an ear of corn on the front of each sack—to further profit from the show's success.

Among the performers who appeared on King Biscuit Time were pianists Robert "Dudlow" Taylor, Willie Love, and Pinetop Perkins, guitarists Joe "Willie" Wilkins, Houston Stackhouse, Earl Hooker, and Sammy Lawhorn, and drummer Peck Curtis.

Lockwood left the show after two years because of a dispute with Max Moore. He soon had his own show on KFFA, sponsored by Mother's Best Flour Company, which lasted about a year. Delta bluesman and Helena native Robert Nighthawk also had a show on KFFA, sponsored by Bright Star Flour. He also appeared on King Biscuit Time and replaced Sonny Boy as the show's regular star after Sonny Boy died in Helena in 1965. Nighthawk passed away in 1967 and is buried in Helena's Magnolia Cemetery.

Since 1968, King Biscuit Time has featured recorded music instead of a live band. Today the show is hosted by Sonny Payne, who has been with the program since the 1940s.

Helena blues has carried on in the juke-joint blues of harp player Frank Frost (who died in 1999) and drummer Sam Carr, the modern blues of west Helena native Lonnie Shields, and the creative down-home blues of John Weston. In 1986, Helena's Sonny Boy Blues Society put together a one-day blues festival to honor the city's rich blues heritage. The King Biscuit Blues Festival has since grown into one of the world's largest free blues festivals, attracting tens of thousands of fans annually.

West Memphis

West Memphis, located directly across the Mississippi River from Memphis, was by the late 1940s a more significant blues center than its larger neighbor. Founded in 1910 as a logging camp, West Memphis grew into a town known for its gambling, hot blues, and other vices. It had many jukeboxes and clubs, especially along 8th Street, which included a variety of venues, from country-style jukeboxes such as the Little Brown Jug to more substantial clubs like the Be-Bop Hall. Just fifteen miles to the west was the Top Hat club at Blackfish Lake, which held hundreds of people.

The most important blues musician on the West Memphis scene was Howlin' Wolf, who loomed large physically and musically. An energetic performer who sang with a voice that sounded like an earthquake feels and played raw, country-style blues harp, Wolf put together his first electric band in the late 1940s while living in West Memphis. Made up largely of musicians much younger than himself, Wolf's band featured many of the best players in the region, including harp players Little Junior Parker and James Cotton, pianist William "Destruction" Johnson, drummer Willie Steele, and guitarists Willie Lee Johnson, Matt "Guitar" Murphy, and Auburn "Pat" Hare. Johnson's guitar work, combining raw blues riffs with jazzy chord flourishes, in particular helped establish the signature sound of the band, which quickly established itself as the most popular in West Memphis and the surrounding Arkansas Delta.

In 1949, Wolf secured a radio show on West Memphis station KWEM, on which he advertised farm supplies. Memphis record producer Sam Phillips heard Wolf on the show and, impressed by his raw talent, began recording him for Chess Records in Chicago. Wolf's success on KWEM opened the door for other blues artists on the station, including Sonny Boy II, who advertised the patent medicine Hadacol, piano player Willie Love, and drummer Willie Nix. Other blues musicians active in West Memphis at the time included B. B. King, Joe Hill Louis, Rosco Gordon, Jr., and Hubert Sumlin. In the 1970s, locally owned 8th Street Records recorded West Memphis blues veterans Sammy Lewis and Sonny Blake, though their records were poorly distributed. Little remains of the West Memphis blues scene today.

Other Parts of the State

Many other Arkansas towns had active blues scenes. In Brinkley, the White Swan club regularly featured Robert Nighthawk, Howlin' Wolf, Sonny Boy Williamson, and others. In Osceola, M. C. Reeder owned the T-99 club, whose In the Groove Boys band included young guitarist Albert Nelson, who later became famous as Albert King. Another Osceola guitarist, Son Seals, learned the blues at his father's juke the Dipsy Doodle. Forrest City lent its name to harp player "Forrest City" Joe Pugh, who made a handful of recordings for Aristocrat (later Chess) Records. Little Rock's blues scene produced the woefully underrated Larry Davis, best known for his recording of "Texas Flood" for Duke Records, and Elmon "Driftin' Slim" Mickle, who later moved to Los Angeles and worked as a one-man band. Also associated with Little Rock was bluesman Calvin Leavy, who achieved a surprise R&B hit with the down-home blues tune "Cummins Prison Farm."

Most unusual of all Arkansas bluesman is Cedell Davis of Pine Bluff. Born in Helena in 1927, Davis contracted polio as a child, which crippled his right hand. He learned to play guitar upside-down, clutching a butter knife as a slide in his crippled hand. The result is a uniquely discordant but powerful and eerie blues sound. Recently, Michael Burks emerged from Arkansas with an outstanding guitar style (influenced by Albert King) and strong vocals that are quickly making him a star.

Other blues artists born in the cities and towns of Arkansas include Luther Allison (Widener), Little Willie Anderson (West Memphis), Buster Benton (Texarkana), Willie Cobbs (Smales), Detroit Junior (Haynes), Art and Roman Griswold (Tillar), "Shakey" Jake Harris (Earle), Floyd Jones (Marianna), Charley Jordan (Mabelville), Louis Jordan (Brinkley), Sammy

Lawhorn (Little Rock), Hosea Leavy (Altheimer), Larry McCray (Magnolia), George "Harmonica" Smith (Helena), Blue Smitty (Marianna), Johnnie Taylor (Crawfordsville), Washboard Sam (Walnut Ridge), Casey Bill Weldon (Pine Bluff), and Jimmy Witherspoon (Gurdon).

MARK HOFFMAN/JAMES SEGREST

Bibliography

- Guida, Louis, Lorenzo Thomas, and Cheryl Cohen. Blues Music in Arkansas. Philadelphia, PA: Portfolio Associates, 1982.
- Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Penguin, 1981.
- Rotenstein, David S. "The Helena Blues: Cultural Tourism and African American Folk Music." Southern Folklore Quarterly 49, no. 2 (1992): 133-146.

ARMSTRONG, HOWARD "LOUIE BLUIE"

b. 4 March 1909; LaFollette, TN
d. 30 July 2003; Boston, MA

Though he could play many instruments, Howard Armstrong's primary musical instruments were the fiddle and mandolin. He played with Carl Martin and Ted Bogan for much of his career. Their prewar era string band was known under names including the Four Keys and the Tennessee Chocolate Drops. Credited as the latter, Armstrong made his first recordings with Martin in 1930 for Vocalion. He also recorded with Bogan for Bluebird in 1934, this time credited as "Louie Bluiie." In the 1970s, the trio achieved fame touring and recording as Martin, Bogan, and Armstrong. In 1985, Armstrong was the main subject of the documentary film Louie Bluiie. He continued to perform until shortly before his death.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

- Zwigoff, Terry. "Louie Bluiie: The Life and Music of William Howard Armstrong." 78 Quarterly 1, no. 5 (1990): 41-55; "Louie Bluiie: The Life and Music of William Howard Armstrong, Part 2." 78 Quarterly 1, no. 6 (1991): 43-50.

Discography: DGR

Selected Recordings

- Martin, Bogan, and Armstrong* (1974, Flying Fish 003).
That Old Gang of Mine (1978, Flying Fish 056).
Louie Bluiie: Film Soundtrack Featuring Howard Armstrong (1985, Arhoolie 4700).
Louie Bluiie (1995, Blue Suit BS-106D).

See also Bogan, Ted; Martin, Carl

ARMSTRONG, JAMES

ARMSTRONG, JAMES

b. 22 April 1957; Los Angeles, CA

Singer, guitarist, and songwriter, whose influences include Jimi Hendrix, Albert King, Albert Collins, and Robert Cray. Since 1995 he has been a HighTone label recording artist. He wrote the songs for his second CD, Dark Night, while recovering from a 1996 stabbing.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Santelli

Discography: AMG

See also Collins, Albert; Cray, Robert; Hendrix, Jimi; HighTone; King, Albert

ARMSTRONG, LOUIS

b. Daniel Louis Armstrong, 4 August 1901; New Orleans, LA

d. 6 July 1971; New York, NY

Trumpeter, singer. Jazz innovator Armstrong was one of the most important musical figures of the twentieth century, both for his pioneering role in the evolution of instrumental soloing and as an enduring vocal influence who popularized horn-derived phrasing and scat singing. A young Armstrong replaced the legendary King Oliver in Kid Ory's band in 1919 in New Orleans. He moved to Chicago in 1922 to join Oliver's Creole Jazz Band and then to New York City in 1924 to work with Fletcher Henderson. He backed blues singers Bessie Smith, Ma Rainey, Sippie Wallace, and Alberta Hunter in recording sessions before revolutionizing ensemble play with his Hot Five and Hot Seven landmark recordings. He formed his own band in 1927 in Chicago and spent the next four decades as the most popular and widely known figure in jazz.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli
Armstrong, Louis. Satchmo: My Life In New Orleans. New York: Prentice Hall, 1954.
Giddins, Gary. Satchmo. New York: Doubleday, 1988.

Discography: Lord

ARMSTRONG, THOMAS LEE "TOM"

b. 22 October 1936; Sparta, TN

d. 14 December 1996; Chicago, IL

Tom Armstrong was the son of Howard Armstrong. He played bass with Martin, Bogan, and Armstrong (also known as Martin, Bogan, and the Armstrongs). He recorded and toured extensively with the group. He also played the trumpet and was a painter.

ANDREW LEACH

Discography

Martin, Bogan, and Armstrong (1974, Flying Fish 003).

That Old Gang of Mine (1978, Flying Fish 056).

Louie Bluie: Film Soundtrack Featuring Howard Armstrong (1985, Arhoolie 470).

See also Armstrong, Howard "Louie Bluie"; Bogan, Ted; Martin, Carl

ARNETT, AL

b. 8 February 1929; Colquitt, GA

Bass player. Grew up in Cleveland, Ohio; settled in Sacramento, California. Worked with bands in France, Vietnam, and Japan while in the armed services. Sat in with Tiny Grimes as a youngster and played with the Sensations in Japan. Arnett was a member of Soul of the Blues, a popular Sacramento-based blues band.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

Jung, Maureen. "Sacramento Blues: Part One." Living Blues no. 114 (March/April 1994): 58–65.

See also Grimes, Lloyd "Tiny"

ARNOLD, BILLY BOY

b. William Arnold; 16 September 1935; Chicago, IL

Harmonica player and vocalist. He took a few lessons with Sonny Boy (John Lee) Williamson in 1948 and was very influenced by his style. Made his recording debut for a small local label as a teenager in 1952, issued by the company under the name Billy Boy Arnold. Although not his own choice, he decided to retain the name. Arnold joined Bo Diddley's trio and played harmonica on the hit single "Hey Bo Diddley"/"I'm a Man" in 1955 and on other recordings with the singer. He used Bo Diddley's trademark rhythmic shuffle on many of his own recordings. Signed to Vee-Jay Records, where Arnold made his best recordings as a leader for the label in 1955–1957, including "I Wish You Would," "I Ain't Got You," "Don't Stay Out All Night,” “Prisoner’s Plea,” “You’ve Got Me Wrong,” “I Was Fooled,” and “Rockinitis.”

He accompanied many Chicago luminaries in the 1950s, including Howlin’ Wolf and Muddy Waters, but was not on their level as an artist. Arnold participated in the Samuel Charters-produced More Blues on the South Side for Prestige in 1963. He later recorded for European labels while touring in blues packages in the 1970s and 1980s. During this time he appeared in the documentary film The Devil’s Music (BBC) in 1977. He returned to a more prominent profile with two albums for Alligator Records in 1993 and 1995, which critics have called his best studio work since the mid-1950s. Boogie ‘N’ Shuffle was released in 1999, with Duke Robillard playing and producing. A live album was issued on Catfish Records in 2000. Although at best an adequate vocalist, his harmonica playing merits attention.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

AMG; Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Aldin, Mary Katherine. “Billy Boy Arnold: I Had No Intention of Stopping.” Living Blues no. 113 (January/February 1994): 20–29.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

I Wish You Would (1955–1957, Charly BM34; compilation).
More Blues on the South Side (1963, Prestige 7389).
Sinner’s Prayer (1976, Red Lightnin’ 14).
Ten Million Dollars (1984, Blue Phoenix 337260).
Back Where I Belong (1993, Alligator 4815).
Eldorado Cadillac (1995, Alligator 4836).
Boogie ‘N’ Shuffle (1999, Stony Plain SPCD1266).
Live at the Venue (2000, Catfish 140).

See also Chicago; Diddley, Bo; Vee-Jay/Abner/Falcon; Williamson, Sonny Boy I (John Lee Williamson)

ARNOLD, JEROME

b. 26 November 1936; Chicago, IL

Jerome Arnold began playing electric bass guitar after his brother, Billy Boy Arnold, couldn’t find any good, steady bass players. After working with Billy Boy, Jerome went on to play bass with some of the biggest names in the business. He was a member of the Otis Rush, Howlin’ Wolf, Muddy Waters, Little Walter, and Paul Butterfield bands, and performed with many others. Jerome was a part of the 1968 American Folk Blues Festival.

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

Tillman, Keith. “Bringing It to Jerome.” Blues Unlimited 63 (June 1969): 12–14.

See also Bass

ARNOLD, KOKOMO

b. James Arnold, 15 February 1901; Lovejoys Station, GA

d. 8 November 1968; Chicago, IL

Kokomo Arnold was a left-handed bottleneck blues guitarist from Georgia. He was taught by his cousin John Wiggles. Another guitarist later taught him how to play the slide in the Hawaiian manner, with the guitar laid flat in his lap. In 1919 he left Georgia for Buffalo, New York. After a stint in Mississippi, Arnold finally settled in Chicago in 1929. In 1930 Kokomo made his first two recordings in Memphis as “Git-fiddle Jim.” As a bootlegger Arnold found a lucrative way of earning a living during the Prohibition era.

In 1934 he was discovered by “Kansas” Joe McCoy, who persuaded Mayo Williams to record him. His first Decca record proved to be a two-sided smash hit for Decca. “Milk Cow Blues” was later recorded by “Big” Bill Broonzy, Amos Easton, “Sleepy” John Estes, Freddie Spruell, and Josh White. Twenty years later Elvis Presley recorded it on his third single. The flip-side, “Old Original Kokomo Blues,” which Arnold may have learned from the 1928 recording by Scrapper Blackwell, was later recorded by Robert Johnson as “Sweet Home Chicago.” Under this title it became the national anthem of postwar Chicago blues. Arnold was to record a steady stream of songs for Decca from 1934 to 1938. In 1936 and 1937 Peetie Wheatstraw was his trusted recording partner. Besides recording under his own name, Kokomo also accompanied Mary Johnson, Alice Moore, Roosevelt Sykes, Sam Theard, and Peetie Wheatstraw.

After his recording career, Arnold kept playing in the Chicago clubs until at least 1946, after which date he drifted off into obscurity. In 1959, when he was a janitor at a steel mill, he was interviewed by Marcel Chauvard and Jacques Demetre, but embittered about his recording career he refused to enter a studio once more. In 1968 he died at home of a heart attack.

Three-quarters of his songs are in open D, one quarter in open G. Only “Shine on Moon” is in standard tuning. His bottleneck style is less precise than Tampa Red’s. Arnold’s style is less sophisticated and more emotional. His aggressive playing and his original song lyrics make him a compelling and influential artist.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

ARNOLD, KOKOMO

Bibliography

AMG; Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR

See also Chicago; McCoy, “Kansas” Joe; Tampa Red; One Time Blues

ARRINGTON, MANUEL

b. 24 April 1944; Collins, MS

Chicago blues vocalist who has performed with the Manuel Arrington Blues Revue and New Orleans Beau group. A frequent performer in Chicago blues venues.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

Sharp, Steven. “Chicago Special.” Living Blues no. 115 (May/June 1994): 40–48.

See also Chicago

ASCH/DISC/FOLKWAYS/RBF

Moses Asch—founder of the Asch Recordings record label and its subsidiary divisions, Disc Records, Folkways Records, and RBF Records—began his musical career as a radio salesman and soundman for various left-wing assemblies in New York City in the 1930s. He eventually established his own recording studio in 1938 and began producing albums of Jewish music for a local radio station. In 1941 Asch expanded his repertoire to record an album of children’s songs entitled Play Parties in Song and Dance by the blues singer Huddie Ledbetter (“Leadbelly”). The recording proved popular in leftist political circles, and its sales helped to solidify the always precarious existence of Asch’s recording endeavors.

Because he was more interested in developing niche markets and the tastes of specialized audience groups, Asch’s recording companies were never far from bankruptcy, and he would frequently be forced to fold a company due to mounting debts, only to shortly resurface with a new name and new mandate. Asch’s namesake company, Asch Recordings (later Asch-Stinson), folded in 1941, and in January 1946 Asch reemerged with a new label, Disc Company of America, which focused less on folk music and more on jazz, including recordings by Mary Lou Williams. Asch was again declared bankrupt in 1949, but he had already begun negotiations with his secretary and partner, Marion Distler, to form a new company, Folkways

Records. Folkways and its offshoot RBF (for Records, Books, Films) avoided insolvency—and survived into the early 1970s—by operating under the distinct mandate of avoiding commercial success. After Moses Asch’s death in 1985 his entire catalogue was purchased by the Smithsonian Institution, where it continues to exist as an invaluable resource of traditional and indigenous music from America and around the world.

DONNA LOWE

Bibliography

Goldsmith, Peter D. Making People’s Music: Moe Asch and Folkways Records. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1998.

ASHFORD, R. T.

Talent scout for the Paramount label in the late 1920s and 1930s. Ashford was Paramount’s primary talent scout in the Southwest. One of his discoveries was guitarist Jesse “Babyface” Thomas.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

Wardlow, Gayle Dean. “A Quick Ramble with Ramblin’ Thomas, Jesse Thomas, Will Ezell, Bessie Tucker, Elzadie Robinson and Texas Talent Scouts, R.T. Ashford and the Kendle Brothers.” Blues Unlimited no. 141 (Autumn/Winter 1981): 14–15.

See also Paramount; Thomas, Jesse “Babyface”

ATLANTA

Atlanta originated as a small station named Terminus located on the Georgia state railroad in the mid-1830s. It was renamed Marthasville in 1843 and again renamed Atlanta in 1847. It soon became a growing commercial center in the South, because it was a major junction for the train lines running east of the Appalachian Mountains and west to the Mississippi Valley. Consequently, it proved to be a key military objective of the Union forces under the command of General William T. Sherman during the Civil War. It was set on fire and destroyed in 1864.

After the Civil War, a black middle class emerged in Atlanta. In the 1860s, the American Missionary Association founded Atlanta University, and the Methodist Episcopal Church founded Clark University. They later combined campuses and Clark Atlanta University became one of the largest collections of black colleges in the world. The race riot of 1906 defined a biracial division in Atlanta that remained unchanged for many years as the black business community was driven away from the downtown center.

Social conditions challenged many blacks in the city during the early twentieth century. Blacks as young as twelve years of age and convicted of criminal offenses often found themselves chained with older adults and sentenced to work at gang labor in Atlanta. During the height of the Great Depression, the number of blacks who could not find regular jobs and qualified for federal relief climbed to more than sixty percent. During the late nineteenth century, Atlanta rebuilt itself and became a symbol of a new and revitalized South. Atlanta emerged in the early twentieth century as the South's leading commercial and industrial center. Convict leases and chain gang labor built much of the infrastructure serving this expansion. Following World War II, Atlanta's location again made it a major center for air and highway travel during the last half of the century.

Atlanta is recognized today as the civil rights center of the region and the birthplace of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. During the 1960s, Atlanta's self-stated motto was "The city too busy to hate." It distinguished itself with its progressive political climate during this period. Since that time, a series of black mayors have guided the continued commercial growth and success of the city. Mayor Andrew Young played a significant role in securing the Olympic games for Atlanta in 1996. In spite of this success, a cycle of poverty still exists for many blacks.

Early in the twentieth century, Atlanta became a center for blues recordings and music scouts. The city's tradition of blues music began on the streets and in the barrelhouses where guitar players and piano players performed. Among the early blues artists who played and recorded in Atlanta were Lillian Glinn, Bert M. Mays, Barbecue Bob, Curley Weaver, and Buddy Moss. Best known of the Atlanta blues singers was "Blind" Willie McTell. He made a number of recordings with his wife, Kate McTell, who was also known as Ruby Glaze.

William Perryman, also known as Piano Red, and his older brother, Rufus Perryman, whose nickname was Speckled Red, grew up in Atlanta where they both played boogie-woogie piano. Speckled Red made a number of recordings before the second world war, whereas Piano Red began his recording career in the 1950s. After living in a variety of cities, Piano Red returned to Atlanta later in his life where he performed his music regularly in local bars.

Tinsley Ellis was born in Atlanta and grew up in south Florida. After returning to Atlanta to attend college, he played with a group, The Heartfixers. Ellis recorded a number of blues albums with this group before going on to a solo career. Illinois born Francine Reed grew up in Arizona before she moved to Atlanta. She provided blues vocal accompaniment for Lyle Lovett before recording two blues albums of her own. Reed performs regularly at Blind Willie's, a venue that specializes in vintage local blues.

Julius "Lotsapoppa" High, Sandra Hall, and Luther "Houserocker" Johnson are other local blues performers that appear regularly at Blind Willie's. These blues artists originally played in clubs on Auburn Avenue up through the 1970s. Auburn Avenue was the center of local blues in Atlanta dating from the early 1950s. Major blues venues included the Royal Peacock, Poinciana, and the Elks Club.

Decatur Street established itself as the first center for both local and national blues artists dating from the early 1920s and continuing through the 1940s. Two vaudeville theaters on that street, known as the "81" and the "91," showcased the talents of Bessie Smith, "Butterbeans and Susie" (the stage names for Joe and Susie Edwards), and Willie McTell among others. A building of the Georgia State University campus stands on the location today.

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

- Cobb, James C. Georgia Odyssey. Athens and London: The University of Georgia Press, 1997.
- Coleman, Kenneth, ed. A History of Georgia. 2nd ed. Athens and London: The University of Georgia Press, 1991.
- Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning. New York: Horizon Press, 1960.
- . The Story of the Blues. London: Chilton Books, 1969.

ATLANTIC/ATCO/SPARK

Atlantic Records was formed in New York City in 1947 by Ahmet Ertegun and Herb Abramson. Both Ertegun and Abramson were avid record collectors specializing in jazz and rhythm and blues. In 1953 fellow R&B aficionado Jerry Wexler became a partner, with Abramson parting shortly thereafter. While never a blues label per se, from the late 1940s through the early 1970s, Atlantic recorded a startling array of blues talent in New York City, Chicago, and at various locations during Southern field recording trips. The net results manifest what Jim O'Neal has termed, in his liner notes for Atlantic Blues: Piano, "the founders' appreciation for roots coupled with an ear for commercial potential."

Atlantic's earliest blues recordings included two top five R&B singles by the New York-based guitarist/vocalist Sticks McGhee, "Drinkin' Wine Spo-Dee-O-Dee" (1949) and "Tennessee Waltz Blues" (1951), as well as seminal sides by New Orleans pianist Professor Longhair, Chicago boogie-woogie pianists Jimmy Yancey and Meade “Lux” Lewis, Yancey’s wife, “Mama” Estelle Yancey, Atlanta twelve-string wizard “Blind” Willie McTell, West Coast guitarist “Texas” Johnny Brown (with Amos Milburn on piano), Chicago pianist Eurreal “Little Brother” Montgomery, and Vann “Piano Man” Walls (who also played on numerous Atlantic sessions as a sideman).

In the mid- and late 1950s Atlantic continued apace, cutting sides with the Kansas City team of vocalist Big Joe Turner and pianist Pete Johnson, New Orleans pianist “Champion” Jack Dupree, Crescent City guitarist Guitar Slim, the Los Angeles-based pianist and balladeer Floyd Dixon, West Coast guitarist T-Bone Walker, jump-blues singer Wynonie Harris, and, at the end of the decade, Mississippi bluesman Fred McDowell. In the early 1960s Atlantic issued a series of albums of field recordings done by folklorist Alan Lomax of both black and white Southern musicians that included substantial blues material.

While Atlantic issued few blues recordings in the mid-1960s, in the late 1960s and early 1970s, the company devoted considerable resources to signing, recording, and marketing white rock groups. Among mainstream pop artists such as the Bee Gees and Iron Butterfly were an inordinate number of groups such as Cream, Led Zeppelin, the Allman Brothers Band, the Rolling Stones, and the J. Geils Band. These bands featured guitarists such as Eric Clapton, Jimmy Page, Duane Allman, and Keith Richards, who recorded covers of blues standards and wrote newer work that was manifestly rooted in the blues. Beginning in 1967 Atlantic also recorded the white acoustic blues guitarist John Hammond, Jr. Continuing to tap into the blues revival, in 1968 Atlantic activated its Cotillion subsidiary, recording albums by black blues artists Freddie King and Otis Rush, and in 1972 the company issued Buddy Guy and Junior Wells Play the Blues on Atco. In the late 1960s, Atlantic and its subsidiaries also issued singles by Johnny Copeland and Z. Z. Hill. New Orleans pianist Dr. John (aka Mac Rebennack) recorded a series of albums that, while marketed toward the white rock demographic, contained substantial R&B content.

Finally, in the 1970s and 1980s, Atlantic was assiduous in reissuing various of its blues recordings. Its Blues Original LP covering the Professor Longhair sessions from 1949 and 1953 helped spark a revival of Longhair’s career. At the same time, Atlantic issued a plethora of live albums documenting various festivals including Woodstock, Mar Y Sol, the Ann Arbor Blues and Jazz Festival, the Montreux Jazz Festival, and the Soul to Soul concert in Ghana. Each of these albums included performances by blues artists ranging from B. B. King, Howlin’ Wolf, and J. B. Hutto to Stevie Ray Vaughan and the Butterfield Blues Band.

ROBERT BOWMAN

Bibliography

- McGrath
 Ertegun, Ahmet. “What’d I Say?”—The Atlantic Records Story: 50 Years of Music. New York: Welcome Rain Publishers, 2001.
 Gillett, Charlie. Making Tracks: Atlantic Records and the Growth of a Multi-Billion-Dollar Industry. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1974.
 ———. Liner notes for Atlantic Blues: Piano. New York: Atlantic Records, 1986.
 O’Neal, Jim. Liner notes for Atlantic Blues: Vocalists. New York: Atlantic Records, 1986.
 Shurman, Dick. Liner notes for Atlantic Blues: Chicago. New York: Atlantic Records, 1986.

ATLAS

Record label (California, 1944–1948). Owners: Robert Scherman (b. June 14, 1915; Brazil, IN; d. November 2, 2000; Sun City, CA) and Art Rupe (b. Arthur Newton Goldberg, September 5, 1917; Greensburg, PA). Based in Hollywood, California, the label was originally called Premier with recordings by the Nat King Cole Trio (“F. S. T.,” “Got a Penny”). The label was the first to record Frankie Laine (with Johnny Moore’s Three Blazers). Other artists include Johnny Alston (with George Vann), the Four Vagabonds, Walter Fuller, Luke Jones, Red Mack, and Oscar Moore.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

McGrath

AUDIOQUEST

Label active since the late 1980s. A division of Valley Entertainment, it is known for the audiophile quality of the “live-to-two-track” recordings produced by Joe Harley. Artists include “Mighty” Sam McClain, Joe Beard, Doug McLeod, Sherman Robertson, Bruce Katz, and Ronnie Earl.

EDWARD KOMARA

AUGUST, JOE “MR. GOOGLE EYES”

- b. Joseph Augustus, 13 September 1931; New Orleans, LA
 d. 9 October 1992; New Orleans, LA

R&B singer. August originally performed as a novelty act—The Nation’s Youngest Blues Singer—while in his teens. Recorded for Coleman and Columbia in the late 1940s and Dot and Instant in the 1950s. Continued performing into the early 1990s.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: LSPF

See also Rhythm and Blues

AUGUST, LYNN

b. Joseph Leonard, 7 August 1948; Lafayette, LA

Zydeco accordion player and singer. Although he went blind before he was a year old, August has had a long and versatile career. Influences include Ray Charles, Clifton Chenier, and Guitar Slim. Has recorded for Black Top.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

AMG; Santelli

Discography: AMG; Santelli

AUSTIN, CLAIRE

b. 21 November 1918; Yakima, WA

Blues vocalist who performed in the 1950s and 1960s with Kid Ory and Gene Mayl’s Dixieland Rhythm Kings. She recorded for GTJ, Contemporary, and Jazzology.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: Lord

AUSTIN, JESSE “WILD BILL”

b. 23 March 1930; New Rochelle, NY

d. 22 March 1996; Bridgeport, CT

Blues shouter, pianist, and organist. Jesse “Wild Bill” Austin developed a unique “hog calling” vocal style as a youngster. He first toured with Wynonie Harris at fourteen and would later perform with his groups Soul Plus, Different Approach, and the Jesse Austin Band.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

Bonner, Brent J. “Jesse ‘Wild Bill’ Austin.” Living Blues no. 128 (July/August 1996): 54.

AUSTIN, LOVIE

b. Cora Calhoun, 19 September 1887; Chattanooga, TN

d. 10 July 1972; Chicago, IL

Pianist, arranger, and bandleader. Studied music at Knoxville College, Tennessee, and at Roger Williams College in Nashville, Tennessee. She toured widely, including on the TOBA theater circuit, before settling in Chicago. She recorded prolifically in the 1920s as a house pianist for Paramount records, providing band and solo accompaniments for many leading blues singers of the era, including Ida Cox and Ma Rainey.

PETER MUIR/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli; Southern White, Delores. “Lovie Austin.” In Black Women in America: An Historical Encyclopedia, edited by Darlene Clark Hine. Brooklyn, NY: Carlson Publications, 1993.

Discography: DGR

As Leader

Rampart Street Blues (1925, Pm 12300).

In the Alley Blues (1926, Pm 12391).

Jackass Blues (1926, Pm 12361).

As Sideman

Ida Cox: Any Woman’s Blues (1923, Pm 12053); Bama Bound Blues (1923, Pm 12045); Graveyard Dream Blues/Weary Way Blues (1923, Pm 12044); Death Letter Blues/Kentucky Man Blues (1924, Pm 12220); Cold Black Ground Blues (1925, Pm 12282); Trouble Trouble Blues/I’m Leaving Here Blues (1926, Pm 12344).

Ma Rainey: Bad Luck Blues/Those All Night Long Blues (1923, Pm 12081); Barrel House Blues/Walking Blues (1923, Pm 12082); Bo-Weevil Blues/Last Minute Blues (1923, Pm 12080); Moonshine Blues/Southern Blues (1923, Pm 12083); Honey Where You Been So Long?/Ma Rainey’s Mystery Record (1924, Pm 12200); South Bound Blues/Lawd Send Me a Man Blues (1924, Pm 12227); Those Dogs of Mine/Lucky Rock Blues (1924, Pm 12215); Ya-Da-Do/Cell Bound Blues (1924, Pm 12257).

B

BABY PLEASE DON'T GO/DON'T YOU LEAVE ME HERE

Big Joe Williams will forever be identified with “Baby Please Don’t Go,” his own composition and his unofficial theme song, but the melody actually emerged in 1925 beneath the bright lights of Tin Pan Alley as “Alabama Bound” by Ray Henderson, with lyrics by B. G. DeSylva and Bud Green.

It was immediately taken up by pop singers, jazz groups, and blues artists alike, with both Lucille Hegamin (Cameo 701) and Sara Martin (OKeh 8262) recording versions of the song in 1925. The song soon found its way into more rural and down-home repertoires, sometimes as “Alabama Bound” and sometimes as “Elder Greene.” Charlie Patton recorded “Elder Greene Blues” in 1929 on Paramount 12972, and Pete Harris recorded “Alabama Bound” for the Library of Congress in 1934 (on Document DOCD 5231). Harris’s version of “Alabama Bound” includes several lines about Elder Greene. Leadbelly also recorded “Alabama Bound” for the Library of Congress in 1935. The song lived on into postwar repertoires, being performed by Bea Booze (with Andy Kirk’s Orchestra, Decca 48073) in 1946, Ray Charles in 1960 (ABC Paramount, ABC 335), and Fats Domino in 1965 (in Las Vegas, unissued).

An intermediate step in the evolution of “Alabama Bound” into “Baby, Please Don’t Go” was its almost immediate transformation into “Don’t You Leave Me Here.” In this new guise, Thomas Morris was credited with writing the music, with Freddie Johnson composing the lyrics, first performed by Monette Moore, vocalist for Charles Johnson’s Original Paradise Ten, in 1927 on Victor 20653. The song became quite popular with down-home singers as either “Don’t Leave Me Here” or “Don’t You Leave Me Here.” “Papa” Harvey Hull and Long “Cleve” Reed recorded a version on the very rare Black Patti label (BP 8002) the same year as Moore. Henry Thomas recorded it in 1929 on Vocalion 1443 and included a few lines from “Alabama Bound,” as if to remind us of its origin. Tampa Red recorded his version in 1932 (Banner 32799), Merline Johnson recorded hers in 1938 (Vocalion 04331), and Washboard Sam recorded a rewritten humorous version in 1937 (Bluebird 7501).

The most influential version, however, was Big Joe Williams’s 1935 recording of “Baby Please Don’t Go” on Bluebird 6200. The influence of the song grew exponentially as Williams rerecorded it in 1941 (Bluebird 8969) and 1947 (Columbia 37945), both times accompanied by Sonny Boy (John Lee) Williamson. Indeed, “Don’t You Leave Me Here” rarely appeared in postwar repertoires except as “Baby Please Don’t Go.”

The first two artists to record “Baby Please Don’t Go” after Big Joe Williams were Sam Montgomery, who recorded it in the spring of 1936 for the American Record Company group of labels (ARC 6-11-55), and the Tampa Red imitator, Tampa Kid, who recorded it in the fall of 1936 on Decca 7278. By the end of the Korean War, “Baby Please Don’t Go” had become a blues standard, and more than fifty versions were recorded for the independent labels that dominated the blues recording scene in the second half of the century. We can only touch on a few of them here.

Perhaps the best known is Muddy Waters's 1953 "Turn Your Light Down Low" on Chess 1542, but the song was recorded by Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry for World Pacific (WP1294), Fred McDowell for Capitol (LP 409) in 1969, and other singers as diverse as John Lee Hooker, Lightnin' Hopkins, Johnnie Shines, Clifton Chenier, and B. B. King.

PAUL GARON

BAILEY, DEFORD

b. 14 December 1899; near Bellwood, TN
d. 2 July 1982; Nashville, TN

Harmonica player DeFord Bailey was the first African American star of WSM's famous country music radio show, the Grand Ole Opry, and he was one of its most celebrated performers during his nearly fifteen years on the show. Though Bailey also played the guitar and banjo, it was his outstanding harmonica work that brought him fame. Dubbed the "Harmonica Wizard" by Opry creator George D. Hay, Bailey was especially renowned for his remarkable ability to imitate the sounds of trains and animals and to create the illusion of two harmonicas playing at once. Bailey gained a great deal of popularity among both black and white audiences, and although his repertoire was not strictly limited to the blues, he did perform a number of blues pieces.

Bailey was born and raised near the small town of Bellwood, Tennessee, in a musical family that was steeped in what he often called "black hillbilly music." He began playing the harmonica at the age of three, and by the time he was a teenager, he had already begun making a living playing the instrument. In 1918, he moved to Nashville and started performing around the city. Bailey joined the WSM Barn Dance radio show around June 1926, and on December 10, 1927, his performance of his best-known piece, "Pan American Blues," indirectly inspired the change of the show's name to the Grand Ole Opry. During his time on the show, Bailey toured extensively with the Opry's other stars, and he also made eighteen recordings (eleven of which were issued) in 1927 and 1928 for Columbia, Brunswick, and Victor.

In 1941, as a result of a conflict between radio networks and ASCAP, the performance rights licensing organization, WSM, and a number of other stations boycotted ASCAP songs and demanded that their artists develop new material. In May 1941, Bailey's refusal to stop performing his older pieces resulted in his dismissal from the show, an incident about which he remained bitter for the remainder of his life. He went to work full time at his shoe shine parlor in Nashville and rarely performed publicly again until the mid-1970s, when he made a few radio and television appearances, including a handful of performances on the Opry.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

Guralnick, Peter. "DeFord Bailey: Pan American Blues." In Lost Highway: Journey and Arrivals of American Musicians, 49–56. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 1999.
Morton, David C., with Charles K. Wolfe. DeFord Bailey: A Black Star in Early Country Music. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1991.

Discography: DGR

Harp Blowers (1925–1936): Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order (1993, Document Records DOCD-5164).
The Legendary DeFord Bailey (1998, Tennessee Folklore Society Records TFS-122).

BAILEY, KID

An elusive Mississippi blues vocalist and guitarist who flourished during the early 1920s through the 1950s, Kid Bailey is known to have recorded one record in 1929 which included "Rowdy Blues" and "M & O Blues." Bailey also is believed to have performed with Charlie Patton.

RYAN OLSEN/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
Kent, Don. Notes accompanying Masters of the Delta Blues: The Friends of Charlie Patton (1991, Yazoo CD 2002).

Discography: DGR

BAILEY, MILDRED

b. Eleanor Rinker, 27 February 1907; Tekoa, WA
d. 12 December 1951; Poughkeepsie, NY

American jazz and pop singer of the 1920s, 1930s, and 1940s. Bailey was one of the first white singers to successfully incorporate blues and jazz phrasing, rhythm, and improvisation into her music. During her career Bailey scored a number of hits as a solo artist and as the singer for several dance orchestras and big bands. She is also credited with discovering famed jazz singer Billie Holiday.

Bailey began her musical career in her early teens, playing piano for silent movies and working in a music store as a demonstration singer. By 1925 Bailey was the headlining act at a club in Hollywood, where she performed pop, jazz, and vaudeville standards of the day. She made her first recording “What Kind O’ Man Is You” (1929; with Eddie Lang) and secured a place in Paul Whiteman’s touring band shortly thereafter. She had her own radio program in the early 1930s and her single “Rockin’ Chair” (1932; written by Hoagy Carmichael) became her signature song. Bailey married xylophonist Red Norvo in 1933 and joined his band in 1936. The pair became known as “Mr. and Mrs. Swing” and a number of their musical collaborations reached the charts. Bailey became a regular on Benny Goodman’s Camel Caravan radio show and recorded several songs with him, including “Darn That Dream” (1939). She performed in clubs and recorded throughout the 1940s. She had her own radio program on CBS from 1944 to 1945, but her failing health halted her singing career shortly thereafter.

ERIN STAPLETON-CORCORAN

Bibliography

- AMG (John Bush); Larkin; New Grove Jazz
 Kolodin, Irving. In Quest of Music: A Journey in Time. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1980.
 Pleasants, Henry. “Mildred Bailey.” In The Great American Popular Singers, 143–156. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1974.
 Schoenberg, Loren. “Mildred Bailey on Records: Addenda and Corrections to Rust.” Annual Review of Jazz Studies III (1985): 167–170.

Discography: Lord

The Complete Columbia Recordings of Mildred Bailey. Stamford, CT: Mosaic, 2000.

BAILEY, RAY

b. 1956; Los Angeles, CA

A well-known Los Angeles blues guitarist, Bailey has performed with Big Joe Turner, Freddy Walker, and Laverne Baker. Leads the Camarillo All-Stars, and released his first album, Satan’s Horn, in 1993.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

- Bonner, Brett J., et al. “40 Under 40.” Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 77–90.

BAKER, ERNEST

(See King Ernest)

BAKER, ETTA

b. Etta Reid, 31 March 1913; Caldwell County, NC

Baker, considered a master guitarist of the Piedmont style, began playing guitar at age three. She was awarded the North Carolina Folk Heritage Award in 1982. Baker and her sister, Cora Phillips, won the North Carolina Folklore Society’s Brown-Hudson Award in 1982.

GAILE WELKER

Bibliography

- Olsen, Ted. “Etta Baker.” Living Blues no. 107 (January/February 1993): 28–30.
 Williams, Lesley. “An Interview with Etta Baker.” Old Time Herald (Spring 1990): 9–12.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Instrumental Music of the Southern Appalachians (Traditions CD 1061).
Music from the Hills of Caldwell County (Physical PR 12-001).
One Dime Blues (Rounder CD ROU 2112).
Railroad Bill (Music Maker CD MM 91006).

Selected Videos

The Fingerpicking Blues of Etta Baker (Homespun VDETTGT 01).

See also Piedmont (region)

BAKER, HOUSTON

b. 22 March 1943; Louisville, KY

Literary scholar Baker’s analysis of African American literature, using blues as an interpretive matrix, has provided an innovative vision for future students of blues and of literature.

PAUL GARON

Bibliography

- Baker, Houston A., Jr. Blues, Ideology, and Afro-American Literature. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984.

BAKER, LAVERN

b. Dolores Williams, 11 November 1929; Chicago, IL
 d. 10 March 1997; New York City, NY

Rhythm and blues singer. Born Dolores Williams, she sang in a Baptist church as a girl. Singer Memphis Minnie was her aunt. Her professional career began in Chicago in 1946 as Little Miss Sharecropper. Baker briefly performed as Bea Baker, then settled on LaVern Baker while with the Todd Rhodes band.

BAKER, LAVERN

Baker signed with Atlantic in 1954 and had a successful run of eight top ten rhythm and blues singles for the label in the next decade, beginning with "Tweedle-Dee" in 1955, and ending with "See See Rider" in 1962. Pop chart hits included "Jim Dandy" and "I Cried a Tear" in 1958.

Baker's sassy, forthright approach established her as a major draw in the late 1950s, and she was regularly featured on disc jockey Alan Freed's popular Rock 'n' Roll Jubilee shows. She left Atlantic for Brunswick in 1963, had a modest hit with soul singer Jackie Wilson on "Think Twice" in 1966. She went to Vietnam as an entertainer, then settled in the Philippines, where she was entertainment director at the U.S. military base at Subic Bay. Baker returned to the United States in 1988 to perform in Atlantic Records' 40th anniversary celebrations. She made her Broadway debut in 1990 when she was chosen to replace Ruth Brown in the hit musical Black and Blue after the producers heard her LaVern Baker Sings Bessie Smith album.

Baker was elected to the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1991. Her health suffered from complications of diabetes, including amputation of both legs below the knee in 1995. She performed until shortly before her death.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

AMG; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Dahl, Bill. "LaVern Baker" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 133 (May/June 1997): 37–38.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Soul on Fire: The Best of LaVern Baker (1954–1962, Rhino/Atlantic 82311; compilation).
Sings Bessie Smith (1958, Atlantic 1281).
Woke Up This Mornin' (1992, DRG 8433).

See also Memphis Minnie

BAKER, MICKEY

b. McHouston Baker, 15 October 1925; Louisville, KY
Guitarist and vocalist. He took up guitar in the early 1940s after learning trumpet and double bass. In 1947–1948 he played jazz guitar with pianist Jimmy Neely. It was only in 1949, when he heard Pee Wee Crayton in California, that he turned to blues. He toured with Lester Young, Paul Williams, and Paul Quinichette before first recording with pianist Billy Valentine in 1951. A Savoy session in August 1952

(Riverboat, Savoy 867), split with Hal Singer, launched his career as a blues/R&B musician accompanying Ruth Brown, Big Joe Turner, Dinah Washington, Ray Charles, and LaVern Baker, among many others.

His session recordings included a highly regarded Sammy Price album (Rock My Soul, 1956, Savoy MG14004). The duo Mickey & Sylvia with Sylvia Vanderpool brought popular success. Love Is Strange (1956, Groove 0175) remains affecting, if only marginally blues, but commercial imperatives dominated their later output. He moved to France and made it his base for performance in both jazz and blues contexts, including work with expatriates Champion Jack Dupree and Memphis Slim. The Blues and Me (1973, Black & Blue 33.507) united him with visiting Chicago players Jimmy Rogers and Louis and Dave Myers to good effect. He has also been an active guitar teacher and published many tutorials. He has at various times used the names McHouston Baker and Big Red McHouston.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Dahl, Bill. "Mickey Baker: The King of the Slip and Slide Guitar." Living Blues no. 154 (November/December 2000): 40–48.
Leadbitter, Mike. "It Was All Alley Music: Mickey Baker." Blues Unlimited 93 (July 1972): 11.
Perim, Jaques. "Mickey Baker: Life Is Strange." Soul Bag No. 90–91 (September–November 1982): 5–22.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Crayton, Curtis Connie "Pee Wee"

BAKER, WILLIE

Dates and birthplace unknown

An enigma, possibly from southeast Georgia, who played in the banjo-influenced twelve-string slide-and-strum style associated with Savannah "Dip" Weaver, mother of Curley Weaver, who taught Robert and Charlie Hicks (Barbecue Bob and Charlie Lincoln). He recorded a number of sides for Gennett in 1929, possibly as covers of the Hicks brothers' hits. Other than that, he remains a mystery as does his place as either an originator or a copyist.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Bastin, Bruce. Red River Blues. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.

Discography: DGR

Charley Lincoln and Willie Baker (Document BDCD 6027).
Too Late, Too Late Blues (Document DOCD 5150).

See also Weaver, James “Curley”

BALDRY, “LONG” JOHN

b. 12 January 1941; London, England

British singer who has resided in Canada from the mid-1970s onward. Nicknamed for his height, some sources give east Maddon-Doveshire as Baldry’s birthplace. A key figure in the early 1960s British blues scene, Baldry toured with Ramblin’ Jack Elliott from 1957 to 1961, then joined Alexis Korner’s Blues Incorporated (heard on seminal R&B at the Marquee, 1962). He worked with Cyril Davies in a Chicago-style blues band, then formed his own R&B-oriented Hoochie Coochie Men. He then worked briefly with Brian Auger, and later had several pop hits in dramatic ballad style as a solo artist. Baldry returned to blues-rock with It Ain’t Easy (1971). He moved to Canada, revived his career, and became a Canadian citizen.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Bruning, Bob. Blues in Britain: The History 1950s to the Present. London: Blandford, 1995.
 Shapiro, Harry. Alexis Korner: The Biography. London: Bloomsbury, 1996.

Discography

Long John’s Blues (1964, Ascot 13022).
It Ain’t Easy (1971, Warners WS 1921).
Good to Be Alive (1973, Casablanca 7012).
It Still Ain’t Easy (1991, Stony Plain SPCD 1163).
Right to Sing the Blues (1997, Stony Plain SPCD1232).
Remembering Leadbelly (2001, Stony Plain 1275).

See also Korner, Alexis; United Kingdom and Ireland

BALL, MARCIA

b. 20 March 1949; Orange, TX

Pianist and singer, Ball grew up in Vinton, a small town in Louisiana, in a family whose female members all played piano. She took her first piano lessons when she was five, playing Tin Pan Alley tunes until she discovered Irma Thomas and the blues in 1962. In 1966, she attended Louisiana State University in Baton Rouge and played with Gum, a blues-based rock band. After graduating, she moved to Austin in 1970 where she was a pioneer of the local R&B scene in the early 1970s, playing the city’s clubs with Freda and the Firedogs, a progressive country band and, at the same time, honing her own songwriting skills.

In 1974, she launched her solo career, influenced by Professor Longhair and Allen Toussain, releasing a first single the following year and a country-soul album for Capitol in 1978; she recorded a series of six dynamic and well-received albums for Rounder (1983–1998)—including a vocal trio with Irma Thomas and Tracy Nelson in 1998—and one for Antone’s (1990) with Lou Ann Barton and Angela Strehli. She was inducted into the Austin Music Hall of Fame in 1990, and she was featured on leading radio and television programs.

She joined Alligator Records in 2001 and cut two successful albums for them. In 2003, she appeared in “Piano Blues,” the film directed by Clint Eastwood in Martin Scorsese’s The Blues Series. As of 2004, she continued to deliver her popular mixture of Gulf Coast R&B, country swing, rock, and New Orleans-flavored music.

ROBERT SACRÉ

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly and Al Campbell); Larkin; Santelli Bays, K. “Marcia Ball: In Pursuit of the Groove,” Blues Revue no. 82 (June/July 2003): 8–9.

Discography: AMGSelected Recordings

Presumed Innocent (2001, Alligator ALCD 4879).
So Many Rivers (2003 Alligator ALCD 4891).

BALLARD, HANK

b. 18 November 1927; Detroit, MI

d. 2 March 2003; Los Angeles, CA

Singer and songwriter who wrote the original version of “The Twist,” but saw Chubby Checker cash in on the big hit single with the song. Born in Detroit (some sources give 1936 as birth year) but raised in Alabama, his early influences included gospel, blues and, less obviously, singing cowboy Gene Autry.

He returned to Detroit in 1951 and joined the doo-wop group the Royals in 1953. He led the group away from their established smooth style into a harder, raunchier approach. They had a hit in the R&B charts with “Get It” on Federal, then changed their name to the Midnighters. Ballard spearheaded their most successful era with his songs, which were often unusually frank on sexual matters for that period. Despite frequent radio bans, they had big hits with “Work with Me Annie,” “Annie Had a Baby,” and “Sexy Ways” in 1954, all written by Ballard.

BALLARD, HANK

His most successful song of all first appeared as the B-side of “Teardrops on Your Letter” in 1959. Dick Clark of American Bandstand passed “The Twist” to the unknown Chubby Checker, and the singer scored a massive hit, considerably outselling Ballard’s own version, also a top ten hit. The exposure also helped yield two more top ten hits in 1960, “Finger Poppin’ Time” and “Let’s Go, Let’s Go, Let’s Go.” Lesser hits led to a gradual fall from notice by the late 1960s, despite the support of soul singer James Brown. Ballard dropped out of music in the 1970s, then reformed the Midnighters in the mid-1980s. He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1990, and further albums appeared in 1993 and 1998.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Larkin

Harris, Paul. “Hank Ballard” [obituary]. Juke Blues no. 53 (Spring Summer 2003): 58–59.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Their Greatest Hits (1954, Federal 29590); The Midnighters (1955, Federal 395541); Midnight, Vol. 2 (1957, King 581); Singin’ and Swingin’ (1959, King 618); The One and Only (1960, King 674); Mr. Rhythm and Blues (Finger Poppin’ Time) (1960, King 700); Twistin’ Fools (1962, King 781); Jumpin’ Hank Ballard (1963, King 793); Naked in the Rain (1993, After Hours AFT-4137); From Love to Tears (1998, Pool Party 9991).

BALLOU, CLASSIE

b. 21 August 1937; Elton, LA

Guitarist on Boozoo Chavis’s influential single “Paper in My Shoe,” which is considered to be one of the earliest known recordings of the zydeco style.

RYAN OLSEN/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Broven, John. “We Were More or Less Doing Blues and Rock & Roll: The Story of Classie Ballou.” Juke Blues no. 1 (July 1985): 4–7.

Discography: LSFP

BANDERA

Record label (Illinois, 1958–1961). Owners: Violet (Vi) Harville Muszynski (b. June 21, 1913, IL; d. November 1995, Mason, IL); Bernie C. Harville, Jr. (b. July 15, 1933; IL). This Chicago, Illinois-based label issued sides by Dusty Brown, Bobby “Top Hat” Davis, the Impressions (“Shorty’s Got to Go,” featuring Curtis Mayfield), King Kolax, Jimmy Lee Robinson (“All My Life,” covered by John Mayall), and Wilbur “Hi-Fi” White.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

McGrath

BANDS

The phrase “blues band” perhaps brings to mind for most people a well-rehearsed group of musicians performing emotionally frank songs of a familiar twelve-measure form. They are likely to use electric guitars, electric bass, harmonica, piano, and drums and be found performing in an extroverted, audience-pleasing manner at a crowded bar or nightclub.

This popular conception, though serviceable, draws from only a single genre of the blues band, the one most closely resembling the bands that developed in post-World War II Chicago. Blues band styles and instrumentation have been much less static and more various throughout the history of the blues.

A regional-historical look at the blues band reveals a diversity of styles and considers the influences—musical, social, and technological—that shaped them. To take such a look, one must reach back to the very beginnings of blues music, perhaps into the nineteenth-century American South. Anything but static, the blues band has reflected the influence of—and has itself influenced—all forms of popular music throughout its history.

In taking such a look, it is important to consider the effect of the commercial recording industry on the shape of the evolving blues band. Blues was readily professionalized and made a commodity early in its existence; musicians and producers wanted their records to sell, and often selected songs and approaches accordingly. Moreover, most blues musicians listened to and learned from records. (For instance, the early postwar Chicago bands would not have sounded as they did had not the young Little Walter, still in the Delta, bought records by Southwestern jump-blues artists to Chicago.) Often in the spotlight, a blues band might evolve as much for commercial and professional reasons as for artistic ones.

Black String Bands

What were the first blues bands like? Too little is known about the earliest expressions of blues music to answer this question exactly. However, there are clues and bits of evidence that give us a general picture. W. C. Handy's firsthand description of a lone guitarist playing at a Mississippi railroad station in 1900 serves as one of our earliest time markers for the existence of the blues. Handy also witnessed, a few years later, the same style of music performed by a group of musicians on guitar, mandolin, and string bass (see the Early History section in the Historiography entry). Surely, at the time the blues took form, musicians joined together to play it.

The first blues bands probably formed from black string bands, versatile groups that entertained at country dances, picnics, and more professionally on the minstrel stage or for medicine shows. Many such bands had become adept at playing in a wide variety of folk and popular styles by the last decades of the nineteenth century. Such a band at this time might include one or more guitars, a mandolin, a piano, and a string bass, in addition to the older core instrumentation of banjo and fiddle. Its repertoire might include ragtime, Tin Pan Alley songs, and marches, as well as the older country dance tunes and folk songs.

The adoption of blues by the string bands was accompanied by a process of change in instrumentation, perhaps in response to certain characteristics of this new—though in some ways more stylistically African—music. The most significant change was the gradual replacement of the traditional foundation instrument, the banjo, by the guitar. With a lower range and a greater ability to sustain the tonal micro-intervals achieved by bending strings, the guitar was better suited than the banjo to the slower tempos, deeper singing, and non-Western tonalities of the blues. The fiddle, on which it is easy to slur notes, never completely disappeared from the blues string band (but it did almost completely drop out when blues bands electrified later on). It has been suggested that the inexpensive and easily portable harmonica served to replace the violin in the itinerant bands. Various reports of blues playing well before the first sound recordings of rural blues styles in the mid-1920s indicate that the guitar, harmonica, mandolin, and piano were common blues instruments.

Through the first decades of the twentieth century, many black string bands kept a repertoire of older dance music in addition to blues, rags, and popular songs. Commercial recordings from the 1920s and 1930s of older-styled black string bands such as the Mississippi Sheiks, Peg Leg Howell and His Gang, and Howard Armstrong's Tennessee Chocolate Drops—in addition to testimony from musicians of the time—suggest that such diverse repertoires were common among the black string bands.

Early Recorded Blues Ensembles

With the publication of W. C. Handy's "St. Louis Blues" in 1911 and the recording of Mamie Smith's "Crazy Blues" nine years later, blues music received much commercial and popular attention. For the next few years, blues recordings almost exclusively featured female singers. While these women used African American singing styles more vernacular than ever before put on record, their musical backings suggested the more formal presentation of the vaudeville stage. Their accompaniment was often a small jazz ensemble consisting of piano, trumpet, and clarinet, or just piano. These records—of the style and period known as "classic blues"—widely spread and popularized blues music among listeners both black and white; however, the most vital black blues band styles to come, except for those most jazz-like, derive much more identifiably from the Southern regional blues music, also known as country blues or down-home blues, that would not make an impact on record until the first record by Blind Lemon Jefferson in 1925.

While the down-home blues recordings of the period from 1925 to 1932 are dominated by the solo guitarist/singer, a few ensemble types can be identified. One is the guitar duet, an arrangement often used by Memphis artists Frank Stokes, whose second guitarist was Dan Sane, and Memphis Minnie, who shared the guitar work with her husband Joe McCoy. The guitar duet was also common in other blues recordings of the period. In this style, the guitarists usually play different, complementary parts. They might use different positions (for example, one plays a G chord while the other plays in a D chord position while capoed on the fifth fret) or take different musical roles (for example, one finger picks chord-based phrases while the other flat picks bass runs) or use a combination of both techniques. Such strategies let the players exploit possibilities for tonal richness and rhythmic complexity. Such a role for twin guitars—simultaneously improvisational and part functional—would survive into the era of the earliest electrified urban blues bands almost twenty years later.

Another duet approach was that of guitar and piano, an arrangement that became particularly popular in the 1930s through the recordings of artists such as Leroy Carr and Scrapper Blackwell. Similar in manner to the guitar duets, the piano and guitar would take different roles, usually the piano holding down the bass and middle figures, leaving the guitar, often played with a flat pick, free to improvise with single-string work up the neck. Rhythmic complexity was created when the guitarist played around and against the steadier beat of the pianist's blues patterns.

BANDS

The Jug Bands

Perhaps the most distinctive and intriguing type of blues ensemble recorded in this period is the jug band (see figure). In their diverse repertoires, use of a broad range of stringed instruments, and popularity among audiences of different races and social strata, the jug bands continued the tradition of the black string band. However, the use in these bands of pseudo instruments such as the jug, washboard, and kazoo—while no doubt intended partly for novelty appeal—point to a unique set of African American antecedents. Such instruments had an older tradition in the “spasm bands,” children’s groups who played on homemade instruments as they marched behind the legitimate jazz bands in New Orleans parades. There certainly is the element of novelty “imitation” in the jug band, where the jug, washboard, and kazoo might be seen as makeshift replacements for the jazz band’s tuba, drums, and trumpet, respectively. Further, in west Africa there are instruments similar to the jug and washtub bass, as well as a ritualistic use of various “voice disguisers”—paralleled in the jug bands by the kazoo—to evoke the voices of spirits or animals. Such African and African American antecedents, and many instances of a more purely musical, less self-referential use of such instruments by black musicians playing among themselves, suggest a legitimate, less novel sense of these instruments historically in African American music.

The Dixieland Jug Blowers, Louisville, Kentucky, 1928. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Commercial recordings tapped rich jug band scenes in Louisville, Cincinnati, and especially Memphis, the home of a group of musicians centering around guitarist and harmonica player Will Shade, known as the Memphis Jug Band, and the more stable Gus Cannon's Jug Stompers. While the three-member Jug Stompers used only guitar, banjo, harmonica, and jug, the Memphis Jug Band had five or six members at any given time and used various combinations of guitars, harmonica, piano, banjo-mandolin, mandolin, violin, string bass, washboard, and kazoo. Overall, the groups tended to carefully arrange their songs—a mark of professionalism—using such attention-getting devices as stop-time, which allowed the jug or other instruments to play brief solos. Harmony singing, another mark of professionalism, was used frequently.

In addition to dance tunes, rags, and popular or jazz songs, the jug bands recorded a lot of blues. These records provide us with a type of aural picture of group interaction in an early down-home blues band. The listener to a jug band blues performance is often aware of a groupwide atmosphere of rhythmic and harmonic improvisation. The guitarist, who would normally supply simple chord backing for a dance tune, juxtaposes single-string and chordal blues patterns in the manner of a solo guitarist. The fiddler or harmonica player might play backing notes while the singer sings, or, just as often, freely improvises bluesy phrases, as if a seconding voice. The mandolin player might alternate between straight-time chording and energetic, against-the-beat improvisations using tremolo or staccato noting. The jug player might break from his normal role of providing root bass notes to execute long runs, sometimes lasting more than a measure and reaching high up the scale; he will even occasionally break time like the others and play across the beat. Not least, the washboard player, peppering the music with an expressive dance-like mixture of taps and drags, clearly has a purpose beyond that of emphasizing a simple beat.

Such rich atmospheres of improvisation—both melodic and metric—are widely heard in early black blues ensemble playing and, in varying degrees, all African American-based vernacular music. In musical terms, such practices are identified as tendencies to polyphony (more than a single sound or melody line occurring at the same time) and polyrhythmy (different or contrasting rhythms occurring simultaneously). Such practices have clear antecedents in west African musical style. Heard in many jug band recordings of the late 1920s and 1930s—and in more recent recordings of bluesmen like Yank Rachell, “Sleepy” John Estes, and Big Joe Williams who often played in a jug band format—such practices began to give way to metrical regularization and more defined backing and lead roles as blues bands formalized through amplification and the influence of other popular musical forms.

Recorded Ensemble Playing in the 1930s

During the Great Depression, many record companies folded their race labels and either stopped or dramatically curtailed regional race recording. Rich varieties of down-home blues, including freewheeling blues ensembles such as the jug bands, were neglected on record. The artists who did record, for example, Big Bill Broonzy, Tampa Red, Washboard Sam, and Memphis Minnie, were established hit-makers who could be counted on for smooth performances and tight songwriting. A part of the jug band tradition lived on in a genre known as hokum, which emphasized well-crafted novelty or sexually suggestive blues-based songs. Musical groups who recorded hokum material generally used conventional instrumentation, not the jug band's jug or kazoo, and often sang in harmony on the choruses to underscore a catch phrase. During this period of smoother recorded blues, it is doubtful that the backups to the main artist's guitar or piano, which might include a tenor saxophone, clarinet, or trumpet and a string bass, represented a type of blues band evolution. Rather, they seemed to be borrowing from established, popular genres for the purpose of lending a professionalism and strategic sound to sessions.

Some trends from the 1930s, however, pointed out new directions for blues ensembles. The sophisticated piano-guitar duets laid the groundwork for a smoother, urbane ensemble sound. The jazz-influenced single-string work of guitarist Lonnie Johnson, and that of jazz artist Charlie Christian, opened the way to a fluid voice for the guitar in a blues band.

Showing these influences, a young generation of Texas blues players developed a new type of blues ensemble playing, borrowing regionally as well from guitarist Blind Lemon Jefferson's arpeggio style, hillbilly-jazz hybrids that led to Western swing, and the jump style of territory jazz bands. Most singularly influential of this new generation was guitarist T-Bone Walker, whose adoption of newly available guitar amplification in the late 1930s paved the way for the guitar as an upfront instrument in a blues band and defined its role as a lead instrument.

Postwar Blues Bands in the Southwest

After World War II, key factors influenced a rapid development of blues ensemble playing into the blues band styles most familiar today. One factor was a great migration of southern blacks to northern urban centers, Chicago and other Great Lakes cities being the destination for those from the Delta, and San Francisco and Los Angeles for those from Texas. Independent record companies, filling a niche left by major labels who curtailed product during a wartime recording ban, provided musicians an outlet to develop new urban blues sounds for recently emigrated audiences. This, as well as the advent of black radio stations and the multiple-record jukebox, gave new birth to a recording industry that sought out and developed regional styles.

BANDS

In the Southwest and West Coast, an enormously influential style developed from the amplified, single-string guitar work of T-Bone Walker and those who followed him, such as Clarence “Gatemouth” Brown and Pee Wee Crayton. Influenced as well by the then-popular jump bands—smaller, dance-related offshoots of big bands, bluesy territory jazz bands, and Western swing bands—Southwestern blues artists created a well-rehearsed ensemble style that utilized a tight rhythm section of piano, bass, chording guitar, and drums to set a foundation for a lead guitar and lead singer. Such artists had a major influence on the development of rhythm and blues and, later, soul music. The influence of this style extended beyond the Southwest, being widely adopted by younger performers like Delta-raised B. B. King and Bobby “Blue” Bland, who were to help bring it international attention.

Southwestern blues bands varied somewhat in size and instrumentation. The smaller size can be represented by guitarist Pee Wee Crayton’s band of 1948, which included, along with the singer’s guitar, tenor saxophone, piano, bass, and drums. An example of a larger size would be the band of Roy Milton, which added alto saxophone and trumpet; a style that found later expansion in the road bands of B. B. King, which typically included a saxophone section—tenor, alto, and baritone—trumpet, trombone, piano, bass, drums, and the singer’s guitar.

Blues styles varied among these bands. However, certain traits can be identified, such as the predominance of a singer who is often the guitarist as well. Band dynamics are controlled so that the singer can be easily heard, with the other instruments generally there to support his singing and lead guitar playing. Singing styles tend to be declarative, clearly articulated, and carefully phrased—in general, smoother and less raspy than those of Delta artists. Often, the singer fills the pauses between his vocal phrases with improvisations on the guitar—with its volume set so that the most subtle string work is easily heard over the band. Bass, drums, and piano generally serve as rhythm section; however, the pianist may improvise softly on the high keys to create a backdrop during a singing verse. A single horn, usually a tenor saxophone, might play an instrumental break; when it does it can explore a range between mellowness to screeching ferocity, paralleling the emotional expressiveness of the singer and his guitar. Usually the horn section serves to play repetitive phrases that punctuate and delineate the song’s chord changes. By working together within carefully defined roles, the band members employ dynamics precisely orchestrated for maximum emotional effect.

Postwar Blues Bands in Chicago

The urban bands that developed in Chicago among Delta emigrants reflected more readily the rawness and older ways of the music from back home. At the same time, along with amplification they adopted much of the lead-rhythm sectioning and a lot of the rhythmic swing of the modern jump groups. Mixing these styles in a compact format that used down-home instrumentation centered on guitar and harmonica, musicians such as Muddy Waters, Little Walter, and Howlin’ Wolf—through continuous club work and in collaboration with independent record producers, notably Leonard Chess of Chicago’s Chess Records and songwriter and session man Willie Dixon—evolved the nascent Delta juke band styles into a form that has come to represent for many “the blues band.”

There are germs of this style in Big Boy Crudup’s 1946 Chicago recording of “That’s All Right, Mama,” which featured an amplified guitar with bass and drums, and in Delta bands like those of Sonny Boy Williamson II (Aleck Miller). In Williamson’s bands, the traditional Delta blues, now played on electric guitar and harmonica and backed by drums and bass, adopt the swing of the jump bands. There is a new prominence for the harmonica, held close to the mike so as to alternate phrasing with the singer, a style pioneered in the 1937 Chicago recordings of the first Sonny Boy Williamson, John Lee Williamson. A little more than ten years later, another Delta emigrant, Marion Walter Jacobs, or “Little Walter,” used a technique of cupping the harmonica and microphone together with his hands while he played for a richer, more powerful sound. This innovation, joined with Little Walter’s improvisational brilliancy, brought the harmonica to an equal, if not sometimes upfront, role among the instruments in an electrified blues band.

For a composite example of the musical interplay among members of a postwar Chicago blues band, one might listen to several early 1950s Chess recordings of Muddy Waters. His recording band at that time typically consisted of himself on vocals and slide guitar, Jimmy Rogers on second guitar, Little Walter on harmonica, Otis Spann on piano, Willie Dixon on bass, and Fred Below on drums.

Though the focus is clearly on Waters's voice, which is recorded at the tape overload point for the highest presence, no single instrument seems ever to dominate. Rather, all merge into a pattern of voices and rhythms, an effect resulting from each player adhering to, but improvising freely within, a specific role. Though the second guitarist usually plays a bass pattern counterpoint to Waters's slide guitar, he might abruptly interject a jazz chord or play muted single-string improvisations during Waters's vocal. The harmonica player might paint a background during the vocal with drawn-out notes, or just as often improvise melodic phrases. The pianist mixes right-hand improvisations—sometimes wildly cross-rhythmic—with rolling basses, altogether rising and diminishing in emotional intensity with the singer and the other instruments. The drums embellish the backbeat with frequent rolls, flourishes, and crescendos—an orchestral approach that recalls the even more wildly broken-up playing of Sonny Boy Williamson's Delta drummer, Peck Curtis.

Recordings of Muddy Waters's band and those of other early postwar Chicago blues artists reveal an urban sound still close to its country roots. While the members of a Southwestern band controlled overall dynamics by adhering to defined roles and parts, the Chicago players improvised freely, achieving group dynamics by following a more organic ebb and flow. Preprofessional performance practices such as the addition or subtraction of measures were often retained in the playing of the early Chicago bands. The Southwestern bands, earlier on, had regularized their timing in accordance with more popular or formal musical expectations.

Such characteristics of the Chicago bands can be directly linked to similar patterns then current in Delta blues, and traceable back through the jug and juke bands and earlier folk styles to distinctive polyrhythmic and polytonal practices in west African music. One also hears a strong favoring of pentatonic scales and aeolian, or minor-like, modes; and retention of tonal expression foreign to, and so not regimented by, the Western system of note intervals, a practice often described as the use of microtones (see Scales entry). Such characteristics are never entirely absent from true blues style in any genre; they did, however, show most strongly in the Delta and persist long into the early postwar Chicago bands before eventually beginning to fade at the hands of younger players with wider influences.

The next generation of Chicago blues players added practices of rhythm and blues and soul music to the Delta styles of their mentors. Key artists of the "West Side Sound," Otis Rush, Magic Sam, and Junior Wells, sometimes augmented their bands with horns and replaced the rippling piano with a gospel-influenced organ sound. Lead guitar work came to the front, influenced by the styles of B. B. King and other popular rhythm and blues guitarists, and a tightened rhythm section provided unambiguous support. True minor keys—rare in aeolian folk-blues styles but common in soul and gospel music—were sometimes used. Singers adopted the entreating, melismatic manner of gospel-influenced rhythm and blues.

While generally preserving a compact format, the newer Chicago bands adopted the regularizing devices of the smoother rhythm and blues and Southwestern blues bands such as tight arrangements—which might include dramatic stop-times and calculated rises and falls in dynamics—and a strong drum backbeat. Indeed, the replacement of the acoustic standup bass by the electric bass guitar in the early 1960s made possible a tighter rhythm foundation, because the more precise and louder electric bass could "lock in" on patterns more easily with the drums and take over the second guitar's practice of playing intricate bass figures, leaving the guitarist freer to augment the rhythm.

Through changes such as these—reflecting wider influences brought in through a vibrant market of blues records and radio—the subtleties of the older Delta band characteristics began to fade. The new blues bands were tighter and more modern, reflecting a broadening reach of the blues.

Band Formats of the 1960s: The Influence of a New Audience

By the mid-1960s, blues musicians had seen the beginning of a shift in their audience base. Around the time that young blacks turned to newer, socially relevant expression in soul music, a growing white audience, exposed to the blues through the folk music revival and the championing influence of blues-based English rock 'n' roll bands such as the Rolling Stones and Cream, embraced the form and its artists.

The white blues-influenced bands of this time tended to use instrumentation similar to that of most Chicago blues bands. Both the Rolling Stones and the more stylistically idiomatic Paul Butterfield Blues Band used a basic recording lineup of guitars, keyboard, harmonica, drums, and electric bass. They covered, more or less faithfully, key songs from the repertoires of their influences, which included Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, Little Walter, Junior Wells, and Otis Rush.

BANDS

In the latter part of the decade, a new type of blues band with an expanded style emerged from the British blues and rock world. This was the so-called power trio, a lineup of guitar, electric bass, and drums introduced by groups Cream and the Jimi Hendrix Experience. Adopting practices of California-style psychedelia and avant-garde jazz, these blues-based bands often extended songs with long periods of improvisation in which all three instruments took part. Accordingly the electric bass and drums were amplified or miked at levels equal to the guitar. Songs were sometimes built on repetitive instrumental phrases abstracted from recordings of Chicago electric blues pioneers, such as Muddy Waters and Howlin' Wolf, and exaggerated by high volume levels and enhanced guitar distortion. Eric Clapton of Cream and other guitarists who pioneered in this form favored and popularized a fluid, expressive single-string lead style in the manner of B. B. King and Albert King. The more singularly influential Jimi Hendrix greatly expanded the boundaries of blues-based guitar playing through seamless integration of blues, rock, and soul styles and an innovative musical use of controlled amplifier feedback. The power trio format influenced the emergence of heavy metal in rock, but it lay fallow as a blues band form until its adoption in the 1980s by guitarist Stevie Ray Vaughan and his band Double Trouble.

In the early 1970s, a fuller ensemble approach was popularized by the Allman Brothers Band and other white American Southern blues-rock bands. The Allman Brothers had a lineup of two lead guitars, two drummers, a Hammond organ, and an electric bass. Influenced by Southern styles of soul music as well as blues—and showing the open, relaxed freedom of the youth counterculture—they used driving, extended grooves established by bass, drums, and percussion as a foundation for churning organ and soulful, hard-edged singing. Perhaps of widest influence would be the band's unique use of twin lead guitars—one played with a slide and one fretted conventionally—to play lead lines in tight harmony, a practice adopted into heavy metal music and occasionally reappearing in blues and country music.

The Blues Band in the 1970s and 1980s: Professionalism and Eclecticism

No significant new blues band forms arose in the 1970s and 1980s. However, an overall tightening of the band sound, brought about through more precise recording techniques and the influence of rock, funk, and disco, affected younger urban musicians like Buddy Guy, Junior Wells, and James Cotton, and even the recordings of longtime players like B. B. King. As blues gained wider popularity, its players faced increasing commercial demands. A professional blues band was expected to give a polished, smooth performance and have a tight rhythm section.

The 1980s saw a revival of traditional, grittier blues styles. With a renewed interest in past styles came eclecticism as well. Historic styles had been codified, and blues musicians of the 1980s were free to pick and choose from which to express themselves. At one end might be the Fabulous Thunderbirds, who had a format of harmonica, guitar, electric bass, and drums; and guitarist Stevie Ray Vaughan, whose even leaner accompaniment of electric bass and drums and later keyboard served to support his guitar playing and singing. These bands, both from the Austin area, chose much of their material and playing style to reflect Texas and West Coast artists like Slim Harpo and Johnny "Guitar" Watson, yet their instrumentation was leaner and borrowed from other styles. One of the largest revival bands, Roomful of Blues, used guitar, piano, electric bass, baritone sax, alto sax, tenor sax, and trumpet—an instrumentation similar to that of the bigger Southwestern blues bands. This decade also found new popularity for the rough, "house-rocking" sound of recently passed artists like Hound Dog Taylor. Chicago's Lil' Ed and the Blues Imperials featured searing bottleneck guitar, tough singing, and a punchy rhythm section of electric bass, rhythm guitar, and drums. In this type of band, a good "feel" for the type of music that is being played is deemed more important than virtuosity or stylistic versatility.

The Zydeco Band

A survey of blues band is not complete without a mention of perhaps the most distinctive of all regional blues styles, that of zydeco, a mixture of Cajun music with the blues. Created in the early years of the twentieth century by blacks who inhabited the bayou areas of southern Louisiana, the hybrid developed a solid base in the blues form, though it was, and continues to be, sung in black Creole patois or French (see Louisiana entry). The original zydeco instruments were those used in Cajun music: the fiddle, accordion, triangle, and rub board. Zydeco musicians eventually brought drums, electric guitar, and bass into the bands, paralleling similar developments in the blues elsewhere. Clifton Chenier, who played a piano accordion instead of the more harmonically limited Cajun accordion, is credited with blending rhythm and blues with the Creole sound to create modern zydeco in the 1950s. A zydeco band today might include accordion, saxophone, trumpet, keyboard, electric guitar, electric bass, and rub board.

The Blues Band at One Hundred Years

Blues bands in the 1990s continued the eclectic trends of the previous decade, with contemporary additions. Some blues musicians, like guitarist Roy Rogers, were inclined to adopt unusual chord changes, instrument textures, and rhythms from modern roots-oriented or alternative rock bands. Forcing a rethinking of the concept of blues “band,” original recordings by blues musicians such as R. L. Burnside and Rick Holmstrom utilized synthesized instruments, drum machines, and sampled clips from vintage blues records—techniques borrowed from hip-hop and modern pop music.

Such readiness of integration was a positive sign that the blues, and the bands that played it, continued to evolve by influencing, and being influenced by, all the music around. At the same time, there surely existed a wider familiarity with the range of historic blues styles than at any previous time. As this music born in the American Deep South began its second century, bands could be found playing Chicago blues, or Southwest blues, or jug band music, or zydeco, in performance or just for fun, all over the world.

JOSEPH A. LAROSE

Bibliography

- Cohn, Lawrence, ed. Nothing But the Blues: The Music and the Musicians. New York: Abbeville Press, 1995.
- Evans, David. Big Road Blues: Tradition and Creativity in the Folk Blues. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- Keil, Charles. Urban Blues. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966.
- Oliver, Paul. The Story of the Blues. Philadelphia: Chilton, 1969.
- Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. Harmondsworth, Middlesex, England: Penguin, 1982.
- Russell, Tony. The Blues: From Robert Johnson to Robert Cray. New York: Schirmer, 1997.

Discography

Black String Bands: Selected Recordings

- Mississippi Sheiks: Stop and Listen* (1992, Yazoo 2006); Alabama: Black Country Dance Bands: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order (1924–1949)

(1993, Document DOCD 5166); Blues Roots: Blues Masters, Vol. 10 (1993, Rhino R2 71135); Country Negro Jam Session (1993, Arhoolie CD372); String Bands 1926–1929: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order (1993, Document DOCD 5167).

Early Recorded Blues Ensembles: Selected Recordings

Frank Stokes: Creator of the Memphis Blues (1990, Yazoo YAZCD1056); Memphis Minnie and Kansas Joe: 1929–1934, Vol. 1, 18 June 1929 to 29 May 1930 (1991, Document DOCD5028); Classic Blues Women: Blues Masters, Vol. 11 (1993, Rhino R2 71134).

The Jug Bands: Selected Recordings

Gus Cannon: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vol. 1 (November 1927 to 20 September 1928) (1990, Document DOCD-5032); Memphis Jug Band (1990, Yazoo YAZCD 1067); Ruckus Juice and Chitlins: The Great Jug Bands (1998, Yazoo CD 2033); Sleepy John Estes: First Recordings, with James “Yank” Rachel, Noah Lewis (JSP Records JSP CD 601).

Recorded Ensemble Playing in the 1930s: Selected Recordings

Memphis Minnie: Hoodoo Lady (1933–1937) (1991, Columbia/Legacy CK-46775); The Virtuoso Guitar of Scrapper Blackwell (1991, Yazoo 1019); Leroy Carr: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vol. 4, 16 March 1932 to 14 August 1934 (1992, Document DOCD 5137); Big Bill Broonzy: Complete Recordings in Chronological Order, Vol. 1 (Document DOCD5046); Lonnie Johnson: Steppin’ on the Blues (Columbia C46221).

Postwar Blues Bands in the Southwest: Selected Recordings

The Complete Recordings of T-Bone Walker 1940–1954 (1990, Mosaic MD6-130); Texas Blues: Blues Masters, Vol. 3 (1992, Rhino R2 71123); Urban Blues: Blues Masters, Vol. 1 (1992, Rhino R2 71121); Gatemouth Brown: Original Peacock Recordings (Rouner CD 2039); Jumpin’ the Blues (Ace CDCHD 941).

Postwar Blues Bands in Chicago: Selected Recordings

Willie Dixon: The Chess Box (1988, MCA Chess CHD 16500); Muddy Waters: The Chess Box (1989, MCA Chess CHD3 80002); Post War Chicago Blues: Blues Masters, Vol. 2 (1992, Rhino R2 71122); The Essential Sonny Boy Williamson (1993, MCA Chess CHD2 9343); Little Walter: His Best (1997, MCA/Chess CHD 9384); The Cobra Records Story (Capricorn 9 42012-2).

The Zydeco Band: Selected Recordings

Bogalusa Boogie: Clifton Chenier (1990, Arhoolie CD 347); Zydeco: The Early Years (1961–1962) (Arhoolie CD 307).

Blues Band Formats of the 1960s: Selected Recordings

The Paul Butterfield Blues Band (1965, Elektra EKL-294); Are You Experienced?/The Jimi Hendrix Experience (1967, Reprise R 6261); Magic Sam Blues Band: West Side Soul (1967, Delmark); The Very Best of Cream (1995, Polydor 3752-2); Chicago/The Blues/Today (Vanguard

BANDS

VMD 79216 [Vol. 1], VMD 79217 [Vol. 2], VMD 79218 [Vol. 3]; Junior Wells: Hoodoo Man Blues (Delmark DD612).

The Blues Band in the 1970s and 1980s: Selected Recordings

Lil' Ed and the Blues Imperials: Rough Housin' (1986, Alligator AL 4749); The Sky Is Crying/Stevie Ray Vaughn and Double Trouble (1991, Epic EK 47390); Postmodern Blues: Blues Masters, Vol. 9 (1993, Rhino R2 71132); The Alligator Records 25th Anniversary Collection (1996, Alligator ALCD 110/111); James Cotton: Live from Chicago (Alligator ALCD 4733); Robert Cray: The Score (Charly CDBM16).

The Blues Band at 100 Years: Selected Recordings

Rhythm and Groove/Roy Rogers (1996, Virgin); Get Wild: Lil' Ed and the Blues Imperials (1999, Alligator ALCD 4868); R. L. Burnside: Wish I Was in Heaven Sitting Down (2000, Fat Possum 80332-2); Rick Holmstrom: Hydraulic Groove (2002, Tone Cool 751 134-2).

BANJO

Technical Description

A plucked string instrument with a long guitar-like neck and a circular soundtable of tautly stretched vellum, skin, or plastic against which the bridge is pressed by the strings. Although unfretted instruments existed, the modern banjo is fitted with frets. Banjos were traditionally strung with gut strings and later nylon, though modern banjos make use of steel wire strings. The head tension is usually adjusted by means of twenty-four or more screw-tightening brackets attached to the outer side of a tambourine-like rim of laminated wood. A pan-shaped resonator is often attached to the lower side of the otherwise open-backed body and serves to reflect outward the sound emitted by the underside of the head. The resonators were originally made of gourd or wood; modern banjos use wood. Banjos can vary greatly with regard to shape, tuning, material, and virtually any other aspect. With the advent of industrial mass production in the late nineteenth century, standard modern banjo types evolved. They can roughly be classified as discussed next.

The banjo and its associates normally have five strings (tuned G, C, G, B, D), with the fifth string fixed to a peg on the neck, not extending the length of the fret board to the head. This fifth string is thin and is higher pitched than its companion strings. Because of its hoop construction, the banjo is often referred to as an “open-back” banjo. However, a resonator can be (and often is) fitted to the instrument to increase its tonal volume; in particular, banjos used by bluegrass and country-and-western players are fitted with resonators. The diameter of the vellum is normally eleven inches. The “classic” banjo is played without plectrum or finger picks.

The zither-banjo is a constructional variation of the banjo and as such has five strings, tuned to the same pitch and notes. The vellum diameter of this closed-back banjo varies between seven and nine inches and it rests on a circular metal casting suspended in a wooden hoop with convex back, approximately nine to eleven inches in diameter. The octave string passes through a tube inserted under the fingerboard and emerges at the peghead.

The banjeurine was invented by the American S. S. Stewart in 1885 and evolved to take the lead in banjo orchestras of that period. Its five strings are in the same intervals as the banjo, but a fourth higher. The piccolo-banjo is virtually a half-size version of the banjo. The plectrum-banjo has the same characteristics and scale length as the banjo but with only four strings (C, G, B, D). This instrument is always fitted with a resonator.

The four strings of a tenor-banjo are tuned C, G, D, A, thus having the same relationship between the strings as a violin and a mandoline (the plectrum-banjo and the five-string banjo have different relationships between the strings, so “doubling” on them is not easy for a violin/mandoline instrumentalist). It has a shorter scale than the banjo, the plectrum-banjo, and the zither-banjo. It looks like a plectrum-banjo with a slightly shorter neck. Nearly all tenor-banjos are fitted with a resonator. The instrument is always played with a plectrum.

The banjolin has four single or eight double strings, tuned G, D, A, E. It looks like a stunted plectrum-banjo in its four-string form, for it has a full-size (eleven-inch) hoop but an arm only about half the length of the banjo. The instrument is always played with the plectrum and was evolved to enable mandolinists and violinists to look like “banjoists” when ragtime orchestras came into being.

The mandolin-banjo has four double strings tuned the same as the banjolin, but it looks like a miniature zither-banjo with a vellum of only four or five inches in diameter. The ukulele-banjo or banjo-ukulele combines a banjo body with a ukulele fingerboard, and it is strung and tuned like the Hawaiian ukulele. It appeared on the market under various trade names, such as Banjulele and Banjuke. The four strings of the bass-banjo are tuned to the same pitch as the violon cello, so its correct name should really be “cello-banjo.” The scale length of this instrument is twenty-seven inches and the vellum diameter is usually thirteen to fourteen inches. It is played in the normal manner, but with a stout leather plectrum. The contra-bass banjo has three strings. It is about five feet in length from tailpiece to peghead, so the player stands behind it to play. The vellum diameter is usually eighteen inches. The contra-bass banjo is played with a large leather plectrum. The six strings of the guitar-banjo are tuned E, A, D, G, B, E. This instrument is virtually a six-string guitar with a banjo body.

The guitar-banjo, the banjo-mandoline, and the ukulele-banjo are instruments that appeared to be banjos but were strung and tuned as nonbanjo instruments, and they have a percussive banjo sound. Three types of banjo are common in blues and jazz: the five-string banjo in G or C, the four-string tenor banjo, and the six-string guitar-banjo.

African Antecedents

Long-necked instruments with skin soundtables are common in Europe, north Africa, the Middle East, and Asia. Because instruments resembling banjos have been associated with African slaves in the Americas since the seventeenth century, a west African origin appears to be plausible. Some evidence points to the halam as played by the Senegambian Wolof as the closest match in terms of structure and performance style. Variants of the instrument are known throughout the region as kotingo (Mandinka), nkoni (Manianka), hodu (Fula), or gambare (Serahuli). One of the common Senegambian ensembles consisted of a plucked-lute (halam), a bowed-lute (riti, or nyanyaur), and a tapped calabash. There is an obvious similarity between this type of ensemble and the fiddle, banjo, and tambourine ensembles known in the United States since the late seventeenth century.

Like the banjo, the halam is a plucked lute of (four or) five strings, one of which vibrates openly as a drone string, and it is played in what American folk musicians call “frailing” or “claw-hammer” style, which the minstrel instruction books of the nineteenth century referred to as brushless, drop-thumb frailing. In frailing, the fingernail picks various strings in a rhythmic, fast-moving pattern while the ball of the thumb repeatedly strikes down at the drone string, providing an insistent ostinato. Both halam and banjo were found typically in trio ensembles, both were played almost exclusively by males, both employed a “stroke” playing technique, and both were fretless. In contrast to the banjo, however, the halam has a round neck.

Development of the Banjo by African Americans Up to the 1900s

The origin of the word is uncertain, but most probably derives from the Portuguese or Spanish bandore. Slave owners in the eighteenth-century Americas noted it under names such as banza, banjer, bania, or banja. The banjo’s flat fingerboard was possibly acquired after slaves became acquainted with European plucked string instruments, all of which have flat fingerboards. The first depiction of a creole bania appeared in J. Stedman’s book Narrative of a Five-Year’s Expedition Against the Revolted Negroes of Surinam from the Year 1772 to 1777, published in 1796, and a specimen collected by this author is kept at the Rijksmuseum voor Volkenkunde at Leiden, the Netherlands. It features one short and three long strings and a skin-headed calabash body. Unlike drums, which were considered to be potentially dangerous transmitters of secret messages, banjos were allowed by slave owners. They were popular among slaves because they derived from African musical traditions and were relatively simple to construct and easy to carry, using gourds as the sounding body. Blackened-up white minstrel entertainers, notably Joel Sweeney and Dan Emmett, lived near and learned from black banjo players. They rapidly introduced “nigger song and dance” as well as banjo playing to white urban culture. At the same time, traditional white musicians of the rural south integrated the banjo in “old time string band music.”

No scholarly accounts or notations are known to exist of black banjo styles and the first tutorial books on minstrel banjo have certainly been “sanitized” to be acceptable to white tastes. Nevertheless, the “stroke” style they teach produces a sound similar to that described in many of the earlier accounts: patterns of upward strikes by the index or middle fingernail, combined with downward strokes of the thumb against the fifth string. More complex patterns can be produced by the thumb dropping further down to pick individual notes on the full-length strings. While the stroke style was, and still is, popular among rural performers, “finger-picking” must have developed at the same time, and it became the dominant technique employed on the minstrel, vaudeville, and urban concert stage. Finger-picking is the guitar-like way to accompany songs, which combines upward plucking by the first and sometimes second and third fingers, with downward plucks of the fifth string by the thumb. The Senegambian halam tradition includes a musical structure, fodet, that is remarkably similar to the blues. A repeated musical structure of a variable number of beats, an analysis of the fodeet reveals similarities to the blues also in melodic, rhythmic, and harmonic characteristics. Finger technique (the right hand) changed, from the use of thumb and index finger in minstrel style, to using three or four fingers in guitar style, and was first codified in 1865. By this time the neck was shortened as the pitch rose from F or G to A. Such a pitch rise would demand a decrease in string length and thus the neck by two or four fret spaces (that is, approximately, $1\frac{1}{8}$ to $2\frac{1}{8}$ inches), because the same strings were used for the new pitch. At this time it became common to add frets, or to indicate finger positions by inlaid marks on the neck. Manufacturers responded by adding fully enclosed backs and holes in the front through which the sound projected to the audience.

Unfortunately, it is impossible to ascertain today the sound of the early black tradition, because the first recordings date only from the 1890s. The picture is further obscured by the fact that practically all recordings by African Americans prior to 1923 (for instance, Sylvester Weaver playing six-string guitar-banjo) were taken in urban environments, both in the United States and in Europe, with an urban white vaudeville audience in mind. Through much of the nineteenth-century minstrel tradition, the banjo was identified with black music, yet white banjo tunings may have reflected black influence. Urban minstrel shows as well as the Victorian parlor performers had usually tuned their banjos in a manner that made it necessary to finger chords by pressing the appropriate frets and leaving consonant strings open. The idea of tuning a banjo was to have as many open strings as possible. Banjos were found in municipal and college banjo clubs and orchestras that rivaled brass bands in popularity as they performed ever more demanding music.

The earliest sound documents by black banjoists appear to be duets by the African Canadian brothers Douglas and George Bohee (Edison cylinders taken at London, 1890–1892). The Bohees represent the “Coloured Minstrel” tradition, and their repertoire is known to have included antislavery protest material, but no copies of their recordings have surfaced to date. Slightly later, an 1892 advertisement by the Louisiana Phonograph Company Limited lists “Negro Sermons” by Louis Vasnier (“very popular and good for the blues”), accompanying himself on the banjo. Only one of at least a dozen cylinders is known to exist but nothing much other than background noise can be heard. The earliest surviving flat disk record is a single-sided Berliner, recorded by Cousins and Ed De Moss in New York in 1897: a vocal duet version of the religious song “Poor Mourner,” accompanied by their own banjos in “stroke” style. It is the same archaic song that was 30 years later recorded as “You Shall” by blues singer Frank Stokes, accompanying himself on the guitar. Also in 1927, Texan Henry Thomas, believed to be one of the oldest rural black singers on record, performed his songs with guitar accompaniment, much resembling the rhythmic approach of banjoists. The staccato-sounding banjo was well suited for early ragtime recordings, but all the leading banjo soloists on record were white (notably Vess Ossman and Fred van Eps in the United States, and Olly Oakley and John Pidoux in the United Kingdom). Black banjo ragtime records were not waxed until the 1920s, an example being Gus Cannon’s “Madison Street Rag” (Victor, 1928), played in a percussive fashion that may well reflect the style of banjo rags from which the piano forms partly derived.

Banjo in Prewar Blues

With the advent of jazz during the 1920s, the popularity of the banjo declined. It was replaced by tenor-banjos and plectrum-banjos, and, with the advent of big band jazz, microphones, and pickups during the 1930s, by the guitar. The two principal blues banjoists to record, “Papa” Charlie Jackson from New Orleans and Gus Cannon from Mississippi, were bridging the gap between the nineteenth-century songsters tradition and the country blues. Both musicians used the “crossed notes” technique involving “returning to a chord,” to facilitate finger-picking patterns. In Jackson’s work (notably “Long Gone Lost John,” Paramount, 1928), especially in his links between choruses, some of the fingering patterns that later emerged in the jazz playing of Lonnie Johnson are identifiable. Jackson was the first commercially successful self-accompanied black artist, and one of the most proficient artists of his time, equally at home in blues, rags, and hokum (“Shake That Thing,” Paramount, 1925). Cannon can be heard exhorting the Jug Stompers to “Rag it!” in the instrumental choruses of “Money Never Runs Out” (Victor, 1930). Here and elsewhere (such as in his duets as “Banjo Joe” with the guitarist Blind Blake) Cannon uses the incisive banjo to play single-string ragtime-oriented phrases over guitar or banjo accompaniment. Even when he played guitar, Jackson used a style strongly reminiscent of the banjo, which he more usually played. Apart from Jackson and Cannon, the banjo never figured prominently in the blues. Some of the best jazz tenor-banjo solos on record were played by Banjo Ikey Robinson with Jabbo Smith’s Rhythm Aces, but he also did hokum and blues (for example, “Rock Pile Blues,” Brunswick, 1929; “Unlucky Blues,” Vocalion, 1933). The foremost white blues banjoist was Dock Boggs (Brunswick, 1927).

The decline of the five-string banjo by the early twentieth century in America must have left countless banjos and banjo-like instruments unused—a source of supply through junk and pawn shops for poor people who, for little cash investment, could experiment with such instruments and add them to their music-making traditions.

Banjo in Country Music and Bluegrass

Although the banjo styles were probably introduced into the Appalachians by blacks, bluegrass music has predominantly English, Irish, and Scottish origins, from the descendants of immigrants to the Appalachian area of the United States. The name, coined by mandolinist Bill Monroe when trying to describe his sound, refers to Monroe's home state of Kentucky, the Bluegrass State. The standard musical instrumental components of bluegrass include mandolin, banjo, violin (fiddle), upright string-bass, also the guitar or the dobro. Often fast paced, bluegrass allows its musicians to improvise, much like jazz. Its lyrical content varies greatly and can consist of many different things from gospel, traditional, and folk to country.

Among the pioneers, Uncle Dave Macon (1870–1952) played banjos with resonators for most of his career in the classic “claw-hammer” or “knocking” style. Guitarist DeWitt “Snuffy” Jenkins picked up the banjo in the late 1920s and further developed the three-finger style, which he passed on to Earl Scruggs, who in turn became a stalwart in Bill Monroe's band from 1944. Scruggs perfected the three-fingered guitar style, mostly using a pick, to the extent that it became known as the Scruggs style: He used his thumb and index and middle fingers, with picks on each of them. A melody note is followed by three fill-in notes and a roll pattern.

Postwar Revival of Banjo

While in North Carolina around 1936, Pete Seeger met local banjo players and folk song collectors, notably Bascom Lamar Lunsford, and consequently switched to five-string banjo himself on which he recorded extensively. In 1940 his travels in search of banjo ballads and different ways to play them began. In 1948 he published an influential instruction manual. During the late 1940s a new interest in folk music began that carried well into the early 1970s and was sparked by the civil rights movement in the South and the war in Vietnam. Lunsford (born in 1882) made his first recordings in 1922 and continued to record well into the microgroove era (Riverside, 1956). Seeger and Scruggs both introduced technological changes to the banjo and reaffirmed the role of the banjo in traditional and folk music after World War II.

The tenor-banjo also reemerged during the 1940s with the revival of traditional jazz. The banjo continued to be an almost exclusively white instrument, a notable exception being jazz performer Elmer Snowden (Riverside, 1960). Professional black blues performers had switched to the guitar, although rural traditions of black old-time folk style still survive (“Black Banjo Songsters of North Carolina & Virginia,” Smithsonian, 1997; “Will Slayden: African-American Banjo Songs from West Tennessee,” TFS, 2003). Georges Guesnon is considered the typical representative of “Creole blues,” but on records at least he uses the tenor-banjo for songs, not blues (“I Can't Escape from You,” Icon, 1959). At the time of this writing, the most influential four-string banjoist worldwide appears to be American Bud Wachter (for example, consider his duets with German Peter Meyer, Transatlantic Banjo, 1987). His position today can be compared to that of Harry Reser (1896–1965) during the 1920s and 1930s.

RAINER E. LOTZ

Bibliography

- B.M.G., The Monthly Magazine Devoted to the Interests of the Banjo, Mandolin, Guitar and Kindred Instruments. London: D. H. Keeogh, 1903–1976.
- Bastin, Bruce. Red River Blues. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Coolen, M. T. “The Fodet. A Senegambian Origin for the Blues.” The Black Perspective in Music 10, no. 1 (Spring 1982): 69–84; updated as “Senegambian Influences on Afro-American Musical Culture.” Black Music Research Journal 11, no. 1 (1991): 1–18.
- Epstein, D. J. Sinful Tunes and Spirituals: Black Folk Music to the Civil War. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.
- Gura, P. F., and J. F. Bollman. America's Instrument: The Banjo in the Nineteenth Century. Chapel Hill, NC: University of North Carolina Press, 1999.
- Heier, U., and R. E. Lotz. The Banjo on Record—A Biographical Discography. Westport/London: Greenwood, 1993.
- Nathan, H. Dan Emmet and the Rise of Early Negro Minstrelry. 2nd ed. Norman, OK: University of Oklahoma Press, 1977.
- Odell, J. S., and R. B. Winans. “Banjo.” In The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, Vol. 2, edited by S. Sadie, 2nd ed. London/New York: Grove's Dictionaries, 2001.
- Oliver, P. The Story of the Blues. London: 1969.
- . Songsters and Saints—Vocal Traditions on Race Records. Cambridge, UK; New York: Cambridge University Press.
- Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Viking, 1981.
- Rosenberg, N. V. Bluegrass—A History. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1985.

BANJO

- Seeger, P. How to Play the 5-String Banjo. New York: Self-published, 1948.
- Shipton, A. "Banjo." In The New Grove Dictionary of Jazz, Vol. 1, edited by B. Kernfeld. London/New York: Grove's Dictionaries, 1988.
- Smith, C. Liner notes for Papa Charlie Jackson, Vol. 1, 1924–1926 (Document CD 5087).
- Tsumura, A. 1001 Banjos. Tokyo/New York: Kodansha America, 1993.
- Webb, R. L. Ring the Banjar! The Banjo in America from Folklore to Factory. Cambridge, MA: MIT Museum, 1984.

BANKHEAD, TOMMY

- b. 24 October 1931; Lake Cormorant, MS
d. 16 December 2000; St. Louis, MO

A St. Louis blues guitarist, Bankhead started out with Sonny Boy Williamson (Aleck Miller), and later recorded for the Fedora label.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

- Greensmith, Bill. "Still in the Woods: Tommy Bankhead." Blues Unlimited no. 145 (Winter 1983/1984): 9–11.

BANKS, CHICO

- b. 1962; Chicago, IL

Learned guitar from his father, gospel musician Jesse Banks, a member of the Mighty Clouds of Joy. By age sixteen, Banks was appearing in Chicago clubs with Little Johnny Christian. He has backed James Cotton and Junior Wells, among others.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

- Bonner, Brett J., et al. "40 Under 40." Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 77–90.

Discography: AMG

BANKS, JERRY

- b. Houston, TX

Sacramento blues drummer, active since 1964. Banks started out playing gospel and broke into the Sacramento blues scene with Al Arnett in the early 1970s.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

- Jung, Maureen. "Sacramento Blues: Part One." Living Blues no. 114 (March/April 1994): 58–65.

BANKS, L. V.

- b. 28 October 1932; near Stringtown, MS

Influenced by B. B. King, the blues guitarist moved to Chicago in 1965, meeting up with Junior Wells, McKinley Mitchell, and Lonnie Brooks. Banks has recorded for the Clicke label.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

- Sharp, Steven. "South Side Special." Living Blues no. 110 (July/August 1993): 29–35.

BANKSTON, DICK

- b. 1899; Crystal Springs, MS

Birth year has also been given as 1897. Bankston, a blues guitarist and violinist, learned guitar from Willie Brown and Charley Patton as a youngster. Bankston formed a string band with his brother, Ben Bankston, that performed at dances in the 1950s. In the 1960s and 1970s he relayed informative details of pre-1942 Mississippi blues to such researchers as Gayle Wardlow and David Evans.

RYAN OLSEN/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Harris, Sheldon. Blues Who's Who. 5th ed. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington House, 1979.

BANNER

Label of the Plaza Music Company, New York. Launched in 1921, the Banner label developed a modest blues catalog featuring vaudeville singers such as Viola McCoy and Rosa Henderson (under the pseudonym Sally Ritz). Continued after the merging of Plaza's labels with those of Cameo and Pathé in August 1929, it became one of the five "dime-store" labels of the American Record Corporation (ARC) with which it used common issue numbers after September 1935. The labels shared an important Race catalog, including Big Bill Broonzy, Sam Collins, "Georgia" Tom Dorsey, and Blind Boy Fuller. All the "dime-store" labels were withdrawn in April 1938.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

- DGR; Sutton
 Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come The Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
 Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington House, 1978.

BARAKA, AMIRI

b. Everett LeRoi Jones, 7 October 1934; Newark, NJ

A poet, playwright, and cultural critic, Baraka was initially a member of the Greenwich Village bohemian scene of the late 1950s. Increasingly disillusioned with the state of American race relations, he broke ties with the bohemians, moving first to Harlem and then back to Newark as he sought to articulate a uniquely African American aesthetic. His 1963 landmark study, Blues People: Negro Music in White America, established his reputation as a music critic, which his follow-up, 1967's Black Music, later confirmed. Appointed poet laureate of the state of New Jersey in 2000, he remains active in the worlds of literature and music.

DEAN A. MASULLO

Bibliography

- Baraka, Amiri. Black Music. New York: William Morrow, 1967.
 ———. Blues People: Negro Music in White America. New York: William Morrow, 1963.

BARBECUE BOB

b. Robert Hicks, 9 or 11 September 1902; Walnut Grove, GA
 d. 21 October 1931; Lithonia, GA

Blues singer and guitarist. Robert Hicks and his elder brother Charlie learned to play the guitar from Curley Weaver's mother. Charlie became the better singer and Bob the better guitarist. In the 1920s Bob served spare ribs at Tidwell's Barbecue Place in Buckhead near Atlanta. The patrons liked him, invited him to perform at parties, and the nickname Barbecue Bob arose. When Columbia's mobile unit reached Chicago in March 1927, Bob recorded his first songs with his resonant twelve-string guitar. The record sold well and Bob was soon in the studio again. He cut "Mississippi Heavy Water Blues" in March 1928. The topical song was a great success and Bob became the best-selling blues singer in the Atlanta of the 1920s.

For the remainder of his life Bob was to record for Columbia at six-month intervals. In 1928 Bob joined a medicine show and toured southern Georgia. His final session was recorded together with Curley Weaver on guitar and Buddy Moss on harp. As the Georgia Cotton Pickers, they delivered four powerful blues songs in which Bob's rhythmic strumming and easily recognizable vocals stand out. He was so popular that his recordings continued into the Depression, only to be cut short by his death of pneumonia at the early age of twenty-nine. Robert Hicks's style is characterized by heavy bass licks and ringing twelve-string sounds underlined by the crying sound of the bottleneck. His wry and witty lyrics combine many traditional lines with original poetry. Dave Moore's eighty-page booklet Brown Skin Gal: The Story of Barbecue Bob, which also contains complete lyrics, became available in a boxed album (Agram Blues AB 2001).

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin; Santelli
 Lowry, Pete. "Some Cold Rainy Day, Part 4: Barbecue Bob." Blues Unlimited no. 103 (August/September 1973): 15.

Discography: DGRBARBEE, JOHN HENRY

b. William George Tucker, 14 November 1905; Henning, TN
 d. 3 November 1964; Chicago, IL

Singer and guitarist. Had early associations with John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson and Sunnyland Slim. After moving to Chicago, he recorded with the Vocalion label in 1938. Upon rediscovery by white listeners, he recorded for the Spivey and the Storyville labels in 1964. His participation in that year's American Folk Blues Festival tour was cut short by illness, and he later died of a heart attack in a Chicago jail while being held for a car accident.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR; LSFP

BARKER, BLUE LU

BARKER, BLUE LU

b. Louise (or Louisa) Dupont, 13 November 1913; New Orleans, LA

d. 7 May 1998; New Orleans, LA

Singer; wife of Danny Barker. Her maiden name was Louise or Louisa Dupont. The stage name may have derived from her penchant for humorous double-entendre in her songs, delivered in straight-faced fashion. She was a dancer as a child, but turned to singing in her teens. After marrying Danny Barker in 1930, the couple relocated to New York. Her first recording was issued in 1938, and featured one of the songs most closely associated with her, "Don't You Make Me High."

Barker recorded twenty-one prewar sides for Decca, collected on the Classics CD, 1938–1939, and another twenty-five for Apollo and Capitol after the war, also collected on Classics as 1946–1949. She had a minor hit with "A Little Bird Told Me" in 1948, which she followed with "Here's a Little Girl." All of these recordings were made in association with her husband, but she also recorded with Erskine Hawkins as "Lu Blue" in 1938.

Barker returned to live in New Orleans in 1965. She was a powerful singer, but a reluctant and therefore only sporadic performer in public throughout her career. She began to be featured more regularly in festivals in the early 1980s, where she was regarded as a valued representative of a waning generation of New Orleans musicians. Ill health meant that she did not perform at all in the final decade of her life. Her last concert appearance with her husband was at the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival in 1989, and it is preserved on record.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Barker, Danny, and Alyn Shipton, eds. A Life in Jazz. London: Macmillan, 1986.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

1938–1939 (1997, Melodie Jazz Classics 704).

Live at New Orleans Jazz Festival (1998, Orleans 2111).

1946–1949 (2001, Melodie Jazz Classics 1130).

BARKER, DANNY

b. Daniel Moses Barker, 13 January 1909; New Orleans, LA

d. 13 March 1994; New Orleans, LA

Singer, writer, and historian; married to Blue Lu Barker. Barker played banjo with Little Brother Montgomery in the early 1920s and rhythm guitar with Lucky Millinder, Cab Calloway, Billie Holiday, and others. He was central in the modern revival of New Orleans marching bands. In later life he was a valuable informant to historians of various periods of jazz and blues.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Barker, Danny, and Alyn Shipton, eds. A Life in Jazz. London: Macmillan, 1986.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

"Chocko Ma Fendo Hey/My Indian Red" (1948, King Zulu 0001).

Save the Bones (1988, Orleans 10118).

BARKSDALE, EVERETT

b. 28 April 1910; Detroit, MI

d. 29 January 1986; Los Angeles, CA

Jazz and urban blues guitarist who also was proficient on other instruments. Played rhythm acoustic guitar for Erskine Tate, Eddie South, and Benny Carter. For the most part, he was based in Chicago in the 1930s, in New York City from the 1940s through the 1960s, and in California from the 1970s onward.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

BARNER, WILEY

b. 1900; near Selma, AL

Big-voiced Alabama railroad worker who recorded two songs for Gennett in 1927 and performed with a local string band until the 1930s. Barner's singing was "untutored and relentless" wrote collector Don Kent, who reported that Barner was alive as of 1973.

DAVID HARRISON/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Kent, Don. "'Take My Picture, Make It in a Frame': The Wiley Barner Story." 78 Quarterly no. 9 (1996): 61–66.

Discography: DGR

BARNES, GEORGE

b. 17 July 1921; Chicago Heights, IL
d. 5 September 1977; Concord, CA

Guitarist. After winning a Tommy Dorsey amateur swing contest in 1937, Barnes took several opportunities to back several Bluebird label musicians during recording sessions, including Big Bill Broonzy, Jazz Gillum, and Washboard Sam. From the 1940s until his death, he increasingly worked with jazz musicians, and in radio and television session work.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

“George Barnes” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 34 (1977): 41.

BARNES, ROOSEVELT MELVIN “BOOBA”

b. 25 September 1936; Longwood, MS
d. 3 April 1996; Chicago, IL

Roosevelt “Booba” Barnes learned harmonica as a child, having been inspired early on by Howlin’ Wolf. Barnes moved to Greenville, Mississippi, in his teens and developed his raw style in the tough juke joints on Nelson Street. By 1960, he taught himself guitar and spent years playing throughout the region. After several brief stints in Chicago, Barnes opened his Playboy Club back on Nelson Street in 1982 and established himself as the Delta’s most popular bluesman. His 1990 Rooster label debut launched his international career, and he appeared in the 1992 film Deep Blues. Barnes later relocated to Chicago, but his life was cut short by cancer in 1996.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Barnes, Roosevelt “Booba.” “The Heartbroken Man.” Living Blues 100 (November/December 1991): 11–15.

O’Neal, Jim. “Roosevelt ‘Booba’ Barnes.” Living Blues 132 (March/April 1997): 72–74.

Discography: AMG

Roosevelt “Booba” Barnes & The Playboys, The Heartbroken Man (1990, Rooster CD R2623).

BARRELHOUSE

Record label (Illinois, 1974–1983). Owner: George Paulus (b. April 23, 1948; Chicago, IL). Chicago based, Barrelhouse issued albums by Joe Carter, Easy Baby (Alex Randle), “Harmonica” Frank Floyd, Bob Hall, Blind Joe Hill, Robert Richards, Washboard Willie (Hensley), and Big John Wrencher. A few various artist collections were issued, including one from Ora Nelle acetates (Othum Brown, Sleepy John Estes, Little Walter, Jimmy Rogers, Johnny Young), and one with J-V-B acetates (Eddie Burns, L. C. Green, and others). The 1974 album Bring Me Another Half-a-Pint contained recordings by Billy Branch, Kansas City Red (Arthur Stevenson), Earl Payton, and others.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

Barrelhouse website, <http://www.wirz.de/music/barrelho.htm>.

BARTHOLOMEW, DAVE

b. 24 December 1920; Edgard, LA

Born into a musical family, Bartholomew (aka The Pit Man) began his career as a trumpet player and joined a brass band after leaving school, then graduated to the better paid jazz bands popular in New Orleans in the late 1930s. He joined the army during World War II and learned composition and musical arrangement. Back in New Orleans in 1946, he formed his own jazz band and was soon broadcasting over radio station WMRY. He was signed by De Luxe Records in 1947, recording four singles, but following some dissensions with De Luxe’s management, he recorded also for Decca and King before joining Lew Chudd’s Imperial label in 1950 as an arranger, songwriter, and recording artist until he formed his own labels, Trumpet and Broadmoor, in the mid-1960s.

In 1952, Bartholomew and his band cut an incognito session for Specialty released as by “The Royal Kings.” He’s remembered largely today not only for being Fats Domino’s longtime bandleader, arranger, and trumpet player, with a dream team (Earl Palmer, Red Tyler, Herb Hardesty, and others) producing and writing most of Domino’s classic hits and chart toppers, but also for his major role in nearly all of the early New Orleans R&B sessions recorded in the 1950s and 1960s, while conducting his own recording career until 1967, even if he is credited with one hit only, “Country Boy” (1949).

Bartholomew was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1991. As an early influence of rock ’n’ roll, he can be found these days leading the Dixieland jazz band at Preservation Hall when not accompanying Fats Domino on tours.

ROBERT SACRÉ

BARTHOLOMEW, DAVE

Bibliography

AMG (Al Campbell); Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSFP

New Orleans Big Beat (1998, Landslide LDCD-1022).
1947–50 (2001, Classics 5002; Fr.).
1950–52 (2003, Classics 5055; Fr.).

BARTON, LOU ANN

b. 17 February 1954; Fort Worth, TX

Singer. The quintessential Texas female blues vocalist, Barton combined a tough stage image with a sultry singing style delivered with a thick drawl and a no-nonsense attitude. Although musically involved with the leading Texas rocking blues acts of her time, Barton's most accomplished work was on swamp-flavored R&B from Louisiana, especially on the songs of Lazy Lester, Slim Harpo, and Irma Thomas.

Her debut album, Old Enough, was recorded at the Muscle Shoals studio in 1982 with rock star Glenn Frey and Atlantic Records president Jerry Wexler coproducing and guitarist Jimmie Vaughan providing a link to her Texas past and future. Barton did not record again until 1986 when Forbidden Tones was released.

The strong-willed Barton was destined to lead her own band but she first attempted to front other groups, beginning with the Austin all-star collaboration Triple Threat Revue with Stevie Ray Vaughan and W. C. Clark. Brief stints with fellow Austinites the Fabulous Thunderbirds and the Rhode Island big band Roomful of Blues followed before she finally began fronting her own groups.

Barton released Read My Lips in 1989 and a year later teamed up with Angela Strehli and Marcia Ball for the blues girls group project Dreams Come True produced by Dr. John for Antone's Records. Beginning in the late 1990s Barton recorded and performed with the Jimmie Vaughan Band. She released Sugar Coated Love in 1998 and in 2001 a bootleg quality import of her performing with Stevie Ray Vaughan in 1977 was released as Thunderbroad.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin; Santelli
Pond, S. "Lou Ann Barton: Up from the Honky-Tonks." Rolling Stone no. 367 (April 15, 1982): 74–75.

Discography: AMG

BASCOMB, PAUL

b. 12 February 1912; Birmingham, AL

d. December 1986; Chicago, IL

Saxophonist in early jazz and urban blues bands through 1944, including those led by Erskine Hawkins and by Count Basie. Afterward he led his own groups, or worked with his brother Dud Bascomb.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG; Larkin

Discography: Lord

BASIE, COUNT

b. William Basie, 21 August 1904; Red Bank, NJ

d. 26 April 1984; Hollywood, FL

Bandleader and pianist; led the "Band That Plays the Blues," one of the most popular big bands. Basie began his career working as accompanist to vaudeville blues singers and entertainers in traveling shows, including Katie Crippen and the Whitman Sisters. Worked primarily on the Southwest "territory band" circuit from 1927, chiefly in Kansas City; with bassist Walter Page's Blue Devils in 1928; then with Bennie Moten for most of 1929 through 1935.

Basie rose to prominence as a bandleader in 1936, gaining an audience via radio broadcasts from Kansas City. Residencies at Chicago's Grand Terrace and New York's Roseland followed. The band was rich in great bluesy soloists, including Lester Young on tenor saxophone and Buck Clayton on trumpet. The "All-American Rhythm Section" (Basie, bassist Page, guitarist Freddie Green, and drummer Jo Jones) anchored the band with a light, bluesy swing that was irresistible to dancers. Many of their pieces featured a blues-based four-beat walking bass pattern. Fronting the band were several fine jazz singers. Most important, from a blues perspective, was Jimmy Rushing, whose recordings with the band are among the greatest big band blues records. Among these are the immortal "Sent for You Yesterday" (1938).

Basie remained active through the 1970s. His 1950s–1960s band, which played in a harder edged style, never lost its bluesy swing. In the 1950s the band featured Joe Williams, with his signature song "Everyday I Have the Blues" (recorded 1955).

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

Bibliography

- Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli
 Basie, Count. Good Morning Blues: The Autobiography of Count Basie. As Told to Albert Murray. New York: Random House, 1985.
 Dance, Stanley. The World of Count Basie. New York: C. Scribner's Sons, 1980.

Discography: Lord

Selected Recordings

Of the many blues-based records the Count Basie Orchestra made in its early years the following are representative: "Swingin' at the Daisy Chain" (1937); "Blues in the Dark," "Sent for You Yesterday," "Every Tub," "How Long, How Long Blues," "The Dirty Dozens," "The Blues I Like to Hear" (1938); "Dupree Blues," "Red Wagon," "Goin' to Chicago Blues," "Dickie's Dream," "I Left My Baby" (1939); "Fiesta in Blue" (1941); and "Harvard Blues" (1942).

Among the collections readily available on compact disc as of 2005 were "Count Basie Story" (Properbox 19), "The Complete Decca Recordings" (Decca Jazz 3-611), and "Count Basie and His Orchestra: America's #1 Band: The Columbia Years" (Columbia/Legacy CAX 87110).

See also Crippen, Katie; Rushing, James Andrew "Jimmy"; Williams, Joe

BASS

(1) Any musical instrument or voice that plays or sings the lowest notes within a group; in blues, this refers primarily to either the upright string bass or to the electric bass guitar, though jugs, washtub basses, tubas, vocalists, and other instruments have all performed this role. (2) The lowest pitched musical line within a musical composition.

Musical Function

The bass line, whether played on string bass, electric bass, jug, or any other low-pitched instrument, serves several important functions within the context of blues music. The two major functions are rhythmic and harmonic in nature. By clearly outlining chord structures, mostly through broken arpeggios and scalar walking patterns, the bass forms a harmonic foundation for the rest of a blues ensemble (see examples 1 and 2). While outlining other notes within a chord, the bass mostly places primary emphasis on the root of a particular chord. This emphasis allows other band members to know exactly where they are in a harmonic progression and allows soloists more harmonic and melodic flexibility by freeing them from being grounded to root-oriented playing. Aesthetically, the focus of the bass on playing chord roots combined with the instrument's low pitch creates a solid harmonic foundation that allows overtones from all other instruments to ring out, creating a fuller sound.

The other major function of the bass is to provide rhythmic stability. It is not just the drummer, but the drummer in conjunction with the bass player who serve as "time keepers" and drive the rhythm of a blues band. Blues drummers and bass players provide the steady beat to which the band must adhere. In many early blues and blues-related forms, bass lines would emphasize the two strong beats, first and third, in each measure. Most typical modern bass patterns, whether walking or arpeggiating, emphasize the downbeats of each measure while clearly sounding on all macro beats (see example 3). For most slow blues, bass lines almost always play four pulses per measure with occasional added notes (example 3). The same patterns often hold true for faster, more upbeat blues tunes, though a long-short pattern is often used in place of a single note played on each beat. To drive the beat forward, a typical blues shuffle pattern uses this method of replacing single notes with two eighth notes played in swing style: the close equivalent of a dotted eighth note followed by a sixteenth note or even a triplet grouping of a quarter note followed by an eighth note (see example 4).

The bass rarely provides any melodic function in blues. Blues basses have typically remained background instruments, helping to hold bands together through harmonic and rhythmic stability. Unlike in jazz, bass solos in blues have always been quite rare. With few exceptions, and these fairly recently, blues bass solos typically consist of the band dropping out, while the bass player continues with a slightly more complex version of the same pattern that is used in the rest of the song.

African Instrumental Antecedents

The bass as used in blues has antecedents in African and European music. Many of the early string bands in America used an instrument known as a washtub or gutbucket bass. These instruments often consisted of an overturned tub (for washing clothes or gutting newly killed animals) to which an attached string connected with the end of a long stick such as a broom handle. The string could then be plucked to produce a tone, which could be raised or lowered by adjusting the tautness of the stick. The tub serves as a resonating chamber for this makeshift instrument.

BASS

Example 1: Arpeggiated bass pattern

Example 2: Walking bass pattern

Example 3: Slow blues pattern in compound

Example 4: One basic blues shuffle pattern

Example 5: Broken chord outline using octave leaps

Example 6: Walking bass pattern of two simultaneously sounding pitches in

The washtub bass seems to be a direct link from an African instrument known as the earth bow. The earth bow, found in both Africa and the West Indies, was basically a modified animal trap. A hole would be dug in the ground, covered over with wood or stretched hide, which was linked to a sapling with a rope or cord. Just like the washtub bass, the earth bow would be played by plucking the cord while bending the sapling to alter the pitches. The washtub bass is in many ways the bass equivalent to the diddley bow, or one-strand guitar, which also seems to have antecedents in African musical traditions.

European Instrumental Antecedents and String Bass

At the same time string bands were using washtub basses, the European double bass was being used by jazz musicians, wind ensembles, ragtime bands, minstrel groups, and other string bands. The double bass, known by many alternate names, including string bass, standup bass, upright bass, contrabass, bass fiddle, bass violin, and doghouse bass, has a long history in European music, dating back to the violone of the late fifteenth century. Long used in art music, the double bass was used in a number of popular music traditions at the turn of the twentieth century, such as ragtime and string bands. While early decades of the twentieth century had three- and five-string double basses, the majority of those used in blues had four strings. These strings generally correspond to the standard tuning arrangement of the lowest pitched four strings on guitar (E, A, D, G), while sounding one octave lower. Sound can be produced through several methods: plucking, slapping, or bowing the strings. In blues, the first two methods have been used almost exclusively.

Recording technology, up until around the mid-1920s, could not pick up many of the lower bass frequencies. This fact, coupled with a need for the bass to project more in live performances, led to the technique of slapping the strings against the fingerboard, rather than plucking them. This “slap bass” technique, thought to have been originated by New Orleans jazz bassists, creates a percussive pop with each sounding of a pitch, which allows the bass to be better heard. Another projection technique used by some bassists was to stand the bass on top of a wooden box, which would act as a second resonating chamber and produce more volume. Advances in steel string production in the early 1950s allowed for far more volume than the previous gut strings. The added volume obtained through steel strings also allowed bassists to lower the bridge, relieving some of the workload needed to pluck the highly placed strings. Despite these advancements in double bass design and its generally warmer tone, the instrument would soon be replaced for the most part by the electric bass guitar.

The most famous string bass player in blues is undoubtedly Willie Dixon, whose bass playing can be heard on hundreds of Chicago blues recordings. Dixon even occasionally played bass solos; consider, for example, “Shakin’ the Shack” on What Happened to My Blues (Prevue 18). Other notable blues string bass players include Ransom Knowling and Wendell Marshall.

Electric Bass

Although Paul Tutmarc, Sr., invented an electric bass guitar in 1935, it was not until Leo Fender created the popular Fender Precision Bass (P-Bass) in 1951 that the electric bass guitar began supplanting the double bass as the bass instrument of choice for blues musicians. Like the double bass, the electric bass guitar is generally a four-stringed instrument, whose string tunings are one octave below the four lowest strings of guitar. The lower string action, addition of a fret board, easy amplification through inclusion of a pickup, and increased portability, combined with the need to match the volume of the increasingly popular electric guitar, led to most blues bands favoring the electric bass guitar over the much larger and more difficult double bass. From the early 1950s until today, the electric bass guitar has been used in almost all electric blues bands.

Many blues musicians started playing electric bass guitar and either completely moved to another instrument, such as guitar, or learned to play multiple instruments. Musicians such as Carey Bell, Ted Bogan, Clarence “Gatemouth” Brown, Peter Chatman (Memphis Slim), “Queen” Sylvia Embry, Big Mojo Elum, Luther “Georgia Boy” Johnson, Willie Kent, and J. W. Williams all play bass, but are far more well known as guitarists or singers. Other notable blues electric bassists include Jesse Knight, Jr.; David Myers, one of the first Chicago blues musicians to play electric bass; Mac Thompson; Jerry Jemmott; and Jeff Ganz, who, in addition to standard electric bass, plays fretless electric bass, eight-string bass, piccolo bass, and four- and five-string double basses.

Until the Motown stylings of James Jamerson and the R&B playing of Donald “Duck” Dunn and others came along in the 1960s and 1970s, blues bass playing was almost always simple and in the background, providing support for the band. While still mainly providing a supporting harmonic and rhythmic role, bassists became free to be slightly more creative and occasionally take solos. This mainly applied to these emerging blues-related forms; traditional electric blues still mostly relegated the bass to a background roll. The funk and soul blues styles placed more emphasis on the bass not only by giving it a more prominent musical role, but also by mixing it with a higher presence on recordings. Extended techniques, such as slapping and popping, have become more prevalent in funk and soul blues. These techniques consist of slapping the strings with the side of the thumb knuckle to “slap” and quickly pulling the strings away from the fingerboard and allowing them to snap against the neck to “pop,” much like a Bartok pizzicato. These techniques can best be heard in the music of funk bands such as James Brown (bassist Bootsy Collins) or Parliament Funkadelic, but are occasionally used in the soul/funk blues of Bobby Rush and briefly appear on the Corey Harris album Greens from the Garden. In addition to some differences in playing technique from most standard blues, funk blues bass playing has incorporated a greater use of syncopation, placing more accents on offbeats and upbeats, but still clearly emphasizing the initial downbeat of each measure.

Although bass has gained more prominence since the beginnings of blues, it still serves primarily as a background instrument used to stabilize the rhythm and ground the harmony. With several notable exceptions in blues-related musical forms, blues bassists still rarely play solos; there is no strong tradition of bass soloing as there is in jazz. In fact, many blues musicians feel that the best bass player is one who stays in the background but holds the group together by establishing and maintaining a solid bass pattern throughout a song.

Alternate Bass Instruments

Although the string bass and electric bass have been the predominant bass instruments used in blues, a number of alternative instruments have filled these roles. Some of the earliest blues recordings have a tuba, trombone, or even bass saxophone playing the bass line. The large number of military brass bands at the turn of the twentieth century made tubas readily available and their capacity for loud volume made them ideal for the early days of mechanical sound recording. Many of the early classic blues singers performed with vaudevillian or even Dixieland style bands, which often included piano, clarinet, trumpet or trombone, and sometimes a tuba. Many of Bessie

Smith's recordings included a tuba until around 1933, when string bass began to be used in her band. Bass saxophone is used as the bass instrument on some early recordings by Mamie Smith (1921), Clara Smith (1925), and others.

In addition to the washtub bass mentioned earlier, string bands often employed the use of a jug (also known as a poor man's tuba) player, to produce bass tones. The mouth of a mostly empty jug of whiskey, or of other substance, would be held to the mouth and air would then be blown across the opening to produce a tone. Pitch could be slightly changed by altering the angle of the jug to the mouth and by varying the airstream. Adding or removing liquid to or from the jug or varying jug sizes could change the pitch center to match the rest of the band. Most jug bands used a single jug player, though some, such as the Dixieland Jug Blowers, used two for more pitch variety.

Since the early days of blues, piano players have often played harmony and/or melody with the right hand, while playing bass lines with the left. For musical acts using just a piano and vocalist, the piano player will often play the bass line, harmony, melody, and solos. Whenever a band lacks a bass player, the pianist often has to take over this role, in addition to playing harmony. Examples of bass lines being performed on piano can be heard in many ragtime, early jazz, and boogie-woogie bands. The barrelhouse style of piano playing often utilized several more complex bass patterns, such as outlining broken chords with octave leaps (see example 5) or playing walking patterns with harmonically sounding intervals (see example 6). In some funk/soul blues music, as heard in Bobby Rush's music, electronic synthesizer keyboards often enhance or occasionally replace an actual double or electric bass with a synthesized bass sound.

Just like pianists, many guitarists often play the bass line while simultaneously playing harmony and/or melody. Most acoustic country blues is played by a solo guitarist responsible for playing all of the parts, including the bass line, through a style of finger-picking, whereby the thumb plays the bass notes while the other fingers strum the harmony and/or melody. Many early blues bands employed a second guitarist for the purpose of playing bass lines. This player would tune his or her guitar strings down several steps to produce lower bass tones. Brewer Phillips, side guitarist with Hound Dog Taylor, often took the role of bassist by playing the bass lines on guitar.

Drums have even functioned as the bass line in some blues and blues-related forms. A small African American fife and drum tradition, closely related to the blues, has been in existence at least as far back as the American Revolutionary War. This style of music consists mostly of a fife player, singer(s), and several percussionists, using a variety of drums. The bass and low tenor drums create a sort of bass line in this music, used to set the rhythm and occasionally even serve as a harmonic foundation. In string bands, instruments often served dual purposes; while the washtub bassist plucked the string, another player would use sticks on the washtub as a drum. Blues drummers playing trap set help emphasize the strong beats of the bass line by playing the bass or kick drum on the first and third beats of each measure.

Gospel and gospel blues music have long employed bass singers. The bass singer in gospel often serves the same function as the string or electric bass: to lay down a rhythmic pattern to keep the time and outline the harmonic progression. Several good examples of a vocalist singing a blues bass line can be heard on Aleck Miller "Sonny Boy" Williamson's recordings for Trumpet Records in 1951. Some of these recordings consist only of Sonny Boy Williamson on vocals and harmonica with Cliff Givens, bass vocalist from the Southern Sons vocal group, singing the bass line and playing the drum part with a broom.

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

- Courlander, Harold. "Instruments: Drums, Gutbuckets, and Horns." In Negro Folk Music, U.S.A. New York: Columbia University Press, 1963.
- Ryan, Marc. Trumpet Records: An Illustrated History with Discography. Milford, NH: Big Nickel Publications, 1992.

Discography

- Crudup, Arthur. Arthur "Bigboy" Crudup Meets the Master Blues Bassists (1994, Delmark DD-621). Features Willie Dixon and Ransom Knowling on bass.
- Dixon, Willie. I Think I Got the Blues (1998, Prevue PR 17). Also features Louis Satterfield on bass.
- Magic Slim & The Teardrops. Black Tornado (1998, Blind Pig Records BPCD 5046). Features Nick Holt on bass.
- Memphis Jug Band. Memphis Jug Band: Double Album (1990, Yazoo 1067).
- Memphis Slim. Raining the Blues (1989, Fantasy FCD-24705-2). Features Wendell Marshall on bass.
- Rush, Bobby. Hoochie Man (2000, Waldoxy WCD 2826). Features Dale Morris, Vasti Jackson, Terry Richardson, and Avery Brady on bass.
- Williamson, Aleck Miller. "Sonny Boy." "Nine Below Zero/Mighty Long Time" (1951, Trumpet 166).
- Winter, Johnny. "Hey, Where's Your Brother?" (1992, Virgin V2-86512). Features Jeff Ganz on electric bass, fretless electric bass, eight-string electric bass, and double bass.

See also Dixon, Willie; Forms; Funk; Jug

BASS, FONTELLA

b. 3 July 1940; St. Louis, MO

Soul singer who achieved national fame recording for Chicago's Chess Records during the 1960s. She was the daughter of notable gospel singer Martha Bass (a member of the Clara Ward Singers and a soloist of some note). In 1961, Fontella was discovered by St. Louis bandleader Oliver Sain, who brought her into his organization to play piano. Little Milton was the band's initial vocalist, and Bass participated on several sides that Milton recorded for the local Bobbin label. She subsequently recorded four sides under her own name for Bobbin. In 1963, after Little Milton left the Sain band, Bass and singer Bernard Mosley became the featured vocalists. Mosley was soon replaced by Bobby McClure. The following year Chess Records signed Bass and McClure to record for its Checker subsidiary in Chicago. They debuted as a duet act, coming out with two hits, "Don't Mess Up a Good Thing" and "You'll Miss Me (When I'm Gone)" in 1965. Bass launched her solo career in 1965 with a huge hit, "Rescue Me." The flip featured an outstanding gospel-blues ballad, "The Soul of a Man." Bass's career at Chess was gradually dissipated by a series of undistinguished but three commercially successful follow-ups, "Recovery," "I Surrender," and "Safe and Sound."

Bass left Chess in 1967, and recorded for Jerry Butler's Fountain Productions, then moved to Stan Lewis's Paula label, recording under the production aegis of her old bandleader, Oliver Sain, and then for Epic. Bass never had another hit record. Occasionally she appeared as a vocalist on jazz albums recorded by her husband, Lester Bowie, trumpeter in the famed Art Ensemble of Chicago.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Greensmith, Bill. "The Fontella Bass Interview." Blues Unlimited no. 147 (Spring 1986): 23–25.

BASS, RALPH

b. Ralph Basso, 1 May 1911; New York City, NY
d. 5 March 1997; on a plane between Chicago, IL and Nassau, Bahamas

Record company executive and producer. Bass was one of the most significant producers of blues recordings in the postwar years, producing for Black & White, Federal, and Chess. During his long tenure in the business he produced such artists as T-Bone Walker, Esther Phillips, James Brown, Etta James, the Dominoes, and Hank Ballard and the Midnighters.

While living in Los Angeles, Bass entered the music business during the early 1940s emceeding jazz concerts. He began producing for the Black & White label in 1945, notably T-Bone Walker and Jack McVea (who hit with "Open the Door Richard"). In 1948 Bass left Black & White and formed his own Bop and Portrait labels, recording mostly jazz, notably Wardell Gray and Dexter Gordon. He joined Savoy in 1948, and soon was producing a spate of hits on Johnny Otis, Little Esther, Mel Walker, and the Robins. In 1951 Bass was hired by King Records as a producer and A&R man and was given his own imprint, Federal. Among the acts on Federal he recorded were Little Esther, the Dominoes, Hank Ballard and the Midnighters, and James Brown.

In 1957, as the black music scene in Los Angeles appeared to go into decline, Bass moved his Federal operation to Chicago. He recorded a few local acts— notably Danny Overbea, Syl Johnson, and Tiny Topsy—but the hits were not forthcoming, and in 1959 he moved to Chess. Bass produced a number of hits on Etta James and the Vibrations, but after Billy Davis came on board to record Chess's burgeoning soul stable in 1962, Bass was moved over to recording blues and gospel acts. During 1964, while still working for Chess, Bass recorded soul acts for Roulette, notably Henry Ford and the Gifts.

Chess went into decline in the early 1970s, and Bass stayed with the company until its closing in 1975. Bass continued to produce blues recordings, notably a series of LPs for TK records under the collective title I Didn't Give a Damn If Whites Bought It. He also assisted his wife, Shirley Hall (a former black nightclub chorine), in the operation of a dance studio. He was elected to the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1995.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Dahl, Bill. "Ralph Bass" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 134 (July/August 1997): 51.

Fleming, John. "A Life Recording." Reader (March 7, 1980): 1, 28–32.

BASSETT, JOHNNIE

b. 9 October 1935; Marianna, FL

Heard Tampa Red and Big Boy Crudup at house parties in his youth; family moved to Detroit in 1944. Bassett started playing guitar and harmonica as a teen and studied clarinet in high school. His early experience was with John Lee Hooker. He spent two years in the U.S. Army from 1958 to 1960. Bassett was a member of Joe Weaver and his Blue Note Orchestra, the house band for Fortune records. Bassett played on many doo-wop and R&B sessions. Bassett's sound is reminiscent of T-Bone Walker, an early inspiration; he has a world-weary vocal style and sound.

BASSETT, JOHNNIE

JIM GALLERT

Bibliography

AMG

Sinclair, John. "Johnnie Bassett: Cadillac Bluesman from the Motor City." Living Blues no. 146 (July/August 1999): 20–27.

Discography

As Leader

Party My Blues Away (Cannonball CBD 29109).
I Gave My Life to the Blues (Black Magic CD 9034).

As Sideman

Five Dollars (Regency RR 114).

BASTIN, BRUCE

b. 1938; United Kingdom

British researcher and label owner Bruce Bastin began making regular research and recording trips through the southeastern United States in the late 1960s, often together with Peter Lowry. His findings were presented in Blues Unlimited magazine and Crying for the Carolines (London: Studio Vista Press, 1971), later expanded into the authoritative Red River Blues: The Blues Tradition of the Southeast (University of Illinois Press, 1986). In 1973 Bastin received a master's degree in folklore studies from the University of North Carolina in Chapel Hill and staged the first blues festival in the region. Bastin joined Flyright Records in 1970—other partners were Robin Gosden and Blues Unlimited editors Mike Leadbitter, John Broven, and Simon Napier—and eventually became the managing director of Flyright's parent company, Interstate Music, Ltd. In 1978 Bastin wrote that Flyright's mission was to "rectify the imbalance shown by the undue concentration on Mississippi blues by previous writers and record reissuers. Flyright's general focus became directed toward a conscious regionalism in an attempt to offer evidence of a broader pattern of blues evolution." This focus resulted in series on prewar and postwar East Coast blues, contemporary field recordings, the fifty-five-volume "legendary Jay Miller sessions" of previously unissued blues, cajun, and zydeco, and recordings made by independent record man Joe Davis, the subject of Bastin's book Never Sell a Copyright (Chigwell: Storyville, 1990). Other Interstate labels have concentrated on piano blues (Magpie), prewar field recordings/commercial blues (Travelin' Man), country/rockabilly (Krazy Kat, Country Routes), "world" music (Heritage), and jazz (Harlequin).

SCOTT BARRETTA

Bibliography

Bastin, Bruce. "Flyright Records: Aims and Objectives of a Small Documentary Concern." JEMF Quarterly 4 (1978): 75–77.

Interstate Music website, <http://www.interstate-music.co.uk>.

BATES, LEFTY

b. William Bates, 9 March 1920; Leighton, AL

Chicago jazz and blues guitarist who worked both as a performer and a session man, largely during the 1940s and 1950s. Bates entered the music business in St. Louis, joining a string band/vocal group called the Hi-De-Ho Boys. The Hi-De-Ho Boys moved to Chicago in 1936, recorded on Decca, and became a semiregular act at the Club DeLisa from 1937 to 1950. After World War II, Bates recorded with the Aristokats on RCA-Victor. When the group broke up in 1948, Bates rejoined the Hi-De-Ho Boys. In 1952 Bates formed a trio with Quinn Wilson (bass) and Horace Palm (piano), and through much of the decade continued with this group. Bates recorded minimally under his own name, singles on Boxer, United, Apex, and Mad. None of the sides achieved any kind of traction, but it did not matter, Bates earned his money in club gigs and as the most in-demand guitar player for recording a host of blues and rhythm and blues sessions, especially for Vee-Jay, but also for such small labels as Club 51 and Mad.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert, and Robert L. Campbell. "The Mad and M&M Labels." Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/mad.html> (accessed June 12, 2003).

Discography: LSFP

BATTS, WILL

b. 24 January 1904; Michigan City, MS
d. 18 February 1956; Memphis, TN

Fiddler. Moved to Memphis in 1919, performing and later recording with Jack Kelly. He also recorded with Frank Stokes in 1929. From 1934, he led his own jug bands and other types of acoustic instrument groups in the Memphis area.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR; LSFPBATY, CHARLIE

(See Little Charlie)

BAYOU

Record label (California, 1953). Owner: Franklin Kort (b. May 10, 1902, IL; d. February 25, 1956, San Gabriel, CA). Hollywood, California-based Bayou was formed in May 1953. Franklin was a former employee of Exclusive, Recorded in Hollywood, and Swing Time Records. Bayou issued recordings by Jesse Allen ("Dragnet"), Dave Bartholomew ("Snatchin' Back"), Red Callender, Goree Carter, Joe Houston, Allen "Fat Man" Matthews, Big Jay McNeely, Clarence Samuels, Big Joe Turner ("Blues Jumped the Rabbit"), Mercy Dee (Walton), L. C. Williams, and others. By June 1953, the label had folded and Imperial Records acquired the name. The label should not be confused with the 1965–1966 label that issued a series of Clifton Chenier that was recorded for Arhoolie Records.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

McGrath
Turner, Bez. "Colony, Bayou, Post." Blues Unlimited no. 130 (May/August 1978): 11–12.

BEA & BABY

Chicago blues label in operation from 1959 through 1961. The company was owned by Narvel Eatmon (1914–1991), who went by the name of Cadillac Baby. During the 1950s he operated Cadillac Baby's Club at 4708 S. Dearborn in Chicago. Eatmon then established his Bea & Baby label, named after himself and his wife, Bea. Subsidiary labels were Key, Keyhole, and Miss. With Ted Daniels he also operated the Ronald label. The company focused on releasing singles to the working African American population, and thus most of Eatmon's releases were of blues artists, notably Eddie Boyd, L. C. McKinley, Hound Dog Taylor, Little Mac Simmons, Sunnyland Slim, Roosevelt Sykes, Detroit Junior, and Lee Jackson. His biggest record was Bobby Saxton's "Tryin' to Make a Livin'" (1960). Bea & Baby also recorded gospel groups and R&B vocal groups. In his later years Eatmon operated candy/variety stores until his death.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

McGrath
Rotante, Anthony, and Paul Sheatsley. "Bea & Baby." Blues Research no. 13 (1965): 2.
Rowe, Mike. Chicago Breakdown. London: Eddison Press, 1973.

BEACON

Record label founded in late 1942 by music publisher Joe Davis, one of the earliest of the post-1940 "indies" that would revolutionize the record business. Boogie pianist Deryck Sampson was a major contributor to the catalog. The 5000 Race series launched in May 1943 most notably featured Gabriel Brown. Many Beacon masters were reissued using the same issue numbers on a revived Gennett label in 1944, which also included reissues from Gennett by Big Bill Broonzy among others, and then were reissued again in 1945, still using the same issue numbers, on the Joe Davis, later Davis, label, which Davis continued to operate for some years. In 1953, his new Jay-Dee label included a 1949 coupling by Gabriel Brown, and the label achieved its greatest success with Otis Blackwell.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR; McGrath; Sutton
Bastin, Bruce. Never Sell a Copyright, Joe Davis and His Role in the New York Music Scene 1916–1978. Chigwell: Storyville, 1990.
Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

BEAMAN, LOTTIE

BEAMAN, LOTTIE

b. Lottie Kimbrough, 1900; Kansas City, MO (unconfirmed)

Sister of Sylvester Kimbrough. A singer during the "classic blues" era, Beaman was active mostly in local Kansas City clubs. She recorded with the Paramount label in 1924, the Merrit label in 1925, the Gennett label in 1928, and the Brunswick label in 1929.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

BEAR FAMILY

Record label founded in 1975. While the bulk of his catalog covers country, rockabilly, and pop, Richard Weize's Bear Family label ranks among the most impressive reissue companies in modern recording history. Their line of exhaustive, multiple-disc boxed sets is equaled only by Mosaic's astonishing jazz series, and these two companies share similar philosophies in terms of providing consumers with the complete works of notable artists. Bear Family releases are beautifully packaged with vivid, rare photographs and comprehensive and superbly penned liner notes. The exquisite sound results through the use of original masters from the copyright owners. Weize has also specialized in documenting music from artists who were neither particularly innovative or big sellers such as Charlie Adams and Jack Guthrie, while also reissuing classic material by Johnny Cash, Louis Jordan, Hank Snow, and Willie Nelson. Weize's tastes even extend into straight pop, with reissues devoted to Dean Martin, Pat Boone, and Petula Clark, plus spotlight label series on such companies as Sun and Sarg.

Some Bear Family specials include a ten-disc set devoted to the music of the American left, and four-disc sets covering the Depression and songs from the British Music Hall. The label has produced mammoth retrospective lines on such pivotal country performers as Hank Snow, Lefty Frizzell, Jim Reeves, and Ernest Tubb, along with specialty items devoted to cabaret and other idioms. Richard Weize abandoned earlier careers as a journalist and wine collector shortly after attending the First International Festival of Country Music at Wembley in 1966. The label's first release was Goin' Back to Dixie by Bill Clifton.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Larkin

Sylvester, B. "Bear Family Records: The Top Shelf of Box Sets." Goldmine 26 (May 5, 2000): 48-49.

Bear Family website, <http://www.bear-family.de/> (accessed December 17, 2004).

BEARD, CHRIS

b. 29 August 1957; Rochester, NY

Beard learned guitar from his father Joe Beard, and in his teens played soul and rock in local bands, also filling in with the R&B group the New York Players. Later he played in R&B groups in the same Rochester venues where his father played blues. Sidetracked by personal difficulties in the 1980s, when Beard took up music again in 1991, it was blues. In 1998 he recorded Barwalkin' produced by Johnny Rawls, and followed in 2002 with Born to Play the Blues. Live Wire on his own label in 2004 marked a new departure for Beard, combining blues with rock and soul material. Beard tours the entire country, most often the East, Midwest, and South. Major influences (besides his father) are Albert King and Johnny "Guitar" Watson.

DANIEL BEAUMONT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Beaumont, Daniel. "Born in a House of Blues." Living Blues no. 169 (September/October 2003): 38-41.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Barwalkin' (1998, JSP CD 288).

Born to Play the Blues (2002, JSP CD 2148).

Live Wire (2004, Destin 001).

BEARD, JOE

b. 4 February 1938, Ashland, MS

Beard grew up in Ashland, where Nathan Beauregard often lived with his family, and the Murphy brothers, Matt, Floyd, and Dan, were close friends. Beard's family moved to Memphis in the late 1940s, and Beard came to know many of the most important musicians then making music in that city: B. B. King, Howlin' Wolf, and others. In the late 1950s Beard moved to Rochester and began playing blues in local clubs. His neighbor in Rochester in the mid-1960s was Son House. John Mooney got a start in Beard's band, and met House through Beard. Beard's work as an electrician has kept him from regular touring, but he has played all over the United States and Europe—first recording with Buster Benton in 1981 in France. In the 1990s he made three well-received CDs. Important influences are John Lee Hooker and Lightnin' Hopkins, but Beard's style also shows the influence of Mississippi legends like Nathan Beauregard.

DANIEL BEAUMONT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Beaumont, Daniel. "So Much Truth." Living Blues no. 169 (September/October 2003): 28–36.

Discography

No More Cherry Rose (1990, Kingsnake KIN-4040).
Blues Union (1995, Audioquest AQ 1039).
For Real (1998, Audioquest AQ 1049).
Dealin' (2000, Audioquest AQ 1055).

BEASLEY, JIMMY

b. 30 September 1929; Kansas City, MO

Vocalist and pianist in the urban jump style. Beasley made his classic records for the labels Modern and Crown in 1956 and 1957.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Cayer, R. C. "Jimmy's Back!" Blues Unlimited no. 95 (October 1972): 14–15.

Discography: LSFP

BEAUREGARD, NATHAN

b. ca.1869; Ashland, MS
d. ca. 1970; Memphis, TN

Singer of black folk music and blues, although his recorded blues tend to be similar to commercial blues of the 1930s. Guitarist Joe Beard recalls Beauregard in Ashland in the 1940s. Before his death, he was recorded by the Arhoolie and Adelphi labels.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Beaumont, Daniel. "So Much Truth (Joe Beard)." Living Blues no. 169 (September/October 1993): 28–37.

Discography: LSFP

BELFOUR, ROBERT

b. 11 September 1940; Hurdle Farm (near Holly Springs), MS

Born and raised in the north Mississippi hill country, singer/guitarist Robert Belfour began playing music as a boy, initially influenced by his musician father and later by childhood friend Junior Kimbrough. Belfour soaked up the region's unique blues tradition and developed his powerful, hypnotic style playing area juke joints. His first full-length album was released on Fat Possum in 2000.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Keith Brown)

Discography: AMG

Selected Recording

What's Wrong with You? (2000, Fat Possum CD 80336-2).

BELL, BRENDA

b. 30 October 1953; Newport News, VA
d. 17 September 1988; Staten Island, NY

New York–based blues vocalist of the late 1970s and 1980s. Bell launched her music career in 1976 by arranging a meeting with famed blues singer Victoria Spivey at her home studio in Brooklyn. After gaining admittance to Spivey's apartment through a friend living in the building, Bell—accompanied by Wade Hampton Green on piano—"auditioned" for Spivey by singing a few songs. As a result, Spivey took Bell under her wing by preparing her for her first live performance, giving her lessons to improve her vocal style and delivery and introducing her to blues musicians in the New York area. Spivey died only months after their first meeting but she forever altered Bell's musical career. Bell appeared at Spivey tribute concerts at the Dan Lynch Club in New York City and at the Chelsea House Folklore Center in West Brattleboro, Vermont, throughout the late 1970s and 1980s, continued to perform with musicians she had met through Spivey, and released all of her own recordings on the Spivey label.

BELL, BRENDA

In 1977 Bell began hosting blues recording parties at her own apartment. Bell regularly appeared in blues clubs throughout the New York area, performing with artists Memphis Slim, Louisiana Red, Bill Dacey, Uncle Boogie and the Holmes Brothers, and "Screamin'" Jay Hawkins. Bell also performed with Muddy Waters in Chicago and toured Europe in the late 1970s, performing with artists such as "Champion" Jack Dupree, Willie Mabon, Al Jones, Sonny Rhodes, Monte Sunshine, and Piano Red.

Bell first appeared on a recording as a supporting vocalist for Joe Turner's album I'm Gonna Sit Right Down and Write Myself a Letter (1978). She also appeared as a guest artist on the album New York Really Has the "Blues Stars" Vol. 2 (1980), performed with Louisiana Red on the recording The Imagery of Louisiana Red and Brenda Bell (1980), and released Brenda Bell and the 9th Street Stompers (1980). Bell also produced two solo albums—Brenda Bell Sings the Blues of Victoria Spivey (1980) and Brenda Bell: Ain't Nobody's Business What Brenda Bell May Do! (1984)—but her career was cut short by her death of cancer at age thirty-four.

ERIN STAPLETON-CORCORAN

Bibliography

Josephic, Beth. "Brenda Bell" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 85 (March/April 1989): 35.
Kunstadt, Len. "Brenda Bell." Blues Life 28 (1984): 13–22.

BELL, CAREY

b. Carey Bell Harrington, 14 November 1936; Macon, MS

Considered one of the finest living exponents of the Southern-born, Chicago-schooled tradition of heavily amplified blues harmonica epitomized by Little Walter Jacobs and Big Walter Horton, both of whom Bell knew personally and learned from. Until moving to Chicago in 1956 or 1957, Bell lived in the Mississippi hill country, near the Alabama border, cutting his musical teeth in Meridian, Mississippi, under the nurturing eye of an older musician, pianist Lovie Lee, who became his surrogate father. In Chicago, harp gigs proved scarce, despite tutoring from the two Walters and musical partnerships with guitarists Honeyboy Edwards and Johnny Young, so he often played bass guitar behind Robert Night-hawk, Earl Hooker, Big Walter, and others, in clubs and on Maxwell Street.

In 1969, he came into his own with a debut LP on Delmark, followed by a session for ABC BluesWay. A brief early 1970s stint in the harp chair of the Muddy Waters band (appearing on Waters's London Sessions) was followed by a longer stretch with Willie Dixon's Blues All-Stars, introducing his diatonic and chromatic harp skills to a worldwide audience. Since then, Bell waxed numerous albums for Blind Pig, Rooster, JSP, and Alligator, some produced in a cranked-up contemporary blues style. From the 1980s onward, he worked primarily as frontman, often backed by Maryland-based guitarist Steve Jacobs. Bell's live performances are memorable not only for his thick-toned, room-filling harp but also for his extroverted manner and large, drooping eyes. Full name often cited as Carey Bell Harrington (after his mother); cousin of guitarist Eddie "Clearwater" Harrington. Son, guitarist Lurrie Bell, is active in blues; they have recorded together.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Dirks, Scott. Liner notes to Carey Bell, Deep Down (1995, Alligator 4828).
Ivey, Ed. "Carey Bell: Blues Is Real." Blues Access no. 57 (May 2000): 16–21.
Neff, Robert, and Anthony Connor. Blues. Boston: David R. Godine, 1975.

BELL, EARL

b. 19 February 1914; Hernando, MS
d. July 1977, Memphis, TN

Guitarist. Worked very closely with Marshall "Memphis Sonny Boy" Jones.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE

Bibliography

LaVere, Steve. "Earl Bell." Living Blues no. 36 (January/February 1978): 31.

Discography: LSFP

BELL, ED

b. ca. 1905; Lowndes County, AL
d. Early 1960s; Greenville, AL

Singer and guitarist. Probably the same artist as Barefoot Bill and Sluefoot Joe who together recorded thirty superb blues between 1927 and 1930. Gave up secular music to become a preacher in Greenville.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Olsson, Bengt. "Ed Bell." Living Blues no. 11 (Winter 1972/1973): 31.

Discography: DGR

Ed Bell—Complete Recorded Works (Document DOCD 5090; reissue).

BELL, JIMMIE

b. 29 August 1910; Peoria, IL
d. 31 December 1987; Peoria, IL

First name sometimes spelled "Jimmy." Pianist active in St. Louis in the 1930s, then around Illinois from the 1940s onward. He recorded in 1948 for Aristocrat. Later life was hampered by prison terms for various crimes, but his 1978 piano appearance at Illinois Central College was released in 1979 by JSP Records.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
Wright, Jean Budd. "Jimmie Bell." Living Blues no. 79 (March/April 1988): 50–51.

Discography: LSPF

BELL, LURRIE

b. 13 December 1958; Chicago, IL

The son of Carey Bell, Lurrie Bell started playing guitar as a child, inspired by Eddie Taylor, B. B. King, and Magic Sam. Bell recorded behind artists such as his father and Eddie C. Campbell while in his teens, and formed the Sons of Blues in the late 1970s with Billy Branch. After a stint in Koko Taylor's band, he spent much of the 1980s recording and touring with his father. Despite personal problems, he recorded several critically acclaimed releases for Delmark in the mid- to late 1990s. With his highly original guitar playing and impassioned vocals, Bell established himself as one of the strongest talents on the Chicago blues scene.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG

700 Blues (1997, Delmark DE-700).

BELL, T. D.

b. Tyler Dee Bell, 22 or 26 December 1922; Lee County, TX
d. 9 January 1999; Austin, TX

Guitarist, singer. A T-Bone Walker disciple, Tyler Dee "T. D." Bell was a dominant figure in the post-World War II Austin blues scene. His band, the Cadillacs, featuring pianist Erbie Bowser, had its first success playing for west Texas oil field workers in the late 1940s. Bell brought the band back to Austin in the early 1950s. In 1992 Bell, with Bowser on piano and protégé W. C. Clark on bass, released his only album, Its About Time, on the Black Magic label. In the wake of the album Bell and Bowser had a late career resurgence, performing regularly in Austin as the Blues Specialists.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin
Baumgartner, Bruce. "Austin Blues: T. D. Bell and the Cadillacs Featuring Erbie Bowser." Juke Blues no. 24 (Autumn/Winter 1991): 13–16.

BELOW, FRED

b. 16 September 1926; Chicago, IL
d. 13 August 1988; Chicago, IL

Pioneering postwar Chicago blues drummer Fred Below developed an interest in music while attending Du Sable High, a school famous for the number of jazz musicians that it produced. Below joined the school band at age sixteen and, after a failed attempt with the trombone, took up the drums. Influenced by Gene Krupa, Chick Webb, and Buddy Rich, Below decided on a career as a jazz drummer. After graduation, he was drafted into the army and served two years overseas, where he met and played with jazz saxophonist Lester Young. Below was discharged in 1946 and he continued his musical education at Chicago's Roy C. Knapp School of Percussion, where he took an advanced drumming course. On graduation, he reenlisted in the army and played in a bebop band as well as with the 427th Army Band throughout Germany.

BELOW, FRED

After being released from the military in 1951, he returned to Chicago only to find little work available in the declining local jazz scene. On the advice of blues drummer and friend Elgin Edmonds, Below accepted an offer to join the Aces (formerly the Three Aces), a young blues band consisting of guitarist brothers Louis and David Myers and harmonica player Junior Wells. Although he initially found it very difficult to adapt his studied jazz expertise to the rough, un-schooled sound of early 1950s Chicago blues, Below persisted with the band and rapidly developed a swinging, jazz-inflected drumming style that would soon help transform the very sound of postwar Chicago blues.

After the star-making success of his hit single "Juke" in 1952, Little Walter left his position as Muddy Waters's harmonica player to lead the Aces, and Wells replaced Walter in Waters's band. Below continued to tour nationally with Little Walter and to record for Chess Records (issued by Chess subsidiary Checker) during the next several years. Below's driving backbeat rhythms, inventive use of the ride cymbal, and creative punctuating fills elevated Little Walter's music to even higher levels and Below's refined style became the model for future blues drummers. His distinctive playing also established him as an in-demand session musician, and he appeared on hundreds of recordings throughout the 1950s and 1960s, including those by Muddy Waters, Elmore James, Otis Rush, Sonny Boy Williamson II, J. B. Lenoir, John Brim, Chuck Berry, and Bo Diddley. Classic recordings like Waters's "Hoochie Coochie Man," Williamson's "Don't Start Me Talkin'," and Berry's "Johnny B. Goode" all benefited from Below's signature drumming. In 1955, Below left Little Walter and spent the next decade playing with a variety of musicians, including Memphis Slim, Buddy Guy, Robert Jr. Lockwood, and John Lee Hooker. He was the house drummer for Chess Records for many years, and recorded for other labels throughout the next few decades including Vee-Jay, Cobra, Delmark, and Testament. He performed in Europe in 1965 as part of the American Folk Blues Festival and continued to tour and record worldwide, occasionally reuniting with the Aces. Fred Below died of a heart attack in Chicago at age sixty-one.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- Greensmith, Bill. "Below's the Name, Drummin's the Game." Blues Unlimited 131/132 (September/December 1978): 12-19.
- O'Brien, Justin. "Fred Below." Living Blues 83 (November/December 1988): 43-44.

Discography

- Little Walter. The Essential Little Walter (1993, MCA/Chess CD CHD2-9342).
- Lockwood, Robert Jr. Steady Rollin' Man (1992, Delmark CD DD-630).

BELOW, LAMARR CHATMON

b. 11 December 1918; Birmingham, AL

d. 24 January 1993; Chicago, IL

LaMarr Chatmon Below came to Chicago at the age of eleven and early in life was drawn to the city's lively jazz and blues scene. She was married to Memphis Slim (Peter Chatman) for a time, and is said to have had a relationship with Little Walter Jacobs. Later in life she married drummer Fred Below, from whom she was widowed. An avid club-goer and bon vivant, LaMarr Below enjoyed giving encouragement to musicians and was an intelligent and wry commentator on the Chicago music scene with which she remained involved all her life.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

- "Other Deaths." Living Blues no. 110 (July/August 1993): 57.

BELVIN, JESSE

b. 15 December 1932; San Antonio, TX

d. 6 February 1960; Little Rock, AR

Singer, pianist, and composer. A prolific composer whose songs, covered by everyone from Dave Brubeck to Gladys Knight, transcended blues, Belvin had only a few years in the spotlight but he made the most of them. His fame, however, was not proportional to his musical creativity since he rarely received the recognition his songs' success deserved due to his practice of selling his compositions outright.

Belvin's family moved to Los Angeles when he was five and he was singing in church two years later. His professional career began in earnest when he joined Big Jay McNeely's backing vocal group, Three Dots and a Dash, in 1950. He formed a band, the Shields, with Johnny "Guitar" Watson but it did not meet with much success. A series of singles recorded with Marvin Phillips did better as "Dream Girl" reached #2 on the R&B charts in 1953. After Belvin was drafted he wrote "Earth Angel" on leave and it became a million-seller for the Penguins and one of the first racial crossover hits.

Belvin began recording for Modern Records in 1956 with some of his songs being credited to the Cliques.

“Goodnight My Love,” a top ten hit in 1956 recorded with eleven-year-old Barry White on keyboards, received the most exposure when it was used as rock deejay/promoter Alan Freed’s outro theme. He then signed to RCA, recording several hit singles and the Just Jesse Belvin album. He began work in 1959 on a project using West Coast jazz greats such as Art Pepper but never finished the album. Belvin and manager wife Jo Anne died in an auto collision after a concert tour date with Sam Cooke and Jackie Wilson.

MICHAEL POINT

Discography: Lord

Blues Ballader (1990, Specialty CD 7003; reissue).
Guess Who (2004, ACE [UK] CDCH2 1020; reissue of RCA Victor recordings).

BENDER, D. C.

b. D. C. Bendy, 19 June 1919; Arbala (or Arbana), TX

Singer and guitarist. Began performing in the mid-1930s, traveling around east Texas and Louisiana. In the 1940s he settled in Houston. Recorded with the Gold Star label in 1948, and with the Elko label in 1953. A trademark trick was to sing and drink beer at the same time. He reportedly died sometime in the 1980s.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
 Leadbitter, Mike. “Beer Bottle Blues.” In Nothing But the Blues, edited by Mike Leadbitter, 194–195. London: Hanover, 1971.

Discography: LSPF

BENNETT, BOBBY “GUITAR”

b. Rayford, NC

Guitarist active in Philadelphia in the 1960s and 1970s, with recordings made between 1962 and 1965.

ROCHELLE MONTAGNE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

McEwen, Joe. “Philadelphia Blues.” Blues Unlimited no. 92 (June 1972): 9.

Discography: LSPF

BENNETT, ANTHONY “DUSTER”

b. 23 September 1946; England

d. 26 March 1976; Warwickshire, England

A British singer and session harmonica musician, who also played guitar and drums. A member of John Mayall’s Bluesbreakers, he made several solo albums for the Blue Horizon label, including Smiling Like I’m Happy (1968) with members of Fleetwood Mac. His life was cut short by an auto accident.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG

Discography: AMG

BENNETT, WAYNE T.

b. 13 December 1933; Sulphur, OK

d. 28 November 1992; New Orleans, LA

Guitarist. A master of elegant, yet forceful, minimalism, Bennett was one of the most in-demand session guitarists of his time. He had a multitude of noteworthy recording credits but it was his work with Bobby “Blue” Bland in the 1960s that became his best-known and most enduring contributions to the blues. Bennett, who also played in Bland’s touring band, was heard to best advantage on the singer’s signature ballads, but he was equally adept on up-tempo tunes like “Turn on Your Love Light,” Bland’s biggest commercial success.

Bennett had established himself as a session star at Cobra Records in the late 1950s, working alongside Willie Dixon and playing with Otis Rush on “I Can’t Quit You Baby,” as well as backing Shakey Horton, Betty Everett, and others. Bennett began the 1960s with work on Bland’s classic singles, including “Cry, Cry, Cry,” “I Pity the Fool,” and “Don’t Cry No More.” Other highlights of his 1960s session contributions included work with Jimmy Reed and John Lee Hooker, in addition to two albums, one a live recording, with Buddy Guy in 1968.

The 1970s, which found him branching out with a soul/jazz session with organist Jimmy McGriff, were slower but Bennett recorded with New Orleans vocalist Johnny Adams and Texas guitarist Zuzu Bollin in the 1980s and also performed with Ron Levy’s Wild Kingdom and played on a live “Mighty” Sam McCain album in Japan in 1988. Bennett worked steadily until the end of his career, recording in New

BENNETT, WAYNE T.

Orleans with Champion Jack Dupree in 1990 and playing on sessions with James Cotton and Jimmy McCracklin just months before his death.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

Forte, Dan. "Wayne Bennett: The Sophisticated Side of the Blues." Guitar Player 18, no. 12 (December 1984): 30–31.
"Wayne Bennett" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 109 (May/June 1993): 50–51.

Discography: LSFP

BENOIT, TAB

b. 17 November 1967; Baton Rouge, LA

Louisiana-based guitarist and vocalist plays an accessible style of swamp blues with crossover appeal to rock audiences. Issued first national recordings in the early 1990s, and has stayed visible since with a heavy touring schedule and participation in recording collaborations with Kenny Neal, Debbie Davies, and Jimmy Thackery.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG

Zogott, Jennifer. "Tab Benoit: Fire from the Bayou." Blues Revue no. 21 (1996): 20–21.

Discography: AMG

Nice and Warm (1992, Justice 1201; reissued in 1999 as Vanguard 79542).

Homesick for the Road (1999, Telarc 83454; with Kenny Neal and Debbie Davies).

Whiskey Store Live (2004, Telarc 83584; with Jimmy Thackery).

BENSON, AL

b. Arthur Leaner, 30 June 1908

d. 6 September 1978; Three Oaks, MI

Chicago radio disk jockey and record company owner. Benson dominated Chicago's black radio market as the principal black deejay at WGES from 1945 to 1962. He was the first deejay in Chicago to play the deep Southern-style blues, and built a huge audience, many of whom were migrants from the South. Benson also operated several record labels. During 1949 to 1950, he headed A&R for Ole Swing-Master (a label named for Benson's moniker, but owned by Egmont Sonderling), releasing records on T. Bone Walker, Snooky and Moody, Floyd Jones, and on his own band. From 1953 to 1956, he operated the Parrot/Blue Lake complex, which recorded blues artists such as Willie Mabon, Curtis Jones, John Brim, J. B. Lenoir, Sunnyland Slim, and Joe Williams, as well as a plethora of vocal groups and jazz artists. From 1965 to 1968 he owned the Crash label (plus subsidiary imprints of Mica and Glowstar), notably recording bluesman Magic Sam and deep soul singer Jimmy Dobbins. During the 1960s Benson worked as a deejay on a variety of stations.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Walton, Charles. "Al Benson—The Godfather of Black Radio in Chicago." Jazz Institute of Chicago website, <http://www.jazzinstituteofchicago.org>.

BENTLEY, GLADYS ALBERTA

b. 12 August 1907; Philadelphia, PA

d. 18 January 1960; Los Angeles, CA

Flamboyant blues singer and pianist most active in 1920s Harlem. Performed in tuxedo and top hat, accompanying herself on piano and alternating her powerful alto with trumpet-like scat singing. Recorded eight titles for OKeh Records in 1928, a side with the Washboard Serenaders for Victor, five discs for Excelsior in 1945, and a Flame label single in the 1950s. Appeared in Los Angeles and San Francisco after 1937. Mentioned by several Harlem Renaissance novelists including Langston Hughes. Recent attention to her career has come through rerelease of her recordings on various contemporary labels and writings by Eric Garber.

TINA SPENCER DREISBACH

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli

Garber, Eric. "Gladys Bentley: The Bulldagger Who Sang the Blues." OUT/Look: National Lesbian & Gay Quarterly 1, no. 1 (Spring 1988): 52–61.

———. "A Spectacle in Color: The Lesbian and Gay Subculture of Jazz Age Harlem." In Hidden from History: Reclaiming the Gay and Lesbian Past, edited by Martin Duberman et al. New York: New American Library, 1989.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

BENTON, BROOK

b. Benjamin Franklin Peay, 19 September 1931; Camden, SC
d. 9 April 1988; New York, NY

Singer. The silky smooth-sounding Benton graduated from early gospel work to become a crossover R&B star via duets with Dinah Washington, including the 1960 hit “A Rockin Good Way,” as well as on his own with “Rainy Night in Georgia” and others.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: Larkin

BENTON, BUSTER

b. Ollie Benton, 19 July 1932; Texarkana, AR
d. 20 January 1996; Chicago, IL

Benton sang in a gospel choir as a youth and was an avid blues fan. Inspired by a B. B. King performance in the late 1940s, Benton purchased his first guitar at age twenty-three and taught himself to play. Instead of relying on music as a profession, Benton worked as an auto mechanic by day and played blues at night until an accident in 1983 took his left leg.

Benton moved from Arkansas to Toledo, Ohio, in 1952. During this time he worked with harmonica player Little Walter Mitchell. Benton’s first break came when he played with John Lee Hooker at the Hines Farm in Swanton, Ohio. Benton relocated to Chicago in 1959 and recorded singles with several record companies, including Sonic, Alteen, Twinnight, and Melloway. In 1971 Benton opened the Stardust Lounge on Chicago’s South Side. While performing in his club, Benton caught the ear of Muddy Waters, who then hired him to play lead guitar for Dixon’s Chicago Blues All-Stars. Benton remained with the group through 1975 and played on the album The All Star Blues World of Maestro Willie Dixon (Spivey).

Benton’s solo career began in 1979 with the release of the album Spider in My Stew (Ronn). Numerous albums followed on various labels, including the W. C. Handy Award winner Blues at the Top (1985, Blue Phoenix). Benton’s active performance schedule of the 1980s lessened in the 1990s due to health problems.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Sharp, Steven. “The Man with a Spider in His Stew.” Living Blues no. 117 (September/October 1994): 44–49.

Discography: AMG; LSF

See also Hooker, John Lee; Little Walter; Twinnight/
Twilight; Waters, Muddy

BERMAN, BESS

(See Apollo/Lloyds/Timely)

BERNHARDT, CLYDE (EDRIC BARRON)

b. 11 July 1905; Gold Hill, NC
d. 20 May 1986; Newark, NJ

Trombonist and singer. Changed surname from Barnhardt in 1930; also recorded under the name Ed Barron. Raised in Pennsylvania, Bernhardt began performing in 1923 and moved to New York in 1928. He toured with Joe “King” Oliver in 1931, the first band in which he featured as a blues singer as well as a trombone player. He played with a succession of band leaders in the 1930s, including Marion Hardy, Vernon Andrade, and Edgar Hayes, and toured Europe with the latter in 1938. He worked with Horace Henderson in 1941, then briefly with Fats Waller before joining Jay McShann in 1942–1943. He performed with Luis Russell in 1944, Cecil Scott in 1943–1944 and 1946, Claude Hopkins in 1944, and the Bascomb Brothers in 1945. In 1945 he formed his own Blue Blazers and made his debut recording as a leader for the Musicraft label with “Blues in the Red”/“Scandalmonger Mama.” Bernhardt returned to Luis Russell’s band in 1948–1951, then worked with Joe Garland’s Society Orchestra from 1952 to 1970. He was a custodian in a building in Newark from 1963 to 1972.

Renewed interest in Bernhardt’s work followed in the wake of a series of interviews in the British jazz magazine Jazz Journal International in 1967–1968. He worked briefly with Hayes Alvis, then formed the Harlem Blues and Jazz Band with Jacques Butler and Charlie Holmes in 1972. He led the band until 1979, including annual tours of Europe from 1976. He gave up that role because of ill health in 1979, but joined the Legends of Jazz that year and remained with them until his death in 1986.

BERNHARDT, CLYDE (EDRIC BARRON)

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Bernhardt, Clyde, and Sheldon Harris. I Remember: Eighty Years of Black Entertainment, Big Bands and the Blues. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1986.

Stewart-Baxter, Derrick. "The Clyde Bernhardt Story." Jazz Journal International 20, no. 9 (September 1967): 15, 40; 21, no. 2 (February 1968): 11.

Discography: LSFP

Selected Recordings

"Blues in the Red"/"Scandalmonger Mama" (1945, Musicraft 348).

"Cracklin' Bread" (1951, Derby 780).

More Blues and Jazz from Harlem (1973, 400W150 400).

Sittin' on Top of the World! (1975, Barron 401).

Harlem Blues and Jazz Band 1973-80 (1980, Barron 403).

BERRY, CHUCK

b. Charles Edward Anderson Berry, 18 October 1926; St. Louis, MO

Birthplace also cited as San Jose, California. Chuck Berry grew up in St. Louis, where he was surrounded and influenced by the blues, R&B, country music, and church music. After careers as a factory worker at the St. Louis General Motors Plant and as a cosmetologist, Berry formed his first band in 1952. The trio featured Berry on guitar and vocals, Johnny Johnson on piano, and Ebby Harding on drums. Within a couple of years, the trio had become a regular in the St. Louis club scene. After meeting Berry, Muddy Waters encouraged him to audition for Chess Records.

In 1955 Chess Records produced Berry's first single, which was a version of the country song "Ida Red," popularized earlier by Bob Wills and the Texas Playboys. The song was modified by Leonard Chess, renamed "Maybeline," and coupled with the blues classic "Wee Wee Hours." Promoted by Alan Freed, who in return was listed as the coauthor, the song went to number five on the pop charts and number one on the R&B charts. The song illustrates Berry's amalgamated form of blues and country that served as a bridge between the blues and rock 'n' roll, and it exemplifies a guitar style that became a defining feature of rock 'n' roll. Following the success of "Maybeline," Berry continued to produce chart-topping singles, including "School Days," "Roll Over Beethoven," and "Johnny B. Good," for the remainder of the decade.

In 1959, Berry was accused of violating the Mann Act for his association with and employment of a fourteen-year-old prostitute. After two trials, Berry was convicted in 1962 and spent the next two years in prison. By the end of the 1960s, Berry's popularity and record sales began to decline. Berry achieved a successful comeback in 1972 with the single "My Ding a Ling," a humorous song that was his first and only number one song on the pop charts. Berry's contribution to the development of rock 'n' roll is heard in his guitar technique and in his mixture of previous styles into a music that was appealing to all audiences. His influence on later musicians is evident from the many covers of his songs performed and recorded by bands including the Rolling Stones and the Beatles, and from the adoption of his guitar technique by many following guitarists.

Berry was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in January 1986. He was awarded the Lifetime Achievement Award at the twenty-seventh annual Grammy Awards during the same year. In 2000, Berry was awarded the Kennedy Center Honors Award. Chuck Berry continues to play live concerts at venues around the world.

ROBERT WEBB FRY II

Bibliography

Harris, Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Berry, Chuck. Chuck Berry: The Autobiography. New York: Harmony Books, 1987.

Pegg, Bruce. Brown Eyed Handsome Man: The Life and Hard Times of Chuck Berry. New York and London: Routledge, 2002.

Discography: LSFP

Selected Recordings

Rock, Rock, Rock (1956, Chess).

After School Session (1957, Chess).

One Dozen Berries (1958, Chess).

Rockin at the Hops (1960, Chess).

The London Chuck Berry Sessions (1972, Chess).

BERRY, RICHARD

b. 11 April 1935; Extension, LA

d. 23 January 1997; Los Angeles, CA

Richard Berry was the writer and original performer of "Louie Louie," as well as of the notable "Have Love, Will Travel.” Born near New Orleans, Berry moved a year later to Los Angeles and began to engage in the city’s record business while still in high school. Along with a group of classmates, he constituted the vocal group the Flairs, which was signed to the Bihari Brothers’ Modern Records. In 1955, their single “She Wants to Rock,” written by Berry, scored on the rhythm and blues charts, and they are regarded by music historians as the first significant teenage vocal group of the time. A jack of all musical trades, prolific songwriter, and an adaptable vocalist, Berry quickly became a virtual utility man for the Modern label while still in his teens. Most notably, he appeared as the bass lead vocalist on the Robins’s “Riot in Cell Block #9” (1954) and the partner to Etta James on “The Wallflower (Dance with Me Henry)” (1955).

In 1956, while performing as Rocky Rillera with Bobby and Barry Rillera’s Rhythm Rockers, Berry heard the ensemble perform a now universally familiar riff taken from Rene Touzet’s “El Loco Cha Cha.” Berry employed this rhythmic fragment as the nucleus for “Louie Louie,” originally played as a mambo for its release as the B-side of Berry’s solo single on Max Feirtag’s Flip Records. The A-side of the 1957 release was a cover version of the hardy perennial “You Are My Sunshine.” Local Los Angeles disk jockey Hunter Hancock pushed the flipside, and the track became a regional hit up and down the West Coast.

Rockers in the burgeoning Seattle, Washington, scene discovered it, and Rockin’ Robin Roberts, backed by local legends the Wailers, covered “Louie Louie” in 1961. The record precipitated the universally familiar version by the Kingsmen, released in 1963. Its success and eventual emergence as a rock standard did not immediately benefit Berry, because he had sold his interest in the copyright to Feirtag for $750 in the late 1950s. Thankfully, after many meager years as a struggling after-hours performer, Berry reclaimed his rights to the song in 1985 with the assistance of crusading lawyer Chuck Rubin. The fact that “Louie Louie” earned Berry nearly $160,000 in 1989 alone indicates the fiscal transformation this legal intervention brought about.

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

- Larkin
Bonner, Brett J. “Richard Berry” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 133 (May/June 1997): 39.
Have Louie Will Travel. Ace, 2004.
Leblanc, Eric. “Richard Berry” [obituary]. Blues and Rhythm no. 117 (1997): 10.
Marsh, Dave. Louie Louie. New York: Hyperion, 1993.

BIBB, ERIC

b. 16 August 1951; New York, NY

Born into a musical family, Bibb was influenced by a vast variety of genres including folk, blues, and jazz. Son of folk singer Leon Bibb; godson of Paul Robeson. Attended High School of Music and Art and Columbia University before moving to Europe. Released first album in 1997. Nominated for a Grammy Award in 1997.

GAILE WELKER

Bibliography

- AMG (Steve Huey)
Zabres, Jean-Luc. “Eric Bibb.” Soul Bag no. 151 (Summer 1998): 12.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

- Good Stuff* (Opus 3 CD-19603).
Natural Light (Earthbeat! CD-73830).
Painting Signs (Rhino CD-74382).

BIG BAD SMITTY

b. John Henry Smith, 11 February 1940; Vicksburg, MS

d. 3 April 2002; Jackson, MS

Born John Henry Smith, the singer/guitarist who would become known as Big Bad Smitty was raised on various farms outside of Vicksburg. He began teaching himself guitar by age eight and after the death of his father a few years later, he moved with his brother to Jackson, Mississippi. In 1958, he settled in Greenville, Mississippi, and began developing his raw and gritty guitar and vocal style while playing with local musicians Roosevelt “Booba” Barnes and L. V. Banks in the area’s tough juke joints. His early musical influences included Frankie Lee Sims, Lightnin’ Hopkins, and Howlin’ Wolf.

Working by day as a truck driver, Smith frequently traveled to St. Louis and eventually relocated there in 1966. He spent the next several years working with various local musicians, including Big George Brock and Robert Weaver. In 1976, he made his recording debut for Ace Records in Jackson. Smith went on to form his own band in St. Louis that featured guitarist Bennie Smith and harmonica player Arthur Williams. In 1991, the group recorded the critically acclaimed release Mean Disposition for Black Magic, which led to several tours of the United States and Europe.

BIG BAD SMITTY

Smith's haunting Howlin' Wolf-like vocals and raw Delta guitar rhythms were an exciting part of his appeal. Smith was plagued by health problems in the mid-1990s and was confined to a wheelchair after losing both legs to diabetes. He continued to perform sporadically and recorded for HMG in 1997 and Ampion in 2000 before succumbing to diabetes at age sixty-two.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Barretta, Scott. "Big Bad Smitty." Living Blues no. 165 (September/October 2002): 88–89.

Greensmith, Bill. "St. Louis on a High Hill: Big Bad Smitty." Living Blues no. 109 (May/June 1993): 26–31.

Discography: LSFP

Big Bad Smitty. Mean Disposition (1991, Black Magic CD-9018).

Various artists. Johnny Vincent Presents Genuine Mississippi Blues ... Plus—The Ace (MS) Blues Masters, Vol. 4 (1999, Westside CD WESM 579).

BIG BOSS MAN (HI-HEEL SNEAKERS)

The classic blues song "Big Boss Man" was first recorded by Jimmy Reed in 1960 and was written for the singer by his manager Al Smith and Luther Dixon. Released on Vee-Jay in May 1961, the song eventually peaked at #13 on the R&B charts and crossed over to the pop charts, where it reached #78. One of the most covered blues songs of the postwar era, "Big Boss Man" was subsequently recorded by dozens of blues, rock, and country artists, including Elvis Presley (whose version reached #38 on the pop charts in 1967), B. B. King, the Grateful Dead, and Charlie Rich.

The song's broad appeal was due in part to its lively shuffle beat and endearing, laid-back vocals, a signature of Reed's style, but also to its defiant, working class lyrics. The rebellious blue-collar sentiment was summed up in the chorus when the singer sarcastically remarks that his boss is not "big" in the sense of status or importance, but only in physical size. Its theme of questioning and confronting authority about being overworked resonated with both black and white listeners. The use of the term "boss man" undoubtedly invoked memories of many African Americans who had escaped the brutal life of working on a plantation. "Boss man" was a common name for a white authority figure in the Deep South, but was also used by African Americans to address white males in general. Such outright defiance in the Jim Crow South as depicted in the song was surely a common dream. Like many great blues songs, there is also an undercurrent of optimism in the message. The final verse concludes with the hopeful declaration of finding a new boss that will offer fair treatment.

The popularity of "Big Boss Man" inspired several other blues songs that became classics in their own right, including Frank Frost's signature 1962 recording "Jelly Roll King." Undoubtedly the best known among these was Tommy Tucker's hit single "Hi-Heel Sneakers," which debuted on Checker in 1964 and eventually reached #11 on the R&B charts. Like Frost's "Jelly Roll King," Tucker's composition used a similar introduction and shuffle beat as "Big Boss Man" did, but the song was propelled by a prominent rhythm guitar (and at times Tucker's organ) which played strong staccato stabs of successive fifth, sixth, and seventh chords throughout. This now-familiar rhythmic chord progression of accenting the beat a la "Hi-Heel Sneakers" was in turn incorporated into many cover versions of "Big Boss Man," and ironically influenced how the Jimmy Reed standard is typically played today.

Lyrically, "Hi-Heel Sneakers" is simply a paean to going out and having a good time. Tucker instructs his female friend to get ready to paint the town by putting on her memorable outfit. He later explained that the song was written about a woman he knew who was fond of wearing a tight red dress, a wig, and high-heeled shoes that resembled sneakers. "Hi-Heel Sneakers" was covered by many diverse artists and was a charted hit for Stevie Wonder in 1965 and Jose Feliciano in 1968.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

O'Neal, Jim, and Amy O'Neal. "Jimmy Reed." Living Blues no. 21 (May/June 1975): 16–41.

Cappuccio, Robert. "Tommy Tucker's a Real Mother _____." Living Blues no. 19 (January/February 1975): 24–25.

Whitburn, Joel. Top R&B Singles: 1942–1999. Wisconsin: Record Research, 2000.

BIG DOO WOPPER

b. Cornell H. Williams, 13 November 1953; Grenada, MS

A blind keyboard player inspired by Ray Charles with strong doo-wop and gospel leanings, the Doo Wopper played for a time in Lucky Lopez's band and worked occasional club gigs, but for many years has primarily performed daily on an electronic keyboard in Chicago's subway tunnels for tips. An exuberant musician with an emotional, hoarse shout, he issued idiosyncratic CDs on the Delmark imprint in 2000 and 2002 on which he played piano and organ and multi-tracked his own elaborate vocal harmonies on nearly all original compositions.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

AMG (Al Campbell)

Discography: AMG (Al Campbell)

All in the Joy (Delmark DE-742).

BIG LUCKY

b. Levester Carter, 10 February 1917; Weir, MS
d. 24 December 2002; Memphis, TN

Memphis-based guitarist and vocalist. Recorded for Savoy, Sun, and 606 while in the Rhythmaires. Released singles under his own name during the 1960s through 1980s. His first album, Lucky 13 (1998, Blueside), garnered the Big Bill Broonzy prize for best blues CD from the French Academy of Jazz.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

Larkin

Barretta, Scott. "Big Lucky Carter." Living Blues no. 169 (September/October 2003): 116–117.

Discography: LSFP

Selected Recordings

Lucky 13 (1998, Blueside #106).

See also Savoy/National/Regent/Acorn; Sun/Phillips International/Flip

BIG MACEO

b. Major Merriweather, 21 March 1905; between Newnan and Atlanta, GA
d. 26 February 1953; Chicago, IL

Major "Maceo" Merriweather was born in Coweta County, between Newnan and Atlanta, on March 31, 1905. The adjacent county is Meriweather (with one "r" in the first syllable) County, and some historians have spelled Big Maceo's surname accordingly. One of eleven children, he was the youngest of five boys, and was raised on a farm until he was fifteen. In 1920 his father got a job in a bank and the family moved to College Park, nine miles from Atlanta. Here he was employed in a house run by a lady named Roxy and taught himself to play blues on her piano. In 1924 he joined a brother in Detroit, settling on the East Side. In the city he maintained a day job and played in the evenings and at weekends in clubs on Russell and Macomb Street and at house parties.

One of the houses where he played, at 980 Alfred Street, was owned by Rossell "Hattie Bell" Spruel who later became his wife. Hattie urged him to move to Chicago to further his career, and there in 1941 he met Tampa Red and Big Bill Broonzy, and was introduced to talent scout Lester Melrose. Melrose dominated the Chicago blues recording scene and speedily arranged a session for RCA Victor for Maceo with Tampa Red. This resulted in the hugely popular "Worried Life Blues," covered by many later artists including Ray Charles. Now an established recording artist, he continued to play in Detroit and Chicago with Big Bill and Tampa Red, and made occasional road trips to Tennessee and Georgia. Further sessions for RCA Victor followed, until the 1942 Petrillo ban effectively put a halt on Maceo's recording career for two years. He resumed in 1945, recording some of his best work, and also accompanying Tampa Red, Big Bill Broonzy, and Jazz Gillum. Sadly in mid-1946 he suffered a stroke that left him paralyzed down his right side. He continued to perform for several years, and even occasionally to record, with either Eddie Boyd or Johnnie Jones playing the right hand on the piano. He suffered a fatal heart attack in 1953.

Despite his short recording career, Big Maceo became one of the most respected pianists of his era, and a major influence on later postwar artists such as Johnnie Jones and Otis Spann. His forthright traditional blues approach contrasted strongly with the prevailing jazz-influenced accompaniments of contemporary pianists such as "Blind" John Davis, Sammy Price, and Horace Malcolm. His choice of material also placed reliance on traditional sources, as evidenced by "Can't You Read," a version of the "toast" the Monkey and the Baboon, and "32-20 Blues," a variant of the "44 blues" theme.

On a slow blues, Big Maceo was a moving, reflective singer with a soft, plaintive voice. Compositions such as "County Jail Blues" are accompanied by a four-to-the-bar chorded bass with a characteristic turnaround at the end of the sequence. By contrast, his up-tempo numbers invariably feature a driving walking bass line punctuated by short, complex phrases and riffs. He recorded several outstanding instrumentals, and in his tour de force, “Chicago Breakdown,” his powerful left hand is especially prominent, including an ascending and descending semitone run that was something of a trademark. Big Maceo was perhaps the last of the Chicago pianists to employ this two-handed approach, as the rapidly increasing volume of the electric guitar eventually drowned the left hand of later exponents.

BIG MACEO

BOB HALL

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR; LSFP

BIG MAYBELLE

b. Maybel (Mabel) Louise Smith, 1 May 1924; Jackson, TN

d. 23 January 1972; Cleveland, OH

With a talent as large as her enormous voice, Big Maybelle was a seasoned professional in her teens and an enduring influence of female empowerment decades after her death. After singing with a Sanctified Church choir, she overwhelmed the judges to win a Memphis talent contest in 1932 and gain her first public recognition. Following a couple of years working with Memphis big bands, she joined the International Sweethearts of Rhythm and in 1936 began a five-year stint with the Christine Chatman Orchestra, where she made her recording debut.

Backed by the Hot Lips Page band, she recorded under her original Mabel Louise Smith name in 1947 in Cincinnati for her first session as a leader. When she signed with Okeh Records in 1952 she became Big Maybelle. She also became an immediate success with three hit singles, including “Way Back Home,” on the R&B charts in 1953. Two years later she released “Whole Lot of Shaking Goin’ On,” which Jerry Lee Lewis would take to the top of the pop charts in 1957. She changed record companies but continued to chalk up R&B hits until the sophisticated soul sensibilities of the 1960s made her roots-oriented approach sound dated to young fans.

She worked with the Quincy Jones Orchestra in the 1950s and made a historic appearance at the 1958 Newport Jazz Festival that was captured in the award-winning documentary Jazz on a Summer’s Day. Her health destroyed by diabetes and heroin, Big Maybelle met an uncharacteristically quiet demise, slipping into a coma and passing away in a Cleveland hospital.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern

Discography: AMG; LSFP

BIG MEMPHIS MA RAINEY

b. Lillie Mae Hardison Glover, 1906; Columbia, TN
d. 27 March 1985; Memphis, TN

Singer and dancer with medicine and minstrel shows. Rainey apprenticed with Ma Rainey and was a Beale Street personality and businesswoman who recorded for Sun (1953).

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

Hay, Fred J. “Goin’ Back to Sweet Memphis”: Conversations with the Blues. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001.

McKee, Margaret, and Fred Chisenhall. Beale Black and Blue: Life and Music on Black America’s Main Street. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981.

Discography: LSFP

Memphis Belles: The Women of Sun Records (2002, Bear Family BCD 16609; reissue).

BIG THREE TRIO

Blues-influenced vocal-instrumental ensemble that emerged in Chicago after World War II. The Big Three Trio, named after the World War II’s “Big Three” of Franklin Roosevelt, Winston Churchill, and Joseph Stalin, recorded together from 1946 to 1952 and continued performing together until 1956. The group was comprised of Willie “Big Jump” Dixon on upright bass (b. July 1, 1915, Vicksburg, MS; d. January 29, 1992, Burbank, CA), Leonard “Baby Doo” Caston on piano (b. June 2, 1917, Sumrall, MS; d. August 1967), and Bernardo Dennis on guitar. Dennis left the group in 1947 to be replaced by Ollie Crawford (b. December 1917, Mobile, AL; d. 1973). The Big Three Trio specialized in three-part harmonies, and all members of the group shared songwriting duties. Although the Big Three Trio was a truly postwar music group, one could argue that the group conjures the aesthetics of the prewar blues sound more than the postwar sound. Additionally, the Big Three Trio defies stylistic categorization, as one cannot truly assess the Big Three as a vocal group or a straightforward blues ensemble, further complicating their stature and place within the history of blues artists.

Willie Dixon and Leonard Caston first performed together as the Five Breezes, releasing a record in 1940 on Bluebird Records. However, the group disbanded when Dixon was jailed for avoiding the war draft. After his release in 1944 Dixon joined a group called the Four Jumps of Jive with Bernardo Dennis, which recorded for Mercury Records. From these previous musical collaborations Caston, Dixon, and Dennis decided to form a new group called the Big Three Trio. The group recorded with Bullet Records in 1946, where they recorded four singles, including “Signifying Monkey,” which sold 40,000 records. After this success they signed with Columbia Records in 1947. The group rereleased a sanitized version of “Signifying Monkey” for Columbia in 1947 and produced a stream of singles for the label, including “I Keep on Worrying,” “Don’t Let That Music Die,” “If the Sea Was Whiskey,” “It Can’t Be Done,” “Where Shall I Go,” “Why Be So Blue,” “You Sure Look Good to Me,” “Big Three Stomp,” and “Hard Notch Boogie Beat.”

The Big Three Trio briefly recorded for OKeh, making their last recording in 1952, which included the single “Got You on My Mind,” but continued only as a live performance ensemble from 1952 to 1956. Caston drifted from the group in the early 1950s and Dixon began working full time for Chess Records as a session bass player, which drew his attention away from the group, and both of these factors ultimately caused the demise of the original Big Three Trio. Although Dixon attempted to resurrect the group—with Lafayette Leake replacing Caston—for a few sessions on Chess records in the 1960s, these recordings were essentially unreleased. Caston died of heart failure in 1967 and Willie Dixon signed full time with Chess Records, launching a successful career as a blues producer, arranger, and songwriter.

ERIN STAPLETON-CORCORAN

Bibliography

- Dixon, Willie. I Am the Blues: The Willie Dixon Story. New York: Da Capo Press, 1989.
 Snowden, Don. Liner notes for The Big Three Trio: I Feel Like Steppin’ Out (1986, Dr. Horse, Sweden).
 Whiteis, David. “Genius Tucked Safely in the Past: The Big Three Trio.” Down Beat (February 1991): 46.

Discography

- The Big Three Trio: I Feel Like Steppin’ Out*. Sweden: Dr. Horse, 1986.
Willie Dixon: The Big Three Trio (1990, Columbia).

BIG TIME SARAH

b. Sarah Streeter, 31 January 1953; Coldwater, MS

An energetic singer active in Chicago, who has recorded for Delmark Records.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn); Santelli

Discography: AMG

BIG TOWN

Record label (California, 1945–1955). Owner: Robert Lee Geddins (b. February 6, 1913, Hybank, TX; d. February 16, 1991, Oakland, CA). This Oakland, California–based label issued the first recordings of Kylo Turner & the Pilgrim Travelers, and Tommy Jenkins & the Rising Star Gospel Singers. It also reissued Swing Time recordings by Lowell Fulson, including “San Francisco Blues” and “You’re Gonna Miss Me.” By 1953, it was a subsidiary of 4 Star Records, and issued sides by former gospel singer Jimmy Wilson (“Tin Pan Alley”), Joe Hill Louis, Little Caesar, James Reed, and Lillian N. Claiborne produced recordings by Frank Motley. J. R. Fullbright also was involved as a producer. It should not be confused with the 1970s label by the same name.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

McGrath

BIG TWIST

b. Larry Nolan, 22 September 1937; Terre Haute, IN
 d. 14 March 1990; Broadview, IL

Singer. As the titular, oversized frontman for the horn-powered R&B band Big Twist and the Mellow Fellows, Nolan transformed the Midwest bar band into one of the hottest live acts on the Chicago scene of the 1980s. Big Twist and the Mellow Fellows, with

BIG TWIST

Nolan doubling on drums, began playing around Carbondale, Illinois, in the early 1970s. The band built up a considerable regional following before relocating to Chicago in 1978.

After establishing itself on the Windy City scene as a popular live act, the group made its recording debut in 1980 with an eponymous effort on the Flying Fish label. The release of One Track Mind in late 1981 raised the band's national profile considerably and a change of record labels for Playing for Keeps, produced by Little Milton saxist Gene Barge, made it a viable touring attraction outside its regional base. Live from Chicago! Bigger Than Life!!, which effectively captured Nolan's charisma as a live performer, finally gave fans a representative recording of the band at its best. Nolan died from kidney failure brought on by diabetes in 1990 but the band played on. Saxist Terry Ogolini and guitarist Pete Special, cofounders of the original group, recruited Nolan's friend Martin Allbritton to take over the Big Twist vocal role and the band recorded Street Party in 1990 in that configuration. When Special left, the group continued as the Chicago Rhythm & Blues Kings, performing regularly and recording for Blind Pig Records.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Woodmansee, Ken, and Jim Feeney. "Larry 'Big Twist' Nolan." Living Blues no. 92 (July/August 1990): 46.

Discography: AMG

BIGEOU, ESTHER

b. 1895; New Orleans, LA
d. 1936 (?)

A singer and dancer in the theater revues and on the TOBA circuit in the 1920s and early 1930s. Her OKeh label records included material written by W. C. Handy, Richard M. Jones, and Clarence Williams. Reports of her retirement to New Orleans, and of her death in the mid-1930s, remain unverified.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

BILLINGTON, JOHNNIE

b. 1935; Quitman County, MS

Guitarist and teacher. From the 1950s through the late 1970s, Billington was active as a performer in Chicago, associating with Muddy Waters, Earl Hooker, and Elmore James. Since the 1980s he has taught music to Mississippi children after school, initially in Clarksdale and currently in Lambert. His efforts are sponsored in part by the Delta Blues Education Program.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Watkins, Leonard. "Teachin' the Blues." Blues and Rhythm no. 108 (April 1996): 18.

BINDER, DENNIS "LONG MAN"

b. 18 November 1920; Rosedale, MS

Blues singer of the 1950s who specialized in comic monologue numbers. His best known song, "Long Man Blues," gave him his nickname. Binder began his career playing spirituals on piano. When he was young, his family moved to St. Louis and then in 1939 relocated to Chicago, where he got interested in the blues. During the 1950s Binder would regularly move back and forth between Chicago and the South, performing in blues clubs and recording. He first recorded for Sun Records in 1952, but the session went unreleased. He recorded a single under producer Ike Turner in Memphis in 1954 that got released on Modern. Returning to Chicago, Binder in 1955 finally recorded a session that produced "The Long Man" on the United imprint. Binder recorded one more session, in 1958, for the Cottonwood label. In the 1960s, Binder was playing soul music, and in the 1970s, country and western music.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Eagle, Bob. "The Long Man: Dennis Binder's Story." Blues Unlimited no. 105 (December 1973/January 1974): 15.

Discography: LSFP

BIOGRAPH

As with many other independent labels, Biograph Records represents first and foremost the artistic vision of its founder, Arnold S. Caplin. Caplin's interests covered many areas, among them rhythmic (as a percussionist) and historical (as a writer and researcher). He also rivaled the legendary John Hammond in his social activism and feeling that music and culture were inextricably linked with politics. Caplin started Biograph in 1967 as a place to reissue seminal American roots music, particularly ragtime as well as jazz and blues. Several albums of Scott Joplin rags were issued and are still available on the label, plus releases from other ragtime pianists, as well as titles from traditional blues performers like Skip James. Biograph issued a release of various performers doing vintage Cole Porter songs in 2003, and its back titles are still available online through several sources.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Biograph website, <http://www.biograph.com/> (accessed December 17, 2004).

BISHOP, ELVIN

b. 21 October 1942; Tulsa, OK

Guitarist. Glendale, California, has also been cited as his birthplace by writers. Bishop was captivated by blues on the radio as a child. He performed with the Paul Butterfield Blues Band from 1965 to 1968, where he struck up a creative twin lead guitar partnership with Mike Bloomfield. Bishop pursued a solo career from 1968 with his own group.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

AMG (Michael Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMGSelected Recordings as Leader

Let It Flow (1974, Capricorn 0134).

Big Fun (1988, Alligator 4767).

Don't Let the Bossman Get You Down (1991, Alligator AL 4791).

Ace in the Hole (1995, Alligator 4833).

That's My Partner (2000, Alligator 4874; with Little Smokey Smothers).

BIZOR, BILLY

b. 1917; Centerville TN

d. 4 April 1969; Houston, TX

Harpist, singer. Country blues harp traditionalist Bizer was unknown until the 1960s and he died before the decade concluded, but his work, both live and in the studio, with his cousin Lightnin' Hopkins secured his reputation. Bizer, a traveling companion of Hopkins before his move to Houston, backed the guitarist on albums such as Smokes Like Lightning and Lightnin' & Co. Bizer, who also accumulated a few songwriting credits along the way, finally recorded an album as a leader that showcased his singing when he finished Blowing My Blues Away in Houston shortly before his death in 1969.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Discography: AMG; LSFPBLACK & BLUE/ISABEL/RIVERBOAT

French record company established by Jean-Marie Monestier in 1966, initially mainly to issue material from earlier concerts and defunct labels, including concerts by Big Bill Broonzy and Memphis Slim. From 1967 visiting African American jazz and blues artists were recorded and, in partnership with Jean-Pierre Tahmazian, tours were arranged for this purpose, building into one of the most important catalogs of blues and swing in the world. Blues artists recorded included Gatemouth Brown, Jimmy Dawkins, Luther Johnson, Louis Jordan, Sammy Price, Jimmy Rogers, Willie Mabon, and French resident Mickey Baker. In 1977–1984, Isabel, a subsidiary label wholly devoted to blues, included albums by Otis Rush, Buddy Guy, Magic Slim, and Lucky Peterson. Albums by Dawkins and Peterson rank among their best work; many feel that some artists with lesser instrumental skills were hampered by lack of A&R direction. Some reissues from the R&B era by such performers as Cecil Gant and Cousin Joe appeared on the Riverboat label. Few new recordings were made after the mid-1980s but repackaging of the back catalog on CD has included much previously unissued material.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Ruppli, Michel, and Jean-Pierre Tahmazian. Black and Blue: Discographie. Paris: AFAS, 1995.

BLACK & WHITE

Record label (New York and California, 1942–1949). Owners: Paul Reiner (b. December 6, 1905, Hungary; d. February 1, 1982, Los Angeles, CA); Lillian Drosd Reiner (b. April 28, 1908, MA; d. September 4, 1982, Los Angeles, CA). Originally based in New York, Black & White's artists included Ernestine Anderson, Ivie Anderson, Wilbert Baranco, Red Callender, Maxwell Davis, (Miss) Jo Evans, Maggie Hathaway, Lena Horne, Helen Humes, Etta Jones, Al Killian, Jack McVea ("Open the Door, Richard"), Phil Moore, Alton Redd, Spirits of Rhythm (with Teddy Bunn, George Vann, Leo Watson), Ray Stokes, Roosevelt Sykes ("This Tavern Boogie," with saxophonist J. T. Brown), Rabon Tarrant, Aaron "T-Bone" Walker ("Call It Stormy Monday [But Tuesday Is Just As Bad]"). Ralph Bass, Jr. (b. May 1, 1910, New York City, NY; d. March 5, 1997, Bahamas) was their major producer.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

Grendysa, Peter. "The Black and White Label." Blues & Rhythm no. 130 (June 1998): 4–9.
Grendysa, Peter, Richard Johnson, Guido van Rijn, Ray Astbury, and Bob McGrath. "Black & White Updates." Blues & Rhythm no. 132 (1998); no. 133 (1998).
Shaw, Arnold. "Two Other Family-Owned Record 'Indies.'" In Arnold Shaw: Honkers and Shouters: The Golden Years of Rhythm and Blues, edited by Arnold Shaw. 1978.

BLACK ACE

b. Babe Kyro (or Karo) Lemon Turner, 21 December 1905; Hughes Springs, TX
d. 7 November 1972, Fort Worth, TX

After playing local parties throughout the 1920s and early 1930s, lap steel guitarist B. K. Turner (aka Black Ace) moved to Shreveport, Louisiana. There he often formed a duo with Oscar "Buddy" Woods, who taught him Hawaiian guitar blues style. Strongly influenced by hillbilly and Western swing, in 1936 Turner cut two unissued sides for ARC. The following year Decca released six blues songs, from one of which Black Ace got his pseudonym. Later rediscovered by Paul Oliver, Black Ace recorded two sessions for Chris Strachwitz's Arhoolie label in 1960 and appeared in Samuel Charters's film The Blues, but never retired from his job.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Oliver, Paul. Notes for Black Ace: I Am the Boss Card in Your Hand (1992, Arhoolie CD-374).

Discography: DGR; LSFP

See also Woods, Oscar "Buddy"

BLACK ANGEL BLUES (SWEET LITTLE ANGEL)

The song known today as either "Sweet Black Angel" or "Sweet Little Angel" is one of the most popular and frequently recorded songs in the blues. Although composer credits are often given to Tampa Red, whose "Black Angel Blues" appeared in March 1934 (Vocalion 02753), the first recorded version was Lucille Bogan's, whose "Black Angel Blues" (Brunswick 7186) was recorded ca. mid-December 1930. The two artists shared recording sessions in 1928 and 1929, and it is probably impossible at this late date to determine who originally created the song's melodic and poetic hooks. Although Bogan's recording (at least its Oriole 8121 issue) credits "Smith" as the composer, she wrote many of her own songs and "Black Angel Blues" certainly contains her earthy style of poetic imagery and straightforward melody. It wouldn't have been the only time a composer credit was assumed by a third party. Tampa Red's Vocalion release carried no composer credit, and apparently no other artist recorded this soon-to-be classic during the pre-World War II era.

During the early post-World War II era, the lyrics of the song began to change. In 1949, Robert Nighthawk had gone back to the song's prewar roots—and its original title—on Aristocrat 2301 (subtitled "Sweet Black Angel"), but in 1950 Tampa Red was the first to record it as "Sweet Little Angel" (Victor 22/50-0107). B. B. King did the same in 1956 (RPM 468); he also changed the song's final line from "... bought me a whiskey still" to "... gave me a Cadillac de Ville." King no doubt incorporated these lyric changes in an attempt to broaden his audience. Showing his masterful ability to read an audience, however, King retains the “whiskey still” line when performing before a black night club audience in his legendary Live at the Regal (1964, ABC LP 509). Today’s revival blues performers frequently prefer the alcoholic approach.

Guitar legend Earl Hooker recorded two versions during his commercial recording career. 1953 saw him record “Sweet Angel (Original Sweet Black Angel)” (Rockin’ 513) and in 1962 he recorded a reworked version titled “Sweet Brown Angel” for Checker (Matrix 11789), which went unreleased at the time. Hooker utilized the slide guitar motifs first used by Tampa Red, and it was Nighthawk and Hooker’s renditions, inspired by the song’s leisurely pace and keening melody, that have made “Sweet Little Angel” a staple in the repertoire of many electric slide guitarists.

Although first recorded by a woman, “Black Angel Blues” has become a song largely performed by male blues artists. Like the rock classic “Hound Dog,” the song was originally one in which a woman talks about her man. In Lucille Bogan’s version, the traditional opening line, “I’ve got a sweet black angel, I like the way he spread his wings,” provokes the image of a man reaching to embrace his lover; the imagery is far more sexually graphic when later sung by a man of a woman.

PETER R. ASCHOFF

Discography

- Bogan, Lucille. “Black Angel Blues” (1930, Brunswick 7186).
 Tampa Red. “Black Angel Blues” (1934, Vocalion 02753).
 Nighthawk, Robert. “Black Angel Blues (Sweet Black Angel)” (1949, Aristocrat 2301).
 Hooker, Earl. “Sweet Angel (Original Sweet Black Angel)” (1953, Rockin’ 513).
 King, B. B. Live at the Regal (1964, ABC LP 509).

BLACK BOB

Flourished 1930s

Under the pseudonym of “Black Bob,” this unknown Chicago pianist recorded extensively on the Bluebird and Vocalion labels as a side accompanist to some of the leading blues artists of the day. He appears on a number of recordings by Big Bill Broonzy, Lil Johnson, Tampa Red, and Memphis Minnie, who refers to him by name on the recording “If You See My Rooster (Please Run Him Home).” (He was also given a publishing credit, along with Bill Settles, on Memphis Minnie’s recording, “Joe Louis Strut.”) While various researchers have offered suggestions as to Black Bob’s possible identity (musicians Bob Hudson and Bob Robinson have been proposed, among others), no substantial evidence has been found. From what little is known, this much can be inferred: Black Bob was a blues pianist living in Chicago in the mid-1930s who was highly regarded as a player, given the demand for his services on the recordings of top blues artists. With its muscular runs and rippling fills, Black Bob’s blues piano style clearly marks him as an accomplished professional of his day. However, after a burst of session work between 1935 and 1938, Black Bob disappeared.

DAVID BEAUDOUIN

Bibliography

- Larkin
 Hirst, Melvyn. “Who Was Black Bob?” Blues Unlimited 130 (May/August 1978): 18–20.

Discography: DGR

BLACK MAGIC

Dutch record label established as Black Cat Records in Gouda in 1980 by Gerrit Robs, Marcel Vos, and Kees van Wijngaarden. After two reissues from English Decca, by Otis Spann and George Smith, the label name was changed because it was claimed by another company. Recording of original material began with a 1982 album by Andrew Brown, recorded in Chicago by Richard Shurman, who also recorded Lacy Gibson and Fenton Robinson for them. Eddie C. Campbell was recorded in the Netherlands. Marcel Vos left in 1985 to found Double Trouble Records. Albums by Lonnie Brooks and Hip Linkchain and reissues of James Cotton and Walter Horton preceded relocation to Amersfoort in 1987. CD issues began in 1989 with the reissue of the Fenton Robinson album and new recordings by him made on a Dutch tour. New artists recorded included Big Bad Smitty, recorded by Joel Slotnikoff, and Long John Hunter and other Texan artists recorded by Terry Owens. Smokey Smothers and Lee Shot Williams were recorded by Richard Shurman in 1993–1995. After 1998, Fred James produced albums by Johnny Jones, Joe Garner, and others, and also negotiated licenses for a series of reissues of Nashville R&B artists including Earl Gaines.

HOWARD RYE

BLACK NEWSPAPER PRESS

History

The first newspaper written by black reporters and editors for black readers was Freedom's Journal, first published in New York City on March 15, 1827, partly to provide news and information within the immediate community and partly to respond to harsh depictions of blacks in the prevailing white newspapers. Freedom's Journal continued to run for two and half years, renaming itself as The Rights of All in May 1829, then ceasing publication five months later. Other black papers were soon begun, including The Mystery (Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, 1837); The Provincial Freeman (published by Mary Ann Shadd Cary in Windsor, Ontario, 1852), which advocated the migration of blacks from the United States to Canada; The Christian Recorder (an organ of the A.M.E. Church, 1852); and The North Star, edited by Frederick Douglass (1847). It is estimated that some two dozen black newspapers were established before the Civil War. In July 1864, the New Orleans Tribune first appeared three times a week, then it became the first daily black paper that October.

Freedom from slavery, and with it, the freedom of literacy, came to the newly freed slaves upon the end of the Civil War in 1865. By 1900 there were some five hundred black newspapers, and in 1890 the Associated Correspondents of Race Newspapers was founded. The content of these publications continued to combine local black community news with the ongoing news of civil rights, from the initial flush of participation in government, to the withholding of those opportunities from blacks after the Reconstruction era, and the enactment of white segregationist laws across the southern United States in the 1880s and 1890s. One of the bravest reporters of the era was Ida B. Wells, who reported on lynchings in the Memphis Free Speech until the paper's forced closing in 1893.

During the first third of the twentieth century, some 2,600 black newspapers were active, and many of the major black newspapers were established during this time, including:

- Atlanta Daily World, Atlanta, Georgia, 1928
- Baltimore Afro-American, Baltimore, Maryland, 1892
- California Eagle, Los Angeles, California, 1878
- Chicago Defender, Chicago, Illinois, 1905
- Jackson Advocate, Jackson, Mississippi, 1938

- Michigan Chronicle, Detroit, Michigan, 1936
- New Pittsburgh Courier, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, 1907
- New York Amsterdam News, New York City, New York, 1909
- Norfolk Journal & Guide, Norfolk, Virginia, 1900
- St. Louis Argus, St. Louis, Missouri, 1912
- Tri-State Defender, Memphis, Tennessee, 1905.

The importance of these publications grew as black laborers moved to the northern cities in the hopes of better jobs and fairer treatment, and as the middle and elite economic classes developed with black communities. The newspapers contained reports, editorials, advertisements, and announcements that appealed to many different readers, including announcements about jobs, society pages, and ads for a range of products from women's cosmetics to phonograph records. The Associated Negro Press was established by Claude Barnett in 1919, the same year of the "Red Summer" race riots in various cities including Chicago, New York, and Washington, D.C. The black press showed its power in 1929, when the Chicago Whip paper began its "Don't Buy Where You Can't Work" crusade, a theme that was soon taken up by other papers. This action, known as a "Double V" campaign, was repeated in 1942 by the Pittsburgh Courier.

During and after World War II, black reporters began gaining access to federal government press conferences, including Harry S. Alpin of the Atlanta Daily World, who attended White House conferences in 1944, and Louis Lautier of the Negro Newspapers Publishers Association who sat in the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives press galleries.

During the Civil Rights Movement of the 1950s and 1960s, reporters covered the marches, the speeches, the riots, and the legislation. The larger, more established mainstream newspapers began hiring away black writers to report on these social changes, especially when the race riots of the mid- to late 1960s were occurring. This loss of staff, together with decreasing advertising revenues, and the move of readers from inner city to suburbs, led many black newspapers to decline or to close during the 1960s and 1970s. In 1973, the Association of Black Journalists was formed and became the National Association of Black Journalists two years later.

Some of the leading black papers, including the Chicago Defender and the Philadelphia Tribune, managed to survive the lean commercial and circulation years from the 1970s through the 1980s. Since 1990 there has been reported a rise in circulation of black newspapers, especially among older, affluent readers. To retain those readers and win new ones, editors are realizing anew that they have to continue balancing community news, including those from black suburbs, with social activism, especially regarding education and health care.

EDWARD KOMARA

Commentary

The black press has dismissed the blues as an inferior form of expression, urged blacks to move beyond its rituals and “primitive emotion,” and, when not castigating the music, simply ignored it through much of the past century. Yet the influence of the black press on the blues has been so profound that at least one scholar believes it forever changed the music’s essential nature and sound. “Where the church left off in its polemical influence on the blues, the ‘new priest’ of the city picked up,” writes Jon Michael Spencer in his book, Blues and Evil. “The medium of this new Race leader (was) the printer’s ink and press and the editorial column.”

Spencer believes the Chicago Defender and other black-owned newspapers contributed immensely to the most profound change that ever took place in the blues—its evolution from a rural, religion-haunted folk music driven by the unique cosmology of the black experience in the South to an urban, secular, electrified commercial venture obsessed with sex, love, and money. The farther the blues traveled from its roots—a trip promoted and sponsored by the black press—the weaker and less significant became its message, Spencer says.

The black press played an important role in the black diaspora from the South in the early decades of the twentieth century. To Spencer, the press was the “Moses” that writers Arna Bontemps and Jack Conroy claimed in their 1945 book They Seek a City was missing. The book urged its readers to seek “progress” and not to wallow in nostalgia for the countrified, race-obsessed South. These attitudes are reflected in a March 5, 1921, story in the Chicago Defender on a performance by blues pioneer Mamie Smith: “One would imagine from the records that she was of a rough, coarse shouter. To the contrary . . . she rendered her numbers clean and void of all foreign dancing, ‘slapping-the-finger’ acts.” In the same edition, columnist Tony Langston was as impressed with her dress as with her music: “She wears a flock of diamonds that has her lit up like a Polish church on Sunday night.”

Spencer offers Defender columnist Lucius C. Harper as typical of journalists’ attitudes: the blues, Harper wrote in 1938, “excite the primitive emotion in man and arouse his bestiality.”

Yet the advice and warnings were contradicted in the many advertisements for so-called “race records” and blues performances that framed the newspaper columns. The advertisements from Okeh, Paramount, Vocalion, and other companies featured blues performers like Charley Patton, Blind Lemon Jefferson, Ida Cox, Henry Thomas, and Blind Blake and included pictures of the musicians—in some cases the only known likenesses of them—as well as detailed cartoons and excerpts from the songs.

“‘Yellow Dog Blues!’ Hot mamma! How Bessie Smith sings them!” reads an advertisement for Bessie Smith’s latest record in the Chicago Defender on June 20, 1925. “If that jockey boy, standing there where the Yellow Dog meets the Southern, could hear her sing them—he’d hot foot it back to where his shoes feel at home.”

The Chicago Defender, founded in 1905 and arguably the most influential of all black newspapers, did acknowledge the blues in occasional reviews and articles such as W. C. Handy’s essay, “Blues,” which appeared in the August 30, 1919, edition. “I am a Southerner by birth and environment,” Handy wrote, “and it is from the levee camps, the mines, the plantations and other places where the laborer works that these snatches of melody originate.”

Recorded blues is said to have begun on August 10, 1920, with Mamie Smith’s rendition of Perry Bradford’s “Crazy Blues” for Okeh Records in New York. It became a major hit, and Bradford writes in his book, Born with the Blues, that Smith got coverage in the Norfolk Journal and Guide, St. Louis Argus, and the Chicago Defender. Such coverage was the exception.

The record industry suffered during the Great Depression—Okeh Records, for example, went bankrupt—as the buying market dried up. The blues were ignored except for major events such as the death of blues diva Bessie Smith in an automobile accident near Clarksdale, Mississippi, on September 26, 1937. When a car wreck killed blues singer Peetie Wheatstraw in East St. Louis in 1941, however, the local black newspaper failed to cover it.

New blues-oriented record labels like Chess in Chicago and Atlantic in New York appeared after World War II, as did new black-owned magazines like Ebony and Jet, but the blues soon were to be upstaged by rock 'n' roll in the 1950s and soul music in the 1960s.

"The blues artist was the most illiterate of the artists of the time," said Charles W. Tisdale, editor and publisher of Mississippi's largest black newspaper, the Jackson Advocate, in a November 2001 interview. "It's the kind of thing the black middle-class abhorred. Today still the blues are extremely neglected in the black press."

The blues today gets more coverage than in the past, but the coverage often is connected with a local concert by B. B. King or another major musician, or with a death, such as John Lee Hooker's, on June 21, 2001. An article in the black-owned Pittsburgh Courier on December 13, 1995, seemed to certify a final victory for the "progress" seekers of the 1920s and 1930s. "The blues is all white," Lauren Cummings wrote in the Courier. "The blues clubs are havens for whites, and the blues itself has become the music for whites."

The article goes on to quote an anonymous "old-timer" on Memphis's legendary Beale Street who laments how whites have taken over the once-famous blues street as well as the music that made it famous. "Years ago, the blues represented a kind of history book. It mimicked our condition, our despair, our joy and our hopes. . . . It was a music by blacks, for blacks and of blacks. But no longer."

If true, perhaps for the first time ever the black press's lack of attention to the blues could be understood.

JOE ATKINS

Bibliography

- Bontemps, Arna, and Jack Conroy. They Seek a City. Garden City, NY: Doubleday, Doran, 1945.
- Bradford, Perry. Born with the Blues: Perry Bradford's Own Story. New York: Oak Publications, 1965.
- Emery, Michael, and Edwin Emery. The Press and America: An Interpretive History of the Mass Media. Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice Hall, 1992.
- Fitzgerald, Mark. "The Revival of the Black Press in America." Editor and Publisher (November 26, 2004), online version at http://www.editorandpublisher.com/eandp/news/article_display.jsp?vnu_content_id=1000727192 (accessed February 2, 2005).
- Hogan, Lawrence D. A Black National News Service: The Associated Negro Press and Claude Barnett, 1919-1945. London: Associated University Presses, 1984.
- Jones, LeRoi. Blues People: The Negro Experience in White America and the Music That Developed from It. New York: William Morrow, 1963.
- Simmons, Charles A. The African American Press: A History of News Coverage During National Crises, with Special Reference to Four Black Newspapers. Jefferson, NC: McFarland and Company, 1997.

Spencer, Jon Michael. Blues and Evil. Knoxville: The University of Tennessee Press, 1993.

Titon, Jeff Todd. Early Downhome Blues: A Musical and Cultural Analysis. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1979.

The Black Press: Soldiers without Swords (film directed by Stanley Nelson, Half Nelson Productions, 1999). Film website, <http://www.pbs.org/blackpress/index.html> (accessed February 2, 2005) (with timelines and transcripts of the film narration).

BLACK PATTI

Record label of the Chicago Record Company, established around March 1927 by J. Mayo Williams, previously responsible for Paramount's Race series, with Edward Bennett and Fred Gennett as partners. It was named for concert artist Sissieretta Jones, whose sobriquet it was. The fifty-five issues were produced and most were recorded by Gennett. The initial release (8001-20) was advertised in May 1927 and trading apparently ceased in September. The catalog includes highly regarded issues by Long Cleve Reed and Papa Harvey Hull, Blind James Beck, Sam Collins, Jay Bird Coleman (as Rabbits Foot Williams), and a Clara Smith who recorded in St. Paul, Minnesota, who is not to be confused with the Columbia artist. Many Black Patti masters were later released, sometimes pseudonymously, on Gennett's own labels.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

- DGR; Sutton
- Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Wyler, Michael. "The Black Patti Story." Storyville no. 1 (1965): 11-17.
- "More about Black Patti." Storyville no. 4 (1966): 11.
- Tsotsi, Tom, and Pete Whelen. "Black Patti." 78 Quarterly 11 (2001): entire issue.

BLACK RIVER BLUES

(See Straight Alky Blues)

BLACK SACRED MUSIC

Sacred music, including Christian sacred music, has been a fundamental part of African American life. Its core function is the same as any other religious music, celebration of faith in song. Black religious song has two strands. One is sung in church and on religious occasions. The other is performed, as entertainment in venues ranging from concert halls to sidewalks, where performers hope to get coins from passersby.

Both are uniquely African American. In the 1925 “American Negro Spirituals,” black poet and composer James Weldon Johnson said of black American singing: “. . . it is often tantalizing and even exciting to watch a minute fraction of a beat balancing for a slight instance on the bar between two measures and, when it seems almost too late, drop back into its own proper compartment In addition, there are the curious turns and twists and quavers and the intentional striking of notes just a shade off key with which the Negro loves to embellish his songs.” Johnson is talking about singing spirituals, but his description applies equally to blues. Singing and accompaniment techniques and instrumentations are shared in sacred music and blues, many aspects of which were brought to America by slaves, and hence similarities and correspondences between the two types of music are extensive.

Dr. Watts and the Spirituals

It was not until the start of the eighteenth century that churches and missionaries made any real attempt to bring Christianity to America’s growing slave population. Some slave owners opposed these attempts; others used Christianity to advance their own cause by giving their slaves religious instruction biased toward reinforcing their status as chattel. But the spread of Christianity and the concept of black religious music were enormously boosted by the “Great Awakening” religious revival of the 1730s, which spread the hymns of writers including Isaac Watts (1674–1748), an English cleric whose elegant and stirring hymns—“Am I a Soldier of the Cross?” “When I Survey the Wondrous Cross,” “That Awful Day Will Surely Come,” and many others—remain embedded in black church music.

Spirituals evolved as slaves sought their own version of Christianity from that of their owners, at times finding a parallel between the religion’s ultimate reward of Heaven and their desire for freedom. This led to the establishment of what has been called “the invisible church”—services held by slaves without the master’s knowledge. Associated with these were the Bible-based spirituals, which emphasized redemption and salvation. Many were sung in a call-and-response style mirroring African religious practices, and to a certain extent secular work songs. The origin of spirituals is impossible to define, but whether they were created by individuals or honed by the “folk process,” they were the slaves’ creation. Passed down initially in oral tradition, they are a unique body of song—James Weldon Johnson says five to six hundred were created—and remain a core part of black sacred music. Songs such as “Swing Low Sweet Chariot,” “Sometimes I Feel Like a Motherless Child,” and “Give Me That Old-Time Religion” have passed beyond the black tradition to become universally known and performed.

University Groups

After the Civil War, spirituals played a new role and came to wider attention. The initial impetus for this was a financial crisis at the American Missionary Association’s Fisk University in Nashville, Tennessee. Fisk opened in 1866, but by 1870 it was facing bankruptcy. Its white treasurer and choirmaster, George L. White, assembled a group of singers who toured to raise money for the college. Initially their concerts featured standard classical fare, but they soon developed a core repertory of spirituals when they saw audience interest in them. Between 1871 and 1878, the Jubilee Singers raised one hundred fifty thousand dollars for Fisk University by performing spirituals in the United States and subsequently in England, Scotland, Germany, and the Netherlands.

Their success spawned imitators. One of the first was the Hampton Normal and Agricultural Institute of Virginia, which had a troupe by 1873, raising seventy-five thousand dollars from performances in northern cities. From Mississippi, the Utica Normal and Industrial Institute sent fund-raising singers north in 1903. In Alabama, Hampton-educated Booker T. Washington’s Tuskegee Institute also used this fund-raising technique in the early years of the twentieth century, as did the Dinwiddie Colored Quartet from the John A. Dix Industrial School in Dinwiddie, Virginia. The Dinwiddie group was the first college group to record, when it sang six songs for the Victor company in 1902. A later touring Fisk group was recorded in 1909, and the Tuskegee Institute Singers made their first recordings in 1914. Although limited by the technology of acoustic sound recording, the performance style on these recordings suggests that the groups recognized their target audience was white. Songs were carefully arranged and sung in a restrained and formal way. But although the groups are sometimes criticized for over-Europeanizing their material, the style and sound of its African American origins were evident.

The Churches

The African American church was born from white Christians' refusal to integrate their congregations, and many churches remain as one of the most segregated parts of American life. This has been criticized as a barrier to racial integration, but participants see it as preserving a symbol of ethnic identity and as a refuge. The Baptists are the largest and oldest black denomination; their first congregation was founded by slave preacher George Liele (1752–1825) at Silver Bluff, South Carolina. The African Methodist Episcopal (AME) church was founded in 1794 in Philadelphia by Richard Allen (1760–1831) after an altercation over segregation at a white church. Other denominations and groups were established during the nineteenth century and into the twentieth. At what may be called the “formal” end of the black religious spectrum, church services and music were restrained and differed little from those of white congregations. But at the “informal,” perhaps ecstatic end, a distinctively African American style was created, a joyous and extroverted style that is worshipful and celebrates triumphs over adversity.

Singing is an important part of that style. The songs of the early black churches were a fusion of Western music—modified hymns or newly composed lyrics, including spirituals—and African influences, and that has remained the basic pattern. Call-and-response songs between a leader and the congregation were widely used. These included “lining hymns,” a distinctive style in which a leader sings a line and the congregation repeats it, singing slowly and powerfully with elaborate vocal ornamentation and harmonies; it evolved from the practice of proctor and congregation response in Colonial churches.

Until the beginning of the twentieth century, church singing was unaccompanied or accompanied only by an organ. Other instruments were regarded as “worldly.” That changed when Charles Harrison Mason (1866–1961) started the Church of God in Christ, initially with Charles Price Jones (1865–1949), in Lexington, Mississippi, in 1897, then after a theological split with Jones, in 1907 in Memphis. Mason was one of a new wave of Pentecostals, believers in the doctrine of baptism with the Holy Ghost, as described in Acts 2:1-4. Their style of worship was extroverted and vigorous, and Mason wanted his church's music to be the same. To achieve this, he allowed in the church guitarists, brass players, harmonica players, and other instrumentalists frowned on by other denominations, opening and encouraging a common link between sacred music and the newly emerging blues.

Pioneer Gospel Composers

Composing songs to meld the elements of composition, performance, and entertainment that are “gospel” was pioneered by Charles Albert Tindley (ca. 1851–1933), pastor of what came to be known as Tindley Temple United Methodist Church in Philadelphia. From 1901, Tindley published more than forty-five songs, many of which have become gospel standards. Among the best known are “Go Wash in the Beautiful Stream” and “What Are They Doing in Heaven” (1901), “We'll Understand It Better By and By,” “Stand By Me,” “The Storm Is Passing Over” (1905), and “(Take Your Burden to the Lord and) Leave It There” (1916).

In Memphis, Lucie E. Campbell (1885–1963) wrote approximately one hundred songs. One of her first was “Something Within” (1919), which became a sacred standard. Campbell was appointed music director of the Baptist Training Union Congress in 1916, and her influence spread through her writing of a new song each year for the choir at the National Baptist Convention. These songs traveled from the convention to churches all over the United States. Among her compositions are “The King's Highway” (1923), “Is He Yours” (1933), “Touch Me Lord Jesus” (1941), and “Jesus Gave Me Water” (1946).

Thomas Andrew Dorsey (1899–1993), more than any other religious songwriter, narrowed the gap between sacred music and blues. Dorsey was raised in a religious home, but as his musical talent developed, he turned to blues and jazz. He moved from Atlanta to Chicago as a blues musician, but in 1920 became director of music at the New Hope Baptist Church and wrote his first sacred song, “If I Don't Get There.” Soon after, the prospect of steady-paying work brought him back into jazz and he remained a secular performer until 1928, when he rejoined the church.

During that period, Dorsey lived a double life until 1932, when he committed himself completely to religion. Until then, he was writing and trying to sell gospel songs; he was also “Georgia Tom,” a leader in the double entendre blues style later known as “hokum.” His gospel gift was his ability to transfer blues and secular techniques to religious song. He used eloquent but simple language, and his melodies were engaging. Many of the more than five hundred songs he wrote have become so well known that they are assumed to be “traditional.” Among them are “Precious Lord,” “Remember Me,” “The Old Ship of Zion,” “Peace in the Valley,” “If You See My Savior,” and “Live the Life I Sing About in My Song.”

The Gospel Evangelists

The affinity between blues and gospel is evident in the grassroots duo performers such as the “gospel (or guitar) evangelists.” Their songs were performance pieces, and their singing and playing was looser than formal church music, closer to blues in sound although not in lyric content. The playing of blind Texas pianist Arizona Dranes (1894–1963) appeared to owe much to barrelhouse styles, but she was a major force in Church of God in Christ music. Blind Willie Johnson (1897–1945), also from Texas, was a master of the slide or “bottleneck” guitar style he used to accompany his strong singing. From the Carolinas came Blind Gary Davis (1896–1972), a dazzling guitarist who was a blues player until his conversion in the mid-1930s. Reverend Edward W. Clayborn, a biographical blank but thought to be from Alabama, played a clear and agile steel guitar style while singing standards and self-composed homilies. Another Carolina artist was guitarist and singer Blind Joe (or Joel) Taggart, born probably in the 1890s; from Texas came Washington Phillips who accompanied his mainly homiletic songs on a zither-like instrument, either a dulcicola—a keyboard mounted on a zither-style body—or an instrument of his own making.

The most successful of the later guitar evangelists was Sister Rosetta Tharpe (1915–1973) whose full-throated singing and dexterous guitar playing fitted everywhere from solo performances to performances with Lucky Millinder and His Orchestra in the 1940s. Even more spectacular in guitar style was Reverend Utah Smith (dates unknown), a Church of God in Christ minister from Shreveport, Louisiana, who was active from the 1920s until the 1950s. In Los Angeles, Reverend Lonnie Farris (1924–1988) sang and played his electric steel guitar on idiosyncratic mid-1960s recordings, mainly self-issued. Sister Ola Mae (O. M.) Terrell (1911–?) from Georgia played a slashing slide guitar style behind her spirited singing. Elder Roma Wilson (b. 1910) recorded four songs around 1952 to the accompaniment of four harmonicas, played by him and three of his sons, then enjoyed a revival to his career nearly forty years later.

Closely aligned with these performers in musical style are the blues singers who also performed sacred material. Lemon Jefferson, Charley Patton, Skip James, John Hurt, Barbecue Bob, Willie McTell, Joshua White, Sam Collins, Blind Boy Fuller, and Brownie McGhee are among those in this category. Most came from the earlier blues years when religion was a more pervasive part of black life, but later singers such as T-Bone Walker, B. B. King, and Muddy Waters have acknowledged the influence of church music. Some blues singers turned to religion; among them are Ishmon Bracey, Rubin Lacey, Robert Wilkins, Walter Davis, and Dwight “Gatemouth” Brown. Two of the greatest Mississippi singers, Son House and Charley Patton, had lifelong inner struggles between blues and religion, and both at times were preachers. In his 1960s concerts, House sometimes included a homily on the difficulty of “straddling the fence” between God and the Devil.

Quartets

Quartets are religious performing artists, and a core part of gospel music. Among the earliest formal quartets were those within university groups, such as the aforementioned Fisk Jubilee Singers and the Hampton University Quartet. The success of the university groups drew religious music to the attention of minstrel and vaudeville shows, and by the 1890s many featured black “jubilee” groups. Outside these extremes were amateur community quartets, which drew from the musical expertise of the university groups and the entertainment skills of the minstrel groups to produce the performance style that remains the template of gospel quartet.

Early quartets mixed sacred and secular, but in the 1920s sacred material came to the fore. Leading groups from the 1920s and 1930s included the Norfolk Jubilee Quartet (originally the Norfolk Jazz Quartet); the Heavenly Gospel Singers, formed in Detroit but based in South Carolina from 1936; and Mitchell’s Christian Singers from Kinston, North Carolina. These groups sang in “jubilee” style, with tight arrangements for lead, tenor, baritone, and bass voices. On stage, they sang “flat-footed,” with little movement or overt emotionalism. Their repertoire was a mix of spirituals, religious standards, and self-composed material, often based on Bible stories. The best-known jubilee group was the Golden Gate Quartet, formed in 1934 in Norfolk, Virginia, which brought a new level of secular professionalism to gospel, in dress and presentation as well as its intricate song arrangements.

From the late 1940s, the “hard” style of emotional and forceful singing and extravagant on-stage movement replaced the restraint of the jubilee singers. Groups used more than one lead singer, passing the lead from one to the other as the tempo and volume of a song intensified. This style was pioneered by Rebert H. Harris (1916–2000), lead singer of the Soul Stirrers, formed in Texas in 1934 and a leader in the new style, especially once the charismatic Sam Cooke (1931–1964) took over from Harris in 1951.

Other leading groups were the Blind Boys of Mississippi, whose lead singer, Archie Brownlee (1925–1960), was recognized as gospel’s most forceful lead singer, the Swan Silvertones, the Dixie Hummingbirds, the Pilgrim Travelers, the Spirit of Memphis and the Sensational Nightingales, whose lead, Julius “June” Cheeks (1929–1981) was considered as strong a lead singer as Brownlee.

Quartets of the 1920s and 1930s generally sang unaccompanied, but by the 1940s, groups started using a guitar to provide pitch and rhythm. By the mid-1960s, most had several instruments—one or two electric guitars, a bass, drums, and often an organ. New groups emerged, including the Supreme Angels, the Mighty Clouds of Joy, the Gospel Keynotes, the Gospelairees of Dayton, Ohio, the Jackson South-ernaires, and the Violinaires. The singing remained the focal point of the performance, but the expanded accompaniments changed the vocal dynamics, most significantly by replacing bass singers with a double bass or electric bass guitar. This innovation began in 1959 with the Pilgrim Jubilees of Chicago, who used blues doyen Willie Dixon on double bass to cover for their bass singer’s unexpected absence from a recording session.

The 1960s is also the time of gospel’s most overt influence on secular pop music. Soul music in particular owes its performance style and many of its top singers to quartets. The best-known defector from gospel to soul is Sam Cooke from the Soul Stirrers; others include Wilson Pickett from the Violinaires, Lou Rawls from the Pilgrim Travelers, O. V. Wright and Joe Hinton from the Spirit of Memphis, Roscoe Robinson from the Blind Boys of Mississippi, Otis Clay from the Gospel Songbirds, and James Carr from the Jubilee Hummingbirds. Other great singers who made this move include Aretha Franklin, Della Reese, Mavis Staples, Al Green, and Ray Charles.

Other Stylists

In its heyday, “quartet” was exclusively a male style. But several female groups performed in a style closely enough related to the male groups that in later years they would be retrospectively recognized as “quartet.” A few modeled themselves directly on quartets; others used a narrower three-part harmony range, but performed in the intense style of the male groups. A leader was the Caravans, from Chicago, formed in 1952. Led by Albertina Walker (b. 1930), the Caravans quickly became a force, especially when they were joined by Bessie Griffin (1927–1990), from

New Orleans, who later became a prominent soloist. Other ex-Caravan soloists include Dorothy Norwood (b. 1930), Shirley Caesar (b. 1938), and Inez Andrews (b. 1929). Other successful female groups were the Original Gospel Harmonettes from Alabama, led by Dorothy Love Coates (1928–2002), and from Philadelphia the hard-driving Davis Sisters and the Angelic Gospel Singers.

Also from Philadelphia was one of the most flamboyant groups, Clara Ward and the Ward Singers, known for the ostentation of their stage dress and presentation as much as for their singing. The group was led by Clara Ward (1924–1973), and organized by her mother, Gertrude (1901–1981). The Wards, too, attracted quality singers, including Marion Williams (1927–1994), who in 1958 formed the Stars of Faith from an exodus of Ward Singers upset at disparities between their income and that of the Wards. Williams later became one of gospel’s best-known soloists.

Gospel’s first and still biggest international star was Mahalia Jackson (1911–1972), whose early influences included blues singers Bessie Smith and Gertrude “Ma” Rainey. Jackson was born in New Orleans and went to Chicago in 1927. In 1930, she joined forces with Thomas A. Dorsey, promoting his songs by singing them at concerts. From the late 1940s, Jackson became a recording star, first for the Apollo label in New York, then for the mainstream giant Columbia.

From St. Louis, Missouri, came “Mother” Willie Mae Ford Smith (1904–1994), who started singing with her sisters in a quartet-styled group. She went to Chicago in 1932, also working with Dorsey. Smith made few recordings, but was influential through her singing and through her central role in the National Convention of Gospel Choirs and Chorus, which Dorsey established in 1932. One singer heavily influenced by Smith and Mahalia Jackson was Brother Joe May (1912–1972), who toured and recorded as “the Thunderbolt of the Middle West.” May, in turn, influenced Reverence Cleophus Robinson (1932–1998).

Alex Bradford (1927–1978) was from Alabama, but entered professional gospel music in Chicago as secretary and occasional pianist to Mahalia Jackson. In 1953 he and his Bradford Specials recorded his best-known composition, “Too Close.” For nearly twenty years, Bradford was minister of music for the Abyssinian Baptist Church in Newark, New Jersey, which had one of the leading choirs, and in 1961, he and Marion Williams headed the cast of Black Nativity, a gospel musical which ran on Broadway and toured the United States and Europe.

Choirs

Every church has at least one choir, but their role in gospel music, outside the churches, was limited until the latter part of the twentieth century. Early exceptions were the Voices of Victory, organized in 1937 by Glen T. Settle (1895–1952) in Cleveland, Ohio; the choir of First Church of Deliverance in Chicago under director Ralph Goodpastor (1923–1996); and the St. Paul Baptist Church Choir of Los Angeles under director and soloist J. Earl Hines (1916–1960). The Voices of Victory and the St. Paul Choir were extensively recorded; the Chicago choir made some recordings, including an early 1960s album behind Nat “King” Cole, but was best known for its Sunday night radio broadcasts.

The real growth in choirs came after James Cleveland (1931–1991) organized the Gospel Music Workshop of America (GMWA). Cleveland, a pianist, singer, and composer, had one of the biggest choir hits in 1963, when he and the Angelic Choir of the First Baptist Church in Nutley, New Jersey, recorded W. Herbert Brewster’s 1949 composition “Peace Be Still.” In 1968, he organized the GMWA, which holds its convention in a different American city each year. The GMWA later added a quartet division, but its convention is effectively a gathering of choirs. One side effect was a proliferation of gospel choirs not necessarily affiliated with one church. The best of these “community” choirs—O’Landa Draper’s Associates from Memphis, the Georgia Mass Choir, the Mississippi Mass Choir, and a few others—were able to overcome the problems associated with organizing a large group of people and function as semicommercial enterprises, making recordings and concert tours.

Changing Times

In the late 1960s, gospel music began a shift that weakened its musical links with blues, but strengthened its similarities with mainstream popular music. Several factors contributed, from the use of electronic instruments that enabled lush but artificial brass-and-strings arrangements to the desire of artists to appeal beyond the black gospel market. One of the earliest manifestations of this was “Oh Happy Day” by the Edwin Hawkins Singers, originally the Northern California State Youth Choir of the Church of God in Christ, directed by Hawkins (b. 1943). The song, an up-tempo working of an old hymn, became a surprise international hit. The impact of the Hawkins Singers on the wider market was fleeting, but they opened the way for a more modern choir style. Among the leading arrangers in this style was Andrae Crouch (b. 1942) who typified the new generation. He was firmly rooted in the Church of God in Christ, but he sang backup for pop stars, including Michael Jackson and Madonna.

Other popular choirs mixing gospel with secular approaches included John P. Kee’s New Life Community Choir, formed in 1981; the Thompson Community Singers, founded in 1948 but achieving their greatest popularity under Reverend Milton Brunson from the 1970s; and God’s Property, formed by Kirk Franklin in 1992. Where records by traditional gospel artists might sell in the tens of thousands, some of these groups achieved their “crossover” goal so successfully that they had sales of more than one million. To appeal to the wider audience, they and other artists used the rhythms and sounds of black popular music, embracing soul, disco and hip-hop/rap. They also often softened the religious message of their songs, using a style called “inspirational,” which avoids overt references to God and Jesus.

Soloists and other groups also followed this trend, led by the ten-child Winans Family of Detroit, which in various combinations had a substantial influence on crossover gospel in the 1980s. Their use of strong rhythms, soul vocal styles, and “inspirational” lyrics put gospel music on pop radio stations and led many other artists to follow their example. The use of more elaborate accompaniments also changed the nature of quartet singing. Traditionally, quartet accompaniments were secondary to the lyrics, but more elaborate instrumentations pushed the backings up closer to the vocals. Harmony ranges also changed, becoming higher, and the voices coming closer in pitch.

But as some artists performed before thousands in auditoriums, others continued to work the “gospel highway,” performing traditional gospel music in churches and school halls. Albertina Walker, Shirley Caesar, and Dorothy Norwood were still active after 2000, as were, among quartets, the Sensational Nightingales, the Pilgrim Jubilees and the Swanee Quintet. Two of the most popular quartets of the 1990s and beyond were the Canton Spirituals and Lee Williams and the Spiritual QCs. Although both updated their sound, the Canton Spirituals were formed in 1946, and the QCs in 1964.

A dramatic fusion of modern and traditional styles achieved some fame from the mid-1990s. “Sacred steel” came from two small House of God subdenominations in Florida that used the electric steel guitar as their main instrument in church. The original influence appears to have been Willie Eason (b. 1921), but others quickly adapted it, and although House of God steel guitarists were not recorded until the 1990s, their line came from the 1930s. The interest generated by the Arhoolie record label's "sacred steel" issues gave the style a secular prominence it does not have in the religious environment, but it is a striking demonstration of the individualism of black sacred music.

Mahalia Jackson, perhaps the preeminent gospel singer of the twentieth century. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

ALAN R. YOUNG

Bibliography

- Allen, Ray. Singing in the Spirit: African-American Sacred Quartets in New York City. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1991.
- Boyer, Horace Clarence. How Sweet the Sound: The Golden Age of Gospel. Washington, DC: Elliott & Clark, 1995.
- Broughton, Viv. Black Gospel: An Illustrated History of the Gospel Sound. Poole, England: Blandford House, 1985.
- Cone, James H. The Spirituals and the Blues. New York: Seabury Press, 1972.
- Epstein, Dena. Sinful Tunes and Spirituals: Black Folk Music to the Civil War. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.
- Harris, Michael W. The Rise of Gospel Blues: The Music of Thomas Andrew Dorsey in the Urban Church. New York: Oxford University Press, 1992.
- Heilbut, Anthony. The Gospel Sound: Good News and Bad Times. 5th ed. New York: Limelight Editions, 1975.
- Johnson, Bernice Reagon, ed. We'll Understand It Better By and By: Pioneering African-American Gospel Composers. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1992.
- Johnson, James Weldon, and J. Rosamond Johnson. American Negro Spirituals. Vols. 1 (1925) and 2 (1926). Originally Viking Press; reprinted in one volume by Da Capo, New York (n.d.).
- Lornell, Kip. Happy in the Service of the Lord: Afro-American Gospel Quartets in Memphis. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1988. Revised ed., Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1995.
- Lovell, John, Jr. Black Song: The Forge and the Flame. New York/London: Macmillan, 1972.
- Oliver, Paul. Songsters and Saints. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988.
- Walker, Wyatt Tee. Somebody's Calling My Name. Valley Forge, PA: Judson Press, 1979.
- Ward, Andrew. Dark Midnight When I Rise: The Story of the [Fisk] Jubilee Singers. New York: Farrar Strauss and Giroux, 2000.
- Young, Alan. Woke Me Up This Morning: Black Gospel Singers and the Gospel Life. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997.
- . The Pilgrim Jubilees. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2001.
- Zolten, Jerry. Great God A' Mighty: The Dixie Hummingbirds. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

BLACK SWAN RECORDS

Record label founded by impresario Harry Pace, former business partner of W. C. Handy, early in 1921. Black Swan was the first successful record label owned and entirely staffed by African Americans. The company was located in Harlem, first at 257 W.

138th Street, then at 2289 7th Avenue. While the preponderance of the label's records featured classical music or pop fare performed exclusively by black artists, the company also released some important blues and jazz records. Its best seller was the Ethel Waters record of "Down Home Blues." Later recordings by Waters, Trixie Smith, Alberta Hunter, Katie Crippen, and other blues singers remained the label's biggest sellers throughout its existence. Pace leased the Black Swan masters to Paramount Records in 1924. Paramount rereleased the records on its Race series, and Pace left the music business.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

Bibliography

- Rust, Brian. Jazz Records 1897–1942. 4th ed. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington House, 1978.
- Thygesen, Helga, Mark Berresford, and Russ Shor. Black Swan: The Record Label of the Harlem Renaissance. Nottingham, UK: VJM, 1996.

Selected Recordings

Crippen, Katie

"Blind Man's Blues" and Play 'Em for Mama, Sing 'Em for Me" (ca. March 1921, Black Swan 2003); "That's My Cup Blues" and "When It's Too Late (You're Gonna Miss Me Daddy)" (ca. June 1921, Black Swan 2018).

Hunter, Alberta

"How Long Sweet Daddy, How Long" and "Bring Back the Joys" (ca. May 1921, Black Swan 2008, New York); "He's a Darned Good Man (To Have Hanging Around)" and "Someday, Sweetheart" (ca. May 1921, Black Swan 2019, New York).

Smith, Trixie

"Desperate Blues" and "Trixie's Blues" (September 1921, Black Swan 2039, New York); "You Missed a Good Woman When You Picked All Over Me" and "Long Lost Weary Blues" (ca. November 1921, Black Swan 2044, New York); "He May Be Your Man (But He Comes to See Me Sometimes)" and "Pensacola Blues" (ca. April 1922, Black Swan 14144, Long Island City); "Give Me That Old Slow Drag" and "My Man Rocks Me (With One Steady Roll)" (ca. September 1922, Black Swan 14127, Long Island City); "I'm Through with You (As I Can Be)" and "Take It Daddy, It's All Yours" (ca. October 1922, Black Swan 14132, Long Island City); "Log Cabin Blues" and "Voodoo Blues" (ca. March 1923, Black Swan 14142, Long Island City); "Tired of Waitin' Blues" and "Triflin' Blues" (ca. March 1923, Black Swan 14149, Long Island City).

Waters, Ethel

"Oh Daddy" and "Down Home Blues" (April/May 1921, Black Swan 2010, New York); "One Man Nan" and "There'll Be Some Changes Made" (ca. August 1921, Black Swan 2021, New York); "Dying with the Blues"

BLACK SWAN RECORDS

(ca. August 1921, Black Swan 2038, New York); “Georgia Blues” (ca. May 1922, Black Swan 14120, Long Island City); “Memphis Man” and “Midnight Blues” (ca. March 1923, Black Swan 14146, Long Island City); “You Can’t Do What My Last Man Did” (ca. June 1923, Black Swan 14151, Long Island City).

See also Delaney, Thomas Henry “Tom”; Down Home Blues; Handy, William Christopher “W. C.”; Hunter, Alberta; Smith, Trixie; Waters, Ethel

BLACK TOP

Record label (New Orleans, founded 1981; out of business 2002). From the late 1980s through the mid- to late 1990s, Black Top Records was one of the very best blues labels going, with a broad artist roster that took in straight-ahead blues, soul, and R&B. Whether due to bad luck or simply a poor business climate, Black Top’s demise was a serious loss for blues listeners.

Founded by blues fans and brothers Hammond and Nauman Scott, the label’s first release was “Talk to You by Hand” by Anson Funderburgh and the Rockets. Funderburgh would remain a staple of the Black Top stable for the next sixteen years, releasing seven more albums on the label.

The label quickly began recording some of the brothers’ favorite musicians. Through the years, Black Top’s 360-plus title catalog has featured artists such as Snooks Eaglin, Mike Morgan, Rod Piazza, James Harman, Ronnie Earl, Grady Gaines, and Earl King, among many others.

In 1990, a contact of Hammond Scott rediscovered guitarist Robert Ward, who had played guitar behind Wilson Pickett and the Falcons on their huge 1962 hit, “I Found a Love.” Ward recorded a highly regarded (and nicely selling) comeback album for Black Top, Fear No Evil, which propelled him back to the top rank of the blues festival circuit.

By the early 1990s, Black Top had signed a national distribution deal with Rounder Records, which gave the label access to most retail outlets. In the late 1990s, a new distribution was struck with Alligator, giving Black Top similar reach.

Nauman Scott passed away on January 8, 2002, at the age of fifty-six. The label apparently went out of business the same year, and as of summer 2004, most of the Black Top catalog was apparently out of print.

JIM TRAGESER

Selected Recordings

Black Top Blues-A-Rama, Vol. 1 (1988, BT-1044; compilation); Robert Ward, Fear No Evil (1990, BT-1063); Ronnie Earl, Peace of Mind (1990, BT-1060); Earl King, Hard River to Cross (1993, BT-1090).

BLACKWELL, OTIS

b. 2 February 1932; Brooklyn, NY
d. 6 May 2002; Nashville, TN

Pianist, singer, composer. Otis Blackwell grew up in Brooklyn during the 1930s and 1940s, learning the piano and listening to country and western and R&B records on the radio. After winning an amateur night competition at the Apollo Theatre as a teen, Blackwell met blues shouter and composer Doc Pomus and was encouraged to pursue his interest in writing songs. Blackwell went on to compose more than a thousand songs to be recorded by Elvis Presley, Jerry Lee Lewis, Ray Charles, Little Willie John, Peggy Lee, Dee Clark, Otis Redding, James Taylor, Billy Joel, The Who, and many others, notching sales of more than 185 million copies. Some were written under the pseudonym John Davenport.

Blackwell’s first big break came at the end of 1955 when he sold six songs to be considered for recording by Elvis Presley under his new association with RCA Victor. The songwriter was known for preparing meticulous demos of his tunes, and Presley carefully followed Blackwell’s template in recording smash hit versions of “Don’t Be Cruel” and “All Shook Up.” Blackwell’s contract with Presley’s publishers allowed Elvis to be credited as co-composer on the tunes he cut, but the arrangement awarded Blackwell with immediate access to an immense audience.

Otis Blackwell’s own recordings, starting with “Daddy Rollin’ Stone” in 1953, failed to move record buyers, but he continued to place his songs with popular artists and enjoyed big hits with “Fever” (Little Willie John, Peggy Lee), “Breathless,” and “Great Balls of Fire” (Jerry Lee Lewis), among many others.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin

Discography: AMG; LSFP

BLACKWELL, ROBERT “BUMPS”

b. Robert Blackwell, 23 May 1918; Seattle, WA
d. 9 March 1985; Hacienda Heights, CA

Bumps Blackwell led jazz and R&B bands in Seattle before moving to Los Angeles as head of A&R at Specialty Records, producing classic recordings by Little Richard, Lloyd Price, Guitar Slim, Clifton Chenier, and Sam Cooke.

He worked as composer, arranger, or producer with a number of artists, including Quincy Jones, Ray Charles, Herb Alpert, Lou Adler, Little Richard, Lloyd Price, Guitar Slim, Clifton Chenier, Sam Cooke, Art Neville, Ike and Tina Turner, Five Blind Boys of Alabama, and Bob Dylan.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography

“Tutti Frutti,” “Long Tall Sally,” “Rip It Up,” “Ready Teddy,” “Good Golly Miss Molly” (Little Richard); “You Send Me” (Sam Cooke); “Shot of Love” (Bob Dylan).

BLACKWELL, SCRAPPER

b. Francis Hillman Blackwell, 21 February 1903; Syracuse, SC

d. 7 October 1962; Indianapolis, IN

Blues singer and guitarist. Francis Hillman Blackwell was born in South Carolina in 1903 of Cherokee Indian descent. His grandmother nicknamed him “Scrapper.” His father played the fiddle and all sixteen children played music. When he was three the family moved to Indianapolis. He built himself a cigar-box guitar and he instinctively knew how to play it. Scrapper later made money selling moonshine, his homemade corn whiskey. In June 1928 Scrapper was enticed to make his very first recordings in a makeshift recording studio in Indianapolis. “Kokomo Blues,” his first recorded song, was later turned into Kokomo Arnold’s “Old Kokomo Blues” and Robert Johnson’s “Sweet Home Chicago.” With his newfound partner, blues pianist Leroy Carr, Scrapper recorded a million seller: “How Long How Long Blues.” The novel piano–guitar duet proved to be an instant success and it led the way for other famous duos like Georgia Tom–Tampa Red and Charlie Spand–Blind Blake. Scrapper earned so much money with his hit that he stopped his bootleg business. Blackwell made a great many recordings with Leroy Carr, for Vocalion from 1928 to 1934 and for Bluebird in 1935.

Carr’s very last recording was the prophetic “Six Cold Feet in the Ground.” Leroy Carr died on April 29, 1935, of alcohol abuse. Blackwell was heartbroken and recorded a moving tribute entitled “My Old Pal,” with Dot Rice replacing Leroy on the piano stool. After 1935 Blackwell worked as a guitarist only occasionally. In 1958 he was rediscovered by Art Rosenbaum. He made some postwar recordings from 1958 to 1961 that were issued on the Flyright, Collector, Document, 77, and Bluesville labels. He also accompanied singer/guitarist Brooks Berry on her Bluesville album. In these last few years he played some concerts for the Indiana Jazz Club. In 1962 Francis Blackwell was shot in the chest by a man called Robert Beam and died the next day.

Blackwell was equally impressive in an accompanying role as well as in solo performances. Important blues guitarists like T-Bone Walker and Johnny Shines have given Scrapper due credit for the enormous influence he had on them. Blackwell’s innovative style formed a bridge between rural and urban blues.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR; LSFP

BLACKWELL, WILLIE “61”

b. 25 December 1905; TN

d. 1972; Detroit, MI (?)

As a singer and guitarist Blackwell was not in the same league as his friends Baby Boy Warren and Robert Jr. Lockwood, but the vivid, imaginative vocabulary of his blues compositions made them appealing to contemporaries like Jazz Gillum and Sunnyland Slim, who got “Johnson Machine Gun” from him.

TONY RUSSELL

Discography: DGR

See also Warren, Robert Henry “Baby Boy”

BLAKE, CICERO

b. 20 February 1938; Jackson, MS

Chicago hard soul and blues singer. Blake began his career in 1952 in a doo-wop group, the Goldentones (who later became the Kool Gents), and from 1959 to 1962, he sang in the Sonny Thompson revue. During 1961–1967, Blake recorded many fine singles in the hard soul style for independent producer Leo Austell, on such labels as Renee, Success, Brainstorm, Tower, and Capitol. Two of his most notable were “Sad Feeling” (1964) and “Love Is Like a Boomerang” (1975). As classic soul music disappeared in the late 1970s, Blake began performing in the soul-blues style that was becoming popular in the South. Under the name Corey Blake, he achieved his first national hit with “Dip My Dipper” (1978), a blues song recorded in the South. During the 1980s Blake established himself on the blues club and festival circuit and in the Southern radio market. His albums have included Too Hip to Be Happy (1988, Valley Vue), Just One of Those Things (1993, Valley Vue), Wives Night Out (1996, Ace), and Stand by Me (1998, Ace).

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. “The Cicero Blake Story.” Goldmine (October 1981): 189.

BLAND, BOBBY “BLUE”

b. Robert Calvin Brooks, 27 January 1930; Rosemark, TN

A prolific and enduring R&B performer, Bobby “Blue” Bland’s style is of the urban Chicago school, with strong, clearly defined links to the delta. He was also influenced by the blues culture of Houston, Texas.

Bland grew up in rural Tennessee and his family moved to Memphis in 1947. He began his career as a local performer in Memphis gospel groups including the Miniatures, where he adapted some of his vocal stylings from Reverence C. L. Franklin, father of the R&B immortal, Aretha Franklin. Bland began his secular performances at the Palace Theater in Memphis by competing in talent contests hosted by blues great Rufus Thomas.

His career took a dramatic upturn when he became an early member of B. B. King and the Beale Street Boys, a seminal group that also included Johnny Ace on piano, Roscoe Gordon, Earl Forest on drums, Junior Parker, and Billy Duncan on saxophone. The Beale Streeters were often referred to as the best band in Memphis during that period.

In 1951, Bland recorded two numbers for Chess Records, produced by Sam Phillips. In 1952, Ike Turner produced four more numbers for the Modern label. In late 1952, Bland signed with Don Robey’s Duke label. His old Beale Street colleagues, especially Johnny Ace, were enjoying local and regional success. In 1956, Bland toured with Little Junior Parker, where he often functioned as driver and valet, as well as performer. He gained valuable experience, honed his raw juke-joint style, and finally found individual success with “Farther Up the Road” in 1957 and “Little Boy Blue” in 1958, which cracked the U.S. R&B top ten charts.

By the early 1960s, Bland struck gold with back-to-back hits like, “Cry, Cry, Cry,” “I Pity the Fool,” and “Turn on Your Love Light.” The release of Two Steps from the Blues in 1961 brought Bland the fame and success he had long sought. The album went on to be one of the great R&B standards and remains in print today.

Several hit albums followed including his live Here’s the Man!! in 1962. His style changed during this period with an increased emphasis on the velvety smooth delivery of blues crooners like Jesse Belvin and Jimmie Witherspoon.

Bland toured almost constantly during the period from 1960 to 1968, often with his own band. He had an impressive forty-five charted R&B hits on the Duke label during that period and played to eager fans all over the world. However, his success took a downturn beginning in 1966.

In 1968, after constant cutbacks and losses in the preceding two years, Bland was forced to break up his touring band. When Bland decided to cut his losses, one of the unfortunate results was the loss of his relationship with the great Joe Scott, his bandleader and arranger since the early Duke days. Scott had penned many of Bland’s classic blues releases and had been a key contributor to Bland’s successes at Duke. Bland became depressed and, ultimately, alcohol dependent during these tough times.

He recovered and, in 1971, was able to jump-start his career when Duke was sold to ABC Records Group. His ABC releases of His California Album and Dreamer restored his confidence and sold moderately well. Bland attempted disco without much success, but his 1983 release of Here We Go Again put Bland back on the charts.

In 1985, Bland moved to Malaco Records, a more traditional southern label, and his career shifted into high gear. Seasoned by the struggles of life and the ups and downs of his career, Bland had matured into a veteran blues superstar. He was a performer who had lost little of the R&B excitement of his early days while adding the poise and delivery that come from an intimate understanding of the art form.

Bobby “Blue” Bland performs at the Sunflower Blues Festival, Clarksdale, Mississippi, August 2002. (Photo by Gene Tomko)

He dazzled audiences with the same electricity that drew them since the early 1950s.

He has received dozens of awards during his outstanding career including the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences Lifetime Achievement Award and the Blues Foundation’s Lifetime Achievement Award.

TOM FISHER

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Giddins, Gary. “Bobby Blue Bland Meets the White Folks.”
In Riding on a Blue Note, pp. 39–47. New York: Oxford University Press, 1981.
Guralnick, Peter. “Bobby Bland: Little Boy Blue.” *Living
Blues* no. 39 (July/August 1978): 8–16.
O’Neal, Jim, and Amy O’Neal. “Bobby Bland!: On Stage.”
Living Blues no. 4 (Winter 1970/1971): 10–18.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

- “Crying” (1952, Chess 1489); Barefoot Rock and I Got You (1960, Duke DLP-72; with Junior Parker); Two Steps from the Blues (1961, Duke DLPS-74); Here’s the Man!!
(1962, Duke DLPS-75); Call on Me (1963, Duke

- DLPS-77); Spotlighting the Man (1967, Duke DLPS-89);
His California Album (1973, Dunhill DSX-50163); Dreamer (1974, Dunhill DSX-50169); Together for the First Time—Live (1974, Dunhill DSX-50190; with B. B.
King); Foolin’ with the Blues (1983, Charly CRB-1049); Members Only (1985, Malaco 7429); After All (1986, Malaco 7439); Midnight Run (1989, Malaco 7450); Sad Street (1995, Malaco 7478); Live on Beale Street (1998, Malaco 7489).

BLANKS, BIRLEANNA

- b. 18 February 1889; IA
d. 12 August 1968; New York, NY

Singer who recorded two songs for Paramount in 1923 with Fletcher Henderson accompanying at piano. Her entertainment career was in singing and dancing in revues and theaters, usually with her sister Arsecola Blanks. She left show business around 1928, and worked outside of music in New York City.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

BLAYLOCK, TRAVIS “HARMONICA SLIM”

b. 21 December 1934; Douglassville, TX

Singer and harmonica player active in Los Angeles, California. His early career through the late 1940s was as part of the Sunny South Gospel Singers in Texarkana, Texas. Around 1949 he moved to Los Angeles, eventually working dates with Lowell Fulson, Percy Mayfield, T-Bone Walker, and others. In 1969 he recorded for Bluestime label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris

Discography: LSFP

BLIND BLAKE

Flourished 1926–1932

Blind Blake was the name used by Arthur Blake (or perhaps Arthur Phelps) to record eighty-four titles and numerous accompaniments for Paramount records between 1926 and 1932. He identifies himself as Arthur Blake in a 1929 duet with “Papa” Charlie Jackson, copyrighted nineteen songs under that name, and recorded two instrumentals as Blind Arthur.

Blake was an itinerant musician working throughout Georgia, Florida, and Ohio before settling in Chicago in the early 1920s. He recorded for Paramount in 1926 and soon became a rival to Blind Lemon Jefferson, Paramount’s best-selling country blues singer. He also acted as a house guitarist, providing accompaniments to artists ranging from Gus Cannon and Charlie Jackson to Ma Rainey and Irene Scruggs.

During his six years with Paramount, he recorded a wide range of material, from desolate blues to ragtime dances of unparalleled inventiveness and elegance to jolly hokum numbers, vaudeville, minstrel show material, and even a Victorian music hall favorite. But for modern listeners, it is his truly prodigious guitar technique that still thrills and amazes—the long fluid runs, the clever use of double and stop time, the ornate decoration, and the way he turned the most banal material into something worthwhile. Of all the really great blues guitarists—William Moore, Willie Walker, Gary Davis—it is Blake who remains a major influence on modern musicians of all kinds.

Blake may have had some links with the Georgia Sea Islands, judging by the extraordinary “Southern Rag” (1927). It is a dazzling instrumental in its own right but Blake speaks effortlessly in the dialect of the islands and plays an African rhythm in a demonstration of what he calls “Geechie music.” He recorded one long, monotonous set of low-key, pessimistic songs in 1928, but a year later returned for some of his finest sides in duet with pianist Charlie Spand. The songs included “Hastings Street,” a commercial for the good times to be found in Detroit’s black areas, and the wonderfully played “Diddie Wa Diddie,” a sexy nonsense song that he reprised a year later. Blake also played a steel-bodied guitar on the amiable “Police Dog Blues,” a tuneful little song where he makes the guitar sound like a piano.

Perhaps his most unusual record was his last, a reworking of the Victorian music hall hit, “Champagne Charlie Is My Name.” There is some debate over whether he sings on this side, but as Paul Oliver points out in Songsters and Saints, music hall songs did register in the black American community and, in any event, the song is adapted for its audience.

Blake may have toured in a show called Happy Go Lucky in 1930–1931, but the Depression marked the end of his recorded career. He may have left a son, but the last days of one of Paramount’s biggest stars remain a mystery.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

AMG (Steve James); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR

See also Cannon, Gus; Jackson, Charles “Papa Charlie”; Rainey, Gertrude “Ma”; Spand, Charlie

BLIND PIG

Founded 1975 in Ann Arbor, Michigan; presently located in San Francisco, California. As with many independent labels, Blind Pig was begun as an extension of the founders’ passion for music, and ended up documenting some of the very best blues music to be heard anywhere.

Jerry Delgiudice was a senior at Loyola University in Chicago when he and University of Michigan senior Tom Isaia founded a coffee house/nightclub called the Blind Pig Café in Ann Arbor, Michigan, in 1971. Live music was a staple at the café, and while both Jimi Hendrix and John Lennon played there, blues was the mainstay of the club's schedule.

In 1975, Delgiudice recorded a local band, The Vipers, and issued a 45 under the Blind Pig label. An album by Boogie Woogie Red followed. After a two-year hiatus, Delgiudice reactivated the label with new partner Edward Chmielewski, and issued sides by Roosevelt Sykes and Walter Horton.

In 1981, Delgiudice and Chmielewski sold the club, with Delgiudice moving to Chicago, while Chmielewski relocated to San Francisco, where the label's headquarters is also now located.

The label's releases have been a mixture of traditional and contemporary blues, established stars and young up-and-comers. While Blind Pig has offered a home to West Coast artists—Coco Montoya, Tommy Castro, Rod Piazza, Norton Buffalo—it has also issued recordings by everyone from James Cotton (Mississippi) to Otis Rush (Chicago), Jimmy Thackery (Washington, D.C.) to Smokin' Joe Kubek (Texas).

Blind Pig was also one of the first blues labels to enthusiastically welcome women guitarists, helping to dispel an industry prejudice. Polished, professional releases by Joanna Connor, Debbie Davies, and Deborah Coleman helped propel the careers of all three women and open doors for others to follow.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Blind Pig website, <http://www.blindpigrecords.com/home.html> (accessed December 17, 2004).

Selected Recordings

Prime Chops: Blind Pig Sampler (1990, Blind Pig 78001).
Blind Pig Records: 20th Anniversary Collection (1997, Blind Pig 2001).
Blind Pig Records: 25th Anniversary Collection (2001, Blind Pig 2002).

BLOCK, RORY

b. Aurora Block, 6 November 1949;
 New York, NY

Guitarist, singer, songwriter. Big city native Block, who began as a fourteen-year-old transcribing blues off the radio, became the best-known female country blues practitioner of the modern era, recording a succession of commercially successful and critically acclaimed albums and winning numerous awards. Block, a two-time W. C. Handy Award winner in both acoustic album and traditional female artist categories, ran away from home in her midteens and tracked down country blues legends such as Son House for personal instruction. She put the lessons to good use, ultimately establishing herself as a live attraction while recording a series of albums including High Heeled Blues, Rhinestones & Steel Strings, House of Hearts, Ain't I a Woman, and Angel of Mercy featuring a feminine perspective. In 1991 she recorded Mama's Blues, with Jorma Kaukonen playing electric guitar on the title track, in a church as she explored new settings for her sound.

Block moved her music to a higher level in the mid-1990s, first with the Handy Award winner When a Woman Gets the Blues in 1996 and then with Confessions of a Blues Singer, another Handy winner, originally inspired by a dream of a Charlie Patton slide riff. The mixture of autobiographical originals and traditional material revealed the maturity of Block's songwriting in the idiom, and the appearance of Bonnie Raitt as a slide guitar guest on a track generated additional airplay and sales. Block secured her status with W. C. Handy Award wins as best traditional female artist in 1997 and 1998 and the release of the critically acclaimed Last Fair Deal in 2003.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Chris Nickson)

Discography: AMG (Chris Nickson)

BLOOMFIELD, MICHAEL

b. 28 July 1944; Chicago, IL
 d. 15 February 1981; San Francisco, CA

Mike Bloomfield began playing guitar at age thirteen, and later frequented the blues clubs on Chicago's South Side, befriending older blues musicians and sitting in wherever anyone would let him. He linked up with other young white musicians hanging around the predominantly black clubs, and played with singer Nick Gravenites and harmonica player Charley Musselwhite before joining the Paul Butterfield Blues Band (1965–1967). His distinctive and original lead guitar work was featured alongside Elvin Bishop on Butterfield's classic East-West album in 1966.

BLOOMFIELD, MICHAEL

He participated in the recording sessions for Bob Dylan's Highway 61 Revisited (1965), and performed with the singer at the infamous Newport Folk Festival appearance that year, when Dylan's new electric approach outraged the purists.

He formed Electric Flag with Gravenites in 1967, an influential but short-lived band that explored a progressive blues-rock direction, and incorporated a horn section. He recorded Super Session with Al Kooper and Stephen Stills in 1968, but the venture received a mixed reception.

He formed Triumvirate with Dr. John and John Hammond, Jr., in 1973, but without making the anticipated commercial or artistic impact. Electric Flag reformed briefly in 1974, and he made one record with KGB in 1976. His solo recordings of the late 1970s were issued on a smaller label, but he received a Grammy nomination for If You Love These Blues, Play 'Em As You Please in 1977.

Problems with drugs had hampered his career from the late 1960s onward, and he died of a drug overdose in 1981.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin; Santelli
Bloomfield, Michael, with S. Summerville. Me and Big Joe.
San Francisco: Re/Search, 1981.
Brooks, Ken. *The Adventures of Mike Bloomfield & Al
Kooper with Paul Butterfield and David Clayton Thomas*.
Hampshire, UK: Agenda, 1999.

Selected Recordings

Super Session (1968, Columbia CS9701); It's Not Killing Me
(1969, Columbia CS9883); *Live Adventures of Mike
Bloomfield and Al Kooper* (1969, PG6); *Live at Bill
Graham's Fillmore East* (1970, Columbia CS9893); Triumvirate (1973, Columbia 32172); If You Love These Blues, Play 'Em as You Please (1977, Sonet SNTF726);
Mike Bloomfield (1978, Takoma 1063); Between the Hard Place and the Ground (1979, Takoma 7070); Living in the Fast Lane (1982, Waterhouse DAMP 100).

BLUE HORIZON

Active 1965–1972

Record label founded in February 1965 by brothers Richard and Michael (Mike) Vernon. The first release was the single “Across the Board” by Hubert Sumlin (Blue Horizon BH 1000). Two subsidiaries were briefly started, Purdah and Outasite. In November 1966, CBS Records began distributing Blue Horizon LPs, which were of new blues-rock acts like Fleetwood Mac and Duster Bennett, or of established African American blues musicians like Otis Rush, Magic Sam, and B. B. King. The label ceased in 1972, but it was revived in 1988 by Mike Vernon for Dana Gillespie, Lazy Lester, and others.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Larkin
Fancourt, Les. Blue Horizon Records 1965–1972: A Discography. Faversham: Retrack, 1992.

BLUE LAKE

Record Label (Illinois, 1954–1956). Owner: Al Benson (b. June 30, 1908, Jackson MS; d. September 6, 1978, Berrien Springs, MI); John Henry “Lawyer” Burton (b. September 14, 1916, IL; d. November 1985, Glencoe, IL). Chicago, Illinois-based, Blue Lake's artists included King Fleming, Little Willie Foster (“Falling Rain Blues”), Lou Mac, L. C. McKinley (“All Alone Blues”), Red Saunders, Sunnyland Slim (with Snooky Pryor, “Devil Is a Busy Man”), Walter Spriggs, Leon Tarver, Baby Boy Warren (with Sonny Boy Williamson #2, “Mattie Mae”/“Sante Fe”), and Jody Williams (as Little Papa Joe), Joe Williams (with Red Saunders, “In the Evening” and “Blow Mr. Low”). The label was acquired by John Henry “Lawyer” Burton in March 1956.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

- Koester, Bob. “Blues Research Notes.” Jazz Report 1, no. 6 (1960/1961).
Rotante, Anthony, and Paul B. Sheatsley. “Parrot-Blue Lake” Blues Research no. 10 (1963).
Shurman, Dick. CD notes for *Hand Me Down Blues—
Chicago Style* (1989, Relic 7015).
Shurman, Dick. CD notes for *Cool Playing Blues—Chicago
Style* (1989, Relic 7016).
Tricker, Phillip J., and Bob Eagle. “Blue Lake.” *Roll Street
Journal* no. 3 (1983); no. 21 (1987).

BLUE, LITTLE JOE

b. Joseph Valery, Jr., 23 September 1934; Vicksburg, MS
d. 22 April 1990; Reno, NV

Guitarist and vocalist influenced by B. B. King, Louis Jordan, and Joe Liggins. Recorded for several labels, including Kent, Checker, Jewel, Chess, and Space. His 1966 composition “Dirty Work Is Going On,” released on Chess Records, was well received and became a blues standard. He toured until his death from cancer.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

AMG (Chad Eder); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Woodmansee, Ken. "Little Joe Blue" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 92 (July/August 1990): 46.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Jordan, Louis; King, Riley B. "B. B."; Liggins, Joe

BLUE MOON (SPAIN)

Formed in Barcelona during the 1990s as a jazz reissue label, Blue Moon Records has also issued several dozen releases that will appeal to fans of blues and R&B. Issuing complete chronological compilations and sets of mainly single artists, Blue Moon has also been responsible for volumes on obscure blues shouters (Sonny Parker, Eddie Mack, etc.), jump bands (Paul Williams, Tiny Grimes, etc.), pianists (Cecil Gant, Sonny Thompson, etc.), and several various artist collections of R&B guitarists and R&B legends. A subsidiary label, called Opal Blues, deals with the more famous names of blues and R&B, such as Fats Domino, Howlin' Wolf, and Muddy Waters.

DAVID PENNY

Discography

Blues and R&B Legends #1 (Blue Moon BMCD 4003).
Blues and R&B Legends #2 (Blue Moon BMCD 4004).
R&B Guitars 1950–1954 (Blue Moon BMCD 6018).

BLUE SMITTY

b. Claude Smith, 6 November 1924; Marianna, AR

Born and raised in Arkansas, except in Chicago from 1928 to 1935. He learned to play guitar around 1938. Early blues influences were Arthur Crudup, Robert Lockwood, and Tampa Red and, through records, Robert Johnson and John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson. From 1942 through 1946 he served in the U.S. Army and was stationed in Alexandria, Louisiana. During that time he began playing with jazz chords and single-note solos in the manner of Charlie Christian and Oscar Moore, and he learned to read music.

After his discharge from the army, he went to Memphis, then to Chicago in 1947. He soon met Muddy Waters, and he taught Waters how to play single-note solos without a bottleneck. Through 1947 Waters, Jimmy Rogers, and he performed in Chicago clubs. He moved to Harvey, Illinois, in late 1947 and devoted himself more to jazz, then moved to Robbins in 1949. He moved to Joliet, Illinois, in 1950 and began performing at Club 99, where he received the nickname Blue Smitty. In 1952 he recorded a Chess label session, from which "Crying"/"Sad Story" (Chess 1522) were initially released. Afterward he performed around Illinois, usually Joliet, Rock Island, Phoenix, and Kankakee. He was interviewed in 1974 and 1979 by Jim O'Neal with George Paulus, and since publication of the resulting two-part article in Living Blues magazine, he has been counted as a significant musician in early postwar Chicago blues.

He is not to be confused with Byther Smith or with Big Bad Smitty, both of whom have performed as "Blue Smitty."

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Santelli
 O'Neal, Jim. "Chicago Blues Yesterday and Today: Blue Smitty" [part 1]. Living Blues no. 44 (Autumn 1979): 9–11; [part 2]. Living Blues no. 45/46 (Spring 1980): 54–57.

Discography: LSFP

BLUE SUIT

Record label (Ohio, 1987–). Owners: John Gibbs Rockwood (b. June 27, 1949; Cleveland, OH); Robert Richard Seeman (b. December 31, 1955; Toledo, OH). Toledo, Ohio–based, Blue Suit's artists include Howard ("Louie Blueie") Armstrong, Eddie ("Guitar") Burns, Little Junior Cannaday, Louis "Mr. Bo" Collins, Detroit Junior, Detroit Piano Fats (Eugene Foster), the Dynatones, Honeyboy Edwards, Art and Roman Griswold, Harmonica Shah, Eddie Kirkland, Big Jack Reynolds, Sir Mack Rice, Willie D. Warren, and Maurice John Vaughn. The Hasting Street Grease and The Motor City R&B Pioneers (with Kenny Martin, Stanley Mitchell, Joe Weaver) collections feature recent performances by Detroit musicians and singers. In 2001, Blue Suit issued two Blue Boot Real, Raw & Blue collections of mostly live recordings by some of these artists.

ROBERT EAGLE

BLUE SUIT

Bibliography

- Blue Suit website, <http://www.blue-suit.com/> (accessed December 6, 2004).
- Osborn, Glenn. CD notes for Even Years of Screwing Around: The Blue Suit Anniversary Album (1998, Blue Suit BS-5001D).

BLUE THUMB

Record label (California, 1968–1974). Owners: Robert A. Krasnow (b. July 20, 1934); Thomas A. (“Tommy”) LiPuma (b. July 5, 1936; Cleveland, OH); Don Graham. A former executive with King Records and Kama Sutra Records, Bob Krasnow and partners recorded Arthur Adams, Clifton Chenier, Chicago Blue Stars (with Charlie Musselwhite), Albert Collins (reissue of TCF-Hall recordings), the Crusaders, Buddy Guy and Junior Wells (with Junior Mance), Jessie Hill, Earl Hooker, Sam Lay, John Mayall, Pointer Sisters, Ike and Tina Turner (with uncredited guest artist Albert Collins), and Phil Upchurch. The Memphis Swamp Jam–Memphis Blues Festival two-album set featured 1969 studio recordings by Chris Strachwitz (of Arhoolie Records) of Nathan Beauregard, “Sleepy” John Estes, Furry Lewis, Fred McDowell, Memphis Piano Red (John Williams), Napoleon Strickland, Otha Turner, Bukka White, Johnny Woods, and guitar duets by R. L. Watson and Josiah Jones (aka Bill Barth and John Fahey). The label was purchased by ABC Records in 1974.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

- Sidran, Ben. CD notes for “Ballad of the Blue Thumb Gang.” In All Day Thumbsucker Revisited: The History of Blue Thumb Records (1995, Blue Thumb BTB-2-7002).

Discography

- Edwards, David, Patrice Eyries, and Mike Callahan. “Blue Thumb/Banana Album Discography.” <http://www.bsnpubs.com/abc/bluethumb.html> (accessed December 6, 2004).

BLUEBIRD

Subsidiary record label of RCA Victor, first used in summer 1932 to issue eight-inch popular discs sold in Woolworth stores. Ten-inch discs were issued from March 1933 for general sale. Its B5000 series became Victor’s Race label during the 1930s, its 35 issues superseding Victor’s own 75 23250 series after June 1933 when it ended at 23432. During the overlap period some performances were issued on both labels and some Bluebird issues were also duplicated on Sunrise. Initially other nonclassical material was mixed in but after B7950 in late 1938 this series was for Race and country issues only. It had reached B9042 by 1942. It featured significant performances by Big Bill (Broonzy), Big Maceo (Merriweather), Bo Carter (Chatman), Walter Davis, Jazz Gillum, Lonnie Johnson, Tommy McClennon, Robert Petway, Tampa Red, Washboard Sam, Big Joe Williams, Sonny Boy Williamson, and many others.

The label became particularly associated with the new urban sounds of late 1930s Chicago and with marathon sessions of eight to twelve titles. Field recording units in the South notably captured the Mississippi Sheiks (San Antonio, 1934, and New Orleans, 1935), Joe Pullum (San Antonio, 1935/1936), Little Brother (Montgomery) (New Orleans, 1936), Andy Boy and Big Boy Knox (San Antonio, 1937), Frank Tannehill (San Antonio, 1938, and Dallas, 1941). In 1943, the series was superseded by a Race-only 34-0700 series, which included work by Big Maceo, Big Boy Crudup, Jazz Gillum, Tommy McClennon, Lonnie Johnson, Yank Rachel, Roosevelt Sykes, Tampa Red, and Sonny Boy Williamson. Nothing recorded after February 1946 appeared on Bluebird, though some titles remained in the catalog until 1950 labeled as RCA-Victor’s “Bluebird Series.” The label name has been revived at intervals since 1976 for reissues of vintage blues both in the United States and France.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

- DGR; Sutton
- Dixon, Robert M.W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Parry, William Hewitt. “The Bluebird 34-0700 Race Series.” The Discophile 15 (December 1950): 12.
- Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

BLUES

Blues: A type of music that may be notated in eight-, twelve-, and sixteen-measure forms, using one of a select number of melodic scales and rhyme schemes, and sung and/or performed with musical instruments, with the melody as the primary component. Engendered in the late nineteenth century by southern rural African Americans in oral communities, the blues has come to be performed at the present time by American and English musicians of various races and economic classes, in settings ranging from ritual celebrations to formal concert halls.

This article aims to expand the preceding definition in order to present explanatory cross-references to other entries, provide a central narrative to which encyclopedia users may refer for context, record new observations about the craft on the lyrics and music, and discuss new and existing hypotheses about blues cultures and history.

The remainder of this entry will be of two essays: the features and techniques to listen for in blues lyrics and music, and a history of the blues using the features and techniques presented.

Part 1: Technical

A blues song consists of lyrics and music, and a performance of that song entails the selection of specific lyrics formulation techniques and of individual musical features, and the interplay of such lyrics and music. We will look at individual lyric techniques first, then at the musical features.

Blues Lyrics

The first characteristic about lyrics most listeners notice is their organization into rhyme schemes and stanza chorus forms. This observation is especially true for listeners from a literate writing-based culture, a few of whom have transcribed lyrics and presented them as poetic texts. Before considering rhyme schemes and chorus forms, we need to be aware of the various kinds of word play on blues lyrics by peoples of oral-based cultures, including those of illiterate and semiliterate skills. The “activity” of words exercised within each lyric stanza by the blues singer may be observed in the following techniques:

1. Appropriation: Also called “stealing” or “plagiarism.” This is the whole transfer of one or more lyric choruses from one song to another. This will occur most often in pre-1942 recordings. In recent decades federal copyright laws have prohibited such appropriation, resulting in many new lyrics on blues records.

2. Phrase-formulas and borrowings: Improvised lyrics may sometimes seem like a mosaic or patchwork of incomplete phrases (or “catch-phrases”) and dependent clauses. Since the lyrics often have to fit within a rhythmic pattern and/or stay within a musical meter/time signature, short word phrases are developed into a formula.

Certain phrase-formulas are used over and over by one artist, irrespective of the melody to which the words may be sung: “Well well well ’m” was used often enough by Peetie Wheatstraw (William Bunch) in the 1930s to become a signature phrase.

Often, certain phrase-formulas are borrowed by other artists, sometimes to the same melody of the lyric source, as in these titular lyrics:

You’re a mean mistreatin’ mama (Leroy Carr)
You’re a cruel hearted woman (Bumble Bee Slim)

The adjective for a stern disposition may be counted as part of the phrase-formula. Mississippi Matilda in 1936 altered the phrase-formula by changing the adjective, yet still retaining the overall lyric and the source melody:

I’m a hard-working woman (Mississippi Matilda)

Robert Johnson altered the Bumble Bee Slim formula from “cruel” to “kind” in his “Kindhearted Woman Blues.”

Phrase-formulas are used even where the melodies are different:

She got Elgin movements and a twenty-year guarantee (Blind Blake, Panther Squall Blues, 1928)
She got Elgin movements, from her head down to her toes (Blind Lemon Jefferson, Change My Luck, 1928)

Robert Johnson would use Jefferson’s lyric in his “Walking Blues” (1936). Entire clauses may be used, even from sacred to secular use:

Dark was the night, cold was the ground, on which our saviour laid (spiritual)

John Hurt in his 1928 recording of “Frankie” would lead a lyric chorus with the same phrase.

3. Phonetic imitation: This is the aural similarity of a lyric phrase to a previously existing one. This technique is not heard often, but it may be detected when a blues song is compared to a melodic antecedent, when shared sounds occur at the same points in the common melody, as in these title statements in each of these songs:

You Gone Need Somebody [when you] Gone to Die (Charlie Patton, 1929)

The last, fair deal, gone down (Robert Johnson, "Last Fair Deal Gone Down," 1936)

4. Paraphrase: Paraphrasing is the restatement of conceptual subjects with different words. In the blues, this lyric technique will refer to a given name or noun previously used as a blues lyric subject, but without using derived phrase-formulas and borrowings, or sharing the original melody. For example, there are Son House's treatments of the "Death Letter" concept previously heard on Ida Cox's "Death Letter Blues" (1924), including "My Black Mama Part 2" (1930) and "Death Letter" (1965), among other House performances. Consider also the widely varying versions of "Stagger Lee" by Furry Lewis (1928) and by John Hurt (1928), which are quite unlike each other with regard to lyric phrases and melodies.

5. Verbal and nonverbal substitutions: Substitutions are adjustments to the lyric without sacrificing the literal meaning and content. Usually they are the result of mental slips, but sometimes they are consciously introduced if the melody is sung to a different scale, performed at a different tempo, or to a different instrumental accompaniment. Sometimes, to detect substitutions, a listener should compare two or more performances of a song by the same artist. An example of a verbal substitution is in Robert Johnson's "Kindhearted Woman Blues" (1936), where in one take he sings "woman" during the first line, while in another take he substitutes "mama."

As for nonverbal substitutions, in 1928 Scrapper Blackwell in "Kokomo Blues" sang to a minor-mode inflected melody "Mmm, baby don't you want to go." In 1936, Robert Johnson sang the lyric to a major-mode version of the melody, but to open up the bright sound he sings "ohh" instead of "mmm."

It should be acknowledged that vocal growls, moans, and other nonverbal utterances by a singer may be heard as an African retention and, as such, they may have a greater significance than as ornaments (which may be how they are interpreted by Western music listeners).

6. Telescoping: This is the adding or dropping of a word or words of an existing lyric phrase to fit an existing melody. Dropping words is the more common instance of this technique, although it runs the risk of rendering the lyric as nonsense. Compare, for example, the opening lyrics of Charlie Patton's "Moon Going Down" (1930) with Howlin' Wolf's "Smokestack Lightning" (1956). To make Patton's lyric fit the new melody, Howlin' Wolf dropped the word "bell," yet changes the meaning of Patton's lyric to the railroad smokestack shining like gold, when it should be black.

Adding words occurs too, as with John Hurt's adding "on" to the spiritual "Dark was the night, cold was the ground" (see the phrase-formula entry above). Sometimes a word has to be repeated, such as Victoria Spivey repeating twice the word "sinking" in "I Can't Last Long" (1936).

7. Rhythmic conversion: Rhythmic conversion refers to the resetting of a set of lyrics to a new declamatory rhythm, often at odds with the customary spoken rhythm of the given words (long-stressed words are underlined, the remaining words are short-stressed).

Well I rolled and I tumbled and I (Willie Newburn, "Roll and Tumble Blues," 1929)

Well I rolled and I tumbled and I (Garfield Akers, "Dough Roller Blues," 1930)

8. Adaptation of locale or gender: Adaptation is not merely substitution. At times the introduction of alternate location or sex may force a change to the surrounding lyrics (especially a rural setting to a city one, or vice versa). Locale may be specific, even when the melody is the same and the lyrics may be similar:

"Original Old Kokomo Blues" (Kokomo Arnold, 1934)

"Sweet Home Chicago" (Robert Johnson, 1936)

"Baltimore Blues" (Charlie McCoy, 1934)

It may be generic:

"Black River Blues" (Roosevelt Sykes, 1930, riverside setting)

"Cross Road Blues" (Robert Johnson, 1936, highway intersection setting)

9. Lists: Blues and African American songs often take the form of lists, many of which are variations of word games and toasts. Two standard songs are "The Dirty Dozens" and "The Signifying Monkey." One of the most popular postwar blues songs, "Wang Dang Doodle" composed by Willie Dixon, is yet another example.

Other blues will proceed with alphabetical lists and numerical lists and sums. Occasionally white composers and performers devise such songs, for instance, "Rock Around the Clock" recorded by Bill Haley and the Comets in 1955, a twelve-measure blues song having lyrics that follow a clock face in numerical/chronological order. “My Daddy Rocks Me,” a song recorded by Trixie Smith in 1938, follows a similar plan for the lyrics about round-the-clock sex.

By means of such techniques, a vast body of lyrics can be generated, and lyrics may be chosen at any moment by the blues singer to suit a particular setting or occasion. The more lyrics a singer knows, the more valued he or she may be to their audience and cultural group. Yet such lyrics are not merely declaimed, but sung to a melody. To facilitate such singing, lyric chorus forms must be devised in accordance with the melody’s characteristics. So, before looking at the lyric chorus forms, we should acquaint ourselves with the blues’ musical characteristics.

Blues Music

The central component of a blues song is the melody, to which words may be sung, and instrumental accompaniment may be added. It is the melody that gets lifted from one blues song, then sung to new lyrics as a new blues song. In view of the importance of melody, certain aspects should be explained first, namely pitch and tone, rhythm, scale, meter, and tempo.

Pitch and tone. It is helpful to begin with two definitions from The New Harvard Dictionary of Music:

Pitch: (1) The perceived quality of a sound that is chiefly a function of its fundamental frequency—the number of oscillations per second (Hertz) of the sounding object or of the particles of air excited by it (see Acoustics)

Tone: (1) a sound of definite pitch; a pitch. . . (3) The character of the sound achieved in performance on an instrument.

In many types of music, especially notated composed types including Western classical music, the notion of pitch may be separable from the notion of tone. Such separation may be enacted in the act of notating music on paper, which requires the notator (whether composer, arranger, or transcriber) to imagine and/or anticipate the sound of each individual musical note, even though a written note obviously does not sound.

In improvised types of music, however, the notion of pitch is not separable from the notion of tone. This is true for blues music developed within oral, nonwriting, non-notating cultures. Every blues song known to an oral culture is one that has been performed at some time in the remembered past, however distantly or recently. Unlike classical music, there are no dead, long-unperformed pieces in improvised blues. Also, although improvised blues songs are conceived and performed without notated music, some observations about blues composition as well as improvisation can be made, and they are presented later in this section.

It follows, then, that the primary source of the blues is the performance, whether live in person or on sound recordings, and the secondary source is the transcription of the performance in words and music notation. The secondary source can never replace the primary source (unless the performance is totally forgotten, or the recording is lost or its playback sound irretrievable). Nonetheless, transcriptions serve as effective illustrations for demonstration and discussion.

Pitch and tone are inseparable in the blues and are dependent on the quality of sound. I will refer to both collectively as “tone.” The agents of tone are musical instruments. Instruments do not contain music in themselves: their strings must be plucked, strummed, or hammered; their surfaces tapped or patted; their columns blown with air while the appropriate tone-holes are blocked with fingers. Music is contained instead in the musicians who manipulate the instruments. For many years, at least in the published literature, there has been the myth associated with Tommy Johnson, then later with Robert Johnson, of the Mississippi Delta bluesman who sells his soul to the devil at a dusty crossroads in exchange for guitar skills; one such story has the devil simply retuning the bluesman’s guitar. Such a story fails to acknowledge a musician’s talent, and it also fails to appreciate the time, training, and hard work that goes into honing an attractive musical expression. It may also tell more about the teller than about the story’s subject.

Important blues instruments have been the singing voice, the guitar (acoustic or electrically amplified), the piano, the harmonica, horns including the trumpet, the saxophone, the drums, and the bass. Other relevant instruments at various times in the history of the blues have been the accordion, the banjo, the diddley bow, the fiddle (violin), the fife with drums, the jug, the kazoo, the mandolin, the rub board, spoons, strings, and electronic synthesizers.

Rhythm. When two tones are played one after another in temporal succession, rhythm is created. The New Harvard Dictionary defines rhythm as “the pattern of movement in time.” Even a melody of tones, each of which is of equal duration to one another (for example, quarter notes in 4/4 time) still has rhythm. Moreover, in the oral dynamic of blues music, every rhythmic pattern has tone (since the two concepts may not be understood separately except through music notation), and rhythm and melody are inseparable.

BLUES

Scale, meter, and tempo. There are three quantitative means of measuring melody: scale, meter, and tempo. Scale measures the intervallic quality of melody; the intervals measure the differences in pitch registered among two or more tones, using increments termed half-steps and whole steps. For example, the “do-re-mi” scale commonly taught in elementary schools is known as the diatonic major scale. Setting the diatonic major on the tone C:

Music theory stipulates that the distances from C to D, D to E, F to G, G to A, and A to B are of a whole step each, and those from E to F and from B to C are of a half-step each. The pattern of whole steps and half-steps in a diatonic major scale is whole–whole–half–whole–whole–whole–half.

The most common blues scale is considerably different from the diatonic:

Here, the distances from C to D, E-flat to F, F to G, G to A, and B-flat to C are of a whole step, and those from D to E-flat and from A to B-flat are of a half-step and are called “blue notes.” The pattern of the common blues scale is thus whole–half–whole–whole–whole–half–whole. It should be acknowledged that the common blues scale may be heard as a combination of pentatonic scales (see entries Scales, Africa), not as a variant of the diatonic scale.

The difference between the diatonic major scale and the common blues scale is telling. A descending melody in diatonic scale is ordinary, bland, unremarkable:

Resetting the intervals according to the common blues scale results in this:

The adjustments are not ornamental musical spice. Rather, such adjustments are necessary to inflect and render a melody within the blues practice.

The common blues scale given above may be heard in most blues performances, but it is far from being the only scale used in blues. The point should be made that the common blues scale was derived by music analysts from listening to hundreds of blues records and live performances, and that the singers and instrumentalists who were heard were performing not from a written scale-book, but from blues conventional practice. It should be added that the common blues scale tones, especially the specific “blue notes,” are not sung or played to equal inflection by every blues performer; rather they may vary according to local musical style or individual performance preference. But among the records that blues music analysts have set as exceptions to common blues practice may be found other scales of blues relevance, whether of modal scales in the rare examples of pre-blues (for example, Geechie Wiley’s “Last Kind Words Blues,” 1930), minor scales (for example, Skip James’s performances with a D minor tuned guitar), scales borrowed from gospel music (Ray Charles’s 1954–1962 performances), or the modal flights of Robert Pete Williams. An exploration of the various scales to be noted is given in the Scales entry. Throughout this encyclopedia, the “blues scale” is that given above, and “blue notes” are the inflections at the third and seventh scale degrees.

For the rhythmic quality of melody, meter is referred to. Notational practice of meter uses time signatures, a set of two numbers, the first to indicate the notated musical beat, the second to indicate the number of such beats to be used in a notated musical measure. This is usually an effort to convey the basic pulse of the melody. Musicians in an oral culture may not be familiar with such a notated visualization, but here are a few examples to show how some blues styles may appear in transcriptions:

4/4 “Common” time—four beats per measure, the quarter note has the unit beat

8/8 “Sanctified” time—eight beats per measure, the eighth note has the unit beat

12/8 “Boogie” time—twelve beats per measure, the eighth note has the unit beat or

Some transcribers will render “boogie” time in 4/4 time as:

but it can be misleading and hard to read because the triplet brackets above the notes can clutter up the appearance.

Tempo refers to the performed rate of melody. To determine the tempo, the meter of the melody should be recognized, and the number of unit beats counted. Tempo is typically indicated as the number of beats per minute. Most blues performances usually fall between 88 to 120 beats per minute. By contrast, the slowest jazz ballads are performed at 60 beats per minute (1 beat per second), and frenetic bebop numbers may be 240 to 300 beats per minute. On this basis, it is understandable why the general public thinks of blues as a “slow” music (why it thinks of blues as “sad” is another interesting matter).

A sung or played tone has a sonic ripple effect that sounds other tones; such are called “overtones.” Western classical harmony is constructed in large part on overtone phenomena. The general concept of harmony is the means to assess the quality of two or more tones sounded at once. This is important for a soloing instrumentalist or one accompanying a singer.

Every melody is set in a key, or a precise tonality (centrality) within an aural spectrum of registers where all tones may be heard. The purpose of harmony in the blues is to give breadth to the melody by providing a sonic context. The means of harmony is the chord, a simultaneous, in-time presentation of two or more tones that have an upper tone and a lower tone as the harmonic limit (arpeggiation, shown below, is the temporal harmonic presentation of a chord).

Given a melody, it is the task of the blues accompanist to determine the melody’s key, then construct chords under the melody. Blues harmony for the most part uses the diatonic major (“do-re-mi”) scale. The chords are of triadic nature, that is, every other scale tone after the base tone is used:

If one starts on C, one should use E, G, and so forth. Every scale tone is capable of having a triadic chord built on it. If triadic chords are built on each tone of a diatonic major scale, then those chords are numbered with Roman numerals (say, C = I, D = ii, E = iii).

After a melody has been fitted with chords, the resulting set of chords is called the harmonic progression. It is important, especially in an oral musical practice, to think of the harmonic progression as a succession of chords played over time to form a discrete unit or component. For a melody in the common blues scale, the blues harmonic progression uses the chords I, IV, and V; in the key of C, the respective chords would be C major, F major, and G major. This progression provides a basis for which melodic tones that sound “wrong,” or dissonant, should be judged.

Blues Form

We are ready now to consider blues forms. To hear blues musical forms as perceptible entities, we should recognize the three dimensions—melody, harmonic progression, and tone—provided by musical instruments and the singing voice, the latter also providing blues lyrics. Each dimension with regard to form will need to be considered in turn.

Melody may last as short or as long as the performer wishes. In blues practice, a typical phrase may last from nine to sixteen beats, which may be notated visually in four measures of four beats per measure. Four-measure phrases may be stacked to form eight-measure blues (4 + 4), twelve-measure blues (4 + 4 + 4), or sixteen-measure blues (4 + 4 + 4 + 4). Some bluesmen have sung to short phrases lasting only up to eight beats, which can be notated in two measures of four beats each. Such two-measure phrases can be stacked to form eight-measure blues (2 + 2 + 2 + 2), or to break in half the first four-measure phrase of a twelve-measure melodic form ([2 + 2] + 4 + 4).

Harmonic progressions can, with frequent playing and use in various songs, become formal entities in their own right. The most established harmonic progression in the blues is that for the twelve-measure form; some analysts have seemed to take this progression to define the blues. This progression follows the (4 + 4 + 4) three four-measure melodic phrase arrangement. For the first four-measure phrase, the tonic I chord is used; for the second four-measure phrase, the IV chord is used for the first two measures, then reverts to the I chord for two more measures; and for the third phrase the V chord is used for two measures, then the I chord returns to close the harmonic progression aspect of the form. Analysts call this the I–IV–V blues progression. It may be more faithful to the blues practice to think of it as the I/IV–I/V–I three-phrase blues progression. The reason for this is that there is a frequently used eight-measure (2 + 2 + 2 + 2) harmonic progression (I/IV–I/I–V/I), as heard on Leroy Carr’s “How Long Blues” (1928), the Mississippi Sheiks’s “Sitting on Top of the World” (1930), and Robert Johnson’s “Come On in My Kitchen” (1936)—the same chord sequence, but serving a different melody or melodic variant.

The remaining dimension is tone, within which is the singing voice that conveys the lyric forms. Earlier, we noted various ways that lyric phrases can be improvised or altered. They may be compiled to form lyric choruses as stanzas by linking rhyming phrases. These rhyme schemes are so important to blues that analysts have given them a defining role. The most commonly cited lyric rhyme scheme is AAB, where a lyric is sung (A), then repeated (A), then a rhyming lyric is given (B). This AAB scheme is used most often in twelve-measure forms, though not in eight- and sixteen-measure forms. And there are other lyric forms for twelve-measure blues, such as those for the (2 + 2) verse and (4 + 4) refrain form, and the (4 + 4) verse and (4) refrain form used in ballads and the earliest datable blues.

Sixteen-measure blues have had distinctive lyric forms, such as the AABA scheme for sixteen-measure hokum blues (where a lyric is sung twice, then a second lyric, then the first lyric once more), and the AAAB form where the lyric is sung three times, then a second lyric closes the form. Eight-measure blues commonly have a 4 + 4 AB verse and refrain lyric form, or a 2 + 2 + 2 + 2 ABCD scheme.

To perform blues music, the musicians must be in agreement as to how to coordinate the melodic and harmonic aspects. One way is through polyphony, that is, a multilayered music where each musician contributes one’s own melody that retains its own identity in the ensemble sound. This manner prevailed in many types of pre-1942 southern music, including blues, hillbilly, and country music. Through the 1930s, most people in the United States, regardless of race, could listen to and follow several melodic layers at once. A second way is through homophony, in which melodic interest is concentrated in one voice that is provided with subordinate accompaniment. For a variety of melody-plus-accompaniment textures, as well as to the type of texture itself, the terms “homorhythmic” or “homophonic” may be used, which refers to all parts moving with the same or similar rhythm called “the big beat.” As far back as the late 1920s but especially since the 1940s, musical listeners began paying more attention to “the big” homophonic “beat” played by a rhythm section consisting of piano, rhythm guitar, bass, and drums, and less to the melody or melodies. In other words, around the 1930s habits of listening became more “vertical” than “horizontal.” (Musicians on records who led the transition in the late 1920s/mid-1930s from polyphonic to homophonic in jazz, blues, and country are Louis Armstrong [1923–1932], Count Basie [1932–1941], Robert Johnson [1936–1937], Muddy Waters [1941–1955], and Milton Brown and Bob Wills together and separately [1933–1941].)

When the formal choices are made regarding instruments, lyrics, melody, harmonic progression, and whether to use polyphony or homophony, we can say that blues composition takes place by “putting together” a blues song performance with these means and within their dimensions. Usually the word “composition” brings to mind written texts like essays and notated classical music scores. But Webster’s defines “composition” as “to form by putting together two or more things, elements, or parts” (definition 1a). I wish to add “to form as fixed entities.” Such entities are needed by listeners to identify the blues song and to follow the unity of a song performance. The most important entity in the blues is the melody, on which the other aspects like tone, harmonic chords, and lyrics are dependent. Throughout a song’s performance, the melody is retained whole, or has only minor variations, in which it is still recognizable. Also, when one blues song is used to construct another, it is the melody that is borrowed and remains intact in the new song.

When elements and entities in a blues song are fixed throughout its performance, they imply a composition governing the improvisation of lyrics and of music. “Improvisation” is much misunderstood. Usually it is characterized as “make it up as you go along,” “play or sing as you feel,” “select the best and put it all together,” or “take it out of the air.” Webster’s offers a practical definition of “improvise” (definition 2b): “to construct or fabricate out of what is conveniently at hand.” I wish to add the words “and in mind.”

The dimensions of blues composition serve also as the bases of improvisation:

1. Tone and lyrics: Tone and lyrics are enabled by musical instruments, from the singing voice to the grand piano, from a solo performer to a large orchestra. Improvisation of tone is to use any, some, or all instruments that are conveniently at hand. Improvisation of lyrics is the retention, omission, or altering of lyrics to suit the conditions at the performance setting.
2. Melody: Improvisation of melody is the use of available tones from voices and instruments to construct melodies over the length of time at hand. In the blues practice, the melody stays intact, and such retention and repetition implies composition. However, the transposition of a given melody from one scale to another is one type of improvisation, if limited. Also, the devising of alternate melodies by the singer or the instrumentalist may be permitted, as long as it is understood to be secondary to the first, primary theme.

3. Harmonic chords: Improvisation of harmonic chords is the altering of the sequence of chords in a given harmonic progression, or the changing from one harmonic system (triadic, quartal) to another. Such improvisation is limited in the blues practice, as such chords and the resulting harmonic progressions are dependent on the melody, which in turn is kept intact throughout a song's performance. Nevertheless, some ornamental passing chords have been permitted in some performances.

Blues improvisation takes place on two levels, musical and verbal. The musical level involves the use of certain instruments available to the musician (usually voice, guitar, piano, harmonica), the melodic pitches usually drawn from the "blues scale" (diatonic major scale pitches with the third and seventh scale degrees flatted), and chords from triadic harmony. The verbal level involves words and lyric techniques. Both musical and verbal levels are bonded together (they should not be mistaken for layered components).

The dynamic quality of blues improvisation takes one melody as a constant factor and repeats it as a distinct chorus unit several times, with the selection and order of the lyrics as a changing aspect. The lyrics may tell a narrative story, relate rhymes on a broad topic, or have no relation to one another at all. In any case, the perceptible result of blues improvisation is a set of sound-chorus-beads strung together. Such "blues beads" may be preset by the musicians for a concert or a formal performance, or left open ended for a dance, ritual, or informal performance.

The length of a blues performance may vary. Sometimes it may last only one or two songs, especially if the performer is at a blues festival, a gala revue, or at a taping for a television show or a recording session. Or it may last for more than two hours, during which fifteen to twenty songs may be performed. During such a larger set, two or three songs may share the same melody yet have different sets of lyrics; or, in two or three songs, each with different melodies, the same lyric phrase may be heard in each. On some occasions, a blues artist may perform a blues song twice, with some changes in the lyrics during the second performance.

Note that other types of music improvisation will hold different formal dimensions constant, or use different types of such dimensions. Jazz, for example, will use many of the same instruments, melodic scales, and chord progressions as blues. But performances of a jazz piece will treat its chord progression and its lyrics as dynamic constant factors, and the melody as the changing factor. Yet, the jazz and blues practices are not wholly incompatible, and each has informed the other on several remarkable occasions.

The best blues performers, those who deserve the most attention from listeners, combine striking lyrics with a melody that allows all words to be heard and remembered vividly. They also can take a melody and punctuate its musical features with word tricks and gimmicks and instrumental ornaments. The history of blues music is a chronological record of musicians and songs, informed with the trends that shaped the creators and their creations.

Part 2: Historical

Blues Antecedents Through 1830

The first capture into slavery of an African, whether by a European or by another African for sale to a European, for work in North America set into motion a chain of events that lasted more than five hundred years to create the present spectrum of African American music, including the blues. As early as 1510, Spain was shipping Congo captives to its New World colony Hispaniola, because even then the colonists considered West Africans hardier mill and plantation workers than Native Americans. Christian justification was cited, if thinly, through the Genesis stories of Cain (Genesis 4:15), whose black mark was inflicted by God as punishment, and Noah (Genesis 9:25) who cursed his son Ham's descendants to become black and be deemed only as "servants of servants." By 1600, it was reported that the African west coastal population in Angola had declined to the extent that white slavers had to travel for three months into the continent's interior to find new slaves. At that time, British settlers were establishing their first stable colonies, starting with Jamestown in 1607; twelve years later they introduced African slaves to the colonies.

By 1700 the slave route itinerary resembled a triangle, from West Africa to the West Indies ports, and from thence to colonial North America. This route laid the seeds for the development of African Caribbean cultures that would migrate and instill aspects into North American blues cultures, including voodoo and hoodoo. Africans brought to North American ports in the Gulf Coast and East Coast were purchased mostly by Anglo-born or -descended plantation owners. Some owners discouraged their slaves from continuing African musical and communicative traditions, especially those involving drums, encouraging them to instead adopt Anglo types of music such as hymns, ballads, and dances. Hymns were usually in sixteen-measure or thirty-two-measure forms, but some ballads and dances were twelve-measure three-phrase forms; some examples can be found that date to the early 1500s. The relative lack of musicians in eastern North America during the Colonial, Revolutionary War, and early Federal era, and the great need for them on the farms and plantations far removed from towns, resulted in African Americans being recruited to play European American instruments like the fiddle so they could play for white parties on occasion. The white esteem for talented black fiddle players may be seen on the surviving notices and posters about escaped slave musicians whose reward money was often higher than that offered for common laborers. White ownership of all slaves tightened after 1803, when Eli Whitney's invention, the cotton gin, eased cotton production for market and rejuvenated the cotton industry. At about the same time, first notice is seen in written accounts by whites of black sacred music, in the wake of the Great Awakening religious movement.

Some African lyric and music retentions were kept by the African captives and their African American descendants. Such retentions include singing and drumming, especially in 8/8 meter instead of the European 4/4 meter; instruments like the banjo, diddley bow, and an Africanized practice of the fife and drums; deployment lyrics in a call-and-response fashion between group leader and group, whether in a work field or in a religious setting; the practice of melody as the basis of an improvisation of a musical piece, around which the lyrics and musical accompaniment may change; and the use of one melody as the basis of several pieces during a performance, a practice that can still be heard today among West African griots.

Blues Antecedents, 1830–1865

Foundational U.S. government documents including the Constitution favored white landowning citizens, gave fewer rights to white citizens owning no land, and none to black slaves, who counted as less than one white citizen in early U.S. censuses. The slave question grew with the geographic boundaries as new states were founded and admitted from the Gulf Coast (Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas), on both sides of the Mississippi River (especially Arkansas, Tennessee, and Missouri), the Northwest Territory (Michigan and Illinois), and even on the West Coast (California). Legislation such as the 1820 Missouri Compromise was meant to contain the controversy over slaves, especially from white abolitionists, but it merely delayed the inevitable Civil War between the slave-holding “Confederate” states and the “free” United States until 1861. Partly on moral principle, partly as a shrewd international diplomacy move, U.S. President Abraham Lincoln formulated the Emancipation Proclamation to free all slaves upon the defeat of the Confederate States of America; the proclamation was approved on January 1, 1863—an ironic date because January 1 was a customary day for major slave auctions and sales. After the 1865 readmittance of the defeated Confederate states to the U.S. government, the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution were passed to make all blacks free, voting citizens.

The music relevant to blues would have been the styles performed by black slaves in the eastern and southern states. What survives are treatments of Anglo-American popular and folk songs and sacred hymns. Since sound recording would not be invented until 1877 and not refined until 1888, and African Americans were for the most part not taught to write and lived in oral cultures, the musical sources surviving today are from whites in the form of journals, letters, travel books, and the important 1867 publication Slave Songs of the United States. From such sources, it appears that black music of this era was in hymns and spirituals, dance, and popular songs and minstrelsy. The Slave Songs book pointed up the importance among blacks of the John Wesley Methodist hymn “Roll Jordan Roll,” in eight measures following an AABA lyric scheme. Spirituals were no less sacred but were more the result of African American tinkering, and their lyrics were more ironic and indicative of a culture alternative to the prevailing white dominance, especially so in “Go Down, Moses” and other spirituals with Exodus themes.

Dance as communal activity among slaves was widely noticed by whites, from the Congo Square Sundays in New Orleans to the innumerable plantation frolics across the South. Dance as virtuoso entertainment was established by William Henry “Juba” Lane (1825–1852) in the 1840s, an African American who established himself dancing Irish jigs but added African American rhythms, including likely the ‘juba’ rhythm (in 8/8 meter, 1-2-3-4-5-6-7-8, with stress on the underlined beats). By the end of his short life Lane laid the foundational elements for what is now known as tap dancing. However, white appropriation of black solo dance occurred around 1828 when a white professional dancer, Thomas D.

Rice, learned a shuffling song and dance to the words “I jump Jim Crow” from a crippled black stableman; for the next 30 years Rice performed “Jim Crow” to wide popular acclaim especially among whites and the “Jim Crow” phrase was introduced in American vernacular language, although later in the nineteenth century it would be used as slang for racial segregation.

Rice’s success came during the initial appearance of the minstrel show craze in the 1830s and 1840s. The minstrel show consisted of white entertainers in black makeup imitating African Americans in coarse, stereotyped manners that were acceptable to white audiences. They used the same instruments—sheet music covers for the Virginia Minstrels and the Virginia Serenaders show members in blackface with tambourine, fiddle, banjo, and percussive bones. Later on, African American entertainers often performed in these minstrel shows, often in a sort of parody of a parody. Sometimes black performers would even put on blackface. Today’s audiences would find much objectionable and even politically incorrect in the minstrel show, but in their time the minstrels introduced many African Americanisms into mainstream culture—critical at a time when slavery was becoming a greater national concern—and their musical imitations, however coarse, of blacks became abiding musical repertory for a century, including “Old Dan Tucker,” “Zip Coon” (also known as “Turkey in the Straw”), and “Camptown Races.” Aspects of the latter two songs deserve comment. In the chorus of “Zip Coon,” the four lyric phrases begin respectively on chords I, IV, I, and V, a trend not seen in American popular music until the 1830s. The chorus of Stephen Collins Foster’s “Camptown Races” (1850) is a striking parody of the chorus of “Roll Jordan Roll” as it uses a hymn tune commonly sung by blacks as a basis of imitation for whites imitating blacks; that the musical basis of imitation is on the melody perhaps may be an imitation of the African American music-making process in the traditional manner.

Leading the second lyric phrase on the IV chord may also be noted in the “Battle Hymn of the Republic,” sung by Union sympathizers and soldiers during the Civil War. By contrast, the Confederate army sang “Dixie,” which uses the IV chord only as a passing chord at the words “in Dixie land I take my stand.” Using the IV chord to begin second lyric phrases is a nineteenth-century trend that would later be used in the twelve-measure blues chorus.

Pre-Blues, 1865–1890

“Pre-blues” is a convenient term used by historians for the styles of music performed and the kinds of spoken arts exercised by African Americans that preceded and informed the blues. By using this term, we are purposefully limiting our view for historical hindsight, and we should not mislead ourselves into thinking that the people of this time were conceiving of and rushing headlong into blues music as we now know it.

Immediately after the Civil War, the vast majority of blacks were still on the plantations where they had been slaves. The Union states’ victory and the military occupation of the South, the ensuing enforcement of the Emancipation Proclamation, and the writing and passing of the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments made African Americans free and full citizens with the power to vote. Although some moved to nearby cities such as Nashville, New Orleans, and Atlanta, and others were landowning farmers, most continued working on farms and plantations as sharecroppers. The sharecropping arrangement held that the landowner would provide the land and seed to the sharecropping farmer, who in turn would give half the resulting crop to the landowner. It was devised to keep the farms and plantations operating after the Civil War, but through little tricks and turns by landowners, it was used to retain blacks in economic slavery.

Work-for-hire opportunities emerged, however hard the work. Along the Mississippi River, the Army Corps of Engineers was building levees to keep the river from overflowing its banks, and thus enabled the clearing of drained land for farming. Railroads were rapidly expanding during this time, and men were needed not only for the construction of new roads but also for the maintenance of existing ones. Work for women ranged from farm work to domestic service.

Education for blacks rose. During and after the Civil War, white missionaries taught reading skills. The partnership of religion and reading in formal education continued in the establishment of black colleges, especially Fisk University in Nashville, Morehouse College, and Mississippi Rust College and Alcorn College (now Alcorn State University).

The result of the rise in literacy was the increased appearance of printed publications of black music, including those prepared by blacks. While the 1867 Slave Songs anthology was collected and published by whites, the 1884 Story of the Fisk Singers presented a significant repertory of spirituals and other sacred music remembered by the ex-slave members of the singing group, published under the auspices of the still-young black Fisk institution. On the other hand, collections of black popular music abounded, often published as “songsters,” a term also applied to itinerant musicians capable of playing dances, ballads, and later the earliest blues.

Styles of music important to the later emergence of blues were dances, work songs of field hollers and gandy dancers, ballads, and spirituals. Spoken games and toasts like the Dirty Dozens and the Signifying Monkey were shared among African American men in cities, farms, levee crews, and lumber camps. For the kinds of work not done or done often previously, hollers and chants took new shape, especially the axe-song whose first beat was the axe-fall and subsequent beats were the chant line. Among ballads, “Poor Boy a Long Ways from Home” was a post-bellum tune by soldiers and drifters black and white, and the title and lyric components would evolve into early and pre-World War II (“prewar”) blues. The first significant narrative ballad devoted to a black American was “John Henry,” based on an actual 1870s contest between a railroad laborer and steam-powered drill. Its tune was tonal in a European manner, but the song’s wide oral circulation for many years should not blind us to the presence of any African-descended modal melodies. “John Henry” can also be sung and notated in eight measures in quarter notes in 4/4 meter, more in the manner of Anglo ballad models. Harmony in the performance of such songs would have been to enable the instrumental accompaniment. Sophisticated four-part harmony in the Western art music manner would have been heard mostly if not only in the spirituals performances of the Fisk Jubilee Singers and their imitators.

Earliest Blues, 1890–1920

The earliest titled “blues” sheet music publications appeared in 1912, W. C. Handy’s “Memphis Blues” and Hart Wand’s “Dallas Blues,” although a few prototypes can be found in publications like Ben Harney’s “Mr. Johnson” in 1896. The earliest blues sound recording by an African American is “Crazy Blues” sung by Mamie Smith on Okeh Records in 1920. The earliest written description of blues in Mississippi was written by white anthropologist Howard Odum in 1906. However, songs recorded by musicians aged forty or older through 1940 may be datable to earlier times and traceable to nonwriting oral communities, and those songs appear to follow out of the nineteenth-century music trends, in contrast to those in the first sheet music and commercial records, which appear as fully developed blues from the start (and it may have seemed so to most white Americans and others outside the oral cultures that developed the blues in the late nineteenth century).

The blues as described technically in the first section combines a form of twelve measures (or eight or sixteen measures), a melodic diatonic scale inflected at the third and seventh scale degrees, and the AAB lyric rhyme scheme, and most important it uses the melody as the basis of imitation in the construction of new songs. Its direct prototypes—more immediate to the blues than antecedents, and the songs first adopted in the blues proper—can be found in ballads describing actual incidents from the 1890s, usually now called “blues ballads” or “bad man ballads,” such as “Frankie and Albert,” “Railroad Bill,” and “Stagger Lee.” Quite a few of these songs remained in oral music circulation to be recorded commercially by older songsters and bluesmen in the 1920s and early 1930s, and included a remarkable field recording in Sledge, Mississippi, from 1942 of Sid Hemphill of the ballad of “Jack the Roguish Man.”

“Frankie and Albert” merits a closer look. Its antecedents as “Frankie and Johnny” date far back in the nineteenth century, and there are unverified reports that it could have been sung by Union troops in 1863 during the siege of Vicksburg, but the earliest twelve-measure versions known for sure date from the 1870s through the 1900s. In 1899 in St. Louis, Frankie Baker shot her lover Allan Britt for visiting another woman, and hence became such a notorious story that the song was revised for this current event within the African American oral culture. The song is in twelve measures, three phrases to a I/IV–I/V–I harmonic chord progression, sung to a tempo of 160 beats per minute with the quarter note getting the beat, and the lyric scheme is ABC, with the B line rhyming with the A line, and the C line as a recurring refrain line.

The song was liable to imitation, and its melody to appropriation as the basis for a new song. In the 1890s and early 1900s, a St. Louis underworld figure named Bob McKinney was commemorated in a song apparently based on a variant version of “Frankie and Albert” which in 1927 was recorded for the Vocalion label by Texas songster Henry Thomas. From “Frankie and Johnny” through “Frankie and Albert” to “Bob McKinney,” a preexisting twelve-measure tune was used, with new lyrics substituted in place of the original words. The treatment as recorded by Thomas suggests that African American inflections were introduced in the 1890s to the twelve-measure form, namely the whole-note melodic alternation between the eighth (octave) and seventh scale tones of the prevailing chord, use of half-beats in melody and in syncopation, and microtonal slurs to and from the third scale step.

However unimpressive the process of adopting a preexisting melody in twelve measures and substituting the words may seem, it is the practical beginning of the blues as it was technically described in Part 1.

(It must be remembered that jazz began at the same time, but it adopted the harmonic progression of pre-existing songs and changed the melody as the basis for new jazz pieces.) Additional changes to the blues soon followed: a slowing of tempo from 160 beats per minute to 100 to 120 beats per minute; with the tempo reduced, there would be shorter note-values per word (in music transcription, from quarter note to eighth note); lyrics declaimed during the first two measures of a phrase instead of all four, as a call allowing for an instrumental response; singing in a field holler manner; the assertive emphasis of the first person “I” in lyrics instead of the impersonal “he” or “she” in ballads; and the AAA and AAB lyric schemes. These changes helped to make early blues songs identifiable from their prototypes.

The singing within oral African American communities of bad-man ballads and the development of blues from them took place across the American South, not just in one particular city or rural county. During the 1890s and 1900s, prototypical and early blues were being sung in St. Louis, Memphis, New Orleans, east Texas, the Carolinas, and likely any other place with an African American community. The political and social times were changing, even reversing, from the end of Reconstruction in 1877. Various Southern states passed new voting laws and/or redrew voting districts in effective attempts to strip blacks of their voting power and turned a blind eye to public mob lynchings of blacks. The 1896 Plessey vs. Ferguson U.S. Supreme Court decision prescribed “separate but equal” facilities for blacks apart from those for whites. It was a time then for African Americans to group together and affirm positively their identity among themselves. Singing about brothers and sisters “outside the law” was one means of affirmation; reviving what was remembered about West African ecstatic rituals and their accompanying music in the newly founded Church of God in Christ (COGIC) “Holiness” congregations was another.

With the formulation of blues having taken place in oral, mostly poor communities, it was a few years before it was noticed enough by composers to be notated and published as sheet music. The most remarkable of such composers was W. C. Handy, an African American musician who had first heard a slide guitarist around 1903 at a Tutwiler, Mississippi, train station, and a few years earlier saw a rudimentary blues group making much money in tips during a break in one of Handy’s dance band appearances. After having lived in Clarksdale, Mississippi, and Memphis, he moved to New York and founded Handy Brothers Music Company, through which he published his most famous compositions, including “St. Louis Blues.” The visual look of his publications shaped for many how blues should be notated on paper.

Most of the first-generation bluesmen are unknown, and those few whose names are known (such as Henry Sloan and Earl Harris) are known as teachers of the second generation of bluesmen who would become the first generation on records. Only a handful of the first-generation blues musicians made records, at least Henry Thomas and Leadbelly of Texas, Furry Lewis and Gus Cannon of Memphis, Sid Hemphill of Mississippi, and arguments may be made to include Mance Lipscomb, Jelly Roll Morton, Geechie Wiley, Ma Rainey, and Reverend Gary Davis. Still, listening to their records and considering the scant written information leads to some conjecture. It appears in this 1890s–1920 era that the guitar and piano were replacing the banjo and the fiddle, and the harmonica replacing the push-button accordion. Bad-man ballads “Frankie and Albert,” “Stagger Lee,” and “Casey Jones” were still favorites, as were sacred themes like “Jesus Is a Dying Bed Maker” and “See That My Grave Is Kept Clean” (which shares its melody with “Careless Love”), and early but outright blues like “Don’t You Leave Me Here,” “C. C. Rider,” and “Make Me a Pallet on Your Floor.”

Prewar Era, 1920–1932: The “Classic” Years

“Prewar” refers to the time prior to World War II. Up until then, little appears to have changed for African Americans since 1890, although a significant migration for jobs north to St. Louis, Detroit, Pittsburgh, and Chicago would begin in the 1910s and continue for the another 40 years. White mainstream media would not notice most blues, not even the nascent jazz collector press in the early 1940s. Even black newspaper inclusion of blues would be limited for the most part to record company advertisements, especially for record labels like Paramount, Victor, Columbia, and Vocalion. Happily those labels and others recorded much blues of city and rural styles, including barely literate musicians who were performing mostly for close-knit oral communities.

The first blues artists sought by record labels in the wake of Mamie Smith’s 1920 OKeh label hit “Crazy Blues” were women singers active in cabarets, the TOBA circuit, and tent shows. Early on, Alberta Hunter was a star for Paramount, but later Ma Rainey began recording for the same label in 1923, and Bessie Smith for Columbia in 1924. But there were many others too, including Lucille Hegamin, Victoria Spivey, Clara Smith (no relation to Bessie Smith), Edith Wilson, and Rosa Henderson. On a few of these singers’ records there were a number of young jazz musicians, including Willie “The Lion” Smith (for Mamie Smith) and Louis Armstrong (for Bessie Smith, Chippie Hill, Sippie Wallace, and many others). Sometimes the singers developed their own songs, but often they collaborated with songwriters and producers like Mayo Williams, Perry Bradford, and Clarence Williams, so the extent of lyric improvisation on these songs could be limited. All the same, these singers showed the viability of blues on record, and they sustained its appearance on records through the end of the 1920s.

In 1926, southern, male talent was tapped, beginning with Blind Lemon Jefferson of east Texas and Blind Blake of south Georgia/north Florida. Their early success paved the way to recorded posterity for their southern contemporaries, whether rivals or associates. From east Texas also came Blind Willie Johnson, a singer/guitarist of sacred music who was one of Columbia’s best-selling black artists with songs like “I Know His Blood Can Make Me Whole,” “Keep Your Lamp Trimmed and Burning,” and a stark, gripping instrumental version of the crucifixion hymn “Dark Was the Night, Cold Was the Ground.” Meanwhile Jefferson was recording hit after hit for Paramount until his death in the winter of 1929–1930, including “Matchbox Blues” and “See That My Grave Is Kept Clean.” Additional Texas talent was brought in by Will Ed Kemble, especially Elzadie Robinson, Will Ezell, and Rambling Willard Thomas.

In 1929, Mississippi Delta guitarist and singer Charlie Patton scored a major record hit with “Pony Blues” for Paramount. That he was not the earliest Mississippi bluesman to record—that was probably Freddie Spruell in 1926—or the first to have a hit record—Tommy Johnson and Ishmon Bracey’s releases for Victor in 1928 sold quite well—attests to the depth of blues talent and the competitiveness in the Delta. Cotton farming expanded to near-industrial proportions with the opening of plantations like Dockery’s in the 1890s, with many laborers and farmers arriving and with them musicians for weekend entertainment at plantation jukes and suppers. It has been said that the further north toward Memphis one proceeds in the Delta, the keener the musical competition, and it is no accident that Patton, Son House, Willie Brown, Memphis Minnie, and Robert Johnson, among others, lived near the Delta’s north tip, at least for a while. Jackson, the state capital, was where Tommy Johnson and Bracey were most active, along with Johnny Temple. Just northwest of Jackson was the cotton hamlet of Bentonia, where Henry Stuckey, Skip James, and Jack Owens performed minor-mode blues. West of Jackson was the Bolton/Edwards area, where Patton was born. It was also where the Chatmon family lived, whose brothers, Walter Vincson and Lonnie Carter, formed the Mississippi Sheiks string band and had the influential hit “Sitting on Top of the World” in 1930. In the same area, Bo Carter had a stellar career with his entertaining and risqué series of records. South of Jackson is Hattiesburg, where the Graves brothers and the underrecorded pianist Cooney Vaughan performed. There were also a number of rootless musicians, including Little Brother Montgomery, whose “Vicksburg Blues” was widely heard and copied. Even so, when “prewar” Mississippi blues is mentioned, the Delta and the Patton–House–Robert Johnson lineage comes to many minds.

Scattered across the South were a number of intriguing personalities who had made evocative records. In Atlanta were Peg Leg Howell, who recorded most of his blues and songs for Columbia, and Barbecue Bob and Blind Willie McTell. In Alabama was Ed Bell, whose “Mamlish Blues” remains a puzzling title to scholars, Clifford Gibson, Jaybird Coleman, George “Bullet” Williams, Edward Thompson, and Marshall Owens. In Louisiana was accordionist Amadie Ardoin who established what was to become known as zydeco. Between Texas and Mississippi, Louisiana was also a tramping ground for blues musicians shuttling between the three states, and mixtures of Texas, Louisiana, and Mississippi blues elements can be heard in the surviving recordings of journey people Sam Collins, Geechie Wiley, and King Solomon Hill (Joe Holmes). West Tennessee had Sleepy John Estes and Willie Newburn, who made the first recording of the blues standard “Roll and Tumble Blues” in 1929.

Jug bands had a considerable presence in the 1920s. Believed to have been active as early as the 1900s as part of the medicine shows and minstrel shows, the instrumentation was banjo, guitar, kazoo, spoons or bones, washtub basses, and the namesake jug as a functional tuba. Relatively few jug bands made it to records, but those who did were the Memphis-based groups Memphis Jug Band and Gus Cannon’s Jug Stompers, and Louisville, Kentucky–based groups including Whistler’s Jug Band. Later jug-band styles featured the harmonica, which Will Shade played in the Memphis Jug Band, and Noah Lewis for Gus Cannon.

In 1928 two widely influential records were issued. One was “Tight Like That” by guitarist Tampa Red and pianist and former Ma Rainey sideman Thomas A. Dorsey. Although it had been preceded by Charlie Jackson’s “Shake That Thing” (1925), “Tight Like That” was a massive hit, providing the single-entendre hokum style with one of its most adopted melodies, and the 4 + 8 lyric format. The other record was “How Long How Long Blues” by pianist and vocalist Leroy Carr of Indianapolis, Indiana, with guitarist Scrapper Blackwell. The song also had its precedents, certainly back to 1925 with Ida Cox's "How Long Daddy How Long" (also with Charlie Jackson accompanying). But Carr brought two new characteristics: an easy, crooning vocal delivery into the microphone, whereas previous and contemporary blues singers had been projecting and bellowing as they would in a large club or an outdoor picnic; and an easy, four-to-the-bar bass pulse in common 4/4 meter. Carr's "How Long How Long" established him and Blackwell as a recording duo, and it spawned hundreds of imitations on records and off. It has been said it was the first song learned by Robert Johnson and by Muddy Waters.

One of the most important cities for the development of urban blues was St. Louis. St. Louis musicians were hugely influenced by Carr's style when it arrived. Throughout the late 1920s and 1930s, Lonnie Johnson reigned supreme with his own brand of self-deprecating blues and virtuoso jazz guitar numbers. The leading pianists, Wesley Wallace, Romeo Nelson, and Edith North Johnson, continued to exercise their own impressive piano chops in instrumentals, but behind singers like Alice Moore they were playing the 4/4 bass pulse instead of the ornate accompaniments played by Will Ezell, Porter Grainger, and Clarence Williams behind the classic blueswomen. By the early 1930s, Roosevelt Sykes, Walter Davis, and Peetie Wheatstraw (William Bunch) were making piano and vocal records comparable to Carr's. A few St. Louis guitarists made it to records, notably Teddy Darby, Henry Townsend, Clifford Jordan, and J. D. Short.

"Boogie-woogie" pianism became more widely heard during the 1920s. This style usually employed bass runs up and down the scale in 8/8 meter, instead of the octave leaps in ragtime and stride piano then in practice. Key performances on records were "The Rocks" by George Thomas (as by Clay Custer, in 1923), "Cow Cow Blues" by Cow Cow Davenport (1925), "Honky Tonk Train Blues" by Meade Lux Lewis (1927), and "Pine Top Blues" and "Pine Top's Boogie Woogie" by Clarence "Pine Top" Smith (1928). The boogie bass runs formulated by these musicians were imitated by other pianists, orchestrated for big bands in the 1930s and 1940s, and adopted by the rhythm sections in electric blues bands and rock bands after World War II.

Prewar Era, 1930–1942: The Great Depression Years

In October 1929, the stock market crashed and from there the Great Depression began. With jobs becoming scarce, and the record industry falling in 1931 to six percent of what it had been in the late 1920s, many blues musicians found themselves losing record contracts, or simply falling out of music altogether. Even the biggest recording stars like Bessie Smith, Blind Willie Johnson, Charlie Patton, Leroy Carr, and Lonnie Johnson had to rely more on live appearances, which were becoming less lucrative as their audiences had less money to spend, whether in the cities or on the farms. For nearly two years, from Summer 1932 to Spring 1934, new recording including blues was nearly halted, effecting an economic blackout. Among the very few recording acts who did record in 1933 were Roosevelt Sykes, Josh White, the Sparks Brothers, and Lucille Bogan with Walter Roland. When the recording industry began to recover in 1934, the first records by Carr, Sykes, and Wheatstraw revealed considerable cross-influence during the fallow period. Other new artists emerged as well, notably Bumble Bee Slim and Georgia White, Big Joe Williams, and John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson. By 1940 the record industry would return to its pre-Depression sales, although recordings of blues and of Mississippi blues in particular were considerably reduced.

In the early 1930s, north Alabama, including the mill towns of Birmingham and Huntsville, had a distinctive group of blues musicians. Pianist Jabo Williams made a series of rare yet pounding performances, including "Ko Ko Mo Blues" and "Fat Mamma Blues" for Paramount in 1932. His protégé Walter Roland would record his own version of "Fat Mamma Blues" as "Fat Lady Blues" in 1934, but his best performances were as piano sidekick to vocalist Lucille Bogan. Bogan was no newcomer, as she had been recording since 1923 and had scored an influential hit with "Black Angel Blues" in 1930. But the introduction of new melodies and new styles of piano accompaniment in the late 1920s led to new expressions for Bogan, Roland, and their guitar associate Sonny Scott, as they preserved them in 1933–1935 on records like "Red Cross Man" and the notorious racy version of "Shave 'Em Dry."

Kansas City was riding high in the 1920s and 1930s as a "wide open" city for drinking and gambling establishments in the era of the Thomas Pendergast political machine. That such establishments were flourishing meant high demands for music, which in the black clubs meant jazz/blues bands led by Bennie Moten, Count Basie (with tenor saxophonist Lester Young and singers Helen Humes and Jimmy Rushing), Harlan Leonard, and Andy Kirk (with pianist Mary Lou Williams). Blues shouting and boogie-woogie piano were provided by Big Joe Turner with pianist Pete Johnson. Even after the Pendergast era ended, one more notable group emerged, that led by pianist Jay McShann, with alto saxophonist Charlie Parker and vocalist Walter Brown.

The Carolinas and Georgia Piedmont style of blues came to records in the mid- to late 1930s. During the previous decade a distinctive guitar style had formed out of dances, ragtime, and early blues. Blind Blake and Willie McTell were important in that formulation, but the core performances of 1930s Piedmont blues were those by Blind Boy Fuller and his teacher Reverend Gary Davis. Piedmont was (and still is) very much in the blues tradition—it made use of melodic themes like “Kokomo Blues,” but a comparison of McTell’s “Savannah Mama” (1934) to Robert Johnson’s “Sweet Home Chicago” (1936) will yield stylistic differences amid the traditional similarities. The Piedmont style continued with Brownie McGhee with Sonny Terry, followed by John Cephas with Phil Wiggins.

Recording opportunities for Mississippi musicians in the mid- to late 1930s were rare, but those who seized them were young musicians in the generation after Charlie Patton, such as Bukka White and Robert Johnson. White had recorded for Victor in 1930, but it was his 1937 Vocalion record “Shake ‘Em on Down” that gained him fame outside Mississippi. Unfortunately, a prison term for a shooting kept him from enjoying the immediate rewards, but the sales of his records were high and sustained enough as to lead to a session on his 1940 release from prison, when he recorded “Fixin’ to Die Blues” among other new classics. Johnson had begun by imitating Carr’s “How Long How Long Blues” and Son House’s “Walking Blues” (“My Black Mama”) and “Preaching the Blues,” but in the early 1930s he acquired a wide breadth of guitar technique whether by imitating Skip James through Johnnie Temple, or by adapting piano-based songs like Bumble Bee Slim’s “Cruel Hearted Woman” (1935) for his own “Kind Hearted Woman” (1936). His best-selling record was “Terraplane Blues,” a highway blues to a Peetie Wheatstraw-style melody with guitar fills including heavily plucked tonic and tonic-seventh chords. Johnson died in 1938 under mysterious circumstances, but the commercial records made in 1940 and 1941 by Robert Lockwood and Frank Edwards showed that Johnson exerted an influence at that time yet to be measured.

Migration to the northern cities was increasing into the 1930s. One group that is emblematic of that migration was the Harlem Hamfats, who were organized for Decca by black producer Mayo Williams. In truth, the Hamfats were not from Harlem; two of its members Charlie and Joe McCoy were from Mississippi, but its style was in city jazz, especially in the Louis Armstrong-influenced trumpet of Herb Morand, who came from New Orleans. How the raw Delta sound of Patton and House would be assimilated when young Mississippi laborers came north became a matter for the 1940s.

Another Mississippi musician of the White-Johnson generation was Big Joe Williams. His first recordings in 1935 have a strong imprint of Charlie Patton, but it wasn’t long before he adapted his style to the RCA Bluebird label he was recording for. Lester Melrose was the main force behind the Bluebird blues sessions, acting as talent scout, publisher, and producer. His leading artists were Tampa Red, John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson, Washboard Sam, Memphis Minnie, and Big Bill Broonzy. All of these artists were from the South, but Melrose set them in front of rhythm sections that gave a sleek, urbane sound—in fact, an intermediary stage in the transition from multilayered group to homophonic ensemble then unfolding.

From Players to Ensembles

A crucial transition in American vernacular music including the blues was from multilayered polyphonic approaches to music making with several players/singers performing individual, identifiable melodies simultaneously, to the homophonic approach with several players performing to a common beat or metric pulse with the singer and/or lead instrumentalist (saxophone, harmonica, guitar) performing in an ornamental if distinctive fashion. This transition occurred across American popular music but it especially affected jazz, blues, and country music, and it contributed to the massive cross-influence among those types of music in the 1940s and 1950s, culminating in rock ‘n’ roll. The homophonic approach demands the creation of a rhythm section, whether of one, two, three, or more musicians, to maintain a steady beat according to the meter (usually 4/4) and to coordinate it to the harmonic chord progression of the song being performed. The result of this combination of rhythm and harmony is the “big beat,” which when emphasized (especially amplified as in rock and rap) is attractive to listeners. Its prevalence in vernacular music practice since the 1930s helps to define what is “modern” in jazz, blues, and country music. Examples of this transition for jazz include the Louis Armstrong recordings with the Hot Five and Hot Seven and as a solo artist from 1925 through 1932, and the Bennie Moten and Count Basie Kansas City-style jazz of the 1930s; for country music, there are the 1930s recordings of early Western swing with Milton Brown and Bob Wills together and separately; and for blues there are the Leroy Carr 1928–1935 recordings with Scrapper Blackwell functioning as ornament to Carr's piano bass; the St. Louis pianists including Roosevelt Sykes, Walter Davis, and Peetie Wheatstraw; and the prewar Mississippi case examples found in the commercial recordings of Robert Johnson, the Graves brothers and Cooney Vaughan as the Mississippi Jook Band, and the Library of Congress recordings of Muddy Waters. Also, the foundation function of the rhythm section and its need to keep it intact helped the phenomenon of long-lasting band lineups, including the Chicago blues bands from the 1950s onward. The adoption of the homophonic approach from those in the 1930s by the first rock musicians in the 1950s is the final stage of this transition, and it may be demonstrated by comparing "Brain Cloudy Blues" recorded by Bob Wills and his Texas Playboys with vocalist Tommy Duncan (1946, Columbia 37313) with "Milk Cow Blues Boogie" recorded by Elvis Presley (1954, Sun 215).

Postwar Blues, 1943–1954

Since co-writing and performing "Tight Like That" in 1928, Thomas A. Dorsey turned exclusively to gospel music, writing new standards like "Take My Hand, Precious Lord" and "Peace in the Valley" that would shape how many blacks would sing for many generations, not just sacred music but also the blues. Singers were stepping away from singing like field hands, and Dorsey's early singers, Sallie Martin, Roberta Martin, and Mahalia Jackson, set new ways of singing in general, especially Jackson's forceful manner of hammering a top note seemingly from above. Gospel quartets were another development. The Golden Gate Quartet was a 1930s favorite, succeeded by the Fairfield Four in the 1940s. By the 1950s, some quartets incorporated dramatic knee drops and scream ornaments into their frenzied music, including the Sensational Nightingales, the Dixie Hummingbirds, the Soul Stirrers, and the Harmonizing Four.

World War II shaped most American lives during the early 1940s. Many blacks served in the armed forces, although in units segregated from whites. Elmore James served in Guam; Howlin' Wolf was stationed in Seattle. For blues musicians not involved in the war, recording activity was limited by the two-year American Federation of Musicians union recording ban in 1942–1944, and the U.S. government's V-Disc program to the Armed Forces, which had some jazz but little blues. Also, the high numbers of young men drafted, and the continuing need for industrial supplies, resulted in large numbers of good and immediate paying jobs becoming available, especially in northern cities.

The Great Migration of blacks moving from the south to the north and to the West Coast had been going on for several decades, and the wartime availability of industrial jobs in Detroit and Chicago beckoned black labor like never before. Along with better, more regular pay than could be had on southern plantations, there was a new opportunity for a better living style and less racial harassment from governing whites; for these reasons Chicago and other northern cities were regarded as the Promised Land, and the migration as an Exodus. Blues performers followed their audiences north, staying put with them or making return trips for gigs down-home.

Los Angeles and the Bay Area cities of Oakland and San Francisco were common destinations for blacks heading west. Jump blues, featuring raucous blues-shouting singers, raspy tenor saxes, and coordinated trumpet sections, had its antecedents in Kansas City and St. Louis, but its swing feel was in keeping with 1940s musicianship from the bands of Chick Webb, Lionel Hampton, Lucky Millinder, and Cab Calloway. A key figure was Louis Jordan, a first-rate bandleader, alto saxophonist, and singer who employed excellent rhythm section musicians in his Tympany Five to maintain the big beat, and prototype electric guitarists Carl Hogan and Carl Jennings who played single-note solos that would later influence Chuck Berry. The great singers in the jump band format were Wynonie Harris, Roy Brown, and Roy Milton, with Big Joe Turner moving from Kansas City to Los Angeles. Smoother-voiced singers were popular too, including Cecil Gant, who was dubbed "the sepia Sinatra." Charles Brown, the most popular blues performer of the immediate postwar era, and Jimmy Witherspoon were his successors in the 1950s. Nat "King" Cole was capable of an influential blues turn in "Route 66" in his Trio, and Ray Charles's first records reveal the influence of Cole and Brown. Other newcomers to the West Coast were Lowell Fulson, Percy Mayfield, Pee Wee Crayton, and Amos Milburn. Among women, Hadda Brooks stood out, her early hits helping to establish the Modern record label, and she even made a few appearances in Hollywood films.

Chicago was another destination in the migration; musicians often headed straight to Maxwell Street, where blues and gospel performers played for shoppers on Sundays. Key figures who moved from Mississippi to the Windy City were Muddy Waters in 1943, who soon afterwards adapted his slide guitar technique to his first electric guitar, then by the end of the 1940s had assembled with guitarist Jimmy Rogers one of the first electric Chicago blues groups of two guitars, harmonica, bass, piano, and drums; Howlin'

Wolf, a longtime mid-South favorite who came north in the early 1950s; Elmore James, whose Broomdusters were surpassed only by the Waters and Wolf bands. Also in Chicago were Aleck Miller, aka "Sonny Boy Williamson II," a harmonica giant who had made many popular and important records for Trumpet in Jackson, Mississippi, who came north to record for Chess Records with the assistance of guitarist Robert Lockwood; Bo Diddley from McComb, Mississippi, who chugged out "shave-and-a-haircut, two bits" rhythm patterns on his rectangular Gretsch guitars; and Willie Dixon and Jimmy Reed, who with Eddie Taylor turned out some of the signature tunes of the late 1950s including "Big Boss Man." Much of the music they recorded was similar to what they were playing in Mississippi during the 1930s, including songs first recorded by Charlie Patton, Son House, Robert Johnson, and Willie Newburn, but to a bigger homophonic beat that any of these predecessors (except Johnson) could have foreseen. Most of these groups recorded for Chess, although Reed recorded for Vee-Jay.

Detroit had a blues scene of its own, as far back as when Blind Blake recorded "Hastings Street" in 1929, through Calvin Frazier's arrival in 1937 from Arkansas. The most famous bluesman found there was John Lee Hooker, whose first record "Boogie Chillen'" presented the basic guitar style that he would improve on later songs like "Boom Boom." Also notable were Eddie Burns and Baby Boy Warren, and the JVB label which was operated locally with local talent.

The rise of Mississippi-émigré postwar blues coincided with the decline of Lester Melrose's roster of artists. John Lee Williamson "Sonny Boy I" was fatally stabbed with an ice pick in 1947. Broonzy, Tampa Red, and Memphis Minnie continued, but their careers were stopped before 1960 by, respectively, cancer, family tragedy, and stroke. Big Joe Williams journeyed back and forth between north and south. Arthur "Big Boy" Crudup was one of Melrose's last discoveries, enjoying several hits during the waning Bluebird era.

There was still some talent to be found in Mississippi and the mid-South, even after the leading bluesmen left. Ike Turner led a band with vocalist Jackie Brenston, and their record "Rocket 88" was a hit in 1952. Turner served as a talent scout for Modern and other labels, and it was he who alerted Modern to Howlin' Wolf, and to Houston Boines and Charley Booker of Greenville, Mississippi. Trumpet Records of Jackson, owned by Lillian McMurry, recorded not only Sonny Boy Williamson II and Elmore James, but also the Huff brothers, Willie Love, Big Joe Williams, and Willie Clayton, as well as a wide variety of country and gospel acts. Other great Mississippi bluesmen of this time were Guitar Slim (Eddie Jones), who performed "The Things I Used to Do," and J. B. Lenoir, the great composer who wrote and performed topical songs on the Korean and Vietnam Wars and on the Civil Rights Movement, and who also wrote the post-war standard "Mama Talk to Your Daughter."

One of the greatest Mississippi talents, B. B. King, moved to Memphis in 1949. For several years King's base of operations was WDIA, a pioneering black radio station where his regular show was scheduled among those of Nat D. Williams and Rufus Thomas. Beale Street remained at the center of black Memphis nightlife as it always had since W. C. Handy's day, where on a typical night one would hear young up-and-coming musicians like Bobby Bland and Roscoe Gordon, and street regulars like Big Memphis Ma Rainey. Local whites in the music business paid attention to Beale Street, including Sam Phillips who recorded much of the Beale blues with options to sell to Modern and Chess, and, later, for his own Sun label, and Dewey Phillips (no relation) who mixed black and white styles on his evening WHBQ radio show. Radio presentation of blues was rapidly evolving, from fifteen-minute sponsored shows (although KFFA in Helena, Arkansas, had been broadcasting its legendary King Biscuit Time blues since 1940) to shifts of "disk jockeys" playing three-minute records. One of the most powerful radio stations in the mid-South was WLAC in Nashville, featuring "John R." Richbourg and Bill "Hoss" Allen.

East Texas entered postwar blues with guitarists. T-Bone Walker hailed from the Dallas region, but he made his long-standing mark when he moved to the West Coast and recorded "Stormy Monday." In 1947, filling in for an ill Walker, Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown performed on guitar so impressively that the club owner Don Robey signed him to a management contract. Brown's "Okie Dokie Stomp" became a test piece for blues guitarists for many years. Robey moved into the record business initially with Peacock and then with Duke. Two of his later artists were Johnny Ace, legendary for his losing game of Russian roulette on New Year's Eve, 1952, and Bobby "Blue" Bland who after a stint in the army began recording for Duke a long string of hits with "I Pity the Fool." Some local musicians stayed outside Robey's growing music empire. One such artist was the prolific Sam "Lightnin'" Hopkins, who could improvise new lyrics to suit any topic or occasion and fit them to a tune new or old, some going back to Leroy Carr.

The Southeast was changing, with Atlanta emerging as a metropolitan center. Peg Leg Howell and Willie McTell were still playing, and each would have chances to record after World War II. In Atlanta the club owner Otis Ealey managed Elmore James in 1954. Frank Edwards and others were notable as local musicians for many years. Among the Carolinians, Blind Boy Fuller had died in 1941, and Reverend Gary Davis and Brownie McGhee had moved north, leaving Richard Trice and a few others.

Several different black styles were developing in Louisiana in the 1950s. Swamp blues was a laid-back style, with a slow tempo, reverberant beats, and high vocals; much of it was based around Baton Rouge and recorded by Excello Records, featuring Slim Harpo, Lightnin' Slim, Lazy Lester, Silas Hogan, and Lonesome Sundown. Zydeco was an eclectic combination of Louisiana folk and popular music, and it was formulated by such powerful musical personalities as Clifton Chenier, Boozoo Chavis, and Rockin' Dopsie. New Orleans remained a musical center for pianists especially local hero Professor Longhair, the renowned Fats Domino, and, late in his long life, Roosevelt Sykes.

In the late 1940s and early 1950s, women singers appeared in front of jump bands and led the way to more sophisticated styles. Picking up where Helen Humes left off, singers like Ruth Brown, Big Maybelle Smith, LaVern Baker, and Esther Phillips were stand-out names, while others like Marie Adams remain cult favorites. Dinah Washington is perhaps now the most imitated singer in recent jump blues revival bands.

Postwar Blues Upheavals, 1954–1970

Two musical upheavals came in the mid-1950s, both brought about in part by the blues. Soul music is generally dated as beginning when the manners of gospel singing and piano playing in church were applied to blues and popular music. Ray Charles tried the combination in 1954 with “I Got a Woman” and “Hallelujah, I Love Her So,” to equal parts derision and applause from audiences. Nonetheless, he had tapped into a new expression, which he would explore further in “Drown in My Own Tears,” “Lonely Avenue,” “Leave My Woman Alone” (compare to Washington Phillips’ “I Was Born to Preach the Gospel”) and take to unparalleled heights in “What’d I Say.” Sam Cooke came from the opposite direction, from gospel quartet to pop, when he left the Soul Stirrers to become a solo pop artist. His early hits “You Send Me” and “Cupid” established his pop career, but the gospel tinge was still evident in songs like “Bring It on Home to Me” (with protégé Lou Rawls) and the civil rights anthem “A Change Is Gonna Come.” Cooke’s untimely death in 1964 by shooting left many “what if?” possibilities, some of which were fulfilled by Otis Redding, the singer at the Stax studio in Memphis who from 1964 to 1967 tapped deeply the sanctified feeling in many of his songs. Redding too died unexpectedly in a plane crash, but by then the broad characteristics of soul were identified and set for the blues to depart from and return to in later decades.

Rock 'n' roll made a bigger mainstream media splash because in large part it was attracting the ears of white teenagers. Regardless of what was the “first” rock 'n' roll record, whether the 1936 Mississippi Jook Band recordings or the 1936–1937 Robert Johnson sessions, the 1940s Decca sessions of Louis Jordan, the 1951 “Rocket 88” by Jackie Brenston with Ike Turner, or the 1953 “Rock This Joint” by Bill Haley, it can be safely be said that whites in the South became aware of rock through the Sun issues of Elvis Presley, and those in the north through Bill Haley’s “Rock Around the Clock,” especially when it was on the soundtrack in the film “Blackboard Jungle.” Exactly why the teenagers adopted these records and their blues antecedents behind them is open to debate, but several aspects should be noted. One was that the homophonic big beat played by the bass and drums could be felt from the bandstand via the floor to the listeners’ standing feet, providing a thrilling effect. Another was that many blues songs reflected the second-class status of blacks, a situation that many white teenagers identified with, at least temporarily until they became adults. A third aspect was that the blues musicians sang of sexuality, which led some listeners and dancers to question middle-class morality. The impact of rock 'n' roll was not merely musical, but also visual. Consider the infamous “waist-up” camerawork on Elvis Presley during a 1957 appearance on CBS-TV’s Ed Sullivan Show that excluded his gyrations, the very movements he picked up while watching blues entertainers and black (and white) gospel groups in his hometown of Memphis; it was too new and seemed to threaten mainstream America. But the uproar did not keep Presley and other early rockers from adapting or imitating blues artists or from resetting country music standards into rock versions, hence producing rockabilly on through the end of the 1950s. There are two views from black culture to be considered and researched: the extent to which black performing artists were ripped off for songs credited to others as composers (Big Mama Thornton’s version of Leiber and Stoller’s “Hound Dog” is a case in point), and the propriety of taking a manner of performance for black sacred spiritual ecstatic ritual and resetting it for white popular music tastes. It is questionable to progress from Hank Ballard’s “Work with Me, Annie” through Etta James’s “The Wallflower” to the modified 1955 version of James’s version as “Dance with Me Henry” by white singer Georgia Gibbs.

The Civil Rights Movement was a social upheaval that coincided with the musical ones. Blacks were uniting into political groups like the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and religiously affiliated ones like the Southern Christian Leadership Conference led by Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and, on the militant side, the Nation of Islam led by Elijah Muhammad with Malcolm X as a leading spokesman. Important victories were being won, starting with the 1954 Supreme Court decision Brown vs. Board of Education, which overturned Plessy vs. Ferguson; the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which reaffirmed the rights for blacks to vote; and the first black enrollments at southern white universities like the University of Mississippi in 1962 and the University of Alabama in 1963. These events were commemorated in various blues and folk songs, none finer than those composed by J. B. Lenoir, who up until then was a Chicago club star best known for the West Side standard “Mama Talk to Your Daughter,” who was now composing “Down in Mississippi” and “Shot on James Meredith.” The civil rights march was perilous: NAACP officer Medger Evers was shot and killed in Jackson, Mississippi in 1963, and three civil rights workers were killed near Philadelphia, Mississippi, in June 1964.

That same weekend in June, two independently working teams of three white men each traveled to Mississippi, one looking for Son House, the other looking for Skip James. Each team was part of a blues rediscovery movement within the folk music revival begun the previous year with the location of John Hurt and Bukka White. Skip James was found quickly enough in a Tunica, Mississippi, hospital, but Son House turned out to be living in Rochester, New York, having traveled the same long road there like other Mississippians to northern opportunity, including his younger neighbor Joe Beard. House’s rediscovery was especially good news, because he was regarded as a teacher to Robert Johnson, whose recordings had lately been reissued in 1961 by Columbia Records to wide acclaim by jazz and folk music listeners. Through the 1960s, additional elder bluesmen were found and brought to folk festival and club stages including Reverend Robert Wilkins, Reverend Gary Davis, Sleepy John Estes with Yank Rachel and Hammie Nixon, Johnnie Temple, and Roosevelt Sykes.

Other blues figures were not disregarded, especially Muddy Waters with Otis Spann, Howlin’ Wolf with Hubert Sumlin, Jimmy Reed, John Lee Hooker, Lightnin’ Hopkins, and Big Mama Thornton, all of them enjoying new exposure to white audiences in the 1960s. The question remained of who among active musicians, old and young, was waiting to be discovered the first time around. Texas had Mance Lipscomb, old enough to have been of the songster era found. The northern Mississippi hills yielded Fred McDowell, Jessie Mae Hemphill, Othar Turner, and R. L. Burnside, while the Delta had Houston Stackhouse, James “Son” Thomas, and Wade Walton, and living in Bentonia were Henry Stuckey and Jack Owens with Bud Spires. Chicago had many older Mississippi transplants from the Robert Johnson era like Johnny Shines and David “Honeyboy” Edwards. White listeners new to the blues eventually realized what many black audiences north and south knew all along: that there was a younger generation playing blues in their own way. The Chicago West Side players were making their mark, reforming the tough electric Mississippi-transplant sound of Waters, Wolf, Elmore James, and Sonny Boy Williamson II with the single-note solos of B. B. King and the virtuosity of Little Walter; among them were Junior Wells, Buddy Guy, Otis Rush, and Magic Sam, with saxophonists Eddie Shaw, A. C. Reed, and Buddy’s brother Phil Guy, and drummers Sam Lay and Odie Payne.

Meanwhile, these rediscoveries and new discoveries were being chronicled in blues magazines in Europe. Blues Unlimited and Blues World in 1963 were the earliest magazines to start up and to last through the 1960s. Soul Bag and Jefferson followed, and Living Blues in 1970 was the first white American-published magazine. Research and scholarship entered a new level in 1959 with publication of Samuel Charters’ The Country Blues, and the following year with Paul Oliver’s Blues Fell This Morning; these foundational texts inspired many young researchers.

There was a growing white involvement in the culture supporting blues. In Chicago were Ray Flerlage, a photographer on the South Side who took some of the most memorable photographs of postwar blues artists and their audiences; Bob Koester, the record dealer who had moved from St. Louis to Chicago and who sought and encouraged old and new talent from Roosevelt Sykes to Magic Sam; and Michael Bloomfield, who learned guitar from bluesmen such as Big Joe Williams and Muddy Waters, assisted in the film shooting of the Maxwell Street film And This Is Free, and was a cornerstone in the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, a great, racially mixed blues-rock group. Additional white contributions were made in folk and acoustic blues by guitarists Ry Cooder and by John Paul Hammond, the son of impresario and record producer John Hammond who had worked with Bessie Smith and Count Basie in the 1930s. Stefan Grossman had taken lessons as a teenager from Reverend Gary Davis, and later would become a teacher and transcriber of classic pre-World War II guitar blues performances.

The way blues records were being issued was changing. Through 1958 blues records were for the most part singles in 78-rpm or 45-rpm formats, and 33 1/3-rpm LPs were for the most part collections of 45-rpm singles. Blues rediscovery artists like John Hurt, Son House, and Bukka White were allowed a little flexibility in music presentation as part of the folk music LP recording and producing practices. But it is widely acknowledged that Delmark Records, run by Bob Koester in Chicago, showed how a working band could be presented on commercial records, especially with the 1965 album Hoodoo Man Blues by Junior Wells; its critical and commercial success was followed by Magic Sam's West Side Soul (1967). Since then, blues issues have been on LP and later CD formats, with singles being made for the jukebox market in black neighborhoods north and south.

Records were the main means of influence in the United Kingdom, not only on record collectors and critics, but also on young Anglo musicians as well. Exports and later European issues of blues recordings from the Chess, Vee-Jay, and Excello labels were played for study and imitation; Chess's license with Pye resulted in many blues records by Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, Chuck Berry, and Bo Diddley becoming widely available. Slim Harpo, Rufus Thomas, and Sonny Boy Williamson II also became significant there. The annual American Folk Blues Festival tours provided valuable opportunities for budding Anglo blues performers to see and hear how their favorite bluesmen sang and played in the ways they had previously heard only on records. And so it was that Alexis Korner, John Mayall, Cyril Davies, and Graham Bond, with the individual members of the Rolling Stones, the Yardbirds, and the Animals trained themselves in blues, and prepared themselves for their roles in the British Invasion of American popular music markets spearheaded by the Beatles in 1964.

It seemed ironic that British groups were coming to America to play to young white teenagers—a generation removed from those teenagers who had adopted black music in the 1950s—the very music to be found in the black ghettos and blue-collar neighborhoods. Even more, a few of these groups sought to record in the same studios as their blues heroes, like the Yardbirds in Sun Studios in Memphis in 1965, and the Rolling Stones in Chess Studios in Chicago in the same year. They were riding higher waves of visibility, promotion, and profit than their heroes, and it was uncommon but notable for a few of them to offer back some better-paying opportunities.

Cases may be made for each of the three Kings—B. B., Freddy, and Albert. B. B. King in the mid-1960s was the biggest star of the three, but even when his classic concert album Live at the Regal (1964) was recorded and released, he was playing for modest fees to black audiences. His mainstream breakthrough was aided by his playing Las Vegas in 1968 and by the Rolling Stones' invitation to open for them on their 1969 tour, and secured with his 1970 hit "The Thrill Is Gone." Freddy King's classic "Hide Away" guitar solo, itself taken from Elmore James and Hound Dog Taylor, was copied by Eric Clapton on John Mayall's Bluesbreakers LP (1965), a classic blues-rock primer for white British and American guitarists, but like B. B., Freddy slugged it out on chitlin circuit gigs and the occasional British club tour until he too received offers to tours with the popular white rock groups. Albert King's 1960s work was appropriated as much as B. B.'s, whether when his song "Born Under a Bad Sign" was recorded by Cream in 1968, or his rendition of Fenton Robinson's "As the Years Go Passing By" became the model for "Since I've Been Loving You" by the group Led Zeppelin in 1970, or the vocal opening of the same performance for the signature guitar riff by Eric Clapton for "Layla" in 1972. The appropriations from Albert King were less obvious than those from B. B. and Freddy, and his due was to be less forthcoming through the end of the 1970s.

As 1970 dawned, an era in blues seemed to be closing. Among the rediscoveries, John Hurt died in 1966, Skip James in 1969, and Son House toured England for the last time in 1970. Talent that could have led the blues into the next decade died young—J. B. Lenoir in 1966 in a car crash, Magic Sam in 1969 from a heart attack, and Little Walter in 1967 from a savage beating. One of the most powerful figures in the Chicago music business, Leonard Chess, died suddenly of a heart attack, but it happened after he had sold Chess Records and its valuable postwar blues catalog to GRT Corporation. In Memphis, Sam Phillips sold his Sun catalog to Shelby Singleton in 1967. Uptown, Stax Records was as successful as ever, especially with the wide popularity of Johnnie Taylor, but the death of Otis Redding in 1967, and Booker T. Jones' move to California after several years of blues and soul instrumental hits, may seem in hindsight to have been omens or irreplaceable losses. The assassinations of President John F. Kennedy, his brother Robert Kennedy, Malcolm X, and Martin Luther King, Jr., and the protracted war in Vietnam had implications on individuals, both black and white, in blues audiences.

Jazz evolved rapidly from the late 1950s through the end of the 1960s. The initial growth came with the development of bebop in New York in the early and mid-1940s by Charlie Parker, Dizzy Gillespie, and Thelonious Monk, where the additional inflections were added to the jazz use of the blues scale, and in front of the 4/4 bass pulse, the solos were taking on more of an 8/8 meter feel. By the late 1950s, Miles Davis and his regular tenor saxophonist John Coltrane were exploring the possibilities of improvising not according to the prevailing harmonic chord changes, but rather to the melodic scale, and using alternate scales to those used in standard blues or bebop. Musicians were having similar realizations of such possibilities; Charles Mingus through sanctified music (as on “Better Git It in Your Soul” on Mingus Ah Um, 1959) and Ornette Coleman with Don Cherry through field hollers and laments (The Shape of Jazz to Come, 1960). The flowering of melody-based jazz came through the so-called “free jazz” or “New Thing” styles through the 1960s, whether through the metrical shifts and stretches of Miles Davis, the modal explorations of John Coltrane with the polyrhythmic drumming of Elvin Jones, the collective improvisations and chants of Sun Ra, or the assertive, often mind-blowing solos of Pharoah Sanders and of Albert Ayler. The 1967 death of John Coltrane, the December 1969 discovery of Albert Ayler’s body in the East River, and the 1971 death of Louis Armstrong may have served as convenient endpoints for the intertwining of jazz and blues. Perhaps, but the deaths themselves are less significant than the efforts of the 1960s jazz generation (including Coltrane and Ayler, among many others) to free jazz melody from the harmonic chord progressions, including those of the blues.

1970–1990

The postwar era through 1970 was one of rapid musical development for the blues, and of great advancement and reaffirmation of civil rights for African Americans and disfranchised American peoples. The late 1960s were heady years for those blues artists most in demand. Their audiences were to be found nationwide, not just in local neighborhoods or home counties; and the attendees were as likely to be white as black, as likely to be literate students as semiliterate blue-collar day workers. African American performers like Richie Havens or Taj Mahal were as likely to be found performing at college concerts and festivals attended mostly by whites, as they were at black venues. Magazines like Blues Unlimited and Living Blues heightened that growing literacy while recording and spreading the latest news and career histories of various musicians. But in 1970 it had been sixty-seven years since W. C. Handy first heard that Delta slide guitarist, a length of time equal to a human life from birth to death. Deaths and retirements of important musicians and label owners opened vacancies for new figures.

Musical changes had been simmering for some years. In the 1950s younger gospel singers like Marion

Williams and Aretha Franklin (daughter of Detroit pastor Reverend C. L. Franklin) had lighter voices than Mahalia Jackson, and they tended to reach lightly for the high note from below, instead of forcefully from above like Jackson. Franklin signed as a Columbia Records artist in 1960, but she really found her style in 1967 for Atlantic Records in the lineage of Ray Charles and Otis Redding. In the meantime, in 1965 Fontella Bass recorded for Chess “Rescue Me,” in a manner that today leads new listeners to mistake her for Franklin. Thomas A. Dorsey’s influence was giving way to the new style of Reverend James Cleveland, who in turn would give way to Andrae Crouch in the 1970s. That evolution in male gospel singing would have its secular counterpart in Al Green, who didn’t belt or even croon his lyrics but breathed them softly and intimately. Even after he turned to religion in 1975, his songs have remained staples for many soul-blues singers including Otis Clay.

Meanwhile, funk was emerging. Three of its early proto-figures had been grounded in rhythm and blues. James Brown’s career went back to 1951, and by the time he recorded his famous 1962 Apollo Theater show, he was established with songs like “Please, Please, Please” and “Night Train.” He was known for using discipline with his bands to keep them in tight precision, which was needed as Brown departed from blues forms (“Papa’s Got a Brand New Bag” in 1965) to open-ended riffs like “Hot Pants.” Jimi Hendrix was exploring funk elements in his 1968 guitar compendium Electric Ladyland, but he died in 1970 before completing an LP of new explorations that had been tentatives, titled First Rays of the New Rising Sun, but initially released as The Cry of Love. Providing a bridge was Curtis Mayfield, who had already written great songs like “People Get Ready” for the Impressions and “Rainbow” for Gene Chandler. Mayfield then developed funk with his soundtrack film music for Superfly. By then the important group Parliament Funkadelic was formed with George Clinton, Bootsy Collins, Catfish Collins, and Eddie Hazel. Other important artists from this time were the Isley Brothers (with the unheralded Ernie Isley on lead guitar), Isaac Hayes, the Meters (with singer Aaron Neville), and Earth, Wind, and Fire.

New instrumentation was being introduced. On B. B. King’s hit single “The Thrill Is Gone,” a synthesizer and string section were heard instead of a thumping blues and drums beat. Horn sections were retained by many studios, especially in Houston by Duke, and in Memphis by Stax and Hi. The Tower of Power gained its own career and its own fame. The new arrangements were not in the jump style; they were brighter and followed the singer more. Bobby Bland’s 1960s hits like “Ain’t Nothing You Can Do” showed the way, but many more were to come in the 1970s like Little Milton's "Walkin' the Back Streets and Crying."

At the time, in the 1970s, it may have seemed that blues had been eclipsed by the new musical developments, but in hindsight it may be more that it had retrenched in the oral culture of its local audiences, especially black audiences, and soaked up new elements. When Robert Cray emerged from the blues club scene to mainstream notice in 1986 with the LP Strong Persuader and its hit "Smoking Gun," fan acceptance was divided, according to what each fan had been aware of in music since 1970. Fans of rock had little to go by, as rock musicians were still working with blues classics of the 1950s and 1960s, and by the late 1970s blues influence in rock was ebbing.

Despite the lower profile of the blues, its low costs of entering the market and the correspondingly low fees of musicians made it possible for new label owners to get started. Several of the labels formed since 1970 were founded by former employees of Bob Koester at the Jazz Record Mart, including Bruce Iglauer at Alligator and Bruce Kaplan at Flying Fish. Iglauer was to have a great impact (if not the greatest) on blues on record, starting with raw-sounding classic LPs by Hound Dog Taylor and Son Seals, continuing with the Living Chicago Blues series, and developing a professional sound quality that would be dubbed "the Alligator sound." His label was key to the later careers of Koko Taylor, Albert Collins, and Luther Allison, and his most recognized album, Showdown! featured Robert Cray, Johnny Copeland, and Albert Collins.

In Jackson, Mississippi, a new label, Malaco, was begun by two University of Mississippi graduates. It was to specialize in down-home soul and blues, starting with Dorothy Moore's "Misty Blue" in 1976. But it really hit its stride in the early 1980s with the leadership of owner Dave Clark, who helped assemble a roster of rhythm and blues veterans. New and influential classics followed, like "Down Home Blues" by Z. Z. Hill, "The Blues Is Alright" by Little Milton, and "For Members Only" by Bobby Bland.

During the 1970s and 1980s, Mississippi, Memphis, and the Arkansas Delta seemed to settle down in musical ways, if only because little of the music was getting recorded. Cedell Davis was becoming noticed for his eerie slide guitar inflections produced with tableware. Clarksdale's Jelly Roll Kings featuring Frank Frost, Sam Carr, and Big Jack Johnson were a favorite group in the 1960s and 1970s. Prewar musicians Sam Chatman and Eugene Powell kept alive the styles of the Mississippi Sheiks and of Bo Carter. After some years in Chicago, Willie Nix returned to Leland, Mississippi, where acoustic guitarists Son

Thomas and Eddie Cusic were very active. In Jackson, blues veteran Sam Myers was singing and playing harmonica in local clubs, and in 1986 he joined a band led by Anson Funderburgh. Joe Callcott had died in 1969 and Fred McDowell in 1972, but the north Mississippi hill country music was continued by Othar Turner, Junior Kimbrough, and R. L. Burnside. When commercial interest in blues turned to Mississippi after 1990, it found a lot of talent willing and ready to play for any audience.

In the 1970s, a new blues center was emerging in Austin, Texas. A state capital and a large university city, Austin nurtured an electric blues style that was part blues, part rock, with its best-known musicians being white. Antone's became and remains a famous showcase for blues, where notable performers like the Fabulous Thunderbirds, Marcia Ball, Keri Leigh, and Angela Strehli honed their styles. It also brought accomplished blues musicians such as Eddie Taylor, Hubert Sumlin, James Cotton, Sunnysland Slim, and Jimmy Rogers for weeklong stands at a time when they had difficulty booking gigs elsewhere in the country. Other Austin blues could be heard in the clubs on Sixth Street, and even in deli storefronts nearby. Many resident and visiting blues musicians have been taped in Austin for broadcast on the PBS television series Austin City Limits. The musician most synonymous with Austin blues is singer and guitarist Stevie Ray Vaughan, whose sound was indebted to Albert King, Albert Collins, and Jimi Hendrix. Even so, he carved out a dizzying national career in the 1980s, including national television appearances and a recording contract with Sony/Columbia Records. A 1989 helicopter accident snuffed out his promising new musical paths in blues and rock, but his records have remained as models of the Austin style.

Reissuing of the blues past was shouldered by many private collectors. Chief among them was Nick Perls, the son of Manhattan art dealers, who was among the three men who found Son House in 1964. He founded Belzona in 1968 and then renamed it Yazoo, and by his death in 1986 he had issued seventy-four (possibly eighty-six) LPs of vintage prewar blues. Other notable labels of the 1970s were Herwin, which was revived by Bernard Klatzko; Mamlish by Don Kent; and in the 1980s Document, which was established by Johnny Parth.

Several of the oldest active blues societies began at this time. Their membership consisted mostly of white fans in areas where blues was not indigenous, like Tucson, Ottawa, and Iowa; they lived in suburbs far removed from the inner cities where most blues musicians lived. Many efforts were made to group fans and gain organized attendance at rare blues music appearances and thereby encourage club owners to bring more talent. Also, many societies began newsletters, and over time several of them printed local blues histories and interviews.

Blues festivals were popping up more often. The Ann Arbor Blues Festivals of 1969 and 1970 were justly legendary, but short lived. The Chicago Blues Festival began in 1985, the Mississippi Delta Blues Festival in Greenville in 1978, the San Francisco Blues Festival in 1977, and the King Biscuit Blues Festival in Helena, Arkansas, in 1986, among others. Many presented living legends from the 1930s, even from the late 1920s, while at the same time showcasing club talents who deserved wider fame.

Formal recognition of blues popularity and achievement was established by the Memphis Blues Foundation with its annual W. C. Handy Awards in 1982. An indication of national recognition was President Jimmy Carter's invitation to Muddy Waters to perform at the White House in 1978.

Television and movie depictions of blues were odd, but telling. On the popular sketch comedy series Saturday Night Live, cast members Dan Aykroyd and John Belushi dressed as bees and performed "I'm a King Bee." The next time the pair performed blues on the show, they dressed in suits and sunglasses as Jake and Elwood Blues, the Blues Brothers. This act became successful, resulting in outside concerts and a feature film, The Blues Brothers (1980), all the while performing 1950s Chicago Chess and 1960s Memphis Stax classics. In 1986, another feature film, Crossroads, was much circulated in theaters. In it, a young teenage white guitarist wishing to play the blues accompanies an older black man to Mississippi, and there the young guitarist does battle with Steve Vai in front of a juke band led by veteran Frank Frost. Much of the background for the story was the now-apocryphal story of Robert Johnson selling his soul to the devil to play guitar better. However much derision the film may have received from blues fans, it heralded a blues revival in 1990 that has not stopped since.

Blues Since 1990

In 1990, the Sony/Columbia/Legacy label released Robert Johnson: The Complete Recordings, a two-CD set selling for twenty dollars that placed in the palm of the buyer's hand the entire surviving recordings of a bluesman. Although more than fifty years old, Johnson's music remained compelling to hear, and it had the accessory legend that had been built up by white journalists since the 1960s that he had sold his soul to the devil, which was similar to recent rock stories of 1970s rock stars who were reputed to have done the same thing. Sales had been expected to be moderate, perhaps thirty thousand to forty thousand copies over ten years, but instead it quickly sold ten times that amount. The sales numbers showed that record buyers were willing to buy blues, especially Mississippi and postwar Chicago blues, and the set's reviews in magazines and blues newsletters indicated an ever-present willingness to write about blues. The 1990s blues revival was on.

The blues audiences were now equal parts black and white, the latter predominantly so at new urban clubs like Buddy Guy's Legends in Chicago, and B. B. King's in Memphis, and at the various summer festivals. What's more, the audiences were not limited to the United States, but worldwide including England, continental Europe, Scandinavia, Canada, and Japan, with their own club and concert circuits and festivals. Travelers from those countries were making pilgrimages to Chicago, Memphis, Mississippi, and New Orleans. Magazines proliferated, rejuvenating the surviving standbys from the late 1960s/early 1970s like Living Blues, Soul Bag, Jefferson, and Block; increasing the numbers for more recent titles like Blues and Rhythm and Juke; and enabling new titles like Blues Revue and Blues Access. Book publishing went sharply up, reprinting classic and scarce titles including the early writings of Charters and Oliver, and recent books by Robert Palmer and Peter Guralnick, and issuing new books regardless of the writer's expertise (or lack thereof). Blues literacy was reaching new highs: Blues in the Schools programs were done to foster recognition of cultural diversity and to promote literacy, through the music that had begun within oral cultures.

A new technology aided the blues, the Internet. Introduced in the late 1980s and becoming widely available in the early 1990s, the Internet enabled listservs which carried ongoing discussions of topics posted by individual correspondents; today there are listservs for blues in general, traditional music in general, prewar blues, postwar blues, and so on. The World Wide Web brought websites of information and of retail sales—independent publishers and CD labels benefited especially from this.

The blues record industry adapted itself to the new compact disc format. The labels prevailing since 1970 such as Delmark, Alligator, Malaco, and Arhoolie transferred classic records and new issues alike. Rounder became visible to blues record collectors through distributing smaller labels like Bullseye, Tone-Cool, and Black Cat. Historical recordings reappeared due to several changes. Yazoo's founder Nick Perls died in 1986, but the label was acquired by Shanachie Records, and it was continued by Richard Nevins with the assistance of Don Kent. MCA purchased the Chess catalog in the early 1980s, and it was mining the treasures through the efforts of Andy McKaie. The compact disc's ability to hold up to 75 minutes of music was ideal for extensive, even complete reissues of one artist's work, as the Sony Robert Johnson set proved, and so Johnny Parth began the Document CD catalog in an effort to reissue all prewar blues and black sacred music on CD, thereby bringing back into print the complete music of Charlie Patton, Leroy Carr, Roosevelt Sykes, and so many others whose music had been out of print for sixty years or more.

New portable digital recording technology and the cheap CD medium helped small labels record local and regional acts. Fat Possum of north Mississippi was based on then-underrecorded bluesmen R. L. Burnside and Junior Kimbrough. Rooster presented Eddie "Bilbo" Walker, Willie Cobbs, and Lonnie Pitchford. West Coast and northern U.S. independent labels abounded, and the blues magazines teemed with ads and reviews of their new CDs.

In 2003, the centennial of Handy hearing the slide guitarist at Tutwiler was celebrated across the United States as the Year of the Blues (YOTB). It was declared as such by an act of the U.S. Congress, promoted in blues magazines and by organizations such as the Experience Music Project in Seattle and the Blues Foundation in Memphis. That September, the PBS television channel aired Martin Scorsese Presents the Blues, a series of seven films celebrating facets of blues performance and history. Tie-in products to that series included DVDs of the films and CDs of music of the featured artists. Blues had been big business in CDs, films, and advertising since 1990, benefitting the living artists who broke into the mainstream, like B. B. King. Some wished that the YOTB could have helped those outside the mainstream, but they are at the local commercial levels, with few or no ties to the media powers that enabled the PBS series and the YOTB-related marketing. However one thinks of it, one has to acknowledge that the YOTB could not have been possible before 1990.

The big four artists for many blues newcomers have been Robert Johnson, Muddy Waters, B. B. King, and Stevie Ray Vaughan, partly because of the ironies and accomplishments in their lives, because Johnson and Waters prefigured the rock that many white listeners came from, and because Vaughan had been very proficient in those rock styles as well. Also, thanks to rock's heavy borrowing of postwar Chicago blues and its Mississippi antecedents, the claim that Mississippi was "the land where the blues began" was all the more plausible. Living artists who had associations with Johnson, Waters, King, and Vaughan came to be of greater interest than those who did not. As a result, the postwar electric blues band lineup continued to dominate.

There have been a few new trends. One was the revival of prewar blues guitar by educated young (under forty) black musicians, initially Keb' Mo', but joined later by Corey Harris, Alvin Youngblood Hart, and Chris Thomas King. All have performed widely and are among the more visible musicians at festivals, public radio, and television.

Another recent trend was white teenaged blues musicians from fairly well-to-do backgrounds. Teenagers in the blues has been nothing new, whether they were nineteen-year-old Roosevelt Graves in 1929 or seventeen-year-old Etta James in 1955. But these recent musicians, like Mike Welch, Jonny Lang, or Kenny Wayne Shepherd, whether or not they were consciously following Ralph Macchio's character in Crossroads, didn't have to start playing for a living like their African American forebears did. In the 1990s, whether whites could play the blues as music was a hotly debated topic, whether they could play them as a cultural function even more hotly debated, but the extent of suburban white teenagers could push the assumptions of that debate very far.

Two cultural trends in African American arts came to shape blues. Black sacred music has been a lifelong partner to blues, supplying it with new innovations and expressions. In the 1980s the new development was mass choirs that brought joyous bursts of sound, but were hardly adaptable to the blues. In 1995 though, a recent style was brought to wider notice, sacred steel, where musicians picked and drawled on pedal steel guitars in sacred repertory. Musicians such as Robert Randolph have been written about in leading blues magazines. The future exercise of sacred steel and its possible influence in the blues is something to be watched.

The other trend is rap. It was initially formulated in the mid-1970s in the housing projects on the Lower East Side of New York City and Brooklyn by artists like Fab Five Freddy and Grandmaster Flash. By 1990 it had several mainstream stars like Queen Latifah and Public Enemy (with members Chuck D. and Flava Flave). There have been assertions and artistic efforts to show that rap music comes from blues, especially from Chris Thomas King and Chuck D. That debate depends on where the speaker is coming from. Those who hold that rap is not related to blues likely pay attention to the musical characteristics of blues, especially its capacity for harmonic forms and models, melodies, and solo instrumental improvisations. Those who do say rap is related to blues pay more attention to the word play and lyric formulation and have great familiarity with the toasts and oral word games shared by their fathers, uncles, and neighbors—they may even say that rap is the blues, or that blues has always been some form of rap, however and whatever it is called.

Looking at blues history since 1890, trends may be noted as going upward. The geographic spread went from pockets of segregated black neighborhoods to global interest and, hence, a greater racial diversity of performers and audiences. The discussion of blues in print became more literate, from print ads in newspapers to many periodicals and books devoted solely to blues. The money involved in the business of the blues has grown rapidly, even within the record industry alone. As for the music, there have been increasing degrees of musical improvisation to the point where some famous blues are solely instrumental (Freddie King's "Hideaway," Albert Collins's "Frosty"), and an increasing role of lyrics as fixed nonchangeable blues elements, especially in the performance of older prewar repertory by young revival musicians. These six vectors bloom out in widening directions, so that the blues development viewed today from prosperity and variety resembles an upright funnel.

Yet for those in oral cultures, those same six vectors may seem to bloom out in opposite directions, to create an overturned funnel as viewed from those in better economic or more informed cultures. Among the six vectors, instead of geographic spread, there would be local or regional identity, and instead of racial diversity, there would be racial celebration of African Americanness. Instead of literacy, there would be oral culture exercising word-of-mouth news/gossip and word games. There would be less individual wealth and hence more economic interdependence, which in practical terms means one person would play a blues CD for ten friends, instead of each of these friends having his or her own copy. There is less musical improvisation in oral blues; in fact the melody is more likely to remain fixed, even stripped down, but the variety and fluidity of lyric elements is to be increased.

These two funnels are not conflicting, but rather two parts of the blues spectrum that may be joined together. This definition of the blues in technical and historical terms has sought not merely to describe it, but to construct a faithful spectrum that may be extended in the future without breaks or cracks in continuity.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

For Part 1

- Barnie, John. "Formulaic Lines and Stanzas in the Country Blues," Ethnomusicology 22, no. 3 (September 1978): 457–473.
- Barry, Phillips. "The Origin of Folk Melodies." The Journal of American Folklore 23, no. 90 (October/December 1910): 440–445.

- Clark, R. Douglas. "Pitch Structure in Vocal Blues Melody." Southern Folklore Quarterly 42, no. 1 (1978): 17–30.
- Macleod, Robert. Document Blues 1-10. Edinburgh: PAT, 1994–2004.
- . Yazoo 1-20; 21-83. Edinburgh: PAT, 1988–1992.
- Rubin, Dave. The 12-Bar Blues: The Complete Guide for Guitar. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 1999.
- Sackheim, Eric, compiler. The Blues Line: A Collection of Blues Lyrics. New York: Grossman Publishers, 1969.
- Smallwood, Richard. "Gospel and Blues Improvisation." Music Educators Journal 66, no. 5 (January 1980): 100–104.
- Taft, Michael. Blues Lyric Poetry: A Concordance. 3 vols. New York: Garland, 1984.
- . Blues Lyric Poetry: An Anthology. New York: Garland, 1983.
- Titon, Jeff Todd. Downhome Blues Lyrics: An Anthology from the Post World War II Era. Boston: Twayne Publishers, 1981; second edition: Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1990.
- . Early Downhome Blues: A Musical and Cultural Analysis. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977; second edition: Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.

For Part 2

- Abbott, Lynn, and Doug Seroff. Out of Sight: The Rise of African American Popular Music 1889–1895. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2002.
- Bogdanov, Vladimir, Chris Woodstra, and Stephen Thomas Erlewine. All Music Guide to the Blues: The Definitive Guide to the Blues. 3rd ed. San Francisco: Backbeat Books, 2003.
- Cohn, Lawrence, ed. Nothing But the Blues. New York: Abbeville, 1993.
- Cook, Bruce. Listen to the Blues. New York: C. Scribner's Sons, 1973.
- Dean, Roger T. New Structures in Jazz and Improvised Music Since 1960. Milton Keynes. Philadelphia: Open University Press, 1992.
- Epstein, Dena. Sinful Tunes and Spirituals: Black Folk Music to the Civil War. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.
- Floyd, Samuel. The Power of Black Music: Interpreting Its History from Africa to the United States. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Guralnick, Peter. Sweet Soul Music: Rhythm and Blues and the Southern Dream of Freedom. New York: Harper and Row, 1986.
- Kubik, Gerhard. Africa and the Blues. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999.
- Oakley, Giles. The Devil's Music: A History of the Blues. London: British Broadcasting Corporation, 1976; reprinted: New York: Da Capo, 1997.
- Oliver, Paul, Tony Russell, and Robert M.W. Dixon. Yonder Come the Blues: The Evolution of a Genre. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- O'Neal, Jim, and Amy van Singel. The Voice of the Blues: Classic Interviews from Living Blues Magazine. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Rowe, Mike. Chicago Breakdown. New York: Drake Publishers, 1975.
- Shaw, Arnold. Honkers and Shouters: The Golden Years of Rhythm and Blues. New York: Macmillan, 1978.

- Southern, Eileen. Music of Black Americans: A History. New York: W. W. Norton, 1971; third edition: 1997.
- Southern, Eileen, and Josephine Wright. Images: Iconography of Music in African American Culture (1770s–1920s). New York: Garland, 2000.
- Stearns, Marshall. The Story of Jazz. New York: Oxford University Press, 1956.
- Thomas, Hugh. The Slave Trade: The Story of the Atlantic Slave Trade, 1440–1870. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1997.

BLUES AND RHYTHM

Label run from 1951 to 1952 by the Bihari brothers as part of their Modern labels group. Among its few known releases are sides by Gene Phillips, and by the Mississippi musicians Houston Boines and Charley Booker.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

BLUES BALLAD

Briefly, a “ballad” is a song that tells a story. “Narrative” or “sequential” ballads are highly structured, telling detailed stories ordered in time. “Blues,” “banjo,” or “nodal” ballads are fluid, offering sparse detail with little sense of sequence, emphasizing emotional high points, and tending to incorporate floating or foreign lines; as such, they share these features with blues. As Evans stated, “Blues ballads are narrative folksongs that tell a story in a very loose, subjective manner and tend to ‘celebrate’ events rather than relate them chronologically and objectively in the manner of other American folk ballads. Oliver prefers “nodal ballad” because “blues ballad” suggests a ballad in blues form.

Well-known blues ballads include “Casey Jones,” “John Henry,” “Frankie,” “Delia,” “Railroad Bill,” “Stack Lee,” “The Boll Weevil,” and “White House Blues.” The blues may have grown out of blues ballads and field hollers.

Blues ballads are found in both African American and Anglo American traditions. American production appears to have begun about the time of the Civil War and gone on into at least the 1920s. British Celtic examples can be traced to the late Middle Ages.

Do blues ballads arise as mutations of narrative ballads, or are they composed initially as blues ballads? While it is believed that both paths are taken, definitive evidence is often lacking—it may not be possible to demonstrate the absence of a narrative precursor. The question is answered most clearly when a body of tradition, such as ancient Irish language ballads, consists almost entirely of blues ballads.

Lack of narrative elements, presence of floating lines, and variations among performers (or even the renditions of one performer) complicate lyric folk song taxonomy. Blues ballads are similar, but subject, phraseology, and tune often allow reasonable delineations.

JOHN GARST

Bibliography

- Evans, David. Big Road Blues: Tradition and Creativity in the Folk Blues. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982, 44–47.
- McCulloh, Judith. “The Problem of Identity in Lyric Folk Song.” In The Ballad Image: Essays Presented to Bertrand Harris Bronson, edited by James Porter, pp. 41–58. Los Angeles: Center for the Study of Comparative Folklore & Mythology, University of California, 1983.
- Oliver, Paul. The Story of the Blues, pp. 22–25. Philadelphia: Chilton, 1973.
- . Songsters and Saints, p. 247. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984.
- Wilgus, D. K. “Arch and Gordon.” Kentucky Folklore Record 6 (1960): 51–56. Here blues ballads are called “banjo ballads.”
- Wilgus, D. K., and Eleanor R. Long. “The Blues Ballad and the Genesis of Style in Traditional Narrative Song.” In Narrative Folksong: New Directions, Essays in Appreciation of W. Edson Richmond, edited by Carol L. Edwards and Kathleen E. B. Manley, pp. 435–482. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1985.

BLUES BOY WILLIE

b. William D. McFalls, 28 November 1946; Memphis, TX

A singer in the soul blues mold influenced by his gospel roots and the recordings of Junior Parker, Blues Boy Willie also plays harmonica and sometimes the guitar. His songwriting abilities are very effective on gritty Southern pieces like “Be Who” (his biggest hit in 1990), “Injustice” or “The Fly.”

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

- Carpenter, Bill. “Blues Boy Willie: Be Who?” Living Blues no. 111 (September/October 1993): 22–25.

Discography

- Be Who* 2 (1991, Ichiban CD 1119).
- Don't Look Down* (1993, Ichiban CD 1161).
- Back Again* (2002, Deep South CD 03).

BLUES BOY'S KINGDOM

Record label (Tennessee, 1956–1957). Owner: Riley B. “B. B.” King (b. September 16, 1925; Itta Bena, MS). Memphis, Tennessee-based, the first issue was by singer-harmonica player Levi Seabury ("Boogie Beat"/"Motherless Child") who died shortly after its release. The other issues were by the Five Stars (with Al "TNT" Braggs, Cal Valentine), B. B. King's pianist Milliard Lee, Rosetta Perry, and Nat Sledge's Blue Jay Dance Band. Their subsidiary label, Kingdom, issued two gospel releases in 1957 (The Five Voices and The Bells of Harmony).

BLUES BOY'S KINGDOM

ROBERT EAGLE

Discography: McGrath

BLUES BROTHERS

Belushi, John "Jake Blues"

b. 24 January 1949; Chicago, IL
d. 5 March 1982; Hollywood, CA

Aykroyd, Dan "Elwood Blues"

b. 1 July 1952; Ottawa, Canada

Duo of singers and actors created by Dan Aykroyd and John Belushi. The Blues Brothers began in 1978 as a comedy sketch by Dan Aykroyd and John Belushi on the TV show Saturday Night Live. Dan Aykroyd played Elwood Blues and John Belushi Jake Blues.

The duo performed live with a tight backing group, in a parodic fashion, shouting R&B standards like Sam and Dave's classic "Soul Man," "I've Got Everything I Need (Almost)," or "B-Movie Boxcar Blues," both dressed in black suits, porkpie hats, and dark sunglasses. Both actors sang; Dan Aykroyd played harmonica while John Belushi performed outrageous and acrobatic dance routines. The Blues Brothers appeared from time to time on Saturday Night Live, first as fillers for the program, but soon as one of its most popular skits.

They are remembered as the exuberant stars of John Landis's The Blues Brothers (1980), which included short appearances by blues legends such as John Lee Hooker playing "Boom Boom" and Ray Charles. The comedy, set in Chicago's music scene, also featured soul artists like Aretha Franklin, James Brown (as a preacher), and the fine Stax musicians from Booker T and the MGs: guitarist Steve Cropper and bassist Donald Dunn. The film was an immense success worldwide and helped bolster the careers of many of the blues artists who appeared in it.

Between 1979 and 1982, the original Blues Brothers released three albums of covers of R&B and rock 'n' roll standards, but their growing success was stopped by John Belushi's tragic death from a heroin overdose on March 5, 1982. In 1998, Dan Aykroyd rekindled the duo with a new partner, John Goodman. Together once again with John Landis, the Blues Brothers made a much publicized sequel to what had by then become a favorite cult movie. Aretha Franklin and James Brown appeared again in The Blues Brothers 2000 (1998), along with B. B. King, Junior Wells, Jonny Lang, Eddie Floyd, and Eric Clapton.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

Glazer, J. "The Blues Brothers Feature: The Legend of Jake and Elwood." Crawdaddy no. 91 (December 1978): 40–44.
Woodward, Bob. Wired: The Short Life and Fast Times of John Belushi. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1984; reissued by Pocket Books, 1989.

Discography

The Blues Brothers. Blues Brothers Complete (1996, Wea CD [1978–1981]).

See also Films; Stax/Volt; Television

BLUES CONNOISSEUR

Record label (California, 1972–1977). Owner: Donald Clark Lindenau (b. November 4, 1942; San Francisco, CA). Pleasant Hill, California-based label was the first to record Harmonica Slim (Richard Riggins) (with guitarist Ron Thompson). Other artists include Boogie Jake (Matthew Jacobs), Charles Conley, K. C. Douglas (with Harmonica Slim), (Cajun violinist) Ben Guillery, Little Willie Littlefield, Robert Lowery, Sonny Rhodes, and Schoolboy Cleve (White).

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

McGrath

Mazzolini, Tom. "Blues Connoisseur: Profile of a Small Record Company." Crazy Music 8 (1976); Blue Sky Review 4.
Rainsford, Mike. "The Blues Connoisseur Story." Blues & Rhythm 170 (June 2002).

Rainsford, Mick. "Veelzijdig en Toch Single-Minded: de Blues Connoisseur Story." Block no. 104 (1997): 20–24 (in Dutch).

BLUES FOLKLORE

Fans and students of the blues have long recognized its importance as one of the great repositories of working class African American culture. Descended from the great verbal societies of West Africa, forbidden access to the written word under slavery and further denied equal access under the “separate but equal” policies that followed the Supreme Court’s Plessey vs. Ferguson decision, working class African American culture has remained one that places far more emphasis on the spoken word than does the mass culture that surrounds it. Consequently, oral traditions such as the blues are the primary means for cultural transmission—from the parent’s lips to the baby’s ear—and as such they offer much to the listener seeking insight into the lives of people whose social and cultural history and values often differ widely from those of mainstream American culture.

Typically, the blues covers a broad range of African American folk culture. Although the majority of blues lyrics deal with the relationship between men and women, there are also lyrics about bad men (and women), food, transportation, intoxicants, work, religion, class and caste, and racism. One of blues poetry’s most powerful and overarching motifs is to use the images of travel—something a slave could never do—as symbols for freedom; freedom to travel then became a symbol for personhood itself. Taken as a whole, the poetry of the blues presents an integrated worldview that discusses the nature of manhood, womanhood, and personhood, a frank and unflinching view of the world and the place of African Americans in it. At its heart, the blues is about being black in the United States.

In 1911, Howard W. Odum observed that the music of laboring class black Southerners was “most valuable to the student of sociology and anthropology, as well as to the student of literature and the ballad.” Although few researchers heeded Odum’s advice at the time, that is exactly the perspective that many later students of the blues have come to take. Guy Johnson’s 1927 “Double Meaning in the Popular Negro Blues” was one of the few scholarly examinations of African American folk music and lore during the pre-World War II era, but the advent of portable recording equipment motivated a very few social scientists and ethnomusicologists to travel America collecting the folk music of African Americans. Among them, the leftist folklorist Lawrence Gellert visited America’s prisons gathering African American music, often of an overtly political nature rarely heard by white audiences. Similarly, a young and black anthropology student named Zora Neale Hurston—before her later success as a writer—accepted the suggestion of Franz Boas that she study the folkways of her southern homeland. The 1935 field work she conducted with Alan Lomax both contributed to her Mules and Men—a classic study of black southern folklore and one of the first conducted by a southern African American—and produced a series of valuable sound recordings which was supplemented during later field trips. A collection of her work is maintained in the Library of Congress (LCFAFA No. 11).

Beyond a doubt, the most important force in documenting the blues—indeed, all American roots music—as folklore has been the Library of Congress, established in 1928. Preeminent among the legions of blues researchers whose work is curated by the Library of Congress is the massive archive of sound recordings and related materials made for the Library of Congress by the father/son team of John and Alan Lomax from the early 1930s into the 1950s. The library continues its efforts today, recently acquiring, for example, the massive catalog of Moe Asch’s Folkways label and commencing a large-scale CD reissue program.

The Lomaxes’ most famous early “discovery” (1933) was Huddie Ledbetter, aka “Leadbelly,” the Texas bluesman and songster who went on to become one of the stars of the nascent folk music revival until his death in 1949. After going out on his own, Alan Lomax continued to crisscross America in search of roots music and musicians. Among his most significant projects was a study conducted (in partnership with Fisk University) in Coahoma County, Mississippi, during 1941–1942. Among the scores of both sacred and secular recordings and interviews were the last recordings the great Delta bluesman Eddie “Son” House until the folk boom of the 1960s and the first recordings of the soon-to-be world famous Muddy Waters. Lomax’s first-person account of his Coahoma project forms the basis for his book Land Where the Blues Began.

Folkloric blues studies have grown dramatically in both number and methodological sophistication during the post-World War II era and have taken many different perspectives. Many non-American blues scholars were first introduced to the blues through recordings, and much fine writing has approached the form through its recorded legacy, Paul Oliver’s Blues Fell This Morning being a prime example. Especially valuable is Oliver’s second edition, which distinguishes between recordings made for a black audience and those made for the “revival” audience. Modern blues studies place great emphasis on context, and the audience for both recordings and live performance is recognized as a primary shaper of the music’s form. For example, in the Alan Lomax film Land Where the Blues Began (only tangentially related to his book of the same name), the barroom recitation of the class toast “The Lion and the Signifying Monkey” is clearly bowdlerized for the benefit of the camera. Similarly, Luke Jordan’s 1927 recording of the minstrel-flavored “Traveling Coon” demonstrates the complex relationship among blues artists, their performances, and their relationship with “insider” and “outsider” audiences.

Other researchers have chosen to specifically approach the blues as a performance art. David Evans's Big Road Blues discusses performance, community, and creativity within a Mississippi Delta blues community and Charles Keil's classic Urban Blues approaches the blues performance as social ritual. During the post-war period, field research and recordings remained an important tool; people such as Harry Oster, whose justly legendary work in Louisiana's Angola State Penitentiary produced the highly talented Robert Pete Williams, continued to document traditional African American folkways that seemed to be rapidly disappearing. Today many of these research veterans continue their work; also producing valuable contributions are younger researchers such as Kip Lornell, Barry Lee Pearson, and John Michael Spencer. Many of the classic works in blues folklore—both past and present—are anthologized in Write Me a Few of Your Lines: A Blues Reader, edited by Steven C. Tracy.

While the blues has, during the recent past, become a wildly successful international pop music form, it also remains an integral part of working class African American culture, particularly among those working class African Americans with Southern roots. For them, the blues is not just music, it is poetry set to music and as such it continues to be an important part of the African American oral tradition. The instruments and the beat may have changed, but the function of the music within the society that created it only a little more than a hundred years ago remains the same.

PETER R. ASCHOFF

Bibliography

- Evans, David. Big Road Blues: Tradition and Creativity in the Folk Blues. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- Hurston, Zora Neale. Mules and Men. Philadelphia: Lippincott, 1935.
- Keil, Charles. Urban Blues. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966.
- Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Pantheon Books, 1993.
- Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning: Meaning in the Blues. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1990. Second Edition.
- Spencer, Jon Michael. Blues and Evil. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993.
- Tracy, Steven C., ed. Write Me A Few of Your Lines: A Blues Reader. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1999. Includes the Odum and Johnson references cited in this story.

BLUES IN THE NIGHT

The music for "Blues in the Night" was written by Harold Arlen (1905–1986) and the lyrics by Johnny Mercer (1909–1976) for the 1941 Warner Brothers' film of the same title (Anatole Litvak, director) about jazz musicians. The movie starred Lloyd Nolan, Richard Whorf, Rosemary Lane, and Elia Kazan. Also included in the film was William Gillespie and the Jimmie Lunceford (1902–1947) band. Gerald Wilson (1918–), scored the film. The assignment for Arlen and Mercer was to "write a score for a movie about an American jazz band and to include one hit song of a blues nature." It was Arlen's decision to write the song as a "traditional form of the early American blues—three sections of 12 bars each, rather than in the conventional 32-bar Tin Pan Alley shape." Arlen set about composing the melody for the song entitled "Blues in the Night." When he completed it, he gave it to Mercer to add lyrics. After Mercer wrote the lyrics, Arlen's only suggestion to him was "... take lines—beginning 'My mamma done tol' me when I was in knee pants'—and move them to the opening of the song." That stroke of genius was so successful that the proposed title for the movie—Hot Nocturne was changed to Blues in the Night. In the movie the song is sung by Jigger (William Gillespie), the leader of the jazz band, who has the miseries, that is, blues, over his "two-faced" woman.

Nominated for a 1941 academy award, "Blues in the Night" was recorded in 1941 by the Jimmie Lunceford band. The song appeared in another Warner Brothers' film, Thank Your Lucky Stars (1943). This time the mood is more comedy than tragedy, and John Garfield, playing a comic gangster/hood, sings it. John Tasker Howard writing about Harold Arlen and "Blues in the Night" (Current Biography 1955) states that "... 'Blues in the Night' made a contribution to American popular music that established him [Arlen] as one of our most gifted light composers." The song is considered to be "one of the best American songs..." and is a standard in repertoires from blues to light classical.

MONICA J. BURDEX

Bibliography

- Zinser, William. "From Natchez to Mobile, from Memphis to St. Joe." American Scholar 63, no. 2 (Spring 1994): 259–267.

BLUES INCORPORATED

Active 1962–1963

Core members were Alexis Korner (vocals, guitar), Cyril Davies (harmonica, vocals), Ken Scott (piano), and Dick Heckstall-Smith (saxophone). Occasional members included Jack Bruce (bass), Charlie Watts (drums), and Long John Baldry (vocals).

Recorded what is now considered the first British blues album, R&B from the Marquee (1962).

Individual members Korner and Davies would go on to significant solo careers, and the group inspired younger British musicians such as the Rolling Stones and John Mayall's Bluesbreakers.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (under Korner)

Discography: AMG (under Korner)

BLUES PROJECT

Formed 1965; disbanded 1972

Conceived on the coffeehouse circuit of the mid-1960s and historically more notable for its concept than execution, the Blues Project created a distinct and briefly popular blues subgenre, a localized New York City fusion rooted in folk and jazz.

Acoustic guitarist Danny Kalb moved to Greenwich Village in 1962 and two years later was featured with John Sebastian on the Elektra folk-blues compilation The Blues Project. The next year Kalb went electric and the band began to coalesce around following a series of jams and loosely organized live dates. The original band consisted of guitarists Kalb and Steve Katz and a rhythm section of drummer Roy Blumenfeld and bassist Andy Kulberg, the latter of whom doubled on flute. Vocalist Tommy Flanders was in and out of the group and keyboardist Al Kooper, who would compose much of the band's material, joined after sitting in at a failed record company audition. Kooper, who left in 1967, would subsequently reunite with Katz, to form Blood, Sweat and Tears.

The success of its debut album Live at the Au-Go-Go in 1966 allowed the band to make a West Coast tour, leading to an appearance at the Monterey Pop Festival. Its catalog also included Projections, the only full-length studio album by the core members, and the falsely titled "Live at Town Hall," part of which was studio outtakes with overdubbed applause.

Kulberg and Blumenfeld guided the band through the 1971 trio album Lazarus and then on to the contractually obligated final release, Planned Obsolescence, with violinist Richard Greene adding a new element to the sound. Then they joined Greene to form the group Seatrain. A half-hearted reunion resulted in the 1973 Reunion in Central Park album with Kooper participating but the band and concept had clearly run its course.

MICHAEL POINT

BLUESBREAKERS

Also known as John Mayall's Blues Breakers. Band led by singer, guitarist, pianist, and harmonica player John Mayall from about 1963 to 1968 in its original incarnation. Made a hugely influential contribution to British blues. Debut album featured Eric Clapton, including famous solo on "Steppin' Out." Later versions had Peter Green and then Mick Taylor on lead guitar. Other members included John McVie and Mick Fleetwood, who formed Fleetwood Mac with Green. Mayall stopped using the name after Taylor joined the Rolling Stones in 1968, and moved to the United States in 1970. He continued to lead his own bands, and resumed use of the Bluesbreakers name in 1985.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Brunning, Bob. Blues in Britain: The History 1950s to the Present. London: Blandford, 1995.

Newman, R. John Mayall: Blues Breaker. Chessington: Sanctuary, 1995.

Discography

Blues Breakers with Eric Clapton (1966, Deram LK 4804).

A Hard Road (1967, Decca SLK 4853).

Crusade (1967, Decca SLK 4890).

Bare Wires (1968, Decca SLK 4945).

Blues from Laurel Canyon (1968, Decca SLK 4972).

Diary of a Band, Vols. One/Two (1968, Decca SLK 4918/4919).

BO, EDDIE

b. Edwin Joseph Bocage, 20 September 1930; New Orleans, LA

Pianist, singer, composer. Bo, whose mother was a popular Professor Longhair-style pianist, became a major influence on the modern evolution of the New Orleans nightclub sound through his prolific recording and pervasive live act. He first gained attention backing local legends like Smiley Lewis, Earl King, Ruth Brown, Lloyd Price, and Guitar Slim with the Spider Bocage Orchestra. He began his extensive recording career (as Little Bo) in 1955 for Ace and released a succession of regional hits that became New Orleans standards. Bo also produced hit recordings by Irma Thomas, Johnny Adams, and other Crescent City stars. He continued to perform in New Orleans into his seventies.

MICHAEL POINT

BO, EDDIE

Bibliography

AMG; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG

BOBBIN

Label owned by Bob Lyons and active in St. Louis from 1958 through 1962, with forty-three singles released. Chief among its artists were Albert King and Little Milton, with Clayton Love, Oliver Sain, and Fontella Bass.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Pearlin, Victor, "Bobbin Records." Blues Unlimited no. 119 (May/June 1976): 16.

Discography: McGrath

BOGAN, LUCILLE

b. Lucille Anderson, 1 April 1897; Amory, MS
d. 10 August 1948; Los Angeles, CA

Also known as Bessie Jackson. This blues singer was born as Lucille Anderson in Monroe County, Mississippi. In about 1914 she married Nazareth Bogan, Sr., a blues singer who worked as a railroad man. The following year a son was born, Nazareth, Jr. In 1974 Lucille's son was interviewed by Bob Eagle so that we now know quite a lot about her.

Lucille Bogan was the first black blues artist to record on location, that is, outside Chicago or New York. On these 1923 recordings her voice was still immature in comparison with her later recordings. By her choice of songs it becomes clear that Viola McCoy was a major inspiration. In a unique move Lucille switched from classic blues to country blues for her next session. She had improved enormously in 1927. Bogan had a taste for fine piano accompaniment and with artists like Will Ezell, Walter Roland, and Charles Avery she could not go wrong. Bogan recorded for Okeh in 1923, for Paramount in 1927, and for Brunswick in 1928, 1929, and 1930.

Although she had an uncommonly large Depression era output, she made no recordings at all in 1931 and 1932. When she switched to ARC for the 1933, 1934, and 1935 sessions, she had to use the pseudonym Bessie Jackson for contractual reasons. Her most famous songs are "Sweet Patunia," "Sloppy Drunk Blues," and especially "Black Angel Blues," which was later covered by B. B. King as "Sweet Little Angel." In 1937 she brought her son Nazareth's group to the Birmingham studio. A photo of this group identifies John Bell on piano, John Grimes on trumpet, and Nazareth himself on bass.

After the Second World War Lucille Bogan made some trial discs for a New York company. She was mad when the records were rejected and died shortly afterward. Lucille Bogan was one of the most distinguished of all the Alabama blues artists. She stayed a blues singer to the end, never yielding to commercialism.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Eagle, Bob. "Lucille Bogan: Bessie Jackson." Living Blues no. 44 (Autumn 1979): 25–28.

Discography: DGR

BOGAN, TED

b. 10 May 1909; Spartanburg, SC
d. 29 January 1990; Detroit, MI

Birth year has also been given as 1910. Guitarist/singer Ted Bogan spent much of his career performing with Howard Armstrong and Carl Martin. He played with them in a prewar era string band known under various names including the Four Keys and the Tennessee Chocolate Drops. His first recordings were made for Bluebird in 1934 with Armstrong. In the 1970s, the trio achieved fame touring and recording as Martin, Bogan, and Armstrong.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

DelGrosso, Rich. "Ted Bogan." Living Blues 92 (July/August 1990): 42.

Moss, Mark D. "'The Devil Stuck His Tail in My Ear': An Interview with Howard Armstrong and Ted Bogan." Sing Out! 32.3 (Winter 1987): 2–11.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Martin, Bogan, and Armstrong (1974, Flying Fish 003).

That Old Gang of Mine (1978, Flying Fish 056).

Louie Bluiie: Film Soundtrack Featuring Howard Armstrong (1985, Arhoolie 470).

BOGART, DEANNA

b. 1960; Detroit, MI

Vocalist, pianist, and saxophonist who emerged from the Maryland club circuit. She is noted for her versatility in piano boogie, swing, rhythm and blues, soul and rock, and for her own compositions.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG

Discography: AMGBOHEE BROTHERS*James Douglass Bohee

b. 1 December 1844; Indiantown, Saint John, New Brunswick, Canada

d. 8 December 1897; Ebbw Vale, England

George B. Bohee

b. 25 March 1857; Indiantown, Saint John, New Brunswick, Canada (1856 repeatedly cited in U.S. census data.)

d. After 1905

James Bohee, teamster, and his wife Isabella had seven or eight children, three of whom became entertainers: James Douglas Bohee (1844–1897), George Bohee (1856–after 1905) and sister Laura Bohee (1870–1890). Mayme Bohee may also have been a relative—known as “The Creole Nightingale,” she toured the United States as a member of troupes such as the Black Patti Troubadours and Sam T. Jack’s Creoles. St. John’s black population had its origins in the Caribbean and the United States, and the Bohee family had moved to Boston by 1959. (In 1860 James Bohee was listed as a sailor.) Boston was the center of banjo manufacturing and the brothers took up that instrument. Around 1876 the Bohee brothers started their own, racially mixed Bohee Minstrels, which also included James Bland. They toured the United States in early 1876, then later in 1876 with Callender’s Georgia Minstrels, and from 1878 as part of Jack Haverly’s Genuine Colored Minstrels. By May 1880 they had reached Canada, where James Bohee was reported to be the drum major in the troupe’s street parades. They opened at Her Majesty’s Theatre, London, in July of that year. The troupe, with more than sixty performers, toured Britain and returned to America in 1882. James Bohee remained in Britain, owning a minstrel show (once again James Bland was hired) that toured theaters and halls for several months each year. He provided banjo lessons at his London studio. James and George Bohee also owned the Gardenia Club in Leicester Square from about 1882. By 1890 the brothers had become London institutions, and members of royalty were among the pupils. After James died of pneumonia, brother George first tried to continue the Bohee Operatic Minstrels but, by late 1898, was forced to disband. He consequently worked as a solo performer and toured the Empire Theatre circuit. His death has been variously dated from 1915 (in the United States) to the 1930s (in Britain).

As well as singing, tenor George Bohee danced to his brother’s banjo and played banjo duets with him. (George also played piano.) James provided banjo solos. They kept in contact with America, introducing songs and providing employment opportunities. Catering to a white European audience, “Home Sweet Home” and “A Boy’s Best Friend Is His Mother” are examples of the sentimental compositions that made them famous, but the Bohee brothers repertoire also included antislavery protest material, cakewalks, and minstrel songs. Sometime between 1890 and 1892 in London, the Bohee brothers recorded banjo duets on Edison wax cylinders, possibly making them the first African Americans to do so. These recordings are known only from a report of their being played in Australia and it is impossible to assess their musical character. George Bohee made at least another eleven banjo solos for the Edison Bell Supply Company in Liverpool in 1898, but the titles (including “Darky’s Dream” and “Darky’s Awakening”) are at present only known from catalogs.

James Bohee was a musical pioneer, an adept instrumentalist, and a successful promoter. With a background in U.S. minstrelsy he was active in many aspects of Britain’s entertainment world between 1880 and 1897. An obituary for James described the brothers as “the best banjoists in the world”; no doubt he was the most influential of all representatives of African American culture in Britain, influencing an entire generation of banjo players in that country. Their songs were widely copied and even arranged for barrel organ. George Bohee was the author of “George Bohee Medleys,” which comprised excerpts from “Manhattan Beach March,” “Washington Post,” and “Rastus on Parade.”

RAINER E. LOTZ

BOHEE BROTHERS

Bibliography

- Green, J. "British Newspapers as Source Material: The Case of James Douglass Bohee (1844–1897)." Black Music Research Bulletin 7, no. 1 (Chicago, 1984).
- Lotz, R. E. Black People: Entertainers of African Descent in Europe and Germany. Bonn, 1997.
- . "The Bohee Brothers: The 19th Century World Wide Odyssey of Two Pioneering Afro-Canadian Banjoists." 78 Quarterly no. 7 (1992): 97–111.
- Rosenberg, N. V. "Canadian Newspapers as Source Material: Further Notes on James Douglass Bohee (1844–1897)." Black Music Research Bulletin 10, no. 2 (Chicago, 1987).

Discography: DGR

BOINES, SYLVESTER

- b. 1931; Port Gibson, MS
d. 16 December 1992; Chicago, IL

Bassist active in Chicago from the late 1950s until his death. Raised in Mound Bayou, Mississippi, and worked there on farms and construction sites. Boines moved to Chicago in 1956 and began playing guitar under the influence of his brother Aaron Boines (d. 1971). Around 1961 he began playing electric bass around the Chicago West Side. In 1965 he began performing with Mighty Joe Young and was included on the latter's Delmark LP Blues with a Touch of Soul. From 1964 through the 1970s he was a locksmith. In later years he was bassist for Jimmy Dawkins.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Eagle, Bob. "Chicago's Sidemen." Blues Unlimited no. 110 (October/November 1974): 13–14.

BOLL WEAVIL BILL

According to the Dixon, Godrich, and Rye discography, this pseudonym was given to four unissued Vocalion recordings by Julius "Juke" Davis and Louis "Panella" Davis. The two were members of Mitchell's Christian Singers, and they made the sides during the Singers' first recording sessions in New York in August 1934.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: DGR

BOLLIN, ZUZU

- b. A. D. Bollin, 5 September 1922; Frisco, TX
d. 19 October 1990; Dallas, TX

An early and enduring influence on the modern Texas blues scene, Bollin, who had previously worked with Percy Mayfield, recorded four songs, including "Why Don't You Eat Where You Slept Last Night?" for the Torch label in Dallas in the early 1950s. Bollin's signature big sound, both as a vocalist and guitarist, was reinforced by future Ray Charles Orchestra saxists David "Fathead" Newman and Leroy Cooper on one of the sessions and by the Jimmy McCracklin band on the other.

After touring in various big bands, Bollin, like the songs he had recorded, disappeared from the scene in the early 1960s. It wasn't until 1983, when they were included on a small label's Texas blues compilation, that his career belatedly began its second and final phase.

A rediscovered Bollin returned to the recording studio in 1989 for Texas Bluesman, a star-studded effort produced by the Dallas Blues Society. The album, later reissued on Antone's Records, featured appearances by original recording colleague Newman, as well as guitarists Duke Robillard and Wayne Bennett and a large cast of Austin all-stars.

Austin club owner Clifford Antone championed Bollin's return, providing him with regular live dates and arranging for his return to recording activity. Bollin, who had already recorded two tracks with guitarists Wayne Bennett and Doug Sahm, was working on an album for Antone's at the time of his death.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Santelli
Schuller, Tim. "Zuzu Bollin" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 95 (January/February 1991): 49–51.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

BOND, GRAHAM

- b. 28 October 1937; Romford, England
d. 8 May 1974; London, England

Jazz saxophonist, turned to rhythm and blues and Hammond organ with Alexis Korner, 1962. Bond led a trio with Jack Bruce and Ginger Baker, known as the Graham Bond Organization. Bond came to America in late 1960s. He was gifted but unstable, and never fulfilled his potential. He committed suicide on the London Underground.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- Brunning, Bob. Blues in Britain: The History 1950s to the Present. London: Blandford, 1995.
 Shapiro, Harry. Alexis Korner: The Biography. London: Bloomsbury, 1996.
 Unterberger, Richie. Unknown Legends of Rock 'n' Roll. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

Discography

- The Sound of '65* (1965, Columbia SX1711).
There's a Bond Between Us (1966, Columbia SX1750).
Solid Bond (1970, Warners WS3001).
Two Heads Are Better Than One (1972, Chapter One CHSR 813).

BONDS, SON

- b. 16 March 1909; Brownsville, TN
 d. 31 August 1947; Dyersburg, TN

Born to Hattie Newbern and Aaron Bonds, Son Bonds was one of a number of singers to come from the Brownsville, Tennessee, area, and he grew up in that same region where he learned to play guitar and was soon working the streets with other regional musicians. He was a powerful singer/guitarist, who is heard to best advantage on his 1941 Bluebird sides with Sleepy John Estes. He began his recording career when he and his street-singing partner, harmonicist Hammie Nixon, recorded for Decca in 1934 as "Brownsville Son Bonds." He recorded four gospel sides as "Brother Son Bonds," and returned to the studio to cut two final 1934 sides for Decca as "Hammie and Son."

He recorded with Sleepy John Estes for Decca in 1938, but the 1941 sides for Bluebird like "80 Highway" and "A Hard Pill to Swallow" are exceptional for their growling tone and clearly articulated guitars. The sides made at the same session but released under Sleepy John Estes's name are also quite superior, owing in no small quantity to Bonds' fine guitar work. He and Estes also split the vocals on six exuberant sides made at the same Bluebird session, issued as by "The Delta Boys." Mistaken for someone else, he was shot and killed while sitting on a front porch in 1947.

PAUL GARON

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR

"A Hard Pill to Swallow" (1941, Bluebird 8927).

BONNER, WELDON H. PHILLIP "JUKE BOY"

- b. 22 March 1932; Bellville, TX
 d. 29 June 1978; Houston, TX

Accompanying himself on both guitar and rack harmonica, Bonner sung highly personal tales typified in songs like "Life Gave Me a Dirty Deal" and "Struggle Here in Houston." He won a talent contest in 1947 in Houston that led to a radio spot. He cut his first sides for Irma in 1957 and next for Goldband in 1960.

Full-length albums came about due to the interest of Mike Leadbitter, coeditor of Blues Unlimited, who recorded Bonner in 1967, issuing his full-length debut on Flyright. He cut his best work between 1968 and 1969 for Arhoolie Records. A few European tours ensued, but by the 1970s he was working outside of music. He died of cirrhosis of the liver in 1978.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
 Leadbitter, Mike. "An Interview with Juke Boy Bonner."
Blues Unlimited no. 78 (1970): 42–47.
 Strachwitz, Chris. Notes for Juke Boy Bonner: Life Gave Me a Dirty Deal (1993, Arhoolie CD 375).

Discography: AMG; LSPF

Selected Recordings

Life Gave Me a Dirty Deal (1993, Arhoolie CD 375).

See also Arhoolie/Blues Classics/Folk Lyric; Goldband Records; Irma

BOOGIE CHILLEN'

John Lee Hooker (1917–2001): vocal, guitar. Recorded November 3, 1948, in Detroit, Michigan (Modern 20-627; mx B 7006). "Boogie Chillen'" was Hooker's first hit record, selling a million copies and climbing to number one on the Race Records Juke Box Chart in February 1949. He recorded it several times during a long career as one of the greatest names in the blues (see the Hooker, John Lee entry). The recording, which was the B-side to "Sally May," was a surprise hit. It was produced by Bernie Besman (1912–2003) at United Sound Studios. Joe Siracuse was the engineer.

The song embodies many qualities that distinguish Hooker as a unique vocalist and guitarist. It is set in open A tuning (E–A–E–A–C#–E) with a capo on the second fret. Throughout his career, Hooker played primarily in standard tuning in E (or E minor), using open G and A tunings for his boogies.

The rhythm of the song has a rolling shuffle feeling, rather than the straight eighth note (duple) rhythm often found in Mississippi blues. Hooker had no training in or concern with form or harmony in the “school” sense. He rarely, if ever, used standard eight-, twelve- or sixteen-measure blues structures. For example, “Boogie Chillen’” begins with a vamp, a repeated pattern setting up the rhythm on A. There is a slurred ascending bass line played on the fifth string leading up to the E note played on the open fourth. The pattern is played, with slight variation, thirteen times. Such asymmetry heightens the tension of the performance, at the same time reducing the dependence on form as an organizing element in the music.

The verse begins with an immediate change to the IV7 (D7) chord on the downbeat of the first measure: “Well, my mama . . .” His voice is high, with a real edge. He spends approximately four bars on the IV, but after the initial striking of the chord, it functions as a substitute for the I chord, with the result that the moment of return to the tone I chord seems unclear, even ambiguous, to the listener. He uses the guitar percussively, with the chord components—and their harmonic functions—subordinate to the groove and the way he attacks the strings to achieve his very personal timbre.

After the second phrase (again asymmetrical) and an interspersed high I7 chord riff, Hooker resolves the verse by going again to the IV before returning to the I. In this song, he never goes to the V chord. (There are some songs in which Hooker never leaves the I chord.) Although he was one of the foremost modern blues performers, his style harks back to the early days, before radio and the record industry helped superimpose a certain uniformity of approach on what had been an idiosyncratic personal expression.

Also of interest in this performance are two lengthy spoken interludes, foot tapping on every quarter note and a lack of rhyming structure. Hooker used these or similar devices in many of his songs.

“Boogie Chillen’” remains the signature song of John Lee Hooker, a truly inimitable musician.

LENNY CARLSON

Bibliography

Santelli

Carlson, Lenny, transcriber. John Lee Hooker: A Blues Legend. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 1991. (Introduction by Fred Sokolow explains Hooker’s tunings and other points of interest.)

Obrecht, Jas. “John Lee Hooker” [interview]. Guitar Player (November 1989).

Rohnisch, Claus. The World’s Greatest Blues Singer. <http://w1.191.telia.com/~u19104970/johnnielee.html>.

Discography

John Lee Hooker. Boogie Chillun [note different spelling] (1972, Fantasy LP 24706); released on CD (1989, FCD-24706-2). The performance was recorded in 1962.

BOOGIE JAKE

b. Matthew Jacobs, ca. 1929; Marksville, LA

Singer and guitarist. Through 1960 he participated in Louisiana blues clubs and in Excello and Minit label recording sessions. From 1960 through 1974, after moving to Berkeley, California, he was retired from music. After his appearance at the 1974 San Francisco Blues Festival, he made a limited return to performing and recording, sometimes with “Schoolboy Cleve” White.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Mazzolini, Tom. “Boogie Jake” Living Blues no. 31 (March/April 1977): 24–26.

Discography: LSFP (under Jacobs)

BOOGIE WOOGIE RED

b. Vernon Harrison, 18 October 1925; Rayville, LA
d. 2 July 1992; Detroit, MI

Boogie Woogie Red was active in Detroit’s blues piano scene by his teens. He accompanied John Lee Hooker from 1946 to 1960, left music for a decade, and came back in 1971 to enjoy great local popularity. While some sources state a death year of 1985, Living Blues published an obituary for July 2, 1992.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Santelli

Rockwood, John, and Gregory Oatis. “Boogie Woogie Red.” Living Blues no. 106 (November/December 1992): 39.

Discography: LSFP

Motor City Blues (Alive Records; two cuts recorded live at the 1973 Ann Arbor Blues & Jazz Festival).

Red Hot (1977, Blind Pig Records).
Live at the Blind Pig (Blind Pig Records).

BOOK BINDER, ROY

b. 5 October 1941; New York, NY

Guitarist and singer. Folk blues virtuoso Book Binder became a literal musical disciple of the legendary Reverend Gary Davis, taking regular lessons from the blind guitar genius and even serving as his chauffeur. After establishing himself on the coffeehouse folk circuit, Book Binder went on to accompany Davis in his live shows.

Book Binder had picked up guitar in the Navy, and while attending college in Rhode Island and New York his interest went from casual to obsessive. He did some mid-1960s recording and dropped out of college in 1967 to work with Davis and tour England in 1969 with Arthur “Big Boy” Crudup. He formed a duo with fiddler Fats Kaplin in 1973 that lasted four years and produced two albums.

When the duo broke up, Book Binder bought an Airstream motor home and hit the road with a self-contained show that became one of the most pervasive aspects of the American folk blues scene for the next two decades. The success of his solo recording debut Going Back to Tampa, released in 1979, allowed Book Binder to take his live show to a national audience.

He did not record again until Bookeroo! was released on Rounder Records in 1988, by which time his identity as an itinerant folk bluesman was well established. He continued recording regularly and touring, putting on live performances that were equal parts entertainment and education. His personalized, but true to the source, renditions of the seminal songs and styles of the genre served as an entry point into the work of the classic folk blues figures, including mentor Davis, for his fans.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin (as Bookbinder); Santelli

Discography: AMG

BOOKER, CHARLIE (CHARLEY)

b. 3 September 1925; Quiver River, MS
 d. 20 September 1989; South Bend, IN

Singer and guitarist in early postwar Mississippi blues. Learned guitar from his father and a maternal uncle, and studied the records of prewar artists including Charlie Patton. His reputation rests on a 1952 recording session for Modern Records, where he made four titles with harmonica player Houston Boines and pianist Ike Turner.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

LaVere, Steve. “Charlie Booker” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 89 (November/December 1989): 38–39.

Discography: LSFP

BOOKER, JAMES

b. 17 December 1939; New Orleans, LA
 d. 8 November 1983; New Orleans, LA

James Booker was one of the most flamboyant, and technically adept pianists to emerge from New Orleans. In his unpredictable sets he would play everything from jazz to classical to popular songs to gut-bucket blues, sometimes all during the course of one song and all delivered in a highly improvisational style.

James Carroll Booker III was born in New Orleans on December 17, 1939. In his early teens he began gaining local recognition on radio station WMRV. His debut was “Doing the Hambone” in 1953 and in 1960 he made the national charts with “Gonzo,” an organ instrumental. During the next few years he worked with famous New Orleans acts such as Huey “Piano” Smith, Earl King, and Shirley & Lee, and during the next two decades he played and recorded with artists such as Aretha Franklin, Ringo Starr, the Doobie Brothers, and B. B. King.

A 1967 conviction for possession of heroin curtailed his career. His profile began to rise during the 1970s as he held court at local clubs and played the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival. Despite his reputation, his recorded output during his lifetime is slim and includes Junco Partner for Island in 1976, New Orleans Piano Wizard: Live! recorded in 1976, and Classified! for Rounder in 1982. Numerous posthumous recordings of Booker have surfaced including many live recordings that have only added to his legend. On November 8, 1983, James Booker died as the result of taking a deadly dose of low-grade cocaine.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Boyd Raeburn); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

BOOKER, JAMES

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Classified! (1982, Rounder 2036).

Junco Partner (1993, Hannibal HNCD-1359).

See also King, Earl; Louisiana; Rounder; Smith, Huey “Piano”

BOOZE, BEATRICE “WEE BEA”

b. Muriel Nichols or Nicholls, 23 May 1920; Baltimore, MD

d. 1975 (?)

Singer most noted for her 1942 hit version of “See See Rider” (Decca 8633). A protégée of Sammy Price, Booze would go on to record topical songs during World War II, tour with the Andy Kirk band, and have additional recording sessions with Price. Activity after 1962 is unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR; LSFP

BORUM, “MEMPHIS” WILLIE

b. 4 November 1911; Memphis, TN

d. 5 October 1993; Memphis, TN

Active in Memphis in the early 1930s, Borum played guitar on 1934 recordings by Allen Shaw and Hattie Hart. After wartime service he worked outside music, playing only casually. Two 1961 Bluesville albums, where he accompanied himself on harmonica and guitar, revealed him as an unshowy but thoughtful performer.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Larkin

Olsson, Bengt. Memphis Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

See also Doyle, Charlie “Little Buddy”; Shaw, Allen

BOSTIC, EARL

b. Eugene Earl Bostic, 25 April 1913; Tulsa, OK

d. 28 October 1965; Rochester, NY

Jazz saxophonist who recorded a number of R&B and jump blues in the late 1940s and 1950s, contributing to the emergence of the era’s characteristic R&B style, which relied largely on rousing saxophone solos to generate excitement. Best known as an alto saxophonist, Bostic also played tenor. He was a member of Lionel Hampton’s hard-driving big band in the early 1940s before forming his own combo. His huge hit, “Flamingo” (produced by Ralph Bass for King in 1951), spotlighted his ability to play in both a smooth, melodic style and an aggressive, raunchy, honking style. Although other jazzmen admired Bostic for his technical skills, his strong record sales and jukebox play owed more to his music’s simple melody lines, strong dance beats, and undeniably sensual feel.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: AMG; Larkin; Lord

BOSTON BLACKIE

b. Bennie Joe Houston, 6 November 1943; Panola, AL

d. 11 July 1993; Chicago, IL

Born Bennie Joe Houston, the singer/guitarist dubbed Boston Blackie possessed a high, soulful singing voice and developed an aggressive electric guitar style performing throughout the 1960s on Chicago’s West Side, influenced by Magic Sam and Otis Rush. In 1993, he was fatally shot by singer James “Tail Dragger” Jones.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Larson, JoAnne, and Richard Shavsin. “Boston Blackie (Bennie Joe Houston)” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 112 (November/December 1993): 43.

Discography

Boston Blackie & Smokey Smothers. Chicago Blues Sessions, Vol. 1 (2001, Wolf 120.847 CD).

BOUCHILLON, CHRIS

b. 21 August 1893; Oconee County, SC
d. 1950s; FL

Bouchillon was the first to exploit, though he may not have invented, the “talking blues,” a rueful comic story recounted to a raggy guitar accompaniment, played on his 1926–1928 Columbia recordings initially by his brother Uris, later by himself. He was billed as “The Talking Comedian of the South.” The form attracted other hillbilly artists like Herschel Brown, Buddy Jones, and Robert Lunn. His 1927 coupling “Born in Hard Luck”/“The Medicine Show” appears to have been widely circulated, with elements reappearing in the work of Harmonica Frank Floyd. His approach finds a resonance, perhaps coincidental, in the work of Woody Guthrie.

TONY RUSSELL

Discography

Russell, Tony. Country Music Records: A Discography, 1921–1942. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

See also Floyd, Frank “Harmonica”

BOWMAN, PRISCILLA

b. 1928; Kansas City, KS
d. 24 July 1988; Kansas City, KS

Blues singer who briefly achieved popularity in the 1950s. Her robust shouting blues style evoked the Kansas City blues tradition, but also signaled the emergence of rock ‘n’ roll. She joined the Jay McShann band in the early 1950s, and in 1955 the band was signed to Vee-Jay. Bowman recorded four sessions for Vee-Jay—two sessions with Jay McShann and the subsequent sessions as a solo act. Just about every number she waxed was top-notch, but only “Hands Off” from this first session made the charts—number one on the Billboard R&B chart in late 1955. As a solo artist, Bowman stayed on with Vee-Jay, recording with the company’s house band in 1957, 1958, and 1959; she enjoyed notable artistic success if not commercial success. After Vee-Jay, she never recorded again. In the 1980s Bowman experienced a revival, playing the Kansas City Blues Festival, Spirit Festival, and other venues.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Grendysa, Peter. “Priscilla Bowman Dies” [obituary]. Goldmine (October 7, 1988).

Discography: LSPFBOWSER, ERBIE

b. 5 May 1918; Davila, TX
d. 15 August 1995; Austin, TX

Pianist. A self-taught pianist from a musical family, Bowser was already touring as a teenager. He joined guitarist T. D. Bell’s band the Cadillacs in the late 1940s, playing for West Texas oil field workers before an extended residency at the Victory Grill in Austin. He recorded and performed again with Bell in the early 1990s, releasing It’s About Time for Spindletop Records and playing locally as the Blues Specialists.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin
“Ernie Bowser” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 123 (September/October 1995): 55.

Discography

It’s About Time (1992, Spindletop/Black Magic).

BOY BLUE

b. Roland Hayes, 18 August 1922; Laurel, MS
d. 20 May 1980; Memphis, TN

Raised in Hughes, Arkansas, Boy Blue was a multi-instrumentalist best known for harmonica. Recorded for Alan Lomax (1959) and with Joe Willie Wilkins (1973).

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

Eagle, Bob. “Boy Blue.” Living Blues no. 50 (Spring 1981): 47–48.

Discography

The Blues Roll On (Southern Folk Heritage Series) (1961, Atlantic LP SD-B52).
Joe Willie Wilkins and His King Biscuit Boys (1977, Adamo LP 9507).

BOYACK, PAT

b. 26 June 1967; Helper, UT

Guitarist in Texas blues styles in practice since 1980. From 1993 through 1996 he performed and recorded with the Prowlers, including singer Jimmy Morello. From 1997 on he has performed under his own name.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG

Discography: AMGBOYD, EDDIE

b. November 25, 1914; Stovall (Coahoma County), MS

d. July 13, 1994; Helsinki, Finland

Edward Riley Boyd was a pianist and singer who recorded more than one hundred tunes for multiple U.S. labels between 1947 and 1965, and subsequently recorded ten or so albums for European labels, but is best known for three brooding blues hits from the early 1950s: “Third Degree,” “24 Hours,” and especially “Five Long Years.” He spent the first third of his life in the Mississippi Delta and Mid-South, the middle third in Chicago, and the last third in Europe.

Growing up in the Delta, Boyd determined early on to escape the plantation exploitation and racial oppression he experienced first-hand. He tried his hand at harp and guitar before settling on piano during his years in Memphis. He made his way to Chicago in 1941. There, he fell in with the “Bluebird beat” musicians who recorded for Lester Melrose, accompanying John Lee Williamson, Tampa Red, and Jazz Gillum on record and eventually cutting his own records for Melrose during 1947–1949. He then did one session each for Regal and Herald. In 1951, he did a session for Leonard Chess, who rejected the tracks.

Frustrated, he financed his next session by himself, using money from his factory job, and convinced J.O.B. to release his tune “Five Long Years,” which became a number one R&B hit in 1952. On that record’s strength, he quit his job and signed with Parrot, owned by Chicago DJ Al Benson. But Benson, without telling him, sold Boyd’s contract to Chess (reportedly to settle a personal debt). Having previously been snubbed by Chess, Boyd was unhappy with the arrangement, and although Chess benefited from Boyd’s two 1953 hits, the bad feelings were mutual, leading to a stormy relationship rooted in personality conflicts but also partly explainable by artistic differences. Boyd’s low-key, urbane piano blues—reminiscent of his greatest influences, Leroy Carr and Roosevelt Sykes—differed from the grittier, guitar- and harp-driven sides Chess favored. He toured actively until sidelined by injuries from a 1957 car accident, then after leaving Chess found his career stymied by Leonard Chess’s reputed efforts to quash airplay for his releases on other labels (including some strong efforts on Bea & Baby with Robert Jr. Lockwood on guitar).

His career took turn for the better when Willie Dixon booked him on the 1965 American Folk Blues Festival package tour of Europe. Abroad, Boyd relished the enthusiasm of festival audiences and the absence of racist attitudes. During the next five years, he lived in France, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, and Denmark, and recorded two albums for Mike Vernon in England, backed by John Mayall’s Bluesbreakers and Peter Green’s Fleetwood Mac. Those albums boosted his visibility among college-age European blues fans. Performing in Finland in 1970, he met a local woman, moved in with her (they married in 1977), and called Helsinki his home up until his death. He recorded and performed extensively in Europe (including albums for Sonet and Storyville), making only occasional trips back to the United States, including a triumphant appearance at the 1986 Chicago Blues Festival.

Boyd was not an extraordinary pianist but he was a bluesman to the core, an artist who lived the blues life and imbued his music with feelings of desperation, sorrow, and loss. His three best-known songs have an almost funereal quality to them, melodically and lyrically. This is not to say that he couldn’t play upbeat, romping numbers—he could and he did—but he will always be remembered for those evocative, gloomy ones, and to this day probably not a night goes by without some bluesman somewhere singing his immortal lines “I’ve been mistreated/You know what I’m talking about/Worked five long years for one woman/She had the nerve to throw me out.”

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern O’Neal, Jim, and Amy van Singel. “Living Blues Interview: Eddie Boyd” [part 1]. Living Blues no. 35 (November/December 1977): 11–15; [part 2]. Living Blues no. 36 (January/February 1978): 14–23; [part 3]. Living Blues no. 37 (March/April 1978): 6–17. Reprinted in O’Neal, Jim, and Amy van Singel. The Voice of the Blues: Classic Interviews from Living Blues Magazine. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Sironen, Erkki. “Eddie Boyd” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 119 (January/February 1995): 65–67.

Discography: LSFP, AMGBOYD, LOUIE

b. 24 August 1924; Carthage, MS

d. 1978; Los Angeles, CA

Began playing harmonica in Mississippi, and continued after moving to California in the mid-1960s. Recorded under his own name, and with Smokey Smothers in the latter's 1962 Federal label session. He also had a reputation for colorful stories and high claims.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Eagle, Bob. "Off the Wall." Blues Unlimited no. 107 (April/May 1974): 9, 12.
 "Louie Boyd" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 45/46 (Spring 1980): 95.

BOYKIN, BRENDA

b. 30 March 1957; Oakland, CA

Big-voiced and versatile Bay Area singer, who was a jazz singer before she became the Johnny Nocturne Band's vocalist in 1991, appearing on three of the band's albums. Since then she has recorded two albums as vocalist with the group Home Cookin' and two with guitarist Eric Swinderman.

RAY ASTBURY

Selected Recordings

Home Cookin', Afrobbilly Soul Stew (Blue Dot BDR CD103).

See also Johnny Nocturne Band

BOYSON, CORNELIUS "BOYSAW"

b. 5 September 1936; Tunica, MS

d. 9 July 1994; Chicago, IL

Bassist who worked with Mighty Joe Young, Jimmy Dawkins, and other postwar Chicago bluesmen. Musicians gave him the nickname "Mule" for playing bass notes that could "kick like a mule."

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Steven Sharp, "Cornelius (Boysaw) Boyson," [obituary]. Living Blues no. 118 (November/December 1994): 63.

BOZE, CALVIN B.

b. 15 October 1916; Trinity County, TX

d. 18 June 1970; West Los Angeles, CA

Vocalist in the jump blues style of Louis Jordan who first recorded for Aladdin Records. Despite strong material like "Safronia B," he never broke into the R&B charts. Also wrote material for Charles Brown.

TOM MORGAN

Discography: LSFP

Jumpin' Like Mad: Cool Cats & Hip Chicks (1997, Capitol CD 52051; reissue).

BRACEY, ISHMON

b. 9 January 1901; Byram, MS

d. 2 February 1970; Jackson, MS

A lugubrious singer-guitarist who first recorded for Victor with Rosie Mae Moore and Tommy Johnson in 1928 as Ishman Bracey. He learned guitar from Rube Lacey and was one of many said to have guided Blind Lemon Jefferson around. He toured frequently with Johnson and played at social events and for a medicine show, before settling in Jackson where he gave up blues and became a minister. He is known to have recorded an unissued tape of religious songs.

Bracey is usually associated with Tommy Johnson, sometimes to his own detriment. He had a hard, unyielding voice and uncompromising guitar style, but was capable of effective falsetto on songs like "Saturday Blues" (1928), which he claimed sold six thousand copies. Stephen Calt and Gayle Wardlow described him as incapable of tuning a guitar properly, repetitive and limited in King of the Delta Blues (Rock Chapel Press, 1988). Bracey was advised by Paramount recording director Art Laibley to vary his approach so he recorded for Paramount with the New Orleans Nehi Boys, a jazz group. Those sides that survive are not a success.

He and Johnson fell out over money, a rift that lasted until Johnson's death. Bracey never recorded commercially again. He was interviewed by Gayle Dean Wardlow in 1963, but remains a figure as remote as his recordings.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Wardlow, Gayle. "Got Four, Five Puppies, One Little Shaggy Hound." Blues Unlimited no. 142 (Summer 1982): 4-11.

Discography: DGR

BRACKEN, JAMES C.

BRACKEN, JAMES C.

b. 23 May 1908; OK
d. 20 February 1972; Chicago, IL,

Birth year sometimes given as 1909. A Chicago record company executive of the 1950s and 1960s. Bracken, with his wife Vivian Carter, founded and operated Chicago's famed Vee-Jay label from 1953 to 1966. Bracken was raised in Kansas City, Kansas. He was living in Chicago in 1944 when he met Vivian Carter. The couple became business partners in 1950, when they founded Vivian's Record Shop in Gary, Indiana; in 1953 they founded Vee-Jay Records ("Vee" standing for Vivian and "Jay" standing for James). They married in December 1953. Vee-Jay grew rapidly with its first two acts, bluesman Jimmy Reed and the doo-wop group, the Spaniels. In 1955 Ewart Abner became a third partner in Vee-Jay and general manager. Vee-Jay went bankrupt in 1966, and James and Vivian continued for a few more months putting out Vee-Jay product on the Exodus label. After that, Bracken struggled with various ventures in the record business, including a blues label, none of which got off the ground.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. Chicago Soul. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

BRADFORD, PERRY

b. 14 February 1893; Montgomery, AL
d. 20 April 1970; Queens, NY

Beginning his career playing piano in tent shows, Bradford made his greatest contribution as a songwriter, convincing OKeh Records to record his composition "Crazy Blues" with African American singer Mamie Smith, the first blues recording.

JIM THOMAS

Bibliography

Santelli
Bradford, Perry. Born with the Blues. Oak Publications, 1965.

Discography: DGR

BRADSHAW, EVANS

b. 18 October 1912; Memphis, TN
d. 17 November 1978; Memphis, TN

Saxophonist and bandleader in Memphis. For some years he was assisted at piano by his son Evans Bradshaw Jr., who moved to Flint, Michigan, in 1953.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

"Obituaries." Living Blues no. 41 (November/December 1978): 40

BRADSHAW, MYRON "TINY"

b. 23 September 1905; Youngstown, OH
d. 26 November 1958; Cincinnati, OH

Guitarist, singer, bandleader. A jump blues original, best known for his propulsive 1951 hit, "The Train Kept a Rollin'," Bradshaw adeptly altered his musical style to extend and expand his career. He recorded with numerous jazz greats, including Sonny Stitt, Gigi Gryce, Charlie Shavers, and Sil Austin, but his music always remained blues based.

Bradshaw, a psychology major, was a singer at Wilberforce University and a drummer for Horace Henderson's Collegians. In 1932 he moved to New York City and quickly became an in-demand drummer, working with the Mills Blue Rhythm Band, the Savoy Bearcats, and other successful bands. Bradshaw soon formed his own group, modeled closely on that of former band mate Cab Calloway, a fellow alumnus of Marion Hardy's Alabamians, and was showcased at the Renaissance Ballroom in New York City. Bradshaw and band recorded in 1934 but it would be another decade before he would be back in the studio on a regular basis.

Bradshaw spent World War II in an Army big band and he returned to his peacetime profession with fresh energy and a new, upbeat, dance-friendly R&B approach that replaced his previous blues emphasis. He did the majority of his recording in the five year span of 1950 to 1954, amassing a handful of hits for the King label before being sidelined by a stroke.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Scott Yanow and Al Campbell); Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern

Discography: AMG ; Lord; LSFP

BRAGGS, AL "TNT"

b. 23 May 1934; Dallas, TX
d. 5 December 2003; Dallas, TX

Last name sometimes shown as "Bragg." A master showman whose original live act featured almost exact impersonations of soul/blues greats, Braggs inadvertently acquired his stage name from a New Orleans promoter who didn't know who he was. Braggs went wild on stage to live up to it and a star and style were born. He was a country and gospel fan before he formed Al Braggs and the Organizers but his friendship with Bobby "Blue" Bland led him deeper into the blues. In 1959 Bland got him signed by Don Robey to Duke Records, where Willie Dixon produced his debut recording. Braggs toured with Bland until 1966 when he went solo.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Santelli

Govenar, Alan. "Al 'TNT' Braggs," Living Blues no. 83 (November/December 1988): 32–33.

Schuller, Tim. "The Al Braggs Story." Juke Blues no. 9 (Summer 1987): 22–25.

BRAINSTORM

Chicago blues and soul label of the late 1960s. Brainstorm was opened in 1966 by veteran record man Leo Austell with two young partners, Archie Russell and Hillary Johnson. Brainstorm and its subsidiary, Twin Stacks, never achieved more than regional success. As a production company, however, the operation had magnificent success with Betty Everett, getting several national hits with her, notably "There'll Come a Time" (1969), all which were leased to MCA's Uni label. The company's other acts—the Emotions, John Edwards, Cicero Blake, and Roy Hytower—did little to sustain the company commercially. The most blues-oriented recordings were those of hard soul singer Cicero Blake ("Loving You Woman Is Everything") and bluesman Roy Hytower ("You Pleases You"). The label closed in 1969.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

McGrath

Pruter, Robert. Chicago Soul. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

BRAMHALL, DOYLE

b. 17 February 1949; Dallas, TX

Drummer, singer, songwriter. Best known as a long-time songwriter for Stevie Ray Vaughan, Bramhall was also a mentor to the Texas rocking blues explosion of the 1980s through his work in early groups like the Chessmen, with Jimmie Vaughan, and Storm, featuring Vaughan and occasionally his brother Stevie Ray. He also performed with Marcia Ball, Rocky Hill, Anson Funderburgh, Lou Ann Barton, and Mason Ruffner. Bramhall's first album as a leader, Birdnest on the Ground, was released in 1994 with the sequel, Fitchburg Street, coming a decade later. Bramhall, father of guitarist Doyle Bramhall II, also worked as a producer for Indigenous and Chris Duarte and coproduced Marcia Ball's W. C. Handy Award-winning Presumed Innocent.

MICHAEL POINT

BRANCH, WILLIAM EARL "BILLY"

b. 3 October 1951; Great Lakes Naval Hospital (north of Chicago), IL

In spite of his continued importance on the Chicago blues scene, Branch was actually raised in Southern California, and only returned to Chicago in the late 1960s to attend the University of Illinois as a political science major.

Inspired by Willie Dixon, Junior Wells and other performers at the Grant Park blues festival in 1969, Branch soon abandoned political science in favor of blues harmonica studies in the clubs of Chicago. He first recorded, as a sideman, on a 1974 session for Willie Dixon, replacing an out-of-town Carey Bell. He continued to frequent the Chicago clubs, learning from Junior Wells, Big Walter Horton, and especially Carey Bell, who he eventually replaced in Willie Dixon's All Stars.

In 1977 Branch, Lurrie Bell, Freddie Dixon, and Garland Whiteside—the latter three all sons of noted blues artists—performed at the Berlin Jazz Festival as the Sons of Blues, and on their return, continued to perform as the SOBs. In Berlin, they represented a new generation of blues performers. Branch has emphasized the importance of each generation learning from the last by helping to found Chicago's Blues in the Schools program, for which he won W. C. Handy Awards in 1990 and 1994.

He has won the Living Blues Critics Award for Most Outstanding Blues Musician (harmonica) in 1993 and 1997, and he shared a Handy award for the album Harp Attack in 1991.

PAUL GARON

Bibliography

Sharp, Steven. "Don't Start Me to Talkin'." Living Blues no. 139 (May/June 1998): 14–25.

Discography: AMG

Harp Attack (1990, Alligator 4790).

BRANDON, SKEETER

b. Calvin Thomas Brandon, 22 April 1948; Halifax, VA

Blind vocalist and keyboardist. Played throughout the southern United States in various bands from 1966 to 1991. Brandon joined Highway 61 in 1991, recorded four albums, and toured extensively until the band's 2001 breakup. In 1994 he formed the Prime Rib Blues Band and released Good to Go (Rock House, 2002).

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

Tilling, Robert. “‘I’d Rather Sing Than Eat’: Skeeter Brandon and HWY 61.” Blues and Rhythm no. 85 (January 1994): 11.

Selected Recordings

Skeeter Brandon and Highway 61. Man of My Word (1999, New Moon 9922).

BRENSTON, JACKIE

b. 15 August 1930; Clarksdale, MS

d. 15 November 1979; Memphis, TN

Vocalist and saxophonist, best known for his recordings with Ike Turner, especially “Rocket 88,” which is considered by some to be the first rock ‘n’ roll record—if not that, then the first, at least, to come out of Sam Phillips’s studio in Memphis, where Elvis Presley got his start three years later. “Rocket 88” was, by Brenston’s own admission, nothing too original—it was based on a number he had been singing by Jimmy Liggins, “Cadillac Boogie.” But it became Chess Records’ first number one hit on the R&B charts.

Brenston learned sax from Jesse Flowers in Clarksdale before he joined Ike Turner’s Kings of Rhythm. When the band went to Memphis Recording Service to make its debut recordings for Phillips in 1951, Turner cut a single of his own, but Brenston got the hit (billed as Jackie Brenston and His Delta Cats) after Phillips sold the sides to Chess in Chicago. The resulting friction broke the Kings of Rhythm apart, with most of the musicians staying with saxophonist Raymond Hill in Clarksdale while Turner and Brenston went to Memphis. There they worked a short while with B. B. King, but as “Rocket 88” climbed the charts, the young and headstrong Brenston split to launch what he thought would be a career as a national star.

Wild and inexperienced in the ways of the music business, Brenston lost all his money, his band, and his stardom over the next couple of years and despite more attempts at Chess, he never had another hit. He went back to work as a sideman, accompanying Dennis Binder, Amos Milburn, Lowell Fulson, Johnny Otis, Memphis Slim, and Joe Hinton, finally rejoining Ike Turner’s Kings of Rhythm in St. Louis from 1955 to 1962. During his second stint with Turner, Brenston recorded two singles with the band for Federal Records and another 45 for the Sue label. The Rockford, Illinois-based duo Birdlegs & Pauline hired him after he left Ike. A final Brenston single was recorded in Chicago for Mel London’s Mel-Lon label, backed by Ricky Allen’s band with Earl Hooker on guitar, in 1963. He continued to perform at times in later years, with Sid Wallace’s band in St. Louis and with local bands back home in Clarksdale, where he took a job as a truck driver. In Clarksdale in the 1970s, his claims of once having a number one record were often met with scoffs of disbelief. As he put it, “I had a hit record and no sense. . . . It all just drifted on away.”

JIM O’NEAL

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
O’Neal, Jim. “Jackie Brenston.” Living Blues no. 45/46 (Spring 1980): 18–20.

Discography: AMG: LSFP

BREWER, CLARENCE “KING CLARENTZ”

b. 1950

Guitarist and vocalist, folk sculptor in the Ozark mountains. His blues in the John Lee Hooker manner are regarded as raw and exotic.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda)

Discography

Clarence Brewer. King Clarentz. (1999, HMG Record 1007).

BREWER, JIM “BLIND”

b. 3 October 1920; Brookhaven, MS
 d. 3 June 1988; Chicago, IL

Guitar/vocal/autoharp. With his blues-playing father and religious mother at odds over how best to help their blind son get along, Jim resolved the conflict, saying “No one was ever hurt by a song.” He played religious music, blues, and folk songs for more than fifty years, hopping freights and traveling around Mississippi, playing on Maxwell Street, around Chicago, and later, around the United States and Canada in the company of many different revival players, for whom he was a door between worlds. He died with gigs on his calendar.

ANDY COHEN

Bibliography

Harris, Larkin; Santelli
 Whiteis, David. “Jim Brewer” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 82 (September/October 1988): 37–38.

Discography: LSFP

Jim Brewer (1974, Philo PH 1003).
Tough Luck (Earwig Records).

BREWSTER, REVEREND WILLIAM HERBERT

b. 2 July 1897; Somerville, TN
 d. 14 October 1987; Memphis, TN

Reverend W. Herbert Brewster combined a poet’s erudition and bluesman’s intensity while penning more than two hundred exceptional gospel tunes. Such giants as Mahalia Jackson and Clara Ward recorded Reverend Brewster’s masterful songs of salvation, especially “Move On Up a Little Higher” (1946). His dynamic oratorical skills were regularly displayed during a five-decade tenure as pastor of Memphis’s East Trigg Baptist Church.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Cadden, Jerry. “Brewster, W(illiam) Herbert, Sr.” In International Dictionary of Black Composers, edited by Samuel A. Floyd, Jr., Vol. 1, pp. 167–173. Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn, 1999.

BRIDGES, CURLEY

b. 7 February 1934; Fuquay-Varina, NC

Big-voiced vocalist, pianist, organist, and occasional drummer. Pianist and vocalist with Frank Motley and the Motley Crew from 1953 to 1966. Relocated from Washington to Toronto with the rest of the group in 1955. Featured vocalist on most Motley Crew records of the 1950s and early 1960s. Credited with the first rocking rearrangement of “Hound Dog,” which appeared as “New Hound Dog” in 1954, but he is probably best remembered from the Motley Crew days for his powerful ballads. His career as a bluesman was revived after decades of lounge work following a successful appearance at an R&B festival in Toronto in 1997. Bridges released new blues CDs in 1998 and 2001.

BILL MUNSON

BRIM, GRACE

b. 10 July 1923; Biscoe, AR
 d. 28 June 1999; Gary, IN

Drummer, harmonica player. Likely the first female drummer in Chicago blues, taking up the instrument as the suggestion of husband John Brim. Assisted Brim in the lyrics of and recording for “Ice Cream Man.” In later years she was devoted to several businesses and church.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Steven Sharp “Grace Brim” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 148 (November/December 1999): 57.

Discography: LSFPBRIM, JOHN

b. 10 April 1922; Hopkinsville, KY
 d. 1 October 2003; Gary, IN

Known for a handful of postwar Chicago recordings, some unreleased for decades, John Brim remains an important blues artist for the stunning integrity of those few sides. Brim’s earliest influences included Big Bill Broonzy, John Lee Williamson, and Tampa Red. In Indianapolis from 1941 to 1945, he sang with Harmon Ray, Scrapper Blackwell, and others, and learned guitar and the dry cleaning business, two skills on which he depended his entire life. In Chicago from 1945 until 1952, when he moved to neighboring Gary, Indiana, Brim befriended childhood heroes Tampa Red, Broonzy, Williamson, and Big Maceo

BRIM, JOHN

Merriweather, and perfected his playing with fellow newcomers Muddy Waters, Floyd Jones, Little Walter, Sunnyland Slim, Jimmy Reed, and others who would help define the new Chicago blues. He began performing around 1948 with his wife, Grace, who sang and played drums and harmonica. In 1950 Brim accompanied Merriweather on four issued titles for Fortune in Detroit, where he also recorded two numbers with Grace singing.

Between 1951 and 1956 Brim recorded several titles for Random, JOB, Parrot, and Checker-Chess, many issued only years later. Brim's best chances for success faded when Chess failed to either promote or release his output. In addition, Brim's fully realized "Rattlesnake," written at Leonard Chess's request in answer to Big Mama Thornton's hit "Hound Dog," was shelved when Don Robey threatened an injunction against Sun Records for the similar "Bear Cat."

"Ice Cream Man," backed by Little Walter, remains one of the most perfect examples of the post-war Chicago sound, a symbiosis of swing, menacing drive, and creative tension and release. "Tough Times" was a rare blues of social commentary characterized, as most of Brim's numbers, by the calm gravity of his baritone voice and his spare, electrified country guitar playing.

Brim saw significant royalties only after J. Geils covered "Be Careful" and Van Halen recorded "Ice Cream Man," of which Brim commented to writer Steven Sharp, "Van Halen did it . . . it stayed on the charts for 20 years. We did it, it stayed on the shelf 20 years."

In 1971 John, Grace, and their son John Jr. released a 45 on their own B&B label. In later years Brim appeared on CDs for Wolf, Anna Bea, Delmark, and Tone Cool, and made occasional club and festival appearances.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli Sharp, Steven. "The Ice Cream Man." Living Blues no. 118 (December 1994): 39.

Discography: AMG: LSFP

Selected Recordings

Ice Cream Man (Tone-Cool CDTC 1150).
Whose Muddy Shoes (MCA/Chess CD CHD-9114).

BRIM, JOHN JR.

b. 13 November 1951; Chicago, IL

Guitarist son of John Brim and drummer Grace Brim, John Jr. accompanied his father throughout the 1970s, frequently with Floyd Jones. Recorded with his parents, "You Put the Hurt on Me," backed with "Movin' Out" in 1971 as a 45 rpm single on their B&B label. Has made infrequent appearances since 1980s, working mainly outside music.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

BRITTON, JOE

b. 28 November 1903; Birmingham, AL

d. 12 August 1972; New York, NY

Jazz and blues trombonist who toured with Bessie Smith (1926–1928), then took various journeyman gigs until settling in New York in the 1930s. His contributions to blues sessions may be heard in the 1940s and 1950s recordings of Jelly Roll Morton, Wynonie Harris, and Sister Rosetta Tharpe.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)

BROADWAY

Record label operated from 1921 by the Bridgeport Die & Machine Company using material recorded by New York Recording Laboratories (Paramount), who took the label over in 1925 and issued the Broadway 5000 Race series, which ran to 112 issues mainly derived from Paramount, with a few from QRS, mostly under pseudonyms. Ma Rainey appears as Lila Patterson, Meade Lux Lewis as Hatch Seward, Blind Blake as Blind George Martin, Ida Cox as both Velma Bradley and Katie Lewis, Elzadie Robinson as Bernice Duke, Charlie Spand as Charlie Chapman. However, Blind Lemon Jefferson, Big Bill, and the Mississippi Sheiks appear under their own names. In 1932–1934, a Broadway label was produced by ARC and in 1934 another by Decca, which issued a 9000 Race series that includes sides by Bumble Bee Slim (as Leroy Carr's Buddy) and Georgia White (as Vergie Lee).

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR; Sutton
Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted with an afterword in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.
 Von Arx, Rolf. "Broadway 5000 Series" 78 Quarterly no. 10 (n.d.): 105.

BROCKMAN, POLK

b 1898; GA
 d. 10 March 1985; Maitland, FL

OKeh label distributor based in Atlanta, Georgia. Scouted blues artists for OKeh, and conducted or assisted various remote commercial recording sessions, including a 1930 OKeh session in Jackson, Mississippi, with local scout H.C. Speir. Later, from 1934 through World War II, he scouted for Bluebird, working especially with the Mississippi Sheiks and Bo Carter. Also a key figure in country music for finding Fiddlin' John Carson for OKeh in 1923.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Brown, Roger S. "Recording Pioneer Polk Brockman." Living Blues no. 23 (September/October 1975): 31.
 "Obituary." Billboard (March 23, 1985): 70.

BRONZE

Record label (California, 1939–1957). Owner: Leroy Edward Hurte (b. 2 May 1915; Muskogee, OK). Los Angeles, California–based, the Bronze label was the first to record Cecil Gant ("I Wonder"), Joe Liggins ("The Honeydrinker"), and the (Five) Soul Stirrers (featuring R. H. Harris, "I'll Never Turn Back," "Walk Around"). Other artists include the Colts, Gladys Bentley, Frank Haywood, Sallie Martin (and Kenneth Morris) Singers, and the Southern Gospel Singers (featuring Willmer "Little Axe" Broadnax). In 1940, Hurte acquired the label from John Levy.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

McGrath
 Pickering, Ed, and Jim Dawson. "The Bronze Story." Blues & Rhythm no. 105 (1995).

BROOKS, "BIG" LEON

b. 19 November 1933; Sunflower, MS
 d. 22 January 1982; Chicago, IL

Harmonica player active in Chicago from the 1950s through his death in 1982. He took up the instrument at age six. An early and abiding influence was Sonny Boy Williamson II (Aleck Miller). After moving from Mississippi to Chicago in the 1940s, Brooks sought and regarded "Little Walter" Jacobs as his "coach." During the 1950s, Brooks led his own bands and worked often with Jimmy Rogers, Otis Rush, Robert Nighthawk, and Freddy King. In the 1982 Living Blues obituary, Rogers attested that Brooks's health and early success was hampered by drugs. By the end of the 1950s, he retired from performing.

Brooks returned to the stage in 1976, rebuilding a following in the Chicago North Side and West Side clubs. His health remained weak. Nonetheless he made a return trip to Mississippi with guitarist Eddie Taylor and vocalist Tail Dragger. Recording opportunities came his way, including individual songs for the Living Chicago Blues album series for Alligator, and a whole album for Bob Corriture's Blues Over Blues B.O.B. label. Shortly before his solo album was released, Brooks died of a heart attack.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
 O'Neal, Jim. "Big Leon Brooks 1933–1982." Living Blues no. 53 (Summer/Autumn 1982): 47.

Discography

Big Leon Brooks. Let's Go to Town (1982, Blues Over Blues B.O.B. 2702).

BROOKS, COLUMBUS

b. 16 November 1927; IN
 d. 4 February 1976; Jackson, MS

Slide guitarist in the manner of Elmore James. From 1968 through 1974 he worked with Sam Myers, mostly around Jackson, Mississippi. His day job was as a janitor. He did not have an opportunity to make studio recordings, but his slide playing remains legendary to those who did hear him live.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

O'Neal, Jim. "Columbus Brooks" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 35 (November/December 1977): 40.

BROOKS, HADDA

b. Hadda Hopgood, 29 October 1916; Los Angeles, CA
 d. 21 November 2002; Los Angeles, CA

BROOKS, HADDA

She studied classical piano and graduated from Polytechnic High School before attending Northwestern University. After working as a rehearsal pianist in the early 1940s, she took up music professionally in 1945 under the guidance of Jules Bihari of Modern Music records, who recorded her extensively as a boogie pianist. She also accompanied Smokey Hogg. She first sang in 1946. She moved to London Records in March 1950, then to OKeh in 1952, concentrating increasingly on ballads aimed at the pop market. Her show on KLAC-TV (from December 1950) was one of the first regular shows hosted by an African American.

Her subsequent career was increasingly night club oriented and included a tour of Europe with the Harlem Globe Trotters basketball show as interval pianist, and residencies in Kansas City, Missouri (1956), Tucson, Arizona (1957), and Honolulu. In the 1960s she was in Australia with a daily TV show. She retired to Los Angeles in 1970, but made a comeback in 1986, now stressing jazz aspects of her style. Despite the vagaries of her later career, she is a significant blues and boogie pianist, as evidenced by “Swingin’ the Boogie” (1945, Modern Music 102), “Rockin’ the Boogie” (1945, Modern Music 113), “Bully Wully Boogie” (1946, Modern Music 1002), and many more records from this era.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Aldin, Mary Katherine, with Mark Humphrey. “Queen of the Boogie.” Living Blues no. 118 (December 1994): 31.
Stolder, Steve: “Queen of the Boogie.” Blues & Rhythm no. 110 (June 1996): 4.

Discography: AMG; Lord

BROOKS, LONNIE

b. Lee Baker Jr., 18 December 1933; Dubuison, LA
Blues singer and guitarist. Lee Baker was born in Louisiana in 1933. His grandfather, a banjo player, got him interested in music. When he was nineteen he moved to Port Arthur, Texas. In 1955 he bought his first guitar. Brooks was influenced by T-Bone Walker and B. B. King. His first recordings were made for Goldband in 1957 and 1958. The best-known number from these sessions was “Family Rules.” Brooks could now leave his construction work behind and has been living from his music ever since. While in Louisiana he played in the bands of Clifton Chenier and Lonesome Sundown. In 1959 he moved to Chicago and for security reasons he changed his name from Lee Baker to Lonnie Brooks. While in Chicago he recorded and toured with Jimmy Reed. In the 1960s he recorded for various labels, such as Midas, Palos, USA, Chirrup, and Chess. A fine live show in Pepper’s Lounge in Chicago from 1968 was taped by Georges Adins and later issued on Black Magic. In 1969 Brooks recorded an album for Capitol. In 1975 he visited Europe for the first time. Black & Blue recorded him in Paris and a first interview appeared in a European magazine. In 1978 Lonnie signed a contract with Alligator Records, for which he recorded many albums. Brooks continues to tour and record extensively, enjoying the success he deserves so much.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

Brooks, Lonnie, with Cub Koda and Wayne Baker. Blues for Dummies. Forest City: IDG Books Worldwide, 1998.
Moon, D. Thomas. “Lonnie Brooks: The Bayou Boogie-man” Living Blues no. 138 (March/April 1998): 48–61.

Discography: AMG

BROONZY, BIG BILL

b. William Lee Conley Broonzy, 26 June 1893 (?); Scott, MS
d. 15 August 1958; Chicago, IL

Few blues artists have been as versatile or influential as William Lee Conley “Big Bill” Broonzy (1893?–1958). His career as an acclaimed songwriter, singer, guitarist, and author began in the late 1920s in the early days of recorded blues and concluded in the late 1950s as the folk music revival began. While he is often cited as a key transitional link between rural Delta blues and urban Chicago musical styles, a distinguishing feature of Broonzy’s work was his ability to adapt successfully to changing musical and cultural tastes over nearly four decades.

His Years in the South

Broonzy was born in Scott, Mississippi, on June 26 of either 1893 (as he claimed throughout his lifetime) or 1898 (the year listed on his twin sister’s birth certificate). His parents, to whom twenty-one children were born, moved the family early in the first decade of the 1900s to Arkansas, where his father worked primarily as a sharecropping farmer. Broonzy’s first musical instrument was a homemade one-string fiddle, which he played at about age ten for what he described as “two-way picnics,” with whites in one area and blacks in a separate section. After the farm he was managing was crippled by the drought of 1916 he worked in mines, levee camps, and work gangs to support his family. After being drafted for service in World War I and serving in France in 1918, he returned to the South to find that he wanted more than the limited employment choices there offered, and headed north.

Big Bill Broonzy in the 1940s. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Chicago and New York, 1920–1950

Arriving in Chicago in 1920, Broonzy learned to play the guitar and, after an initial session likely held in 1925, recorded his first sides for producer J. Mayo Williams on Paramount in late 1927 and early 1928. Broonzy’s presence became easily identifiable: a limber, often jaunty guitar style with a strong ragtime feel, featuring clearly picked, single-string runs and emphasizing several musical phrases he commonly used. His voice expressed confidence and authority, and, as Samuel B. Charters observed, “. . . as a warm, entertaining blues singer he had no equal.”

Historian Paul Oliver has characterized Broonzy as “the most important single influence in Chicago blues of the 1930s,” and one measure of this judgment is the sheer volume of his output. Recording for numerous labels but primarily for Bluebird and the American Recording Corporation, his playing can be identified on more than 600 sides during the period 1930–1939 alone, the majority in the latter half of the decade when the record companies and the buying public emerged from the depths of the Depression. In addition to the groups he led under his own name, his services as a sideman were in constant demand. The list of his musical collaborators includes a significant number of the popular Chicago-based blues artists of this period: Memphis Minnie, John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson, Washboard Sam, Bumble Bee Slim, Lil Johnson, and Bill “Jazz” Gillum. An added source of Broonzy’s clout was that producer Lester Melrose—arguably the most powerful decision maker in the Chicago recording industry in this period—used Broonzy as an unofficial talent scout.

The 1930s were also a period in which Broonzy demonstrated his protean ability to adopt differing musical styles successfully as a performer and songwriter. He recorded sexually suggestive hokum sides with Georgia Tom (who later became gospel pioneer Reverend Thomas A. Dorsey); blues in the style of Leroy Carr and Scrapper Blackwell accompanied by a series of piano players including Black Bob, Josh Altheimer, and Blind John Davis; and up-tempo, sometimes jazz-flavored songs with a series of combos featuring trumpet, clarinet, and electric guitar. Broonzy was a prolific and popular songwriter (he claimed to have written more than 360 songs), and his strengths as a lyricist included the skillful blending of rural and urban references, his astute observations of the relations between men and women, and his talent for a memorable phrase (such as “Looking Up at Down”). When he appeared at the December 1938 “From Spirituals to Swing,” concert at Carnegie Hall in New York City organized by record producer John Hammond, Broonzy won over the audience by playing his song of ironic social commentary, “Just a Dream.”

Broonzy’s popularity continued into the 1940s, as he collaborated with pianists Memphis Slim, Big Maceo Merriwether, and Roosevelt Sykes, wrote songs that became blues standards such as “I Feel So Good” and “Key to the Highway” (for which Gillum also claimed credit), and backed vocalist Lil Green. In 1947, folklorist Alan Lomax brought Broonzy, Memphis Slim, and John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson into a New York City studio and recorded a remarkable session of conversation and music, which, after inserting some additional material, he later released as the record titled “Blues in the Mississippi Night.” In discussing the origins of the blues, the three musicians drew on their own experiences to describe the often violent and degrading realities of Southern life in the first half of the twentieth century. The relaxed, matter-of-fact way in which they offered their recollections and observations underscored both the humor and the horror. The record was not issued until 1957 (and then on a British label), and Lomax did not identify the participants by name until after the death of Memphis Slim in 1988; the anonymity may have reflected either the volatility of the contents or the other contractual commitments of the musicians.

Europe, “Big Bill Blues,” and the Folk Revival

In the late 1940s and early 1950s, black popular musical tastes in the United States shifted away from Broonzy, first toward the R&B style of artists like Charles Brown, and then toward the electrified blues of the Chess Records stars such as Muddy Waters and Little Walter. Broonzy, who had started to perform in clubs and at colleges in the late 1940s in a revue of folk songs led by Chicago writer Studs Terkel titled “I Come for to Sing,” became a solo performer accompanying himself on acoustic guitar. While Leadbelly and Josh White had each previously performed in Europe, Broonzy used his concert tour in the fall of 1951 to establish himself to audiences outside the United States as the leading representative of the American blues community. He combined his skills as a raconteur and performer with a repertoire to which he added spirituals and popular songs, and his several tours of Europe in the 1950s resulted in widespread international recognition, a number of records, and even a short film about him. It would be hard to overstate the impact on global popular culture of British artists such as the Rolling Stones and Eric Clapton who were drawn to the excitement surrounding the blues that Broonzy played a large role in generating. In addition, many blues artists received exposure and acclaim in a series of successful European tours organized in the 1960s and 1970s by Willie Dixon; these tours were built on the successful foundation laid by Broonzy and others.

To create his 1955 autobiography, Big Bill Blues, Broonzy hand-wrote text, which Belgian writer Yannick Bruynoghe then edited into the final version. While some of the facts he presented have since turned out to be inaccurate, Broonzy was nonetheless able to bring the narrative power of his lyrics and his recorded commentaries to his writing. The book is the source of numerous often-told blues vignettes, including Memphis Minnie's victory over Broonzy in a guitar-playing contest, and also includes some of Broonzy's commentaries on racism ("...all over the USA it's the same soup, but it's just served in a different way."). It remains one of the very few extensive firsthand accounts of the life and views of a blues artist.

In his collaborations with Studs Terkel and Pete Seeger in the 1950s on the radio, on records, and in concerts, Broonzy played an active role in encouraging and shaping the emerging interest in acoustic music in the United States and Europe that by the 1960s became known as the folk revival. A vital element of this trend was a keen interest by its mostly white audiences in "authentic" songs and styles, and Broonzy provided legitimacy, although to accomplish this he had to revive songs he had not sung for decades and incorporate others he had to learn. In addition, by presenting songs such as "Black, Brown, and White" and "When Do I Get to Be Called a Man?," he brought his ironic but pointed perspectives on race to international audiences.

Broonzy died of cancer in Chicago on August 15, 1958, just over a year after he had lost the effective use of his voice in an operation. Muddy Waters, whom Broonzy had helped get his start in Chicago in the mid-1940s and whom he recommended take his place on a tour of England later in 1958, was the lead pallbearer. In describing him some years later, Waters provided what might serve as a fitting tribute to Broonzy's role as friend and mentor to two generations of blues artists: "... Big Bill, he don't care where you from; he didn't look over you 'cause he been on records a long time. 'Do your thing, stay with it, man; if you stay with it, you goin' to make it.' That's what Big Bill told me. Mostly I try to be like him."

BOB RIESMAN

Bibliography

- AMG (Steve James); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Broonzy, Big Bill, and Roosevelt Sykes. Big Bill Broonzy and Roosevelt Sykes: Masters of the Country Blues (1995, Yazoo Video/DVD 518).
 Broonzy, Big Bill, and Yannick Bruynoghe. Big Bill Blues. New York: Da Capo, 1955/1992.
 Oliver, Paul. Blues Off the Record: Thirty Years of Blues Commentary. Tunbridge Wells: Baton; New York: Hippocrene, 1984.
 Smith, Chris. Hit the Right Lick: The Recordings of Big Bill Broonzy. Bromham: Blues & Rhythm, 1996.
 Various articles in Living Blues no. 55 (Winter 1982/1983), pp. 4-23.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings: Pre-1950

- Blues in the Mississippi Night* (1990, Rykodisc CD 90155).
Do That Guitar Rag (1991, Yazoo 1035).
The Young Big Bill Broonzy (1991, Yazoo CD 1011).
Where the Blues Began (2000, Snapper SMDCD 248).

Selected Recordings: Post-1950

- Big Bill Broonzy Interviewed by Studs Terkel* (1957, Folkways F-3586).
The Big Bill Broonzy Story (1999, Verve CD 314547555-2).
Trouble in Mind (2000, Smithsonian Folkways SFW CD 40131).

BROWN, ADA

- b. Ada Scott, 1 May 1890; Kansas City, KS
 d. 31 May 1950; Kansas City, KS

Vocalist. Worked and recorded with Bennie Moten's Kansas City Orchestra, including "Evil Mama Blues"/"Break O'Day Blues" (1923, OKeh 8101). From the mid-1920s, she toured widely; continued to work as an actress, singer, and dancer until the mid-1940s, including in the film Stormy Weather (1943) from which "That Ain't Right" was issued (V-Disc 165).

HOWARD RYE

BROWN, ADA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

BROWN, ANDREW

b. 25 February 1937; Jackson, MS

d. 11 December 1985; Harvey, IL

Chicago blues singer and guitarist who emerged in the 1960s. In early adolescence Brown began playing guitar in blues bands in the south suburbs of Chicago. By the mid-1960s he was recording, coming out with a variety of hard soul and blues sides—on one release for USA (1964), three releases for Four Brothers (1965–1966), and one release for Brave (early 1970s), but garnered no commercial success. In the early 1980s, Brown revived his career, first coming out with three tracks on the Alligator Living Chicago Blues series (1980), and then two well-received albums with predominantly original material, produced by Dick Shurman for two Holland-based labels, namely Big Brown's Chicago Blues (1982, Black Magic), which won a W. C. Handy Award, and On the Case (1985, Double Trouble).

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Shurman, Dick. "Andrew Brown" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 68 (1986): 34–35.

Discography: LSFP

BROWN, ARELEAN

b. 10 June 1924; Tchula, MS

d. 27 April, 1981; Chicago, IL

Blues singer and songwriter Arelean Brown started her career in Detroit in the late 1940s, cut unreleased sides in the 1950s, and enlivened the Chicago club scene in the 1970s, also recording an LP including her warhorse "I Am a Streaker, Baby."

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

O'Neal, Jim. "Arelean Brown" [obituary]. Living Blues 50 (Spring 1981): 44–45.

See also Simmons, Malcolm "Little Mack"; Smith, Bessie; Williams, Lee "Shot"

BROWN, BESSIE (OHIO)

b. 1895; Cleveland, OH

d. 1955; New York, NY

Vocalist. Billed as the Original Bessie Brown. Began career touring with musical reviews and performing on live radio broadcasts in Cleveland, Ohio. Her complete recordings date between 1925 and 1929. Pseudonyms: Caroline Lea and Sadie Green.

ROBERT WEBB FRY II

Bibliography

Harris, Sheldon. Blues Who's Who. New York: Da Capo, 1994.

Tracy, Steve. Liner notes for Original Bessie Brown: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order (Document CD5456).

Discography: DGR

Selected Recordings

"Them Has Been Blues"/"Pappa De Da Da" (1925, Perfect 32156)

"Arkansas Blues"/"Sugar" (1928, Vocalion 1182).

"Smile"/"Blue Ridge" (1928, Brunswick 3922).

"Taint Nobody's Fault But My Own"/"The Blues Singer from Alabama" (1929, Brunswick 4346).

BROWN, BESSIE (TEXAS)

b. ca. 1895; TX

Teamed with in 1918 and later married George W. Williams, touring with him on the TOBA circuit. Recorded duets with Williams for Columbia in 1923–1926, and had a solo session for the same label in 1924. According to Sheldon Harris, she retired from performing in 1932, and was living in Cincinnati, Ohio, into the 1970s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

BROWN, BUSTER

b. 15 August 1911; Cordele, GA

d. 31 January 1976; Brooklyn, NY

Buster Brown recorded some tracks in a 1943 Library of Congress session that collected dust for more than forty years. His first released recording was “Fannie Mae” for Fire Records in 1959. From this session, several R&B-charted songs made it to his only album of note, The New King of the Blues. Later, he covered Louis Jordan’s, “Is You Is or Is You Ain’t My Baby?” and a great version of “Lost in a Dream.” His final release was “Crawlin’ Kingsnake” in 1964.

Brown was influenced by many blues harmonica players including Sonny Terry and Sonny Boy Williamson and had a wild, earthy country style to his harmonica playing. The songs were always arranged in a more urban flavor, really more R&B than blues.

Brown was forty-eight at the time he recorded for Fire, and his success, however brief, was a real surprise. His talents were finally recognized by a wider audience, but subsequent releases of “Is You Is or Is You Ain’t My Baby?” in 1960 and 1962’s “Sugar Babe” were the only other charted hits for this dynamic artist.

TOM FISHER

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

The New King of the Blues (1960, Fire 101/102).

Slow Drag Blues (1962, Gwenn 600).

Trying to Learn to Love You (1962, Gwenn 602).

Good News (1996, Charly CRB-1209).

BROWN, CHARLES

b. 13 September 1922; Texas City, TX

d. 21 January 1999; Oakland, CA

Pianist, vocalist, and bandleader Charles Brown pioneered an alternate style of singing and playing that proved blues and R&B could be delivered in a sophisticated, elegant fashion without sacrificing either soul or intensity. His piano work also had the fluidity, expressiveness, and dexterity more often associated with jazz, though it wasn’t quite as harmonically elaborate as bop. The style reflected his early classical training, which he received as young man in Texas City, Texas. Brown’s direction and interests were permanently changed after he heard and became immersed in the music of jazz giant Art Tatum. Brown’s phrasing was elegant, his accompaniment crisp, and his solos clean and rhythmically delightful. He did not pound the keyboard or stomp out beats like such contemporaries as Amos Milburn, but he could generate equal excitement through his soothing, inviting leads. Still, Charles Brown didn’t initially plan on a music career. He earned a chemistry degree and for a time was a high school teacher and government chemist in Pine Bluff, Arkansas, and later in Berkeley, California, before moving to Los Angeles in the mid-1940s.

Brown became the pianist and lead singer in guitarist Johnny Moore’s (brother of Oscar Moore, a member of Nat “King” Cole’s threesome) trio, the Three Blazers, during the mid-1940s. The band featured Brown’s smooth, yet bluesy pianos contrasting Johnny Moore’s spicy guitar riffs, plus Brown’s sensual, smoky leads. Their recordings of “Merry Christmas Baby” and “Sunny Road” among many others influenced the early music of Ray Charles, and were later cited by both Sam Cooke and Bobby “Blue” Bland as helping to define and shape their approach to song structure and presentation. Much of the Three Blazers’ music had a joyous, swinging quality, though solo space was minimized and the trio’s collective sound was usually at the forefront during vocal breaks. In later interviews, Brown often spoke about the lack of individual space and personal publicity he endured during those times, though he spent nearly four years with the Blazers. During his Blazers tenure Brown’s “Drifting Blues” peaked at number two on the R&B charts. It was subsequently voted R&B Record of the Year by Cashbox, and would later be covered and turned into almost as big an R&B hit by Bland.

Though they were frequently compared to Nat King Cole’s trio, the two groups were actually quite different. Cole as a pianist could be traced directly back to Earl “Fatha” Hines in his solos and rhythmic flair. His singing was also even smoother and more polished than Brown’s, and he was predominantly an interpretative vocalist while Brown was also a fine songwriter. Although the Three Blazers recorded for several labels, Brown enjoyed even more success as a featured artist for Aladdin. Brown became a superstar as a solo performer after leaving the Blazers in 1948. He was a mainstay among R&B acts in the pre-rock ’n’ roll 1950s, headlining major tours and scoring numerous big hits with such songs as “Black Night,” “Hard Times,” and “Please Come Home for Christmas.” His first solo single, “Get Yourself Another Fool,” became Brown’s second R&B top ten hit (at number 4), while “Trouble Blues” topped the charts for fifteen weeks in 1949. That year Brown’s trio enjoyed another smash with “In the Evening When the Sun Goes Down.”

His dominance extended into 1951, when “Seven Long Days” hit the number two spot and “Black Night” gave him another number one R&B single. But Brown’s style was deemed dated by the advent of the backbeat-heavy sounds of rock ’n’ roll. Despite being both a tremendous instrumentalist and gifted vocalist, Brown's approach wasn't considered bombastic enough for audiences enthralled by the likes of Elvis Presley, Little Richard, and Chuck Berry. His songs also were not lyrically rooted in the rebellious teen dynamic that increasingly fueled the late 1950s rock revolution.

Interestingly, Brown never stopped worked or recording, cutting dates for King, Jewel, and Imperial during the 1960s and 1970s. He enjoyed his last significant R&B hit in 1960 with "Please Come Home for Christmas," a sentimental ballad that remains a holiday staple in the twenty-first century. The Eagles cover version cracked the top twenty at number eighteen some eighteen years later. But it was the emergence of the reissue market that reinvigorated Brown's career during the 1980s, as his classic 1940s and 1950s sounds began resurfacing on imports labels, most notably the Swedish company Route 66. Brown also began doing club dates again, highlighted by a recurring set of appearances in New York City at Tramps. A marvelous 1986 album, One More for the Road on Blue Side (later reissued on Alligator with bonus cuts, remastered sound, and new packaging), turned Brown into a star once more. Despite some signs of aging in the voice, his playing was still inventive and his singing consistently engaging. Brown started making the rounds at various blues festivals and two years later would be featured on a Public Broadcasting special That Rhythm Those Blues with Ruth Brown. This show included performance footage, photos from Brown's earlier years, extensive interviews, and a strong duet with Brown.

His final decade began with the release of All My Life, another fine disc that included guest stints and collaborations by Dr. John, Ruth Brown, and Bonnie Raitt. Brown also enjoyed a stint as opening act on a national tour for Raitt, and made numerous club and festival appearances. He was awarded a National Heritage Fellowship by the National Endowment for the Arts at the White House in 1997, and issued the final studio release of his distinguished career So Goes Love (Verve) the following year. Brown was posthumously inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1999. Two years before that he was inducted into the Blues Foundation's Blues Hall of Fame. Though always a mellow, smooth singer and player, Charles Brown's music ultimately was always rooted in blues, never lacked swing, and was always far more soulful than laid-back.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli

Brisbin, John Anthony. "Charles Brown." Living Blues no. 118 (November/December 1994): 10–29.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

BROWN, CLARENCE "GATEMOUTH"

b. 18 April 1924; Vinton, LA

Blues singer, guitarist, and violinist Clarence Brown was born in Vinton, Louisiana, the son of Clarence Brown Sr. and Virginia Franks, who had both come from Mississippi. When he was just three weeks old the family moved to Orange, Texas—thus, Clarence is actually a Texan. He began to play guitar at the age of five, inspired by his father, a multi-instrumentalist who could play violin, guitar, banjo, mandolin, and accordion. Following in his father's footsteps, Clarence mastered a violin at the age of ten, and later learned to play mandolin and harmonica. It is believed that he got the nickname "Gatemouth" from a high school teacher who thought his voice sounded like a gate. His main early influences were Count Basie, Louis Jordan, Peetie Wheatstraw, and T-Bone Walker, who got Clarence his first real job at a Galveston night spot.

Brown first recorded with Maxwell Davis & His Orchestra for Aladdin in 1947. In 1949 he switched to Peacock where he continued to record until 1961. The Peacock recordings are Gatemouth's classical heritage. Scorching boogie guitar is to be heard on titles like "Boogie Uproar" and "Okie Dokie Stomp" with wailing harp heard on "Gate's Salty Blues" and electrifying violin sounds on "Just Before Dawn." If he did not record with his own orchestra, the Al Grey All Stars or the Pluma Davis Orchestra helped him out. With Don Robey as his manager Gatemouth became extremely popular, playing at both white and black clubs. Due to "serious financial difficulties," Brown left Peacock in 1964. He then had abortive dealings with Cue (1964), Cinderella (1965), and Hermitage (1965).

In 1971 he visited Europe for the first time. The album he recorded with Mickey Baker and Jimmy Dawkins for Black & Blue in Paris was his first in six years. In 1972 he recorded a second album in France, this time for Barclay. It gave him a chance to express his views on economics, the environment, and politics. Black & Blue recorded him again in 1973 with Hal Singer on tenor sax. In 1973 Gatemouth also performed at the Montreux blues festival in Switzerland and two songs were issued by Black & Blue. Later that year Brown recorded an album with Louis Jordan songs for B&B with Arnett Cobb and Milt Buckner. There was even a fourth 1973 album with Jay McShann. Both in 1974 and 1975 Barclay traveled to Bogalusa, Louisiana, to record Brown in his home country. The label Music is Medicine did the same in 1975 and 1976. In 1977 Gate-mouth was back in France again to record with Lloyd Glenn. MCA waxed him in Tulsa, Oklahoma, in 1978 and Charly recorded him live in 1980. That same year the Schweizerischer Bankverein recorded him live at the Internationale Jazz Festival in Bern. In 1981 Brown signed a contract with Rounder and for them he recorded albums in 1981, 1982, and 1985. In 1992 he recorded for Alligator. Next he signed a contract with Verve and recorded albums for them in 1994, 1995, and 1996. At the time of this writing Brown continues to tour and record extensively.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Bonner, Brett J., and David Nelson. "Gatemouth Brown: Music That's Right for the World." Living Blues no. 107 (January/February 1993): 10–19.
Collier, Pat. "Clarence 'Gatemouth' Brown: American Music, Texas Style." Sing Out! 40, no. 4 (1996): 34–42.
Grasso, Skip, ed. Clarence Gatemouth Brown: Vital Blues Guitar: Authentic Tablature Transcriptions Off the Original Recordings. Ojai, CA: Creative Concepts, 1994.
Obrecht, Jas. "Clarence Gatemouth Brown: 40 Years on the Road as Picker, Fiddler, Bluesman, Jazzer." Guitar Player 13, no. 5 (May 1979): 44–46, 90, 92, 96.

Discography: AMG; LSFPBROWN, CLEO

- b. 8 December 1909; DeKalb, MS
d. 15 April 1995; Denver, CO

Chicago boogie-woogie pianist and singer. Some sources cite 1904 as the birth year and Meridian, Mississippi, as the birthplace. Brown began her career in 1923 performing in Chicago clubs. Singing in a light but sly and insinuating voice and accompanying herself with driving keyboard work, Brown gained national fame as a boogie-woogie stylist during the 1930s and early 1940s. She recorded for Decca during 1935–1936, and built nationwide popularity for the boogie-woogie with her exhilarating variation of "Pinetop's Boogie Woogie" and her swinging version of "Lookie, Lookie, Here Comes Cookie." Brown subsequently recorded for Hollywood Hot Shots (1936), Capitol (1949), and Blue (1949). She retired in 1953, but was lured out of retirement by jazz pianist Marian McPartland to record an LP in 1987 for Audiophile.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- Balliett, Whitney. "Jazz: Scoop." The New Yorker (November 10, 1986): 132ff.
Pease, Sharon A. "Health Better, Cleo Brown Set for Comeback." Down Beat (July 1, 1945): 12.

Discography: AMG; LordBROWN, DUSTY

- b. 11 March 1929; Tralake, MS

Singer and harmonica player Dusty Brown taught himself the instrument at age thirteen while growing up in rural Mississippi. He moved to Chicago in 1946 and within a few years began working local clubs, sometimes with Muddy Waters and Little Walter. Brown recorded for Parrot and Bandera in the 1950s, and worked sporadically in music throughout the next fifty years.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
O'Neal, Jim. "Dusty Brown." Blues Unlimited no. 84 (September 1971): 7–8.

Discography: LSFPBROWN, GABRIEL

- b. 1910; Orlando, FL
d. 1960s (?)

A strangely anonymous artist with no real discernible roots and a sophisticated background that belies his concentration on slick country blues. Brown won first prize in the St. Louis National Folk Festival of 1934 and was recorded for the Library of Congress. He became an actor, working with Orson Welles among others, and was taken up by record company owner Joe Davis who recorded him extensively from 1943 to 1953 before he reportedly died in a boating accident.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

- Bastin, Bruce. Never Sell a Copyright. United Kingdom: Storyville 1990.

BROWN, GABRIEL

Discography: DGR; LSFP

Mean Old Blues (Flyright CD59).

BROWN, HASH

b. Brian Calway, 22 September 1955; Bristol, CT

Guitarist in postwar Texas styles including those of Goree Carter and of Gatemouth Brown. Moved to Dallas, Texas, in 1983 and backed U. P. Wilson and Zuzu Bollin in local performances. Formed the Hash Brown Band in 1993 with bassist Terry Graff-Montgomery and drummer Bobby Baranowski; their weekly blues jams are a hallmark of the contemporary Dallas blues scene.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

“Blues News: Making Waves in Dallas–Fort Worth: Hash Brown.” Living Blues no. 157 (May/June 2001): 9.
Hash Brown Band website, <http://www.geocities.com/BourbonStreet/2888/contents.html> (accessed January 7, 2005).

BROWN, HENRY “PAPA”

b. 1906; Troy, TN

d. 28 June 1981; St. Louis, MO

Moved to St. Louis around 1918 and by 1922 was playing piano at rent parties and bars. His prewar records show him as an able soloist and sensitive accompanist to singers. He was drafted into the army in World War II and stationed in England. His postwar recording career began with an excellent album for the 77 label. Not to be confused with guitarist “Hi” Henry Brown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

“Obituaries.” Living Blues no. 51 (Summer 1981): 52.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

BROWN, IDA G.

b. ca. 1900

Singer and actress on the TOBA circuit, revues, and theater through the mid-1930s. Recorded two blues sides with a small jazz group in 1924 for the Banner label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

BROWN, J. T.

b. John T. Brown, 2 April 1918; MS

d. 24 November 1969; Chicago, IL

Birth year sometimes cited as 1910. Tenor saxophone/vocals. Chicago style jump blues, classic Chicago blues. Known for his distinctive “nanny goat” vibrato on the sax. Moved to Chicago in 1945. First session as a leader was in 1950 for the Harlem label. In 1951 and 1952, Brown recorded for the Chicago-based labels United and JOB. Later recorded some sides for the Bihari Brothers’ Meteor label: “Round House Boogie”/“Kickin’ the Blues” (credited to Bep Brown Orchestra), and “Sax-ony Boogie” (credited as “Saxman Brown”)/“Dumb Woman Blues” (as J. T. [Big Boy] Brown). As a sideman he recorded with Roosevelt Sykes and Jimmy Oden, and also backed Eddie Boyd and Washboard Sam for RCA Victor. Brown played on Elmore James’s classics “It Hurts Me Too” and “Dust My Broom” and with pianist Little Johnny Jones. In January 1969, he recorded with Fleetwood Mac “Blues Jam at Chess.”

DENNIS TAYLOR

Bibliography

AMG; Larkin
Leadbitter, Mike. “J. T. Brown.” Blues Unlimited no. 70 (February/March 1970): 14.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

BROWN, JAMES

b. 3 May 1933; Barnwell, SC

Birth year sometimes cited as 1928. Vocalist, keyboardist, composer, arranger, bandleader, and producer. James Brown, the “Godfather of Soul,” fused his urgent gospel-inspired vocal delivery with a precision-tooled ensemble and spectacular stagecraft to become one of the most powerful and influential forces in twentieth-century popular music. From soul to funk to social consciousness to disco and beyond, “Soul Brother No. 1” changed the shape of music several times. Billed as the “Hardest Working Man in Show Business,” Brown mounted his relentless stage show more than three hundred fifty nights a year and released an unbroken string of hit recordings stretching thirty years, from “Please Please Please” in 1956 to “Living in America” in 1986. His early styles were in rhythm and blues, developing into soul in the 1960s, and to the beginnings of funk style around 1969–1970, often employing and even extending blues forms as the basis of many songs.

Brown worked with the Famous Flames, Maceo Parker, Fred Wesley, Bootsie Collins, Bobby Byrd, Lynn Collins, Hank Ballard, the Blues Brothers, and Afrika Bambaataa.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Brown, James. James Brown: The Godfather of Soul. New York: Macmillan, 1986.

Discography: Lord

Selected Recordings

“Please Please Please” (1956, Federal), “Try Me” (1958, Federal), “Papa’s Got a Brand New Bag” (1965, King), “It’s a Man’s Man’s Man’s World” (1966, King), “Cold Sweat” (1967, King), “Say It Loud—I’m Black and I’m Proud” (1968, King), “Get Up—Feel Like a Sex Machine” (1970, King), “Living in America” (1986).

Selected Album

Live at the Apollo (recorded 1962, King).

BROWN, JOHN HENRY “BUBBA”

b. 5 December 1902; Brandon MS
d. 21 December 1985; Los Angeles CA

Learned guitar and violin from musician father. In the late 1920s and 1930s he performed with Jackson bluesmen Tommy Johnson, Johnny Temple, and various Chatmon brothers. Moved to Los Angeles and worked outside music. Among his three sons is jazz guitarist Mel Brown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Evans, David. “The Bubba Brown Story.” Blues World no. 21 (October 1968): 7–9.

Discography: LSFP

BROWN, LILLYN

b. Lillian Thomas, 24 April 1885; Atlanta, GA
d. 8 June 1969; New York, NY

Early singer on commercial records, making two sides on the Emerson label in 1921. Blues singing was a small part of a long career in black entertainment beginning in 1894. Coming out of a fifteen-year retirement in New York City in 1949, she appeared in local theater and taught acting and singing until her death.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR

BROWN, NAPPY

b. Napoleon Brown Goodson Culp, 12 October 1929; Charlotte, NC

Brown spent his formative years singing gospel. After winning a talent contest, he was asked to join the Golden Bells. From there he joined the Selah Jubilee Singers whom he recorded with, and eventually the Heavenly Lights, who were signed to the roster of Savoy Records. When owner Herman Lubinsky heard Brown he convinced him switch to R&B in the early 1950s.

Brown brought gospel fervor to his Savoy recordings, scoring a hit with “Don’t Be Angry” in 1955. Throughout the 1950s he scored with numbers such as “Pitter Patter” and the oft-covered “Little by Little.” He cut “The Right Time” in 1957, originally cut by Roosevelt Sykes as “Night Time Is the Right Time” in 1937 and subsequently covered by Ray Charles in 1958. Several of these songs crossed over to the pop charts. The hits had Brown touring constantly, as he hit the road with package tours that included Fats Domino, Little Richard, and Jackie Wilson. His last Savoy recordings were in the early 1960s. Shortly after, he went into virtual retirement and moved back to Charlotte to resume singing gospel music.

With renewed interest in his music, mainly from Europe, he began a comeback in the 1980s. He resurfaced in 1984 with an album for Landslide Records, Tore Up, which was eventually issued on Alligator Records. Strong follow-ups included Something Gonna Jump Out the Bushes with Anson Funderburgh, Ronnie Earl, and Earl King on Black Top, and in the 1990s he cut albums for Ichiban and New Moon.

JEFF HARRIS

BROWN, NAPPY

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
McGarvey, Seamus, and Stuart Colman. "Nappy Brown:
That Man!" Juke Blues no. 9 (1987), 11–15.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Something Gonna Jump Out the Bushes (1990, Black Top CD-BT-1039).

Night Time Is the Right Time (2000, Savoy Jazz 92908).

See also Ichiban; Savoy/National/Regent/Acorn

BROWN, OLIVE

b. Olive Jefferson, 30 August 1913; St. Louis, MO
d. 9 May 1982; St. Louis, MO

Moved to Detroit while an infant. Brown worked extensively in the early 1940s and starred in productions at Club Zombie. She worked with Detroit jump blues bands, including Todd Rhodes and T. J. Fowler (1940s), doing revues at Broad's Club Zombie (1942). Brown toured extensively, used horns rather than guitars as backup. Her major influence was Bessie Smith; her repertoire included numbers associated with Smith and also Ethel Waters.

JIM GALLERT

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: LSFP

BROWN, OSCAR III "BOBO"

b. 18 October 1956; Chicago, IL
d. 12 August 1996; Chicago, IL

Oscar Brown III was an electric and upright bass player, vocalist, poet, and songwriter. His musical interests were far ranging, including theater productions, world music, jazz, and blues. He worked with his father Oscar Brown, Jr., and other family members from the age of fifteen. Early in his career, he worked live with Chicago harp master Sugar Blue. At the time of his tragic death in 1996, his main musical interest was the merger of poetry with fusions of various genres of music. Along with poets Keith M. Kelley and Quraysh Ali, and Dennis "Nate" Williams, Jr., on sax, he was a founding member of the Funky Wordsmyths, which produced a popular McDonald's commercial. Brown worked with Chicago percussionist Don Moye in his Sun Percussion Summit, was the musical director for the Jazz Buffet's production of "Back Down Memory Lane" in 1995, and performed with hard-bop ensemble One Family Band and the late avant-gardist Frank Lowe.

DEBORAH L. GILLASPIE

Bibliography

"Oscar Brown III, 38, Chicago Jazz Artist" [obituary].
Chicago Tribune (August 13, 1996).

"Wordsmyths Mix Poetry, Jazz For Explosive Results."
Chicago Tribune (January 11, 1994).

Selected Recordings

The Funky Wordsmyths. Spoken Anthologeez: Hard Hittin Blak Poetry n' Muzik. Blak Yang Music (privately produced). Available at <http://www.maggielbrown.com>.

Moye, Famadou Don, and Enoch Williamson. Afrikan Song (1996, AECO Records, Chicago, Illinois; distributed by Southport Records, SSD3009).

BROWN, PETE

b. 9 November 1906; Baltimore, MD
d. 20 September 1963; New York City, NY

Saxophonist in jazz and jump blues styles in the 1930s and early 1940s, based in New York since 1927. Turned to bop jazz during its development in the early to mid-1940s. Recorded for the Bethlehem and Verve jazz labels in the 1950s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Penny, Dave. "Unlucky Blues." Blues and Rhythm no. 100 (1995): 10.

Discography: Lord

BROWN, RICHARD "RABBIT"

b. ca. 1880; New Orleans, LA
d. 1937; New Orleans, LA

A heavy-voiced singing boatman with a slight speech impediment who recorded long ballads (including one about the Titanic sinking of 1912) and blues of startling imagery at one session in 1927.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Harris

Fontenot, Kevin. "New Orleans Songster." The Jazz Archivist 13 (1998–1999).

Discography: DGR

BROWN, ROY JAMES

b. 10 September 1925; New Orleans, LA

d. 25 May 1981; San Fernando, CA

A pioneer in rhythm and blues and a master of the "slow burn," Roy Brown effectively transferred the melismatic quaver of gospel to the twelve-bar blues. Born in New Orleans, he recorded his landmark song "Good Rockin' Tonight" for DeLuxe Records in 1947. An immediate regional hit, it emerged on the national charts the following year and led to other such popular songs as "Boogie at Midnight" (1949) and "Hard Luck Blues" (1940). King Records signed Brown from 1952 through 1957. His career, however, eroded, like that of many of his peers, with the emergence of rock 'n' roll. A cover of Buddy Knox's "Party Doll" for Imperial was his final hit in 1957, though the European reissue of his early sides in the late 1970s led to an otherwise unexpected twilight resurgence.

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli

Broven, John. "Roy Brown. Part 1: Good Rockin' Tonight" Blues Unlimited no. 123 (January/February 1977): 4–11; "Part 2: Hard Luck Blues." Blues Unlimited no. 124 (March/June 1977): 14–21.

Harris, Sheldon. "Roy Harris, 1925–1981" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 52 (Spring 1982): 54.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

BROWN, RUTH

b. Ruth Weston, 12 (or 30) January 1928; Portsmouth, VA

Singer. The personable Miss Rhythm was the single most important and influential female artist in the development of modern R&B. Brown was originally a moody balladeer who modeled herself on Billie Holiday. But she soon became her own creation, the first true female R&B singer. In that persona she energized the rise of R&B, reshaping the sound of American music in the process, and made herself a multi-generational star, as well as the spokesperson for the seminal soul music survivors of the 1950s.

She ran away from home in 1945 and ultimately married trumpeter Jimmy Brown. She landed a few singing gigs and her bold and brassy stage presence soon caught the eyes and ears of those on the scene. Brown was signed to Atlantic Records in 1949 after Duke Ellington and radio legend Willis Conover acted as talent scouts and called the record company. Neither Atlantic Records nor the music world would ever be the same. Her rendition of "Teardrops from My Eyes" was the first 45-rpm single released by Atlantic and it became the fledgling label's first big hit.

The hits, more than two dozen in the next decade, just kept coming for Brown and their success laid the foundation of Atlantic Records, financing the label's growth and imbuing it with a public identity as the major source of the new R&B sound. Brown toured, including one historic series of one-nighters through the South with Ray Charles in 1954, and served as the role model for a new generation of aspiring R&B vocalists. After Atlantic dropped her from its recording roster in the early 1960s, Brown left the music business, driving a school bus to support her children despite the millions of dollars she had made for her record company. Brown's later campaign to collect her royalties from Atlantic was the catalyst for the formation of the Rhythm & Blues Foundation, an organization that ultimately procured partial payment for her fellow R&B veterans.

Brown returned to the music business in 1976 and then moved on to the theatrical stage in the 1980s, beginning with a role in Allen Toussaint's off-Broadway musical Staggerlee. She won a Tony Award in 1989 for "Black & Blue" and also appeared in the movies Hairspray, Under the Rainbow, and True Identity. In addition, she served as host for National Public Radio's popular Blues Stage program. Along the way she also was awarded a Grammy for Blues on Broadway, inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, and given a Lifetime Achievement Award from the Blues Foundation in 1999. To top it off, her conversational autobiography Miss Rhythm received the Ralph Gleason Award for Music Journalism in 1996.

After a series of albums, including Fine and Mellow and Songs of My Life, for the Fantasy label in the late 1980s and early 1990s, she released R + B = Ruth Brown, a star-studded session featuring Bonnie Raitt,

BROWN, RUTH

Johnny Adams, and Duke Robillard. A Good Day for the Blues followed in 1999.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Brown, Ruth. Miss Rhythm: The Autobiography of Ruth Brown, Rhythm and Blues Legend. New York: Donald I. Fine/Dutton, 1996.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

BROWN, "TEXAS" JOHNNY

b. 22 February 1928; Ackerman, MS

Guitarist and composer. While growing up in Mississippi, Brown assisted his blind guitarist father in playing for change on street corners. After moving to Houston in 1946, he became associated with Amos Milburn and, later, Joe Scott. In 1961 he wrote "Two Steps from the Blues" for Bobby Bland. After thirty years of working day jobs in Houston, he returned to performing full time in 1992.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Damora, Robert. "'Texas' Johnny Brown." Living Blues no. 131 (January/February 1997): 41.

Discography: LSFP

BROWN, WALTER

b. 17 August 1917; Dallas, TX
d. June 1956; Lawton, OK

Singer. Big-voiced Texas blues shouter Brown proved himself capable of holding his own in front of one of the most high-powered big bands ever, serving a five-year stint with the classic edition of the Jay McShann Orchestra featuring saxist Charlie Parker. After joining the McShann band in 1941 Brown was showcased on a series of seminal Kansas City classics, including "Confessin' the Blues" and "Hootie Blues." Brown left the band for a short solo career with mixed results, the high point probably being a recording session reunion with McShann in 1949 on a collection of jump blues tunes.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Burke, Tony, and Dave Penny. "Walter 'Confessin' the Blues' Brown." Blues and Rhythm no. 17 (March 1986): 6–12.

Discography: AMG; DGR (under McShann); LSFP; Lord (under McShann)

BROWN, WILLIE LEE

b. 6 August 1900; Cleveland, MS
d. 30 December 1952; Tunica, MS

In his teens Brown learned to play guitar from Charley Patton on Dockery's. At sixteen, Brown, now adept on guitar, moved north to the Tunica area. There in the 1920s he often performed with Kid Bailey and a young Memphis Minnie.

Brown went to the 1930 Grafton session with Patton and Son House and recorded four sides; the two surviving songs, "M & O Blues" and "Future Blues," based respectively on Patton's "Pony Blues" and "Maggie," show Patton's enduring influence on Brown. He probably plays on Patton's "Dry Well Blues" from the same session.

After Grafton, Brown and House became fast friends, frequently performing together in the 1930s, with Brown usually leaving the vocals to House. But Brown only other recorded once more, accompanying House on three of the 1941 Library of Congress recordings, and one of his own, a version of "Make Me a Pallet on Your Floor." Brown joined House briefly in Rochester, New York, in 1952, but soon returned to Tunica where he died that same year.

Brown taught House key Patton songs, and influenced Robert Johnson, who mentions him in "Crossroad Blues," later covered by Cream. Due to that well-known song, the mythic Willie Brown looms over the real man, the accomplished guitarist and formative influence on the Delta blues.

DANIEL BEAUMONT

Bibliography

Wardlow, Gayle Dean. "Can't Tell My Future: The Mystery of Willie Brown," Blues Unlimited no. 147 (Spring 1986): 6–9; reprinted in Chasin' That Devil Music, pp. 181–190. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

Discography: DGR

BROZMAN, BOB

b. 8 March 1954; New York, NY

Guitarist, singer, ethnomusicologist. Brozman began playing guitar at age six and discovered the National steel guitar at thirteen. He studied music and ethnomusicology at Washington University, specializing in early Delta blues. Heavily influenced by early blues masters like Bukka White, Charley Patton, and Robert Johnson, Brozman developed a unique personal style that remained firmly rooted in blues and jazz, but blossomed outward to encompass myriad world music influences, notably Hawaiian, Caribbean, African, Indian, Asian, Japanese, and South Pacific music. He wrote the definitive book on National steel guitars. A virtuoso performer, Brozman developed many extended techniques in finger-picking, slide, and percussive styles. He is an adjunct professor of ethnomusicology at Macquarie University in Sydney, Australia.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Brozman, Bob. The History and Artistry of National Resonator Instruments. California: Centerstream Publishing, 1993.

Discography

Hello Central, Give Me Dr. Jazz (1985, Rounder 3086); Devil's Slide (1988, Rounder 3112); A Truckload of Blues (1992, Rounder 3119); Blues 'Round the Bend (1995, Sky Ranch); Golden Slide (1997, Sky Ranch); Kosmic Blues & Groove (1998, RDS Music); Live Now (2001, own label); Blue Hula Stomp (Kicking Mule 3905).

BRUNSWICK

Record label of the Brunswick-Balke-Collender Company of Dubuque, Iowa, first issued in 1920. About November 1924 the Vocalion label was acquired from the Aeolian Company. The two labels operated independently, but masters recorded for one were sometimes released on the other, for which purpose transfer numbers were allocated in the ordinary matrix series of the other label, creating confusions that scholars have had difficulty resolving. Brunswick issued vaudeville blues by such artists as Rosa Henderson, Viola McCoy, Lizzie Miles, and Lena Wilson in 1923–1924, but launched a dedicated Race series (the Brunswick 7000s) only in March 1927. Initially directed by Jack Kapp, the series expanded at the end of the decade under the direction of J. Mayo Williams, when significant field recording was undertaken, notably in Knoxville, Memphis, and Dallas in 1929–1930. The 234 issues included performances by Mozelle Alderson, Lucille Bogan, Gene Campbell, and Charlie McCoy.

Warner Brothers bought Brunswick in April 1930 but sold it again in December 1931 to Consolidated Film Industries, which already owned the American Record Corporation (ARC). Though formally separate, Brunswick and ARC functioned as a single operation. The 7000 series was discontinued in July 1932 and blues issues were thereafter concentrated on Vocalion and the ARC labels. CBS bought the group in February 1938 and discontinued the Brunswick label altogether in 1940, prior to selling the trademark to Decca, which had already acquired in 1942 the rights to Brunswick's pre-1932 catalog.

The Brunswick label was used by Decca from 1944 for its 80000 series of reissues, mainly of early jazz, but a Furry Lewis recording was included and many titles by boogie-woogie pianists. LPs based on this series bore Decca labels in the United States, but the Brunswick label was extensively used in Europe for reissues. These had earlier included a Sleepy John Estes coupling on British Brunswick, which was one of the earliest country blues issues directed at the collector market. German Brunswick had issued records by Virginia Liston and Luella Miller as early as 1927.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR; Sutton

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted with an afterword in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Dutton, Frank. "Numbers Runners Blues." Storyville 79 (1978), 8; "Numbers Runners Blues 2." Storyville 106 (1983), 125.

Edwards, David, Mike Callahan, and Patrice Eyries. "Brunswick Records Album Discography." <http://www.bsnpubs.com/brunswick.html> (accessed December 6, 2004).

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

BRUYNOGHE, YANNICK

b. 1924; Leuven, Belgium

d. 30 March 1984; Uccle, Brussels, Belgium

Yannick Bruynoghe devoted much of his life to examining and supporting blues and jazz music and musicians. After studying law, he worked with Radio Television Belge (RTB), the Belgian broadcasting system, in 1954. Two years later, he headed the "Midnight Movie Club" in Brussels. An extremely learned man, he was quite knowledgeable about surrealism in paintings, film, literature, and music.

BRUYNOGHE, YANNICK

He befriended many jazz and blues musicians, often entertaining them in his home. Bruynoghe is probably best known for compiling Big Bill Broonzy's words into the book Big Bill Blues, though this relationship also produced a short art film and sound recording. His photographs of 1950s Chicago musicians have been often reproduced, and those of Elmore James have attained iconic status among blues fans. Bruynoghe also directed movies on Roosevelt Sykes, Coleman Hawkins, and more.

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

- Broonzy, William. Big Bill Blues: William Broonzy's Story as Told to Yannick Bruynoghe. London: Cassell, 1995.
- Sacré, Robert. "Yannick Bruynoghe." Living Blues nos. 60/61 (Summer/Fall 1984): 71–72.

BRYANT, BEULAH

- b. Blooma Walton, 20 February 1918; Dayton, AL
- d. 31 January 1988; New York City (Roosevelt Island), NY

As a child in Birmingham, Bryant began singing in church groups. Then, as a teenager in California, she won a 1937 talent contest on KFRC San Francisco radio. In her professional career she sang in the Ella Fitzgerald style, which gave versatility to her blues and jazz singing. She worked often in radio, films, and television through the 1970s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
- "Obituary." New York Times (February 6, 1988).

Discography: LSFP

BRYANT, PRECIOUS

- b. 4 January 1942; Talbot County, GA

A lifelong resident of Georgia, Precious Bryant began teaching herself to play songs on her uncle's guitar at age nine. Her first public performances were in church, where she accompanied her sisters in their gospel singing group. Bryant developed an early interest in the blues and was influenced by the recordings of Muddy Waters, Elmore James, and Jimmy Reed, as well as the complex finger-picking style of area musicians. In the late 1960s, she was recorded by blues researcher George Mitchell. Bryant's 2002 full-length album debut Fool Me Good featured her superb vocals and intricate guitar playing on both strong originals and blues and gospel standards.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- Nelson, David. "Music Maker: It's the Spirit Behind the Gift." Living Blues no. 137 (January/February 1998): 21.

Discography: LSFP

- Fool Me Good* (2002, Terminus Records CD 0201-2).

BRYANT, RUSTY

- b. Royal G. Bryant, 25 November 1929; Huntington, WV
- d. 25 March 1991; Columbus, OH

Tenor and alto saxophonist. Funky, soul-jazz style. One of the first bar-walking saxophonists. Played with Tiny Grimes and Stomp Gordon before striking out on his own in 1951. Toured with organist Hank Marr during the 1960s. Recorded eight albums for Prestige from 1969 to 1974. Bryant's two biggest hits were 1956's "All Night Long" (based on the classic tune "Night Train") and 1970s soul-jazz classic "Soul Liberation."

DENNIS TAYLOR

Bibliography

- Burke, Tony. "Rusty Bryant." Blues and Rhythm no. 62 (July 1991): 17.

BUCHANAN, ROY

- b. 23 September 1939; Ozark, TN
- d. 14 August 1988; Fairfax, VA

Guitarist. Hugely influential in blues-rock guitar. Raised in California from age two, Buchanan's father was a farm laborer, not a preacher as Buchanan later claimed. He learned on lap steel guitar, then moved to electric. Buchanan toured with Dale Hawkins and Ronnie Hawkins as a teenager, but spent much of the 1960s playing bars or with obscure bands, and session work.

Buchanan established a formidable reputation among guitar players, and was said to have declined a place in the Rolling Stones, an unsubstantiated claim. He favored a battered 1953 Fender Telecaster and developed an expressive signature sound on the instrument, with innovative use of harmonics.

Buchanan formed his band the Snakestretchers in 1970 and released a self-made live record that was sold in burlap bag at gigs and is now a sought-after artefact. He was brought to wider attention by favorable press and a U.S. television documentary, The Best Unknown Guitarist in the World, in 1971. He recorded a number of albums for Polydor (Second Album included “Tribute to Elmore James”) and then Atlantic in 1972–1981. These albums featured a wide range of styles, including blues, gospel, country, and rock ‘n’ roll.

Buchanan never broke out of cult “musician’s musician” status with a wider public, and his career faltered in early 1980s. Alligator Records brought him back to the studio in 1985 for a slick blues outing on When a Guitar Plays the Blues. Further Alligator releases followed, confirming his standing as an instrumentalist, but the breakthrough continued to elude him. His life came to a tragic conclusion when he was arrested for drunkenness in Fairfax, Virginia and allegedly hanged himself in the holding cell of local jail.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Carson, Phil. Roy Buchanan: American Axe. London: Backbeat, 2001.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Roy Buchanan (1972, Polydor 5033); Second Album (1973, Polydor 5046); In the Beginning (1974, Polydor 6035); That’s What I’m Here For (1974, Polydor 6020); Live Stock (1975, Polydor 6048); A Street Called Straight (1976, Atlantic 18170); Loading Zone (1977, Atlantic 19138); You’re Not Alone (1978, Atlantic 19170); When a Guitar Plays the Blues (1985, Alligator 4741); Dancing On the Edge (1986, Alligator 4747); Hot Wires (1987, Alligator 4756).

BUCKNER, WILLIE (WILLA) MAE

b. 15 June 1922; Augusta, GA

d. 8 January 2000; Winston Salem, NC

Buckner began her career in minstrel shows at the age of fourteen. A singer of risqué and blues songs, she also played guitar, piano, and upright bass. Buckner joined the Music Maker Relief Foundation roster in 1992.

GAILE WELKER

Bibliography

Welker, Gaile. “Willie Mae Buckner” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 150 (April/May 2000): 116–117.

Discography

A Living Past (Music Maker MMCD 9401).

Blues Came to Georgia (Music Maker MMCD 23).

Expressin’ The Blues (Cello/Music Maker MMKCD 701).

BUCKWHEAT ZYDECO

b. Stanley Dural, 14 November 1947; Lafayette, LA

Accordion, vocals, organ, piano. A veteran of the Louisiana zydeco music scene, Stanley Dural, better known as Buckwheat Zydeco (a nickname given to him in childhood), is a top-notch zydeco musician. His work in zydeco popularized what the seminal performers, such as Clifton Chenier and Boozoo Chavis, created: a “creole” (combination) of blues and Cajun-oriented folk music.

Dural, however, did not start out playing zydeco. His interest and work in R&B brought him into contact with a different group of entertainers such as Lynn August and Clarence “Gatemouth” Brown during the mid- to late 1960s. In 1971, Dural formed his own band, a large, sixteen-piece funk band, which he led until 1976 when zydeco took center stage in his musical career. Dural’s father was friends with Chenier, who recruited Dural as an organist for his band. During this time Dural learned the accordion under the tutelage of Chenier and then started his own band in 1979—the Ils Sont Partis Band (meaning “they’re off!” in Louisiana racetrack terminology).

Dural also began to call himself “Buckwheat Zydeco” around this time. Dural’s group, also usually referred to as “Buckwheat Zydeco,” was signed to Blues Unlimited in 1979 and released One for the Road, followed up by Take It Easy, Baby in 1980. Shortly after their 1983 record 100% Fortified Zydeco, the group signed on with Rounder Records. Their first two efforts in the studio for Rounder, Turning Point (1983) and Waitin’ for My Ya Ya (1985), were both nominated for Grammys and feature songs such as “Turning Point,” “Someone Else Is Steppin’ In,” and “Your Man Is Home Tonight.” Then, in 1986, the group was offered a major label contract at Island Records; their debut record on this label, On a Night Like This, was also nominated for a Grammy in 1987 and is full of songs that are representative of the group’s zydeco fast and slow-tempo songs. Later that year the group appeared in the popular movie The Big Easy, increasing their visibility among the general populace outside of Louisiana and Texas.

BUCKWHEAT ZYDECO

The band recorded two more CD's for Island—Taking It Home in 1988 and Where There's Smoke There's Fire in 1990—before moving to four other major labels: Charisma, Warner, Polygram, and Atlantic. These efforts produced songs that demonstrate the band's mix of zydeco boogie and slow Cajun waltzes and, in the case of the Warner CD, Choo-Choo Boogaloo, a children's album—Cajun/zydeco renditions of traditional children's songs. Although the group's commercial success has waned in recent years, their live performances are still in high demand. The band released a CD of live material in 2001, Down Home Live.

JUSTIN WERT

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli
Wentz, Brooke. "Buckwheat Zydeco: Reclaiming His Roots." Down Beat 57, no. 8 (August 1990), 29.

Discography

100 % Fortified Zydeco (1983, Black Top CD BT-1024).
Turning Point (1983, Rounder CD 2045).
Waitin' for My Ya Ya (1985, Rounder CD 2051).
Five Card Stud (1994, Polygram 524018).
On a Night Like This (Island 422-842739-2).

BUFORD, GEORGE "MOJO"

b. 10 November 1929; Hernando, MS

Harmonica player associated with Muddy Waters. His father introduced him to the basics of harmonica playing; the boy took to the instrument, spending his youth in Memphis picking up harmonica tips as he went. He formed his first combo, the Savage Boys, upon moving to Chicago in 1952, playing the area clubs and earning a reputation as a standout act in a competitive music scene. At the height of their popularity, the Savage Boys settled into a series of gigs as a stand-in for Muddy Waters when the latter was on the road, becoming known as the Muddy Waters Jr. Band.

Occasional gigs with Waters himself led to Buford's entry into the former's band as James Cotton's replacement in 1959. The coveted position was not enough to curb Buford's restlessness, however. He moved to Minneapolis in 1962 where he formed the Chi-Fours. The group played the clubs and cut two obscure LPs for Vernon and Folk Art labels before Buford returned to Waters in 1967. By the 1970s Buford remained a semipermanent fixture in the Waters's band, dividing his time between that and his own recording and performing opportunities. He went full time with Waters again in 1971 after Jerry Portnoy's departure, staying this time until 1974. He continues to work as a bandleader, recording for Red Rooster and JSP labels.

JOHN OTIS

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl), Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Wisner, Steve. "Chicago Blues: Yesterday and Today: Mojo Buford." Living Blues no. 42 (January/February 1979): 22–26.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

BULL CITY RED

b. George Washington, date unknown; flourished 1935–1939, Durham, NC
d. Unknown

Singer and washboard player. Bull City Red was red-complected from being a partial albino and he lived in Durham, North Carolina, which was known as "Bull City" for producing its Blackwell's Genuine Durham Smoking Tobacco, hence the name. He was associated with Blind Boy Fuller, and with Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry. His recordings are of sacred material and of Fuller-style blues.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder)
Oliver, Paul. "Bull City Red." Blues Unlimited no. 1 (April 1963): 5–7.

Discography: DGR

BULLET

Record label (Tennessee, 1946–1953). Owners: James Albert Bulleit (b. November 4, 1908, Corydon, IN; d. December 12, 1988, Nashville, TN); Conrad V. (C. V.) Hitchcock (b. February 9, 1897; d. May 1976, Brentwood, TN); Wally Fowler (b. John Wallace Fowler, February 15, 1917, Adairsville, GA; d. June 3, 1994, TN); Overton Ganong (b. April 24, 1909, Leland, MS; d. February 8, 2001, Columbia, SC); Wilbur Clarence "Red" Wortham (b. September 6, 1902, Stewart County, TN; d. December 31, 2002, Nashville, TN). Nashville, Tennessee-based, this important label (and its short-lived subsidiary label DELTA, 1949) recorded many artists (some for the first time), including Max Bailey, Big Three Trio (“Signifying Monkey” with Willie Dixon and Leonard Caston), Lucius “Dusty” Brooks, Red Calhoun, Walter Davis (“You’ve Gotta Reap What You Sow”), Shy Guy Douglas, (Miss) Jo Evans, Fairfield Four Ernie Fields, Cecil Gant (“Nashville Jump” and “This Train”), Richard “Tuff” Green, Ruby Green(e) (“Buzzard Pie”), Wynonie Harris (“Dig This Boogie” with pianist Sun Ra), Smokey Hogg, B. B. King (“Miss Martha King” and “Got the Blues”), Little Eddie Lang (Eddie Langlois), Red Miller (“Bewildered”), Don Q. Pullen, Roosevelt Sykes, St. Louis Jimmy (Oden), Rufus Thomas (as Mr. Swing with the Bobby Platers’s Orchestra), Doc Wiley, Big Joe Williams (“Jivin’ Woman”), and Sherman Williams. In February 1949, Jim Bulleit sold his interest to C. V. Hitchcock, and he was replaced by Overton Ganong. The label was reactivated in the 1960s by “Red” Wortham issuing sides by Shy Guy Douglas.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

McGrath

Hawkins, Martin. CD box set notes, “In the Beginning. . . There Was Bullet Records” in A Shot in the Dark: Nashville Jumps—Blues and Rhythm on Nashville’s Independent Labels 1945–1955 (2000, Bear Family BCD 15864). Rotante, Anthony, and Paul B. Sheatsley. “Bullet.” Blues Research no. 11 (1964).

BUMBLE BEE SLIM

(See Easton, Amos)

BUNN, TEDDY

b. Theodore Leroy Bunn, 7 May 1909; Rockville Center, NY
d. 20 July 1978; Lancaster, CA

Early jazz guitarist who led his own groups and also freelanced in blues. Birthplace listed as Rockville Center on his social security application; listed elsewhere as Freeport, New York. Recorded with Lizzie Miles, Fat Hayden and Walter Pichon, and Trixie Smith. Bunn was also a member of the influential vocal group Spirits of Rhythm. Later played in rhythm and blues groups with Louis Jordan and Jack McVea.

TOM MORGAN

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz (Johnny Simmen, Howard Rye, Barry Kernfeld)

Discography: DGR; Lord

BURKS, EDDIE

b. 17 September 1931; Rising Sun Plantation, MS
d. 27 January 2005

A harmonica player and singer of great emotional intensity. During Burks’s childhood in the Mississippi Delta, he worked in cotton fields, and he saw his brother murdered by the Ku Klux Klan. He found solace in the harmonica, and he was inspired and influenced by the playing of Aleck Miller “Sonny Boy Williamson II.” Burke had been playing the instrument since age three, receiving a new one every Christmas. Although his mother, a devout Baptist, forbade the playing of that “devil music” in their home, his guitarist stepfather encouraged his interest. Burke left for Chicago at age fifteen as part of the Great Migration, finding work in the steel mills. He began singing gospel with a local church choir, an experience that he later attributed for his powerful baritone singing.

His recording output before 1992 consisted of a handful of singles. He occasionally performed in clubs, but more often he would be heard onweekends on Maxwell Street. For some while he was known by the street’s nickname “Jewtown,” but he later dropped it after some hassles with music publishers and recording labels. In 1992 he and his second wife launched Rising Sun Records, featuring himself and a small roster of regional blues artists.

JOHN OTIS

Bibliography

Larkin

Arentson, Robert M. “Eddie Burks: ‘Sure, I Have a Dream.’” Living Blues no. 117 (September/October 1994): 38–43.

Discography: Larkin

BURLEY, DAN

b. 7 November 1906; Lexington, KY
d. 29 October 1962; Chicago, IL

BURLEY, DAN

Vocalist and pianist whose music combined elements of 1940s Chicago and Harlem blues and jazz. He was also notable as a lexicographer of black slang and “jive.”

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Dan Burley's Original Handbook of Harlem Jive.
New York, 1944.

Discography: Lord

Dan Burley. South Side Shake (Wolf WBJ 008; notes).

BURNETT, CHESTER

(See Howlin' Wolf)

BURNS, EDDIE

b. 8 February 1928; Belzoni, MS

Guitarist and harmonica player who flourished in the Detroit postwar blues scene; also known as Little Eddie “Guitar” Burns. Burns was initially influenced by recordings of John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson and Tommy McClennan. He played harmonica as a sideman to Aleck Miller (Sonny Boy Williamson II) and Pinetop Perkins from 1943 through 1947 in Clarksdale, Mississippi. Moving to Detroit in 1948, he was taken under the wing of John Lee Hooker, with whom he recorded in 1949 through 1952 for the Sensation label and for Chess Records in 1965. A series of singles under his own name on various labels throughout the 1950s and steady club work in and around Detroit sustained but a part-time musical career, supplemented by day work as a mechanic. The 1970s brought wider recognition with appearances at the Detroit and Ann Arbor blues festivals and on tours in Europe. Solo releases in 1993 and 2002 update a recorded output that, while slim, is well regarded.

JOSEPH A. LAROSE

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Obrecht, Jas. “Eddie ‘Guitar’ Burns: Inside Detroit Blues.” Living Blues no. 156 (March/April 2001): 28–39.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Detroit

BURNS, JIMMY

b. 27 February 1943; Dublin, MS

Chicago-based guitarist and vocalist. Recorded several singles in the late 1960s and early 1970s before reducing musical activity to raise his family. Burns returned to music full time in the early 1990s, and released his debut album, Leaving Here Walking, in 1996.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)
Sharp, Steven. “Jimmy Burns: I’m Back in Music to Stay.” Living Blues no. 156 (March/April 2001): 40–45.

Discography: AMG

BURNSIDE, R. L.

b. 23 November 1926; Harmontown, Lafayette County, MS

From beginnings as a popular local performer in the north Mississippi house party milieu, guitarist and vocalist Burnside became known internationally as both a traditional blues stylist on the festival circuit and for cutting-edge recordings that fused his music with punk rock, rap, and electronic effects. Burnside was influenced as a youngster by guitarists Fred McDowell and Ranie Burnette; he mastered their modal, hypnotic style of blues while also incorporating popular blues songs from Muddy Waters and Lightnin’ Hopkins into his repertoire.

After a brief sojourn in Chicago in the late 1940s, he settled in Mississippi permanently, working mostly as a sharecropper and performing at weekend parties and juke joints. Burnside was first recorded in the late 1960s by George Mitchell for the Arhoolie label and began touring occasionally; he subsequently recorded three albums for the Dutch label Swingmaster. In the late 1970s he began performing regularly in local venues with a family band, the Sound Machine, collaborating with his musically talented sons and incorporating elements of funk and R&B into his sound. He recorded with the Sound Machine for Swingmaster and High Water, and continued to feature his sons and grandchildren on later albums. Burnside became more widely known and began touring extensively through his association with Fat Possum Records, for which he has recorded a series of albums since 1993. He has appeared in five films, including the blues documentaries The Land Where the Blues Began and Deep Blues and the feature film Big Bad Love.

DAVID NELSON

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Pettengell, Michael. "R.L. Burnside: 'Well Well Well!'"
Living Blues no. 117 (September/October 1994): 10–23.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

BURNSIDE RECORDS

Label active in Portland, Oregon, recording blues artists active in the Pacific Northwest. Artists include Back Porch Blues, Big Dave and the Ultrasonics, Kelly Joe Phelps, and Duffy Bishop. Subsidiary is Sideburn Records, specializing in "roots and rock" music.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Burnside Records website with catalog, <http://www.burnsiderecords.com/index.html> (accessed September 27, 2004).

BURRAGE, HAROLD

b. 30 March 1931; Chicago, IL
d. 26 November 1966; Chicago, IL

A Chicago R&B singer who helped make Chicago a center for hard soul during the 1960s. Burrage began his recording career in the late 1940s as a standup blues singer on the city's West Side. In 1950 he recorded a session with the Horace Henderson band for Decca, which yielded a moderately successful record, "Hi Yo Silver." Less successful sessions followed with the Los Angeles-based Aladdin (1951) and Chicago-based States labels (1954). In 1956 Burrage joined Cobra, for which he recorded rock 'n' roll with a blues feel, notably "Betty Jean" in the Little Richard vein. Burrage moved to Vee-Jay in 1959, and got a solid local hit with the soulful "Crying for You Baby."

In 1962, he joined the fledgling One-derful operation, recording for their M-Pac imprint. With his experience in the music business, label owner George Leaner gave Burrage staff duties as well as a recording contract. In his position he helped mentor the careers of fellow One-derful artist Otis Clay and Four Brothers recording artist Tyrone Davis. Burrage's first recordings for the firm made little impression, but with the driving "Got to Find a Way" in 1965 Burrage experienced his first national hit, going to number ten on the Cashbox R&B chart. One-derful failed to sustain Burrage's success, by recording weak sound-alikes. The artist had no other opportunities, dying the following year in Tyrone Davis's backyard.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. "Harold Burrage: Pioneer of Chicago Soul." Juke Blues no. 8 (Spring 1987): 22–25.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

BURRIS, J. C.

b. 15 February 1928; Kings Mountain, NC
d. 15 May 1988; San Francisco, CA

A nephew of Sonny Terry, harmonica and bones player Burris helped keep African American folk traditions alive by doing the "hand jive" (body slapping) and "Mister Jack" (dancing dolls). He accompanied his uncle in sessions for Folkways and Bluesville, and cut a solo album for Arhoolie.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Mazzolini, Tom, and Chris Strachwitz. Notes accompanying J. C. Burris: Blues Professor (2001, Arhoolie CD 497).

See also Fuller, Blind Boy; Terry, Sonny

BURROW, CASSELL

b. 8 March 1914; Galloway, TN
d. 2 May 1980; Chicago, IL

Drummer. Around 1953, Burrow arrived to Chicago as a vocalist and emcee. Sometime around 1954, he received his first set of drums from Snooky Pryor. He then assisted the rhythm sections of Eddie Taylor, Eddie Boyd, Howlin' Wolf, Homesick James, and Elmore James live and on records. His own solo session in 1962 for the LaSalle label is unissued.

EDWARD KOMARA

BURROW, CASSELL

Bibliography

O'Neal, Jim. "Obituaries: Cassell Burrow," Living Blues no. 47 (Summer 1980): 33.

Discography: LSFP

BURSE, CHARLIE

b. 25 August 1901; Decatur, AL
d. 20 December 1965; Memphis, TN

Singer and ukulele player long associated with Will Shade of the Memphis Jug Band. Among his various recordings is a 1939 Vocalion session in Memphis when he recorded "Oil It Up and Go," a significant rendition of the "Bottle It Up and Go" song group.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris, Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR; LSFP

BURTON, ARON

b. 15 June 1938; Thyatira, MS

Chicago bassist, songwriter, and vocalist, Burton was sent from the Mississippi hills to Chicago in 1955 by his mother, fearful that more black youths would be slain in Mississippi following the murder of Emmett Till that year. In Chicago, he sang on the West Side around 1957–1958 with Freddy King, who bought Burton his first bass. After serving in a U.S. Army band in Germany, Burton returned to Chicago and began to find steady work playing rock 'n' roll, R&B, and jazz before finding a niche in the blues as a member of Junior Wells' band. In the 1960s and 1970s he also performed or recorded with Billy Wade in the Third Degree Band, Baby Huey & the Babysitters, Wild Child Butler, Fenton Robinson, Carey Bell, Fontella Bass, Jackie Ross, Sugar Pie DeSanto, and Willie Mabon, before Albert Collins hired him to play in his Chicago-based touring and recording group, the Icebreakers, during Collins's early years with Alligator Records.

Keeping a day job as a landscaper with the Chicago Park District, Burton continued to record with James Cotton, Valerie Wellington, Johnny Littlejohn, Fenton Robinson, and others, and cut his first single for Eddy Clearwater's Cleartone label in 1980. His debut LP, on his own Avaron label, was recorded in Europe in 1986. Burton began staying in Europe for extended periods, doing gigs on his own as well as with Jack Dupree, Louisiana Red, and others. On sojourns back to Chicago, he has worked the clubs and recorded with Big Jack Johnson, Honeyboy Edwards, and others. His Avaron sides were incorporated into his first CD for Earwig Music. A live album followed on Earwig, and in 1999 Burton did a third CD for Delmark Records in Chicago. Burton enjoyed a long association through the years with drummer Robert Plunkett, and often teamed up with younger brother Larry Burton for many jobs on their own or behind other artists. In recent years he has lived and performed primarily in Europe.

JIM O'NEAL

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)
Brisbin, John Anthony. "Aron Burton: Gettin' the Message Out There." Living Blues no. 123 (September/October 1995): 22–35.

Discography: AMG

BUTLER, GEORGE "WILD CHILD"

b. 1 October 1936; Autaugaville, AL
d. 1 March 2005; Windsor, Ontario, Canada

Although his gutbucket style is sometimes likened to swamp blues, George Butler grew up in the cotton plantation country of central Alabama, not the bayous of Louisiana. He acquired his nickname as an unruly toddler at home, where he took up guitar and harmonica as a youngster. Inspired by Sonny Boy Williamson II, Butler began performing locally around Montgomery and then took to the road. Butler cut his first record for Sharp Records, an obscure local label from Montgomery, in 1964. Sharp dealt Butler's contract to Jewel Records, and after landing in Chicago, Butler began recording under the aegis of Willie Dixon, with more 45s resulting on the Jewel label. A rambler during the 1960s, Butler hooked up with Lightnin' Hopkins in Houston and would later return to play on some of Hopkins' recordings and make an appearance in the film The Blues Accordin' to Lightnin' Hopkins. At other points he teamed with Roosevelt Sykes or Cousin Joe in New Orleans and played with Yank Rachell's Indianapolis-based band.

In Chicago, Butler did police work and was never a regular on the city's blues club circuit, but continued to record, cutting albums for Mercury in 1969 and a self-produced session for Roots in 1976. Tapes from the Roots album were later reworked for a new release on Rooster Blues and, subsequently, on M.C. Records. Milwaukee was a frequent performing base during Butler's later Chicago years. He did most of his playing as a touring artist, with his own band or in a package with other Chicago artists such as Jimmy Rogers and Sam Lay, although in later years he performed more extensively around Ontario, Canada, which was his home since the 1980s. Veteran producer Mike Vernon of the British Blue Horizon label recorded two albums by Butler in England that were issued in the United States by Bullseye Blues in the 1990s, and in 2000 Butler cut a CD for the APO label in Salina, Kansas. Insistent on originality in his own idiosyncratic style, Butler maintained a heartfelt, hard blues edge in his music throughout his career.

JIM O'NEAL

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Hobus, Hobus. "Wild Child Butler." Blues Unlimited no. 131/132 (September/December 1978): 27–30.
Kunstadt, Len. "George 'Wild Child' Butler." Record Research no. 87 (December 1967): 4.
O'Neal, Jim. Liner notes for Lickin' Gravy (1989, Rooster Blues R7611).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

BUTLER, HENRY

b. 21 September 1948; New Orleans, LA

New Orleans-based singer, composer, and pianist. Birth year sometimes cited as 1949. Blind since birth, Butler studied piano with Alvin Batiste, Harold Mabern, and Professor Longhair, among others, and received a master's degree in voice. His piano and vocal style is heavily blues influenced, but also owes much to the varied musical traditions of his home town.

RICK ANDERSON

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); New Grove Jazz; Santelli

Discography: AMG

BUTLER, JERRY

b. 8 December 1939; Sunflower, MS

Chicago-based soul balladeer of the 1960s and 1970s. Butler launched his career as lead singer of the Impressions, whose gospelized hit, "For Your Precious Love" (1958, Abner), is considered by many observers to be Chicago's first soul-style record. In 1959 Butler began a solo career, and while at Vee-Jay, he hit with a spate of Curtis Mayfield ballads, notably "He Will Break Your Heart" (1960), "Find Another Girl" (1961), and "Need to Belong" (1963), and also scoring with such hits as "Make It Easy on Yourself" (1962) and "Giving Up on Love" (1964). Duetting with Betty Everett, he also had a hit with "Let It Be Me" (1964). Among his many LPs was Folk Songs (1963), which featured Butler on some folk blues.

In 1966 Butler joined Mercury, where he experienced major pop success, recording in Philadelphia under the production aegis of Kenny Gamble and Leon Huff. Notable hits with this team included "Never Give You Up" (1968), "Only the Strong Survive" (1969), and "Moody Woman" (1969). After leaving Mercury in 1974, he recorded with diminished success for Motown, Philadelphia International, Fountain, Ichiban, and Valley Vue.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Butler, Jerry, with Earl Smith. Only the Strong Survive: Memoirs of a Soul Survivor. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 2000.
Pruter, Robert. "Only the Strong Survive: The Jerry Butler Story." Goldmine (March 1, 1996): 40ff.

BUTLER TWINS

Clarence Butler (Harmonica, Vocals)

b. 21 January 1942; Florence, AL
d. 22 December 2003; Detroit, MI

Curtis Butler (Guitar)

b. 21 January 1942; Florence, AL

The Butler Twins learned the blues from their father and were touring the South by their teens. They came to Detroit for factory work and returned to music with their raw blues sound in the 1970s.

JOHN SINCLAIR/EDWARD KOMARA

BUTLER TWINS

Bibliography

“Clarence Butler” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 174 (September/October 2004): 94.

Discography: AMG

BUTTERBEANS AND SUSIE

Joe “Jody” Edwards (Butterbeans)

b. 19 July 1895; GA
d. 28 October 1967; Dolton IL

Susan Hawthorn (Susie)

b. 1896; Pensacola, FL
d. 5 December 1963; Chicago, IL

Susie Hawthorn began her career when she joined a circus in her midteens. She married Jody in Philadelphia when she was nineteen; they teamed in 1917 and traveled with Ma Rainey’s Rabbit Foot Minstrels before graduating to the TOBA circuit and becoming a popular vaudeville duo in the 1920s, specialized in satirical male–female relationships, domestic disharmony and infidelity, love, sex, and money—or lack thereof.

They toured the south and the north extensively with boogie-woogie pianist Clarence “Pinetop” Smith, sharing the bill with Ma Rainey, Bessie Smith, the Memphis Jug Band, and others. Starting in 1924, they made a lot of recordings for OKeh Records with Clarence Williams, King Oliver, Louis Armstrong’s Hot Five, and Eddie Heywood and continued to do so until the late 1920s. They had developed an act, the Butterbeans & Susie Revue, that appealed to large audiences, both rural and urban. Vocally each possessed a rather narrow range but because they were comics and comedians rather than singers, such limitations allowed them to perfect a conversational style, delivered with the rhythmic punctuations of a jazz performer and it worked perfectly.

In the 1930s, despite the stagnation and decline of the recording industry and the loss of popularity of the classic blues singers, they went on working in a small vaudeville circuit until the early 1940s, in association with the black theaters circuit and, in the early 1950s, with Harlem’s Apollo Theatre. The couple recorded again in 1960 for the Festival label but had to retire around 1965 because of Joe’s poor health.

ROBERT SACRÉ

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder); Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern

Discography: AMG; DGR; Lord; LSFP

Elevator Papa, Switchboard Mama (1991, JSP Records CD329, United Kingdom; reissue).

BUTTERFIELD, PAUL

b. 17 December 1942; Chicago, IL
d. 4 May 1987; Los Angeles, CA

Harmonica player, singer. Studied classical flute as a child, then turned to blues and harmonica; became a virtuoso on that instrument. Butterfield jammed in South Side clubs with Muddy Waters, Howlin’ Wolf, Otis Rush, and his main influence, Little Walter. He formed the racially integrated Paul Butterfield Blues Band in 1963 with Elvin Bishop (guitar), Jerome Arnold (bass, brother of Billy Boy Arnold), Sammy Lay (drums, replaced by Billy Davenport, 1965). He added Mike Bloomfield (guitar) and Mark Naftalin (organ) for the group’s groundbreaking eponymous debut album, which included Nick Gravenites’ “Born in Chicago” (earlier version of album later released as Lost Sessions).

Butterfield combined blues virtuosity with rock amplification levels. He backed Bob Dylan in his first electric outing at the Newport Folk Festival in 1965. The classic East–West (1966) included a masterly slow blues, “I Got a Mind to Give Up Living,” and a long, Indian-influenced title track. The group enjoyed immense popularity with rock audiences and exerted massive influence on both rock and blues artists in the mid-1960s. They did a great deal to push their influences into the spotlight, including B. B. King and Muddy Waters. Bloomfield departed to form the rock band Electric Flag, and Butterfield recruited a horn section for the next album.

The band performed at the Woodstock festival in 1969, but was no longer a major force. Butterfield broke up the band in 1972, but continued to perform and record with his own band, Better Days, and with members of The Band (including an appearance in The Last Waltz film). He sidelined the harmonica in favor of keyboards. He struggled with alcohol and drug dependency, and died from a drug-induced heart attack.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

“Building a New Tradition.” Blues Access 27 (Fall 1996): 28–36, 38–40.

- Ellis III, Tom. "The Real World of Paul Butterfield." Blues Access 23 (Fall 1995): 10–16, 18–19.
- "The Final Years." Blues Access 31 (Fall 1997): 12–15, 17–22.
- "The Glory Years: The Maturation of an Idea." Blues Access 25 (Spring 1996): 22–35.
- "The Woodstock Years." Blues Access 29 (Spring 1997): 20–22, 24, 27–36.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Paul Butterfield Blues Band (1965, Elektra 7294); East–West (1966, Elektra 7315); In My Own Dream (1968, Elektra 74025); The Resurrection of Pigboy Crabshaw (1968, Elektra 74015); Keep on Moving (1969, 74053); Sometimes I Feel Like Smilin' (1971, Elektra 75013); Better Days (1972, Bearsville 2119); It All Comes Back (1973, Bearsville 2170); Put It In Your Ear (1974, Bearsville 6960); North–South (1981, Bearsville 6995); East–West Live 1966–67 (1996, Winner 447).

BYRD, JOHN

b. ca. 1896; possibly Huntington, WV
d. Unknown

Long supposed a Mississippian, singer and twelve-string guitarist John Byrd probably came from eastern Kentucky or western West Virginia. In Huntington, he met the singer Mae Glover, whom he accompanied at a 1929 Gennett session where he also recorded sermons as "Reverend George Jones." In 1930 he partnered with the Kentuckian singer and washboard-player Walter Taylor on disc in buoyant blues and hokum songs, and then, recording solo and (for once) in his own name, coupled the comic "Billy Goat Blues" with "Old Timbrook Blues," a unique composition about the horse race more famous from the bluegrass song "Molly and Tenbrooks."

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder)
Wardlow, Gayle Dean. "Six Who Made Recorded History (1926–1935)." 78 Quarterly no. 5 (Autumn 1990): 93–96.

Discography: DGR

BYRD, HENRY ROELAND

(See Professor Longhair)

C

CADET

(Chess/Aristocrat/Checker/Argo/Cadet)

CADILLAC BABY

b. Narvel Eatmon, 8 October 1912; Cayuga, MS
d. 18 March 1991; Chicago, IL

Born Narvel Eatmon near Vicksburg, Mississippi, the flamboyant nightclub and record label owner, radio broadcaster, and entrepreneur who came to be known as Cadillac Baby was first exposed to the blues as a boy hearing local performances by the Mississippi Sheiks. Eatmon moved to Chicago as a young man and in the mid-1930s he started the first of many small storefront business ventures on the city's South Side. He owned and operated a number of successful South Side blues clubs from the 1940s through the 1960s, including Cadillac Baby's Club and Cadillac Baby's Show Lounge, which featured many popular artists of the time such as Little Mack Simmons, Detroit Jr., Eddie Boyd, Sunnyland Slim, Earl Hooker, and Hound Dog Taylor.

In 1959, Eatmon started his own record label, Bea & Baby, to record many of the musicians who were appearing at his club. Bea & Baby, along with Eatmon's other imprints (Key, Key Hole, Miss, and Ronald), issued dozens of Chicago blues sides throughout the 1960s, including the recording debuts of Taylor and Detroit Jr. Bea & Baby's best-selling release came in 1960 with Bobby Saxton's "Trying to Make a Living," which was cowritten by Eatmon and was subsequently leased to Chess Records.

Bea & Baby dissolved in the early 1970s and Eatmon coproduced his last recordings in 1974 on a session with Sunnyland Slim, Byther Smith, and Bonnie Lee. Largely retired from music, Narvel "Cadillac Baby" Eatmon quietly spent the remainder of his life operating a couple of small shops on Chicago's South Side.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- O'Neal, Jim. "You Must Be the Man from God. You Are Cadillac Baby!" Living Blues no. 6 (Autumn 1971): 23–29.
———. "Narvel Eatmon (Cadillac Baby)" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 101 (January/February 1992): 32–33.

Discography

- Various artists. Meat & Gravy from Bea & Baby (2003, Castle Music CD 06076 81269-2).

CAESAR, HARRY "LITTLE"

b. Horace Caesar, 18 February 1928; Pittsburgh, PA
d. 12 or 14 June 1994; Los Angeles, CA

Singer and actor. During his recording career he was based in Oakland, California. He sounded enough like Percy Mayfield that the Modern label withheld his 1951 session from release. He enjoyed one hit in 1952, "Goodbye Baby" (recorded in Hollywood 235). In the

CAESAR, HARRY “LITTLE”

1960s he turned to acting, and through the 1980s he appeared in numerous films and television shows.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Bonner, Brett. “Little Caesar” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 117 (September/October 1994): 62.

Discography: LSFP

Little Caesar. Lying Woman... Goodbye Baby (1983, Route 66 KIX-24).

CAGE, JAMES “BUTCH”

b. 16 March 1894; Hamburg, MS

d. ca. 1975, Zachary, LA

Fiddler and occasional guitarist. Recordings by folklorist Harry Oster released on the Folk-Lyric label led to performances outside Louisiana, including the 1960 Newport Folk Festival. His fiddle playing is regarded to have retentions of African fiddle styles.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli

CAIN, CHRIS

b. 19 November 1955; San Jose, CA

Guitarist, pianist, singer, songwriter. After playing clubs in San Jose and Monterey in the mid-1980s, Cain moved to the Bay Area and attracted a following with his uncanny ability to recapture the sound of early B. B. King. In 1987 Cain made his recording debut on the small Blue Rock’it Records label in impressive fashion with Late Night City Blues; the album generated four W. C. Handy Award nominations, including best band and best guitarist. Cain moved to Blind Pig in 1990 for Cuttin’ Loose, which established him as a national artist. A series of albums, including the concert recording Chris Cain Live at the Rep and a Christmas album in 1999, followed. Cain began the twenty-first century with Cain Does King, wherein he acknowledged and embraced his B. B. affinity, and Hall of Shame in 2003.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl and Stephen Thomas Erlewine)

Discography: AMG (Bill Dahl and Stephen Thomas Erlewine)

CAIN, PERRY

b. 1929; New Waverly, TX

d. 24 April 1975; Houston, TX

Houston guitarist active in the 1940s and early 1950s, performing and recording locally. Through the 1960s, Cain was the radio disk jockey known as “Daddy Deep Throat” on KCOH Houston.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: LSFP

CALLENDER, RED

b. George Sylvester Callender, 6 March 1916; Haynesville, VA

d. 8 March 1992; Saugus, CA

Bassist, tuba player, composer. Callender began his career in New York, settled in Los Angeles in 1936, and became a leading jazz and blues bassist on the West Coast. His recording debut was with Louis Armstrong in 1937. He recorded with Charlie Parker on classic “Cool Blues” for Dial (1945); also with Lester Young, Dexter Gordon, Errol Garner, Art Tatum, Jimmy Witherspoon, Billie Holiday, Charles Mingus, B. B. King, and many others. He did occasional recordings as leader for small labels during 1944–1946 and 1951–1954. Callender was equally comfortable in blues, traditional, swing, and modern jazz settings (pioneered tuba in latter context) and also with a symphony orchestra. Callender was a busy commercial studio player. He toured in the 1980s with Jeannie and Jimmy Cheatham’s Sweet Baby Blues Band.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Callender, Red, and Elaine Cohen. Unfinished Dream: The Musical World of Red Callender. London: Quartet, 1985.

Discography: Lord; LSFP

Selected Recordings as Leader

Speaks Low (1957, Crown 5012).

Swingin’ Suite (1957, Crown 5025).

The Lowest (1958, MGM 1007).

Basin Street Brass (1973, Legend 1003).
Red Callender-Gerald Wiggins (1983, Hemisphere 1002).

CALLICOTT, JOE

b. 11 October 1900; Nesbit, MS
 d. 1969; Nesbit, MS

Also known as “Calico Joe” and “Mississippi Joe.” Birth year cited as 1899 (gravestone), 1900, or 1901. Farm worker who played with Garfield Akers and worked in Memphis clubs and bars with Frank Stokes. Callicott recorded three sides (two issued) for Brunswick in 1930 and also backed Akers on highly regarded duets in the Stokes–Sain tightly meshed guitars style. The pair rival such close-knit teams as Memphis Minnie and Kansas Joe or Willie McTell and Curley Weaver. Callicott retired but recorded again in the 1960s.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Wardlow, Gayle Dean. “Garfield Akers and Mississippi Joe Callicott: From the Hernando Cottonfields.” Living Blues no. 50 (Spring 1981): 26–27. Reprinted in Wardlow, Gayle Dean. Chasin’ That Devil’s Music. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

Selected Reissue

Mississippi Delta Blues, Vol. 2 (Arhoolie CD1042).

CALLOWAY, CAB

b. Cabell Calloway III, 25 December 1907; Rochester, NY
 d. 18 November 1994; Hockessin, DE

Singer, dancer, songwriter, bandleader. Began in Chicago, then became bandleader in New York. Led orchestra at Cotton Club, Harlem, in succession to Duke Ellington from 1932 to 1940; featured in many important jazz instrumentalists; sang jazz, blues, and novelty songs. He broke up the band in 1948, and led a small group briefly in 1951–1952, then concentrated mainly on stage and film roles, including Sportin’ Life (said to be modeled on him) in Porgy and Bess and the Harlem Globetrotters touring show in the 1960s. He revived the band for tours and festivals. Calloway was a charismatic, flamboyant showman, famous for the “Hi-De-Hi-De-Hi” chorus on “Minnie the Moocher” (1931). Compiled dictionaries of jive language.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Calloway, Cab, and Bryant Rollins. Of Minnie the Moocher and Me. New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1976.

Discography: Lord

Selected Recordings

The Chronological Cab Calloway (1930–1942, Classics 516, 526, 537, 544, 554, 568, 576, 595, 614, 625, 996).

CALLOWAY, HARRISON

b. 6 November 1940; Chattanooga, TN

Band arranger best known for his R&B and soul record session work. Studied trumpet in high school in Chattanooga, then attended Tennessee State University, Nashville (1959–1963). From the late 1960s through 1974 he led the Muscle Shoals horn section for Rick Hall at Fame Records, then for Malaco (1976–early 1990s) and for Ace (US) (1990s–present).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Haralambos, Mike. “The Sound of the South: Harrison Calloway.” Juke Blues no. 40 (1998): 12–18.

CAMEO

The principal label of the Cameo Record Corporation of New York, introduced in February 1922 and mainly sold in Macy’s stores. Cameo had signed Lucille Hegamin to an exclusive contract in October 1921. Her twenty-three issues, released every two months until 1926, accounted for all but three of the label’s blues issues in these years. Some of them appeared also on the company’s Muse and Lincoln labels. In 1926–1927, Viola McCoy had six releases, some under a pseudonym, which also appeared on the company’s Romeo and variety labels under other pseudonyms. Cameo merged with Pathé in October 1927 and the resulting combination merged with the Plaza labels in August 1929, forming the American Record Corporation (ARC). The label was dropped in 1931.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR; Sutton
 Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

CAMEO

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

CAMPBELL, “BLIND” JAMES

b. 17 September 1906; Nashville, TN
d. 22 January 1981; Nashville, TN

Blinded at age thirty by a fertilizer plant accident, Campbell turned to playing guitar for tips, eventually gathering a somewhat regular Nashville street group that included mandolin, tub bass, and washboard. Recordings of him were made by Chris Strachwitz and released on Arhoolie Records.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris

Discography: AMG; LSFP

CAMPBELL, CARL

b. 20 March 1933; TX
d. 4 July 1993; Houston, TX

Pianist, vocalist, and club owner. Began career in Houston, Texas, in 1948 and made records for Freedom (1949), Peacock (1950), and Sittin' in With (1950). For many years he owned Carl's Blues Club in Houston.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Burke, Tony. “Carl Campbell” [obituary]. Blues and Rhythm no. 84 (November 1993): 17.

Discography: LSFP

CAMPBELL, EDDIE C.

b. 6 May 1939; Duncan, MS

Moving from Mississippi to Chicago as a boy, singer/guitarist Eddie C. Campbell grew up on the city's West Side, but not far from Maxwell Street. Campbell's mother bought him his first guitar at age nine, and by age twelve he was good enough to sit in with idol Muddy Waters at a neighborhood gig. The young guitarist was also inspired by Howlin' Wolf, Jimmy Reed, and fellow West Side guitarist and mentor Magic Sam, who lived nearby. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, Campbell developed his stinging, reverb-heavy guitar sound and flamboyant playing style by working as a sideman, and performed regularly with Reed, Howlin' Wolf, Little Walter, and Otis Rush. On a recommendation from Koko Taylor, he joined Willie Dixon's band in 1976 and spent the next four years as a member of Dixon's All Stars.

In 1977, Campbell recorded his impressive debut album for the Mr. Blues label, King of the Jungle, which was eventually reissued in the United States on Rooster Blues. After touring Europe in the late 1970s, he moved overseas in 1984 and spent the next eight years working abroad, with recordings on Black Magic, JSP, and Double Trouble. Campbell returned to Chicago in 1992 and released the critically acclaimed That's When I Know on Blind Pig two years later. The recording featured his introspective songwriting skills and signature West Side sound. Campbell continued to perform in clubs and festivals into the next century, being regarded as one of the original exponents of the fabled West Side Chicago blues style.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

That's When I Know (1994, Blind Pig BPCD 5014).
King of the Jungle (1996, Rooster Blues R2602; reissue).

CAMPBELL, JOHN

b. 20 January 1952; Shreveport, LA
d. 13 June 1993; New York, NY

Singer, guitarist. Using only an amplified acoustic guitar and a haunted voice, Campbell infused a streak of deep spiritualism into his signature voodoo blues stylings. Campbell grew up in Center, Texas, and began playing professionally at age thirteen. But he was more interested in drag racing until an accident cost him his right eye. During recovery he got deep into blues, particularly the work of Lightnin' Hopkins, and ultimately hit the road in the 1970s, playing small clubs and working as an opening act. He moved to New York City in 1985 and it was there he caught the attention of guitarist Ronnie Earl, who was instrumental in getting Campbell his recording debut in 1988 with A Man and His Blues on the German Crosscut label. After signing with Elektra he released One Believer in 1991 and Howlin' Mercy in 1993 before his death on the eve of an European tour.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin; Santelli
Allison, John. "John Campbell" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 111 (September/October 1993): 55.
Slaven, Neil. "John Campbell" [obituary]. Blues and Rhythm no. 81 (1993): 23.

Discography: AMG

CANNED HEAT

Death-haunted blues and boogie band formed by Bob Hite (1943–1981) and Al Wilson (1943–1970) in California, with Henry Vestine (1944–1997) on guitar. The contrast between Hite's gruff vocals and Wilson's shrill falsetto was central to their sound. Reached musical peak in late 1960s; had chart hits with "On the Road Again," "Going Up the Country" (both 1968), and "Let's Work Together" (1970). Wilson died of a drug overdose in 1970. Released collaboration with their musical model, John Lee Hooker (1971). Hite died of a heart attack in 1981. Drummer Fito (Adolpho) de la Parra continued to lead the group through many personnel changes, but the distinctive sound of Canned Heat did not survive the passing of its founders. Vestine died while touring with the band in 1997.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

De La Parra, Fito. Living the Blues. California: Canned Heat Music, 2000.

Discography

Canned Heat (1967, Liberty 7526).
Boogie with Canned Heat (1968, Liberty 7541).
Livin' the Blues (1968, Liberty 27200).
Future Blues (1970, Liberty 11002).
Hooker 'n' Heat (1971, Liberty 35002).
Historical Figures & Ancient Heads (1972, United Artists 5557).
The New Age (1973, United Artists 049F).
One More River to Cross (1974, Atlantic 7289).

CANNON, GUS

b. 12 September 1883; Red Banks, MS

d. 15 October 1979; Memphis, TN

Gus "Banjo Joe" Cannon will be remembered both for creating the finest of the Memphis jug bands and for writing the original version of "Walk Right In," an international pop hit in 1963 for the Rooftop Singers.

He was the son of a slave and some of his records retain archaic overtones from the years before the blues. His first instrument was home-made but he soon ran away from home and played banjo around work camps. He teamed up with harmonica player Noah Lewis in around 1910 and the pair worked with Jim Jackson and others in dives, street parties, and social events through Arkansas, Illinois, and Tennessee. Gus was billed as Banjo Joe, a name he used for his first recording session for Paramount with Blind Blake in 1927.

A year later, Cannon was asked to form a group to compete with the Memphis Jug Band and set up his Jug Stompers, which recorded some twenty-nine titles from 1928 to 1930. The band included Cannon on banjo, jug, and vocals, the remarkable Noah Lewis on harmonica, and guitarists Elijah Avery, Hosea Woods, and Ashley Thompson at various times.

The strength of the Jug Stompers was the variety of their material. Cannon's first solo recordings for Paramount had been a mix of blues, rags, and political commentaries (the cynical "Can You Blame the Colored Man?") and a unique demonstration of banjo played with a knife on "Poor Boy, Long Ways from Home." The Stompers expanded on this material with the extra instruments available, and produced a stunning set of records that covers nearly the whole gamut of black American music of the time. "Feather Bed," for instance, is an ancient shared tradition song popular with blacks and whites (it was later recorded as "Over the Road I'm Bound to Go" by white singer Uncle Dave Macon). A number of songs serenaded local places, while "Walk Right In" was a Cannon-Thompson song written before the blues coalesced in 1910.

The band's major musician was Noah Lewis who demonstrated remarkable breath control, inventiveness, and mastery of his instrument. In 1929, he recorded solo, and in 1930 had his own jug band featuring Sleepy John Estes, Yank Rachel, and Ham Lewis from the Memphis Jug Band. He lived in dire poverty after 1930, dying from gangrene in 1961.

The band's recording contract ended in 1930 with the Depression, although it continued to work throughout the following decade. Cannon himself returned to playing for tips and working outside music. He recorded for Folkways in 1956 and appeared in a documentary film called The Blues in 1963. But the success of the Rooftop Singers reawakened interest in the old man and he made an album for Memphis soul label Stax. He was also featured in The Devil's Music—A History of the Blues on BBC TV in 1976. Obituaries, including that published in Living Blues magazine, gave his age as ninety-six, although some reference sources give a birth year of 1885.

CANNON, GUS

DAVID HARRISON/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG; Harris
O'Neal, Jim. "Gus Cannon" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 44 (Autumn 1979): 57.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Gus Cannon and Noah Lewis. Complete Recorded Works 1927–1930 (Document DOCD 5032-33).
Walk Right In (Stax SCD 8603).

CANNONBALL RECORDS

Founded circa 1997 in Chanhassen, Minnesota. Offshoot of a music distribution company of the same name, Cannonball Records has issued a handful of regional blues compilations, and a handful more by blues artists such as James Harman, Johnnie Bassett, and Bernard Allison.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Cannonball Records website,
<http://www.cannonballrecords.com/> (accessed December 17, 2004).

Selected Recordings

Various artists. Blues Across America: The Dallas Scene (1997, Cannonball 29203).
Various artists. Blues Across America: The Detroit Scene (1997, Cannonball 29201).
James Harman. Takin' Chances (1998, Cannonball 29107).

CAPITOL

Founded in Hollywood, California, in 1942 by music industry veterans Glenn Wallichs, Buddy DeSylva, and Johnny Mercer, Capitol Records' early success was based on pop chart hits by artists such as Nat

"King" Cole and Ella Mae Morse. Although black music—particularly jazz—was represented in the main catalog, it was not until 1949 that a short-lived R&B series was launched with the 70000 sequence to promote black artists as diverse as Nellie Lutcher, Scatman Crothers, Blue Lu Barker, Betty Hall Jones, Walter Brown, Duke Henderson, and Sammy Davis, Jr. (under his R&B pseudonyms "Charlie Green" and "Shorty Muggins"). The series, managed by veteran A&R man Dave Dexter, was discontinued by the end of the same year, despite enjoying hits by Julia Lee and Sugar Chile Robinson and reissuing the best of the classic Black & White masters of T-Bone Walker, purchased in April of that year.

In January 1950, all artists were transferred to the main pop series and Capitol continued to produce the odd blues and R&B session, although the majority of the label's output remained the fine pop and country issues that had earned it its reputation. During the early 1950s, artists such as Big Dave Cavanaugh, Paul Williams, Billy Valentine, Anita Tucker, and The Cues helped ease Capitol into the rock 'n' roll era. The label was bought by EMI in Britain in 1956.

DAVE PENNY

Bibliography

Daniels, Bill, and Galen Gart. "Capitol." Whiskey, Women, And... 14 (June 1984): 37.

Discography

Capitol from the Vaults #5: The Roots of Rock 'n' Roll (2001, Capitol CD 28292).

CARBO, HAYWARD "CHUCK"

b. 11 January 1926; Houma, LA

Former lead singer of the popular 1950s New Orleans rhythm and blues vocal group the Spiders. Originally formed in the mid-1940s as a gospel group built around Carbo and his brother, Leonard "Chick" Carbo, the Spiders began recording secular rhythm and blues in 1953. During the next two years, the band scored a string of top ten hits, including "I Didn't Want to Do It," "You're the One" and "I'm Slippin' In." In 1956, Chuck began recording as a solo artist for Imperial. He never found the success he'd had with the Spiders and was often forced to take day jobs. In the early 1990s, Chuck recorded two well-received albums for Rounder.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Warner, Jay. The DaCapo Book of American Singing Groups: A History, 1940–1990. New York: DaCapo Press, 2000.

Discography: AMGSelected Recordings and Reissues

Drawers Trouble (1993, Rounder 2123).
The Imperial Sessions (1993, Bear Family Records 15673; with the Spiders).
The Barber's Blues (1996, Rounder 2140).

CARBO, LEONARD “CHICK”

b. 28 December 1927; Houma, LA
 d. 18 August 1998; New Orleans, LA

Along with his brother, Hayward “Chuck” Carbo, was co-lead singer of the popular 1950s New Orleans rhythm and blues vocal group the Spiders. The band was active from 1953 to 1955, scoring a string of top ten hits. Chick Carbo left for a solo career with Atlantic Records in 1956 and continued performing regionally for many years.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Hannusch, Jeff. “Lawrence [sic] ‘Chick’ Carbo.” Living Blues no. 145 (May/June 1999): 55.
 Warner, Jay. The Da Capo Book of American Singing Groups: A History, 1940–1990. New York: DaCapo Press, 2000.

Discography: AMG (for brother Hayward “Chuck” Carbo)Selected Recordings

The Imperial Sessions (1993, Bear Family Records 15673; with the Spiders; reissue).

CARELESS LOVE

One of the most important and frequently recorded of American folk songs. It is not strictly a blues song—in fact, it predates blues probably by some decades—though it has important blues characteristics and has long been a favorite of blues singers. Its roots are obscure, though it is usually thought to have developed out of an Anglo-American Southern mountain melody some time in the second half of the nineteenth century. Though W. C. Handy stated his band played it as early as 1892, apart from a 1911 transcription of the text by Howard Odum (titled “Kelly’s Love”), the song leaves little trace until 1921 when Handy published an updated version entitled “Loveless Love.” The more familiar folk version of the song did not emerge into the mainstream until the second half of the 1920s through recordings, which became increasingly common toward the end of the decade, and through appearances in printed collections of folk music such as those of Handy and Sandburg (see Bibliography).

“Careless Love” has a symmetrical sixteen-bar, four-line structure. There is little to connect the melody of the song with later blues, for its phrasing and shape seem to more closely correspond to white than black folk influences. There is, however, a blues connection in the harmony of the second half of the song (measures 9 through 16). Its standard form (one chord/measure) is: I–I7–IV–IVmin–I–V–I–I. This distinctive sequence, taken in isolation, is the harmonic foundation of numerous eight-bar blues, notably Leroy Carr’s “How Long Blues” (1928), as well as the important proto-blues “Fare Thee, Honey, Fare Thee Well” (aka “Dink’s Song”) found in various manifestations in folk and mainstream culture from 1901. The connection between “Fare Thee” and “Careless Love” is reinforced by the text of certain stanzas being commonly found in both songs.

The text of “Careless Love” also shows a blues influence in its subject of abandonment in love and the AAAB or AABC structure of the text of many versions (relating it to the characteristic AAB form of the twelve-bar blues).

Partly because of its racially mixed identity, “Careless Love” has, quite exceptionally for a folk song, been equally associated with three different genres: blues, hillbilly/bluegrass, and jazz. Thirty hillbilly recordings of the song are known of by 1938 and there have been many more since, while Tom Lord’s Jazz Discography lists nearly five hundred jazz recordings of the song up to the present.

The first recording by a black artist was that of vaudevillian Noble Sissle (“Loveless Love,” 1921, PA 020493; the titles “Loveless Love” and “Careless Love” are used interchangeably in recorded versions before the 1930s). The earliest blues versions of the song were made by Katharine Handy (1922, Pm 12011) and Alberta Hunter (1923, Pm 12013). Bessie Smith’s 1925 recording (“Careless Love Blues,” Col 14083-D), which included Louis Armstrong on cornet, was particularly important in establishing the significance of the song. Other major recordings from the prewar period include those by Lonnie Johnson (1928, OK 8635), Bo Chatman (1931, OK 8888), Blind Boy Fuller (1937, ARC 8-02-66), and Joe Turner (1940, De 7827). Important postwar blues recordings of the song include version by Fats Domino (1951, Imp 5145),

CARELESS LOVE

Billie and Dede Pierce (Riverside RLP 370), and Skip James (1968, Vanguard VSD 79273).

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

- The Bluegrass Messengers. "Careless Love—Version 5." <http://www.bluegrassmessengers.com/master/carelesslove5.html>.
- Muir, Peter C. Before "Crazy Blues": Commercial Blues in America 1850–1920. Ph.D. dissertation, City University of New York, 2004.
- Odum, Howard W. "Folk-Song and Folk-Poetry as Found in the Secular Songs of the Southern Negroes." Journal of American Folklore 24 (1911): 255–294, 351–396.

CARMICHAEL, JAMES "LUCKY"

b. 12 October 1902; Harrodsburg, KY
d. 6 October 1982; Cincinnati, OH

Blues singer and guitarist in the post–World War II era. He began his blues career in Chicago, where during the early 1960s he played the local clubs, often in the Lefty Bates Band. While there he recorded three blues singles, for Dillie (1960), Shar (1961), and Pam (1962), the latter rereleased on Loma in 1964. He never recorded again. By the 1970s, Carmichael was working in Cincinnati, and performed there until his death.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- O'Neal, Jim. "Lucky Carmichael" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 55 (Winter 1982/83): 39.

Discography: LSFP

CAROLINA SLIM

b. Edward P. Harris, 22 August 1923; Leasburg, NC
d. 22 October 1953; Newark, NJ

Little is known about Carolina Slim. His real name was Edward P. Harris and most of his early life seems to be unknown. Apparently, Harris played the guitar for several small clubs while growing up. Around 1950, Harris moved to Newark, New Jersey, where he made his first recording for Herman Lubinsky's Savoy label as Carolina Slim, a name probably chosen for Harris's tall frame. Because of his North Carolina upbringing, Slim developed a sound that was distinctly a Piedmont blues style. Under the influence of Lightnin' Hopkins, Slim structured a majority of his songs to resemble Hopkins's blues style. Occasionally, he recorded with a drummer or a washboard player. He also recorded under various nicknames such as Country Paul, Georgia Pine, Jammin' Jim, and Lazy Slim Jim.

His down-home combination of Texas blues, Piedmont blues, and Lightnin' Hopkins kept him returning to the Savoy, and he acknowledged his roots with songs like "Carolina Boogie" and a cover of Blind Boy Fuller's "Rag Mama Rag." Slim's albums are unusual for their time because, although they are skillful and convincing performances, many of them feature solo country blues, either in the Carolina style of Blind Boy Fuller, or blatant copies of Lightnin' Hopkins. Unfortunately, he did not live long enough to develop a real style of his own. In 1953, Harris entered the hospital in Newark, New Jersey, for back surgery but died during the operation from a heart attack. He was only thirty years old.

HEATHER PINSON

Bibliography

AMG (Charlotte Dillon)

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

- Blues Go Away from Me* (1964, Savoy SJL 1153).
Carolina Blues and Boogie (1985, Traveling Man TM 805).
Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, 1950–1952 (1994, Document BDCD-6043).

CARON, DANNY

b. 2 November 1955; Washington, DC

Danny Caron earned his place in blues lore as the guitarist and musical director for pianist/singer Charles Brown during that legend's remarkable career comeback in the 1980s and 1990s.

Caron's roots in the blues extend further than that one remarkable relationship, however—he backed Marcia Ball shortly after moving to Austin, Texas, in the late 1970s, and then joined Clifton Chenier and was in his band in 1980 when they recorded "I'm Here," which won a Grammy.

His relationship with Brown began in 1987, shortly after Brown's career had been revived under the prodding and sponsorship of Bonnie Raitt. Playing with a lithe, jazz-oriented touch on a hollow-body electric guitar, Caron's guitar work re-created the feeling of a 1950s jazz club that served as the foundation for Brown's own singing and playing. A near-perfect complement to Brown's after-hours brand of sophisticated blues, Caron's playing with Brown embodied elements of T-Bone Walker and jazzster Herb Ellis to create a sense of warmth and relaxation every bit as hip as that of Brown's legendary recordings from the 1950s with Johnny Moore's Three Blazers (which featured Moore on guitar).

Caron has also played on sessions with John Lee Hooker, Little Milton, Katie Webster, Ruth Brown, Dr. John, and John Hammond, Jr. With Brown's passing in 1999, Caron has taken on recording as a leader and teaching at a music school.

JIM TRAGESER

Discography

All My Life (1990, Bullseye Blues 9501; with Charles Brown).

These Blues (1995, Polygram 523022; with Charles Brown).

Good Hands (2003, Danny Caron Music).

CARR, BARBARA

b. 9 January 1941; St. Louis, MO

Soul-blues singer based in St. Louis. From 1965 through the 1970s her career was guided by Oliver Sain, who assisted in several recording sessions, including some for Chess in 1966. Long a St. Louis favorite, she became better known nationally through her self-produced 1989 CD Good Woman Go Bad (Bar-Car label) and her festival performances. Her recent work has been recorded for Ecko, including the risqué Bone Me Like You Own Me (1998).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)

Aldin, Mary Katherine. "Next Generation: Barbara Carr."

Living Blues no. 90 (March/April 1990): 49.

Discography: AMG

CARR, LEROY

b. 27 March 1905; Nashville, TN

d. 29 April 1935; Indianapolis, IN

The son of John Carr and Katie Dozier, Leroy Carr moved to Louisville, Kentucky, and then settled in Indianapolis. He taught himself piano and worked with a traveling circus (an event later serenaded in "Carried Water for the Elephant") before joining the Army. Throughout the 1920s, he was a regular accompanist to other singers at dance halls and house parties. In 1928, he teamed with the brilliant guitarist Scrapper Blackwell and the two became one of the most durable partnerships in the blues for the rest of Carr's short life.

Their first record for Vocalion included "How Long—How Long Blues," a sad and wistful number based on the tune of the standard "Crow Jane." It was a huge hit by the standards of the time, and Carr went on to record new versions throughout his career. For the next year the pair recorded regularly but as many titles were rejected as issued. And it is not difficult to see a portent of the future in "Straight Alky Blues" (1929), a two-part lament for a young man addicted to the kind of heavy drinking that killed Carr at the age of thirty.

Carr was seen by contemporaries as mild mannered, especially compared with the aggressive Blackwell who felt, understandably, that his own career was being overshadowed by Carr's popularity. It is possible some of the many unissued sides from this time were rejected because this resentment overflowed into the music. From August 1929, matters seemed to settle down and virtually everything from long regular sessions through to 1934 was put on the market. Overall, the Carr-Blackwell partnership made more than one hundred thirty records together, mostly of the highest quality.

Their importance in the history of the music was in the new sophistication they added to a rough, rural music, which appealed to country buyers who had moved into the cities. Carr's cleverly understated piano perfectly complemented Blackwell's imaginative guitar runs and the mix was completed by Carr's plaintive, nostalgic voice. It was a recipe that spawned countless imitators and admirers.

The range of material was impressive too, from maudlin ballads through personal prison blues to knockabout comedy. But Carr was drinking ever more heavily, helped by the income from his record sales, and the Depression was biting. Due to the economic collapse of the recording industry in the early 1930s, Carr and Blackwell did not record for two years, a break framed by two of his most exquisite songs: "Midnight Hour Blues" (1932) and the beautiful "Blues Before Sunrise" of 1934, both of which show the pair at their finest.

But Carr's drinking had led to kidney failure, and entire recording sessions were again scrapped, although those sides issued were well up to standard. He moved to Bluebird for one last session, ending prophetically with "Six Cold Feet in the Ground." Three months later, he was dead from nephritis.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O'Neal and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern

CARR, LEROY

Discography: DGR

Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vols. 1–6 (Document DOCD 5134-5139; reissue).

CARR, SAM

b. 17 April 1926; near Marianna, AR

Blues drummer Sam Carr was born in the north Mississippi Delta, the son of slide guitarist Robert Nighthawk. Adopted and raised as a baby by the Carr family, he left home at sixteen and joined his father in Helena, Arkansas. Carr started out as Nighthawk's chauffeur/doorman, but soon was playing upright bass with him. In 1946, he moved to St. Louis to form his own band, but within a few years was working again with Nighthawk. Now a guitarist, Carr soon switched to drums after failing to find a drummer to his liking when one was needed. In 1954, he formed what would become a forty-five-year partnership when he hired guitarist and harmonica player Frank Frost. From 1956 to 1959, the two would frequently play with Sonny Boy Williamson II. Carr and Frost moved from St. Louis to Lula, Mississippi, in 1959, and continued to play throughout the region, often with Carr's wife Doris singing.

Clarksdale guitarist Jack Johnson joined the group in 1962 and the trio, billed as Frank Frost and the Nighthawks, recorded the album Hey Boss Man! for Phillips International. In 1966, Carr and Frost recorded for Jewel Records with guest harmonica player Arthur Williams. Carr, Frost, and Johnson, now known as The Jelly Roll Kings, recorded Rockin' the Juke Joint Down for Earwig in 1978. Carr played and recorded with Frost until Frost's death in 1999, and his exemplary drumming style became the model for future Delta musicians. He continued on to become an in-demand session musician and remained a popular festival draw.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Cooper, Margo. "The Drums Got to Be Heard Just Right." Living Blues no. 171 (January/February 2004): 10–25.

Johnson, Matthew. "Doing Terrible Things with the Sticks." Living Blues 96 (March/April 1991): 32–35.

Discography

The Jelly Roll Kings. Rockin' the Juke Joint Down (1993, Earwig 4901CD).

CARRADINE, WILLIAM "CAT-IRON"

b. ca. 1896; Garden City, LA

d. ca. 1958; Natchez, MS

Little known singer-guitarist whose 1958 backwoods recordings of blues and religious songs was issued on LP by Folkways. It remains his sole legacy.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

Selected Recording

Cat Iron Sings Blues and Hymns (Folkways LP FA2389. No CD).

CARRIER, ROY JR. "CHUBBY"

b. 1 July 1967; Lafayette LA

Singer and accordionist in zydeco. He was taught accordion by his zydeco musician father Roy Carrier, Sr.; his cousins perform as the Carrier Brothers. Early influence was Clifton Chenier. From 1987 through 1989 he was drummer for Terrance Simien to gain experience in a touring band. In 1989 he went on his own, recording initially for Flying Fish and Blind Pig labels.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Craig Harris)

Rotenstein, David S. "Chubby Carrier: Don't Forget Where You Come From." Living Blues no. 98 (July/August 1991): 20–22.

Discography: AMG

CARSON, NELSON

b. 18 September 1917; New Boston, TX

d. 31 January 2003; Ashdown, AR

Aka Nelson Carter. Learned guitar after moving to Houston, Texas, in 1924. After serving in World War II, he lived in Ashdown, Arkansas. He shuttled between Arkansas and Texas, working often with Jay Franks and occasionally with Sonny Boy Williamson II (Aleck Miller). Activity after the 1970s is undocumented.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: LSFPCARTER, BETTY

b. Lillie Mae Jones, 16 May 1929; Flint, MI
d. 26 September 1998; New York, NY

Singer. Studied piano and voice at Detroit Conservatory, sang with visiting bebop musicians (including Charlie Parker), then joined Lionel Hampton in 1948 under name of Lorraine Carter. He nicknamed her “Betty Bebop” and she thereafter used the name Betty Carter. In New York from 1951, she often worked at the Apollo Theatre in Harlem; collaborated with Ray Charles in 1960–1963 and again in 1989. Founded Bet-Car (record company) in 1970. Unique stylist with an uncompromising improvisational approach to jazz standards and popular songs. She earned a reputation as a nurturer of talented young instrumentalists in her trio. Founded Jazz Ahead education program in 1993.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Bauer, William R. Open the Door: The Life and Music of Betty Carter. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 2002.

Discography: LordSelected Recordings

Meet Betty Carter and Ray Bryant (1955, Epic 3202).
The Modern Sound of Betty Carter (1960, ABC-Paramount 363).
Ray Charles and Betty Carter (1961, ABC-Paramount 385).
Finally Betty Carter (1969, Roulette 5000).
Betty Carter (1970, Bet-Car 1001).
The Audience with Betty Carter (1979, Bet-Car 1003).
Carmen McRae–Betty Carter Duets (1987, Great American Music Hall 2706).
It’s Not About the Melody (1992, Verve 314-513970).
Feed the Fire (1993, Verve 314-523600).

CARTER, BO

b. Armenter Chatmon, 21 March 1893; Bolton, MS
d. 21 September 1964; Memphis, TN

Bo Carter was born near Bolton, Mississippi. His twelve siblings were all musical, including Sam,

Harry, and Lonnie Chatmon, who became recording artists. Carter played clarinet and tenor banjo as well as the instruments he used in his recordings—guitar and, occasionally, fiddle. Besides music and farming, Carter worked in chauffeuring, carpentry, and phonograph repair.

Carter played with his brothers in a string band that took the name Mississippi Sheiks when it began to record in 1930. Although he played on only a few of that group’s recordings, he played with it regularly in live appearances and acted as the group’s manager. Carter also acted as an agent to other artists, including Eugene “Sonny Boy Nelson” Powell.

Carter made his recording debut in 1928, backing singer Alec Johnson. He also recorded that year as Bo Chatman; behind singer Mary Butler; and with Charlie McCoy and Walter Vincson as the Jackson Blue Boys. He recorded with the Sheiks on several occasions, including their 1930 session backing Texas Alexander; and in 1931 with Charlie McCoy and possibly Sam Chatmon as the Mississippi Blacksnakes.

As Bo Carter, he began recording on December 15, 1930, and continued through February 12, 1940, cutting one hundred ten sides in nine sessions for OKeh and Bluebird. Carter was one of the blues stars of the 1930s. His only peers, in terms of numbers of sides issued, were Tampa Red, Memphis Minnie, Big Bill Broonzy, Bumble Bee Slim, Sleepy John Estes, and Blind Boy Fuller.

Carter went blind sometime in the 1930s, but continued to farm and play music. In the early 1950s, Sonny Boy Williamson brought Carter to audition several times for Lillian McMurry of Trumpet Records in Jackson, Mississippi. McMurry turned him down because of the condition of his voice, she said.

Carter was living in Memphis in 1960 when British blues researcher Paul Oliver happened to meet him, and interviewed and photographed him for Oliver’s book Conversation with the Blues. Carter suffered strokes and died of a cerebral hemorrhage at Shelby County Hospital, Memphis. He is buried in an unmarked grave in Nitta Yuma, Mississippi.

Although current blues fans often regard Carter as a smutty lyricist, only about a third of his songs have erotic themes. But those do show a flair for original erotic metaphors, often food related: “Let me put my banana in your fruit basket,” “She may be your cook but she burns my bread some times,” and “Let me squeeze and roll your lemon” are classic Carter lines.

Beyond his prolific recording career and his interesting lyrics, Carter is notable for the sophisticated technique with which he played his metal National guitar. He used flashy runs, unusual chords, and several keys and tunings. Some of his songs have thirty-two-bar, AABA structures—common in pop tunes but rare in the down-home blues. Carter's 1928 recording of "Corrine, Corrina" is the earliest known version of that song, which has become a standard of American music.

CARTER, BO

STEVE CHESEBOROUGH

Bibliography

Oliver, Paul. Conversation with the Blues. New York: Horizon Press, 1965.

O'Neal, Jim. "Living Blues Interview: Lillian S. McMurry." Living Blues no. 67 (1986): 15–28.

Romanowski, Ken. Liner notes to Carter, Bo. Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vols. 1–5. Vienna: Document Records, 1991.

Discography: DGR

Bo Carter Greatest Hits 1930–1940 (1970, Yazoo; reissue).

Twist It Babe (1970, Yazoo; reissue).

Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vols. 1–5 (1991, Document Records; reissue).

CARTER, GOREE

b. 31 December 1930; Houston, TX

d. 29 December 1990; Houston, TX

Texas singer/guitarist Goree Carter was heavily influenced by T-Bone Walker as a teenager, and at age nineteen was signed to Freedom Records. Carter recorded for the label throughout the next two years, and had a minor hit with the scorching single "Rock Awhile." He recorded for several labels throughout the 1950s, including Coral, Imperial, and Modern, with limited success, and eventually retired from music altogether.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin

Discography: AMG; LSFP

The Complete Recordings, Vol. 1, 1949–1951 (2001, Blue Moon CD 6027).

CARTER, JOE

b. 6 November 1927; Midland, GA

d. 5 June 2001; Chicago, IL

Georgia-born musician Joe Carter moved to Chicago in 1952 and developed his style directly from Elmore James and Muddy Waters. An engaging singer and slide guitarist in the classic postwar Chicago blues vein, he reportedly turned down a recording offer from Cobra in the late 1950s. Carter recorded for Barrelhouse in 1976 and retired from music in the 1980s due to illness.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Larkin

Discography: AMG; LSFP

CARTER, LEVESTER "BIG LUCKY"

b. 1917; Weir, MS

d. 24 December 2002; Memphis, TN

Raised in Mississippi, singer/songwriter/guitarist "Big Lucky" Carter moved to Memphis after serving in World War II. He recorded for several labels throughout the 1950s and 1960s, including Sun and Savoy. In 1969, he recorded for Hi Records, which produced the classic "Goofer Dust." A staple of the Memphis blues scene for more than fifty years, Carter recorded the critically acclaimed CD Lucky 13 at age eighty-one.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Larkin

Evans, David, and Bob Groom. "Big Lucky: Memphis Bluesman" [with interview and discography]. Juke Blues no. 7 (Winter 1986/1987): 12–17.

Discography: LSFP

Lucky 13 (1998, Blueside CD WESF 106).

CARTER, VIVIAN

b. 25 March 1921; Tunica, MS

d. 12 June 1989; Gary, IN

Gary, Indiana, record store owner and consultant for Chess Records. In 1953 Carter founded the first large independent black-owned music company, Vee-Jay Records in Chicago, with her husband James Bracken. Until 1966, Vee-Jay released a wide variety of successful recordings including John Lee Hooker, Jimmy Reed, R&B, doo-wop, and early Beatles. Multiple reissues.

TINA SPENCER DREIBACH

Bibliography

Larkin

Darwen, Norman. "Vivian Carter" [obituary]. Blues and Rhythm no. 47 (October 1989): 11.

Discography

Callahan, Mike, and Edwards, David. "The Vee-Jay Story." <http://www.bsnpubs.com/veejay/veejay.html> (accessed April 13, 1999).

See also Vee-Jay/Abner/Falcon

CASEY JONES

"Greatest Comedy Hit in Years"—"The Only Comedy Railroad Song"—so reads the cover of "Casey Jones: The Brave Engineer" (T. Lawrence Seibert and Eddie Newton, 1909). To a catchy, syncopated tune, it tells how Jones died when his "western mail" rammed "number four" near "Reno hill," on its way to "Frisco."

In fact, engineer John Luther "Cayce" Jones died when Illinois Central No. 1, with passenger and mail service from Chicago, Illinois, to New Orleans, Louisiana, rammed the rear of a freight train at Vaughn, Mississippi, at 3:52 A.M., April 30, 1900. According to Simeon Webb, Jones's fireman, they left Memphis ninety minutes late. As they approached Vaughn, 174 miles south, they were on time. Rounding a curve there, they saw two red lights of another train standing on the main line. Jones, the only casualty, threw on the brakes while Webb jumped.

The Illinois Central's official report accepts witness statements that safety regulations had been followed. "Engineer Jones was solely responsible for the collision by reason of having disregarded the signals given by Flagman [John] Newberry." After he left railroad work, Webb maintained that there was no warning.

To some Jones was a hero for having stuck to his engine and slowed it enough to avoid serious passenger injuries. To others he was a villain, having recklessly endangered passengers and crew. Both opinions are reflected in "Casey Jones" texts—he is praised and ridiculed. A version recovered from Jim Holbert is unusually accurate and particularly acidic. Elements of ridicule may have prompted Seibert and Newton to see the ballad as "comedy."

The original is said to have been the work of Wallace Saunders, a black roundhouse worker in Canton, Mississippi, who "rendered [it] in a singsong" according to Freeman Hubbard. The tune used by Memphis songster Furry Lewis ("Kassie Jones," 1928, Victor 21664) shares a chant quality with a few others, suggesting that it may be close to Saunders's original. Newton's familiar tune is very different.

One of Lewis's verses begins, "Lord, some people said Mister Casey couldn't run / Let me tell you what Mister Casey done." Similarities of text and tune suggest that "Some people say that a preacher won't steal / But I caught two in my cornfield" was a model for this verse. Songs about magnates, other engineers, hoboes, porters, etc., if they are older, are other possible models, for example, "Old Jay Gould"/"Jay Gould's Daughter," "James A. Michaels," "Charlie Snyder," "Joseph Mica," and "Jimmie Jones."

Lewis's song is a blues ballad. Norm Cohen recognizes an additional thread of tradition, that of the Anglo-American vulgar ballad ("Come all you," linear form, moralizing). Perhaps early blues ballads inspired rewrites for white audiences.

"Casey Jones" parodies proclaim the views of several groups. In 1912 Joe Hill made Jones a "scab" (strike breaker). In Robert Hunter's Grateful Dead song, Jones is a cocaine user. Bessie Smith's "J. C. Holmes Blues" (1925, Columbia 14095-D) is racy; other parodies are bawdy.

JOHN GARST

Bibliography

Cohen, Norm. Long Steel Rail: The Railroad in American Folksong. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981; 2nd edition, 2000.

Cray, Ed. The Erotic Muse. 2nd ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1992; 1st edition, 1969.

Gurner, J. K. "Water Valley Casey Jones Railroad Museum." <http://www.watervalley.net/users/caseyjones/home.htm> (accessed October 16, 2002).

Hubbard, Freeman. Railroad Avenue: Great Stories and Legends of American Railroading. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1945.

Place, Jeff. Supplemental Notes on the Selections. Selection 24, "Kassie Jones, Parts 1 and 2," Furry Lewis. In "Anthology of American Folk Music," edited by Harry Smith. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Folkways, 1997. Smithsonian Folkways CD 40090.

Randolph, Vance, and G. Legman. Roll Me in Your Arms: "Unprintable" Ozark Folksongs and Folklore, Volume I, Folksongs and Music. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1992.

Discography

Webb, Sim T. "The Story of Casey Jones' Last Trip" (1952, Davidson Clay Co., Memphis; 78-rpm recording on four sides).

CASEY, SMITH

b. Perhaps 1900 in east Texas

d. 11 September 1950; Tyler, TX

Singer and guitarist of ballads, blues, and spirituals. Discovered and recorded by John and Alan Lomax at the Texas Department of Corrections at Brazoria. He was released in 1945, and died five years later in a tuberculosis hospital. His performances were released after his death.

CASEY, SMITH

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Groom, Bob. "Smith Casey." Blues World no. 34 (September 1970): 4–6.

Discography: DGR

CASTON, LEONARD "BABY DOO"

b. 2 June 1917; Sumrall, MS

d. 22 August 1987; Minneapolis, MN

Versatile pianist/guitarist chiefly known for his work in several Chicago-based bands throughout the 1940s, chiefly in the legendary Big Three Trio. After learning guitar at an early age, Caston switched to piano, which was to be his chief instrument as a young man in Natchez, Mississippi. Caston moved from Mississippi to Chicago in 1939, where he met a young ex-boxer, Willie Dixon. In 1940, Caston and Dixon formed their first band, the Five Breezes, which recorded on the Bluebird label. During this period, Caston cut his only solo hit, "Death of Walter Barnes" b/w "Baby Please Don't Go" on Decca.

In 1941, after Dixon was arrested for refusing to serve in the military, Caston formed his own band, the Rhythm Rascals, which joined Alberta Hunter's USO tour for performances in Europe, Africa, India, and China. At the close of World War II, Caston reunited with Dixon, and with Ollie Crawford formed the Big Three Trio, which toured nationally and recorded for Columbia, OKeh, and Bullet. After the band broke up in 1952, Caston continued to perform in other groups or solo in clubs and music festivals until his death. He often cited Leroy Carr as his idol and chief influence. Caston is remembered for his eclectic, improvisational piano parts in recordings with the Big Three Trio, which blended blues with boogie-woogie, pop, and other styles, filtered through smooth, three-part vocal harmonies.

DAVID BEAUDOUIN

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Titon, Jeff. From Blues to Pop: The Autobiography of Leonard "Baby Doo" Caston. John Edwards Memorial Foundation, Inc., 1974.

Discography: AMG (as The Big Three Trio); DGR (under The Five Breezes); LSFP

CASTRO, TOMMY

b. 15 April 1955; San Jose, CA

Longtime Bay Area favorite Tommy Castro plays a bright, upbeat West Coast style of blues with elements of pop and rock, bringing him a broad crossover audience. The guitarist and vocalist recorded a series of well-received albums for Blind Pig in the mid- to late 1990s; he continues to record and tour extensively.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda)

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Exception to the Rule (1995, Blind Pig 5029).
Can't Keep a Good Man Down (1997, Blind Pig 5041).

CATFISH

British record label established in 1998 in Guildford, England, by Russell Beecher and Khaled Abdullah. Its catalog of blues reissues extended to more than eighty CDs with prewar issues programmed by Paul Swinton and postwar issues programmed by Mike Rowe, including both compilations and single-artist issues.

HOWARD RYE

CATFISH BLUES

First recorded on March 28, 1941, by Mississippi bluesman Robert Petway for RCA Bluebird, and subsequently released on Bluebird B8838. Another version, titled "Deep Sea Blues," was made by Petway's contemporary Tommy McClennan on September 15, 1941, also for RCA Bluebird (Bluebird B9005).

Melodic and lyric antecedents can be traced at least back to the 1920s. The melody may be sacred in origin, because it may be heard to the words "I Know His Blood Will Make Me Whole" as recorded by Texas sacred musician Blind Willie Johnson in 1927 (Columbia 14276-D). The lyric distribution over the eight-measure melody in the sacred song is AABA (2 + 2 + 2 + 2). For "Catfish Blues," the lyrics are of two sentences or independent phrases, each sung over four measures (4 + 4). Lyric antecedents can be found on Jim Jackson's "Kansas City Blues Part 3" (1928, Vocalion 1155). Individual phrases turn up in passing on various recordings in the early 1930s, such as “deep blue sea” in Leroy Carr’s “Blues Before Sunrise” (1934, Vocalion 02657). It is surprising that the tune and words do not appear together on records before 1941.

After the Petway and McClennan versions were released in 1941 and 1942, respectively, and after the 1942–1944 American Federation of Musicians union ban on new recording, other treatments of “Catfish Blues” appeared on 78s. Notable ones were made by John Lee Hooker (1951, Gotham 515) and, a bit later, by B. B. King (as “Fishin’ After Me (Catfish Blues),” 1959–1960, Kent 351).

Two distinctive recordings were made by Muddy Waters for Chess Records in the early 1950s. The first was “Rollin’ Stone” (1950, Chess 1426), which was simply a retitling of the standard “Catfish” tune and lyrics. Nonetheless, the title would be adopted in 1962 by the Rolling Stones in London, and in 1968 for the rock publication Rolling Stone. The second was “Still a Fool” (1951, Chess 1480), featuring a two-electric guitar accompaniment by Waters and “Little Walter” Jacobs, and lyrics relating a situation of adulterous love in urban Chicago. The uses of single-string licks on the guitars, and the lyrics reflecting an urban sensibility, show the extent to which “Catfish Blues” had evolved from its prewar rural origins.

Rock musicians in the 1960s tried their hands on “Catfish Blues.” Cream with Jack Bruce and guitarist Eric Clapton recorded an instrumental treatment on Doctor Ross’s song “Cat’s Squirrel,” with the Catfish Blues theme played on harmonica, on the LP Fresh Cream (1966, Atco). The American guitarist Johnny Winter used the melody for “I Love Everybody” on Second Winter (1969, Columbia). A related lyric paraphrase (without reference to the original melody) on the “Catfish” concept of escaping and living in water may be found on Jimi Hendrix’s “1983 (A Merman I’d Like to Be)” from Electric Ladyland (1968, Polydor/Reprise).

The “Catfish Blues” melody can still be heard in the blues, sung to the lyrics popularized by Petway and Waters, such as T-Model Ford’s “The Old Number” (1998, You Better Keep Still, Fat Possum 80318-2).

EDWARD KOMARA

CATFISH KEITH

b. Keith Daniel Kozachik, 9 February 1962; East Chicago, IL

Singer and acoustic guitarist specializing in pre–World War II blues styles.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Larry Belanger)

Discography: AMG

CAVA-TONE RECORDING

Record label (California, 1948–1949). Owner: Robert Lee Geddins (b. February 6, 1913, Highbank, TX; d. February 15, 1991, Oakland, CA). Oakland, California–based, the label issued sides by Lowell Fulson (“Prison Bound”), Bob Geddins’ Cavaliers, Roy Hawkins, Ulysses James, Saunders King, Jimmy McCracklin, Rising Star Gospel Singers, Jimmy Wilson, and others. Some of these were reissued on Aladdin, Gilt-Edge, and Modern.

ROBERT EAGLE

Discography: McGrath

See also Big Town

C. C. RIDER

The history of “C. C. Rider” could potentially be viewed as a history of the folk process itself. Since its original recording under the title “See See Rider” on October 15, 1924, in New York by Gertrude “Ma” Rainey for Paramount Records, it has undergone several transformations which have incorporated the various styles of blues, jazz, folk, and rock ‘n’ roll. It has been included on the studio and live efforts of so many musicians that it has become canonized in American popular music.

Along with “C. C. Rider” and “See See Rider,” this song has also been presented as “Easy Rider” possibly due to vernacular interpretations and/or the use of oral tradition in the passing of this song from performer to performer. Traveling blues musicians would often refer to their instruments, usually guitars or harmonicas, as “easy riders” due to their ease as traveling “companions.” This term was also used in the same respect as a double entendre for a female companion with whom these musicians could expect sexual preferences. Ma Rainey’s version is the first known recording of “See See Rider.” However, there is a written account of this song by Alan Lomax, derived from an interview with Big Bill Broonzy, which places its existence as early as the turn of the twentieth century.

As this song has evolved, most versions have discarded the first two verses sung in the initial recording by Ma Rainey. Conversely, many have added traditional blues verses that do not appear in the original, again all part of the folk process. Blind Lemon Jefferson used what has become the standard first verse of “C. C. Rider” as the first verse of his “Corrina Blues,” which he recorded for Paramount in April 1926 less than two years after Ma Rainey’s original recording. The changes in the growth of this song have not all been lyrical, however. It has not only been played as a blues standard by artists such as Big Bill Broonzy, John Lee Hooker, Mississippi John Hurt, Lightnin’ Hopkins, and Leadbelly but it has also been approached from a jazz perspective by Jelly Roll Morton and Jimmy Witherspoon among others, and it was a 1942 hit for singer Bea Booze.

The folk/blues revival of the 1960s placed “C. C. Rider” as a recurring presence in the set lists of many mainstream artists of the day. Folk revivalist Dave Van Ronk’s version closely imitates Ma Rainey’s original version, whereas Eric Burdon and the Animals’ electric version shares a recurring phrase on the keyboard similar to the guitar phrasings used by Blind Lemon Jefferson in his “Corrina Blues” as well as his “Easy Rider.” Of the versions to come out of this era, the ubiquitous nature of this song in the live sets of the Grateful Dead throughout their career will ensure its continued appreciation. The broad appeal of the Grateful Dead as a popular musical group that consistently explores different genres of music will no doubt guarantee further interpretations of “C. C. Rider” by countless musicians of all styles in the future.

BRYAN GROVE

Bibliography

- Calt, Stephan. Booklet accompanying Blind Lemon Jefferson: King of the Country Blues (Yazoo CD 1069).
Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Delta, 1995.

Discography

- Gertrude “Ma” Rainey. Red Hot Musicians (1895–1930).
<http://www.redhotjazz.com/rainey.html>

CEE-JAY

Record label (New York, 1960–1961). Owners: Clarence Edward Johnson (“Jack Raggs”) (b. July 12, 1910, Baltimore, MD; d. October 26, 1961, Bronx, NY); Joe Evans. Artists recorded include Betty James (“I’m a Little Mixed Up,” covered by Sue Foley, Koko Taylor), Jimmy Spruill, and Sherman Williams. Clarence Edward Johnson was a musician and songwriter and had worked with Tiny Bradshaw (cowriting “Jerry Bounce” and “Salt Lake City Bounce”) and with Danny Robinson’s Everlast and Holiday labels.

ROBERT EAGLE

Discography: McGrath

CELESTE

Record label (California, 1963–1965). Owners: Sherman Leo Coleman (b. November 6, 1916, MO; d. April 4, 1987, Alameda County, CA); Anne Coleman, Ezekiel “Zeke” Strong (b. October 19, 1921, Isabella, OK; d. May 8, 2003, Phoenix, AZ). This Los Angeles, California–based label’s artists include Ray Agee, Ronnie Brown, Carter Brothers (“Just Consider Yourself Baby”), Perry Dancy, Mary Ann Miles, Carl Underwood, and Zeke Strong. Based on Bob Eagle’s interviews with Ray Agee, the label was a successor of Kick Off Records, and saxophonist Zeke Strong may have only been a producer (of Ray Agee). During the same time, Agee issued many of his own records on his Krafton label. The Carter Brothers single was leased from Morris Lee “Duke” Coleman’s Coleman Label.

ROBERT EAGLE

Discography: McGrath

CEPHAS, JOHN

b. 4 September 1930; Washington, DC

Guitarist proficient in Piedmont and Bentonia, Mississippi, styles. Since 1977 he has performed with harmonica player Phil Wiggins.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Richard Skelly); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Pearson, Barry Lee. “Bowling Green John Cephas and Harmonica Phil Wiggins: D.C. Country Blues.” Living Blues no. 63 (January/February 1985): 14–20.

Discography: AMG

CHAMBLEE, EDWARD LEON “EDDIE”

b. 24 February 1920; Atlanta, GA
d. 1 May 1999; New York, NY

Tenor saxophonist Eddie Chamblee shared a barrack with Jimmy Cheatham and Chico Hamilton during World War II service in a segregated Army band. After the war, Chamblee played with Lionel Hampton's band, and in the late 1950s backed and was married to singer Dinah Washington. Until his death, he most often led his own small combos featuring his impassioned jump-blues playing.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn); Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: AMG; Lord

Selected Recordings

As bandleader: Dinah Washington Sings Bessie Smith (1958, EmArcy MG 36130).
Chamblee Music (1960, Mercury 60127).

CHAMPION (INDIANA)

Record label introduced in September 1925 by the Starr Piano Company of Richmond, Indiana, as a lower-priced alternative to its Gennett label, costing thirty-five cents rather than seventy-five cents. Most of the catalog comprised pseudonymous issues of recordings also available on Gennett, with many Race items, including performances by Lottie Beaman (as Lottie Everson), Jay Bird Coleman (as Rabbits Foot Williams), Sam Collins (as Jim Foster), Cow Cow Davenport (as George Hamilton), and Georgia Tom (as Smokehouse Charley). Champion records remained in production after issue of Gennett ceased in December 1930, and subsequent records by such artists as Scrapper Blackwell, Georgia Tom, and Irene Scruggs used their real names. Only a few sessions were held after mid-1932 and operations ceased in December 1934.

On June 28, 1935, the Champion name was sold to Decca with rights to some Gennett recordings, resulting in a Champion 50000 Race series, which ran to seventy-eight issues, including some newly recorded material, notably by Scrapper Blackwell, as well as reissues from both Gennett and Paramount, the latter including 1932 recordings by the Mississippi Sheiks. Bumble Bee Slim had both new recordings and reissues from Paramount in the series under the pseudonym Shelley Armstrong. This venture lasted only until April 1936.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR; Sutton
Blacker, George. "Parade of Champions, 1925–1930." Record Research nos. 169/170 (January 1980): 4.

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

Wyler, Michael. "A Glimpse of the Past, 11: Champion." Storyville no. 20 (1968), 69.

CHAMPION (TENNESSEE)

Record label (Tennessee, 1958–1959). Owners: Alan Bubis (b. 1910; IL); Reynold Bubis (b. December 5, 1918, TN; d. January 13, 1996, Pompano Beach, FL); Theodore (Ted) Jarrett (b. October 17, 1925; Nashville, TN). Nashville, Tennessee-based, one of the Bubis cousins (Alan) and African American musician, singer, and songwriter Ted Jarrett had worked together at Tennessee Records. Artists included Gene Allison, Jimmy Beck, Larry Birdsong, Fairfield Four, Earl Gaines, Al Garner (aka Murfreesboro), and Christine Kittrell.

ROBERT EAGLE

Discography: McGrath

CHANCE

Chicago rhythm and blues label of the early 1950s. Chance was one of the pioneer independent labels to record the new African American sounds that swept the city in the postwar years, namely, the electrified Mississippi blues and the doo-wop harmony groups. The label also recorded a little jazz, gospel, and pop. Chance was begun in 1950, and a subsidiary, Sabre, was added in 1952. The company was owned by Art Sheridan, who was the principal producer and A&R person. An associate, Ewart Abner Jr., was originally the company's administrator, but gradually became involved in working with the artists.

The company released records on a plethora of blues artists, prominently John Lee Hooker, Home-sick James, J. B. Hutto, Lazy Bill Lucas, and Big Boy Spires on Chance, and Tampa Red (recording as the Jimmy Eager Trio) and Willie Nix on Sabre. Some blues artists were recorded independently by producer Joe Brown, who also owned the JOB label. Chance also recorded such famed doo-wop groups as the Flamingos, Moonglows, Five Echoes, Five Chances, and Five Blue Notes. After Sheridan closed down Chance in late 1954, Abner joined Vee-Jay Records as general manager.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert, Armen Büttner, and Robert L. Campbell. "The Chance Label." Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/chance.html> (accessed June 8, 2003).

Discography: McGrathCHANDLER, GENE

b. Eugene Dixon, 6 July 1937; Chicago, IL

Chicago soul singer of the 1960s and 1970s. Chandler rarely recorded any songs approaching blues, but his 1964 hit, "Soul Hootenanny," was a derivation of Jimmy Reed's "Big Boss Man." Plus, the aching intensity he gave such songs as "Rainbow" reached the emotional depths of blues. Chandler made his first recordings as the lead singer of a doo-wop group, the Dukays of "Nite Owl" fame. The Dukays recorded the million-selling "Duke of Earl," which was picked up by Vee-Jay, who released the record under the name "Gene Chandler," thus launching the singer's solo career. His glorious voice was subsequently put to terrific use on a host of great ballads, most of which were written by Curtis Mayfield and produced by Carl Davis, notably "Rainbow" (1962, Vee-Jay), "Man's Temptation" (1963, Vee-Jay), "Just Be True" (1964, Constellation), "Nothing Can Stop Me" (1965, Constellation), and "Girl Don't Care" (1967, Brunswick), among many others. In 1970, Chandler hit with the million-selling "Groovy Situation" (Mercury). During the disco era, he hit with "Get Down" (1978, Chi-Sound). His last chart record was in 1986. Chandler operated his own label, Mr. Chand, from 1969 to 1973. The singer performed at the 1994 Chicago Blues Festival.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. "Gene Chandler." Goldmine (January 1980): 13–17.

CHARITY, PERNELL

b. 20 November 1920; Waverley, VA

d. 12 April 1979; Waverley, VA

Essentially a local musician, guitarist Charity blended diverse influences from phonograph records into a personal style of Piedmont blues. His eclectic and entertaining approach can be appreciated in his 1972 and 1975 recordings for Trix, which include the original composition "War Blues."

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Lornell, Kip. Notes to Pernell Charity: The Virginian (1975, Trix Records 3309).

———. "Down in Virginia: Sam Jones & Pernell Charity." Living Blues no. 13 (Summer 1973): 25–27.

See also Fuller, Blind Boy; Hopkins, Sam "Lightnin'"

CHARLES FORD BAND, THE

From Ukiah, California, the all-white Charles Ford Band played together for only one year, recording one album before their breakup in 1972. Three members were brothers: Robben (b. 1951; guitar, vocals, sax), Patrick (b. 1949; drums), and Mark (b. 1953; harp, vocals). Their bassist was Stan Poplin (b. 1952). The band was named to honor the brothers' father, Charles Ford, an amateur country musician. Pat and Robben had played for harpist Charlie Musselwhite in the San Francisco electric blues scene until 1971 when they left to form their own band.

Their album, The Charles Ford Band, was actually recorded at the request of Arhoolie after the group disbanded. It showcases Robben and Mark, revealing the influence of Paul Butterfield in its use of harmonica. Two songs are Robben originals, and the band honors predecessors such as Albert King, covering his "Wild Woman." The album is also characterized by Robben's clear, tenor vocals and relatively clean guitar style.

In 1982, the group reunited for a new album. Subsequent versions of the band (with variations in line-up) have recorded under several names: the Ford Blues Band, Robben Ford and the Ford Blues Band, and Mark Ford and the Robben Ford Band. Mark and Robben went on to play for musicians such as Muddy Waters, Miles Davis, Albert King, John Lee Hooker, Joni Mitchell, and George Harrison. Patrick founded Blue Rock'it Records in the early 1980s and has released work by Charlie Musselwhite, Brownie McGhee, and various incarnations of the Charles Ford Band.

OLIVIA CARTER MATHER

Discography

The Charles Ford Band (1972, Arhoolie LP 4005).

A Reunion Live (Blue Rock'it 101).

As Real as it Gets (Blue Rock'it 124).

CHARLES, RAY

b. Ray Charles Robinson, 23 September 1930; Albany, GA

d. 10 June 2004; Beverly Hills, CA

Singer and pianist. Charles grew up in Florida and went blind at age seven from untreated glaucoma. He absorbed a wide range of music as a child, including blues, jazz, “Race music” (rhythm and blues), country and western, and gospel in church. All played an important role in his development and mature music.

Charles began playing piano at three, took lessons in clarinet and piano, and learned to read and write music in Braille at St. Augustine School for the Blind. He formed his first group in 1945, adopted the stage name of Ray Charles, played in jazz trios, and met Quincy Jones in Seattle. He recorded for Swingtime (1950–1952), Atlantic (1952–1959), then ABC-Paramount. He toured with Lowell Fulson and worked with Guitar Slim. Hits from 1954 were in the rhythm and blues style; his first LP release was in 1956. Charles recruited the vocal group the Raelettes in 1957, and they became a signature part of his sound as rhythm and blues transmuted into soul.

Charles made important jazz recordings with Milt Jackson on Soul Brothers (1958) and Soul Meeting (1959), and The Genius of Ray Charles, with arrangements by Quincy Jones. Major charts hits included “Georgia on My Mind” (1959) and “What’d I Say?” (1959). He began touring Europe in 1960, and became established as an international pop star. Charles kicked a career-threatening drug addiction in the mid-1960s.

His major influence in popular music lay in the development of soul, a style Charles saw as rooted in a combination of gospel and blues, but he continued to record often uneven albums in many styles, including blues, jazz, country, and pop. A passionate singer and gifted pianist, he also composed and arranged using Braille.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Charles, Ray, and David Ritz. Brother Ray. New York: Dial, 1978.

Lydon, Michael. Ray Charles: Man and Music. New York: Riverhead, 1998.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

The Great Ray Charles (1956, Atlantic 1259).

The Genius After Hours (1957, Atlantic 1369).

Ray Charles at Newport (1958, Atlantic 1289).

The Genius of Ray Charles (1959, Atlantic 1312).

The Genius Sings the Blues (1961, Atlantic 8052).

Genius + Soul = Jazz (1961, Impulse! AS-2).

Ingredients in a Recipe for Soul (1963, ABC 465).

CHARLES, ROCKIE

b. Charles Merick, 14 November 1942; Boothville, LA

Singer, songwriter, guitarist, bassist, producer. Rockie Charles, “The President of Soul,” introduced his deeply personal sound on his own Soulgate label in the 1960s, worked as a tugboat captain, then returned in the 1990s as an avatar of Southern Soul. Charles worked with Little Johnny Taylor, Percy Sledge, O. V. Wright, and Otis Redding.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Rockie Charles website, <http://home.att.net/~jlroberts/rc/rhome.html> (accessed November 11, 2004).

Discography: AMG

CHARLY

Record label founded in 1977 in London to reissue American blues, R&B, and rockabilly records, and its first releases focused on the recordings of Sun Records. During the next two decades, Charly would release hundreds of compilation LPs and CDs on the main label as well as on the Charly R&B, Classics, Gospel, and Lejazz specialty labels. Among blues performers, Charly released dozens of well-packaged compilations for John Lee Hooker, the Yardbirds, Albert King, Jimmy Reed, and Sonny Boy Williamson (II). In 1986, MCA bought the Chess Records catalog from Sugar Hill Records. Because Charly believed that MCA did not hold the legal rights to the Chess masters in Great Britain, they continued to reissue Chess recordings, and MCA brought suit in 1993. In April 1996, MCA won their suit in the British courts, as they would in the U.S. courts one year later, and the fines incurred by Charly effectively bankrupted the label.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

Holland, Bill. “MCA Is Victor in Supreme Court Refusal to Hear Charly Case.” Billboard no. 109 (October 18, 1997): 5, 97.

Pride, Dominic. “MCA Scores Victory in U.K. Case over Rights to Chess Masters.” Billboard no. 108 (May 4, 1996): 8, 93.

CHART

Record label (Florida, 1955–1957). Owner: Henry David Stone (b. June 3, 1921; Bronx, NY). Artists include Rufus Beacham, Elder Beck (“Rock and Roll Sermon”), David Brooks, Roy Gaines (“Loud Mouth Lucy”), Wilbert Harrison, John Lee Hooker (“Wobbling Baby”), Lightnin’ Hopkins (“Walkin’ the Streets,”), Sonny Thompson (“Juke Joint”), TNT Tribble (“T. N. T.”), and Jimmy Wilson (“Alley Blues”).

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

- Kochakian, Dan. “The Henry Stone Story” [part 1]. Blues and Rhythm no. 171 (August 2002): 14; [part 2]. Blues and Rhythm no. 172 (September 2002): 12.
- Stone, Bob. “The House That Stone Built. . . : An Interview with Henry Stone.” Blue Flame nos. 17/18 (1972).
- Topping, Ray. “Henry Stone: The Rockin’ and Chart Story.” Juke Blues no. 33 (1995): 27.

Discography: McGrath

CHARTERS, SAMUEL BARCLAY

b. 1 August 1929; Pittsburgh, PA

The 1959 publication of Samuel Barclay Charters’ book The Country Blues is widely viewed as marking the beginning of the “blues revival”; it brought mainstream attention to older blues traditions and inspired many future researchers.

Charters, a musician, poet, novelist, filmmaker, and record producer, was born in Pittsburgh in 1929 and was introduced to jazz and blues as a child through musicians in his family. In 1945 the family moved to Sacramento, California, and in 1948 he began performing in Bay Area traditional jazz groups.

In 1950 Charters first visited New Orleans to study with George Lewis, and returned to the city in 1953 following service in the Army. Encouraged by veteran jazz researcher Frederic Ramsey, Charters began recording jazz and blues artists in 1955. The following year Folkways Records began issuing his recordings, including the five-volume jazz series Music of New Orleans. His first book was Jazz, New Orleans, 1885–1863 (Belleville, NJ: Walter C. Allen, 1958). He later wrote, together with Leonard Kunstadt, Jazz: A History of the New York Scene (New York: Doubleday and Co., 1962).

Charters’ first blues productions were the 1957 Folkways albums Blind Willie Johnson: His Story Told and American Skiffle Bands, which featured the Mobile Strugglers, Gus Cannon, Will Shade, and Charlie Burse. In 1958 Charters and his future wife Ann (Danberg) discovered the Bahamian guitarist Joseph Spence on Andros Island; the trip is documented in his book The Day Is So Long and the Wages

So Small: Music on a Summer Island (New York: Marion Boyars Publishers, 2002).

A companion LP to The Country Blues (New York: Rinehart & Company, 1959) was issued on Folkways’ RBF reissue label, for which Charters produced about twenty albums; he also recorded new Folkways albums by Lightnin’ Hopkins, Furry Lewis, and others. The 1964 anthology One String Blues was first issued on his own Portents label.

Poetry of the Blues (New York: Oak Publications, 1963) is an anthology of blues lyrics, while The Bluesmen: The Story and the Music of the Men Who Made the Blues (New York: Music Sales, 1967) examines traditions in Mississippi, Alabama, and Texas. It was complemented by Sweet As the Showers of Rain: The Bluesmen Part II (New York: Oak Publications, 1977), which addresses Memphis, Atlanta, and the East Coast; the books were reissued together as The Blues Makers (New York: DaCapo, 1991).

A 1961 recording trip for Prestige Records yielded albums by Furry Lewis, Memphis Willie B. (Borum), Baby Tate, and Pink Anderson. On a separate trip the following year he documented these artists for his film The Blues (1962). In 1963 he was hired by Prestige as an A&R representative, and oversaw the Bluesville and Folklore series. He recorded for the label as part of the True Endeavor Jug Band and (with Artie Traum) the duet The New Strangers.

Charters’ Prestige recordings of Homesick James, Billy Boy Arnold, and Otis Spann were some of the first electric blues releases aimed at the revival market. He continued in this vein as an independent producer for Vanguard with the influential three-volume anthology Chicago: The Blues Today as well as solo albums by Buddy Guy, Junior Wells, James Cotton, and Charlie Musselwhite. He also produced rock albums for Vanguard, notably by Country Joe and the Fish.

In the early 1970s Charters moved to Sweden, where he worked as a producer for Sonet. The twelve-volume series “Legacy of Blues” resulted in a similarly titled book (London: Calder & Boyars Ltd., 1975) and Charters’ other productions included a series of Cajun and zydeco albums, including seven by Rockin’ Dopsie and Clifton Chenier’s Grammy Award winner I’m Here. In the 1980s Charters returned to Folkways Records as a producer, and cofounded the Gazell label, which he still runs.

Robert Johnson (New York: Music Sales Corporation, 1972) is a songbook with an essay that extends Charters’ writings on Johnson from The Country Blues and The Bluesmen, while The Roots of the Blues: An African Search (New York: Marion Boyars Publishers, 1981) draws on Charters’ visits to West Africa in the mid-1970s; in 1983 it received the ASCAP-Deems Taylor Award.

Blues Faces: A Portrait of the Blues (New York: Marion Boyars Publishers, 2000) collects photos by Charters and his wife Ann and recollections about his musical career, while Walking a Blues Road (New York: Marion Boyars Publishers, 2004) collects his blues writing over fifty years. He continues to supervise and annotate many CD reissues of his previous productions.

In 2000 he and his wife, a noted literary scholar, established The Samuel and Ann Charters Archives of Blues and Vernacular African American Music at the University of Connecticut's Thomas J. Dodd Research Center.

SCOTT BARRETTA

CHATMAN, PETER

(See Memphis Slim)

CHATMON, SAM

b. 10 January 1899; Bolton, MS

d. 2 February 1983; Hollandale, MS

Birth year also given as 1897. Sam Chatmon was a member of the celebrated Chatmon family, who lived just outside the small town of Bolton, Mississippi. His parents, Henderson and Eliza Chatmon, reportedly had thirteen children together, eleven of whom were sons who all played musical instruments. Around 1910, seven of them formed a family string band that would later develop into the Mississippi Sheiks. From an early age, Sam played with the band, primarily on the bass (though he mainly played the guitar later in his career). In 1928, after the seven-piece band had broken up, Sam and some of his brothers relocated to the Delta town of Hollandale, Mississippi.

Sam's first recordings were made on June 9, 1930, as an accompanist for "Texas" Alexander. The following day, he recorded with the Mississippi Sheiks at the group's second session for OKeh Records. As a recording group between 1930 and 1935, the Sheiks chiefly consisted of Sam's brother Lonnie Chatmon and Walter Vinson, though Sam and his brother Armenter "Bo" Chatmon (who also had a successful solo career as Bo Carter) occasionally joined them on their recording dates. The group's personnel for live performances was more loose knit, however, and it is likely that Sam frequently joined the group at their appearances at picnics, dances, and parties. In 1936, Sam and Lonnie made twelve recordings (ten of which were issued) for Bluebird as the Chatman [sic] Brothers. Soon thereafter, the family band dissolved, and Sam did not record again for twenty-four years.

During that time, he mostly worked outside music—reportedly as a farmer, a night watchman, and a plantation supervisor—and lived in Hollandale and Arcola, Mississippi.

In 1960, Chris Strachwitz rediscovered Sam in Hollandale and recorded him, and four of the songs recorded were included on the Arhoolie LP I Have to Paint My Face. In 1966, he was rediscovered again by blues enthusiast Ken Swerilas, who persuaded Sam to travel with him to San Diego. There, Sam began playing in clubs and became a local favorite. He soon began performing around the country at various folk festivals and clubs and achieved considerable fame as one of the few surviving first-generation Mississippi bluesmen. Sam's newly found popularity led to his recording a few LPs in the 1960s and 1970s. His wide-ranging repertoire on these recordings included blues, rags, minstrel tunes, and popular songs. Until the end of his life, Sam divided his time between touring and living in Hollandale, where he still worked odd jobs from time to time. He made his last professional appearance at the 1982 Mississippi Delta Blues Festival.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

- Lornell, Kip. "Sam Chatmon." Jazz Journal no. 25 (June 1972): 18.
 Obrecht, Jas. "Sam Chatmon: The Last of the Mississippi Sheiks." Blues Revue no. 15 (Winter 1994/1995): 35–39.
 O'Neal, Jim. "Sam Chatmon." Living Blues no. 56 (Spring 1983): 38.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

- The Mississippi Sheik* (1972, Blue Goose BG 2600).
The New Mississippi Sheiks (1972, Rounder 2004).
Sam Chatmon's Advice (1979, Rounder 2018).
Sam Chatmon & His Barbecue Boys (1981, Flying Fish 202).

CHAVIS, BOOZOO

b. Wilson Anthony Chavis, 23 October 1930; Church Point, LA

d. 5 May 2001; Austin, TX

Zydeco king Boozoo Chavis learned accordion from his father, who along with Joe Jackson, Potato Sam, and Henry Martin, played the Creole dance halls in the Lake Charles area of Louisiana. He recorded the single "Paper in My Shoe," an update of a two-centuries-old New Orleans standard, in 1954. It became the first zydeco song to become a regional hit. The single fared well nationwide, but Chavis was paid little for his work, which led to a bad opinion of the record business. He recorded sporadically after that, and left playing music professionally to breed and race quarter horses. In 1984 he staged a comeback with his three sons comprising the Majic [sic] Sounds as his backing band. Their sound in comparison to the more polished zydeco of the period is raw and primitive. He recorded four albums through the 1980s on various labels, all available through Rounder.

CHAVIS, BOOZOO

JOHN OTIS

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli
Hannusch, Jeff. "Boozoo Chavis" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 159 (September/October 2001): 85–86.

Discography: LSFP

CHEATHAM, JIMMY AND JEANNIE

Jeannie Cheatham (née Jean Evans; pianist, vocalist)

b. 14 August 1927; Akron, OH

James R. "Jimmy" Cheatham (trombonist, bass-trombonist)

b. 18 June 1924; Birmingham, AL

Married in late 1950s. Jean Evans had worked with Jimmy Colvin and Jimmy Cheatham with many jazz ensembles. In 1972, both took academic posts at the University of Wisconsin, Madison, where they hosted a weekly jam session. Jeannie Cheatham worked occasionally as an accompanist to Big Mama Thornton. They moved to San Diego in 1977, continuing the jam sessions, which in 1983 spawned their Sweet Baby Blues Band, featuring Jeannie's blues singing alongside elements of jump/R&B, blues, swing, and traditional jazz. Contributors to their records from Sweet Baby Blues (1984, Concord Jazz CJ258) to Gud Nuz Blues (1995, Concord Jazz CCD4690) included Gatemouth Brown, Papa John Creech Curtis Peagler, Ricky Woodard, Hank Crawford, Plas Johnson, Jimmie Noone, Jr., and Clora Bryant.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

New Grove Jazz
Trageser, Jim. "Sweet Baby Blues: Jeannie and Jimmy Cheatham." Living Blues no. 93 (September/October 1990): 11.

CHECKER

(See Chess/Aristocrat/Checker/Argo/Cadet)

CHEEKS, REVEREND JULIUS

b. 7 August 1929; Spartanburg, SC

d. 27 January 1981; Miami, FL

The definitive "hard gospel" singer, roaring baritone Cheeks went briefly with the Soul Stirrers before rejoining the Sensational Nightingales in the early 1950s to reel off a string of gospel classics on the Peacock label.

JIM THOMAS

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Discography: AMG (Jason Ankeny)

CHENIER, C. J.

b. 28 September 1957; Port Arthur, TX

Accordionist, singer. After playing piano, saxophone, and flute at Texas Southern University and working in an R&B cover band, dynastic zydeco star Chenier got the call in 1978 to replace saxophonist John Hart in his father's classic group, The Red Hot Louisiana Band. Once Chenier served his apprenticeship he moved to accordion and ultimately inherited his father's band in 1987, enlarging its audience and appeal from its zydeco purist base with roots-oriented pop and blues material. Clifton Chenier may have invented the music, but his son, who also recorded with Paul Simon on "Rhythm of the Saints," contributed to its evolution by significantly modernizing zydeco without sacrificing its basic sensibilities.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin Barker, Sunny Slim. "You'd Catch Pure Natural Hell: C. J. Chenier." Living Blues no. 98 (July/August 1991): 30–33.

CHENIER, CLEVELAND

b. 16 May 1921; Opelousas, LA

d. 7 May 1991; Lafayette, LA

Performing R&B with his younger brother, Clifton, the Cheniers switched to zydeco in the early 1960s. Acknowledged as the King of the Rub Board, he is considered to be the first to strap the instrument on his chest as is common practice today.

JIM THOMAS

CHENIER, CLIFTON

b. 25 June 1925; near Opelousas, LA

d. 12 December 1987; Lafayette, LA

One of the innovative and best-known zydeco musicians. Born the son of sharecroppers in Acadiana, Chenier learned to play the accordion from his father, Joseph. The Chenier family included many musicians who regularly played at local dance halls, but Clifton also drew inspiration from the recordings of Amadie Ardoin, the pioneer Creole blues accordionist, and jump-blues master Louis Jordan. Chenier's brother Cleveland learned to play the froittoir, a washboard played to provide a rhythmic accompaniment. The brothers began playing dances in southwestern Louisiana during the 1940s. By the early 1950s his reputation had spread into southeast Texas, and Chenier began the process of transforming the older accordion-based Creole music into a driving, bluesy style that would be christened zydeco. The word itself derives from the title of one of Chenier's most popular pieces "Les Haricots Sont Pas Sale," meaning "the beans aren't salty."

Through the efforts of Clarence "Bon Ton" Garlow, Chenier came to the attention of the Los Angeles-based producer J. R. Fulbright. In 1954 Chenier recorded his first session at a radio station in Lake Charles. The titles were released on the Elko and Post labels. Fulbright eventually got Chenier's records to Specialty and with that label he had his first substantial hit, "Ay Tete Fee," in 1955. Chenier's newfound popularity took him to the rhythm and blues circuit where he performed with such artists as B. B. King, Ray Charles, and Big Joe Turner. After two sessions with Specialty, Chenier moved to the Chess label. During this period his music took a decided rhythm and blues feel, perhaps the result of his touring experience. This fusion of the Creole accordion style with rhythm and blues helped define the burgeoning zydeco sound. Chenier also adopted the piano accordion as his primary instrument as opposed to the smaller diatonic (or 'tit noir) accordion favored among rural Creole and Cajun artists. The music was both bluesy and propulsive, with an intensity accentuated by the power of the piano accordion. Chenier developed a national popularity and toured extensively. In 1955 he toured with a very young Etta James and served as her legal guardian on the road. During the 1950s he released singles on the Argo and Checker labels.

The emergence of rock 'n' roll dimmed Chenier's national career and by 1960 he was firmly back in Louisiana. He recorded for J. D. Miller's Crowley-based Zynn label in the late 1950s, but produced no significant hits. His career stalled until Lightnin' Hopkins (who had married Chenier's cousin) introduced Chris Strachwitz to the zydeco master. Strachwitz offered Chenier a recording contract with Arhoolie, thus beginning one of the most productive and rewarding careers in zydeco music. In 1964 Chenier cut his first record for Arhoolie. The resulting single, "Ay Ai Ai," restarted his career. Chenier deeply appreciated Strachwitz's unfailing promotion of his career.

Chenier began to tour Europe in the late 1960s and in 1969 performed at the American Folk Blues Festival in Germany. During the 1970s he kept up a hectic touring and recording schedule. Chenier became a popular regular at such festivals as the Montreaux Jazz and Pop Festival, the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival, and the Berkeley Folk Festival. He released albums on the Arhoolie, Bayou, Jin, Maison de Soul, and other labels. He recorded several live performances that come close to capturing the intensity of a live Chenier show. Chenier was equally at home playing traditional Creole tune and blues, but he developed a strong affinity for R&B-tinged dance music. He took to wearing a crown on stage and proclaimed himself to be the "King of Zydeco." In 1983 Chenier won a Grammy for his I'm Here album (Alligator 4729), and the following year he played for President Reagan at the White House. He also received a National Heritage Fellowship, awarded by the National Endowment of the Arts.

His last years found Chenier plagued by numerous health problems. His kidneys weakened, he developed diabetes, and then lost part of a foot. Still the "King of Zydeco" insisted on performing, though his touring was hampered by his need for dialysis. On December 12, 1987, Chenier died at Lafayette Memorial Hospital.

There would be little exaggeration in the statement that Clifton Chenier transformed the Creole music of southwest Louisiana. He found it a decidedly rural sound rooted in the house party music (called "la la") of the late nineteenth century and infused it with a propulsive rhythm and blues power. His music reflected a period of growing contact with the world outside of Acadiana and the old Creole ability to adapt to changes and still retain basic elements of the culture. He also brought a sense of outrageous style to the scene, a strutting confidence, and a deep, beautiful musical spirit.

KEVIN S. FONTENOT

Bibliography

- Ancelet, Barry Jean. Cajun and Creole Music Makers. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999. (Originally published 1984.)
- Clifton Chenier: The King of Zydeco* (Arhoolie Video ARV 401).
- Olivier, Rick, and Ben Sandmel. Zydeco!. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999.
- Tisserand, Michael. The Kingdom of Zydeco. New York: Arcade Publishing, 1998.

Discography: LSFP

- Louisiana Blues and Zydeco* (Arhoolie CD 329).
- Zydeco Dynamite: The Clifton Chenier Anthology* (Rhino CD R2 71194).
- Zydeco Sont Pas Sale* (Arhoolie CD 9001).

CHENIER, MORRIS “BIG”

- b. 1929; Opelousas, LA
- d. 1978; perhaps Lake Charles, LA

Morris was the uncle of late Zydeco King Clifton Chenier. He played guitar on Clifton’s first recordings in 1954 and on his own Goldband recordings from 1957 to 1960, including “Let Me Hold Your Hand.” Although mainly a guitar player, he was most well known for his bluesy fiddle playing on Clifton’s “Black Gal,” a massive regional hit from 1966 to 1967 and other songs recorded at the same sessions for Arhoolie Records.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

- “Morris Chenier” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 39 (July/August 1978): 58.
- Tisserand, Michael. The Kingdom of Zydeco. New York: Arcade Publishing, 1998.

Discography: LSFP

See also Arhoolie/Blues Classics/Folk Lyric; Chenier, Clifton; Goldband Records

CHENIER, ROSCOE

- b. 6 November 1941; Notleyville, LA

Second cousin of Clifton Chenier. Singer and guitarist in R&B and soul, active mostly in southern Louisiana. Recorded a single with guitarist Lonesome Sundown for the Reynard label in 1963, and made his first album in 1993.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Alex Henderson)

Discography: AMG; LSFP

CHESS/ARISTOCRAT/CHECKER/ARGO/CADET

Leonard and Phil Chess, two Polish immigrants to America, were an unlikely duo to run a successful record company. In the right place at the right time—postwar Chicago—it nonetheless took the right stuff to turn Chess Records into a blues powerhouse: instinct, determination, and a common touch.

Chess was the successor to Aristocrat Records, a small independent formed in 1947 by Evelyn and Charles Aron. Aristocrat’s first records featured a white band led by Sherman Hayes doing such novelty tunes as “Get on the Ball Paul.” It was moving into the “race” market—recording black artists for a black audience—when it came to Leonard’s attention. He was operating a popular after-hours club on bustling Cottage Grove Avenue, the Macomba Lounge, whose mainstay was saxophonist Tom Archia. Leonard got interested in making records when a producer wanted to record Andrew Tibbs, who occasionally sang at the club. Leonard got in touch with the Arons and helped make Tibbs’s first record, “Bilbo is Dead”/“Union Man Blues.” In October 1947 Leonard became an Aristocrat salesman and assumed more responsibility after the Arons divorced. Used to Archia’s jump-blues, Leonard did not understand the spare, intense music made by Muddy Waters, a talented guitar player brought to Aristocrat by piano player Sunnyland Slim. But as soon as she heard “I Can’t Be Satisfied,” Evelyn appreciated its power. When Aristocrat finally released it, “I Can’t Be Satisfied” was a success, and Leonard realized there was a market for this new kind of music.

By the end of 1949 Leonard had bought out Evelyn. Muddy Waters continued to record tunes in the mold of his first hit, such as “Rollin’ Stone,” which inspired the Rolling Stones, but he chafed to record with a bigger band. Leonard finally relented and let him bring harmonica wizard Little Walter and a drummer into the studio. He had also moved the tiny Aristocrat office to larger quarters, and Phil officially joined the enterprise early in 1950. The brothers closed the Macomba later in the year after a fire.

In the meantime, Leonard’s friend, Buster Williams, a record presser in Memphis, suggested that Aristocrat be renamed after the family. The first Chess record was released in June 1950, not Muddy Waters but the saxophonist Gene Ammons doing “My Foolish Heart.” It was Chess 1425 for the family’s first American address, 1425 South Karlov in Chicago.

Sam Philips, an independent producer and another Memphian, gave Chess its first national hit when he sent “Rocket 88,” a fast-paced tune about the pleasures of a new car, to Chess. Philips also sent the Chess brothers another bluesman, “Howlin’ Wolf,” whose real name was Chester Burnett. His “Moanin’ at Midnight” and “How Many More Years” were immediate classics.

Leonard and Phil moved again in 1951 to larger quarters on Cottage Grove and created a new subsidiary, Checker Records. Their first Checker hit was Little Walter’s “Juke,” which was the break tune for Muddy Waters’s band. Leonard also found his right-hand man for blues, bass player Willie Dixon, who wrote songs and ran sessions. His most successful collaboration came in 1954 with Muddy Waters and “Hoochie Coochie Man.” It was a good omen for the brothers, who moved again, to 4750 South Cottage Grove.

Though neither Chess brother had any musical training, their regular sales trips to the South and East gave them a feel for the music and an appreciation for the next new thing. When Ellas McDaniel—soon rechristened Bo Diddley—walked into 4750 with his high-energy demo tape, Phil knew it was special. The next day Leonard listened, and within two months Bo Diddley and his song “Bo Diddley” were national hits.

A few months later, Chuck Berry, a guitar player from St. Louis, came to see Leonard at Waters’s suggestion. His demo tape, renamed “Maybellene,” was sent to influential disc jockey Alan Freed, and by September 1955 the record topped the R&B charts.

Fueled by their continuing success, the Chess brothers bought the building at 2120 South Michigan in 1957 and turned it into the Chess Producing Corporation. During the next nine years, it was home to legends: Waters, Wolf, Walter, Bo Diddley, Berry, Etta James (the label’s major female star whose hits included “At Last” and “Something’s Got a Hold On Me”), Little Milton, Fontella Bass (who sang “Rescue Me”), and Koko Taylor and her classic “Wang Dang Doodle.” Though synonymous with blues, the label branched out to jazz; Ahmad Jamal and Ramsey Lewis recorded their hits for the Argo subsidiary in the storied second-floor studio.

In 1963 Leonard and Phil bought a local radio station, renamed it WVON—Voice of the Negro—and turned it into the first station to broadcast news to and for Chicago’s black community twenty-four hours a day. When he sensed the product was lagging, Leonard made a deal with producers in Muscle Shoals, Alabama. Among the hits to emerge were James’s “I’d Rather Go Blind” and “Tell Mama.”

Musicians said they loved the freewheeling atmosphere at Chess. “We was all right—like family,”

James said. But Leonard and Phil were not immune to charges that they cheated their artists. Phil and Marshall Chess, Leonard’s son, disputed those claims. Howlin’ Wolf, Muddy Waters, and Willie Dixon all sued Arc Music, the publishing arm, alleging they were defrauded of royalties. Confidential settlements were reached. The publishing rights to Wolf’s music stayed with Arc; as copyright renewals for Waters and Dixon came up, Arc returned their songs to them.

Leonard died unexpectedly in 1969, two years after moving into a big new studio on east 21st Street and just after he sold the company to General Recorded Tape. GRT ran the company poorly, and by the mid-1970s, the label, which had changed hands again, was barely in existence. The music experienced a resurgence after 1987, when Universal Music, which gained control of the catalogue, began reissuing the Chess canon.

NADINE COHODAS

Bibliography

- Cohodas, Nadine. Spinning Blues into Gold—The Chess Brothers and the Legendary Chess Records. New York: St. Martins, 2000.
- Dixon, Willie, with Don Snowden. I Am the Blues. New York: Da Capo Press, 1989.
- Glover, Tony, Scott Dirks, and Ward Gaines. Blues with a Feeling—The Little Walter Story. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Gordon, Robert. Can’t Be Satisfied—The Life and Times of Muddy Waters. New York: Little Brown and Company, 2002.
- Tooze, Sandra. Muddy Waters—The Mojo Man. Toronto: ECW Press, 1997.

Discography: McGrath

- Michel Ruppli. The Chess Labels: A Discography (1983, Greenwood).

CHICAGO

While Chicago is commonly known—especially among hometown blues fans—as “The Blues Capitol of the World,” it’s no secret that the music for which the city is famous has usually been imported fresh from the rural South. In the early years of the twentieth century, as blacks from throughout the southern states attempted to escape the oppressive conditions that still resonated with the not-so-distant echoes of slavery, many looked directly north. The urban centers of the north offered the promise of relatively lucrative industrial jobs as a respite from the back-breaking field labor of the agricultural South, as well as access to better educational and housing opportunities, and at least a marginal escape from the institutionalized racism that was then still rampant in the former Confederacy. For most, the quickest and easiest route was straight north; consequently, many thousands of those leaving the Mississippi Delta region ended up in Chicago, just as those leaving the southeastern states migrated directly north to New York, Washington, Philadelphia, and so forth.

However, the history of African Americans in Chicago goes back to the city's very earliest roots, to a time before Chicago existed. In the late 1700s, the very first permanent settler in what would later become a sprawling city of some six million inhabitants was a black man from Haiti named Jean-Baptiste DuSable. The enterprising and successful DuSable set up the area's first trading post, and his importance in the region is commemorated by a large high school and an African American history museum on Chicago's South Side.

By Civil War times Chicago had a small black population, primarily former slaves who had moved north. After the war the city's black population slowly but steadily grew; as the biggest city in the home state of the "great emancipator" Abraham Lincoln, Chicago was a not-impossibly-distant beacon of hope for blacks looking northward. Chicago's 1893 "Columbian Exposition" World's Fair served as a forum for pioneering civil rights addresses and activities by the great black orator Frederick Douglass and activist Ida Wells, among others. By 1902 there were enough black musicians working in Chicago that the very first black musicians union in the nation, Local 208 of the American Federation of Musicians, was organized. The Chicago Defender, for many years the nation's largest and most widely distributed black-owned newspaper, began publishing in 1905. Widely distributed in the South, the Defender as much as any other source helped popularize Chicago as a desirable northern destination for African Americans in the South. The years between 1910 and 1920 have been referred to as the era of "The Great Migration," as Southern blacks moved northward by the thousands to escape the oppressive conditions of the South. Between the Civil War and the dawn of the "Chicago Blues" era in the early 1920s, these events helped spread the word throughout the rural South that Chicago was a desirable destination for southern blacks seeking something better.

By the late 1920s, Chicago hosted a large enough black population to support a vibrant black "downtown" on Chicago's South Side, boasting most of the same types of businesses and amenities found in Chicago's white business districts. While the promise of a better life went unfulfilled in many ways—poverty, deplorable housing conditions, and all of the associated problems were rampant—for many it was still at least a marginal improvement over the grinding hopelessness left behind.

One of the by-products of the newly acquired relative affluence was a bustling music scene, and for a large number of these newcomers, the music of choice was the blues. Many musicians who found themselves in Chicago picked up just where they'd left off—solo guitar pickers plied the streets for tips, piano players worked taverns and house-rent parties, and other more ambitious musicians put together small bands and sought work in local nightclubs. Before long a great cross-pollination of styles and repertoires was taking place, as musicians who had been widely dispersed throughout Mississippi, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Louisiana were suddenly concentrated together in the same general neighborhoods, living within walking distance of each other and vying for the same gigs. Not only were musicians now exposed to regional blues styles to which they may have had at most limited access while down south, but they were also being influenced by other, more urbane genres of music—jazz, dance bands, and pop balladeers. Thanks to the sheer concentration of people, a musical osmosis was taking place at an accelerated pace, and the wide and varied sounds of what became known as "Chicago Blues" began to be heard. But rather than any single style or sound, Chicago Blues might be likened to a pool of sounds, into which various tributaries, many of which originated in the Mississippi Delta region, have continually emptied, year after year, musical trend after musical trend.

One consequence of the convergence of the various musicians and styles was the standardization of musical structures and timing. A bedrock element of the blues has always been the vocals, and stylistically there may have been little difference between those singing blues in Chicago and their peers down south. But musicians who were accustomed to working solo—backing their singing with only their own instrumental accompaniment—had often followed their own irregular patterns when it came to bar lengths, chord changes, and song structure. Being exposed to and playing with a wide variety of other musicians forced many of the idiosyncrasies to be smoothed out for the sake of more cohesive ensemble playing. Blues ensembles developed wherein instrumentalists found their own space within increasingly elaborate—if often improvisational—song arrangements. Although in the early years some artists continued to perform solo, the developing Chicago Blues sound was based on an ensemble sound, and the increasingly sophisticated use of instruments that had been (and continued to be) played by blues artists in the Mississippi Delta region. But whether used in an ensemble setting or solo, the primary instruments to be heard were piano and guitar, although it wasn't long before harmonicas, washboards, and even horns were heard both live and on record.

One of the early southern blues artists to make a large if short-lived impact on the burgeoning Chicago blues scene was, oddly enough, not a guitarist or pianist, but a banjo player, Papa Charlie Jackson, whose 1925 recording, "Maxwell Street Blues," sounded a call to action for many southern blacks who were considering the move north. (For most of the twentieth century, Maxwell Street was a bustling neighborhood bazaar, and the first stop for immigrants to Chicago from all over the world, providing a place for newly arrived musicians of all types to earn a little spending money by busking on the streets, and also an opportunity to hook up with other like-minded individuals. Many generations of blues musicians first played in Chicago on Maxwell Street, until the city closed the market down in 1994.) Jackson was also an early mentor to guitarist Big Bill Broonzy; after arriving in Chicago in the 1920s, Broonzy quickly established himself as not only a hugely talented and prolific artist, but also a patriarch over the Chicago Blues scene for next three decades. Guitarist and New Orleans native Lonnie Johnson was not far behind chronologically or musically; with his sophisticated and complex single-string flat picking, he went on to establish a standard for both blues and jazz guitarists that has seldom been equaled. Guitarist Tampa Red (Hudson Whittaker) was a prolific and influential recording artist beginning in the late 1920s, and introduced not only several standards to the Chicago blues lexicon ("It Hurts Me Too," "Black Angel Blues," aka "Sweet Black Angel," "Don't You Lie to Me," and "Love Her with a Feeling," among others), but also inspired countless blues guitarists with his beautifully fluid slide guitar style. Memphis Minnie Douglas (later Lawlers), despite her name, made Chicago her home beginning in the early 1930s; widely recognized as the equal of any of the men just mentioned in both musicianship and popularity, her rhythmically swinging guitar work, often backed by one of her series of guitar-playing husbands, provided a clear blueprint to succeeding generations of Chicago blues guitarists.

Maxwell Street, Chicago, in June 2001. Whether in chic clubs, on festival stages, in local taverns, or on sidewalks, the blues still thrives in Chicago. (Photo by Gene Tomko)

Early important pianists on the Chicago scene included much-traveled Clarence “Pine Top” Smith, whose “Pine Top’s Boogie Woogie” has been covered countless times down through the years, including Tommy Dorsey’s massive hit with a big band arrangement of it in the late 1930s. (Unfortunately Smith did not live to reap any of the rewards of his influence—he died after being hit by a stray bullet in a Chicago dance hall in 1929, after making only a handful of recordings.) Not to be confused with the white bandleader just mentioned, pianist “Georgia Tom” Dorsey teamed up with the aforementioned Tampa Red, and enjoyed great commercial success in the late 1920s and early 1930s with a series of mildly ribald recordings such as “It’s Tight Like That” and “Let Me Play with Your Poodle,” establishing what became known as the “hokum” blues style. While not extensively recorded, in the 1940s Big Maceo Merriwether’s powerful piano style established him as one of the cornerstones of the scene until ill health took its toll in the late 1940s; his influence was to be felt for years afterward through his disciples Johnny Jones and Otis Spann. Mention must also be made of Sunnyland Slim (Albert Luandrew); although he didn’t arrive in Chicago until the early 1940s, and may not have left much of a stylistic imprint on piano players who followed, he recorded prolifically as a leader and a sideman in Chicago for half a century, and also helped to facilitate some very important musical events, among them the first professional sessions by future blues icon Muddy Waters. In spite of the economic depression of the 1930s, blues as a business was slowly but steadily developing. With a wealth of talent available, and more arriving every day to both make and buy records, a few large record companies were regularly recording in Chicago. Brunswick, RCA Victor/Bluebird, Columbia, and others set up offices and studios, and with the influence of professional A&R men and producers (such as Lester Melrose at Bluebird), certain subcategories and signature sounds began emerging. Particularly notable was the “Bluebird sound,” typified by tight, smooth, small band arrangements that often included piano, bass, drums, and often clarinet or saxophone. Depending on the situation, to this basic backing mix was added a guitarist/singer such as Broonzy or Tampa Red, a harmonica player/singer such as John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson or Jazz Gillum, or even washboard player/singer Washboard Sam (Robert Brown). While the general sameness of the backing sound would eventually wear thin with blues fans, it remained one of the most popular sounds in Chicago Blues for the better part of a decade, until what came to be known as the “Post-War” sound exploded onto the scene.

World War II had brought an influx of industrial jobs, and the blues migration from the South to Chicago continued at a rapid pace. After the war, but before integration, there existed large segments of Chicago’s south and west sides that supported bustling and vibrant entertainment strips catering almost exclusively to Chicago’s newly prosperous black population. Also added to the mix was new technology; although electronic amplifiers for music and voice had existed for at least a decade before the war broke out, industrial advances brought about by the war put these amplifiers within the reach of even semi-pro musicians, and this new equipment was quickly seized on by those who sought to create a new, “modern” sound. As the decade of the 1940s waned, the acoustic guitars and pianos of the prewar years were being cast aside, and electronically amplified guitars (and before long, amplified harmonicas) began dominating the center of the Chicago blues stage. Harmonica pioneer John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson had dominated the blues harmonica genre for a decade, but his violent death in 1948, as much as any other event, signaled the end of the “old” styles of blues and the coming of a new era in Chicago. The somewhat polite “Bluebird sound” was replaced by a louder and more raucous blues sound utilizing electronic amplification, which allowed a three- or four-piece combo to shake the back walls of the club in a way that only a big band with a large horn section could have a few years earlier.

Muddy Waters (McKinley Morganfield), a Mississippi native who had migrated to Chicago in the mid-1940s, was one of the first to break through commercially with the new sound. Essentially rooted in the solo singer/guitarist style of influential fellow Mississippian Robert Johnson (who had died in 1938), Muddy’s keening, whining slide guitar took on a quality when amplified that struck a chord with homesick southern transplants; it was a familiar sound, but also new and different, to suit the modern times and faster pace of the big city lifestyle. Muddy’s recordings of “I Can’t Be Satisfied,” “I Feel Like Going Home,” “Mean Red Spider,” and others from 1948 and 1949 broke ground for his long reign at the pinnacle of the Chicago blues scene, and also helped to establish the label for which he recorded, Chess Records (formerly Aristocrat), as the preeminent Chicago Blues label. Although his early recording success was with stripped-down guitar-and-vocals arrangements, soon Muddy had surrounded himself with the very best accompanists available—the fiery, swinging Little Walter Jacobs on harmonica, Jimmy Rogers on second guitar, and Otis Spann on piano, all of whom would go on to their own successful solo careers (as would many others who would populate Muddy’s bands in the years that followed). In the wake of Muddy's success, gravel-voiced bluesman Howlin' Wolf (Chester Burnett) eventually made the move north from Memphis, where he'd already begun a successful recording career. Wolf's unique sound was a combination of feral intensity and pounding musical arrangements, melded with the relatively sophisticated guitar work of Willie Johnson and, later, Hubert Sumlin. Wolf and Muddy recorded for the same label, and throughout their careers cultivated the same audience, ultimately (if somewhat uneasily) sharing the crown of King of Chicago Blues for the rest of their careers.

Although the migration of southern blacks seeking industrial jobs may have slowed somewhat in the postwar years, the musical migration continued unabated, as blues musicians were drawn to Chicago by the vibrant live music scene and the many independent record companies, led by Chess. Countless labels sprang up to dip into the brimming talent pool, some existing only long enough to issue a handful of sides by neighborhood talent, others like United and States, JOB, Cobra and Abco, and the mighty Vee-Jay sticking it out long enough to make inroads into the national music charts, and capture some of the most vibrant music of the era. Vee-Jay in particular enjoyed a long and successful run after establishing itself with a string of hits by Mississippi transplant Jimmy Reed. Cobra was only in business for a handful of years in the late 1950s, but somehow found a way to change the sound of modern blues by recording a triumvirate of future guitar legends at the very beginnings of their careers. Otis Rush, Magic Sam (Samuel Maghett), and George "Buddy" Guy came to personify what would become known as the "West Side sound"—although in reality this appellation had more to do with the location of the record company than where the artists lived or performed. These three young bluesmen shared a modern, forward-thinking approach to the music—and their instruments—that put the guitar front and center once and for all in modern blues. Influenced as much by Memphis-based B. B. King and Los Angeles resident-by-way-of-Texas T-Bone Walker as they were by the big names in Chicago, these three took the energy level and emotional expressiveness of their instruments to the next level. For the first time, the guitar solo was becoming as important as the vocals in communicating the blues, a development that continues to reverberate in the music to this day.

By the early 1960s musical tastes among urban blacks—many of whom now had no personal connection to the South—were evolving away from blues played by people who had made the migration to Chicago in the immediate postwar years. This development paralleled an increasing interest among young white music fans for something earthier and more emotionally direct than what the radio Top 40 was offering them. Not only did rebellious young white fans start actively seeking out blues music in Chicago's black communities, but before long some of these fans actually started performing it, sitting in with the veterans who were playing in local clubs, and in some instances even forming their own bands. One of the earliest and most notable of these was harmonica player and singer Paul Butterfield, whose recordings would influence and empower generations of like-minded blues fans and musicians who followed. Butterfield's blues was essentially a revved-up version of the music that had dominated Chicago's blues clubs a generation earlier—music that was by then passé for many young black fans, but exciting and new to their white counterparts. The rock 'n' roll dynamics added to the blues mix by Butterfield and those of his ilk created just the sound to draw in a new generation of blues fans, and for the first time the music moved out of the ghetto and into rock clubs and college auditoriums.

At the same time, large numbers of journeyman black blues players continued to work mainly in their own neighborhoods in Chicago. Some of them retained small but loyal local followings there, while others—guitarists Buddy Guy and Otis Rush, and harp players Junior Wells and James Cotton among them—were able to follow Muddy and Wolf across the racial divide and find considerable success playing colleges, rock clubs, and concert halls both across the United States and abroad. However, the 1960s and 1970s were slow times for blues in general, as all but a handful of "name" acts gradually faded from the spotlight, and retreated either to the neighborhood clubs on the south and west sides of the city or retired from performing altogether. The veteran acts that continued to work locally into the 1970s found themselves incorporating more R&B, soul, and even disco elements into their music in efforts to reach a younger black audience, and the few new artists to come on the scene were influenced as much by Motown and Stax as they were by the now-defunct Chess and Vee-Jay.

By the end of the 1970s a modest Chicago Blues revival was beginning to gather momentum, supported mainly by the younger white fans. Several blues clubs catering to this audience had opened on the north side of city, far from the south and west side ghettos, and those old-timers who were still willing and able began performing the old songs for a new audience. These clubs created opportunities for many of the younger blues acts as well, and local blues record labels like Delmark and Alligator were providing recordings of young acts and veterans alike to the growing fan base. In 1983 the city of Chicago put its official stamp of approval on the burgeoning blues revival by organizing the first annual Chicago

Blues Festival. Sadly, many of the icons from the heyday of Chicago Blues in the 1950s were gone—Little Walter had died in 1968, Jimmy Reed and Howlin' Wolf both died in the mid-1970s, and Muddy passed away just weeks before the first festival—but there was still plenty of local talent left to spotlight in front of the large festival audience. This annual festival has grown into the largest blues festival and, in fact, the largest free music festival of any kind, in the world, providing much needed exposure for obscure local talent as well as showcasing the biggest names in blues, drawing annual audiences in the hundreds of thousands from around the world.

In the 1980s and 1990s, the Chicago Blues Festival, along with non-Chicago occurrences such as the huge crossover success of Robert Cray and the ascendancy to superstar status of blues-rock guitarist Stevie Ray Vaughan, combined to help draw attention to Chicago's importance as a center of the blues universe, in the process giving the local scene a shot in the arm and bringing the music closer to the mainstream. Blues was still being played in a few south and west side clubs, but as these neighborhoods became more dangerous and the local blues fans who inhabited them grew older, fewer were willing to venture out for a night of live music. Consequently, there were fewer venues for live blues, fewer local acts to play them, and fewer reasons for young African Americans interested in music to even consider playing any form of blues. At the same time the number of blues venues outside the traditional south and west side homes of the music continued to increase, providing opportunities for those few Chicago blues artists who chose to follow their predecessors down the traditional path. Consequently, many of the blues artists who live and learned their craft on Chicago's south and west sides no longer actually play there—their professional musical activities are confined to the north side “tourist clubs” and work on the road.

The days of blues “hit records” ended by the late 1960s, and consequently the big labels long ago abandoned the Chicago Blues scene. But into the 1990s, locals like Delmark and Alligator continued a regular schedule of releases, Delmark in particular scouring the Chicago scene for new and unrecorded blues talent. And much like the “Bluebird sound” of fifty years earlier, an “Alligator sound” became an influential cornerstone of the Chicago Blues sound—hard-driving beats, searing guitar work, and high energy being the order of the day, both on records and in clubs, although by the 1980s an increasing percentage of Alligator artists were not actually Chicago based.

The current Chicago Blues scene may be seen as being polarized into two segments: the larger tourist blues scene, with almost a dozen clubs in the downtown and near-north side tourist areas offering live blues full time, featuring the best full-time local talent the city has to offer, such as Magic Slim and the Teardrops, Son Seals, Koko Taylor, and others mixed in with national touring acts; and the small, almost off-the-radar local blues scene in the ghetto clubs of the south and west sides. This handful of small clubs and taverns features almost exclusively neighborhood, part-time performers, who seldom venture into the north side and downtown tourist clubs. Even though the music played by these last local holdouts may at times sound only loosely related to that of their musical forebears, in many ways it is closer in spirit—and certainly closer in lineage—than the music played to large audiences just a few miles away. It's in the small handful of south and west side venues that the blues of Chicago is still a vehicle for dialogue between the blues player and his immediate audience, as it has been since the music first arrived in Chicago. In the early years of the twenty-first century, Chicago Blues in all its various forms and fashions continues to be heard in clubs and concert halls across the city and around the world. Both as a reminiscence of days and styles gone by, and as a living, breathing tradition, Chicago Blues continues to offer musical and personal inspiration for music fans around the world.

Bibliography

- Harris; Santelli
 David, Francis. The History of the Blues. New York: Hyperion, 1995.
 Library of Congress. African American Mosaic: Chicago: Destination for the Great Migration. <http://www.loc.gov/exhibits/african/afam011.html> (accessed September 23, 2004).
 Oliver, Paul, ed. The Blackwell Guide to Blues Records. Oxford: Blackwell, 1989; revised 1991.
 ———. The Story of the Blues. London: Rock Barrie; Philadelphia: Chilton, 1969.
 Rowe, Mike. Chicago Breakdown. London: Eddison, 1973; reprinted as Chicago Blues: The City and the Music. New York: Da Capo, 1981.

CHIEF/PROFILE/AGE

Series of related Chicago blues labels of the late 1950s and early 1960s. Their owner, Mel London (1932–1975), began in the business as a songwriter and an owner of a music publishing company (Melva), which provided an entrée into the operation of record labels. In its years of operation—from 1957 to 1960—Chief put out nearly forty releases, producing some of the best blues artists that Chicago had to offer: Elmore James, Junior Wells, G. L. Crockett (as Davey Crockett), Magic Sam, Otis Rush, Earl Hooker, and Lillian Offitt. The label also issued a few vocal groups and a rock 'n' roll artist, Tobin Matthews (who hit with "Ruby Duby Du"). Profile, in its much shorter history from 1960 to 1961, released fifteen records, notably records by Junior Wells, the imprint's only blues artist (his "Little By Little" was a national hit in 1960). Profile is better appreciated by followers of country and rockabilly for its output by Mickey Hawks, Bobby Dean, and Hayden Thompson. Age, with about twenty-five releases from 1961 to 1963, was notable for its output by Ricky Allen, A. C. Reed, Big Moose Walker, and Earl Hooker. London achieved a national hit on Age with Allen's "Cut You A-Loose" (1963). After Age collapsed, London remained in the record business producing and releasing records on Paul Glass's USA label. In the 1970s, there were a handful of releases on his All Points, Mel, and Mel-Lon imprints, but most were reissues of Chief/Profile/Age recordings.

London was a songwriter of some note, having written "Cut You A-Loose," "Messing with the Kid," and "Little by Little" (for Junior Wells), "The Twelve Year Old Boy" (for Elmore James), and "Will My Man Be Home Tonight" (for Lillian Offitt). After the collapse of his record business, London worked as a clerk and driver for United Record Distributors.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Turner, Bez. "Mel London's Labels." Blues Unlimited no. 125 (July/August 1977): 13–15.

Discography: McGrath

CHITLIN CIRCUIT

Chitterling, chitling, chitlin—small intestines of pigs trimmed of fat, scrupulously cleaned, and either boiled or fried—the most distinctive and classic example of Southern African American soul cooking—was also the name for the circuit of small venues in the postwar era South that featured live R&B music. While today "Chitlin circuit" is used to describe a variety of locations (biker bars, comedy clubs, and small theaters dedicated to African American productions), the original usage referred specifically to small southern clubs, night spots, cafes, resorts, warehouses, dance halls, and roadside joints.

For a decade after World War II (until the mid-1950s), American popular music was almost as segregated as southern lunch counters. Black performers singing in black styles for a black audience were not played on white radio stations and did not appear on television. But there was, especially in the Deep South, a lively African American, self-contained rhythm and blues culture. The social system of segregation in the South generated opportunities for African Americans engaged in the business of black music, enabling, Nelson George says, "blacks to form businesses and profit from a product their own people created."

Legendary Birmingham, Alabama, radio personality Shelley "The Playboy" Stewart remembers that chitlin circuit venues were black owned and often managed by a man and wife. There was always a shot-house near by, he says, always a hotel or rooming place. Food was served, and on one special day of the week—usually Friday, Saturday, or Sunday—chitlins.

Venues like the Night Life Club, Stardust, Elk's Rest Club, Grand Terrace Ballroom, and Madison Night Spot provided the opportunity for local residents to see and hear, in the only available manner, African American performers who were national celebrities in black America. In addition, by all accounts the musical culture of the period was always more integrated than the existing laws permitted. White adults sneaked into the clubs, and white teens set up listening posts outside.

Charles Sawyer suggests that a "self-sustaining career" for a black musician performing black music for a black audience during this period required personal appearances to give the artist "long-term exposure to audiences who dependably patronized his music." The fact that the careers of R&B performers of the period were constricted by a "built-in ceiling" that was, at the time, "beamed at the lower economic strata of black American society" made personal appearances for blacks even more important than for white performers, who could be heard on the radio and seen on television.

Evelyn Johnson, who established the Buffalo Booking Agency in Houston in association with Don D. Robey's Peacock Records, believes the term "chitlin circuit" was coined by "the Eastern establishment" to describe her operation—a circuit of small clubs, dance halls, and juke joints designed to get Peacock acts personal appearances before a wider audience and create a demand for Peacock Records in a wider market.

Eventually, Buffalo Booking put together as many as three hundred forty one-nighters a year for popular performers (Johnny Ace in 1954 and B. B. King in 1956). The chitlin circuit was "a ruthless pacemaker," Sawyer says. "Successive one-night stands were often eight hundred miles apart. Days might pass before the pace allowed a night's rest in a hotel: play five hours, dismantle the bandstand, load the bus, ride fifteen hours on the nod, set up the bandstand, play five hours, dismantle the bandstand, and so on." B. B. King remembers Johnson describing these long drives as “just right up the street.” The pace of road performances was driven by venue requirements, as Johnson recalls. “You could only get Friday, Saturday, and Sunday in the small towns.”

Club Ebony, Indianola, Mississippi. This blues club was a famed stop on the chitlin circuit. Pictured here in 2004, the club dates back to the mid-1940s. (Photo by Gene Tomko)

The humiliation and inconvenience of Jim Crow segregation laws and practices were hard on black musicians traveling as a group through the postwar Deep South. Overnight accommodations were limited, and laws regulating food service and bathroom facilities wore people down on a daily basis. (King learned to negotiate for food before filling the 150-gallon gas tank on his bus.) The occasional booking at the Apollo, Regal, and Howard theaters in the urban northeast or Billy Berg’s 5-4 Ballroom in Los Angeles were a heavenly reprieve for the musicians, making those accommodations different enough to be outside of what was commonly called the chitlin circuit.

JAMES M. SALEM

Bibliography

- Broven, John. Rhythm & Blues in New Orleans. Gretna, LA: Pelican Publishing, 1988.
 George, Nelson. The Death of Rhythm & Blues. New York: Penguin Books, 1988; reprinted by Plume, 1988.

Salem, James M. The Late Great Johnny Ace and the Transition from R&B to Rock 'n Roll. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1999.

Sawyer, Charles. The Arrival of B. B. King: The Authorized Biography. New York: Doubleday, 1980.

CHRISTIAN, CHARLIE

b. 29 July 1916; Dallas, TX

d. 2 March 1942; New York, NY

Guitarist. One of the twentieth century’s most enduring and influential guitar innovators, Christian died of tuberculosis at age twenty-five, having created a quantum leap in sonic sensibilities in his short and seminal career. The original icon of the electric guitar began his career as a pianist in Oklahoma before becoming a student in 1937 of amplified guitar inventor Eddie Durham. Christian was discovered by talent scout John Hammond and joined the Benny Goodman Sextet in 1939 where he introduced an exciting new role and sound for jazz guitar. Christian experimented with even more adventurous jazz giants, such as Thelonious Monk and Dizzy Gillespie, in jam sessions, but his death prevented the potential of those collaborations from being fully explored.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: Lord

CHRISTIAN, JOHNNY “LITTLE”

b. 19 August 1936; Cleveland, MS

d. 27 January 1993; Chicago, IL

Christian arrived in Chicago in 1951 as a gospel singer, and had a term with the Highway QCs from 1957 to 1961. He then learned bass guitar, and through the 1960s he played behind Otis Rush and Jimmy Dawkins. From the 1970s until his death, he led his own bands, recording several small-label singles and two CDs for the Big Boy label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: Larkin

CHUDD, LEWIS ROBERT “LEW”

b. 1 July 1911; Toronto, Canada

d. 15 June 1998; Los Angeles, CA

Chudd founded Imperial Records in 1946 in Los Angeles, California. Initially, the label concentrated on local Spanish-language artists but soon expanded into country and western and rhythm and blues. In 1949, Chudd hired bandleader Dave Bartholomew as a talent scout and producer. Bartholomew focused on the growing rhythm and blues scene in New Orleans and recorded a local pianist, Fats Domino. Domino was the most important artist on Imperial and had an impressive string of hits that appeared on both the pop and rhythm and blues charts from 1950 until 1963. Domino's band, led by Bartholomew, featured many musicians who would also back up other artists such as Little Richard who came to New Orleans to record. The band at one time or another consisted of bassist Frank Fields, drummer Earl Palmer, and saxophonists Clarence Ford, Lee Allen, and Alvin “Red” Tyler.

Other R&B and blues artists who recorded for Imperial were T-Bone Walker, Smiley Lewis, Lil' Son Jackson, Slim Harpo, Roy Brown, Earl King, Snooks Eaglin, Tommy Ridgley, Bobby Mitchell, Sugarboy Crawford, Big Jay McNeely, Joe Turner, Archibald, Jewel King, and Chuck and Chick Carbo, who were members of the Spiders. In 1958, Imperial was one of the first labels to issue stereo albums. Some of the most popular songs in the Imperial catalogue were “The Fat Man,” “Ain't That a Shame,” and “I Hear You Knockin'.” In 1961, Lew Chudd bought the Aladdin Records catalog and reissued many of the Aladdin masters on Imperial. In 1963, Chudd purchased the Minit label of New Orleans. In 1964, he sold Imperial to Liberty Records.

TOM MORGAN

Bibliography

Broven, John. Rhythm and Blues in New Orleans. Gretna, LA: Pelican Publishing, 1983.

CHURCH, EUGENE

b. 23 January 1938; St. Louis, MO

d. 16 April 1993; Los Angeles, CA

R&B vocalist. Recorded with Jesse Belvin as the Cliques for Modern, then solo for Specialty, Class (hits with “Pretty Girls Everywhere” and “Miami”), Rendezvous, King (hit with “Mind Your Own Business”), and Liberty. Church retired from music but returned in 1985, recording for his own Church and Slick labels.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Slaven, Neil. “Beauty and the Blues—The Eugene Church Story.” Blues and Rhythm no. 73 (October 1992): 6–8.

See also Belvin, Jesse

CINCINNATI

While the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, does not have an indigenous blues style, it is notable for a large degree of blues activity since the 1920s. Cincinnati likely does not possess its own particular blues style because, being neither a southern city where African American slaves were originally transplanted from Africa nor an urban area where migrants from one particular section of the South relocated (as with the Mississippi to Chicago migration), it did not draw on one particular blues style and transform it in the urban setting. Nonetheless, Ohio River traffic as well as the B&O, C&O, and Cincinnati Southern railroads brought African Americans, including slaves seeking to escape from slave states like neighboring Kentucky to a free state, into the community in abundance.

The major African American community where blues was performed in the 1920s was the West End, where individual blues performers, jug bands, and larger units played on streets such as Court, Cutter, George, or Sixth, or at joints and clubs such as Mom's, the Bucket of Blood, or, later, the Cotton Club. The patriarch of the scene was Sam Jones, "Stovepipe No. 1," a songster whose recordings from 1924 to 1930 include folk songs, spirituals, blues, and hokum in solo and jug and string band group settings. Those recordings include a variety of references to Cincinnati landmarks, as do the recordings of Bob Coleman and Walter Coleman. Those two were likely brothers who recorded under various pseudonyms—Kid Cole, Sweet Papa Tadpole, Walter Cole, and Kid Coley among them, as well as with the Cincinnati Jug Band—between the years 1928 and 1936. Their recordings reflect at times a Memphis jug band-type sensibility and, especially in the Walter Coleman recordings, a lilting, southeastern blues ragtime influence. Particularly Walter's "Going to Cincinnati" paints a picture of a raucous community, one that also was purportedly the birthplace of Mamie Smith, hosted performers such as Walter Davis, Jesse James, Clara Burston, and Leroy Carr, and was mentioned in songs such as Ivy Smith's "Cincinnati Southern Blues."

While a number of these performers, and other unrecorded artists such as "Baby Ruth," continued performing on the streets as late as the 1960s, by August 1944, when Syd Nathan's King Records incorporated the brash new rhythm and blues of the coming postwar era, major and soon-to-be-major artists such as Lonnie Johnson, Wynonie Harris, Roy Brown, Tiny Bradshaw, and Freddy King were being drawn to the city to record for what would become the major independent R&B label in the country, backed by such local session men as Philip Paul, Ed Conley, and Ray Felder. H-Bomb Ferguson, who had recorded earlier for such labels as Derby and Savoy, eventually moved to Cincinnati and recorded for King, remaining in the city and recording and performing to this day.

Other longtime residents who have been on the scene since the 1920s and 1930s, such as James Mays, Pigeon Jarrett, and Big Joe Duskin, were "rediscovered" in the 1970s and have had successful performance and/or recording careers. The major contemporary blues performer was Albert Washington, whose blues, gospel, and soul recordings for Fraternity, Jewel, Eastbound, and other labels marked him as a major talent. Today the Cincinnati scene is still active, with a Greater Cincinnati Blues Society that assists in promoting the interests of Cincinnati blues and its performers.

STEVEN C. TRACY

Bibliography

Tracy, Steven C. Going to Cincinnati: A History of the Blues in the Queen City. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.

Discography

H-Bomb Ferguson. Wiggin' Out (1993, Earwig 4926).
Big Joe Duskin. Cincinnati Stomp (1995, Arhoolie 422).
Albert Washington. Blues and Soul Man (1999, Ace 727).
Cincinnati Blues (2001, Catfish 186).
The King R&B Box Set (n.d., King 7002).

C.J.

Record label (Chicago, Illinois, 1956–1985). C.J. Records was owned by Carl Jones (1913–1985) and was essentially a boutique operation run from his home. He was a musician (banjo and trumpet) in the 1930s, and in 1945 he recorded two sides for Mercury. In 1956 Jones founded the C.J. label, eventually followed by subsidiary imprints Colt and Firma. Although he recorded some country and some gospel, the bulk of his output was in the blues field, having recorded Earl Hooker, Mack Simmons, Hound Dog Taylor, Homesick James, Betty Everett, and Detroit Junior. Jones's record company had no distribution during its last two decades of existence. His nine-to-five job was in the liquor distribution business and Sundays he worked as a bartender at the famed South Side blues bar, Theresa's.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Baker, Cary. "Carl Jones—Surviving Chicago Blues Indie: The C.J. Records Story." Goldmine (March 1982).

Discography: McGrath

CLAPTON, ERIC

b. 30 March 1945; Ripley, Surrey, United Kingdom

Aka Eric Patrick Clapp. Clapton was born to Patricia Molly Clapton and Edward Fryer and raised by Patricia's mother and stepfather, Jack and Rose Clapp. At age sixteen he enrolled at the Kingston College of Art where he was dismissed after one year. His 1979 marriage to Pattie Boyd Harrison ended in divorce in 1988; in 2002 he married Melia McEnery. Clapton's children include three daughters, Ruth Patricia (b. January 1985), Julie Rose (b. June 2001), and Ella Mae (Born January 2003), and a son, Conor (deceased—b. August 1986).

Clapton's career has taken many directions, yet he never forgets the blues, the music that inspired him in his youth. He has recorded many traditional blues songs and written his own as well. He offers an intense, yet fluid guitar style, which originated as he emulated the works of his heroes Robert Johnson, Freddie King, and others. Today, Clapton inspires younger generations, serving as a connection between traditional blues and people who have not been exposed to it.

Introduced to rock 'n' roll in the late 1950s, Clapton soon discovered and became obsessed with the blues. The year 1963 brought his first band, the Roosters, and they covered songs by Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, and others. After their breakup and a brief stint with another band, he joined the Yardbirds, whose manager nicknamed Clapton "Slowhand," in tribute to his lightning speed solos. By May 1964, his reputation brought him work as a session musician on recordings by blues pianist Otis Spann. Soon the Yardbirds shifted from traditional blues-based songs toward a pop sound, something the soon departing Clapton disagreed with intensely.

In 1965 John Mayall asked Clapton to join the Bluesbreakers and soon the phrase "Clapton is God" began appearing on London's subway walls. When recording, Clapton insisted on turning his amplifier up to its maximum volume to retain the distortion and sustain of live performances. The resulting album, John Mayall's Bluesbreakers with Eric Clapton, remains a classic, with Clapton's confident, fat-toned guitar jumping out at the listener. He left the band, becoming part of Cream before the album was released. Cream recorded several blues songs, including Robert Johnson's "Cross Road Blues," which Clapton renamed "Crossroads." Strong personalities and the stress of constant work doomed Cream. Blind Faith was his next band, formed in 1969 with Steve Winwood; they broke up after one album and tour.

After touring with Delaney and Bonnie and Friends, he recorded Eric Clapton, his first solo album. A departure from his previous work, he was now writing and singing his own songs, including "Blues Power." While working on this project he contributed his guitar playing to The London Howling Wolf Sessions. Clapton's next band, Derek and the Dominos, was joined in the studio by Duane Allman of the Allman Brothers Band. Layla and Other Assorted Love Songs was a statement of Clapton's love for George Harrison's wife Pattie. The album included Clapton's "Bell Bottom Blues," and a cover of "Key to the Highway." In 1971 the group disbanded while recording their second album, with drug use rumored to be a factor.

After struggling with heroin addiction for nearly three years, Clapton reappeared in 1974, releasing several albums over the next decade or so. While each contained some blues, he explored other musical styles, downplaying his role as guitar deity. After recovering from alcohol addiction in the early 1980s, a strong appearance at Live Aid in 1985 signaled a return to form. In 1987 Clapton began a series of annual concerts at the Royal Albert Hall, including nights of blues-only performances. Album highlights of the 1980s included his career-spanning Crossroads and Journeyman, which included a collaboration with Robert Cray.

The deaths of Stevie Ray Vaughn and then of his son just months afterward in 1991 were tragic for Clapton. He resumed his career with the Rush soundtrack, which included a ballad written for his son, "Tears in Heaven," a song that was also featured in his MTV Unplugged appearance and the subsequent album that won six Grammy Awards. From The Cradle (1994) consisted of blues covers, recorded live in the studio, with minimal overdubs. The album won a Grammy in 1995 for Best Traditional Blues Album. Riding with the King (2000), recorded with B. B. King, covered four of King's songs, as well as songs by Big Bill Broonzy and Maceo Merriweather.

By recording and performing the blues, and by discussing the importance of the blues and its original performers, Clapton keeps the music in the public eye, helping to create new generations of blues fans.

JOHN J. THOMAS

Bibliography

- Coleman, Ray. Clapton! An Authorized Biography. New York: Warner Books, 1985.
 Roberty, Marc. Slowhand: The Life and Music of Eric Clapton. New York: Crown Trade Paperbacks, 1993.
 Schumacher, Michael. Crossroads: The Life and Music of Eric Clapton. New York: Hyperion, 1995.

Discography

- Five Live Yardbirds* (1964); Sonny Boy Williamson and the Yardbirds (1965); Fresh Cream (1966, Atco 33-206); John Mayall's Bluesbreakers with Eric Clapton (1966, London 492); Disraeli Gears (1967, Atco 33-232); Wheels of Fire (1968, Atco 700); Blind Faith (1969, Atco 33-304); Goodbye (1969, Atco 7001); Eric Clapton (1970, Atco 33-329); Layla and Other Assorted Love Songs (1970, Atco 704); E. C. Was Here (1975, RSO 4809); Just One Night (1980, RSO 3039); Crossroads (1988, Polydor 835 261); Journeyman (1989, Reprise 9 26074-2); 24 Nights (1991, Reprise 26420); Unplugged (1992, Reprise 9 45074-2); From the Cradle (1994, Reprise 9 45735-2); Riding with the King (2000, Reprise 9 47612-2).

CLARK, "BIG" SAM

CLARK, "BIG" SAM

b. 1 July 1916; Glover, MS

d. 6 August 1981; Little Rock, AR

Memphis pianist remembered in part for his persistence in securing club performances. In addition to a contribution to the 1971 Adelphi LP anthology Memphis Blues Again, he released several singles and albums on his Big Sam label for sale in the United States and Europe.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Evans, David. "Big Sam Clark 1916–1981." Living Blues no. 52 (Spring 1982): 57.

Discography: LSFP

CLARK, DAVE

b. 6 March 1909; Jackson, TN

d. 22 July 1995; Madison, MS

Songwriter, musician, and pioneering record promoter. Clark is considered the first African American record promoter and one of the earliest American record promoters of any race. His methods and philosophies for getting records on the radio, which included clever strategies, endless travel to radio stations throughout the United States, and relationships with small record stores and secondary radio markets, all continue to serve as the model for record promotion of undiscovered musicians today. Clark also composed more than sixty songs and cowrote "Why I Sing the Blues" (1969) and "Chains and Things" (1970) with B. B. King.

Clark grew up primarily in Chicago, where he studied violin and piano as a child and performed with traveling minstrel shows. Clark graduated from Lane College in Jackson, Tennessee, in 1934 and the Julliard Conservatory of Music in 1939. Between his studies at Lane and Julliard, Clark began writing a jazz column for Downbeat magazine called "Swing Row Is My Beat" and worked as a song plugger, selling sheet music—including his own compositions—to local bands.

In the 1930s Clark served as an advance man, traveling to cities before bands performed in an effort to get records on local jukeboxes and to place press releases in black newspapers—the primary methods of promoting black artists at that time—for artists such as Billie Holiday, Lionel Hampton, and Louis

Armstrong. Clark was hired as a record promotion consultant for Decca in 1938, a time when very few radio stations were willing to play music by black artists or even to allow entry of a black artist or record promoter into a radio station. Clark went to great lengths to get his first assignment from Decca on the air, Jimmie Lunceford's single "St. Paul's Walking Through Heaven with You," ultimately charading as a chauffeur to get past security at WNEW, a New York radio station. Clark's scheme was successful because the single was played on air that evening, and Clark's career as a radio promoter was launched.

Clark worked as a freelance record promoter for Chess, Aladdin, Apollo, and United before securing a series of permanent promotion positions. Clark served as promotion director at Duke/Peacock (1954–1971), where he is largely responsible for the career launches of Bobby Bland, Junior Parker, O. V. Wright, the Original Five Blind Boys, and the Dixie Hummingbirds. Clark moved to Stax Records (1971–1975) to act as national promotion manager, and there he represented such artists as Little Milton and the Staple Singers before transferring to TK (1976–1980), where he promoted Betty Wright and KC and the Sunshine Band among many others. In 1980 Clark transferred to Malaco Records, where he served as senior vice president up until his death. There he represented such artists as Johnnie Taylor, Bobby Bland, Denise LaSalle, and Z. Z. Hill, whose 1982 blues album, Down Home, was a major success. Throughout his career Clark also promoted African American musicians Duke Ellington, Dinah Washington, Nat King Cole, Cab Calloway, B. B. King, T-Bone Walker, Junior Parker, Sam Cooke, Aretha Franklin, Quincy Jones, Stevie Wonder, Mahalia Jackson, Inez Andrew, the Sensational Nightingales, and the Mighty Clouds of Joy. Clark served as music consultant for several movies, including The Color Purple, also making a cameo appearance in the film. Clark was inducted into the Chicago Music Hall of Fame in 1981 and also received a Living Legend Award in 1982.

ERIN STAPLETON-CORCORAN

Bibliography

Barnes, Terry. "Everyone Knows the Hits, But What About the Men Behind Them?" Billboard (June 12, 1993): R16–R18.

Bonner, Brett J. "Dave Clark" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 124 (November/December 1995): 56.

George, Nelson. "Why I Promote the Blues." Village Voice (August 26, 1986): 74–77.

Guralnick, Peter. "I Do Not Play No Rock 'n' Roll." Living Blues (January/February 1989): 36–46.

McAdams, Janine. "Promotion Pioneer Dave Clark Dies at 86." Billboard (August 5, 1995).

CLARK, DEE

b. Delecta Clark, 7 November 1938; Blytheville, AR
d. 7 December 1990; Toccoa, GA

Chicago R&B singer popular in the late 1950s and early 1960s. Clark had a wonderfully impassioned tenor voice that got him a spate of rock 'n' roll hits in the late 1950s and a lesser body of soul work in the 1960s. Clark first recorded as one of the Hambone Kids in 1952, recording "Hambone," and then waxed some classic doo-wop with the Kool Gents vocal group for Vee-Jay. He went solo in 1958, scoring for Vee-Jay such hits as "Nobody But You" "Just Keep It Up," "Hey Little Girl" (which employed the "Bo Diddley" beat), and "Raindrops." He also occasionally recorded blues, notably "Blues Get Off of My Shoulder," although his high tenor voice was less than suitable for the idiom. After 1963, Clark continued on Chicago-based Constellation with a spate of moderate R&B hits, namely, "Crossfire Time," "Heartbreak," and "TCB." His career essentially died after Constellation closed shop in 1966. In the United Kingdom he got a sizable hit in 1975 with "Ride a Wild Horse." In the United States, the record failed to chart.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. "The Dee Clark Story." Goldmine (May 1981): 19–20.

CLARK, W. C.

b. Wesley Curley Clark, 16 November 1939;
Austin, TX

Guitarist, singer. "The Godfather of the Austin Scene" played behind touring R&B stars in his early teens as a member of Blues Boy Hubbard and the Jets and also toured with soul man Joe Tex at an early age. When Clark's group Southern Feeling, featuring singer Angela Strehli, dissolved he entered semi-retirement and took a job as a mechanic. But he was recruited by Stevie Ray Vaughan for the short-lived Triple Threat Revue, which also included vocalist Lou Ann Barton. Clark formed his own band in the aftermath of the demise of the Triple Threat Revue and began to tour steadily, releasing three albums, including the W. C. Handy Award winner Texas Soul on Black Top Records, after his 1986 self-released solo debut Something for Everybody.

Clark was honored in 1989 by his peers, including the Vaughan brothers, Barton, Strehli, Kim Wilson, and others, with a special program on the Austin City Limits television series that celebrated his fiftieth birthday. In 1997 Clark was involved in a tragic accident when his tour van was returning from a series of Midwest dates and crashed near Dallas, killing his fiancée and drummer. Clark, who won another W. C. Handy Award, this time for Artist Most Deserving of Wider Recognition, in 1998, regrouped and began work on his breakthrough recording, "From Austin with Soul." The 2001 release of the soul-drenched album, produced by fellow Austinite Mark "Kaz" Kazanoff, received five W. C. Handy Award nominations in 2003 with "Let It Rain" winning the Song of the Year category.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)CLARKE, WILLIAM

b. 29 March 1951; Inglewood, CA
d. 3 November 1996; Los Angeles, CA

Singer, harpist, songwriter. Clarke coaxed a gargantuan sound, at once swinging and intense, from his chromatic harp, becoming one of the key figures in modern West Coast blues while achieving an international reputation. And he did it in his own way and without much outside assistance. He was hanging out in Watts blues clubs when he met and befriended Chicago harmonica exiles Shakey Jake Harris and George "Harmonica" Smith. Their influence and encouragement put him on the path to a blues career but for the first twenty years he worked full time as a machinist to support his family, playing music only on weekends.

Clarke released three self-financed albums, Hittin' Heavy in 1978, Blues from Los Angeles County in 1980, and Can't You Hear Me Calling in 1983 before Tip of the Top, a 1987 tribute to Smith on the small Satch Records label got him a W. C. Handy nomination. Clarke finally quit his day job, released the live Rockin' the Boat in 1988, and signed with Alligator Records.

Clarke retained his do-it-yourself approach with Alligator, producing the recording sessions himself in California and composing almost all of the material for the albums Blowin' Like Hell, Serious Intentions, and Groove Time. Clarke's songwriting was twice rewarded with W. C. Handy awards in the Best Song category, in 1991 for “Must Be Jelly” and in 1997 for “Fishing Blues.” He collapsed on stage from congestive heart failure in the spring of 1996 and died six months later. He received three posthumous W. C. Handy Awards, adding Best Contemporary Album, for the jazz-inflected “The Hard Way,” and an instrumental award to his Best Song win.

CLARKE, WILLIAM

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin
Aldin, Mary Katherine. “William Clarke” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 131 (January/February 1997): 64.

Discography: AMG

CLASS

Record label (California, 1951–1964). Owners: Leon T. Rene (b. February 6, 1902, Covington, LA; d. May 30, 1982, Los Angeles, CA), Googie Rene (b. Raphael Rene, March 30, 1927; Los Angeles, CA). This Los Angeles, California–based label’s artists include Jesse Belvin, Bob & Earl (Bobby Day and Earl Nelson) (“Chains of Love,” cover of the Big Joe Turner original), Eugene Church (“Pretty Girls Everywhere” with the Fellows), Paul Clifton, Bobby Day (“Little Bitty Pretty One,” “Over and Over,” “Rockin’ Robin”), Jimmy Grissom, Adolph Jacobs, Oscar McLollie (“Hey Girl, Hey Boy” with Jeanette Baker, and “The Honey Jump”), Googie Rene, and Johnny “Guitar” Watson.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

Dawson, Jim. CD notes for The Class & Rendezvous Story (1993, ACE [UK] CDCHD 461).

Discography: McGrath

CLASSICS

French CD label established in 1990 by Gilles Petard to reissue systematically classic jazz performances whose European copyrights had expired. Artists overlapping jazz and blues were generally left to Document but the main series has included complete chronological reissues of Ethel Waters, Charles Brown, and Wynonie Harris. In 2001 a parallel 5000 series was launched to apply the same approach to artists loosely categorizable under rhythm and blues and not already started in the main series. Featured artists have included Marion Abernathy, Buster Bennett, Roy Brown, Ruth Brown, Muddy Waters, Johnny Otis, Sunnyland Slim, and Andrew Tibbs, as well as many jump band and other instrumental performances. The catalog includes much material never previously reissued.

HOWARD RYE

CLAY, FRANCIS

b. 15 November 1923; Rock Island, IL

Francis Clay was an accomplished jazz drummer before joining Muddy Waters’s band and becoming a popular blues drummer. He had played in church and at circuses, behind vaudeville and with country and western groups, and could do bird and animal imitations, but he couldn’t immediately grasp the straight blues beat. At his first gig with Waters, Muddy took the sticks and demonstrated. It was the only lesson Clay needed. He stayed with Muddy well into the 1960s, sometimes alternating the position with drummer Willie Smith. In 1967, he helped found the James Cotton band, and remained associated with Cotton for several years.

Prior to playing with Waters, Clay had been living in New York and touring with former Chicago jazz saxophonist Gene Ammons, and also with organist Jack McDuff. After joining Muddy around 1957, Clay learned quickly, accompanying Waters on the classics “She’s Nineteen Years Old” and “Tiger in Your Tank.” Clay pushed the envelope for blues drumming at Muddy’s first Newport Festival appearance in 1960, drawing on his jazz background for a strong driving rhythm. Soon after, when English musicians visited Muddy in Chicago, Clay taught drummer Graham Burbridge to play triplets, knowledge which helped push the British musicians from skiffle into rock ’n’ roll. Clay created a distinctly modern blues beat that did not conflict with the genre’s classic root. He ultimately resided in San Francisco, where he worked some with Mark Naftalin, of the Butterfield Blues Band, and also composed scores for large combos that included horns, violin, and cello.

ROBERT GORDON

Bibliography

Mazzolini, Tom. “A Touch of the Blues.” Crazy Music (Australia), 1979, <http://www.bluespower.com/a-fc.htm#a-fc01.htm> (accessed November 12, 2004).

Discography: AMG

Muddy Waters Live at Newport (1960, Chess).
Mark Naftalin's Blue Monday Party, Vol. 1 (1981, Winner Video 112).

CLAY, OTIS

b. 11 February 1942; Waxhaw, MS

A Chicago hard-soul singer who achieved his greatest popularity in the 1960s and 1970s, Clay began his singing career in the church, and served fifteen years in gospel groups, most notably with the Pilgrim Harmonizers (1962), the Gospel Songbirds (1963), and the Sensational Nightingales (1964–1965). In 1965, Clay left the gospel field to join George Leaner's One-derful label, coming out with such heavily gospelized soul hits as “I'm Satisfied,” “I Testify,” and “That's How It Is,” all of which had great appeal for the African American blues audience.

When Leaner closed One-derful in 1968, Clay moved to Atlantic Record's Cotillion subsidiary, getting a national hit with a remake of the Sir Douglas Quintet's “She's About a Mover” (1968). From 1971 to 1974, Clay recorded in Memphis with Willie Mitchell's Hi label, and that fruitful collaboration produced two albums and such notable hits as “Trying to Live My Life Without You” and “If I Could Reach Out.” In the late 1970s he recorded with lesser success on a variety of small labels, as soul music went into decline. At the same time, however, Clay redirected his career to the international market and to the blues audience and was soon playing blues festivals across the United States, in Europe, and Japan. In Japan, he recorded two of his most notable albums, Live! (1978) and Live Again (1984). Clay recorded a hard-soul album and a gospel album for Bullseye in the early 1990s.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. “Otis Clay: The Arkansas Yardbird.” Juke Blues no. 7 (Winter 1986/87): 4–9.

CLAYTON, PETER JOE “DOCTOR”

b. 19 April 1898; GA

d. 7 January 1947; Chicago, IL

Peter Joe Clayton was born April 19, 1898, in Georgia, by most reports, moving to St. Louis with his parents. His last name is sometimes shown as “Cleighton.” In St. Louis he married and had four children, was employed as a factory worker, and started his singing career. In 1937 tragedy struck when a fire burned down his house, killing his wife and children. He began drinking and living recklessly, a pattern that continued throughout his life. He moved to Chicago with partner Robert Lockwood to pursue his musical career.

He first recorded for Bluebird in 1935. Clayton worked strictly as a vocalist; his initial recordings show him employing a distinctive falsetto technique, later refined into a powerful, swooping style. He was an unparalleled songwriter, writing mostly original material with a rare wit, intelligence, and social awareness.

Between 1941 and 1942 he recorded four sessions for Bluebird and Decca. This period included many of his most memorable sides, including “Pearl Harbor Blues” (cut three months after the attack) and some that have become blues classics like “Hold That Train Conductor” and “Gotta Find My Baby.”

He cut two more sessions in 1946. These sessions included the original versions of oft-covered songs such as “Root Doctor,” “Angels in Harlem,” and “I Need My Baby.” Clayton's records were steady sellers and he regularly appeared at Chicago clubs and toured in a bus with his likeness on the side. Attesting to this popularity was Sunnyland Slim who recorded as “Doctor Clayton's Buddy” on his debut 1947 sessions and Willie Long Time Smith who in 1947 recorded the tribute, “My Buddy Doctor Clayton.” Clayton died on January 7, 1947, in Chicago, of pulmonary tuberculosis.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Larkin
 Burke, Tony. “I Ain't Gonna Drink No More: The Story of Doctor Clayton.” Blues and Rhythm no. 24 (1986): 4, 5.
 Smith, Chris. “I'm a First Class Root Doctor” [part 1]. Talking Blues no. 5 (1977), 2–7; [part 2]. Talking Blues no. 6 (1977), 8–14; “Afterword.” Talking Blues 7 (1977), 13–16.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFPSelected Recordings in Reissue

Doctor Clayton & His Buddies: Complete Recorded Works—1946–47 (1994, Old Tramp OTCD-005).

Doctor Clayton: Complete Recorded Works 1935–42 (1994, Document DOCD-5179).

See also Bluebird; Chicago; Decca; Lockwood, Robert Jr.; St. Louis, MO

CLAYTON, WILLIE

CLAYTON, WILLIE

b. 29 March 1955; Indianola, MS

Specializes in piercing ballads and gritty narratives. His most acclaimed releases were issued on Johnny Vincent's Ace label in the 1990s. Clayton's 2002 Last Man Standing emphatically proved the one-time Hi artist could still wail, moan, and soar with flair, while bridging the gap between blues and soul.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)
Stephenson, M. "Steppin' Out: Willie Clayton's First Annual Homecoming." Blues and Rhythm no. 173 (October 2002): 27.

Discography: AMG

CLEARWATER, EDDY

b. Edward Harrington, 10 January 1935; Macon, MS

Blues guitarist, singer, songwriter, a flamboyant performer who describes his own music as "rock-a-blues"—a mixture of basic rock with West Side blues. Among his influences are Magic Sam, Luther Allison, Freddy King, Otis Rush, and Buddy Guy, as well as Chuck Berry and even Jimi Hendrix. Raised in Mississippi, Eddy Clearwater is among the very few blues artists to have ancestors who were of both African American and (his grandmother) Cherokee descent; he sometimes appeared on stage wearing a full traditional Indian headdress and was nicknamed "The Chief."

At age thirteen, the young Eddy Harrington moved with his family to Birmingham, Alabama, and with the blessings of his uncle Reverend Houston H. Harrington, Eddy learned to play guitar. A left-handed musician, Eddy Clearwater nonetheless plays on a normal right-handed electric guitar turned upside down on the left side, without changing the strings around.

At only fifteen, he began playing guitar with various formations around Chicago, sometimes under the name "Guitar Eddy" or "Clear Waters and His Orchestra" (as a reference to Muddy Waters, whom he admired). From 1958 until 1969, Eddy Clearwater occasionally recorded for independent labels and under various pseudonyms (sometimes as a sideman) some eighteen singles. In the early 1970s, Eddy Clearwater temporarily abandoned music for a job at the Harmony guitar factory, where he assembled guitar bodies; but he soon returned to the stage, since he could offer different kinds of shows: Chicago blues, rockabilly, and even country.

After more than twenty years of performing in nightclubs and a successful European tour with Buddy Guy and Junior Wells in the mid-1970s, Eddy Clearwater's fame really began from 1977 with the release of his first LP, Black Night, recorded in Chicago but appearing on a French label, MCM. Some of his most highly acclaimed albums appeared on independent, European labels; his Blues Hang Out (1989) was recorded in a Paris studio in 1989. Recognition really came in the 1980s; he toured all over the world, including West Africa in 1987. After a half-century career and almost twenty albums, the flamboyant Eddy Clearwater is still performing.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Blind Pig Records website, Eddy Clearwater page, <http://www.blindpigrecords.com/artists/Clearwater,+Eddy.html>.
Cianci, Bob. "Eddy 'The Chief' Clearwater. They Say Good Things Come to Those Who Wait" [interview with Eddy Clearwater]. Vintage Guitar (June 2002), <http://www.vintageguitar.com/artists/details.asp?ID=121>.
Eddy Clearwater website, <http://www.eddyclearwater.com/>.
Moon, D. Thomas. "Eddy Clearwater: It's a Hard Way to Make an Easy Living." Living Blues no. 127 (May/June 1996): 14–27.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

From 1958 to 1969, about eighteen singles on 45-rpm records, on various independent labels: Atomic-H, Coed, Lucky Four, Lasalle, Federal, and USA. From 1977, many LPs on various labels: MCM (France), Rooster Blues, Red Lightnin', Blind Pig, Delmark, Bullseye Blues, Fan Club, New Rose Blues, Black & Blue (France), Evidence, and other labels.

Eddie [sic] Clearwater. (The most complete discography, including singles, LPs and imports, <http://koti.mbnet.fi/wdd/clearwater.htm>).

See also Bell, Carey; Blind Pig; Robillard, Duke

CLEVELAND, REVEREND JAMES

b. 5 December 1931; Chicago, IL

d. 9 February 1991; Culver City, CA

Gospel composer and singer. Began under the guidance of Thomas A. Dorsey, and then worked as Minister of Music for Reverend C. L. Franklin. For most of his career, his home base was the Cornerstone Baptist Church in Los Angeles, California. His compositions and singing have had a large influence on contemporary blues and soul musicians. The Reverend James Cleveland Singers were featured on the Blues Brothers soundtrack and sang with Ray Charles on his 1976 Porgy & Bess album.

EDWARD KOMARA/MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

AMG; Larkin

Discography: AMG; Larkin

CLOVERS, THE

A pioneering rhythm and blues vocal group of the 1950s. The Clovers formed in Washington, D.C., in 1946, and signed with Atlantic Records in 1950. The group became one of the company's biggest hit makers by initially recording bluesy ballads (notably "Don't You Know I Love You" and "Fool Fool Fool") and blues jumps (notably "One Mint Julep" and "Good Lovin'"), and subsequently recording more pop-type ballads (such as "Devil or Angel" and "Blue Velvet"). The original members on Atlantic were John "Buddy" Bailey (lead), Matthew McQuater (tenor), Harold Lucas (baritone), and Harold Winley (bass). The group experienced many personnel changes but the group's sound remained consistent. The Clovers' last major hit was "Love Potion No. 9" (1959, United Artists).

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Goldberg, Marv. "The Clovers." Discoveries 113 (October 1997): 30–42.

CLUB 51

Chicago rhythm and blues label of the 1950s. The label was a side business for local roller-skating impresario and record storeowner Jimmie Davis, who founded the label in March 1955. Club 51 was operated as part of the Davis's Savoy Record Mart at 527 East 63rd. It was not his main business enterprise; two blocks west was his principal interest, the Park City Bowl skating rink. Club 51 put out just seven known releases, by two doo-wop groups (the Five Buddies and the Kings Men), guitarist and singer Rudy Greene, blues singer Honey Brown, R&B singer Bobbie James, jazz pianist and King Cole emulator Robert "Prince" Cooper, and veteran piano bluesman Sunnyland Slim. Quality accompaniment was provided by combos led by saxophonist Eddie Chamblee and guitarist Lefty Bates. After scoring no hits, Davis shut down Club 51 in 1957.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert, and Robert L. Campbell. "The Club 51 Label." Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/club51.html> (accessed June 1, 2003).

Discography: McGrath

COASTERS, THE

Originally named the Robins, this R&B group enjoyed success with "Riot in Cell Block No. 9," produced by Leiber and Stoller (1954). Renamed the Coasters, they became famous for witty depictions of adolescence ("Charlie Brown" and "Yakety Yak"). The Monkees and the Rolling Stones recorded versions of their hits.

STEPHANIE POXON

Bibliography

Millar, Bill. The Coasters. London: Star Books, 1975.

Discography

Millar, Bill. The Coasters. London: Star Books, 1975, pp. 189–204.

See also Leiber and Stoller

COBB, ARNETT

b. Arnette Cleophus Cobb, 10 August 1918; Houston, TX

d. 24 March 1989; Houston, TX

Saxophonist. In a lengthy, productive, and courageous career, unfortunately hampered by illness and injury, Cobb utilized his blues-drenched "Texas tenor" sound to create an expressive and extroverted musical personality. His formative years, 1934–1942, were spent in the territorial groups of Texas big band leaders Chester Boone and Milt Larkin. Cobb moved to the international stage when he replaced fellow Larkin alumnus Illinois Jacquet in the Lionel Hampton Orchestra from 1942 to 1947. Cobb's solo career was sidetracked by a spinal operation and a subsequent automobile accident that put him on crutches for the remainder of his life but he was back on the bandstand in a few years and continued to perform and record until his death.

COBB, ARNETT

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: Lord

COBBS, WILLIE

b. 15 July 1932; Smale, AR

Arkansas-raised singer, songwriter, and harmonica player Willie Cobbs spent much of his childhood singing in his family's gospel group and catching local performances by Sonny Boy Williamson II and Robert Lockwood, Jr. In 1948, he moved to Chicago and performed regularly on Maxwell Street, often with Little Walter. Cobbs, who was greatly influenced by Jimmy Reed, formed his own band in Chicago in the late 1950s. He recorded for several small labels before hitting it big in 1961 with "You Don't Love Me," a blues classic released on Vee-Jay that was subsequently covered by dozens of blues and rock artists. Cobbs returned to Arkansas and continued to perform and record sporadically, with notable releases on Rooster and Bullseye.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli Bonner, Brett. "Willie Cobbs: I Want to Do Some Music We Can Shake Our Ass To." Living Blues no. 154 (November/December 2000): 14–21.

Discography: AMG

Willie Cobbs: Down to Earth (1994, Rooster Blues CD 2628).

COBRA/ARTISTIC

A label started in the golden age of blues in Chicago by a half Mexican, half Italian former GI from Texas named Eli Toscano in 1956. Toscano quickly recruited Willie Dixon away from Chess Records to produce and play bass and the label soon recorded Otis Rush singing "I Can't Quit You Baby." Only lasting a few years, the label and its offshoot, Artistic, was the first to showcase the new breed of young guitar players moving away from postwar electric to a modern blues sound with Rush, Buddy Guy, and Magic Sam. Several histories and blues legends say Toscano was murdered in the late 1950s or perhaps faked his own death to escape a gambling debt. One of his artists, Shakey Jake, was known to get his session pay and more by beating Toscano in dice games. However, in reality, Toscano drowned in a boating accident on September 21, 1967. He was killed while trying to start an outboard motor.

ACE ATKINS

Discography: McGrath

Selected Recording

The Cobra Records Story: Chicago Rock and Blues, 1956–1958 (1993, Capricorn 9 42012-2, 2 CD set).

COHN, LARRY

Born in Pennsylvania, Lawrence "Larry" Cohn was raised in Brooklyn. He began collecting records at an early age, eventually becoming a member of the "78 mafia" of New York City record collectors; others included Pete Whelan, Bernard Klatzko, Nick Perls, Dave Freeland, and Samuel Charters. Cohn began writing about blues in the 1950s, and from 1960 to 1968 was a regular reviewer of blues in the Saturday Review. During this time he coordinated blues sessions and wrote liner notes for a variety of labels, and produced for Elektra Records a three-LP set of Leadbelly's recordings for the Library of Congress.

In 1968 Cohn, trained as a lawyer, left his job as a federal agent to be vice president of A&R for CBS; artists he signed included Fleetwood Mac, Johnny Otis, and Shuggie Otis. From 1972 to 1974 Cohn headed Playboy Records, where he produced albums by Phillip Walker and Leadbelly (live recordings from Texas). Cohn worked in music production and publishing through the 1970s and 1980s, and in 1990 returned to CBS (now Sony); he received a Grammy for his first production, the boxed set The Complete Robert Johnson. As staff producer of Sony's Legacy division, Cohn produced many CD reissues of blues, gospel, country, and Cajun music in the Roots & Blues series. He edited the anthology Nothing But the Blues (Abbeville Press, 1993), which received the ASCAP-Deems Taylor Award and the Ralph J. Gleason Book Award. In 2003 Cohn left Sony to start his own label, Cohn-DeSilva Entertainment (<http://www.cohndesilva.com>).

SCOTT BARRETTA

COLE, ANN

b. Cynthia Coleman, 24 January 1934; Newark, NJ

R&B and gospel singer who was the first artist to ever perform "Got My Mojo Working" in 1956. She began her career in her teens with a family vocal group, the Colemanaires. Her first recording on her own was "Are You Satisfied" in 1956. She recorded "Got My Mojo Working" in 1957 for Baton Records in New York City, but it was simultaneously covered and recorded by Muddy Waters, who claimed to have composed it, for Chess. However, a lawsuit ruled that Preston Foster was the sole composer of "Got My Mojo Working."

Backed by the Suburbans vocal group, Ann Cole released a follow-up, "I've Got Nothing Working Now," and had a hit with "Easy Easy Baby," later covered by Magic Sam. Ann Cole's best songs remain "Each Day," featuring her very deep voice, and two versions of "In the Chapel" (different from "Crying in the Chapel"). An accident stopped her career; she has been confined to a wheelchair since the early 1960s.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

Larkin

Bastin, Bruce. Liner notes from October 1983 for the LP by Ann Cole's early recordings, produced in England by Interstate Records, Ann Cole, Got My Mojo Working (1984, Krazy Cat KK782).

Menconi, David. "Mojo Fighting," in "Songs of Sol." News and Observer [Raleigh, North Carolina] (February 15, 1998), <http://www.daremusic.com/mojo.htm>.

Moonoogian, George. "Ann Cole." Whiskey, Women, and..., nos. 12/13, (December 1983).

"She's Got Her Mo-Jo Working... ANN COLE." Rhythm and Blues (July 1957), <http://www.daremusic.com/ann.htm>.

Selected Recordings

Ann Cole recorded mainly for Baton Records in New York City, but also for Timely, Sir Records, MGM, Roulette.

Got My Mojo Working (1984, Krazy Cat KK782). Contains fourteen songs recorded for the Baton label, between 1956 and 1959.

See also Waters, Muddy

COLE, NAT KING

b. Nathaniel Adams Coles, 17 March 1917; Montgomery, AL

d. 15 February 1965; Santa Monica, CA

An African American pianist and smooth blues balladeer, Cole's early record hits with the King Cole Trio were "Straighten Up and Fly Right" (1943, Capitol) and "Route 66" (1946, Capitol). He would go on to mainstream popular music success, including his own radio series (1948–1949), his own television show (1956–1957), and appearances in several films, but regardless was not immune to racist attacks both subtle and overt.

DONNA LOWE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Epstein, Daniel Mark. Nat King Cole. New York: Farrar, Straus, and Giroux, 1999.

Discography: Lord

The Best of the Nat "King" Cole Trio: The Vocal Classics, Vol.1 (1942–1946) (1995, EMD/Blue Note; reissue).

COLEMAN, DEBORAH

b. 3 October 1956; Portsmouth, VA

Singer, guitarist, songwriter of contemporary electric blues. Coleman has recorded six CDs many of which have garnered high praise. She has also been nominated for six W. C. Handy Awards, including Guitarist of the Year in 2001.

JUSTIN WERT

Bibliography

Whiteis, David. "Deborah Coleman: I Want to Venture Out." Living Blues no. 148 (November/December 1999): 16–23.

Discography: AMGSelected Recordings

I Can't Lose (1997, Blind Pig 5038).

Where Blue Begins (1998, Blind Pig 5048).

Livin' on Love (2001, Blind Pig 5070).

COLEMAN, GARY "B. B."

b. 1 January 1947; Paris, TX

d. 21 February 1994; Shreveport, LA

Texas guitarist Gary "B. B." Coleman made his mark as the man who shaped the blues sounds at Ichiban Records in Atlanta, where he recorded six albums of his own (plus a best-of compilation) and produced more than thirty others, including Chick Willis, Little

Johnny Taylor, Jerry McCain, Buster Benton, Trudy Lynn, and his childhood friend, Blues Boy Willie (William McFalls). Coleman and McFalls performed together in the 1950s when they were known as "Little Chuck Berry" and "Little Ray Charles."

Coleman, later nicknamed B. B. after another influence, B. B. King, also accompanied Lightnin' Hopkins and worked in Freddie King's band for five years in addition to fronting his own group, Gary and the Charmers. He began promoting shows by various blues artists, including many whom he would soon bring into the Ichiban fold, beginning in 1987 when the company picked up his first LP, Nothing But the Blues, which he had released on his own Mr. B's label. The album hit the Billboard charts as Ichiban's first blues release. After Coleman's prolific five-year stint at Ichiban, he again went back into business for himself, releasing a final album, Cocaine Annie, on his Boola Boo imprint (rereleased in 1994 by Icehouse). He was working to make a bigger name for himself on the performing circuit when he died of a heart attack at the age of forty-seven.

JIM O'NEAL

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O'Neal and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Bonner, Brett. "Gary B. B. Coleman." Living Blues no. 115 (June 1994): 61–62.

Discography: AMG

COLEMAN, JAYBIRD

b. 20 May 1896; Gainesville, AL
d. 26 or 28 June 1950; Tuskegee, AL

A virtuoso and original harmonica player, Burl C. "Jaybird" Coleman played in an Army band in Europe in 1917–1918, in different medicine shows, and possibly in the famed Birmingham Jug Band. His falsetto singing adorns "Man Trouble Blues," his best-known title, recorded twice in 1927 and 1930.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

Cather, James Pat. Tracking Down a Legend: The Jaybird Coleman Story. Birmingham: Cather & Brown, 1990.

Discography: DGR

Jaybird Coleman & The Birmingham Jug Band (1992, Document CD 5140; complete reissue).

COLEMAN, MICHAEL

b. 24 June 1956; Chicago, IL

Michael Coleman's hot guitar licks came to prominence during the ten years he played with the James Cotton Band, a group that epitomized high-energy blues in the 1980s and early 1990s. Coleman grew up with the blues as the son of Chicago drummer Bald Head Pete (Cleo Williams), but split his time between Top 40 R&B gigs and blues club work with West Side singer Little Johnny Christian, Johnny Dollar, Aron Burton, and others. Over the years he has also worked with Eddy Clearwater, Professor Eddie Lusk, Junior Wells, Buster Benton, Jimmy Dawkins, and Syl Johnson. Coleman's own recordings have mostly been for European labels: a live album by Coleman and Eddie Lusk on Black & Blue, and some Chicago sessions for Wolf Records of Austria. His American CD debut came with Do Your Thing! for Delmark in 2000.

JIM O'NEAL

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Birchmeier); Larkin
Pointer-Jones, Sandra. Liner notes for Do Your Thing! (2000, Delmark Records DE-747).
Sharp, Steven. "Michael Coleman." Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 64–65.

Discography: AMG

COLEMAN, WALLACE

b. 10 February 1936; Morristown, TN

Cleveland-based blues harpist and vocalist. After Coleman's retirement in 1987 from a Cleveland bakery, he joined Robert Jr. Lockwood's band. In 1997 Coleman left Lockwood's band and recorded his debut album Wallace Coleman on Fishhead records. He released Stretch My Money in 2000 on his own Pinto Blue Music label.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

AMG (Andrew Hamilton)

Discography: AMG

See also Lockwood, Robert Jr.

COLLECTABLES

The nation's largest independently owned reissue label, Collectables has blossomed from a small operation to a huge company whose current roster includes more than twenty-five hundred vintage titles, and whose operation encompasses a huge mail-order service that also deals in classic film and music video and DVD titles. Their current reissue line includes releases from the catalogs of Columbia, Atlantic, Vee-Jay, RCA, and Capitol. Their sonic quality has also improved greatly over the years, with current Collectable reissues on par with those of any major label, something that couldn't always be said of the early doo-wop, blues, and jazz titles. An extensive list of current and past Collectables titles is available online at <http://www.oldies.com>, and their monthly updated listings cover every genre from alternative rock through early jazz and blues. Regular customers receive monthly supplements and catalogs. The business's other end is under the jurisdiction of Alpha Video.

RON WYNN

COLLINS, ALBERT

b. 1 or 3 October 1932; Leona, TX
d. 24 November 1993; Las Vegas, NV

Known by three separate monikers—"The Ice Man," "The Master of the Telecaster," and "The Razor," Collins had a readily identifiable series of song and album titles designed to represent the "ice cold" approach of the guitar style that was his legacy.

Life

Collins was raised by two farming parents in Leona, Texas, a small town located approximately one hundred miles north of Houston. At age seven his family moved to Marquez, and to the Third Ward district at age nine where he spent most of his childhood. Collins began his musical career studying piano as a primary instrument, but by the age of eighteen, he redirected his efforts to the guitar and began performing with his own band, the Rhythm Rockers, by the late 1940s.

Music

Collins's earliest recordings included instrumental material that consisted of mostly blues shuffles and were recorded primarily on various local labels such as Kangaroo, Hall, Hallway, TFC, 20th Century, and Great Scott. With Kangaroo, he obtained his first recording contract and released his first single "The Freeze" in 1958. During this period, his song titles were uniquely associated with freezing temperatures. "The Freeze," "Defrost," "Thaw Out," "Sno-Cone," "Icy Blue," and "Frosty" created a trademark that Collins retained for the remainder of his career. In 1962 his first major hit, "Frosty," was a million-selling single.

The West Coast Years

It was Bob Hite of the legendary San Francisco band, Canned Heat, who was instrumental in getting Collins signed with the Imperial Records label in 1968, and Collins moved to Los Angeles to record for his first major label. The three Imperial albums, Love Can Be Found Anywhere, Even in a Guitar, Trash Talkin', and The Compleat Albert Collins produced a funkier and jazzier style than what was to come in later years. For nearly ten years, his live shows were well received throughout the psychedelic blues circuit, and he performed regularly to enthusiastic crowds at the Fillmore West, Seattle Pop Festival, and other venues.

Albert Collins. (Photo by Tom Copi, © Frank Driggs Collection)

After three albums, Collins was dropped from Imperial in 1972 and was the first artist signed by Eagles producer Bill Szymczyk's Tumbleweed Records. Collins recorded There's Gotta Be a Change, but unfortunately the company folded less than two years later. After a short stint with Chicago-based Blue Thumb Records, Collins became quite despondent and went into retirement from the West Coast music scene, which included a complete retreat from playing guitar altogether. During this period he struggled financially and held odd jobs such as truck driving and construction work, which included a remodeling job for pop star Neil Diamond.

The Alligator Years

It was only after a considerable amount of cajoling from his wife Gwen that Collins emerged from retirement. This period in Collins's career would prove to be pivotal, as he would embark on a phase of recording that would spawn his greatest successes. In 1977, he was offered a record deal from Bruce Iglauer of Alligator Records in Chicago, who signed Collins as the first non-Chicago-based artist. His first album, Ice Pickin', was released in 1978 to raving reviews, won the Best Blues Album of the Year award at the Montreaux Jazz Festival, and was nominated for a Grammy.

With his signature backup band, the Ice Breakers, the majority of Collins's most worthy material was produced on these six Alligator records: Ice Pickin' (AL4713) in 1978, Frostbite (AL4719) in 1980, Frozen Alive! (AL4725) in 1981, Don't Lose Your Cool (AL4730) in 1983, Live in Japan (AL4733) in 1984, Showdown! (AL4743) in 1985, and Cold Snap (AL4752) in 1986.

His awards include W. C. Handy Awards for both Don't Lose Your Cool and Cold Snap. In 1987 he won his first Grammy Award for Showdown, an impressive three-way guitar duel with Johnny Copeland and newcomer Robert Cray.

Influences

Collins's main musical influences were fellow guitarists T-Bone Walker, Lowell Fulson, B. B. King, Freddie King, John Lee Hooker, Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown, and his older cousin, the legendary Lightnin' Hopkins. Also, Frankie Lee Sims and his cousin Willow Young (who taught him the unorthodox, open minor key tuning used throughout his career) were two of his earliest influences.

Style and Technique

Albert Collins's overall approach to guitar playing can be somewhat described as an "attack" on the instrument. The notes seem to burst forth with a piercing tone quality. His approach has had a direct influence on such foremost guitarists as Stevie Ray Vaughan, Robert Cray, Eric Clapton, and Jimi Hendrix.

The quintessential Texas guitarist, he played without the use of a guitar pick, preferring the flesh and nails of his thumb, forefinger, and middle finger. His mainstay instrument was a blonde maple-neck 1966 Fender Telecaster with humbucking pickups. Combined with his legendary 1970 Fender Quad Reverb 100-watt tube amplifier (which contained four 12-inch speakers, usually turned up full blast), this combination created the biting treble tone that was his signature sound. Collins played in an unusual minor-key open tuning in the key of F, combined with the use of a capo that allowed him to play in his favorite key of D minor.

Although his recorded output is significant, it was Collins's stage presence that was most legendary among fellow musicians, critics, and fans. It was not unusual for Albert to conclude his concerts with a grandiose exit from the stage by walking through the middle of the crowd and out the front door of the venue, with the use of his legendary 150-foot guitar cord that allowed him to stand in the middle of the street wailing on his guitar, while fans watched as Collins brought the city traffic to a halt in mid-solo. The two albums that best capture his typical electrifying performances can be heard on Frozen Alive and Live in Japan, both recorded at the pinnacle of his career. His last two albums, Ice Man (1991) and Molten Ice (1992), were released on the Pointblank label, a subsidiary of Virgin Records. At the age of 61 Albert Collins died of lung cancer on November 24, 1993, in Las Vegas. A posthumous album, Albert Collins Live 92-93, captures Collins in rare form and at the top of his musical prowess.

WAYNE E. GOINS

Bibliography

- AMG (Richard Skelly); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Bonner, Brett. "A Tribute to Albert Collins." Living Blues no. 114 (March/April 1994): 66-72.
- Hollis, Larry, and Eddie Ferguson. "Albert Collins: Interview." Cadence 12, no. 5 (May 1986): 20-22, 88-89.
- Lewis, Dennis, and Cilla Huggins. "A Long Conversation with Collins." Blues Unlimited nos. 135/136 (July/September 1979): 4-10.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

COLLINS, LITTLE MAC

b. McKinley C. Collins, 6 June 1929; Indianola, MS
d. 4 February 1997; Detroit, MI

Guitarist, bassist, vocalist, bandleader. Little Mac Collins and his brother Louis ("Mr. Bo") moved to Detroit in the early 1950s, where Mac enjoyed a long career as a popular local sideman and leader of nightclub favorites, The Partymakers Inc. Collins worked with Mr. Bo, Little Junior Cannady, Joe L., Baby Boy Warren, and Eddie "Guitar" Burns.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Selected Recordings

Motor City Blues: "Live" at the 1973 Ann Arbor Blues & Jazz Festival (Alive/Total Energy).

COLLINS, LOUIS "MR. BO"

b. 7 April 1932; Indianola, MS
d. 19 September 1995; Detroit, MI

Guitarist, singer. Louis ("Mr. Bo") Collins settled in Detroit in the early 1950s, worked with Washboard Willie, John Lee Hooker, and Little Sonny, and established his solo career with "If Trouble Was Money" and other local hits. Collins worked with Washboard Willie, John Lee Hooker, Eddie Burns, Little Sonny, and Little Mac Collins.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Varjabedian, Jonathan. "Louis 'Mr. Bo' Collins: 'I've Got to Play What I Feel.'" Juke Blues no. 30 (Spring 1994): 10-12.

Discography: LSPF

If Trouble Was Money (1995, Blue Suit Records).

COLLINS, SAM

b. 11 August 1887; LA
d. 20 October 1949; Chicago, IL

Aka "Cryin' Sam," "Salty Dog Sam," and Jim Foster. Collins was raised in the McComb area of Mississippi and became a wandering musician playing at local barrelhouses. He traveled with King Solomon Hill and recorded for Gennett in 1927 and ARC in 1931, playing a badly tuned guitar with a knife, which forms a surprisingly effective accompaniment to his eerie falsetto singing on spirituals, hokum numbers, and deep blues. He died from heart disease and is buried in Worth, Illinois.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O'Neal); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGRCOLUMBIA

Record company and label that began issuing cylinders in 1889. Blues issues began with Mary Stafford and Edith Wilson in 1921. Columbia developed into a major Race label after signing Bessie Smith and Clara Smith in 1923, initially issued in the general popular series. To mollify triskaidekaphobics, the 13000-D Race series, started in November 1923, was discontinued after eight issues, four by Bessie Smith, and restarted in December at 14000-D. Vaudeville blues recordings by Bessie and Clara, Martha Copeland, Maggie Jones, Ethel Waters, and George Williams and Bessie Brown dominated the early catalog.

Country blues issues began with Peg Leg Howell (14194-D), recorded in Atlanta in November 1926. Many significant artists were discovered on field trips. Atlanta also yielded Barbecue Bob (Robert Hicks) and Charlie Lincoln. Coley Jones and Hattie Hudson were recorded in Dallas, Lillian Glinn at both. Columbia was in receivership from late 1922; in March 1925 British Columbia bought its American parent, reorganizing the group as Columbia International, Ltd., which from November 1926 also controlled Okeh, which was maintained as a separate company with its own Race series. Only after October 1929 were joint field trips undertaken but with recordings for the two labels kept distinct. In March 1931 Columbia International merged with the Gramophone Company, Ltd., to form Electrical and Musical Industries (EMI). Because Victor was part owner of the Gramophone Company and thus became, through EMI, part owner of its U.S. competitor Columbia, Okeh and Columbia were transferred to trustees to avoid anti-trust action, and in May 1931 sold to Grigsby-Grunow, makers of Majestic Radios. A final field session in Atlanta in October 1931 recorded Blind Willie McTell for issue as Blind Sammie on Columbia and Georgia Bill on Okeh. The 14000-D series ended at 14680-D in April 1933.

COLUMBIA

The labels were bought by the American Record Corporation (ARC) in August 1934 following Grigsby-Grunow's November 1933 bankruptcy. ARC discontinued the Columbia label in the United States, but it was maintained in other territories by EMI. In February 1938 the Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS) bought ARC and revived Columbia the next year, although blues issues were mostly on OKeh, the successor to ARC's Vocalion label. A new Columbia Race series, the 30000s, was started in October 1945, with reissues of ARC recordings by such artists as Big Bill (Broonzy), Blind Boy Fuller, Curtis Jones, and Memphis Minnie, alongside new recordings by Minnie, Big Joe Williams, and others, and a major documentation of emerging R&B styles in Chicago with many disks by Buster Bennett, the Big Three Trio, and others. The series lasted into the 1950s.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR; Sutton

"Columbia 30000." Blues Research no. 14 (1966): 2.

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Mahony, Dan. The Columbia 13/14000-D Series: A Numerical Listing, 2nd ed. Stanhope, NJ: Walter C. Allen, 1966.

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

COMBO

Record label (California, 1951–1961). Owner: Vernon Haven (Jake) Porter (b. August 3, 1916, Oakland, CA; d. March 25, 1993, Culver City, CA). Porter was a respected trumpeter, and under his direction recorded many of the Central Avenue sounds, from jump-blues to honkers to doo-wop vocal groups. The recordings include the original version of "Ko Ko Mo" (by Gene & Eunice), and "Chop Chop Boom" (Jack McVea with Al Smith [aka Al King] and the Savoy). He also recorded saxophonist Chuck Higgins, issuing "Motor Head Baby," with Johnny "Guitar" Watson, and the very influential instrumental "Pachuko Hop." Other artists include Jesse Belvin, Tal Carter, T. L. Clemons (aka C. T. Clemons), Ernie Fields, Frankie Ervin, Great Gates (Edward White), Peppermint Harris, Smokey Hogg, Joe Houston, Gus Jenkins, Betty Hall Jones, Johnny Moore's Three Blazers, Native Boys, Gene Phillips, Sharps (with vocalist Carl White), Lou "Freddie" Simon, Buell Thomas, Floyd Turnham (with Cledus Harrison), William "Brother" Woodman, and many others.

ROBERT EAGLE

Discography: McGrath

CONLEY, CHARLES

b. 1 July 1928; Curtain Bottom, TX

Learned guitar at age eighteen in east Texas. Lowell Fulson and Li'l Son Jackson were his formative influences. He moved to California in 1950, initially to Los Angeles. He was convicted of manslaughter in 1957, initially released in 1963, then returned to prison on a parole violation to be rereleased in 1973. Afterward, he moved to Richmond, California, where he resumed public performance. Believed to have died in 1989.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Mazzolini, Tom. "Richmond Blues: Charles Conley." Living Blues no. 21 (May/June 1975): 42–43.

CONNOR, JOANNA

b. 31 August 1962; Brooklyn, NY

Joanna Connor began playing the guitar as a child and soon became a young professional by performing with bands from her mid-teens throughout New England. In 1984, she moved to Chicago, and by 1985 at the age of twenty-three, she joined Dion Payton's popular 43rd Street Blues Band. By 1987 her talents as a slide guitarist and as a songwriter had become so well recognized that she was able to form her own band to perform in Chicago bar circuits, college campuses, and music festivals.

By 1989, she signed her first recording contract with Blind Pig Records, and her debut record Believe It was so successful that it enabled her to tour the United States, Japan, South America, and Europe where she released a live CD. When her second Blind Pig recording called Flight was released three years later in 1982, she was able to change her style from hard blues to exploring combinations of rhythm and blues. Since then she has changed to M. C. Records.

Her blend of blues, jazz, funk, and pop style has been called "quick, aggressive," "raw blues," and "a new sound" and she attributes her influence to the likes of Duane Altman, Ry Cooder, James Cotton, Freddie King, Buddy Guy, A. C. Reed, Otis Rush, and Luther Allison, who even made a special trip to sit in on one of her shows. Connor's talents as a musician continue through recordings and performances on her slide guitar.

HEATHER PINSON

Bibliography

AMG; Santelli

Discography

Believe It! (1989, Blind Pig CD BP-73289); Fight (1992, Blind Pig CD 5002); Living on the Road (1993, Inak 1727); Rock & Roll Gypsy (1995, Ruf CD 1003); Big Girl Blues (1996, Blind Pig CD 5037); Slidetime (1998, Blind Pig CD 5047); Nothing But the Blues (2001, Inakustik CD 9060); The Joanna Connor Band (2002, M.C. 46).

CONQUEROR

Record label of Sears Roebuck & Company, sold through their mail-order catalog. Launched in 1928, it drew its material from the Plaza labels and after they were merged in the new American Record Corporation (ARC) developed a substantial Race catalog including issues by Big Bill (Broonzy), Lucille Bogan, Bumble Bee Slim, Lil Johnson, and Memphis Minnie. CBS continued to supply the label after taking over ARC until it was discontinued in spring 1942.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR; Sutton

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

CONVICT LABOR

Convict labor appeared in the South during Reconstruction and continued into the twentieth century. Blacks in the region comprised the vast majority of convicts that worked as lessees during the late nineteenth century and then as members of chain gangs and work farms during the next century. The experience of many blacks working at convict labor informed the lyrical content and musical forms found in blues music.

Convict labor originated in 1798 in Massachusetts where leased convicts worked for private business. Early nineteenth-century reforms introduced the institution of the penitentiary where inmates made commercial items ranging from shoes to railroad cars. The South practiced limited forms of these punishments before the Civil War.

During Reconstruction, southern states expanded the role of convict leasing as a form of involuntary servitude to rescue the region's failed economy. The South needed to rebuild the infrastructure destroyed during the war, and bankrupt southern businesses had nothing to pay for the labor needed to complete this task. They turned to convict leasing in state after state to supply the labor for building levees, rebuilding railroads, draining swamps, mining, farming, cutting and milling timber, collecting turpentine, and making bricks.

The deplorable and inhumane working conditions of convict leasing attracted social critics from the start. Convicts lived in tents or wagons, dressed in tattered uniforms, ate meagerly, suffered whippings, and worked at gunpoint from sunrise to sunset. Leasing companies worked many convicts until they died. State politicians in the South often dealt themselves lucrative contracts under the convict leasing system that many outside observers saw as worse than slavery.

The rise of organized labor, the good roads movement, and social reform combined to transform convict labor at the beginning of the twentieth century. One by one, states abolished the privately controlled convict leasing system and replaced it with one of state and local control. Louisiana transferred Angola farm from private ownership to the state in 1901. Mississippi established a prison farm at Parchman in 1904, and Georgia instituted chain gangs in 1908. State-controlled labor for the construction of highways and as a form of punishment continued well into the twentieth century. The federal government allowed convict labor for the construction of U.S. highways until 1935. Road construction and repair by convicts continued at a state and local level after 1936.

Courts of law unjustly sentenced blacks to several years for crimes as petty as the theft of food. Whites, by contrast, received much lighter sentences for comparable crimes. Convicts included men, women, and adolescents. They labored under a system known as "gang and task," the same system that drove the slaves on plantations. Gangs, also called squads, worked with specific goals assigned by drivers. If the squad failed to meet those goals, its members suffered beatings.

Gangs often designated a caller who led the group in chanting work songs. The caller set the pace of the work song for completing each assigned task. The members of the gang responded in chorus. Often the callers gave instruction of specific details in the work required and many times the response alerted the caller as to how well the work was going. Work songs also diverted the attention of the convicts from their intolerable situation and made the end of the day seem to arrive faster.

CONVICT LABOR

The rhythmic form and lyrical content of the work song influenced blues music. Convict labor provided the crossover experience for the transformation of work songs into blues. Huddie “Leadbelly” Ledbetter is perhaps the best example of this crossover because he worked at convict labor in Sugerland, Texas, and later at Angola, Louisiana. Ledbetter’s singing ability led to his release from both criminal sentences. The first time, the governor of Texas pardoned Ledbetter and invited him to sing and play his guitar in the governor’s mansion. This experience informed his song, “Midnight Special” recorded in 1934 by John and Alan Lomax. They discovered Ledbetter laboring in Angola under a later conviction while they were recording prison songs. They also recorded Ledbetter’s “Angola Blues” in 1933. The prison experience informed a number of other blues songs. Blues singer Bukka White served time working at Parchman and recorded “Parchman Farm Blues” in 1940 after his release.

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

DGR

Lichtenstein, Alex. Twice the Work of Free Labor. London: Verso, 1996.

Mancini, Matthew J. One Dies, Get Another. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996.

Myers, Martha A. Race, Labor & Punishment in the New South. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1998.

Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning. New York: Horizon Press, 1960.

———. The Story of the Blues. London: Chilton Books, 1969.

Oshinsky, David M. Worse Than Slavery. New York: The Free Press, 1996.

Powell, J. C. The American Siberia. New York: Arno Press & The New York Times, 1969.

Wilson, Walter. Forced Labor in the United States. New York: International Publishers, 1933.

COODER, RY

b. Ryland Peter Cooder, 15 March 1947; Los Angeles, CA

Eclectic guitarist and composer whose work has taken in everything from country/western to Cuban and Hawaiian slack key to Hollywood soundtracks, Ry Cooder’s music is grounded in the blues, a music to which he regularly returns. In the mid-1960s, he was briefly in a band called the Rising Sons with Taj Mahal. His first two solo albums, in 1970 and 1971, featured covers of songs by Leadbelly, Blind Willie Johnson, Sleepy John Estes, and Washington Phillips, among others. In the late 1970s, he issued a series of R&B-flavored albums with vocalists Bobby King and Terry Evans. 1986 brought the soundtrack for the film Crossroads.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin

Discography: AMG

COOK, ANN

b. 10 May 1903; St. Francisville, LA

d. 29 September 1962; New Orleans, LA

Believed by jazz historian Al Rose to be the only woman blues singer from the Storyville red-light district of New Orleans to have made records. She recorded with the Louis Dumaine Jazzola Eight for Victor in 1928, then with the Wooden Joe Nicholas Band for American Music in 1949. In later life, she was devoted to church, and did not discuss her early years.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Rose, Al. Storyville, New Orleans. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 1974.

Discography: DGR

COOKE, SAM

b. Samuel Cook, 22 January 1931; Clarksdale, MS

d. 11 December 1964; Los Angeles, CA

There were at least three Sam Cookes: one, a gifted young gospel performer who sang lead in the Soul Stirrers; the second, a blues performer with an extraordinary blending of blues and gospel voices; and, finally, a pop star music attraction with dozens of Top 40 hits in the early days of rock ‘n’ roll.

Samuel Cook was born in Clarksdale, Mississippi; the son of Reverend Charles Cook. He grew up in Chicago, Illinois, where his father was minister of Christ Holiness Church. He learned his craft at various churches in the Chicago area and performed with the Pilgrim Travelers and the famous Highway QCs. In 1950, at the age of nineteen, Cooke replaced R. H. Harris in the legendary Soul Stirrers. The Soul Stirrers group was formed in Texas in 1935 and was recorded extensively by Alan Lomax. Its first commercial recordings on the Aladdin label were released in the late 1940s.

The first Soul Stirrers releases with Cooke as lead were released in 1951 and the group prospered with the dynamic young lead singer, reaching the upper “rooms” of gospel popularity. Cooke was able to master the Soul Stirrers classic soloist arrangement—two lead singers; one silky, smooth and eloquent higher voice and one impassioned, hoarse, and bluesy voice to “stir” the audiences. His work on the Soul Stirrers was truly inspirational. In 1956, Cooke left the Soul Stirrers and was replaced by Johnnie Taylor.

Cooke’s first secular release in 1957 was “Lovable,” a reworking of a Soul Stirrer’s gospel hit, “Wonderful,” on Specialty Records. On this recording, Cooke used another name (Dale Cooke) to avoid offending his loyal gospel fans. Later that year, Cooke cut the classic “For Sentimental Reasons,” using his new stage name, Sam Cooke. His first number one hit was his third release with Specialty, “You Send Me.”

Cooke’s first album, under the Specialty sublabel Keen, was released in 1958 and topped the Billboard album chart at #16. Cooke broke the R&B charts again in 1959 with “Young Blood.” The song also ranked number eight on the pop charts.

Cooke signed with RCA in 1960 and recorded the famous “Chain Gang,” which hit number two on both pop and R&B charts. He followed with several other hits on RCA and, in 1961, formed an independent label, SAR, with his manager, J. W. Alexander. After several classic “almost hits,” Cooke’s release of “Twistin’ the Night Away” jumped to number one on R&B charts and number nine on pop charts in 1962.

Cooke continued to release minor hits on the R&B and pop charts and worked with dozens of both young and established artists, including Jimi Hendrix, the Isley Brothers, and Little Richard. During that period, Cooke was a prolific songwriter and recorded dozens of tracks that would appear during the next decade. Cooke became a pop sensation during that period and his career paralleled other notable crossover artists such as Jackie Wilson.

Cooke’s life was cut tragically short when he was shot to death in the parking lot of a South Los Angeles motel in 1964. The details of the incident made tabloid front pages for months and, for a time, threatened to outshine his magnificent career in media limelight. But Cooke’s contribution to music would never be forgotten. During subsequent years, some of his best secular works were released, including, Live at the Harlem Square Club, which he recorded in early 1963.

In 1986, Sam Cooke’s place in rock ‘n’ roll was validated when he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame at its first induction celebration in New York City. Cooke left a legacy of dynamic recordings that changed R&B music and blended gospel, R&B, and pop into a new kind of soul that is reflected in the works of literally dozens of later artists. The Soul Stirrers were inducted into the Hall of Fame in 1989.

TOM FISHER

Bibliography

Larkin

Wolff, Daniel, et al. You Send Me: The Life and Times of Sam Cooke. New York: William Morrow, 1995.

Discography

Selected Recordings

The Soul Stirrers Featuring Sam Cooke (1959, Specialty SP-2106); Cooke’s Tour (1960, RCA 2221); Hits of the 50’s (1960, RCA 2236); My Kind of Blues (1961, RCA 2392); Sam Cooke (1961, RCA 2293); Twisting the Night Away (1962, RCA 2555); Sam Cooke and the Soul Stirrers (1963, SAR LPM-505); At the Copa (1964, RCA 2970); Unforgettable (1966, RCA 3517); Gospel Soul of Sam Cooke with the Soul Stirrers (1970, Specialty SPS-2128); The Soul Stirrers with Sam Cooke—That’s Heaven To Me (1970, Specialty SPS-2146); Two Sides of Sam Cooke (1970, Specialty SPS-2119); The Original Soul Stirrers (1971, Specialty SPS-2137); Forever Sam Cooke (1974, Specialty SPS-2164); Sam Cooke’s SAR Record Story (1994 ABKCO 2231-2).

COOPER, JACK L.

b. 18 September 1888; Memphis, TN

d. 12 January 1970; Chicago, IL

Pioneering black radio disk jockey from Chicago. Cooper began in radio in Washington, D.C., on WCAP doing comedy. In 1926 he moved to Chicago, and started a program on WWAE. He moved to WSBC in 1929 and began his “All Negro Radio Hour.” In 1931 he became the nation’s first black disk jockey when he began playing phonograph records on his show. By the late 1940s, Cooper was presiding over a huge radio empire, using a number of radio personalities (including his wife Trudi Cooper) who broadcasted a variety of music, news, quiz programs, and religious shows seven days a week on six stations—WSBC, WEDC, WHFC, WAAF, WJJD, and WXRT. Cooper's music programming was more refined than some of his later counterparts, refusing to play what was called gutbucket blues. As younger deejays and WGES took over the Chicago African American radio market during the 1950s, playing the blues music that the new black migrants from the South wanted to hear, Cooper's operation went into decline. Cooper went blind in 1959 and ended his radio career in 1961.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Passman, Arnold. "Jack Cooper: The First Black Disc Jockey." Popular Music and Society 16 (Summer 1992): 43–49.

COPELAND, JOHNNY "CLYDE"

b. 27 March 1937; Haynesville, LA
d. 3 July 1997; New York City, NY

Johnny "Clyde" Copeland, the son of sharecroppers Blanton and Ruthie Copeland, was born outside of Haynesville in northwestern Louisiana. By his first birthday, his parents had separated and Copeland moved with his mother to Magnolia, Arkansas. At age eight, he returned to Haynesville to visit his blues-singing father, who aroused the young Copeland's interest in the music and gave him his first guitar lessons. After his father's death a few years later, Copeland inherited his guitar and started practicing on his own. The family moved to Houston when he was thirteen, and he immediately began immersing himself in its vibrant blues scene. He soon befriended fellow fourteen-year-old guitarist Joe Hughes, who gave him lessons.

Influenced by T-Bone Walker and Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown, Copeland and Hughes formed the Dukes of Rhythm and played around Houston's Third Ward as well as nearby Galveston. He left the band in 1955 and, after gigging in west Texas for a few months, recorded for the first time on Clarence Samuels' "Chicken Hearted Woman" for Excello later that year. In 1957, after Johnny "Guitar" Watson's urging, Copeland signed with Don Robey's Duke Records. Although he never recorded for Robey, his contribution to the label came from a song he and Joe Medwick cowrote. Titled "Further Up the Road" and originally written for Copeland, Robey instead gave the song to Bobby Bland, whose recording of it reached number one on Billboard's R&B charts. Copeland's involvement remained uncredited.

Copeland finally got a chance to record as a leader in 1958 for Mercury, of which his recordings included "Rock 'n' Roll Lily." In 1963, after a couple of singles on the small All Boy label, he achieved his first regional success when he recorded "Down on Bending Knees" for Houston's Golden Eagle label. The record's popularity launched Copeland on a large tour of the Southern states.

Copeland worked with producer Huey Meaux throughout much of the 1960s, and recorded his soul-infused blues for several labels, including Wand and Atlantic. This association also led to a recording session with idol T-Bone Walker in the late 1960s. Copeland's music began drifting toward the increasingly popular soul sound and he was part of several soul package tours that performed throughout the country in the late 1960s. By the early 1970s, after a few singles on the Kent label, Copeland became frustrated by the declining Houston blues scene. Prompted by a friend's assurance that he could make a living playing blues in the North, he relocated to Harlem in 1975 and began gigging throughout the region. His constant performing paid off in 1979 when he signed with Rounder Records, with Copeland Special being released in 1981. His contemporary Texas sound, coupled with his strong songwriting, would be featured on seven releases for the label throughout the 1980s. He toured Africa in 1982, and returned in 1984 to become the first blues musician to record on the continent with Bringing It All Back Home, an album in which he incorporated both African music and musicians.

Copeland's greatest success came in 1985 with Showdown!, the Grammy Award-winning collaboration with Albert Collins and Robert Cray on Alligator Records. The popularity of this album catapulted his reputation as one of the country's top blues artists. In 1992, he signed a major-label contract with Polygram/Verve. Copeland produced three releases for the label and enjoyed worldwide touring on the club and festival circuit. His commanding, preacher-like vocal style and stinging, Texas guitar playing dominated his live performances.

In late March of 1995, his life changed drastically as his previously diagnosed congenital heart condition became critical when he suffered a heart attack after a show in Colorado. During the next two years, he would undergo eight open-heart surgeries and survived with the aid of the, at that time, new heart implant L-VAD (left ventricular assist device) while awaiting a heart transplant. Copeland made several public service appearances on several national television programs in 1995 about the new L-VAD technology that was keeping him alive. Throughout his serious condition, he continued to perform with the help of his teenaged blues-singing daughter Shemekia, who opened and sometimes closed the shows for her ailing father. Though in a weakened state, Copeland, aided on the road by wife Sandra, nevertheless gave strong performances both vocally and instrumentally. On New Years Day in 1997, he successfully received a new heart and his condition improved dramatically. Copeland returned to performing within a few months but was back in the hospital by the end of June to repair a leaky valve. Johnny Copeland died a few days later of complications from the surgery.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- Larkin; Santelli
Hudson, Kathleen, and Peter Lee. "Johnny Clyde Copeland." Living Blues no. 83 (November/December 1988): 12–21.
Pearlin, Victor. "Johnny Copeland." Living Blues no. 52 (Spring 1982): 12–13.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

- Albert Collins, Robert Cray, and Johnny Copeland. Show-down! (1985, Alligator ALCD 4743).
Johnny Copeland. Copeland Special (1981, Rounder RCD 2025).
———. Catch Up with the Blues (1993, Verve P2-21239).

COPELAND, SHEMEKIA

b. 10 April 1979; New York, NY

The daughter of Texas guitarist Johnny Copeland, Shemekia Copeland made her singing debut at Harlem's Cotton Club at age nine. Influenced by Koko Taylor and Etta James, Copeland also drew inspiration from male artists O. V. Wright and Muddy Waters. In 1995, her father's heart condition became serious and she spent the following two years opening his shows—giving her both national exposure and experience. Under her father's guidance, her powerful voice and charismatic stage presence developed quickly. After her father's death in 1997, Copeland signed with Alligator Records and continued to record and tour worldwide. In 2001, she was nominated for a Grammy.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Santelli

Discography: AMG

Wicked (2000, Alligator ALCD 4875).

COPLEY, AL

b. 1952; Buffalo, NY

Pianist cofounded Roomful of Blues with guitarist Duke Robillard in 1967. Left the band in 1984 to pursue a solo career, which has spanned jazz, blues, and R&B. Generally based out of Europe since leaving Roomful of Blues.

JIM TRAGESER

Discography

- Roomful of Blues* (1979, Island Records 9474).
Automatic Overdrive (1989, Black Top Records 1047).
Royal Blue (1990, Black Top Records 1054; with Hal Singer).

See also Robillard, Duke; Roomful of Blues

CORLEY, DEWEY

b. 18 June 1898; Halley, AR

d. 15 April 1974; Memphis, TN

Jug band musician of harmonica, kazoo, and washtub bass. Played frequently in the jug bands of Will Shade and Jack Kelly, then led his Beale Street Jug Band. Performed widely at festivals in the 1960s and 1970s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Eugene Chadbourne); Harris; Larkin
LaVere, Stephen. "Dewey Corley" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 18 (Autumn 1974): 7.

Discography: LSFP

COSSE, IKE

b. 1955

Singer and guitarist in the San Francisco Bay area. Initially playing blues-rock and jazz fusion styles, in

COSSE, IKE

1983 he began a four-year apprenticeship under saxophonist Joe Cuttley. Since then, he has led his own blues group and released three CDs, two of them through JSP Records.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelley)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelley)

COSTELLO, SEAN

b. 16 April 1979; Philadelphia, PA

He won the 1994 Memphis Beale Street Blues Society talent contest. Additional exposure was gained by guesting on the Susan Tedeschi CD Just Won't Burn (released 1998) and through his own releases on Landslide. His influences range from T-Bone Walker through postwar Chicago guitarists and Robert Lockwood to Stevie Ray Vaughan.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Hyslop, Tom. "Sean Costello's Got a Brand New Bag." Blues Revue no. 74 (February/March 2002): 8–12.

Discography: AMG

COTILLION

(See Atlantic/Atco/Spark)

COTTEN, ELIZABETH

b. 5 January 1895; near Chapel Hill, NC

d. 29 June 1987; Syracuse, NY

Elizabeth "Libba" Cotten told interviewers that she had music in her from the beginning, often repeating the familiar story of sneaking her brother's banjo out from under the bed. As an eleven-year-old, she did housework for a white woman at the rate of seventy-five cents per month to make enough money to buy a Stella guitar. She was already playing, but since she was not comfortable restringing her borrowed guitar, her extreme left-handedness led her to learn the instrument upside down and backward.

She will always be associated with the songs "Freight Train," "Babe It Ain't No Lie." and "Shake Sugaree," all of which she wrote. Nearer to blues ballads than blues, they are prime examples of Piedmont-style guitar playing and simple enough to serve as examples for beginning guitarists. Since the late 1950s, untold thousands of young folkies have used them precisely that way. Pressure from church authorities caused her to give up playing, and she continued to labor variously as a charwoman or a store clerk. A chance encounter with Ruth Crawford Seeger ("American Folk Songs for Children") led to a job in the Seeger household, where she surprised them one day by playing the family guitar. She apologized for playing when she should have been working, but the family encouraged her to pick up the guitar again. Libba's first recording, produced by Mike Seeger, was issued in 1957. Because it was one of very few recordings of an authentic black folk song, it became one of the most influential, especially in college communities. Libba spent the rest of her life playing coffeehouses, schools, festivals, and concerts, at an accelerating pace, until she passed away quietly in Syracuse at the age of ninety-two. By the time she died, she had been given a Grammy, been awarded a National Heritage Fellowship, and was included (with Rosa Parks, among others) in Brian Lanker and Barbara Summer's book, I Dream a World: Portraits of Black Women Who Changed America (New York: Stewart, Tabori, and Chang, 1989).

ANDREW M. COHEN

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Gerrard, Alice. "Elizabeth Cotten." Old-Time Herald 1, no. 2 (Winter 1987/1988): 11–13.
Seeger, Mike. "Elizabeth Seeger." Sing Out! 33, no. 1 (1987): 48–49.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Elizabeth Cotten: Negro Folk Songs and Tunes (1957, Folkways).
Elizabeth Cotten: Shake Sugaree (1967, Folkways).
When I'm Gone (1979, Folkways).
Elizabeth Cotten Live (ca. 1980, Arhoolie).

COTTON, JAMES

b. 1 July 1935; near Tunica, MS

James Cotton became one of the most popular post-war harmonica players. Over his career, he performed with Sonny Boy Williamson II (Aleck Miller), Howlin' Wolf, and Muddy Waters, and he became one of the biggest blues acts of the 1970s, working with the Grateful Dead, Santana, Steve Miller, Freddie King, and B. B. King, among others.

Cotton first learned to imitate a train and a hen cackle from his mother's harmonica playing, and thought that was the extent of the toy's possibilities—until he heard King Biscuit Time on the radio with Sonny Boy Williamson II. At age nine, orphaned, an uncle took Cotton to Helena to meet Williamson, who was impressed. Cotton began to perform with Williamson, which usually meant he collected money at the door while Sonny Boy performed, then performed while Sonny Boy gambled away the money.

Around 1950, Cotton moved to West Memphis with Sonny Boy, which is where Howlin' Wolf heard him. Wolf enlisted Cotton, using him on gigs and on recordings at Sun Studio. At Sun, Cotton was invited to cut his own sides, resulting in 1954's "Cotton Crop Blues," a reworking of Roosevelt Sykes's 1932 "Cotton Seed Blues." ("Raising a good cotton crop is just like a lucky man shooting dice" was one of the lyrics bemoaning the farmer's fate.) In West Memphis, Cotton played with guitarists Hubert Sumlin and Auburn "Pat" Hare, who favored a crunching, distorted sound years ahead of its time. Hare recorded with Cotton at Sun.

Not long after the record's release, Cotton was working as a gravel truck driver in West Memphis, Arkansas, finishing a Friday's work hauling gravel when a man approached, saying, "I'm Muddy Waters." Cotton had never seen a picture of Muddy Waters and had no expectations of meeting him. He looked at the stranger, tapped the vanishing half-pint of Echo Springs in his back pocket, said, "That's nice. I'm Jesus Christ." But it was Muddy Waters, whose band was short one harmonica player after Junior Wells had abandoned him in mid-tour, AWOL from the military. Cotton finished out the tour, then rented a room in Muddy's Chicago home. Otis Spann, also living at Muddy's, worked Cotton into the band. Cotton's former guitar mate, Pat Hare, soon followed him to Muddy's band.

Cotton was always a lively performer, and with Muddy he found a large audience for his antics. The band often warmed up the crowd for Muddy, and Cotton favored popular hits. He'd use a long microphone cord and work his way through the crowd; he'd spin, roll, and dance, even hang upside down from the rafters, sweat pouring from his brow, dripping from his garments. Audiences stuffed his clothes with money (all tips were shared by the band).

Cotton's first session with Muddy was for the tune "All Aboard." Leonard Chess was still using Little

Walter on recordings, but this song called for two harmonicas, and Cotton played the train sounds. Within short order, Cotton was a regular on Muddy's sessions, playing on tunes such as "I Live the Life I Love," "Evil," and the classic performance at Newport in 1960. Cotton stayed with Muddy until 1966 (though he also dropped out for a spell around 1961), during which time he became Muddy's bandleader. Cotton also served as a bridge to the burgeoning folk crowd, making himself available to the young white kids who were increasingly showing up at Muddy's shows. Cotton befriended Paul Butterfield, Charlie Musselwhite, Mike Bloomfield, and Peter Wolf, making them comfortable at gigs.

In 1966, Cotton set out on his own with the James Cotton Blues Band (sometimes billed as the Jimmy Cotton Blues Quartet), hitting the road. The first gig from the first tour was recorded, and released in 1998 as Late Night Blues (Justin Time Records). He recorded for Sam Charters on Vanguard's Chicago/The Blues/Today series, and released four albums under his own name before the decade was out. His high-energy performance landed him an opening slot on not one but two Janis Joplin tours. In the 1970s, Cotton was signed to Albert Grossman as manager; Grossman managed Bob Dylan among others. Cotton's albums were produced by Todd Rundgren, Mike Bloomfield, and Allen Toussaint. He was a successful crossover artist, his shows and recordings keeping him in front of the large rock 'n' roll audience.

In 1977, he rejoined Muddy Waters for the recording of Hard Again, Muddy's comeback album produced by Johnny Winter. The reunion was a success (the album won a Grammy), and Cotton joined Muddy and Johnny on tour, the three drawing big crowds around the world.

In 1984, he signed with Alligator Records, his second release there, Live from Chicago: Mr. Superharp Himself, earning him his first solo Grammy nomination. His 1987 album for Blind Pig Records, Take Me Back, also earned a Grammy nomination, as did James Cotton Live for the Antone's label in 1988. A bout with throat cancer in 1994 seemed not to slow him; he won his first Grammy in 1996 for Deep in the Blues.

ROBERT GORDON

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 Gordon, Robert. Can't Be Satisfied: The Life and Times of Muddy Waters. New York: Little, Brown, 2002.
 Lazar, Helen Doob. "James Cotton." Living Blues no. 76 (Fall 1976): 22–33.
 Tooze, Sandra. Muddy Waters: The Mojo Man. Toronto: ECW Press, 1997.

Discography: LSFP, AMG

Selected Recordings

100% Cotton (1974, Buddah Records).
Live from Chicago: Mr. Superharp Himself (1986, Alligator).
Live (1988, Antone's).
Deep in the Blues (1996, Verve).
Seems Like Yesterday (1998, Justin Time).

COUNCIL, FLOYD "DIPPER BOY"

b. 2 September 1911; Chapel Hill, NC
d. June 1976; Sanford, NC

Coached by friend Tom Strowd, Council was highly rated by his peers, including the Trice Brothers. He was the only guitarist other than Gary Davis that Blind Boy Fuller let "second" him on record. On his own and with Sonny Terry, he made eight sides, two still unsued. Though active through the 1940s and 1950s, his playing diminished in the early 1960s as the result of an unknown illness. He had a debilitating stroke shortly before Pete Lowry and Bruce Bastin located him. He is the "Floyd" in the rock band name "Pink Floyd."

ANDY COHEN

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Bastin, Bruce. Red River Blues, pp. 172, 224. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1995.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

COUN-TREE

Label active in 1964 in St. Louis, Missouri. Among its few known releases are two singles by Albert King: 1006, "Worsome [sic] Baby"/"COD," and 1007, "Threw Your Love on Me Too Strong"/"Lonesome."

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

COUNTRY MUSIC

Country Music Up to 1960

Black and white music styles and songs have merged, diverged, and remerged since Colonial times. Black musicians brought the banjo from Africa and learned European reels and waltzes on the fiddle. The southern plantation experience produced hymns, secular songs, and dance music that would influence music throughout the American South. By the 1820s, white entertainers had mastered the art of performing in blackface, and playing the fiddle and banjo in something like black style. The minstrel shows they developed remained popular through the nineteenth century, producing many popular songs. Even religious music found a place in minstrelsy, as "Hear Dem Bells," "Golden Slippers," and other black hymns were adapted for the popular stage.

After the Civil War, black entertainers formed successful troupes on their own, trading in part on their enhanced authenticity as "real coons." Though minstrelsy was on the wane by the 1890s, early records featured banjo-playing singers and soloists, so-called "coon shout" songs, and occasional examples of an emerging genre called "ragtime." Alongside these developments, white musicians maintained separate traditions and styles, from ancient narrative ballads to sentimental and comic songs, a variety of dance tunes, and hymns. Nevertheless, white and black music had many points of convergence. Many religious and secular songs enjoyed interracial appeal, and the fiddle and banjo became as essential to white southerners in the nineteenth century as they had been to early black plantation music. Those instruments have become passé in most country music since the 1940s, but they have persisted as basic elements of bluegrass.

"Country music" was a term created by the record industry in the 1950s. It is said to have begun in June 1923 (the exact date is unknown), when the popular entertainer Fiddlin John Carson made a record for the Okeh label in Atlanta. He sang in a raw, rural voice, accompanying himself on the fiddle, and Okeh was quite surprised when repeat orders for the record began to appear. Carson was quickly invited to record again, and other southern musicians soon followed his example. At first they traveled to New York, but gradually major labels began to carry recording equipment to southern cities, capturing a broad variety of regional blues and country talent.

The racial divide in the Old South was still firmly in place in the 1920s, but it nevertheless still permitted the cross-fertilization of white and black repertoire and style. Blues formed an important element of country music from the first, as Carson, Riley Puckett, Gid Tanner, Samantha Bumgarner, Henry Whitter, and Uncle Dave Macon all logged blues titles on record in 1923–1924. Macon's work was especially interesting, since he continued the performance practices, and sang many of the songs of the nineteenth-century minstrel stage.

By 1927, southern black blues performers, notably Blind Blake and Blind Lemon Jefferson, were producing records that would have immediate and long-term effects on white country music. In their wake came Jimmie Rodgers, a Mississippi-born brakeman who sang and yodeled the blues while playing his own rudimentary guitar accompaniments. His records sold well and influenced other performers, black and white. Some, including Mae Glover, Tommy Johnson, Gene Autry, and Cliff Carlisle, copied Rodgers closely on records of their own. Cajun French-language Rodgers-style pieces were made by Roy Gonzales and Sydney Landry in 1929.

In Rodgers' wake came a pair of Georgia natives, Tom Darby and Jimmie Tarlton, whose 1927 coupling "Columbus Stockade Blues"/"Birmingham Jail" became a hit at the same time as Rodgers' first "Blue Yodel." Buoyed by Tarlton's primitive slide guitar, the pair recorded many blues-oriented songs between 1927 and 1933. They were followed by the Allen Brothers (Lee and Austin) from Chattanooga, whose rowdy deliveries enhanced their popular cover versions of Charlie Jackson's "Salty Dog Blues" and a number of original blues that became their hallmark. Like Darby and Tarlton, their popularity waned during the Great Depression, but the Allens were the forerunners of many 1930s brother duets. A number of them leaned heavily on the blues.

Cliff and Bill Carlisle from Wakefield, Kentucky, both worked in the Jimmie Rodgers orbit during the early 1930s. Cliff and his Hawaiian guitar were featured on radio and records in 1930. He backed Rodgers on some 1931 records and formed a duet with his younger brother Bill in 1933. Bill was an impressive flat-picking guitarist whose country music career continues to this day, with regular appearances on the Grand Ole Opry. Together they evolved away from the Rodgers style, though they retained an affinity for the blues, especially in a number of good-naturedly outrageous songs that dealt with sexual bragging and domestic strife.

In 1934 the Callahan Brothers (Walter and Homer) from Asheville, North Carolina, recorded "St. Louis Blues," a cover of minstrel show veteran Emmett Miller's 1928 version. They duplicated Miller's distinctive yodel in duet harmony and had a hit. Many blues-oriented pieces followed during their 1934–1939 stay with the American Record Corporation. Their cover of Bill Carlisle's 1933 "Rattlesnake Daddy" inspired a related song by Blind Boy Fuller in 1935, and 1940s versions by the Bailey Brothers and Hawkshaw Hawkins.

The Delmore Brothers (Alton and Rabon) from northern Alabama did more than anyone except Bob Wills to plant the blues firmly into the country music agenda. A 1931 record, "Got the Kansas City Blues," heralded their new style, though the Depression precluded significant sales. In 1933 they landed on the Grand Ole Opry in Nashville, and recorded their signature piece for Bluebird, "Brown's Ferry Blues." The Depression notwithstanding, it became a major seller, inspiring Alton Delmore to write many more like it. In the 1940s, they recorded numerous blues and boogie-based tunes for King Records, scoring hits with "Freight Train Boogie" and "Blues, Stay Away from Me," among others.

White musicians in areas with large black populations were particularly vulnerable to the blues. In Texas, the young fiddler Bob Wills toasted Bessie Smith with a version of "Gulf Coast Blues" in 1929 on a trial recording that went unissued and has been lost. When he joined forces with singer Milton Brown to form the Light Crust Doughboys band, they adapted Georgia Tom Dorsey's "Eagle Ridin' Papa" as the band's radio theme song, and recorded Dorsey's "Nancy Jane" on their first release in 1932. When Brown formed his own Musical Brownies, his repertoire featured blues along with country and pop tunes. Wills then built his Texas Playboys band on an even broader blues foundation, recycling the compositions of Bessie Smith, Lucille Hegamin, W. C. Handy, Memphis Minnie, Big Bill Broonzy, and Tampa Red, among others, and fashioned new blues on his own. Wills's longtime vocalist Tommy Duncan paid an impressive tribute to Blind Lemon Jefferson in 1941 with "Honey, What You Gonna Do."

The broad influence of Bob Wills and Milton Brown inspired many more Texas string bands, most of whom also relied on the blues. Among them were Bob's younger brothers Johnnie Lee, Billy Jack, and Luther (Luke) Wills, who formed fine Western swing bands of their own. Johnnie Lee's first records in 1941 included Tampa Red's "Too Long" and Kokomo Arnold's "Milk Cow Blues." The latter became a hit and remained identified with Johnnie Lee throughout a long career. Billy Jack led an accomplished band in Sacramento, California, during the 1950s that played a lot of blues, stylishly embellished with bop and proto-rock licks.

The Maddox Brothers and Rose was a family band that fled Alabama for California in 1933. Its members were still adolescents when they sang Memphis Minnie's "I'm Talking About You" on a surviving 1940 Sacramento broadcast. They recorded a few more blues during their salad years from 1947 to 1957 and made cover versions of several bluesy Hank Williams hits.

Bill Monroe learned music in his youth from the legendary black Kentucky fiddler and guitarist Arnold Shultz, who died in 1931. Shultz never recorded, though his name was associated with the influential Kentucky bluesmen John Byrd and Walter Taylor, who did. When he was young, Monroe recalled playing guitar behind Shultz's fiddling and learning from it. Shultz also pioneered finger-style guitar playing, teaching a young white student, Kennedy Jones, who passed the style to Mose Rager, who in turn instructed Ike Everly (father of the Everly Brothers) and Merle Travis. Travis himself became a model for a young Chet Atkins, who taught himself to play from listening to early 1940s Travis broadcasts. Travis's affection for a blues repertoire is evident from surviving live recordings, and his guitar playing was always blues informed. Bill Monroe created a new musical genre called "bluegrass," symbolically resuscitating the fiddle and banjo from plantation minstrelsy. Blues and other bluegrass songs about loneliness and alienation combined with hoedowns, waltzes, and hymns were fundamental to Monroe's aesthetic. His sensibilities influenced generations as bluegrass became an enduring music.

King Records in Cincinnati played a major role in injecting blues and R&B into country music in the 1940s, mainly through efforts of the creative black producer Henry Glover, who routinely cross-fertilized the company's country and Race catalogs, in part to increase royalties to King's publishing arm, Lois Music. Thus King's staple country artists, including Moon Mullican, Clyde Moody, the Delmore Brothers, the York Brothers, and Hank Penny, all helped to put blues and songs from the emerging R&B genre on country radio and jukeboxes in the 1940s and early 1950s. They also became forerunners of 1950s rockabilly, a genre created when Memphis producer Sam Phillips encouraged Elvis Presley to sing the blues in the same fashion as the black performers who recorded for Phillips's Sun label. Blues weren't Elvis's first choice, but he did them superbly, redirecting Sun toward other white southerners who performed blues-informed music. These included Johnny Cash, Carl Perkins, Roy Orbison, and Jerry Lee Lewis who, with Presley, quickly superseded Sun's black performers.

Country Music Since 1960

The 1940s saw the wide popularization of two styles. One was "Western music," cowboy and cowboy-themed songs sung by Gene Autry (who was doing so in Republic film westerns in the 1930s), Roy Rogers (sometimes with the Sons of the Pioneers), Tex Ritter, and, a little later, Marty Robbins. The other was "honky tonk," preceded in the 1930s and early 1940s by fiddler Cliff Bruner (formerly with Milton Brown), Floyd Tillman, and Buddy Jones. The great honky-tonk figure was Hank Williams, born and raised in Birmingham, Alabama, and taught some guitar rudiments by a local black musician, Rufe "Teetot" Payne. His first hits were "Lovesick Blues," a reworking of the 1928 Emmett Miller record, and "Move It on Over," a twelve-measure (4 + 8) verse and refrain blues. His blues-injected music proved popular through his MGM Records releases and his Grand Ole Opry appearances, and he has been influential to singers, who have imitated Williams's singing and rerecorded his songs through the present day. Other "honky tonk" musicians through the 1950s include Ernest Tubb, Lefty Frizzell, Webb Pierce, and Hank Snow.

In 1952 Kitty Wells recorded the country chart number one hit "It Wasn't God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels," and into the following decade a number of women followed her success, including Jean Shepherd, Patsy Cline, and Loretta Lynn. The same period also heralded the arrivals of Porter Wagoner, the Louvin Brothers, Conway Twitty, and George Jones. Jim Reeves was a popular artist in the United States, and an influential one in Ireland. As the 1960s continued, Johnny Cash outgrew his rockabilly beginnings, Merle Haggard came forth, Buck Owens with the guitarist Don Rich established "the Bakersfield Sound" with Fender Telecaster guitars, and Charlie Pride of Sledge, Mississippi, became one of the first black stars of country and western.

Television and country went back together as far as Tennessee Ernie Ford's program in the 1950s, and by the early 1970s the annual Country Music Association awards show aired regularly, several syndicated shows, including Hee Haw, were introduced, and Glen Campbell was a media personality as well as a country singer. Singer/songwriters such as Kris Kristofferson, Tom T. Hall, and Willie Nelson were each recognized in his own right. Nelson, Waylon Jennings, and Tompall Glaser spearheaded "the Outlaws" trend in the mid-1970s to counter the trend of Nashville country music records to sound more like mainstream popular music. One singer who went in the commercial direction was Dolly Parton, who began the 1970s as a member of the Porter Wagoner troupe and ended the decade as a solo country/pop star on all the record charts. Other notable women recognizable to the general public were Tammy Wynette and Tanya Tucker, with Loretta Lynn recording a successful series of duets with Conway Twitty.

Meanwhile, an "alternative country" was developing, initially with Bob Dylan and the Byrds in the late 1960s, continuing with The Band, John Prine, and Jimmie Dale Gilmore in the next decade. Other artists who began on this fringe but are now established show headliners are J. J. Cale, Lucinda Williams, Joe Ely, Nanci Griffith, and Steve Earle. Within the last twenty years, mainstream country music has seemed more like popular music. Still, some top acts have taken much from previous styles, such as Emmylou Harris, Ricky Skaggs, and more recently the Dixie Chicks. New male voices have been heard, like Dwight Yoakam, Randy Travis, George Strait, Travis Tritt, Vince Gill, and Garth Brooks, along with the women Reba McEntire, Mary Chapin Carpenter, and Trisha Yearwood. Alabama and the Judds proved to be among the most popular recording acts of the 1980s. Dave Grisman and Bela Fleck, two artists trained in older music, have pushed various musical boundaries for guitar and banjo, respectively. Yet the biggest recent phenomenon appears to be the soundtrack music CD to the 2000 film O Brother Where Art Thou, whose high sales indicate wide interest in the country music before 1935.

DICK SPOTTSWOOD (TO 1960)
EDWARD KOMARA (SINCE 1960)

Bibliography

- Allen, Bob. The Blackwell Guide to Recorded Country Music. Oxford, UK: Blackwell, 1994.
- Ginell, Cary, and Kevin Coffey. Discography of Western Swing and Hot String Bands, 1928–1942. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2001.
- Kingsbury, Paul, ed. The Encyclopedia of Country Music. New York: Oxford University Press, 1998.
- Meade, Guthrie T., Jr., Dick Spottswood, and Douglas Meade. Country Music Sources. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2002.
- Russell, Tony. Country Music Records: A Discography, 1921–1942. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004.

COURTNEY, TOM “TOMCAT”

b. 22 or 23 January 1929; Marlin or Waco, TX

Longtime San Diego, California, blues mainstay, singer-guitarist Tomcat Courtney first cut his teeth as opening act/backup guitarist for Guitar Slim. He moved to San Diego in 1971, and spent two decades leading the house band at the Texas Teahouse in hippie enclave Ocean Beach. During the 1980s, Courtney often shared a bill with popular San Diego roots rockers the Beat Farmers and Mojo Nixon. He has recorded several self-released CDs, and remains a popular draw in southern California.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography: Harris

Curtiss, Lou, and John Payne. “Tomcat’s Blues: Tom Courtney.” Living Blues no. 20 (March/April 1975): 36–37.

COUSIN JOE

b. Pleasant Joseph, 20 December 1907; Wallace, LA
d. 2 October 1989; New Orleans, LA

Singer, pianist, guitarist, composer. Cousin Joe’s fluent piano, insouciant singing, and inventive compositions such as “Box Car Shorty and Peter Blue” made him a popular New Orleans entertainer and prolific recording artist whose career spanned four decades from the mid-1940s. He worked with A. J. Piron, Harold DeJean, Joseph Robichaux, Mezz Mezzrow, Dizzy Gillespie, Sidney Bechet, Charlie Parker, and Billie Holiday.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Harris
Joseph, Pleasant “Cousin Joe,” and Harriet J. Ottenheimer. Cousin Joe: Blues from New Orleans. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987.

Discography: LSPF

COVINGTON, ROBERT

b. Robert Lee Travis, 13 December 1941; Yazoo City, MS
d. 17 January 1996; Elk Grove Village, IL

Robert Covington learned drums as a boy and played in the St. Francis High drum and bugle corps and also in the R&B band Melvin and the Downbeats. He left Alcorn College (now Alcorn State) when Big Joe Turner, in town on tour, needed a drummer for several months. A fine singer as well as a drummer, he fronted the Lee Covington Revue, with whom he had the regional hit, “I Know,” in 1962, and toured with Ernie K-Doe and Ted Taylor.

After arriving in Chicago in 1965 Covington worked with Little Walter Jacobs, and later found regular work with Bob Stroger, Buddy Guy, Junior Wells, Lonnie Brooks, Fenton Robinson, and Aron Burton, who introduced him to the North Side club scene. In 1983 he landed a ten-year stint with Sunnyland Slim’s band, working alongside Bob Stroger, Steve Freund, and Sam Burckhardt, a well-balanced unit that made good use of his professional metrical skills and accommodated his soulful balladry. His steady backbeat and warm baritone vocals were featured on two numbers on the ensemble's only full-length recording, Chicago Jump, issued in 1985 by Red Beans (reissued on Evidence).

Following Sunnyland's retirement, Covington sang at Chicago's Kingston Mines club and continued to work with Stroger as a founding member of Mississippi Heat, appearing on their Singing Straight from the Heart album in 1992. His only solo collection is The Golden Voice of Robert Covington, recorded for Red Beans in 1988 (reissued on Evidence), on which he sang six original compositions, including "I Want to Thank Ya," "Better Watch Your Step," "I Don't Care," and the subtle and seductively soulful lead track "Trust in Me." He also recorded with Johnny Littlejohn, James Cotton, Lacy Gibson, Casey Jones, and Aron Burton.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

AMG (Michael Erlewine)

Discography: AMG

The Golden Voice of Robert Covington (Evidence 26074-2; reissue).

COW COW BLUES

Charles "Cow Cow" Davenport was born in 1894 in Anniston, Alabama, into a religious family. He attended Alabama Theological Seminary, but was expelled and gravitated to working as a pianist in honky tonks in Birmingham, Alabama, and Atlanta, Georgia. In his teens he worked in various traveling minstrel shows and carnivals, and also had a spell as a brothel pianist in the Storyville district of New Orleans. He had his greatest success in vaudeville, first appearing as Davenport & Co, partnered by singer Dora Carr, and then as the Chicago Steppers, with Ivy Smith, both on the TOBA circuit. In 1929 he became staff arranger/composer for Vocalion, but later returned to the stage with his Chicago Steppers revue. The venture failed and, burdened with debts, he spent a short time in prison, which affected his health. Despite sporadic comeback attempts, he never achieved his former popularity again. A stroke in the late 1930s affected his playing but in the early 1940s he was back, touring with his wife, Peggy, a snake dancer. Now restricted to singing, he performed only sporadically, eventually retiring to Cleveland where he died, almost forgotten, in 1955.

His most famous composition is "Cow Cow Blues." "Cow cow" refers to the so-called cow catcher on a train, not to Davenport himself; it was only after he began performing the song, which proved immensely popular, that he acquired the nickname "Cow Cow." "Cow Cow Blues" is a classic, its complicated bass patterns heavy, yet with an inexorable pulse. The way in which the melody line switches from bass to treble is particularly notable. Davenport, with Dora Carr, first recorded it for Gennett on October 1, 1925. The record sold well and other versions followed for Brunswick, Vocalion, and Paramount. The composition was also available in sheet music and as a piano roll on Vocal Style.

A tough, uncompromising pianist, Davenport's varied recorded work ranges from "Alabama Strut," a two-handed barrelhouse composition exhibiting Davenport's characteristic version of the walking octaves bass, with the accent on the first note of each couplet, to "Atlanta Rag," a version of Scott Joplin's "Pineapple Rag." Other fine recordings include "Slum Gullion Stomp," which uses a walking octave boogie-woogie bass, sometimes carrying the melody in the left hand; "Mama Don't Allow No Easy Riders," with a bass in tenths and a catchy melody similar to the New Orleans song "Winin' Boy," with detectable marching band influences; "Back in the Alley," taken at a fast tempo and containing many of his most typical flourishes; and "Mooch Piddle," which was unusual for Davenport in that it had a predominantly four-to-the-bar chorded bass.

It has been alleged that at least some of the riffs of "Cow Cow Blues" are derived from earlier pieces, such as "Trilby Rag" (1915, Carey Morgan). Henry Callen's accompaniment to Lucille Bogan's "Lonesome Daddy Blues" (1923) also uses similar phrases. Although the generic theme may have been around for some time, Davenport's version, in which the left-hand melody begins on the fourth beat of the bar, is quite distinctive. Other pianists who adapted the "Cow Cow Blues" melody to their own compositions were Mississippian Louise Johnson, in "On the Wall" (1930), and Chicago-based Clarence Lofton in "Streamline Train" (1936), accompanying Red Nelson. There is also a mandolin version by Charlie McCoy entitled "That Lonesome Train Took My Baby Away" (1930) and a harmonica version by DeFord Bailey, "Davidson County Blues" (1928).

In the postwar period, the popular song "Cow Cow Boogie" is a completely different composition. The "Cow Cow Blues" theme did, however, reappear as "Mess Around" by Ray Charles (1953) and Roy Byrd (Professor Longhair) (1978).

BOB HALL

Bibliography

Davenport, Cow Cow. "Cow Cow and the Boogie-Woogie." In The Jazz Record; reprinted in Art Hodes and Chadwick Hansen, eds., Selections from the Gutter. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1977.

COX, IDA

b. Ida Prather, 25 February 1896; Toccoa, GA

d. 10 November 1967; Knoxville, TN

Blues singer. Long regarded as one of the finest of female blues singers, her reputation rests on her Paramount recordings made in the 1920s and, to a lesser extent, a number of later recordings.

Life

Cox was born Ida Prather and grew up in Cedartown, Georgia. She showed an early interest in music, singing in the local church choir. Her professional career began in her early teens when she ran away with White & Clark Black & Tan Minstrels around 1910, debuting with the popular hit "Put Your Arms Around Me, Honey." She then toured extensively with other minstrel companies, including the Rabbit Foot Minstrels and Pete Werley's Florida Cotton Blossom Minstrels, where she met her first husband, Adler Cox. The couple briefly managed the Douglass Hotel in Macon, Georgia. However, in about 1920, she returned to show business, touring on the TOBA circuit. During this period, she worked with the seminal jazz pianist Jelly Roll Morton (Atlanta, 1920).

She began working for Paramount in 1923. Billed as "The Uncrowned Queen of the Blues," her records sold well from the first and she recorded regularly for the company until the beginning of the Depression. Her status with Paramount is shown in her being featured in the Paramount Book of Blues (ca. 1927), a publication celebrating the company's most popular race artists.

As well as making records, she continued to work as a top-line entertainer in black vaudeville throughout the 1920s, touring widely along the East Coast and in the South. An important musical association at this time was the pianist Jesse Crump whom she married sometime around 1927. He had first joined her show in 1923 and thereafter became her principal accompanist. Cox also associated with major jazz musicians like the cornetist King Oliver with whom she frequently performed in Chicago at the Plantation Club and elsewhere.

In about 1929, she organized her own company titled Raisin' Cain, which became the first TOBA show to open at Apollo Theater in Harlem. The company was commercially successful and toured widely during the Depression. During the 1930s, Cox performed both in her own revues and with musicians such as Bessie Smith (Fan Waves revue, Apollo Theater, 1934) and Billie and Dede Pierce (Florida, ca. 1935).

In 1939, her career revived under the auspices of promoter John Hammond who booked her for the second of his From Spirituals to Swing concerts in Carnegie Hall. This led to her first recordings in ten years, for Vocalion and OKeh. She continued to be booked for theater and club dates during the 1940s, but after suffering a stroke around 1945, she only worked sporadically. She settled in Buffalo, New York, from 1945 to 1949 and then moved to her daughter's home in Knoxville, Tennessee, where she remained for the rest of her life, living in semi-retirement. A final recording session for the Riverside label took place in New York in 1961 with the Coleman Hawkins Quintet. She died in 1967 of cancer.

Cox was unusually level-headed for a blues performer. As her colleague, the pianist Lovie Austin noted, "She never led the wild life the rest of us did." She had an excellent business sense and it was this, as well as her musical talent, that enabled her to survive as a theatrical producer and performer in the cut-throat world of black theater for more than three decades.

Music

Cox's recorded legacy falls into three periods: the Paramount era of 1923–1929, the 1939–1940 recordings instigated by Hammond, and the 1961 Riverside LP. Of these, the Paramount sessions are by far the most important, not only because of the quantity of records they produced (eighty-seven different tracks along with a number of alternate takes), but also because of their consistently high level of musical excellence. She is in fact regarded as one of the consummate female blues vocalists of the 1920s. While her voice is not as intense as that of her two main rivals, Bessie Smith and "Ma" Rainey, it is nevertheless remarkably strong, capable of charging even a second-rate lyric with a highly wrought emotionalism. Like most other vaudeville blues artists, her diction is always clear.

An example of her artistry, taken almost at random from her extensive output, is the 1925 recording “Coffin Blues.” The theme is that of the singer lamenting at the wake of her lover (this composition is one of a series of blues recorded by Cox based on the death of a lover, the most famous example being “Graveyard Dream Blues” from 1923). Cox’s singing is filled with pathos and is of the utmost sincerity. Its power is greatly enhanced by the use of harmonium, suggestive of a church organ, and cornet as accompaniment. This unusual combination was undoubtedly influenced by Bessie Smith’s famous recording of “St. Louis Blues,” issued a few months earlier. Here, however, the particular aptness of the harmonium to the funereal theme gives an extra dimension.

Cox’s recorded repertoire revolved almost exclusively around blues. (How accurately this reflects her stage repertoire is not altogether clear, though it is probable that her live performances incorporated a wider variety of material.) Almost three-quarters of her Paramount recordings are classic blues (that is, using twelve-bar stanzas and AAB texts). Nearly all the remaining numbers are blues of one type or another. Two exceptions are her cover of the 1916 pop standard “I Ain’t Got Nobody” and the novelty song “Scootle De Doo.”

Cox is important as a composer as well as a vocalist and up to half her Paramount recordings may have been either self- or co-composed. Although she often incorporated traditional folk strains in her lyrics, many use original themes in a most effective way. For example, “Wild Women Don’t Have the Blues” (1924) advises the listener to get “real wild” as “You never get nothing by being an angel child” (here, as in many of her recordings, the listener is assumed to be female). Structurally this number is also unusual, with each twelve-bar stanza consisting of a two-line verse and a one-line refrain. (Cox also successfully experimented with this form in 1928’s “Worn Down Daddy.”)

The Paramount sides are noted for their accompaniments. Until 1926, Cox’s recordings are dominated by the Paramount house pianist Lovie Austin who accompanied her either solo or with a band that included top jazz musicians of the day such as cornetist Tommy Ladnier, clarinetist Johnny Dodds, and trombonist Kid Ory. From 1927, her husband, Jesse Crump, was her main pianist on record. His accompaniments, whether solo or with a band, are also of remarkably high standard.

The 1939–1940 sessions produced six sides that are hardly musically inferior to the earlier recordings and benefit from superior sound quality. Again, the accompaniments—including clarinetist Edmond Hall and guitarist Charlie Christian—are exemplary. This is also true of the 1961 LP, though, almost inevitably, Cox’s voice had somewhat deteriorated by this time.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography: AMG (Scott Yanow and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern

- Albertson, Chris. Sleeve notes to Ida Cox: Blues Ain’t Nothin’ Else But... (Milestone LP 2015).
 Bourgeois, Anna Strong. Blues Women: Profiles of 37 Early Performers. Jefferson, NC: McFarland & Co., 1996.
 Chilton, John. Who’s Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street, 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: DaCapo, 1985.
 Harrison, Daphne Duval. Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
 “Ida Cox Is Dead; Blues Singer, 78.” New York Times (November 12 1967): 1/87.
 Stewart-Baxter, Derrick. “Ida Cox Sings the Blues.” Jazz Journal nos. 7/6 (June 1954): 13–14.
 Von Arx, Rolf. “A Glimpse at the Golden Years of Ida Cox.” 78 Quarterly no. 11 (ca. 2001): 109–122.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

- Blues for Rampart Street* (Origin Jazz Classics 1758).
Ida Cox: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order (Document Records DOCD-5322-3525 and 5651).

CRAFTON, HARRY “FATS”

Flourished 1940s–1960s

Singer, guitarist, songwriter in the jump-blues style. Emerged from Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, after World War II with releases on small labels. His important work was done in the early 1950s for the Gotham and Jarman labels with various musicians, including bandleader Doc Bagby and young organist Jimmy Smith. Little is known about him after he left the Nite Rider Orchestra in the early 1960s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder)

Discography: AMG (Bruce Eder)

CRAIG, “LEFT HAND” FRANK

(See Left Hand Frank)

CRAWFORD, JAMES “SUGAR BOY”

b. 12 October 1934; New Orleans, LA

Recorded one of New Orleans’s most famous Carnival songs, “Jock-A-Mo.” Crawford was one of the finest rhythm and blues vocalists produced by the active New Orleans scene of the 1950s. At an early age, he learned the piano and while attending Booker T. Washington High School formed his own band, in which he played trombone. The band was later christened the “Chapake Shawee,” based on an instrumental the group performed. A chance break came in 1952 when Crawford performed over Doctor Daddy-O’s local radio program. The exposure led to a recording contract with Aladdin Records and regular club work in New Orleans. The Chapake Shawee recorded one session for Aladdin, but failed to produce a hit. Nevertheless, Crawford’s local popularity grew and he played regularly in such local clubs as the Dew Drop Inn, the Tijuana, and the Joy Lounge.

In 1953 Crawford and his group the Cane Cutters moved to the Chess label and in 1954 recorded his most significant hit, “Jock-A-Mo,” a tune based on a Mardi Gras Indian chant. The Mardi Gras Indians are African American carnival organizations who mask as Indians and wear intricately designed beadwork costumes. Each “tribe” maintains a varied repertoire of songs performed in a patois unique to the Indians. The song later became a hit for the Dixie Cups under the title “Iko Iko.” The Cane Cutters, which included such New Orleans talent as Ernest Holland, Smokey Johnson, David Lastie, “Big Boy” Myles, Batman Rankin, and Billy Tate, took a long-term gig as the house band at the Carousel Club in Baton Rouge. By 1956 the group was back in New Orleans. Crawford then joined the Imperial Records roster and produced some fine titles that enjoyed success in the South. Some of his better Imperial titles were “Morning Star,” “She’s Gotta Wobble (When She Walks),” and “I Don’t Know What I’ll Do.” Crawford’s mastery of the ballad shows in these recordings, cementing his reputation as one of the finest singers to emerge from New Orleans.

He later recorded for the Motel and Ace labels, having a local hit with “Danny Boy” on the former. Crawford’s career was very successful regionally, and he kept an extensive touring schedule. But the tense racial environment of the early 1960s violently halted his career. In 1963 outside of Monroe, Louisiana, police stopped Crawford for allegedly speeding and driving under the influence. He was pistol whipped by the police, developed paralysis, and remained incapacitated for almost two years. A brief comeback failed to revive his career, and Crawford has since dedicated his singing to church performances. Crawford works today as a locksmith. His legacy stills exerts an influence through his recordings and the career of his grandson Davell Crawford.

KEVIN S. FONTENOT

Bibliography

- Berry, Jason, Jonathan Foose, and Tad Jones. Up from the Cradle of Jazz: New Orleans Music Since World War II. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1986.
- Hannusch, Jeff. “Backtalk: James ‘Sugar Boy’ Crawford.” Offbeat XV, no. 2 (February 2002): 99–101.
- . I Hear You Knockin’: The Sound of New Orleans Rhythm and Blues. Ville Platte, LA: Swallow Publishing, 1985.

Discography: LSFP

Sugarboy Crawford (Chess -2-9215).

CRAY, ROBERT

b. 1 August 1953; Columbus, GA

Guitarist, singer, songwriter. One of the most popular artists during the 1980s blues revival, Robert Cray has proven that a bluesman can still achieve popular recognition and remain true to his influences. Early in his life, Cray’s family moved around the country and overseas because his father was in the U.S. Army, but Cray’s family eventually settled in Tacoma, Washington. Cray learned to play the guitar, formed the Robert Cray Band in 1974, and toured around the Northwest, playing at various colleges and in small clubs. In 1978 the band released its first album, Who’s Been Talkin’, on the Tomato label, which then folded. The band did not release another album until 1983: the long-awaited Bad Influence, which features Cray originals such as “Phone Booth,” “Bad Influence,” and “Where Do I Go from Here?” This album also highlights one of the seminal influences on Cray’s vocals/guitar work—Magic Sam.

Not long after the next album, False Accusations (1985), was released, Cray teamed up with Albert Collins and Johnny Copeland on Showdown! (1985), a super blues guitarist collaboration that earned Cray and his veteran collaborators a Grammy Award for Best Traditional Blues album. Even this successful recording venture could not have prepared Cray for the monumental success of his next album, Strong Persuader (1986). Three singles—“Smokin’ Gun,” “Right Next Door (Because of Me),” and “Guess I Showed Her”—all made the Billboard rock Top Forty with “Smokin’ Gun” reaching as high as #2. The album also charted high, reaching #13. After this widespread success, Cray’s touring proved far more lucrative and helped, along with the growing popularity of Stevie Ray Vaughan and others, to create a late 1980s blues revival in the United States.

The follow-up album to Strong Persuader, Don't Be Afraid of the Dark, also produced a hit tune—the title track. While Cray didn't buckle or change under this newfound fame, the line-up of his band did change, as longtime bass player Richard Cousins and drummer Dave Olson departed. His next album, Midnight Stroll (1990), took on a Stax-soul groove with the Memphis horns backing all the tracks. Besides a 1990 reissue of his first album Who's Been Talkin', entitled Too Many Cooks, Cray spent some time reinventing his blues sound, which hit full stride again on 1993's Shame + a Sin backed by the solid rhythm section of Kevin Hayes on drums and Karl Sevareid on bass, accompanied by Jim Pugh on organ/piano and Albert Collins on guitar/harmonica. With blues and soul still at the forefront of this “new” Robert Cray Band's repertoire, recent albums have been particularly well received by critics. The band's last two efforts Take Your Shoes Off (1999) and Shoulda Been Home (2001) are excellent CDs: the former featuring a Memphis soul-blues tune, “Love Gone to Waste,” and numerous other soul-based songs such as “That Wasn't Me” and “24-7 Man”; and the latter featuring the rocking blues songs “Baby's Arms” and “Love Sickness” along with the slow soulful tunes “Already Gone,” “Anytime,” and “No One Special.”

JUSTIN WERT

Bibliography

Larkin

“Living Blues Interview: Robert Cray Doesn't Hitchhike to Gigs Anymore.” Living Blues no. 73 (1987): 22–27.

“The Next Generation.” Living Blues no. 90 (March/April 1990): 47.

Discography: AMG

Bad Influence (1983, Hightone 8001).

Showdown! (1985, Alligator 4743).

Strong Persuader (1986, Mercury/Polydor 8305681).

Take Your Shoes Off (1999, Rykodisc 10479).

Shoulda Been Home (2001, Rykodisc 10611).

CRAYTON, CONNIE CURTIS “PEE WEE”

b. 18 December 1914; Liberty Hill, TX

d. 25 June 1985; Los Angeles, CA

Connie Curtis Crayton was born on December 18, 1914, in Liberty Hill, a small community near Rockdale, Texas, sixty miles outside of the state capital of Austin, where the family soon moved. His nickname came from his father who named him after a favorite piano player. He relocated to Los Angeles in 1935, later moving north to Oakland. Crayton was inspired to pick up guitar after witnessing T-Bone Walker at a local club and enlisted Walker to teach him the rudiments of the instrument. Another major influence during this period was John Collins, a guitarist who had played with Nat King Cole. Crayton started playing in the local clubs and eventually joined Ivory Joe Hunter's band. With Hunter he made his 1946 debut on the Pacific label with “Seventh Street Boogie” and appeared on several other Hunter records over the succeeding year. Shortly after, he cut his first single under his own name for the Gru-V-Tone imprint.

He signed with the Los Angeles-based Modern label in 1948, hitting big with the instrumental “Blues After Hours” which scaled to number one on the R&B charts at year's end. “Texas Hop” hit number five on the charts the same year, followed the next year by “I Love You So,” which reached number six. Crayton cut prolifically for the label until 1951 but subsequent records failed to chart. Crayton moved briefly to Aladdin and, in 1954, Imperial. Under Dave Bartholomew's production, Crayton made many notable sides in New Orleans, including “Every Dog Has His Day,” “Do Unto Others,” and “Runnin' Wild.”

From there, Crayton landed at Vee-Jay in the late 1950s, and during the early 1960s cut singles for Jamie, Guyden, Edco, and Smash. Crayton cut album sessions for Vanguard and Blue Horizon with a final album for the Murray Brothers label in 1983. By the 1980s he was playing regularly at blues festivals both domestically and in Europe. Pee Wee Crayton died of a heart attack at his Los Angeles home June 25, 1985.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Santelli Blau, Ellen. “Living Blues Interview: Pee Wee Crayton” [part 1]. Living Blues no. 56 (Spring 1983): 5–16; [part 2]. Living Blues no. 57 (Autumn 1983): 6–9, 36–47.

Slavin, Neil. Notes accompanying Blues After Hours—The Essential Pee Wee Crayton (2002, Indigo 2526).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings in Reissue

Complete Aladdin & Imperial Recordings (1996, Capitol 36292).
Blues After Hours—The Essential Pee Wee Crayton (2002, Indigo 2526).

See also Aladdin/Score; Hunter, Ivory Joe; Imperial; Modern/Flair/Meteor/Kent/RPM; Walker, T-Bone

CRAZY CAJUN RECORDS

The Crazy Cajun record label is synonymous with legendary record producer Huey P. Meaux. One of the label's biggest hits was Barbara Lynn's "You'll Lose a Good Thing" (1962), but most of the label's successes lay outside of the R&B and blues realm. Still Meaux recorded a number of blues performers, including Johnny Copeland and Lowell Fulson.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

Larkin (under "Meaux, Huey")
Bernard, Shane K. Swamp Pop. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1996.

Discography: AMG; McGrath

See also Copeland, Johnny "Clyde"; Fulson, Lowell; Lynn, Barbara; Meaux, Huey P.

CREACH, PAPA JOHN

b. 28 May 1917; Beaver Falls, PA
d. 22 February 1994; Los Angeles, CA

Johnny "Papa John" Creach was an electric violinist and vocalist whose career spanned lounge music, jazz, country, blues, and rock. He moved to Chicago at the age of about eighteen and led the Chocolate Drops and Chocolate Music Bars. By the mid-1940s he was based in Los Angeles, recording for Excelsior as Johnny Creach's Majors and Minors. In the early 1950s the Johnny Creach Trio recorded popular material for Dootone. He recorded five blues titles with Roy Milton in 1960–1961. Shortly afterward he followed violinist Ginger Smock for a residency on the SS Catalina before settling at the Parisian Room in Los Angeles.

He remerged in 1970 as Papa John Creach with the rock groups Jefferson Airplane, Jefferson Starship, and Hot Tuna. Throughout the 1970s he also recorded eponymous blues rock albums. His lyrics for "Hezekiah" on the 1978 album Inphasion are almost certainly in tribute to Hezekiah Stuff Smith, with whom he recorded privately in 1964 in a violin trio including Ginger Smock. In 1992 Creach recorded his only CD, a blues album with the Bernie Pearl Blues Band. Creach's playing, like his singing, was hip and funky. While his ballad work exhibited instability and the limits of his technique, he dug deep with bent horn-like notes on the blues. Fast fiddle lines were characterized by a trademark combination of tremolo with flurries of descending arpeggios. The video documentary Papa John Creach: Setting the Record Straight (1987) teams him with Eddie "Cleanhead" Vinson. Creach also acted in movies: Jacob in A Gathering of Old Men (1987) and John Devil in Revolving Doors (1988).

ANTHONY BARNETT

Bibliography

Lieberman, Julie Lyonn. Blues Fiddle, pp. 49–53, including three transcriptions. New York, 1986.
———. Rockin' Out with Blues Fiddle, pp. 52–53, including a Lieberman transcription based on Creach's style. New York, 2000.
Liner notes to Papa Blues (1992, Bee Bump BBCD03).

Discography

Big Joe Turner accompanying Creach and orchestra on "Give Me an Hour in Your Garden" from "Papa John Creach: Filthy!" (1971, LP Grunt FTR1009).
Johnny Creach. "Ode to Danny Boy/Three in Love" (ca. 1961, 45 Era 3190). Creach and Orchestra.
———. "Majors and Minors Boogie Woogie on Strings" (1946, 78, Excelsior 183).
———. "Cotton and Corn Blues/Black World Blues" (1946, 78, Excelsior 181; accompanied by Helen Andrews).
Papa John Creach. "Hezekiah" from "Papa John Creach: Inphasion" (1978, LP DJM DJM18).
Papa John Creach with the Bernie Pearl Blues Band. "Papa Blues" (1992, Bee Bump BBCD03).
Red Callender Sextette. "Atomic Love" (1952, 78, Hollywood 239; accompanied by Little Caesar).
Roy Milton. "Early in the Morning" (1960, 45, Lou Wa 1002; 45 Warwick M549).
———. "R. M. Blues" (1960, 45, Warwick M591).
———. "So Tired" (1961, 45, Warwick M662).

CREAM

British power trio, more influential on heavy rock scene than blues. Ginger Baker (drums) formed band with Eric Clapton (guitar) and Jack Bruce (bass) in 1966. Debut album featured distinctive reworkings of blues staples like "I'm So Glad," "Spoonful," "Rollin' and Tumblin'." Disraeli Gears was more psychedelic in approach and established the band as a major commercial success in United States, especially the single "Sunshine of Your Love." Live concerts featured extended improvisations on both original material (mainly by Bruce and poet Pete Brown) and blues songs. Wheels of Fire contained studio and live recordings, including their hit "White Room," and their famous rendition of Robert Johnson's "Cross Road Blues" ("Crossroads"). Increasingly strained personal relationships and an incessant touring schedule broke up the band at the peak of its popularity in 1969.

KENNY MATHIESON

CREAM

Bibliography

Welch, Chris. Cream: Eric Clapton, Jack Bruce and Ginger Baker, The Legendary 60s Supergroup. London: Backbeat, 2000.

Discography

Fresh Cream (1966, Reaction 593001).
Disraeli Gears (1967, Reaction 593003).
Wheels of Fire (1968, Polydor 582031/2).
Goodbye Cream (1969, Polydor 583053).
Live Cream (1970, Polydor 2383016).
Live Cream, Vol. 2 (1972, Polydor 2382119).

CRIPPEN, KATIE

b. 17 November 1895; Philadelphia PA
d. 25 November 1929; New York, NY

Singer who had two short recording sessions with the Fletcher Henderson Orchestra for the Black Swan label in 1921. She had been singing in small clubs and cafes, and after 1921 she worked her way up to revues and the Keith-Albee-Orpheum and RKO theater circuits. She died of cancer.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

CROCHET, CLEVELAND

b. 6 June 1921; Hathaway, LA

Fiddler and singer in Cajun style. Worked as a farmer in the Lake Charles, Louisiana, area, playing weekends with local musicians. Best known for his 1960 regional hit "Sugar Bee" (Goldband 1106) with singer/steel guitarist Jay Stutes.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Leadbitter, Mike, with Eddie Shuler. "Mr. Sugar Bee: Jay Stutes and Cleveland Crochet." Blues Unlimited no. 21 (April 1965): 10–11.

CROCKETT, G. L.

b. George L. Crockett, ca. 1929; Carrollton, MS
d. 15 February 1967; Chicago, IL

Chicago blues singer of the 1950s and 1960s. Crockett began his career singing in Chicago performing stand-up blues in West Side clubs under the name of George Crockett. He first recorded in 1957 for Mel London's Chief label, producing the single "Look Out Mabel," an up-tempo blues that sounded like a rock 'n' roll record. As a result it became a collectible in rockabilly circles. Crockett's next recording opportunity only came in 1965, when he recorded for Willie Barney's Four Brothers label, getting a national hit with "It's a Man Down There." It was sung in a Jimmy Reed drawl style but was based on Sonny Boy Williamson's "One Way Out." Crockett followed with another Jimmy Reed soundalike, "Every Goodbye Ain't Gone," that sold well. Before he died, Crockett recorded a third, but unsuccessful, single for Four Brothers.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. "Jack Daniels and the Four Brothers/Bright Story." Juke Blues no. 14 (Winter 1988/89): 8–13.

Discography: LSFP

CROSS ROAD BLUES

(See Straight Alky Blues)

CROTHERS, BENJAMIN "SCATMAN"

b. 23 May 1910; Terre Haute, IN
d. 22 November 1986; Van Nuys, CA

Popular entertainer "Scatman" Crothers is best remembered for his roles as a film and television actor. But his career began in music, and he was one of the first musicians of the big band era to embrace rhythm and blues.

Crothers began earning money as a teenager by playing drums in the local speakeasies around his hometown of Terre Haute, Indiana. After dropping out of high school, he moved to Chicago and got work in the bigger speakeasies singing for mobsters like Al Capone. It was also in Chicago that he first formed his own band. Crothers apparently picked up the stage name of Scatman (sometimes spelled "Scat Man") in the 1930s for his ability to improvise vocally, or scat. There are reports that he played with Louis Armstrong and T-Bone Walker, and his own local band at one point featured future Count Basie sideman and Tonight Show band member Snooky Young on trumpet.

Crothers moved with his band to Los Angeles in the late 1940s seeking better opportunities. The 1950s found him among the first rhythm and blues artists—mining a musical style similar to what the much younger Ray Charles and Charles Brown were doing. However, as acting work became more regular, his involvement with music lessened to the point that the latter half of his career was focused primarily on acting. However, he did continue recording intermittently, and he wrote and sang a song on an album Young did with fellow Basie alumni Marshal Royal in 1978.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Haskins, Jim, and Helen Crothers. Scatman: An Authorized Biography of Scatman Crothers. New York: William Morrow, 1991.

Discography

Rock 'n' Roll with Scatman (1956, Tops 1511).

Gone with Scatman (1960, Craftsman 8036).

Big Ben Sings (1973, Motown 777).

Snooky & Marshal's Album (guest singer/composer, 1978, Concord 4055).

Meet Me at the Fair (1953, Universal Pictures).

CROWN

Record label, based in New York City and managed by Eli Oberstein; operated from 1930 to 1933. It reissued blues records originally on Paramount by such artists as the Mississippi Sheiks and Blind Blake. Oberstein subsequently reissued some of these again on his later Varsity label, which also used material from Gennett and Paramount that Crown had apparently acquired and not itself issued.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Sutton

Olson, Robert R., and Bill Korst. “Two Hits for Two Bits.” Crown Record and Master Listing. Zephyrhills, FL: Joyce Record Club, 1993.

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

CRUDUP, ARTHUR WILLIAM “BIG BOY”

b. 24 August 1905; Forest, MS

d. 28 March 1974; Nassawadox, VA

The life story of Arthur “Big Boy” Crudup is, in many unfortunate ways, a fairly typical one. Born shortly after the turn of the century in southern Mississippi and raised in poverty, he was forced from an early age to focus more on the pressing concerns of immediate survival than on the development and expression of his significant talent. Even after he became a professional musician, his career was hampered by simple bad timing and, later, by the exploitation of an unscrupulous manager; Crudup abandoned music entirely for a significant period and only found a modicum of commercial success and popularity late in life. He was the composer of Elvis Presley’s breakout hit “That’s All Right, Mama,” and largely for that reason Crudup is one of several black musicians to have been called the “Father of Rock ‘n’ Roll”—yet it took the intervention of third parties many years later to ensure that he would reap even a small amount of financial benefit from his tremendously popular songs.

Early Life and Musical Development

Arthur Crudup was born to a poor rural family in southern Mississippi in 1905. He showed musical promise early on, and like many of his contemporaries, he seemed to have had his first significant musical experiences in church, where he performed as a singer beginning around age ten. He acquired the nickname “Big Boy” as a child, working primarily as a manual laborer during his youth and early adulthood. Crudup developed a serious interest in the blues during his twenties, but did not begin to learn the guitar until age thirty-two, at which point he took lessons from a local bluesman known as Papa Harvey. While Crudup’s guitar technique would never develop beyond a fairly rudimentary level, his sweet-toned but chesty tenor voice and his skill as a songwriter were enough to secure him irregular spots at juke joints and parties in the area. These jobs eventually dried up, however, as the regional economy declined and musical tastes shifted, and by the late 1930s Crudup was reduced to playing on street corners for change.

Crudup’s fortunes began to improve around 1940, when he joined a gospel quartet called the Harmonizing Four. He moved with that group to Chicago in 1941, but soon turned away from gospel music and resumed playing the blues, though he found little more commercial success in the big city than he had in the Delta. He was living in a crate under an elevated train track and playing once again for spare change on street corners when Lester Melrose, a local agent and talent scout for the RCA Victor company and its Bluebird imprint, heard him and invited him to play at a house party that evening to be hosted by Hudson “Tampa Red” Whittaker. Crudup arrived to find that he would be playing for the likes of Big Bill Broonzy and Lonnie Johnson, who were also attending the party. His performance there made a strong impression on all present, convincing Melrose to sign Crudup to a contract with RCA.

Arthur “Big Boy” Crudup in the 1950s. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

The Father of Rock ‘n’ Roll

Between 1941 and 1956, Crudup recorded more than eighty sides for Melrose and RCA, among them such popular songs as “Rock Me, Mama,” “Mean Old Frisco Blues,” and “Shout Sister Shout.” But it was “That’s All Right, Mama” that would bring him the greatest notoriety. The young Elvis Presley heard Crudup’s recording of that song and adapted it to his own R&B-rockabilly style; it was one of three songs he recorded at the beginning of his relationship with Sam Phillips’s Sun Records label, and was released as his first single in the summer of 1954. The local response to Presley’s recording of Crudup’s song was tremendous, and suddenly Presley was on his way to becoming not only the avatar of a new and wildly popular style of music, but one of the central icons of American pop culture.

Meanwhile, Crudup continued to struggle financially. He was recording regularly and achieving significant success with his songs, and others were having even greater success with their own versions of his compositions. Yet it was his label and manager who reaped the benefits; royalty payments never reached Crudup himself. Also, his spare and sometimes rough Delta style was out of fashion in Chicago, where a louder and more richly orchestrated approach (often involving a horn section, electric guitars, and piano) had already become popular. Crudup continued to make ends meet by playing in small clubs and recording pseudonymously for other labels, sometimes using the name Elmer James, and sometimes borrowing the name of his son, Percy Lee. In the late 1940s he gave up on Chicago and returned to southern Mississippi and the juke joint circuit.

Withdrawal and Return

By the mid-1950s Crudup's enduring influence was assured; his music was being recorded by respected black bluesmen as well as white musicians, and his songs had entered the rock 'n' roll canon. But his own financial situation continued to deteriorate, and at this point he began to fully realize the extent to which he had been swindled earlier in his career. He finally left the music business around 1956, returning to farmwork. He played and recorded sporadically around the Delta for the next ten years, until blues promoter Dick Waterman found him and encouraged him to take advantage of the folk music craze and the new interest it had generated in rural blues music among white urban audiences. Waterman worked to recover some of the back royalties that were due to Crudup (eventually securing sixty thousand dollars on his behalf) and helped him join the East Coast touring circuit. For the next few years Crudup played various folk and blues venues and even made television and film appearances in Europe and the United Kingdom. Near the end of his life, he toured the United States in support of Bonnie Raitt. Crudup continued working until his death by stroke in 1974.

RICK ANDERSON

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
George-Warren, Holly, and Patricia Romanowski, eds.
Rolling Stone Encyclopedia of Rock & Roll. Rev. ed.
New York: Rolling Stone Press, 2001.
- Leadbitter, Mike. "Big Boy Crudup: Arthur 'Big Boy' Crudup Talks to Mike Leadbitter, 3/3/70" [part 1]. Blues Unlimited no. 75 (September 1970), 16–18; [part 2]. Blues Unlimited no. 76 (October 1970), 18; [part 3]. Blues Unlimited no. 77 (November 1970), 19.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSPF

Selected Recordings

- Mean Ol' Frisco* (1960, Fire LP 103).
Crudup's Mood (1969, Delmark LP 621).
Look on Yonder's Wall (1969, Delmark LP 614).
Roebuck Man (1974, Sequel LP 210).

CRUMP, JESSE "TINY"

- b. 15 January 1897; Paris, TX
d. 21 April 1974; San Francisco area, CA

Pianist and organist. A birth year of 1906 has been frequently cited. Echoes of his experience in vaudeville and the TOBA circuit may be heard in his 1929 recordings with Billy McKenzie. He also accompanied his then-wife, Ida Cox, on Paramount recordings. He spent his later life in California, including the San Francisco bay area.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR

CUBY AND THE BLIZZARDS

Formed in 1965. Original members were Harry "Cuby" Muskee (vocals, harmonica), Eelco Gelling (lead guitar), Hans Kinds (guitar), Willy Middel (bass), and Dick Beekman (drums). Regarded as the leading blues band in the Netherlands in the 1960s. Its early singles like "Stumble and Fall" had a rock edge, but it earned its blues credentials partly through recording with Eddie Boyd on its second album Praise the Blues. It also backed singer Van Morrison on an early tour following his departure from the group Them. In the 1970s, it drifted more into progressive rock, and charter member Eelco Gelling left to join the rock group Golden Earring.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger); Larkin

Discography: AMG (Richie Unterberger); Larkin

CURTIS, JAMES "PECK"

- b. 7 March 1912; Benoit MS
d. 1 November 1970; Helena AR

Peck Curtis was best known as the drummer with Sonny Boy Williamson in the King Biscuit Boys from Helena, Arkansas. Peck performed with a changing assortment of musicians who played with the band on KFFA radio's King Biscuit Time show for about twenty-five years in Helena, and it was he who in fact acted as de facto bandleader, holding things together during the long periods when Williamson was not around, and for a few years after Sonny Boy's death in 1965. Peck would often sing the theme song and sometimes tap danced on a plywood board placed in front of the microphone.

CURTIS, JAMES “PECK”

King Biscuit guitarist Robert Jr. Lockwood claims to have bought Peck his first set of drums shortly after Lockwood and Williamson hired him, in early 1942. Although KFFA has been reputed to be the first station in the region to broadcast the blues, Curtis had played in a band with guitarist Calvin Frazier on KLCN radio from Blytheville, Arkansas, in the 1930s.

Curtis started out playing washboard and fashioned his first homemade drum kit out of a washboard, wash tub, and door hinge. He began following carnivals and minstrel shows, danced on stage, and for a while played jug with the South Memphis Jug Band. In the 1930s he worked with Robert Johnson, among others. During his tenure on King Biscuit Time, Peck also played juke joints and nightclubs with Houston Stackhouse, Joe Willie Wilkins, Driftin' Slim, and others in Arkansas and Mississippi.

Curtis and fellow King Biscuit entertainer Robert “Dudlow” Taylor recorded in Helena for the Modern label in 1952, but the sides remained unissued until Kent Records released a few on a vintage blues LP series in 1970. Folklorist George Mitchell also recorded Peck reciting the story of “The Death of Sonny Boy Williamson” and singing a few more songs with Houston Stackhouse and Robert Nighthawk in 1967, with tracks ending up on Arhoolie and Testament.

JIM O'NEAL

Bibliography

- Evans, David. “Peck Curtis: Interview” [part 1]. Blues Unlimited no. 69 (January 1970): 10–13; [part 2]. Blues Unlimited no. 70 (February/March 1970): 9–12.
- O'Neal, Jim. “Houston Stackhouse.” In The Voice of the Blues. London and New York: Routledge, 2002.

Discography: LSFP

CUSIC, EDDIE

b. 4 January 1926; Wilmot, MS

An acoustic guitarist, singer, and songwriter, Cusic's roots are firmly set in the Mississippi Delta, as one can hear on such notable tracks as “Catfish Blues” and “Ludella” on his recording I Want to Boogie.

JUSTIN WERT

Discography

- I Want to Boogie* (1998, HMG 1005).

D

DALE, LARRY

b. Ennis Lowery, 7 January 1923; Wharton, TX

Guitarist Larry Dale was born Ennis Lowery in Wharton, Texas, in 1923. Dale moved to New York City in 1949 and became an active session guitarist. His first recordings, in 1954, were on the Groove and Herald labels. His recording credits are wide ranging, including sessions with the Cleftones, Frankie Lymon and the Teenagers, and most notably with Champion Jack Dupree, including the 1958 album, Blues from the Gutter. Dale, along with pianist Bob Gaddy, formed the Houserockers in 1953, one of the top R&B groups of the New York/New Jersey area. In 1956 Dale joined the jazz band of Cootie Williams with whom he remained for many years. In 1960 Dale recorded "Let the Doorbell Ring," one of his most effective covers, for the Glover label.

As the blues revival of the 1960s waned during the 1970s, Dale supported himself playing in various wedding and cover bands. In 1987 both Larry Dale and pianist Bob Gaddy were reintroduced to blues audiences when they were featured at the Blues Estafette in Utrecht, Holland. During that time, Dale recorded for the Juke Blues label, and both he and Bob Gaddy played with the New York-based group Killing Floor. They were featured (along with Roscoe Gordon) in a concert presented by the World Music Institute. Dale's Texas-style guitar playing is sparse and direct. It has often been described as biting, but his razor sharp solo lines are underpinned by a cool textured guitar sound that adds a sense of urgency to his playing.

GEORGE BOZIWICK

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin
Broven, John. "Larry Dale: The New York Houserocker."
Juke Blues no. 9 (Summer 1987): 4–8.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

DALLAS

(See Texas)

DALLAS, LEROY

b. 12 December 1920; Mobile, AL

Traveled the South with Frank Edwards during the years immediately before World War II. After a brief stay in Chicago, Dallas arrived in New York City in 1943. His 1949 Sittin' In With label session with Brownie McGhee and Big Chief Ellis showed that city living had not affected his rural style of blues. In 1962 he recorded two tracks for the Storyville/Milestone labels. His activity since then is unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

DALLAS STRING BAND

Flourished 1920s

The Dallas String Band, whose core members were Coley Jones, Marco Washington, and probably Sam Harris, were a trio or quartet of mandolin(s), guitar, and string bass, with vocal refrains by Jones and often other bandsmen. Their antique style, with its harmonized choruses in the manner of a glee club, and their repertoire of composed blues and popular songs seem to identify them as one of those string groups, described in some jazz memoirs, that played on the streets and in bars at night in cities like New Orleans. The instrumental “Dallas Rag” has been much reissued.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)

Discography: DGR

DANCE: ARTISTIC

Finding a cohesive definition of the term “blues” is very difficult. Generally the themes deal with death, love, or poverty, but they can also be joyful or satirical. The origins of the blues lie in black American slave work songs, spirituals, and sorrow songs from the southern plantations of the United States. These sorrow/work songs—that is, blues—aided the slaves in surviving the inhumane and unusual circumstances of their lives. The blues acknowledge the ups and downs of life, with the hope of moving onward and upward. This survival instinct of the blues has manifested itself in works of dance created by many choreographers and dancers.

Choreographers and dancers such as Fred Astaire, Paul Taylor, Alvin Ailey, Talley Beatty, Donald McKayle, and John Butler have been influenced by the blues. The squalor of London’s notorious East End district, Limehouse, is aptly depicted by Fred Astaire and Lucille Bremer in MGM’s Ziegfeld Follies (1943) in the “Limehouse Blues” number. In 1956 Paul Taylor used the blues to mount his “3 Epitaphs.” The dancers were dressed in matte black and did a slow drag, bumping and grinding for the entire number, with seemingly no hope of ever changing their lives for the better.

The life and work of the choreographer Alvin Ailey (1931–1989) were influenced by the blues. Born in Rogers, Texas, but raised in Navasota, Texas, by a single mother, he was stigmatized by the poverty and racism of the times. However, he found enjoyment in the town’s nightclubs, where he heard the blues, and in the Baptist churches, where he heard spirituals. When Ailey was eleven years old, he and his mother left Texas for Los Angeles. He began studying dance in 1949, and by 1954 had departed for New York. Both his dancing and choreography were critically well received. He formed his own dance troupe—Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater—in 1958. At the company’s first performance that same year, he premiered “Blues Suite.” The choreography of “Blues Suite” is a cycle, with ups and downs during the day. It ends with the indication that everything will start over again the next day. “Blues Suite” was a resounding hit. The dance piece “Cry,” which paid respect to the resilience of black women and especially to Ailey’s mother, was another hit for the company, and was also strongly influenced by the blues.

The blues themes of love and death were to be found in choreographer Talley Beatty’s (1918?–1995) 1959 work, “Road of the Phoebe Snow.” The work tells of an interracial love affair and resulting death along the Erie Lackawanna railroad tracks.

Donald McKayle’s “Rainbow Round My Shoulder” (1959) portrays the murder of a prisoner on a chain gang. The other members of the chain gang feel sorrow for the murder, but are not surprised at the occurrence and are powerless to make right the injustice.

Singer Billie Holiday’s troubled life was certainly fodder for the blues, and “Portrait of Billie” (1960) was John Butler’s (1920–1994?) paean to this gifted singer. Other singers whose lives inspired dance pieces by Alvin Ailey were rock stars Janis Joplin and Jim Morrison.

The blues themes of love and love lost continue to permeate the dance world. In November and December 2000, at the fortieth anniversary celebration of the Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater at the City Center in New York, former Ailey dancer Carmen de Lavallade choreographed a pas de deux, “Sweet Bitter Love,” to the songs of Donny Hathaway and Roberta Flack.

The blues has now become a fine art. It permeates the culture from motion pictures and Broadway to opera.

MONICA J. BURDEX

Bibliography

Emery, Lynne Fauley. Black Dance: From 1619 to Today, 2nd rev. ed. Hightstown, NJ: Princeton Book Company Publishers, 1988.

Long, Richard A., and Joe Nash. The Black Tradition in American Dance. New York: Rizzoli, 1989.

DANCE: AUDIENCE PARTICIPATION

The core aesthetics features of traditional black performance style—dance, body movement, audience participation, and call and response—are integral to the blues, gospel, and other traditional African American musical genres. In the African American tradition, total involvement of all—performers and audience—is expected. There is not a clear line between performers and audience, and in some sense all are performers. Total involvement means giving one hundred percent and involving your entire body in the process. It also means engaging your audience and compelling them to respond. Through melodic and textual repetition and embellishment, rhythmic and timbral contrast, and call and response, the audience is drawn in and expressive intensity is built.

Dance and audience participation have been integral to the blues from the beginning. A great deal of blues music and many popular black dance styles originated in juke joints—the so-called “bawdy” or “pleasure” houses of music, dancing, drinking, and gambling in the South. These music and dance styles migrated north with African Americans to Chicago and Harlem where they were introduced to a wider audience via black musicals. In addition, new dances were invented in the big ballrooms of Harlem and Chicago.

Dancing was integral to the vaudeville performances of the women who first recorded the blues starting in 1920. These traveling shows featured chorus lines of dancing women along with blues divas who used their bodies—hands, face, feet—as well as their voices to engage and involve their audiences. In “Ma Rainey’s Black Bottom” (1927), the “Mother of the Blues” sings about learning and teaching the then-popular dance that folklorist/fiction writer Zora Neale Hurston says originated in the “black bottom” area of Nashville, Tennessee, which was introduced to the stage in Dinah (1924). A second popular dance of the period is celebrated in the vaudeville song “I Wish I Could Shimmy Like My Sister Kate,” and a third dance was popularized through James P. Johnson’s stride piano piece, “The Charleston,” featured in Running Wild (1923).

Many black dances, from the cakewalk to Ballin’ the Jack and the Big Apple, show a clear resemblance to the ring shout, a sacred tradition from the antebellum period in which music and dance were integrally connected and which Samuel Floyd posits as the ancestor of all modern black music and dance. “I must note here the near-inseparability of Afro-American music and dance in black culture, both in the ring and outside it. The shuffling, angular, off-beat, additive, repetitive, and intensive unflagging rhythms of shout and jubilee spirituals, ragtime, and rhythm and blues; the less vigorous but equally insistent and characteristic rhythms of the slower ‘sorrow songs’ and the blues, and the descendants and derivatives of all these genres have been shaped and defined by black dance” (p. 138). Like the ring shout, many black dances involve counterclockwise circular motion, a shuffling step in which the feet stay close to the ground, hand clapping, and rotating or undulating hip movements.

Boogie-woogie began as an upbeat style of piano blues designed to accompany the dance. In the inspired classic “Honky Tonk Train,” first recorded in 1927, Meade Lux Lewis captures the sounds and rhythms of the crowded, seat-less express trains furnished only with an upright piano that carried blacks to visit family members in the South. In “Pinetop’s Boogie Woogie” (1928) Clarence “Pinetop” Smith talks to the dancing crowd, directing them when to stop and when to “boogie.” The style migrated after World War I from the lumber and turpentine camps of the deep South and Texas to Chicago and New York where it became an institution at Depression Era rent parties, and to Kansas City where it was incorporated into riff jazz. The performance by Albert Ammons, Meade Lux Lewis, and Pete Johnson at the “Spirituals to Swing” concert in Carnegie Hall (1938) led to the commercialization of boogie-woogie in mainstream swing music and also to its integration into early rhythm and blues music, especially in the jump blues of Louis Jordan.

As in earlier styles and eras, the beat and popularity of rhythm and blues music in the 1940s were closely tied to the slick dances of that period. It was the dancing along with the energy of the performers and audience that appealed to young whites and led to the birth of rock ‘n’ roll. “The great artists of the era, showstoppers or housewreckers like [Wynonie] Harris, utilized whatever choreography or instrumental highjinx it took to work their audience. . . . Blow-top sax players fell out, lying on their backs kicking at the air. T-bone Walker and Guitar Slim played their guitars behind their backs or leaped in the air and landed in splits. Vocal groups and small jump bands put together frantic stage routines with all manner of synchronized moves, fancy footwork, dramatic stops, and extended grooves. Like athletes, rhythm and blues artists gave their all. . . . In turn the audiences appreciated the effort, responding in kind, feeding energy back to the on-stage stars” (Pearson, p. 327).

In the 1950s when R&B transitioned to rock ‘n’ roll, multiple-performer concerts in big cities replaced the intimate dance-oriented shows on makeshift stages in the black section of small towns, and the music began to be separated from the dance. This trend continued in the 1960s as the face of the blues began to change with more whites becoming involved and many blacks gravitating to soul, funk, disco, and rap.

DANCE: AUDIENCE PARTICIPATION

Dance and audience participation are integral to the meaning and function of the blues in African American culture. In Albert Murray's words: "The people for whom blues music was created are dance-beat-oriented people" (p. 189). "Music which is not sufficiently dance-beat oriented is not likely to be received with very much enthusiasm by the patrons of downhome honkytonks, uptown cabarets, and ballrooms. . . . Music can be sweet (and low and ever so slow), or it can be hot (and also fortissimo and up-tempo) so long as it has the idiomatic rhythmic emphasis that generates the dance step response . . . the incantation must be so percussion oriented that it disposes the listeners to bump and bounce, to slow-drag and steady shuffle, to grind, hop, jump, kick, rock, roll, shout, stomp, and otherwise swing the blues away" (p. 144).

MARIA V. JOHNSON

Bibliography

- Burnim, Mellonee V. "The Black Gospel Music Tradition: A Complex of Ideology, Aesthetic and Behavior." In More Than Dancing: Essays on Afro-American Music and Musician, edited by Irene Jackson, pp. 147–167. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1985.
- Emery, Lynne Fauley. Black Dance: From 1619 to Today, 2nd rev. ed. Hightstown, NJ: Princeton Book Company Publishers, 1988.
- Floyd, Samuel A., Jr. "Ring Shout! Literary Studies, Historical Studies, and Black Music Inquiry." In Signifyin(g), Sanctifyin,' & Slam Dunking: A Reader in African American Expressive Culture, edited by Gena Dagal Caponi, pp. 135–156. Amherst: University of Massachusetts, 1999.
- Murray, Albert. Stomping the Blues. New York: Vintage, 1976.
- Pearson, Barry. "Jump Steady: The Roots of R & B." In Nothing But the Blues: The Music and the Musicians, edited by Lawrence Cohn, pp. 313–345. New York: Abbeville, 1993.
- Shaw, Arnold. Honkers and Shouters: The Golden Years of Rhythm and Blues. New York: Collier, 1978.
- Wilson, Olly W. "The Association of Movement and Music as a Manifestation of a Black Conceptual Approach to Music-Making." In More Than Dancing: Essays on Afro-American Music and Musicians, edited by Irene Jackson, pp. 9–23. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1985.

DANCELAND

Label run in Detroit from 1948 through 1951 by Morry Kaplan (1910–). Named for the Danceland dance hall located in the west side of Detroit. Candy Johnson's "Stampin'" (Danceland 399) was the label's hit. Other important artists were John Lee Hooker (recording as Little Pork Chops) and Tony "Blues" Lewis.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography and Discography

- Levy, Jon. "The Danceland Years." Blues and Rhythm no. 103 (October 1995): 6–7.

DANE, BARBARA

b. Barbara Jean Spillman, 12 May 1927; Detroit, MI

Barbara Dane has combined scholarship and the pursuit of social justice with her love of blues, jazz, old time Americana, union songs, protest songs, Nueva Trova, and many other genres. In her sixty-year career, she has broken down numerous cultural barriers and collaborated with other artists from an enormous variety of backgrounds and walks of life. She has shared stages, recording studios, and TV spotlights with performers as diverse as Louis Armstrong, Pete Seeger, Bob Dylan, Mikis Theodorakis, the Chambers Brothers, Lightnin' Hopkins, Muddy Waters, Memphis Slim, Little Brother Montgomery, Ray Skjelbred, Reverend Gary Davis, Pablo Menendez and Mezcla, Silvio Rodriguez, Joseito Fernandez, and Carlos Puebla.

Through her travels and collaborations, Dane created an informal network of activist artists from every continent. Out of this network she founded Paredon Records, producing nearly fifty albums of their work out of her back bedroom and kitchen table. She later donated the catalog to Smithsonian/Folkways. Notable albums are her first, Trouble in Mind, and latest, What Are You Gonna Do When There Ain't No Jazz?

ANDY COHEN

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
Barbara Dane website, <http://www.barbaradane.net>.

Discography: Lord

DANIELS, JACK

b. 23 December 1936; Crossett, AR

Chicago record company executive and producer active in the 1960s and 1970s. Daniels moved up from the South to Chicago in 1954, but did not become involved in the music business until 1965, when he recorded “It’s a Man Down There” on G. L. Crockett for Willie Barney’s Four Brothers label. At the company, Daniels handled administration, A&R, production, and promotion. Other artists recorded by Daniels included Johnny Moore, Junior Wells, Ricky Allen, and Tyrone Davis. During 1968–1969, Daniels worked for Mercury, getting hits on such blues and soul acts as Johnny Moore, Junior Parker, and Junior Wells, after which he went into independent production. Daniels also collaborated with Johnny Moore on many hit records, notably “Turn Back the Hands of Time” for Tyrone Davis. Daniels went into the liquor distribution business in 1972.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. “Jack Daniels and the Four Brothers/Bright Story.” Juke Blues no. 14 (Winter 1988/89): 8–13.

DANIELS, JULIUS

b. 20 November 1901; Denmark, SC

d. 18 October 1947; Charlotte, NC

A warm singer and an elegant player of the twelve-string guitar, Daniels made a handful of finely conceived recordings in 1927, some in collaboration with guitarists Bubba Lee Torrence or Wilbert Andrews. They embrace reels, gospel songs, and blues, including the first recording of the very widespread “Crow Jane.”

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

AMG (John Bush); Larkin
Bastin, Bruce. Red River Blues. Basingstoke, Hampshire, and London: Macmillan, 1986.

Discography: DGR

DARBY, IKE “BIG IKE”

b. 7 December 1933; Philadelphia, MS

d. 6 September 1988; Mobile, AL

Born and raised on a farm in Neshoba County, Mississippi, Darby moved to New Orleans in 1949. He served in the U.S. Army during 1951–1953, after which he settled in Mobile, Alabama. From 1963 he performed as a singer of blues and soul and worked as a radio deejay. He also owned a record store in Mobile.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Nelson, David. “Big Ike Darby” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 87 (July/August 1989): 34.

Discography: LSFP

DARBY, TEDDY

b. Theodore Roosevelt Darby, 2 March 1906; Henderson, KY

d. Unknown, East St. Louis, IL

Aka “Blind Teddy” and “Blind Squire Turner.” Theodore Roosevelt Darby worked in a barrel factory until glaucoma blinded him around 1926. Known as a violent man, he was taught guitar in prison. Entrepreneur Jesse Johnson took him to Paramount in 1929 with Roosevelt Sykes, Lee Green, Ike Rodgers, and others where he recorded four charming country blues. The rest of his recording career with Vocalion, Victor, and Decca saw him concentrating on standard 1930s blues. He became a church deacon in 1954 and recorded again for Testament in 1960.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR; LSFP

DARNELL, LARRY

b. Leo Edward Donald Jr., 17 December 1928; Columbus, OH

d. 3 July 1983; Cleveland, OH

An early R&B superstar, singer Larry Darnell could rock and croon with equal effect. He hit the charts in 1950 with the smash Paul Gayten–produced singles “I’ll Get Along Somehow” and “For You My Love.” He retired from popular music in 1969, singing afterward for church and for benefit concerts.

JOHN SINCLAIR/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Shurman, Dick. “Larry Darnell.” Living Blues no. 58 (Winter 1983/1984): 44.

Discography: LSFP

DAVENPORT, COW-COW

b. 23 April 1894; Anniston, AL
d. 3 December 1955; Cleveland, OH

Charles Edward “Cow-Cow” Davenport is best remembered for his song “Cow Cow Blues,” one of the earliest recorded examples of boogie-woogie piano playing. Davenport grew up as the son of a minister, Clement Davenport, and learned to play the piano from his mother, Queen Victoria Jacobs, a church organist. Originally destined for the ministry, like his father, Charles was expelled from the Alabama Theological Seminary in 1911 for playing ragtime at a church function. He worked as a pianist in the Birmingham, Alabama, area until around 1914, when he joined the medicine show Barkoot’s Traveling Carnival, which performed throughout the southeastern United States.

According to some sources, Davenport’s ragtime piano playing was influenced at this time by Bob Davis, and the result was his distinctive “boogie-woogie” or “barrelhouse” style of piano playing. This distinctive rolling bass piano playing had a different name in every part of the country, and its players were the stars of backwoods joints where the walls were lined with barrels of beer and whisky, hence the name “barrelhouse.”

In 1917 Davenport worked as a brothel pianist in the Storyville section of New Orleans. He then toured the TOBA circuit with many of the classic blues singers, including Bessie Smith, Dora Carr, and Ivy Smith. He and Carr were known as Davenport and Company. After Carr married in 1926, Davenport migrated to Chicago where he toured with Ivy Smith in the Davenport and Smith’s Chicago Steppers Revue. Davenport recorded solo and with Smith under his own name. Davenport also recorded as George Hamilton, the Georgia Grinder, and Bat the Hummingbird. Recording labels included Gennett, Paramount, Decca, Brunswick, and Vocalion.

“Cow Cow Blues” was released in 1927 on the Vocalion and Brunswick labels, and was titled after the railroad part that was Davenport’s childhood nickname. The song’s train imitation is a distinctive boogie-woogie theme, and has been called one of the most popular boogie-woogie piano tunes ever recorded. Though the style of playing was not original, many believe Davenport was the first to coin the term “boogie-woogie.” Other compositions by Davenport include “Jim Crow Blues,” the traditional standard “Mama Don’t Allow,” and “(I’ll be Glad When You’re Dead) You Rascal You.”

In the 1930s Davenport tried working as a record shop owner and as the proprietor of his own café. In 1938 had a stroke that adversely affected his piano playing. He continued to sing but eventually moved to New York where he worked as a dishwasher for the Onyx Club.

Pianist Art Hodes helped Davenport to record again as a pianist for the Comet and Circle labels in 1945 and 1946. Davenport continued to perform and tried to make a comeback in the 1940s and 1950s. These attempts were plagued by illness, and Davenport died in Cleveland, Ohio, in December 1955.

DEBBIE BOND

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR; LSFP; Lord

DAVENPORT, JED

Birth and death dates unknown

A raucous harmonica player and singer who recorded with the Beale Street Jug Band in 1929–1930 and accompanied records by Memphis Minnie, Arthur Pettis, Too Tight Henry, and one of the three different Joe Williams.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Harris; Santelli

Discography: DGR

DAVENPORT, LESTER “MAD DOG”

b. 16 January 1932; Tchula, MS

Harmonica player. Davenport moved to Chicago in 1946. He played on Bo Diddley’s “Pretty Thing” Chess session in 1955 and was a member of the Kinsey Report in the 1980s. Recorded as a solo artist for Earwig Records.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Brisbin, John Anthony. “Lester Davenport: It’s All About Havin’ a Good Time.” Living Blues no. 107 (January/February 1993).

Discography: AMG

DAVIES, CYRIL

b. 1932; Denham, Buckinghamshire, England
 d. 7 January 1964; Eel Pie Island, England

Vocalist, guitarist, harmonica player, and seminal figure in British blues. Teamed with Alexis Korner in 1957. Their performances as a duo and as the nucleus of Blues Incorporated inspired younger British musicians in blues and blues-rock. In 1963 Davies formed the Cyril Davies All-Stars and recorded several singles of musical promise. When Davies died of leukemia in 1964, the All-Stars were retained by Long John Baldry.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder); Larkin

Discography: AMG (Bruce Eder); LarkinDAVIES, DEBBIE

b. 22 August 1952; Los Angeles, CA

Guitarist, singer. Davies, whose father was an arranger for Ray Charles, broke into the blues in 1986 when guitarist Coco Montoya referred her for a job in the all-female band, Maggie Mayall and the Cadillacs, led by the wife of the British bandleader John Mayall.

Davies was hired by Albert Collins in 1988 and spent the next three years as a member of his band, the Icebreakers. Nightly guitar duels pitting her Stratocaster skills against the "Master of the Telecaster" sharpened her playing and she also appeared on her first major recording, Collins's 1991 Grammy nominee Iceman. She also did a guest spot on John Mayall's 1990 comeback album A Sense of Place.

After working with Fingers Taylor and the Ladyfinger Revue in 1991 Davies made her recording debut as a leader in 1993 with Picture This, which included a cameo from Collins, who would die later that year. Loose Tonight, produced by Tab Benoit, followed in 1994, solidly establishing Davies on the contemporary blues scene.

Davies, building on the success of her 1996 album, I Got That Feeling, which featured duets with Montoya and Benoit, won the 1997 W. C. Handy Award for Best Contemporary Female Artist. Davies paid tribute to two influences with special recordings, traveling to Texas in 1999 to work with Stevie Ray Vaughan's Double Trouble rhythm section on Tales from the Austin Motel and then releasing Key to Love, an album of John Mayall material featuring appearances by James Cotton and former Mayall guitarists Mick Taylor and Peter Green, in 2003. Davies also recorded on albums by Montoya, Benoit, Otis Grand, and Duke Robillard, the last of whom produced her 2001 album, Love the Game.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Cianci, B. "Debbie Davies." Blues Access no. 41 (Spring 2000): 22–24.

Discography: AMGDAVIS, "BLIND" JOHN

b. 7 December 1913; Hattiesburg, MS
 d. 12 October 1985; Chicago, IL

Blues singer and pianist. When John Davis was three years old his parents moved the family from Mississippi to Chicago. When he was nine a tetanus infection caused by stepping on a rusty nail was incorrectly treated and resulted in blindness. In the 1920s, Davis learned to play the piano in his father's speakeasies. His recording career started in 1937 when he became the staff pianist for producer Lester Melrose. Davis also made six recordings as name artist for Vocalion in 1938. Davis often explained that he did not have any particular affinity for the blues. Some blues purists have denounced his playing as "cocktail" blues. Nevertheless, John's style is sophisticated, with a great many subtle surprises for the attentive listener, with strong boogie rhythms.

In 1948 and 1951 Davis made ten recordings for MGM in Chicago. As early as 1951 and 1952 John Davis traveled to Europe in the company of Big Bill Broonzy. In Paris he made nineteen recordings for Vogue. In 1955 his Chicago house burned down, killing his wife of seventeen years. The fire also destroyed his unique collection of 1,700 78-rpm recordings. John's collection had been even bigger than Tampa Red's.

In 1969 Karl Gert zur Heide found Davis alive and well in Chicago. Four years later Martin van Olderen persuaded him to travel to Europe again and in the next ten years he made a number of successful European tours. After his "rediscovery" he recorded five albums and contributed to two others.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

DAVIS, "BLIND" JOHN

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O'Neal); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Rusch, Bob. "Blind John Davis." Cadence 4, no. 4 (June 1978): 18–22.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

DAVIS, CARL

b. Carl Adams, 4 April 1934; Chicago, IL

Chicago rhythm and blues record company executive and producer. Davis was the prime mover in developing Chicago as a flourishing soul music center during the 1960s and 1970s. In 1961, Davis, while moonlighting from his Columbia Records promotion job, partnered with Bill "Bunky" Sheppard in establishing the Nat/Pam/Wes label complex. Shortly afterward he produced Gene Chandler's million-selling "Duke of Earl." Columbia, seeing his talents were misplaced, hired him as a producer in 1962. Within a year Davis had Okeh (Columbia's R&B imprint) thriving, producing hits with the help of Curtis Mayfield compositions and Johnny Pate arrangements. These Okeh artists included Ted Taylor, Major Lance, Walter Jackson, and the Artistics.

In 1966 Davis moved to the Brunswick label and began recording hits by Jackie Wilson, Gene Chandler, Barbara Acklin, Tyrone Davis, and the Chi-lites, but failed to get hits by veteran LaVern Baker. In 1967 Davis started his Dakar label, but merged it with Brunswick in 1970. Davis left Brunswick in 1976 and established his own Chi-Sound label, and recorded with some success the Dells and Gene Chandler. After closing Chi-Sound in 1984, Davis attempted several times to resurrect a company without success.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. Chicago Soul. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

DAVIS, CEDELL

b. 9 June 1927; Helena, AR

Cedell Davis learned guitar and harmonica as a child growing up in Helena. Stricken with polio at age nine, Davis adapted his guitar playing to his limitations, and developed a hauntingly raw slide style (using a knife) playing juke joints throughout the area, often with Robert Nighthawk. Several excellent recordings for Fat Possum in the 1990s launched his international career.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (John Bush); Larkin
Palmer, Robert. Liner notes to Feel Like Doing Something Wrong (1995, Fat Possum).

Discography: AMG

DAVIS, EDDIE "LOCKJAW"

b. 2 March 1922; New York, NY

d. 3 November 1986; Culver City, CA

Tenor saxophone. Hard-hitting stylist who started out with swing, but was equally at home with sophisticated bop harmony or driving rhythm and blues. In fact, he was always deeply rooted in blues, a major element of his style and repertoire. He took his nickname (sometimes reduced to "Jaws") from one of his own compositions. David played with big bands in the 1940s, including Cootie Williams, Andy Kirk, and Lucky Millinder, and later several times with Count Basie. He co-led the Tough Tenors band with Johnny Griffin in the early 1960s, and later collaborated with trumpeter Harry "Sweets" Edison. Davis was a prolific recording artist in the hard bop and soul jazz era who possessed a very personal sound with a caustic, hard-edged, vocalized cry.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Mathieson, Kenny. Cookin': Hard Bop and Soul Jazz, 1954–1965. Edinburgh: Canongate, 2002.

Discography

The Eddie "Lockjaw" Davis Cookbook (1958, Prestige 7141, 7161, 7219).

Jaws (1958, Prestige 7151).

Trane Whistle (1960, Prestige 7206).

Afro-Jaws (1961, Riverside 373).

The Heavy Hitter (1979, Muse 5202).

With Johnny Griffin

Tough Tenors (1960, Jazzland 931).

Blues Up and Down (1961, Jazzland 960).

Live At Minton's (1961, Prestige 7309, 7330, 7357, 7407).

The Tenor Scene (1961, Prestige 7191).

Tough Tenor Favourites (1962, Jazzland 976).

DAVIS, GEATER

b. Vernon Davis, 29 January 1946; Kountze, TX
 d. 28 September 1984; Dallas, TX

Birth year also given as 1942. One of the notable soul-blues singers of the 1970s. He had a few hits, including “Sweet Woman’s Love” (1970, House of Orange label) and “Your Heart Is So Cold (1973, Seventy 7). He was active across the South, including eastern Texas, Nashville, Tennessee, and Jackson, Mississippi.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Kuhn, Jeff. “The Great Unknown: The Geater Davis Story.” Juke Blues no. 37 (1997): 18–27.

Discography: LarkinDAVIS, GUY

b. 12 May 1952; New York, NY

Vocalist, guitarist, actor. Son of actors Ossie Davis and Ruby Dee. His albums for Folkways and Red House contain many new blues accompanied with acoustic guitar. His stage credentials include productions of Mulebone (Broadway, 1991) and Robert Johnson: Trick the Devil (off-Broadway, 1993). For television he has acted and has scored soundtracks, including the music for the 1995 PBS series The American Promise.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Discography: AMG (Jason Ankeny)DAVIS, JAMES “THUNDERBIRD”

b. 10 November 1938; Mobile, AL
 d. 24 January 1992; St. Paul, MN

Singer. Davis’s R&B-trained vocals so impressed a touring Guitar Slim at a show in Pritchard, Alabama, that he got hired as the opening act for his revue, ultimately moving to Thibodaux, Louisiana, where Slim lived. He picked up his nickname there from a drinking contest with Slim when he was forced to match his boss’s shots of high-priced whiskey with more affordable Thunderbird wine.

Davis recorded several singles, including the semi-hit, “What Else Is There to Do,” for Duke Records in the early 1960s and subsequently relocated to the label’s base in Houston. But instead of being put on the fast track to a successful solo career, the label, which also employed him to do yard work and shipping duties around the studio, had him do demos for Bobby “Blue” Bland. Davis, usually recording after Bland and the other label stars had concluded for the day, did come up with a few hits, most notably “Blue Monday,” a 1963 southern hit successfully covered by Z. Z. Hill, Little Milton, and Albert Collins.

Davis finally left Duke in 1966 and worked in the Joe Tex Revue and toured with O. V. Wright in the 1970s. But he abandoned his secular career for church singing by the late 1970s and worked as a manual laborer. His inactivity was so complete that he was presumed dead before being tracked down by Black Top Records, which put him in the studio in 1988, backed by the dual guitars of Clarence Hollimon and Anson Funderburgh and a horn section led by Grady Gaines, who he had worked with decades before, for his comeback album Check Out Time. Davis resumed performing and it was on stage, in the middle of a set, when he died from a heart attack.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)

Discography: AMG; LSFPDAVIS, KATHERINE

b. 25 February 1953; Chicago, IL

Raised in Chicago’s Cabrini-Green projects and trained as a classical singer, Davis has built a successful career singing gospel, standards, jazz and blues, and has portrayed Bessie Smith and Ma Rainey in professional theatrical productions. Her 1999 recording Dream Shoes artfully melded traditional jazz and blues. She has also recorded with frequent accompanist Erwin Helfer for Red Beans, and with the Dixie Stompers for Delmark, and has appeared on blues and gospel compilations here and abroad. Davis has been an artist-in-residence in blues in the schools programs in Chicago and South Carolina.

JUSTIN O’BRIEN

Bibliography

AMG (Dave Nathan)

Discography: AMG, including Dream Shoes (Southport/Katy D Records S-SSD-0071)

DAVIS, LARRY

DAVIS, LARRY

b. 4 December 1936; Kansas City, MO
d. 19 April 1994; Los Angeles, CA

Raised in England, Arkansas, singer/guitarist Larry Davis started playing professionally at age fourteen as a drummer and then bassist for harmonica player Sunny Blair in nearby Little Rock. In the mid-1950s, Davis teamed up with guitarist Fenton Robinson and, on a recommendation from Bobby Bland to Don Robey of Duke Records, the pair recorded several sides for the label in 1958. The session produced Davis's best-known song, "Texas Flood," which would become a classic of electric blues and eventually help launch the career of guitarist Stevie Ray Vaughan. Davis eventually settled in St. Louis and throughout much of the 1960s played bass in Albert King's band. Davis recorded for the Virgo label in 1968, and by 1970 had decided to switch to guitar as his main instrument, modeling his playing after Albert King and B. B. King's popular single-string style.

A motorcycle accident in the early 1970s temporarily postponed his musical career, but he slowly made a comeback with singles on several tiny labels by the end of the decade. In 1981, Davis recorded for Jim O'Neal's Rooster label with St. Louis musician Oliver Sain. The resulting album, Funny Stuff, showcased Davis's soulful vocals and rousing guitar playing, and garnered him both national recognition and two W. C. Handy Awards. He went on to record critically acclaimed albums for Pulsar, Black And Blue, and Bullseye, and toured Europe several times. Davis was stricken with cancer in the early 1990s and succumbed to the disease at his home in Los Angeles at the age of fifty-seven.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Santelli
Aldin, Mary Katherine, and David Nelson. "Larry Davis."
Living Blues (September/October 1994): 60–61.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Sooner or Later (1992, Bullseye CD 9511).
Funny Stuff (2001, Rooster CD 2616).

DAVIS, "LITTLE" SAMMY

b. 28 November 1928; Winona, MS

Harmonica player. Met and recorded with Earl Hooker in Miami, Florida, in 1952. After some journeyman work, he settled in Poughkeepsie, New York. In 1995 he revived his performing career, playing with guitarist Fred Scribner. He became well known through his Delmark CD and his guest appearances on the syndicated Don Imus radio program, "Imus in the Morning."

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)

Discography: AMG; LSFP

DAVIS, MAMIE "GALORE"

b. 24 September 1940; Erwin, MS
d. 6 October 2001; Jackson, MS

Deep soul and blues singer who briefly achieved fame in the soul market during the 1960s. She first began performing in rhythm and blues bands around Greenville, Mississippi. During 1961 she performed in the Ike and Tina Turner Revue, and from 1962 to 1965 she toured with the Little Milton Band. During 1965–1966, Davis, under the name of Mamie Galore, recorded in Chicago for the St. Lawrence/Satellite label complex under producer Monk Higgins, getting soul-style minor hits with "Special Agent 34-24-38," "I Wanna Be Your Radio," and "It Ain't Necessary." During 1968–1969, she recorded three Higgins-produced singles for Imperial in California. Davis moved back to Greenville in 1972, and continued the remainder of her career as a blues singer.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

AMG (Andrew Hamilton)
Butch, Ruth. "Mamie 'Galore' Davis." Juke Blues no. 50 (2002): 68.
"Obituaries." Living Blues no. 160 (November/December 2001): 87.

DAVIS, MAXWELL

b. Thomas Maxwell Davis, 14 January 1916; Independence, KS
d. 18 September 1970; Los Angeles, CA

Davis was a tenor sax player influenced by Coleman Hawkins, he moved to Los Angeles in 1937 and became a band leader and one of the most important songwriters, arrangers, and producers working on the West Coast in the 1940–1960 era. He helped to build the R&B sound of his time and influenced musicians like T-Bone Walker, Jimmy Witherspoon, and Floyd Dixon; as a top studio artist, he worked with B. B. King, Etta James, Clarence “Gatemouth” Brown, and many other important blues and R&B artists. The rock ‘n’ roll craze hit him badly but he continued to release records for a small R&B market and to work with orchestras and studios until his death in 1970.

ROBERT SACRÉ

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Santelli

Discography: Lord

DAVIS, “MAXWELL STREET” JIMMY

b. Charles W. Thompson, 2 March 1925; Tippoo [Vance?], MS

d. 28 December 1995; Chicago, IL

Long-time singer/guitarist and street musician in Chicago. He gave conflicting reports on the place of his birth. He first learned guitar as a teenager from John Lee Hooker, who was dating one of his aunts; like Hooker, Davis held onto a single-chord, modal guitar style throughout his life. Also while in his teens, he worked as a buck dancer and novelty entertainer for traveling shows such as F. S. Wolcott’s Rabbit Foot Minstrels and Silas Green From New Orleans; his act included a routine that involved walking barefoot on broken glass. In the 1940s, he moved to Detroit where he reestablished his relationship with Hooker and performed locally. He returned South to Memphis, probably in the early 1950s; there he recorded a session (unissued) at Sun Studios. Within a few years he migrated back north, this time to Chicago, where he soon began to perform in the open-air Maxwell Street Market. He remained a Maxwell Street mainstay for the rest of his life.

In about 1964, he and his wife opened a restaurant, the Knotty Pine Grill, in the Maxwell Street neighborhood. By this time, he had probably begun to call himself “Maxwell Street Jimmy Davis.” (He sometimes claimed he took the name as early as the mid-1940s, to avoid conscription; other accounts suggest he received the moniker from an admirer—perhaps the late historian, producer, and documentarian Pete Welding—who saw him perform in the market.) He often performed in front of the restaurant to attract customers.

An eponymously titled 1965 LP on Elektra, followed by appearances on the Testament, Takoma, Roots, Sonnet, and Flyright labels, expanded his reputation among aficionados, but he never managed to channel his talents into a viable performing career outside Chicago. A few years after the Elektra sessions he returned to Memphis, where he and two accompanists, billed as “The Three Tuffs,” cut a primitively styled 45 that was issued locally. He came back to Chicago, probably in the early 1970s, and resumed his street singing along with occasional appearances in neighborhood clubs.

For a time in the early 1980s, Davis renounced the blues and became a lay preacher; but within a few years he returned to secular music. With the assistance of young admirers such as percussionist Kenny Tams and mandolinist Dave Andersen, he refocused his skills and played (often acoustic) on the street, in local folk venues, and at festivals like the Chicago Blues Festival (1990) and the Sunflower River Festival in Clarksdale, Mississippi (1994). He also recorded a full-length CD on the Wolf label, released in 1989.

Despite the relative paucity of his recorded legacy, Maxwell Street Jimmy Davis was a lifetime professional musician who performed for thousands of people over the course of his career. He was an important link between modern Chicago blues and the earlier southern traditions from which the music arose. (Note: Not to be confused with jump-blues saxophonist and arranger Maxwell Davis.)

DAVID WHITEIS

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris (as Charles Thomas); Larkin O’Neal, Jim. “BluEsoterica.” Living Blues no. 127 (1996): 128.

Whiteis, David. “Obituary: Maxwell Street Jimmy Davis.” Living Blues no. 126 (1996): 56–58.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

See also Chicago

DAVIS, QUINT

b. Arthur Quentin Davis, Jr., 5 November 1947; New Orleans, LA

Festival, concert, and record producer, artists’ manager. Quint Davis teamed with George Wein in 1970 to establish the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival and continues to serve as its director. Davis resuscitated the career of Professor Longhair and launched the Wild Magnolias. He has also worked with the Dirty Dozen Brass Band.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

- Davis, J. "Back Talk with Quint Davis." Offbeat 16, no. 6 (June 2003): 84–86.
- Palmer, Robert. "Jazz and Heritage Festival: New Orleans Bares Its Soul." Rolling Stone no. 294 (June 28, 1979): 20.

Selected Recordings

As Producer

- Dirty Dozen Brass Band. Mardi Gras in Montreaux (Rounder).
- Professor Longhair. House Party New Orleans Style (Rounder).
- Professor Longhair. Mardi Gras in Baton Rouge (RykoDisc).
- Wild Magnolias. Handa Wanda (Parts 1 and 2) (1970, Treehouse Records).

DAVIS, REVEREND GARY

- b. 30 April 1896; Laurens, SC
d. 5 May 1972; Hammonton, NJ

Reverend Gary Davis's importance is manifold. He was an astounding musician who could effortlessly blend all the major concepts underlying both black and white music into a single coherent alloy. Choked strings, major, modal, and minor scales, advanced harmonies, ancient tunes, popular music, sacred music, blues and jazz, and old-time music all found expression through the man. And while the guitar (both six- and twelve-string) was his obvious forte, he was also adept on piano, harmonica, and the five-string banjo.

He was either blind from birth, or became so shortly thereafter. A likely diagnosis, "buphophthalmus" (congenital glaucoma), was made in 1937, when Davis applied to the state of North Carolina for aid. Davis was able to distinguish light and dark, however, as well as color and vague shape, all of which aided him in getting around.

Laurens, Davis's birthplace, was seriously divided racially. As recently as 1996, a museum dedicated to the Ku Klux Klan was erected in an old movie theater. Not surprisingly, around 1904, Davis's grandmother, Evalina Cheek, moved with Davis and his brother Buddy to Gray Court, a few miles outside of Greenville. By the time Davis was sixteen, he was playing in a Greenville string band that included another young blind man, the famous "Willie Walker."

Davis's half brother, Buddy Pinson, who lived until 1930, also played "but not like Gary," according to bluesman Walter Phelps, who had grown up near them. Phelps, whose age was almost identical to Davis's, moved to Asheville in 1904 to work as a water boy on the Beaucatcher Tunnel project. He said that Davis turned up in Asheville, playing in Pack Square, early in the 1920s. Another guitar player, Aaron Washington, has Davis living in Asheville at that time as well, and the chapter on Davis in Bruce Bastin's Red River Blues documents him leaving some time after 1926. In any case, he was there long enough to make a cameo appearance in Thomas Wolfe's Look Homeward Angel, as "the black boy who played in Pack Square," and may have been living there when Jimmy Rodgers came to town in 1927.

Davis is known to have been busking for a living in Durham in 1931, and to have lived there with his mother until after she died (1934). While there, he became acquainted with the Trice Brothers (Willie and Richard), Blind Boy Fuller, Sonny Terry, Bull City Red, Brownie McGhee, and Buddy Moss for a surety. He probably knew Floyd Council, Vernon Jordan, and Mitchell's Christian Singers as well, and possibly Pegleg Sam Jackson.

He first recorded in 1935, traveling to New York City with dry goods merchant and ARC scout J. B. Long. There he backed up Blind Boy Fuller on several blues numbers and laid down twelve sides of his own, two blues and ten gospel songs. He did not record again until 1949, but from then until his death in 1972, he recorded often. Previously unissued material continues to make its way to the public, most recently in the form of two remarkable CDs culled from tapes made privately in the fifties: The Sun of Our Lives (2002, World Arbiter Records), recorded 1955–1957, includes twenty minutes of Davis preaching; and If I Had My Way (2002, Smithsonian-Folkways) was recorded in 1953 by John Cohen, at Davis's house.

Davis moved from Durham, first to Mamaroneck and then to Harlem with Annie Bell Wright, whom he married in 1937. Reports differ and are vague as to the exact date: He said 1940, but he was still playing at the barbershop on Pettigrew Street (in Durham) as of 1943. The Durham welfare office reported that he had gone to New York as of January 1944.

Once in New York, he fell in with the some old cronies from Durham, notably Alec Seward, Sonny, and Brownie, who had allied with the New York Folk Music crowd. He became friends with Leadbelly, and would give guitar lessons at Leadbelly's apartment in Harlem, reaching a host of young white musicians and some black ones, many of whom achieved some degree of success on their own.

His teaching, explicit and self-conscious, may turn out to be his greatest contribution, as shown by the very partial list of his associates and students at the bottom of this article. He may be the only guitar evangelist/bluesman to develop significant teaching skills at all. His first teaching experience, aside from showing his brother Buddy how to play, came when he attended the Blind and Deaf School at Spartanburg, South Carolina, where he learned to read Braille. He also taught at Brownie McGhee's Home of the Blues from 1948 to 1950. Further, the lessons he gave at his home, Leadbelly's home, and Tiny Robinson's home, to the likes of Stefan Grossman, John Gibbon, Ian Buchanan, Roy Book Binder, and Ernie Hawkins, have achieved the status of legend by now, as have the lessons he gave to young guitar players he encountered wherever he went in his later years.

From 1945 until 1957, Martha Ledbetter's niece, Tiny Robinson, and her husband Jim looked after his interests. Davis played on the streets of Harlem, and preached in storefront churches. As a result of a Town Hall Memorial Concert for Leadbelly in 1950, Davis gained some exposure in the nascent folk revival, and he began to be featured along with Sonny and Brownie at club dates and in concerts. Having resumed recording in 1949, by 1957 he was busy enough that concert promoter Manny Greenhill took over the management of his career from Mrs. Robinson.

From 1957 until 1962, Greenhill promoted Davis as the instrumental genius, gospel singer, and all-around entertainer that he was, with the result that Davis and his wife started to become more comfortable. When Peter, Paul, and Mary released a version of "Samson and Delilah" in 1962, they ascribed their version to Davis. Manny arranged for an advance royalty payment of sufficient size to install the Davises in a tidy little house in Jamaica, Queens. From that point until he died about ten years later, Davis's living was assured. He recorded and toured consistently until his death and, in fact, was on his way to a gig in New Jersey when he was taken by his final heart attack.

Elements of Davis's Style

Reverend Davis, like almost all southern guitar players, used only his thumb and index finger to pick the strings. If queried why he didn't use more fingers, he would reply, "It wasn't necessary!" One student, Ernie Hawkins, maintained that he did ninety percent of his playing with just his thumb, and while that may be an exaggeration, his right thumb certainly seemed to have a mind of its own. He could "roll" it, inserting bass grace notes at will (à la Blind Blake, whom he much admired); play countermelodies to his treble line, sometimes in contrary motion, which involved picking backward with his thumb; alternate his thumb with his index finger for lightning fast runs; or just "boom-chang" with it.

His left-hand technique was equally extraordinary. Because he was not well sighted enough to pick up on how others played, he had to make up his own way of getting around the neck. Owing to a broken left wrist that had set medially deviated, he could drop difficult-to-impossible chord forms anywhere he wanted on the fingerboard. He knew those chords by name, shape, and position, easily playing the "hard chords" avoided by most guitarists.

He had large hands, and could use his left thumb to cover three bass strings. Another of his tricks was to divide his left hand up into two sets of two fingers each, usually paired 12, 34. He could play runs in harmony this way, against an alternating thumb accenting the off-beat, pinching off sequences of parallel sixths or thirds, one or the other pair acting as if it were a single finger.

He learned to play scales and arpeggios in a fashion similar to classical guitar players, and used a technique called "cross-stringing" (moving the arm while playing an open string) to move runs and chord positions around the neck. Obviously this implies a thorough knowledge of every note on the neck, and where the crossover points are.

Reverend Davis had substantial influence on many people, some well known, others not. Some of these were his contemporaries, some were students, and some are "grandstudents," not yet born when he died. Nevertheless, all, to a greater or lesser degree, incorporated recognizable elements of his style and repertoire into theirs. The list includes, but is certainly not limited to, Walt Phelps (Laurens, Asheville), Craig Fowler (unknown) (Laurens), Will Bonds (Candy Man) (Laurens), Willie Walker (Greenville), Sam Moore (Greenville), Aaron Washington (Asheville), Bull City Red (Durham), Willie Trice (Durham), Richard Trice (Durham), Brownie McGhee (Durham), Blind Boy Fuller (Durham), Buddy Moss (Durham), and Kinney Peebles ("Sweet Papa Stovepipe").

In the 1950s: Jack Elliott, John Cohen, John Gibbon, Fred Gerlach, Alex McEwen, Rory McEwen, Frank Hamilton, Dave van Ronk, Robert Meeropol, Mitch Greenhill.

In the early 1960s: Ian Buchanan, Marty Brennan, Marc Silber, Perry Lederman, Danny Kalb, Rory Block, Steve Katz, Stefan Grossman, North Peterson, Eric Kaz, Steve Mann, Jadurani (Hare Krishna), Ernie Hawkins, Jerry Garcia, Ry Cooder, Bob Dylan, John Fahey, Linda Kalver, Dave Bromberg, Bessie Jones & Georgia Sea Island Singers, Dan Smith, Pops Staples, Jerry Ricks, Larry Johnson, Taj Mahal, John Cephas, Alan Smithline, Dave Feretta, Loring Janes, Jorma Kaukonen, Donovan (Leitch), Rick Ruskin, Ken Whiteley, Woody Mann, Bob Weir, Mark Greenberg,

DAVIS, REVEREND GARY

Danny Birch, Maria Muldaur, John Pearse (string-maker), Bo Basiuk, Eric Schoenberg, Alex Shoumatoff.

In the mid-1960s: Robert Tilling, John Townley, Roy Book Binder, “Barbecue Bob” (Bob Johnson), Spencer Bohren, Rolly Brown, Jackson Browne, Joan Fenton, Andy Cohen, Catfish Keith, George Gritzbach, Brother Tom Winslow.

“Grandstudents”: Pat Conte, Bill Ellis, Eric Noden, Dr. Michael Taub, Colin Linden, Frank Basile, Ken Edwards.

Bibliography

- AMG (Bruce Eder); DGR; Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Basile, Frank. Notes to Demons & Angels (2003, Shanachie 6117).
Bastin, Bruce. Red River Blues. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
Cohen, Andrew M. “The Hands of Blues Guitarists.” American Music 14, no. 4 (Winter 1996): 455.
Grossman, Stefan. “A Rare Interview with Rev. Gary Davis.” Sing Out! 23/1 (March/April 1974): 2–5, 36, 46.
———. The Holy Blues. New York: Robbins Music Co. & Chandos Music, 1970.
———. Rev. Gary Davis: Blues Guitar: Songs, Guitar Styles & Techniques of the Legendary Reverend Gary Davis: A Biography and Instruction Book in Standard Music Notation and Tablature with Discography & Photos. New York: Oak, 1974.
———, Stephen Calt, and Hal Grossman. Country Blues Songbook. New York: Oak Publications, 1973.
———, and Aaron Stang. Stefan Grossman’s Masters of Country Blues Guitar: Rev. Gary Davis. Miami, FL: CPP/Belwin, 1991.
Tilling, Robert, ed. “Oh, What a Beautiful City,” A Tribute to Rev. Gary Davis 1896–1972. Jersey, England: Paul Mill Press, 1992.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSF

Selected Recordings

- The Guitar and Banjo of Rev. Gary Davis* (Prestige).
Harlem Streetsinger: Original Blues Classics (OBCCD 547-2 CD, Prestige BV 1015 LP).
If I Had My Way (Smithsonian-Folkways).
Reverend Gary Davis 1935–49 (Yazoo 2011, Document 5060).

DAVIS, TINY

b. Ernestine Carroll, 5 August 1909 or 1910; Memphis, TN
d. 30 January 1994; Chicago, IL

Trumpeter/vocalist. After working with the Harlem Play-Girls (1935–1936) and the International Sweethearts of Rhythm (early 1940s), she formed her own Hell Divers (1947–1952). In 1949 she recorded Race

Horse/Bug Juice (Decca 48220) and ran a Chicago club from the late 1950s.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: LSF

DAVIS, TYRONE

b. 4 May 1938; Greenville, MS
d. 9 February 2005, Chicago IL

Soul singer who has a significant following of blues fans and critics. He first became popular with “Can I Change My Mind” in 1968, and his “Turn Back the Hands of Time” (1970) is today played often on “oldies” radio stations. Through the years he has held on and added to his audiences, usually women, with his sexy stage persona and medium-tempo songs.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Larkin; Santelli
Nelson, David. “I’m Not a Blues Singer.” Living Blues no. 105 (September/October 1992): 12–17.

Discography: AMG Soul; Larkin

DAVIS, WALTER

b. 1 March 1912; Grenada, MS
d. 22 October 1963; St. Louis, MO

Walter Davis moved to St. Louis at the age of thirteen. Spotted by Roosevelt Sykes, he began recording in 1930, but did not play his own piano on record until 1935. His career lasted until 1952 and at the height of his popularity he had a new record issued every few weeks. A temperate man, he had a fine, expressive voice and accompanied himself in an idiosyncratic piano style with hollow, modal chords. He joined the church in 1952 and was a well-known preacher in St. Louis until his death in October 1963.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

- AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Rye, Howard. “Walter Davis.” Collectors Items no. 47 (December 1988): 6–9.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSF

DAWKINS, JAMES HENRY “JIMMY”

b. 24 October 1936; Tchula, MS

Born in 1936 in Tchula, Mississippi, James Henry Dawkins's first musical influences reflected his southern upbringing. Fats Domino, Smiley Lewis, and Guitar Slim, to name a few, inspired a young Dawkins to pick up the guitar and teach himself to play. However it would be in Chicago that Dawkins would make his mark by helping to define the West Chicago Blues scene for the next several decades. After a brief time working in a box factory in the mid-1950s, Dawkins began to play Chicago clubs with artists such as Lester Hinton, Eddie King, and Willie Black. A peer of other important Chicago-based artists like Magic Sam, Dawkins released his first solo effort in 1969 entitled Fast Fingers (which was awarded the Grand Prix du Disque from the Hot Club of France for best album).

Dawkins has since amalgamated an extensive catalog and tour schedule. The last three-plus decades have seen Dawkins record for such labels as Earwig, Black & Blue, JSP, and Delmark, to name a few. Although never achieving widespread commercial success, Dawkins has gained a significant amount of respect as an earnest and powerful guitar player and singer, highlighted on such critically acclaimed efforts as Fast Fingers, All for Business, and Kant Sheck Dees Bluze. In addition to being a mainstay in the blues club and festival circuits, Dawkins has also been a contributing writer to blues publications including Blues Revue. He also began Leric Records, recording such acts as Nora Jean Wallace and Little Johnny Christian.

MATHEW J. BARTKOWIAK

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Cummerow, William. “Living Blues Interview: Jimmy Dawkins.” Living Blues no. 8 (Spring 1972): 18–21.
 Dawkins, Jimmy. “Blues First Handed.” Blues Revue no. 16 (March/April 1995): 15.
 Sharpe, Steven. “Deep Into the Feelings.” Living Blues no. 108 (April 1993): 16–21.

Discography: AMG; LSPFSelected Recordings

Fast Fingers (1969, Delmark); All for Business (1971, Delmark); Tribute to Orange (1971, Black & Blue); Transatlantic 770 (1973, Excello); Blisterstring (1977, Delmark); Hot Wire 81 (1981, Evidence); Feel The Blues (1985, JSP); All Blues (1986, JSP); Kant Sheck Dees Bluze (1992, Earwig); Blues & Pain (1994, Wild Dog); B Phur Real (1995, Ichiban); Blues from Iceland (1995, Evidence); Come Back Baby (1995, Storyville Records); Me, My Gitar & the Blues (1997, Ichiban);

I Want to Know, Vol. 2 (1999, Storyville); American Roots: Blues (2002, Ichiban); Born In Poverty (2002, Black & Blue); Tell Me Baby (2004, Fedora); West Side Guitar Hero (2002, Fedora).

DAY, BOBBY

b. Robert James Byrd, 1 July 1930; Fort Worth, TX
 d. 27 July 1990; Los Angeles, CA

R&B vocalist. Day worked with a vocal group called the Flames from 1948 before going out as a solo singer in 1956. He recorded for Class (for whom he had a number one hit with “Rockin’ Robin”), Rendezvous, and RCA. He recorded little thereafter but continued to perform and tour.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

- McGarvey, Seamus. “Over and Over Again—It’s Bobby Day.” Now Dig This no. 82 (January 1990): 22–25;
Now Dig This no. 83 (February 1990): 23–25.

Selected Recording

Bobby Day—The Original Rockin’ Robin (Ace CDCH 200).

See also Class; RCA/Victor/Bluebird/Camden/Groove/X/Vik

DE LUXE/REGAL

Founded by the Braun family in Linden, New Jersey, in 1944, the first artists to appear on the De Luxe label were jazz performers such as Billy Eckstine and Benny Carter, but in late 1946 the Brauns made the first of their trips to New Orleans where they signed local R&B artists such as Paul Gayten, Pleasant “Cousin Joe” Joseph, Dave Bartholomew, Roy Brown, and Smiley Lewis. Commercial success was instantaneous and then crushed in November 1947 when a fire destroyed the label’s recording plant and warehouse, prompting King Records to buy a fifty-one percent share in the ailing company. In August 1949, Dave and Jules Braun launched a new label, Regal Records, with their new partner Fred Mendelsohn, continuing to release records by Paul Gayten and Larry Darnell. Regal lasted just two years when Mendelsohn left to form Herald Records.

DAVE PENNY

Bibliography

- Daniels, Bill. “A De Luxe and Regal Feast! Part One—De Luxe Records 1944–1949.” Whiskey, Women, And... 9 (July 1982): 28.

- . “A De Luxe and Regal Feast! Part Two—Regal Records 1949–1951.” Whiskey, Women, And... 10 (November 1982): 12.
- . “De Luxe 3300.” Whiskey, Women, And... 12/13 (December 1983): 56.

Discography

Jump 'n' Shout! New Orleans Blues & Rhythm (2000, Delmark CD DE-715).

DEAN, JOE “JOE DEAN FROM BOWLING GREEN”

- b. 1908; St. Louis, MO
d. 24 June 1981; St. Louis, MO

Raised by his widowed mother, Dean began by playing house parties and small clubs. In 1930 he recorded the rocking I'm So Glad I'm Twenty-One Years Old Today, and Mexico Bound Blues for Paramount, who dubbed him “Joe Dean from Bowling Green.” Subsequently Dean worked in a steel mill, playing intermittently, until the 1950s when he became a pastor.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

“Joe Dean” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 53 (Summer/Autumn 1982): 48.

Discography: DGR

DECCA

Record company and label founded in Britain in 1929 by Edward Lewis; it also owned the Brunswick and Vocalion trademarks in Britain. An American Decca label was inaugurated in August 1934 by Jack Kapp, who had previously been director of Brunswick's Race series. Another former director of that series, J. Mayo Williams, was brought in to supervise the Decca 7000 Race series. In June 1935 the new company launched a second Race series, the Champion 50000 series, using mainly reissues from Gennett and Paramount, but this ran to only seventy-eight issues. A Broadway 9000 Race series was equally short lived. The 7000 series continued until 1944 and included many of the most important blues artists of the era, including Kokomo Arnold, Blue Lu Barker, Bumble Bee Slim (Amos Easton), Sleepy John Estes, Bill Gaither (Leroy's Buddy), Jimmie Gordon, Rosetta Howard, Alberta Hunter, Lonnie Johnson, Joe McCoy, Memphis Minnie, Ollie Shepard, Roosevelt Sykes, Johnny Temple, Joe Turner, Peetie Wheatstraw, and Georgia White. However, only four of Blind Boy Fuller's Decca recordings were issued in his lifetime because he proved to be under exclusive contract to ARC.

The catalog had a definite bias toward urban artists, often accompanied by small jazz groups. Decca generally brought artists to Chicago or New York City to record, but a significant documentation was undertaken in Dallas in February 1937, when Black Ace (B. K. Turner), Alex Moore, and Andrew (later Smokey) Hogg were among those recorded. Jazz artists featured in the 7000 series included some whose music would be regarded later as “rhythm and blues,” such as the Harlem Hamfats, Louis Jordan, Buddy Johnson, “Hot Lips” Page, and Sam Price. After 1940 this genre was transferred to the new 8500 Sepia Series, which also included some blues singers such as Bea Booze (Muriel Nicholls). The 8500s were more widely advertised than the ethnically restricted Race series and possibly represent the first more than casual attempt to sell any blues other than boogie pianists into the wider market. In 1944, both series were superseded by a new 48000 series, launched with reissues from the 7000 series by Kokomo Arnold, Georgia White, and others. Jazz and R&B artists, including Buddy Johnson and Sam Price, and gospel music initially dominated new issues.

After 1947, sides by Sticks McGhee, Harmon “Peetie Wheatstraw” Ray, Grant Jones (Mr. Blues), and a 1950–1951 series by Cecil Gant (initially credited as Gunter Lee Carr) are noteworthy. Stomp (Archie) Gordon, Lightnin' Hopkins, and Little Esther (Phillips) were also featured before the series ended in 1954. Buddy Johnson and Louis Jordan, whose issues had long been transferred to the general popular series, ceased to be Decca artists in 1952 and 1954, respectively. British Decca had been forced to dispose of its American interests to obtain dollars for Britain's war effort and the American company was thereafter independent until 1962, when it was bought by MCA (Music Corporation of America), which at first continued to use the Decca label but from 1973 used its own MCA label.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR; Sutton
Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
Fairchild, Rolph. “Decca Matrix Letter System.” Matrix 76 (1968): 7.

Garrod, Charles. Decca 8500, 11000, 12000, 14000, 15000, 16000 Record Series (Zephyrhills, FL, Joyce Record Club, 1993).

———. Decca Records 5000 and 7000 Series (Zephyrhills, FL, Joyce Record Club, 1993).

Ruppli, Michel. The Decca Labels, i: The California Sessions; ii: The Eastern and Southern Sessions (1934–1942); iii: The Eastern Sessions (1943–1956); iv: The Eastern Sessions (1956–1973); v: Country Recordings, Classical Recordings, and Reissues; vi: Record Numerical Listings and General Artist Index. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1996.

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

DECCA/CORAL/MCA

Decca Records was founded in London, England, by Edward Lewis in 1929, who acquired the rights to the recordings of the American Record Company (ARC), which were reissued in the United Kingdom on the Decca subsidiary, Brunswick Records. In August 1934, British Decca opened a U.S. office under the leadership of Jack Kapp, a former employee of U.S. Brunswick, and the new label, U.S. Decca, became involved in recording blues, jazz, and country music at an early stage, employing talent scouts such as J. Mayo Williams. Within a year of its inception, with much foresight U.S. Decca began purchasing important blues and jazz labels such as Gennett and Champion, and before the decade was out, had reclaimed the rights to the pre-1932 catalogs of Brunswick and Vocalion that had been lost to U.S. Columbia in 1938.

A serious rival to RCA's Bluebird subsidiary, U.S. Decca's budget 7000 series became home to best-selling blues artists like Joe Turner, Roosevelt Sykes, Kokomo Arnold, Sleepy John Estes, Johnnie Temple, Peetie Wheatstraw, Frankie "Half-Pint" Jaxon, Joe McCoy and Memphis Minnie, Georgia White, Ollie Shepard, Bill Gaither, Lee Brown, Jimmie Gordon, Blue Lu Barker, Rosetta Howard, and the Harlem Hamfats. During the Second World War, British Decca was forced to dispose of its U.S. assets, whereupon Jack Kapp purchased the company outright. The subsidiary Coral was founded in 1949, primarily as a vehicle for the productions of jazz A&R man Bob Thiele, but the label soon expanded to feature much pop, R&B, and even country content. The old Brunswick imprint was revived in 1957, yet in 1959, U.S. Decca was purchased by MCA (Music Corporation of America) who continued to use the established Decca label until the late 1960s. Since the 1960s, MCA and, more recently, parent company Universal International have continued to acquire important black music labels. The catalog currently includes MGM, Mercury, Duke/Peacock, Chess, Excello, Dot, Motown, and ABC Paramount, in addition to both U.S. and U.K. Decca and their various subsidiaries.

DAVID PENNY

Bibliography

Ruppli, Michel. The Decca Labels, 6 vols. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1996.

Discography

Jumpin' the Blues (1990, Ace CDCHD 941).

Blues Classics (1996, MCA CD 11441).

DEE, DAVID

b. David Eckford, 24 March 1938; Greenwood, MS

Birth year has also been given as 1942. His early musical experiences were in gospel, pop vocal groups, and bass playing. He began playing guitar in the 1970s. Living in St. Louis, he had a local hit with "Gone Fishing" in 1982. Since then, releases on the Edge and Ichiban labels have brought his music to larger audiences.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Greensmith, Bill. "Fishing for a Hit: David Dee." Blues Unlimited no. 147 (Spring 1986): 15.

Selected Discography: Larkin

DELAFOSE, GENO

b. 6 February 1971; Eunice, LA

Accordianist and zydeco performer, Delafosse merges traditional styles of Louisiana music with country music, rock, and blues, and is progressive yet in line with tradition. At age eight he began playing washboard in his father John Delafosse's Eunice Playboys. Today a multi-instrumentalist, he had learned drums and accordion in his teens. He took an increasingly more prominent role in the group as his father approached retirement, and by the time of John Delafosse's death in 1994, Geno was leader of the Eunice Playboys. He has made it a point to interpret traditional Louisiana, while performing with younger musicians. Currently he performs with his French Rockin' Boogie Band, with recordings for Rounder and Times Square labels.

JOHN OTIS

DELAFOSE, GENO

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)
Stambler, Irwin, and Lydon Stambler. Folk and Blues: The Encyclopedia. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2001.

Discography: AMG

DELAFOSE, JOHN

- b. 16 April 1939; Duralde, LA
- d. 17 September 1994; Lawtell, LA

John Delafosse, master accordionist and founder of the Eunice Playboys, was one of the first performers to fuse traditional zydeco material with contemporary treatments. He developed his skills in a variety of local zydeco bands in the Eunice, Louisiana, area. He was proficient on a variety of instruments and often performed with several during the same set. He formed the Playboys in the mid-1970s with the Slim and Charles Prudhomme.

By the late 1980s, the Eunice Playboys had expanded to include other members of the Delafosse family. John's son, Geno, played accordion and sang until John's poor health forced him to retire shortly after the release of his last album, Blues Stay Away from Me, released a year before his death. Geno became the leader of the Playboys following his father's death.

TOM FISHER

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Stambler

Discography: AMG

Zydeco Man (1980, Arhoolie 1083).
Heartaches & Hot Steps (1984, Maison De Soul LP-1015).
Zydeco Excitement (1985 Maison De Soul LP-1015).
Zydeco Live! (1989, Rounder 2070).
Pere Et Garcon Zydeco (1992, Rounder 2116).
Blues Stay Away from Me (1993, Rounder 2121).

DELANEY, MATTIE

- b. Mattie Doyle (?), ca. 1904–1905; near Tchula, MS

Mississippi Delta singer and guitarist. Born and raised in a devout Baptist household, she sang in Sunday choirs. According to a cousin, Delaney began playing guitar in 1927; by 1930 she was performing in the styles of Charlie Patton and Memphis guitarists. In February 1930 she recorded two titles for Vocalion Records, one of them the notable flood blues "Tallahatchie River Blues." Activity since 1930 unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Calt, Stephen, and Gayle Dean Wardlow. King of the Delta Blues: The Life and Music of Charlie Patton, pp. 197–198. Newton, NJ: Rock Chapel Press, 1988.

Discography: DGR

DELANEY, THOMAS HENRY "TOM"

- b. 14 or 15 September 1889; Charleston, SC
- d. 16 December 1963; Baltimore, MD

Blues songwriter and entertainer. Delaney's "Jazz Me Blues," recorded by Lucille Hegamin in 1921, quickly became a jazz standard. His "Down Home Blues" became Ethel Waters's first hit in 1921. Among his other blues to be recorded by important blues artists were "Southbound Blues" (Ma Rainey), "Troublesome Blues" (Clara Smith), and "Log Cabin Blues" (both Trixie Smith and Blind Boy Fuller).

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

Bibliography

Harris
Grove, Thurman, and Mary Thurman. "Notes on Tom Delaney." Record Changer (May 1944): 17.
Rea, E. B. "Paramount Missed Scoop Filming 'Birth of Blues.'" Baltimore Afro-American (February 7, 1942): 15.
Rust, Brian. Jazz Records 1897–1942, 4th ed. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington House, 1978.

Discography: DGR

Complete Recordings (Delaney, vocal; Fred Longshaw, piano)

"I'm Leavin' Just to Ease My Worried Mind"/"Georgia Stockade Blues" (Columbia 14082); "Bow-Legged Mama"/"Parson Jones (You Ain't Livin' Right)" (Columbia 14122-D). Recorded New York, June 18, 1922; all four songs by Delaney.

See also Down Home Blues; Hegamin, Lucille; Rainey, Gertrude "Ma"; Smith, Trixie; Waters, Ethel

DELAY, PAUL

- b. 31 January 1952; Portland, OR

Influenced by his parents' collection of jazz and swing, deLay pursued a musical career from his adolescence. George "Harmonica" Smith and Charlie Musselwhite were early influences—Musselwhite gave deLay his first bullet microphone. In 1970 deLay, with Lloyd Jones and Jim Mesi, formed “Brown Sugar” with deLay singing and playing harp. After 1978 deLay led a series of bands known as “The Paul deLay Band,” always with Mesi on guitar. That band issued three albums in the 1980s on its own label, Criminal Records.

In 1988, guitarist Peter Damman replaced Mesi; in 1990 organist Louis Pain and saxophonist Dan Fincher joined to form a stable core that has played on all of deLay’s recordings since then except for DeLay Does Chicago, on which deLay was joined by the Rockin Johnny Band, Jimmy Dawkins, and Zora Young. DeLay’s drug problems eventually led to a jail term in 1992. Released in 1995, deLay resumed his career. New songs written in prison led to more well-received albums.

DeLay has toured with Sunnyland Slim, Hubert Sumlin, Johnny Otis, and played major blues festivals in the United States and Europe. A sophisticated composer and accomplished vocalist, deLay is especially noted for his mastery of the chromatic harp.

DANIEL BEAUMONT

Bibliography

Foyston, John. “Paul deLay: Groovin’ in Limbo.” Blues Access (Fall 1991) pp. 8–12.

Discography: AMG

The Other One (1990, Criminal); Paulzilla (1992, Criminal); Ocean of Tears (1996, Evidence); Take It from the Turn-around (1996, Evidence); Nice & Strong (1998, Evidence); deLay Does Chicago (1999, Evidence); Heavy Rotation (2001, Evidence); The Paul deLay Band (Criminal); Teasin’ (Criminal).

DELMARK

Record label. Founded in 1953 in St. Louis, Missouri; presently located in Chicago, Illinois. Along with, and long before, Alligator Records, Delmark has been the prototypical independent Chicago blues label, issuing dozens, perhaps hundreds, of releases by Chicago (and other midwestern) blues artists who lacked the national recognition to land recording contracts with the major labels. More so than Alligator or Chess Records, which was also based out of Chicago before being sold to MCA, Delmark has focused on Chicago-area musicians.

Delmark founder and owner Bob Koester started the business in St. Louis as a record shop specializing in the jazz and blues he loved. In 1953, he recorded and issued his first record—by the Windy City Six, a St. Louis-based jazz combo. He continued recording local jazz acts for the next few years, and also began acquiring the rights to recordings that had either not been released or had gone out of print—a practice of reissuing older recordings that continues to this day.

In 1958, Koester moved the business from St. Louis to Chicago—and picked up where he left off in St. Louis, finding local blues and jazz artists to record. Blues artists that Delmark has recorded and/or released through the years include Carey Bell, Big Time Sarah, Sleepy John Estes, Jimmy Dawkins, Magic Sam, Roosevelt Sykes, and Junior Wells. Delmark has also issued records by such blues-tinged jazz artists as Dinah Washington and Coleman Hawkins.

Bruce Iglauer worked at Delmark for about a year before setting off to found Alligator Records in 1971; Living Blues founders Jim O’Neal and Amy Van Singel were also employees at Delmark before starting the magazine.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz
Baretta, Scott. “Bob Koester: The Monarch of Delmark.” Blues Access no. 30 (Summer 1997): 22–29.
Delmark label website, <http://www.delmark.com/>.
Jackson, M. “Delmark Shows Independent Spirit at 50.” Down Beat 70, no. 9 (September 2003): 16.

Discography

45 Years of Jazz & Blues (1998, Delmark DD-903; two-disc sampler).
50 Years of Jazz & Blues (2003, Delmark DX-50; five-disc box set).

DERBY (NEW YORK)

Founded in New York City in July 1949 by Larry Newton in partnership with Eddie Heller, the distinctive Derby label was specifically an R&B company for only the first two or three years of its existence. Between its launch and late 1951, the label’s staff band was fronted by wild tenor saxophonist Freddie Mitchell, but following Mitchell’s departure and the company’s chart success with the saccharine “Wheel of Fortune” by Sunny Gale, the hot R&B backings of Mitchell’s band swiftly gave way to cool pop arrangements of Eddie Wilcox and his orchestra. Newton’s responsibilities became divided in late 1953 when he formed a new label, Central Records, with Lee Magid, allowing Derby to drift into debt and, finally, bankruptcy. The label’s masters were acquired by Eli Oberstein’s Record Corporation of America in 1954 and some of the sides were reissued on the budget Allegro label for the burgeoning rock ’n’ roll market.

DAVE PENNY

DERBY (NEW YORK)

Bibliography

Pearlin, Victor. "Derby Records." Whiskey, Women, And ... 14 (June 1984): 14.

Discography: McGrath

Cootie Williams & Jimmy Preston: Rock 'n' Roll (1954, Allegro-Elite LP 4109).
The Chronological Freddie Mitchell 1949–1950 (2002, Classics CD 5034).

DESANTO, SUGAR PIE

b. Umpeylia Morsema Balinton, 16 October 1935; Brooklyn, NY

Singer and songwriter. Grew up in San Francisco, California. DeSanto was discovered at an Ellis Theater talent contest by Johnny Otis in the early 1950s, who nicknamed her "Little Miss Sugar Pie." Her persona of a tough woman with a tougher voice emerged with her first hit, "I Want to Know," for Veltone Records in 1960, made with the assistance of producer Bob Geddins. In the early 1960s she toured with James Brown. In 1961 she joined the roster of Chess/Checker as singer and songwriter. She wrote songs for Little Milton and Fontella Bass. As singer she recorded one LP and several singles, among which are the duets with her cousin Etta James, including "In the Basement," Parts 1 and 2, and "Do I Make Myself Clear." In 1964 she toured Europe with the American Folk Blues Festival. After the end of her Chess contract, she returned to San Francisco, where she began working with her manager Jim Moore in 1971. In recent decades she has been recording on the Jasman label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Porter, James. "Sugar Is Sweet! Sugar Pie DeSanto Interview." Roctober no. 24 (1999); interview at <http://www.roctober.com/roctober/greatness/sugar.html> (accessed February 8, 2005).

Stolder, S. "From the Vaults: Sugar Pie DeSanto Interview." Blues and Rhythm no. 178 (April 2003): 4–7.

DESHAY, JAMES

b. 16 May 1919; Benoit, MS

d. 12 November 1998; St. Louis, MO

Singer and guitarist in southern style. Moved to St. Louis, Missouri, in 1939–1940. Musical associations included Little Walter Jacobs (1943–1947) and guitarist Charles Hollinshead. In 1965 he began owning a series of bars, initially the Blue Stallion Lounge, then the Santa Fe, and DeShay's and Whisper's. He was filmed by the BBC for the documentary The Devil's Music.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

DeShay James, with Mike Rowe. "They Know I'm Not Playing Anything But the Blues." Blues Unlimited no. 143 (Autumn/Winter 1982): 32–36.

DETROIT

Early blues in Detroit established itself in the predominantly African American neighborhoods that sprang up as a result of the migration that became possible after World War I. A census of Detroit in 1910 recorded only 5,741 African Americans in the city but by 1920 this figure had grown to more than 40,000. The majority of new arrivals took up residence in Black Bottom replacing the Jewish immigrants who had preceded them. By 1937, Paradise Valley, as it had become known, was firmly established as the center of the African American community in Detroit. Some of the earliest known examples of the blues in Detroit took place in the bars, brothels, and house parties that were plentiful in Paradise Valley.

Several early blues artists who were known to have been active in Detroit include piano players Rufus Perryman, also known as Speckled Red and Big Maceo Merriweather. Speckled Red was known to have played house parties in Detroit from 1924 through 1928 and Big Maceo Merriweather lived and worked in Detroit from 1924 through 1941 (and again from 1951 until his death in 1953). Big Maceo was a direct influence on another Detroit player called "Boogie Woogie Red" (Vernon Harrison). Another early Detroit blues artist was guitarist Calvin Frazier. Calvin Frazier moved to Detroit in the mid-1930s and was recorded (accompanied by Sampson Pittman) by Alan Lomax for the Library of Congress (1938). Frazier continued to perform in Detroit through the 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s.

In the 1940s Detroit's Paradise Valley showcased a vibrant mix of blues and jazz in the many clubs that were located on Hastings Street and the surrounding area. The Paradise Theater (for which Paradise Valley was originally named) featured many nationally known artists from that period, including Duke Ellington, T-Bone Walker, and Billie Holliday. Other popular clubs in and around Hastings Street included The Flame, The Palms, and Club Three Sixes. Detroit Queen of the Blues Alberta Adams began her career at the Paradise Theater.

During and after World War II a second wave of migration took place with many people leaving the South to work in the industrial North, and Detroit became the home to many fine blues artists. An important development in the growth of Detroit blues became the establishment of record labels anxious to take advantage of these artists. While earlier artists such as Big Maceo Merriweather had to travel to Chicago to record, new record companies such as Sensation, Holiday, JVB, and Fortune had established themselves in Detroit. They became important by recording Detroit blues artists but often leased material to other labels in order to gain distribution. Detroit blues artists such as John Lee Hooker, Eddie Kirkland, and Eddie Burns were the first to record on these labels. Other notable Detroit artists to have recorded in the late 1940s/early 1950s period include Baby Boy Warren and Bobo Jenkins. Blues artists not specifically known as Detroit artists were on the Detroit blues scene for periods of time. When Big Maceo Merriweather returned from Chicago to Detroit in 1951 he brought with him John and Grace Brim, with whom he played until his death in 1954. Sonny Boy Williamson II also lived and worked in Detroit recording with Baby Boy Warren and influencing Little Sonny. Louisiana Red (Iverson Minter) also was a Detroit resident in the late 1950s working by day and playing the blues in Clubs like the Harlem Inn (with John Lee Hooker) and Ethel's (with Eddie Burns) by night. Big John Wrencher (One-Armed John) also lived and worked in Detroit (with Baby Boy Warren) for several years. Other important Blues artists in Detroit in the 1950s included Mr. Bo (Louis Collins) and Little Sonny (Aaron Willis).

The blues scene in Detroit received several blows in the early 1960s that were to bring an end to the once vibrant blues scene that existed around Hastings Street. The first and most critical was the demolition of Hastings Street from 1951 through 1961 (when Interstate 75 replaced it). After the destruction of Hastings Street, blues artists found few venues in which to ply their trade. The second was the ascendance of Berry Gordy's Motown records as one of the most powerful recording labels in the country. With the popularity of Motown records, Detroit's blues were overshadowed.

The 1960s saw a period where few Detroit blues musicians prospered. Some musicians (Eddie Burns and John Lee Hooker) were able to sustain themselves through regional touring. These artists were also able to tour Europe as part of the American Folk/Blues Series.

In 1973 the Ann Arbor Blues and Jazz Festival showcased Detroit blues during its program "Music of Detroit," which was the seminal presentation of Detroit blues artists. Artists to appear at the festival included John Lee Hooker, Little Junior Cannaday, Baby Boy Warren, Johnnie Mae Matthews, One String Sam, Eddie Burns, Bobo Jenkins, Mr. Bo, Boogie Woogie Red, and Washboard Willie. The festival was able to show the depth of Detroit blues and its importance in relation to the national blues scene.

Several blues musicians, who were to become important to Detroit blues, relocated to Detroit in the 1970s. Willie D. Warren (1924–2000) moved to Detroit in 1975 after working on the South Side of Chicago with artists Willie Dixon and Muddy Waters. After moving to Detroit he quickly became a Detroit favorite with his "less is more" approach to guitar. Another artist to relocate from Chicago was Johnny "Yard Dog" Jones (guitar/harmonica/vocals). Jones would later win the W. C Handy Award as Best New Artist in 1998.

The blues of Detroit have never fully recovered from the destruction of Hastings Street; however, the Detroit blues scene continues to show surprising durability in the work of both the older artists who are still active on the scene and from the younger artists who work with them. Johnnie Bassett and Alberta Adams are both artists with a long and storied history in Detroit. Both began careers in the 1940s or 1950s and continue to be active today. The Butler Twins (active in Detroit from the 1950s) were a staple on the Detroit blues scene until Clarence's passing. Uncle Jessie White (whose home became a gathering place for Detroit blues musicians after the destruction of Hastings Street) is still performing.

ED SCHENK

Bibliography

- Harris; Herzhaft
 Bjorn, Lars. "From Hastings Street to the Bluebird: The Blues and Jazz Traditions in Detroit." Michigan Quarterly Review 25 (Spring 1986): 257–268.
 Burke, Tony. "Hello Chicago, Detroit Is on Your Back." Blues and Rhythm no. 51 (April 1990): 4–7.
 Cohassey, John Fredrick. Down on Hastings Street: A Study of Social and Cultural Changes in a Detroit Community, 1941–1955. M.A. thesis, Wayne State University, 1993.
 Danchin, Sebastian. "Detroit: An ABC." Soul Bag no. 112 (Winter 1987/1988): 10–15.
 Schenk, Ed. The Detroit Blues Heritage Series. <http://www.geocities.com/woodsmanq/> (accessed February 1, 2005).

See also Burns, Eddie; Hooker, John Lee; Kirkland, Eddie

DETROIT JUNIOR

b. Emery H. Williams, Jr., 26 October 1931; Haynes, AR

d. 9 August 2005; Chicago, IL

Detroit Junior worked in Flint, Michigan, auto plants and played piano on the side before moving to Chicago in 1955. There he became a solo artist with a jukebox repertoire as well as an ensemble player, notably with Howlin' Wolf's last band. "Money Tree," his first recording, was credited to "Detroit Jr." by Cadillac Baby, who coined the name.

Though known for such humorous, self-deprecating compositions as "If I Hadna Been High" and "Call My Job," his recorded work is slim with a handful of singles and one featured set, Turn Up the Heat (1995, Blue Suit). He also appeared on Chicago Urban Blues (1972, Blues on Blues) and Alligator's Living Chicago Blues, Vol. 4., and shared billing with Barrelhouse Chuck, Erwin Helfer, and Pinetop Perkins on 8 Hands on 88 Keys (2002, Sirens).

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

Brisbin, John Anthony. "Detroit Junior: You Got to Put Somethin' In It." Living Blues no. 129 (September/October 1996): 26–41.

Discography: LSFP

Turn Up the Heat (1995, Blue Suit BS105C).

DIAL

Record label (Tennessee, 1961–1974). Owner: William D. (Buddy) Killen (b. November 13, 1932; Lexington, AL). Nashville, Tennessee-based, the artists include Clarence "Frogman" Henry, King Floyd, Chris Harris, Jimmy Holiday, Paul Kelly ("Chills and Fever"), Frederick Knight, Jean Knight, Little Archie (Archie Himons) ("I Need You") Bobby Marchan ("Get Down With It," covered by Little Richard), Clarence Reid (aka Blowfly), Annette Snell ("You Oughta' Be Here With Me," "Footprints on My Mind"), Joe Tex ("Hold What You've Got," "I Gotcha," "I Want To [Do Everything for You]," "The Love You Save [May Be Your Own]," "Skinny Legs And All," "A Sweet Woman Like You"), and Len Wade. Recordings were also leased to Atlantic, Cameo, Epic, Mercury, Philips, and Wand Records.

Bibliography

Killen, Buddy, and Tom Carter. By the Seat of My Pants: My Life in Country Music. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993.

Ridley, John. CD notes for The Dial Records Southern Soul Story (2003, CDKEN2 223, Kent, UK).

DIAMOND TEETH MARY

(See McClain, Mary "Diamond Teeth")

DICKERSON, "BIG" JOHN

b. Ohio; active since 1960s

Session drummer at Motown Records in Detroit in the 1960s. He also fronted local bands as singer of 1960s blues, including those of Albert King and B. B. King, especially since moving to Minneapolis.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

DIDDLEY, BO

b. Otha Ellas Bates McDaniel, 30 December 1928; McComb, MS

Background

Bo Diddley, born Otha Ellas Bates McDaniel, was raised by his mother's cousin Gussie McDaniel, and moved to Chicago at an early age. Bo actually began his music career studying classical violin for twelve years and taught himself how to play a guitar, drums, and trombone. After hearing John Lee Hooker and his hit song "Boogie Chillen'" on the radio, Bo quickly turned to the blues as his favorite sound. Although he abandoned the violin, he incorporated his church music roots into his sound, giving him the pulsing rhythmic drive often found in his later songs.

In his early teens, he formed his first group, the Hipsters, which included maraca player and percussionist Jerome Green, who became Diddley's regular sidekick throughout his musical career. Also to join the Hipsters was blues harmonica player Billy Boy Arnold, soon after which Diddley changed the name of the band to the Langley Avenue Jive Cats after the avenue that he and bass player Roosevelt Jackson lived on. After graduation, Diddley took on several jobs, including amateur boxing, truck driving, and playing electric blues and R&B on the street corners and clubs of Chicago to supplement his income. At this time, he married his first wife, Louise Woolingham, which lasted for one year, after which Diddley married his second wife, Ethel Smith.

Chess Records

In the spring of 1955, Diddley took a demo of two songs he had written and recorded, "I'm a Man" and "Uncle John," to the Chicago blues label, Chess records. Leonard and Phil Chess suggested that he change the title and the lyrics of "Uncle John" and, later that same year, "Bo Diddley" and "I'm a Man" were released, launching Bo Diddley's musical career. The single "Bo Diddley" went to the top of the R&B charts and created the signature rhythm that was to make him famous. The syncopated rhythm once known as "shave and a haircut/two bits" was now known as the Bo Diddley beat. Diddley's popularization of the rhythm left its mark on numerous pop songs down the road. Other hit songs followed and climbed onto the R&B charts: "Diddley Daddy," "You Can't Judge a Book by Its Cover," "Say Man," "Who Do You Love?," "Walkin and Talkin," and "Road Runner." His first American pop hit was "Say Man," which made the top forty list for popular music in 1959.

Diddley soon left Chicago and moved to Washington, D.C., where he met and married his third wife, Kay Reynolds. In the 1960s, Diddley created albums to fit the rock 'n' roll style with such titles as Bo Diddley Is a Gunslinger, Bo Diddley Is a Lover, and Bo Diddley Is a Twister. With the surfing and beach boy faze of the mid-1960s, Diddley also met the challenge with albums such as Surfin with Bo Diddley and Bo Diddley's Beach Party. Diddley's association with Checker and Chess labels lasted for twenty-one years, ending in 1971. In 1974, he was appointed deputy sheriff for the New Mexico police force, moved to Florida in 1987, and married his fourth and current wife, Sylvia, in 1992.

Contribution to Rock 'n' Roll

Diddley's music seems to fall under the rock 'n' roll and R&B label rather than the blues, but his contribution to the blues remains strong through his adaptation of blues themes, his funky guitar riffs, his infectious rhythm extended from blues influences, and his incorporation of blues musicians into his recordings especially during his time at Chess records. Diddley helped to establish the rock 'n' roll sound that was gaining in popularity in the 1950s. At this time, famous rock 'n' roll legends were being produced through the recording industry such as Elvis Presley's "Heartbreak Hotel," Chuck Berry's "Maybellene," Little Richard's "Tutti Frutti," and Bill Haley and the Comets' "Rock Around the Clock."

Diddley's musical style fell into the rock 'n' roll legacy while leaning heavily on his R&B and blues influences. He was even recording along with fellow Chicago musician, Chuck Berry. While Berry quickly earned a pop career, Diddley's style of music kept him from the mainstream although both artists proved influential, especially overseas. Diddley had a huge following in the United Kingdom where his rock 'n' roll singles went to the top of the charts. This channeled his influence to several British rock 'n' roll artists such as the Beatles, the Rolling Stones, the Yardbirds, and the Who.

Bo Diddley performs at the Chicago Blues Festival in May 2002. (Photo by Gene Tomko)

The Name and the Guitar

Around Christmas of 1940, he began to acquire the name of Bo Diddley. There is much speculation behind the meaning of his name: It may refer to a mischievous or bullyboy, or it might be a nickname describing his brief boxing career, or it may be attributed to the southern folk instrument the diddly bow. In any case, Diddley himself is not sure where he got his name, but he has made the name famous by integrating it into his lyrics.

Around 1958, Diddley took the neck and the electrical wiring off of a Gretsch guitar and put them onto a home-made square body, making Big B the world's first square guitar. Diddley's next square guitar was made by Chris Kinman and was called "The Mean Machine."

Awards

Throughout his life, Bo Diddley toured all over the world, including the United Kingdom and Australia, and won countless awards and honors for his contribution to rock 'n' roll, including induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame. Instantly recognizable as much for his physical presence as for the distinctive rectangular guitar, Bo Diddley projects an identity, a sense of humor, including shameless self-promotion and raw musical talent that has stood the test of time.

HEATHER PINSON

Bibliography

- AMG (Richie Unterberger); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 Loder, Kurt. "Bo Diddley: The Rolling Stone Interview." Rolling Stone no. 493 (February 12, 1987): 76.
 Pruter, Robert. Doo-Wop: The Chicago Scene. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
 White, George R. The Complete Bo Diddley Sessions, 1993–2000. United Kingdom: Music Mentor Books, 2002.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Bo Diddley (1957, Checker LP 1431); Go Bo Diddley (1959, Chess, CS CHC-9196); Bo Diddley in the Spotlight (1960, Chess LP CH-9264); Bo Diddley's Beach Party (1963, Checker LP P-2988); 500% More Man (1965, Checker LP 2996); The Originator (1966, Checker LP P-3001); Super Blues (1967, Chess CD CHD-9168); Rare and Well Done (1991, Chess CD CHD-9331); Who Do You Love (1992, Sound Solutions CD 400902).

DIDDLEY BOW

Also called "didley bow," "bo diddley," "jitterbug," "di'di' bahg" [Gullah], and "diddy bowl." The diddley bow is a one-stringed instrument used primarily in Mississippi Delta blues. The forerunner of the slide guitar, its antecedents are African. Over the years there has been significant controversy in the scholarly community about the likely evolution of the instrument. Researchers in the 1970s thought the diddley bow was a direct descendent of the ancient mouth bow, also played in twentieth-century Mississippi. By the late 1990s, the general consensus seemed to be that the form of the instrument used in Delta blues is more directly derived from the monochord zithers of central Africa.

The monochord zither is a popular children's instrument in central Africa. It is typically constructed from a string of palm fiber, a stick, and a stalk of raffia, and is played by two children. The stick is used to hold the string up and away from the stalk so it can vibrate freely. One child keeps the string vibrating, while the other runs a knife or other edge along the string to change the pitch.

The diddley bows popular in the Delta are of two types: wall mounted and free standing. Big Joe Williams, who played slide guitar, described the diddley bows of his childhood as made of cotton bailing wire, thread spools, and a bottle. The bailing wire was mounted on the wall of a house or barn with staples, the spools were bridges, and the bottle was the slider. Other sliders commonly used on wire were nails, knives, and other metal and glass objects, which resonated well on the bailing wire. Alan Lomax describes sitting in Napoleon Strickland's kitchen, watching him make a free-standing diddley bow by wrapping a broom wire around two brads on a board, bridged with snuff bottles. While the principles of construction remain constant, field-work interviews with musicians indicate that there are an unlimited number of found objects that can be used to make and play a diddley bow. The interviews also mention the popularity of the instrument with both children and adults, and its important role as a transition instrument to the slide guitar.

Although the diddley bow started as an acoustic instrument, it has successfully made the transition to the amplified urban blues setting. Electric diddley bows typically resemble tiny electric guitars in the body, with a guitar-like tunable string. Probably the best known electric diddley bow maker and musician was Lonnie Pitchford, who can be seen on film with both kinds of diddley bow. Pitchford demonstrates the wall-mounted diddley bow at the end of the film Deep Blues, and plays an electric diddley bow of his own design in the film The Land Where Blues Began.

The sound of a diddley bow can be described as a moan, a twang, a scream, a human voice, a glissando—it slides from one note to another in melodic and rhythmic accompaniment to the singer. Once heard, the sound is never forgotten. Blues artists who started on the diddley bow include Luther Allison, Ranie Burnett, Lewis Dotson, Elmore James, Eddie “One String” Jones, Lonnie McDonald, Napoleon Strickland, Big Joe Williams, and Jo Jo Williams. Diddley bow artists include Jessie Mae Hemphill and Lonnie Pitchford. Despite his stage name, guitarist Elias McDaniel, aka Bo Diddley, did not play the instrument.

DEBORAH L. GILLASPIE

Bibliography

- Evans, David. “Africa and the Blues.” In Write Me a Few of Your Lines: A Blues Reader, edited by Steven C. Tracy. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1999.
- . “Afro-American One-Stringed Instruments.” Western Folklore 29 (1970): 229–245.
- , and Pete Welding. CD liner notes for Bottleneck Blues (1995, Testament Records TCD 5021).
- Kubik, Gerhard. Africa and the Blues. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999.
- Lomax, Alan. The Land Where Blues Began. New York: Pantheon Books, 1993.
- Smith, Charles Edward. LP liner notes for Mississippi’s Big Joe Williams and His Nine-String Guitar (Folkways Records FS3820).
- Titon, Jeff Todd. Early Downhome Blues: A Musical and Cultural Analysis, 2nd ed., p. 40. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.

DIG/ULTRA

Founded by bandleader Johnny Otis in 1955 in Los Angeles, the first five issues of this new record company were issued on the Ultra label, in partnership with Aladdin Records, before breaking away to become Dig Records. The label recorded many local blues/R&B acts as well as the Otis band and its alumni. Otis discontinued the label in 1957 when he signed to Capitol.

DAVE PENNY

Discography

- Dapper Cats, Groovy Tunes & Hot Guitars* (1992, Ace CDCHD 351).
- Dig These Blues* (1992, Ace CDCHD 334).

DILLARD, VARETTA

- b. 3 February 1933; New York City (Harlem), NY
d. 4 October 1993; Brooklyn, NY

Postwar-era R&B vocalist who recorded a handful of hits for Savoy Records in the early 1950s. Born with a rare bone disease of the legs that required numerous operations, Dillard spent much of her childhood in hospitals, and there she developed her singing talents by performing for the hospital staff and other patients. After competing in a variety of amateur singing contests throughout New York, Dillard performed successfully at the prestigious Apollo Theater in 1948, 1949, and 1950—taking top prize twice—and was signed to Savoy Records in 1951 as a result. She recorded twelve sessions for Savoy and three of her singles with the label reached the R&B charts: “Easy Easy Baby” (1952), “Mercy Mr. Percy,” (1953), and “Johnny Has Gone” (1955), a song memorializing the late vocalist Johnny Ace.

Dillard quit the Savoy label in 1955, and signed with RCA Victor subsidiary label Groove in 1956. There she recorded “I Miss You Jimmy,” about the late actor James Dean. Dillard remained under contract with Groove until 1958, after which time she recorded for the Triumph and MGM Cub label, but these sessions met with little commercial success. Dillard ended her solo recording career in 1961 and joined her husband’s gospel group, the Tri-Odds, a group that was politically active in the Civil Rights Movement. After the Tri-Odds disbanded, Dillard quit her professional career as a singer and worked a variety of jobs outside the music business until her death.

ERIN STAPLETON-CORCORAN

Bibliography

- AMG (Ron Wynn); Larkin
Penny, Dave. “Varetta Dillard.” Blues and Rhythm no. 86 (February 1994): 8.

Discography: AMGSelected Recordings

Varettia Dillard: Got You On My Mind. Complete Recordings 1956–1961, Vol. 1 (1989, Bear Family).

Varettia Dillard: The Lovin' Bird. Complete Recordings 1956–1961, Vol. 2 (1989, Bear Family).

DIRTY DOZENS

A family of bawdy blues songs characterized by insulting language. The term is derived from the African American folk practice of “playing” or “putting in” the dozens (also known as sounding, joning, woofing, or cracking) in which two or more participants trade insults about each other’s relatives, especially their mothers. The insults are typically delivered in a rhythmic fashion, often with improvised rhymes, each side aiming to outdo the other in verbal dexterity and scatological abuse. The intent could be friendly or otherwise, and there are many reports of the game ending in violence. McCormick has suggested that the practice evolved during the nineteenth century as a parody of a set of twelve verses describing certain Biblical facts learned by children as a standard part of their religious education.

It is unknown when the dozens evolved into a musical form, though it probably did so at an early stage, given the natural transition between rhythmic speech and singing in African American culture (as found, for example, in certain black southern preaching styles). The classic version of the song was first recorded by piano-vocalist Speckled Red (Rufus Perryman) in 1929. It was an immediate hit on the Race record market and its popularity resulted in numerous versions of the songs being recorded during the 1930s by important Race artists such as Kokomo Arnold, Leroy Carr, Ben Curry, Jed Davenport, Frankie “Half-Pint” Jaxon, Lonnie Johnson, Memphis Minnie, and Victoria Spivey.

All of these versions use a variant of the standard three-line, twelve-bar blues stanza. The first line acts as a verse. It is typically sung (or half-sung) rhythmically on a monotone, just as in the original folk game; is generally unaccompanied except for rhythmic chordal punctuations (stop-time) on a tonic (I) chord; and is of variable length, most commonly eight measures (instead of the four of a standard blues), although it is at times extended to twenty-four measures or even more. The last two lines of each stanza act as a refrain, repeated with only minor differences between each stanza. They conform to the twelve-bar blues stereotype in terms of both harmony and length (each four measures). This one-line verse, two-line refrain form shows the connection between “The Dirty Dozens” and contemporary hokum blues songs such as “Tight Like That,” which share a similar structure and risqué subject matter.

There is a particular association with “The Dirty Dozens” and boogie-woogie piano style. Speckled Red’s version, for example, uses split octaves in the accompaniment as does Will Ezell’s instrumental “Playing the Dozens,” recorded seven months earlier. Interestingly, boogie-woogie is also hinted at in the earliest known example of the song, a printed version from 1917 by black composer-pianist Clarence M. Jones and white lyricist Jack Frost.

While prewar commercial versions of the song were considerably toned down from the folk originals, certain later recordings were more explicit, particularly those of Eddie Jones, Lightnin’ Hopkins, and Speckled Red (1996). Although versions of the latter type have been generally valued for their directness, the toned-down versions also have considerable merit through the subtle use of double entendre as well as their musical excellence.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

- Abrahams, Roger D. “Playing the Dozens.” Journal of American Folklore 75 (1982): 209–220.
- Dollard, John. “The Dozens: Dialectic of Insult.” American Imago 1 (1939): 3–25.
- Garon, Paul. “The Dirty Dozens.” Living Blues no. 97 (May/June 1991): 33–35.
- McCormick, Mack. Notes to The Unexpurgated Folk Songs of Men (1965, Raglan LP51).
- Oliver, Paul. Screening the Blues: Aspects of the Blues Tradition. London: Cassell, 1968.
- Stancil, Cassandra A. “The Dozens.” In Encyclopedia of African American Culture and History, edited by Jack Salzman, David Lionel Smith, and Carmel West. New York: Macmillan, 1996.

Selected Recordings

- Arnold, Kokomo. “The Twelves (Dirty Dozens)” (1935, De 7083).
- Carr, Leroy, and Scrapper Blackwell. “The Dirty Dozen” (1930, Vo 1454).
- Chatman, Sam. “God Don’t Like Ugly” (1960, Arhoolie F1006).
- Curry, Ben. “The New Dirty Dozen” (1932, Pm 13140).
- Davenport, Jed. “The Dirty Dozen” (1930, Vo 1478).
- Ezell, Will. “Playing the Dozen” (1929, Pm 12773).
- Hopkins, Lightnin’. “Dirty Dozens” (1959, Raglan LP 51).
- Jaxon, Frankie. “Half-Pint”/“The Dirty Dozen” (1937, De 7304).
- Johnson, Lonnie. “The Dirty Dozen” (1930, OK 8775).
- Jones, Eddie. “One String”/“The Dozens” (1960, Portents 2).
- Memphis Minnie. “New Dirty Dozen” (1930, Vo 1618).

- Noble, George. "Dozing Blues" (1935, Vo 02905).
 Price, Sam. "The Dirty Dozens" (1940, De 7811).
 Smith, Chris. "Don't Slip Me in the Dozen" (1924, Ajax 17004).
 Speckled Red. "The Dirty Dozen" (1929, Br 7116).
 ———. "The Dirty Dozen—No. 2" (1930, Br 7151).
 ———. "The Dirty Dozens" (1996, Delmark CD 601).
 Spivey, Sweet Pease. "Double Dozens (You Dirty No Gooder)" (1936, De 7204).
 Spivey, Victoria. "From 1 to 12 (Dirty Dozen)" (1937, Vo 03639).

Sheet Music and Transcriptions

- Jones, Clarence M., and Jack Frost. "The Dirty Dozen." Chicago: Frank K. Root, 1917.
 Kriss, Eric. Six Blues-Roots Pianists. New York: Oak Publications, 1973.

DISCOGRAPHY

A discography documents sound recordings in much the same fashion that a bibliography does for printed materials. A primary difference is that a discography cites performances created in real time, as opposed to printed works that are rarely completed at a single session. Despite its name, a discography documents soundprints in all formats—cylinder, wire, tape, and other recordings, along with conventional disc media. Normally, discographic documentation for popular or vernacular music performances will include some or all of the following information:

- Performer name(s)
- Performer name(s) as identified on published recordings, including pseudonyms
- Participating performers, with instrumental or other roles
- Song title(s)
- Composer credit (few discographies actually include this)
- Matrix number (identifying the actual metal master disc)
- Take letter or number (identifying one of potentially multiple performances)
- Date and place of recording
- For published recordings, original release information, usually record label and catalog number
- For unpublished recordings, label or record company name, or (with field recordings) archival identification data
- Details of rereleases and reissues, including formats that vary from the original
- Supplementary notes as required

Recordings are normally grouped by session. A sample entry from Blues & Gospel Records (Robert M. W. Dixon, John Godrich, and Howard W. Rye, eds., Oxford, 1997, p. 739) looks like this:

"Ma" Rainey vocal acc. Her Georgia Jazz Band: Louis Armstrong, cornet; Charlie Green, trombone; Buster Bailey, clarinet; Fletcher Henderson, piano; Charlie Dixon, banjo; unknown, percussion effects—1

New York City	ca. 16 October 1924
---------------	---------------------

1925-1, -2	See See Rider Blues	Paramount 12252, United Hot Clubs of America 85, Jazz Information 9, Jazz Collector L20, Ampersand R101
1926-2	Jelly Bean Blues	Paramount 12238, 14016, United Hot Clubs of America 84, Jazz Information 8, Jazz Collector L10
1927-2, -3	Countin' the Blues-1	Paramount 12238, 14016, United Hot Clubs of America 83, Jazz Information 8, Jazz Collector 10

Numbers at the left indicate metal matrices from which pressings were made. Single digits following each dash indicate a "take" or unique performance. In this instance, two takes of two of these three songs were published. The second column shows titles as they appeared on the original Paramount record labels. The right-hand column shows 78-rpm issues for each title. All but the first Paramount releases were dubbed from pressings, and these numbers are shown in italics. Normally, pressings made from original matrices yield the best sound and are more desirable to collectors. Discographies use abbreviated forms of most record label names, for instance, Pm for Paramount, UHCA for United Hot Clubs of America; however, those names are spelled out in this particular example. This "Ma" Rainey session appears in both blues and jazz discographies.

Discographies normally focus on particular genres, performers, or eras. The first important generic work was Charles Delaunay's Hot Discography, published in Paris in 1936. Other jazz discographies followed, most notably Brian Rust's Jazz Records, appearing in several editions between 1961 and 1982. These works chronicled certain blues records from the pre-World War II era, though only those of interest to jazz historians and collectors. This policy dictated the inclusion of singers like Bessie Smith and "Ma"

DISCOGRAPHY

Rainey (who recorded with jazz musicians) and the omission of Leroy Carr, Blind Lemon Jefferson, and Lucille Bogan (who didn't).

The Rust discographic model was useful, inspiring Robert M. W. Dixon and John Godrich to compile and publish the first edition of Blues & Gospel Records in 1964. At the time, they felt constrained to identify and include only material with sufficient "Negroid content" (their phrase), omitting material by the Fisk University Jubilee Singers, Bert Williams, and others whose style was deemed overpolished. Nevertheless, Dixon and Godrich documented a large universe of African American recordings made before 1942 that had previously been unchronicled. Their important work has appeared in four editions, each adding and updating information to the previous one. The fourth edition (1997) includes entries on Williams, the Fisks, and other performers excluded earlier. Material captured on radio transcriptions and film sound tracks is cited, most of it for the first time.

The first jazz and blues discographies focused on material made before July 31, 1942, when an extended ban on recording was enforced by the American Federation of Musicians. The strike, coupled with war-time conditions, put an almost complete halt to record making through most of 1943. The largest companies, Victor and Columbia, failed to come to terms with the union until the fall of 1944. Meanwhile, a number of small record companies sprang up with the goal of filling the void left by the major labels. By the end of the war, many radio stations had acquired recording equipment, as had numerous small independent studios throughout the country. Independent record publishers sprang up in abundance everywhere, and many of them focused on African American entertainers. Most new record labels didn't last long. Many had limited distribution, and accounts of their activities have tended not to survive, making the task of documentation difficult for discographers. The late 1940s saw the gradual substitution of magnetic tape for acetate-coated discs in the recording process, making it less expensive and more widespread. By the early 1950s, every major American town and many smaller ones featured recording studios, homegrown labels, or both.

The effect of the recording diaspora was to create thousands of new operations. Some (like King, Atlantic, and Mercury) were national in scope, and created catalogs that encompassed multiple music genres. Others focused on fewer areas and local performers. Labels like Harlem, Chess, Jackson, Down Town, Gotham, and JOB concentrated on blues, gospel, and R&B. As technology and the music business evolved in the 1950s and thereafter, 45-rpm, 33 1/3-rpm, and stereophonic recordings were introduced, with each advance marking the demise of some producers and the introduction of new ones. Thorough documentation is often not possible with small, fleeting record operations. Nevertheless, collector journals and fan magazines like Blues Unlimited, Living Blues, DisCollector, and Goldmine have published articles about individual performers that include discographies. Two comprehensive discographic works survey blues and gospel music through the 1960s: Blues Records, 1943 to 1970 (1987), and a companion volume, Gospel Records, 1943–1969 (1992). The R&B Indies (2000), though not a discography, is a comprehensive collection of postwar record lists, covering the mid-1940s through the early 1970s.

Comprehensive discographies covering the period from 1970 to the present remain to be published. One presumption that will require reexamination is the exclusion of white blues performers from existing discographies. The racial distinction is appropriate to earlier eras, when white performers rarely produced blues records aimed at the African American market. As the white audience for the blues expanded in the 1960s, white and interracial recorded performances did as well, becoming the norm by the end of the decade. As the blues on record is further documented, generic definitions and boundaries will need to be revisited if discographies are to accurately reflect social and musical developments.

RICHARD SPOTTSWOOD

Bibliography

- Dixon, Robert M. W., John Godrich, and Howard Rye. Blues & Gospel Records, 4th ed. Oxford, England: Clarendon, 1997.
- Hayes, Cedrick J., and Robert Laughton. Gospel Records, 1943–1969: A Black Music Discography. London: Record Information Services, 1992.
- Leadbitter, Mike, and Neil Slaven. Blues Records, 1943 to 1970: A Selected Discography, 2 vols. London: Record Information Services, 1987, 1994.
- McGrath, Bob. The R&B Indies, 2 vols. West Vancouver, BC: Eyeball, 2000.
- Rust, Brian. Jazz Records, 1897–1942, 5th ed. Chigwell, Essex, England: Storyville, 1983.

DIXIE HUMMINGBIRDS

Founded 1927. Gospel singing ensemble, pioneers of on-stage theatrics and flash among gospel acts. The original group began as teens in 1927, consisting of founding tenor James Davis, lead vocalist Barney Gipson, baritone singer Barney Parks, and bass voice J. B. Matterson. Fred Owens replaced Matterson quite early, and they initially billed themselves as the Sterling High School Quartet, before Davis tabbed them the Dixie Hummingbirds. Jimmy Bryant from the Heavenly Gospel Singers and Tucker from the Gospel Carriers joined the group in 1939, followed shortly after by the addition of thundering bass vocalist Willie Bobo. During the 1940s came recording sessions for Apollo and Gotham, plus more changes with Beachy Thompson from the Five Gospel Singers.

During the 1950s and 1960s, the Dixie Hummingbirds were superstars, making several now-classic recordings on Peacock and also adding another masterful lead singer in James Walker. They made a highly praised appearance at the 1966 Newport Folk Festival. Later came rock/pop exposure thanks to a collaboration with Paul Simon on the 1973 song "Loves Me Like a Rock." They later cut their own version of that tune. Despite Bobo's death in 1976 and Davis's retirement in 1984, the Hummingbirds are still performing and touring. They issued the landmark recording Diamond Jubilation in 2003.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Larkin Zolten, J. Jerome. Great God A'Mighty!: The Dixie Hummingbirds and the Rise of Soul Gospel Music. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.

Discography: AMG; Gospel Records 1943–1966

DIXIELAND JUG BLOWERS

Jazz-oriented jug bands led by Clifford Hayes and featuring jug blower Earl McDonald, which recorded with Johnny Dodds and various blues vocalists in 1926–1927. An important part of the thriving Louisville musical scene that inspired the Memphis jug bands.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Santelli Geesin, Ron. Notes accompanying Dixieland Jug Blowers: Louisville Stomp (1998, Frog CD 6).

Discography: DGR; Lord

DIXON, FLOYD

b. 8 February 1929; Marshall, TX

Singer, pianist, songwriter. A pianist with impressive technique and impeccable timing, Dixon was instrumental in the evolution of jump-blues into R&B, both as a mentor to Ray Charles and as a successful singer in his own right. Dixon, who wrote "Homesick Blues" while still a teenager, idolized fellow Texan Charles Brown, who he met at talent contest at which Brown's group, the Three Blazers, was headlining.

Dixon moved to Los Angeles as a teenager and won several talent contests in the mid-1940s. He performed in cocktail blues combos, ultimately including Johnny Moore's Three Blazers, where he replaced Brown for a year. Johnny Otis encouraged Dixon to record and he came up with a hit in 1948 with his Swing Time debut "Houston Jump." He also released a succession of singles in 1949 while in the Brown Buddies quartet. The Modern Records hit "Dallas Blues," released in 1949 while Dixon was holding down a day job in a drugstore, was followed by "Broken Hearted," but it was "Telephone Blues," recorded with the Three Blazers in 1951, that gained Dixon his greatest early acclaim. He successfully mined the same vein with "Call Operator 210" before recording his signature song and biggest hit, "Hey, Bartender," in 1954.

Dixon returned to Paris, Texas, and semi-retirement in the early 1970s. A tour of Sweden in 1975 presaged a return to full-time action in the early 1980s when he joined the touring European Blues Caravan, which included R&B legend Ruth Brown and Dixon's former idol Charles Brown. Dixon played regularly on the West Coast in the 1980s, touring with a young Robert Cray for part of the time. His career was further revitalized in the early 1990s when he played a series of major festivals. He won the 1997 W. C. Handy award for best comeback album with Wake Up and Live.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli Shurman, Dick, and Tom Mazzolini. "Living Blues Interview: Floyd Dixon." Living Blues no. 23 (September/October 1975): 14–21.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

DIXON, WILLIE JAMES

b. 1 July 1915; Vicksburg, MS
d. 29 January 1992; Pasadena, CA

A composer, arranger, producer, singer, and upright bassist, Dixon was, in one way or another, responsible for many of the blues' seminal postwar recordings.

Willie Dixon with blues artist Koko Taylor. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

His autobiographical claim—I Am the Blues—is neither bravado nor hyperbole, for his career decisively shaped the development of the urban blues in all its various forms, and his ability to adapt to changes in America’s cultural climate from the Great Depression to the late twentieth century ensures him a unique and lasting place in the annals of American music history.

Early Career

Dixon’s upbringing lent itself to his later vocation as a songwriter. His mother, Daisy Dixon, was poorly educated but instilled in her children a respect for reading and a love of poetry—a rarity in the Jim Crow South, where African American literacy rates were generally low. His understanding of the power of language was fostered by his increasing facility at word play and in his early poems such as “The Signifying Monkey.” The industrious Dixon wrote this mildly salacious ditty as a fourth grader, had it printed, and subsequently sold tens of thousands of copies on the street, first as a boy in Vicksburg and later as a young man in Chicago. Indeed, this early effort was an indication of things to come, for Dixon later rewrote “The Signifying Monkey” to appeal to a more genteel sensibility and recorded it as a member of the Big Three vocal group. Released on Nashville’s Bullet label in 1946, the song became a hit on the national race record charts.

While Dixon spent much of his adolescence traveling across the Depression Era South in search of work and getting into and out of trouble, the fledgling songwriter found his first musical situation close to home and in respectable company singing bass with the Union Jubilee Singers, a local gospel quartet of some renown. It was around this same time that he also established himself as an able boxer; sensing the limitations of a pugilist’s life in the South he left for Chicago in 1936.

Chicago, the Chess Years, and Beyond

In Chicago Dixon fought successfully, even winning his weight division in the Golden Gloves tournament of 1937. At the same time he sang in a number of vocal groups and met Leonard “Baby Doo” Caston, who eventually persuaded Dixon to trade in his boxing gloves for a washtub bass. The two worked the Chicago streets for pocket money—enough, apparently, for Dixon to upgrade from washtub to double bass—and formed a group called the Five Breezes; in November 1940 the quintet cut eight sides for the Bluebird label, the Race record subsidiary of RCA. In late 1941 Dixon spent ten months in prison for draft evasion; after his release he formed another group, the Four Jumps of Jive, which cut four sides for Mercury in 1945. Dixon then rejoined Caston to form the pop-oriented Big Three trio with Bernardo Dennis and later Ollie Crawford on guitar; between 1946 and 1954 the trio would make a number of recordings on the Okeh, Delta, and Columbia imprints. The earliest of these earned Dixon the attention of Leonard and Phil Chess, who, beginning in 1948, enlisted Dixon to do session work for Aristocrat, a newly formed subsidiary of the Chess label.

Dixon's tenure at Chess was fateful. Although they were quick to capitalize on Dixon's playing, arranging, writing, and producing skills from the start, the Chess brothers did not hire him full time until 1951. His first session for the parent company came in 1952, but it was only in 1954, when Muddy Waters recorded Dixon's "Hoochie Coochie Man," that the commercial potential of Dixon's songwriting became apparent. After the initial success of that recording, Dixon penned a number of other hits, including Waters' follow-up, "I Just Want to Make Love to You," Howlin' Wolf's "Evil," and two by Little Walter Jacobs, "Mellow Down Easy" and the R&B classic "My Babe." At the same time, Dixon played bass with Waters, Jacobs, and other Chess artists such as Sonny Boy Williamson II, Jimmy Witherspoon, and Bo Diddley, as well as with Chuck Berry on early rock 'n' roll compositions such as "Maybellene," "Sweet Little Sixteen," "Rock and Roll Music," and "Johnny B. Goode." Nevertheless, by late 1956 the Chess brothers' notoriously manipulative business practices encouraged Dixon to move to the Cobra label while he continued to play sessions for Chess. At Cobra Dixon wrote songs for pioneers of the "West Side" sound such as Magic Sam, Buddy Guy, and Otis Rush; Rush's version of "I Can't Quit You Babe" was the label's first single and a top ten R&B hit. Nevertheless, Cobra folded in 1958 and Dixon returned to Chess full time.

Meanwhile, changes in American culture were afoot. The electric bass guitar, introduced by Leo Fender in 1951, increasingly supplanted the upright bass on many recordings, diminishing Dixon's demand as a session player. The emergence of rock 'n' roll took its toll on Chicago's live blues scene; with the number of hometown gigs dwindling, Dixon joined Memphis Slim for a series of eastern tours that included stops at the Newport Folk Festival in 1957 and 1958 as well as recording sessions for the Prestige, Verve, and Folkways labels. At the same time, the folk and blues revival of the late 1950s and early 1960s led Germans Horst Lippmann and Fritz Rau to stage the first of several highly successful American Folk Blues Festivals across Europe, with which Dixon was closely involved.

If any of this affected Dixon's songwriting for Chess, it was only for the better. Indeed, during this period Dixon wrote many of his most influential songs, including "Spoonful," "Back Door Man," "I Ain't Superstitious," "Little Red Rooster," "Shake for Me," "Wang Dang Doodle," and "You Shook Me" for Howlin' Wolf as well as "Bring it on Home" and "Help Me" for Sonny Boy Williamson and "I'm Ready" for Muddy Waters. And even as Chess's star began to descend—its last blues hit was, fittingly, Koko Taylor's 1966 version of "Wang Dang Doodle"—Dixon had the attention of a whole legion of English, and subsequently American, rock bands eager to plunder his songwriting catalog, at times without acknowledgment or consent. Dixon's efforts to recoup lost songwriting revenues in the 1970s were largely successful, and his experience led him to found the Blues Heaven Foundation, a benevolent organization dedicated to the financial well-being of aging blues artists. He died in his sleep at the age of seventy-six.

DEAN A. MASULLO

Bibliography

- AMG (Bruce Eder); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 Carlson, Lenny, and Fred Sokolow. Willie Dixon: The Master Blues Composer, 1915–1992. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 1992.
 Corritore, Bob, Bill Ferris, and Jim O'Neal. "Willie Dixon. Part I." Living Blues no. 81 (July/August 1988): 16–25; "Part II." Living Blues 82 (September/October 1988): 20–31.
 Dixon, Willie, with Don Snowden. I Am the Blues: The Willie Dixon Story. New York: Da Capo, 1989.
 Pruter, Robert. "Willie James Dixon." In International Dictionary of Black Composers, edited by Samuel A. Floyd, Jr., Vol. 1, pp. 380–384. Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn, 1999.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

Selected Recordings

- Catalyst* (Ovation OVD/1433); Ginger Ale Afternoon (Varese Sarabande VDS-5234); Live! Backstage Access (Pausa PR 7183); Memphis Slim and Willie Dixon (Folkways FA 2385); Memphis Slim and Willie Dixon: At the Village Gate (Folkways FA 2386); Memphis Slim and Willie Dixon: Live at the Trois Mailletz (Polydor 65f8.148); What Happened to My Blues? (Ovation OV-1705); Willie Dixon: I Am the Blues (Columbia PC 9987); Willie Dixon: Mighty Earthquake and Hurricane (Pausa PR 7157); Willie Dixon: The Chess Box (MCA/Chess CH3-16500); Willie's Blues (Prestige/Bluesville BV-1003).

DIXON, WILLIE JAMES

DIZZ, LEFTY

b. Walter Williams, 29 April 1937; Osceola, AL
d. 7 September 1993; Chicago, IL

Born Walter Williams in Osceola, Alabama, the flamboyant singer, guitarist, and songwriter dubbed Lefty Dizz moved to Chicago with his family when he was a baby. Although he learned piano as a boy, Dizz gravitated to the guitar while in his teens, inspired by the recordings of Elmore James and T-Bone Walker. After serving in the Air Force, the left-handed guitarist started gigging around Chicago in the early 1960s as a bass player with Earl Hooker. Hooker's brilliant guitar work had a tremendous impact on Dizz's own playing style. Dizz joined Junior Wells's band in the mid-1960s and spent the next several years recording and touring with the harmonica player, performing as far away as Africa, Europe, and Southeast Asia. He also worked regularly in Chicago with Hound Dog Taylor, J. B. Lenoir, and Big Moose Walker. In the 1970s, Dizz recorded a single with brother Woody Williams for C.J. Records and formed his own band, Shock Treatment. Dizz's wild acrobatic stage antics, raw South Side Chicago guitar style, and charismatic personality made him a very popular act on the Chicago blues scene throughout the 1970s and 1980s with both fans and musicians alike. He recorded three studio albums during his lifetime, including two for French labels in 1979 and a third for England's JSP in the late 1980s. In 1992, after returning from a tour in Europe, Dizz was diagnosed with cancer of the esophagus. Performing almost right up until the end, Lefty Dizz succumbed to the disease at age fifty-six.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda)
Sharp, Steven. "Lefty Dizz" (obituary). Living Blues no. 112 (November/December 1993): 40–41.

Discography: AMG

Ain't It Nice to Be Loved (1989, JSP CD 259).

DOCUMENT

Record company established in Vienna, Austria, in the mid-1980s by Johnny Parth, one of the former proprietors of Roots, seeking initially to reissue pre-1942 blues and gospel recordings of which reissues were not currently available. These appeared both on their own Document, Earl Archives, Eden, HK, and Limited Edition labels and also on other Austrian labels, RST Blues Documents, Fantasy by Selmerphone, Wolf, Best Of Blues, and on the German Story Of Blues, Dutch Old Tramp, and British Matchbox labels. When LPs were superseded by CDs, the opportunity was taken to consolidate the catalog into a series of complete chronological reissues intended as far as possible to reissue the entire contents of Blues & Gospel Records, 1890–1943, along with much closely related jazz. At first some of the previous associated labels continued to be used but the catalog was progressively concentrated under the Document label. By the time the label was taken over by Gary Atkinson and moved to Newton Stewart, Scotland, in March 2000 more than eight hundred CDs had been issued. Such a vast output was inevitably dependent on using what material collectors were able to supply in the condition in which it was supplied and some of the output fell short of the highest sonic standards that might have been achieved under ideal conditions. With the original task near to completion, the new owners have undertaken some remastering and repackaging and have also indicated an intention to issue post-1943 recordings.

HOWARD RYE

DOGGETT, BILL

b. 16 February 1916; Philadelphia, PA
d. 13 November 1996; New York, NY

William Ballard "Bill" Doggett took up piano at the age of nine. His mother, Wynona, was a church pianist. He formed his first group at fifteen, and worked in a theater orchestra while still attending high school. He led his own big band for a time in 1938–1939, but became disillusioned with the financial responsibilities of leadership, and handed the band over to Lucky Millinder, staying on as pianist and arranger.

He worked with Jimmy Mundy (1939) and Millinder (1940–1942), and wrote "Shout Sister Shout" for Sister Rosetta Tharpe while with the latter band. He became pianist and arranger for the popular vocal group the Ink Spots (1942–1944). He recorded with Jimmy Rushing, Helen Humes, and Johnny Otis in 1945, and worked with saxophonist Illinois Jacquet (1945–1946) and others before joining Louis Jordan.

He was featured on many of Jordan's most successful recordings during his tenure in the band, which ended in 1951. He recorded with Ella Fitzgerald after leaving the saxophonist, and led his own very successful rhythm and blues bands. He had replaced Wild Bill Davis in Jordan's band, and was inspired to take up organ by Davis's example, despite some initial reservations about using an instrument so closely associated with the church in a secular context.

The jump-blues instrumental "Honky-Tonk" in 1956 was the biggest of his popular but rather formulaic hit records in that decade. He responded to changing musical fashions by returning to his jazz roots from the mid-1960s. He appeared regularly in jazz clubs and the European festival circuit into the 1990s.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- AMG (Scott Yanow); Larkin; New Grove Jazz
 Shaw, Arnold. Honkers and Shouters: The Golden Years of Rhythm and Blues. New York: Macmillan, 1978.
 Watrous, Peter. "Bill Doggett, 80, Keyboard Player and Rhythm-and-Blues Innovator." New York Times (20 November 1996).

Discography: AMG; Lord

Selected Recordings

"Big Dog Blues" (1952, King 4530); Hot Doggett (1954, King 514); Everybody Dance to the Honky Tonk (1956, King 531); The Doggett Beat for Dancing Feet (1957, King 557); Back Again with More Bill Doggett (1960, King 723); Focus on Bill Doggett (1960, Warner Bros 36009); Prelude to Blues (1962, Columbia CL1942); Bill Doggett (1971, Black and Blue 33029); The Right Choice (1991, After Hours 4112).

DOLLAR, JOHNNY

b. Johnny Williams, 22 November 1941; Greenville, MS

Brother of Lefty Dizz (Walter Williams). Moved with his family to Chicago as an infant. Dollar matured on the West Side, performing guitar with Magic Sam and others. Served in the Marines during the Vietnam War, then on the Chicago Police. Performs mostly around Chicago, with an occasional tour of Europe.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Sharp, Steven. "So Be It: Johnny Dollar." Living Blues no. 128 (July/August 1996): 46–51.

DOLPHIN, JOHN

d. 1 February 1958; Los Angeles, CA

The unscrupulous exploitation of musicians by money-grubbing entrepreneurs acknowledges no racial boundaries. Los Angeles-based African American businessman John Dolphin trawled the city's precincts for talent and played a role in the careers of balladeer Jesse Belvin and saxophonist Joe Houston, among others. Dolphin operated the Money, Lucky, and Cash labels from his record store at the heart of the city's Central Avenue district, the regional equivalent of New York City's Harlem. He kept a disk jockey broadcasting from the window of his establishment to attract customers. Dolpin's incessant machinations eventually led to his violent and sudden death in 1958 when a disgruntled client fatally shot him over a financial dispute.

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

- Dawson, Jim. "Recorded on Central: The Rise and Fall of John Dolphin." Juke Blues no. 13 (Autumn 1988): 12–17.

DOMINO, FATS

b. Antoine Domino, Jr., 26 February 1928; New Orleans, LA

Rhythm and blues pianist and singer. In the early 1950s he emerged as a major R&B star performing his New Orleans-style boogies and blues, but by the middle of the decade, Domino exploded as a rock 'n' roll star second in popularity only to Elvis Presley. With his crack New Orleans band accompaniment and his appealing Creole-accented vocals, Domino reached all audiences with his easygoing rocking songs. From 1950 to 1963, he scored with thirty-eight top ten R&B hits and thirty-five top forty pop hits, among them were such million-sellers as "Ain't It a Shame" (1955), "I'm in Love Again" (1956), "Blueberry Hill" (1956), "I'm Walkin'" (1957), "Whole Lotta Loving" (1958), and "I Want to Walk You Home" (1959). Domino was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1988.

Domino grew up in a musical family and a musical environment, and by the age of sixteen, in 1944, he was appearing in New Orleans nightclubs. His biggest musical influences were boogie-woogie masters Pete Johnson and Meade Lux Lewis, and jump-blues artist Louis Jordan. In 1946, he joined the Billy Diamond Band, where he got his "Fats" nickname. In 1949, Domino formed his own band and began playing regularly at the Hideaway. There he was discovered by band leader Dave Bartholomew, who got him signed with Los Angeles-based Imperial Records. Bartholomew recorded Domino with some of the most exciting New Orleans musicians in the business, notably Herb Hardesty, Lee Allen, and Red Tyler on saxes, Frank Fields on bass, and Earl Palmer on drums. Domino's first release, "The Fat Man," was a fast boogie based on Jack DuPree's "Junker's Blues." It reportedly sold a million copies. Blues were a sizable part of Domino's early repertoire, with such R&B charters as "Every Night About This Time" (1950), "Going Home" (1952), "Going to the River" (1953), "Please Don't Leave Me" (1953), and "What a Price" (1961). Two outstanding blues numbers that did not make the charts were the Domino's versions of the standard "Careless Love" and "Don't You Lie to Me."

DOMINO, FATS

What made Domino a rock 'n' roll star were his jump tunes and ballads, and they made up the bulk of his hits. Domino's biggest successes included many gently rocking versions of old standards, such as "My Blue Heaven" (1956), "When My Dreamboat Comes Home" (1956), and "Red Sails in the Sunset" (1963), the latter his last top forty hit. In the late 1950s, Domino toured the rock 'n' roll circuit, appeared on the biggest television variety shows, and was a featured performer in such movies as The Girl Can't Help It (1956) and The Big Beat (1958). During much of the 1960s and 1970s Domino performed in Las Vegas.

After Domino left Imperial in 1963, he recorded with diminished success with ABC-Paramount (1963–1965), Mercury (1965), Broadmoor (1967–1968), and Reprise (1968–70). His version of the Beatles' "Lady Madonna" (1968) was his last chart record. By the 1990s, Domino was mostly retired from the music business.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Dahl, Bill. "Fats Domino: The King of Blueberry Hill." Goldmine 546 (29 June 2001): 14–19, 71.
Harris, Paul. "Hey! Fat Man." Blues & Rhythm: The Gospel Truth 40 (November 1988): 4–8.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

DONEGAN, DOROTHY

b. 26 April 1922; Chicago, IL
d. 19 May 1998; Los Angeles, CA

Death date sometimes shown as June 16, 1998. Pianist and delightful entertainer equally skilled in the blues, boogie-woogie, gospel, even classical. An accomplished actress who also appeared in the film Sensations of 1945 and the Broadway play Star Time, Donegan earned an American Jazz Masters fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts in 1992.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: Lord

DOOLEY, SIMMIE

b. Simeon Dooley 5 July 1881; Hartwell, GA
d. 27 January 1961; Spartanburg, SC

Singer and guitarist who performed and recorded with Pink Anderson. It is believed he was not active in music after the 1930s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Santelli

Discography: DGR (under Pink Anderson)

DOOTONE/DOOTO/AUTHENTIC

Owned by Walter "Dootsie" Williams, Los Angeles-based Dootone Records began operations in December 1951 and its main 300 series had reached 480 by 1973 (though only a handful of singles came out after 1963). There were also short-lived 600, 700, and 1200 series. Owing to a complaint by needle manufacturer Duotone, the name of the label became Dooto early in 1957. The 700 series also appeared on the Authentic label, as did a small number of the Dooto(ne) 300 series. Williams was also one of the earliest "indie" label owners to venture into the EP and LP field. By 1954 vocal groups dominated the roster of artists and later still comedy albums by the likes of Redd Foxx were heavily featured. Most of the blues artists on the label (such as Big Duke, Big Joe Turner, Helen Humes, Mickey Champion, Peppy Prince, and Joe Houston) had only a single issue; for Johnnie Two-Voice (Morissette) and Filmore Slim their careers began with recordings for Dootone. Fats Gaines had two issues, while Chuck Higgins and Roy Milton notched up five; but by far the most prolific of Dootone's blues artists was Willie Headen with ten issues.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

McGrath

McGarvey, Seamus. "The Dootsie Williams Story." Blues & Rhythm no. 132 (September 1998): 4-7; Blues & Rhythm no. 133 (October 1998): 4-7.

See also Henderson, Duke "Big"; Higgins, Charles William "Chuck"; Houston, Joe (Joseph Abraham); Humes, Helen; Milton, Roy; Morissette, Johnny "Two-Voice"; Turner, Joseph Vernon "Big Joe"

DORSEY, LEE

b. Irving Lee Dorsey, 24 December 1924; New Orleans, LA

d. 1 December 1986; New Orleans, LA

Singer, composer, and one of R&B's most distinctive stylists, Dorsey created several enduring songs that became mainstream American standards. Dorsey was a talented vocalist but it was his personalized rhythmic delivery, a sort of Crescent City chant, that made his reputation. Dorsey compressed most of his musical production in a decade-plus period, getting a late start and then having ill health shorten his career. His first entertainment experience came when he boxed professionally as "Kid Chocolate" and it wasn't until after he had served a World War II stint in the navy that Dorsey was involved in the music business. Even then he was only a part-time musician in New Orleans while running an auto body shop as his day job.

In 1961 he signed with Fury Records and had an enormous crossover hit with "Ya Ya," which became a top ten single on the pop charts. A second single, Earl King's "Do Re Mi," had a little success, but Fury went out of business and Dorsey didn't record again until 1965 when he teamed up legendary Louisiana producer Allen Toussaint. The pair delivered a succession of hits, including "Working in a Coal Mine" and "Get Out of My Life, Woman," usually with the Meters as the backing band. But Dorsey dropped out of the music scene in 1970, returning to his auto repair shop. He resurfaced at the end of the decade, performing regularly and touring with James Brown. But Dorsey's comeback, like his life itself, was cut short by emphysema.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

Burke, Tony. "Lee Dorsey." Blues and Rhythm no. 26 (1987): 6.

Hannusch, Jeff. "Tribute to Lee Dorsey." Juke Blues no. 8 (1987): 26.

Discography: AMG

DORSEY, MATTIE

Flourished 1910-1927

Dorsey was known initially as part of the black vaudeville act The Whitman Sisters, whom she left in 1910. She retained the name Whitman for many years afterward in publicity during her solo career. She recorded four songs for the Paramount in 1927. Activity since then is unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Seroff, Doug, and Lynn Abbott. "Sweet Mattie Dorsey: Been Here, But She's Gone." 78 Quarterly no. 8 (1994): 103-112.

Discography: DGR

DORSEY, THOMAS A.

b. 1 July 1899; Villa Rica, GA

d. 23 January 1993; Chicago, IL

Blues and gospel singer and pianist. Thomas "Georgia Tom" Dorsey's father was a Baptist preacher, Reverend T. M. Dorsey. When Thomas was eleven, the family moved to Atlanta, Georgia, where he entered the world of vaudeville theater. In 1916 Thomas left his family and moved to Chicago, where he became a member of the Pilgrim Baptist Church. In 1921 Dorsey heard Reverend A. W. Nix at the National Baptist Convention and was profoundly influenced by the latter's inspired sermons and songs.

In the 1920s many blacks were aspiring to become blues singers. Lem Fowler gave Thomas Dorsey a lot of advice on how to arrange songs. Dorsey next studied at the Chicago School of Composition and Music. He was then introduced to Clarence Williams by Richard M. Jones, and George W. Thomas introduced him to J. Mayo Williams of the Paramount Record Company. Dorsey began to compose songs for Paramount. Altogether he wrote, recorded, played, and sang with others on more than two hundred blues songs in the 1920s. For his own blues recordings with his guitar partner Tampa Red, he used the soubriquet of “Georgia Tom.” In 1928 this successful piano/guitar duo recorded a very successful song, ambiguously entitled “It’s Tight Like That.” Dorsey also teamed up with Big Bill Broonzy and in 1930 these two artists scored some hits as the Famous Hokum Boys

DORSEY, THOMAS A.

After the Wall Street crash the record market collapsed. In 1932 the tragic deaths of his wife and his newborn child led him to specialize in gospel. Black America needed reassurance in the dark days of the Depression and Dorsey compositions like “Precious Lord” (Heavenly Gospel Singers) and “Peace in the Valley” satisfied the need. Dorsey founded the Dorsey House of Music, established to publish African American religious music. Dorsey himself composed a thousand religious songs, half of which were published.

In later life Dorsey seldom recorded under his own name, the MGM 78 rpm from March 1953 being an exception. Dorsey has been called the catalyst of gospel music and he continued to preach and sing well into the 1980s.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Santelli O’Neal, Jim, and Amy O’Neal (Van Singel). “Living Blues Interview: Georgia Tom Dorsey.” Living Blues no. 20 (March/April 1975): 16–34.

Discography: DGR; Gospel Records 1943–1966

DOT RECORDS

Record storeowner Randy Wood founded Dot Records in 1951 in Gallatin, Texas. The label’s earliest hits were with Arthur Alexander. Wood sold the label in 1965 to Gulf and Western, where it became part of the ABC group. During its existence, a few blues artists recorded for the label, including Joe Liggins, Barbara Dane, Ivory Joe Hunter, Smiley Lewis, and Harmonica Fats.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

Gillett, Charlie. The Sound of the City: The Rise of Rock ‘n’ Roll. New York: Dell, 1972.
Southall, Brian. The A–Z of Record Labels. London: Sanctuary, 2003.

Discography: McGrath

Callahan, Mik, and David Edwards. “Randy Wood: The Dot Records Story.” Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/dot/dotstory.html> (accessed November 17, 2004).

DOTSON, JIMMY “LOUISIANA”

b. 19 October 1934; Ethel, LA

Early career was as singer and drummer, including seven years as Silas Hogan and Lightnin’ Slim’s drummer. Dotson learned guitar in the 1950s, and in the following decade he was based in Memphis. Since 1977 he has been living and performing in Houston, Texas. A 1997 heart attack has limited his performances to special occasions.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
Schneider, Stephan P. “Jimmy ‘Louisiana’ Dotson.” Living Blues no. 140 (July/Aug 1988): 54.

Discography: LSFP

DOUGLAS, K. C.

b. 21 November 1913; Sharon, MS

d. 18 October 1975; Berkeley, CA

As blues writer and promoter Tom Mazzolini observed, “K. C. Douglas has been an integral part of the Oakland blues scene since its beginning in the mid-1940s.” Douglas had a percussive guitar style and a typical down-home blues vocal delivery perfectly suited for fast boogie figures. After learning from Tommy Johnson’s records and sporadically playing with him at local parties until 1945, Douglas moved to California but never strayed from what he defined as “them cotton picking blues.” In 1948 in Oakland Douglas waxed (with harmonica player Sidney Maiden) his much covered and commercially successful signature song “Mercury Boogie” for Bob Geddins’s Down Town label and another single for Rhythm in 1954. Two years later folklorist Sam Eskin taped—and Cook released—Douglas’s first LP. Few poorly distributed copies of the record were pressed but people at Prestige heard it, and in the 1960s other sessions released by Bluesville and Arhoolie ensued. These recordings made Douglas very popular in the northern California area club and festival circuit. He participated twice in the Berkeley Blues Festival and once in the San Francisco Bay Blues Festival. Equally at ease as a solo performer, in duo (often with harmonica player Richard Riggins), or in small combos, Douglas recorded 45s for Galaxy in 1967 and for Don Lindenau's Blues Connoisseur in 1972. Accompanied by guitarist Ron Thompson, Douglas finally recorded again for Arhoolie the year before unexpectedly dying of a heart attack at home, just when he was starting to get some recognition.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

- Cohn, Larry. Notes accompanying K. C. Douglas: K. C.'s Blues (1990, Original Blues Classics OBCCD-533-2).
 Mazzolini, Tom. "Living Blues Interview: K. C. Douglas." Living Blues no. 15 (1973/74): 15–19.
 ———, and Chris Strachwitz. Notes accompanying K. C. Douglas: Mercury Blues (1998, Arhoolie CD 475).

Discography: AMG; LSPF

See also Carr, Leroy; Jefferson, Blind Lemon; Johnson, Lonnie; Johnson, Tommy

DOWN HOME BLUES

(1) Song by Tom Delaney (q.v.), written in 1921 and popularized by Ethel Waters on Black Swan Records. The song was published by the firm of Albury and Delaney to capitalize on its success as a record. Its chorus bore a striking likeness to the verse of W. C. Handy's hit "Aunt Hagar's Children Blues." This caused friction between Handy and his former business partner Harry Pace, Black Swan's owner. Some subsequent performances of the song on record, such as the one by Clarence Williams, bore the title "The New Down Home Blues"; the music itself was unchanged.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

(2) Composed by George Jackson, and recorded by Z. Z. Hill for Malaco Records in 1981. It is a twelve-measure blues in (4 + 8) verse and refrain lyric form. Although the melody has much similarity to Jimmy Reed's "Baby What You Want Me to Do," it was performed by Hill and the backing group in a soul manner. It may be argued that the success of the song's release on singles and albums helped to codify and promote soul blues as a newly recognized style, especially to white listeners. After Hill's death in 1984, the record continued to promote his name through radio airplay and jukeboxes, and the song itself became widely played by artists and bands during summer blues festivals. In 2000 the Memphis Blues Foundation inducted the song into its Blues Hall of Fame, acknowledging Jackson's composition and Hill's performance.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Rust, Brian. Jazz Records 1897–1942, 4th ed. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington House, 1978.
 Thygesen, Helga, Mark Berresford, and Russ Shor. Black Swan: The Record Label of the Harlem Renaissance. Nottingham, UK: VJM, 1996.
 Waters, Ethel. His Eye Is on the Sparrow. New York: Doubleday, 1950; reprint: New York: Da Capo, 1992.

Selected Recordings

(1)

- Clarence Williams and His Orchestra (as "New Down Home Blues") (ca. August 1928, Q.R.S. 7005).
 Ethel Waters with Cordy Williams' Jazz Masters (ca. April–May 1921, Black Swan 2010).
 Mamie Smith (ca. August 30, 1921; OKeh 4446).
 Alice Leslie Carter (ca. September 1921, Arto 9103).
 Mary Stafford (September 28, 1921; Columbia A-3511).
 Ethel Waters (July 28, 1925; Columbia 14093-D).

See also Black Swan Records; Waters, Ethel

DOYLE, CHARLIE "LITTLE BUDDY"

- b. prob. 20 March 1911; Forest City, AR
 d. Unknown

Very little is known about this singer and guitarist who might have been a dwarf hanging around Beale Street in Memphis. But the eight sides he recorded there in 1939 ensured him posterity: well crafted, original and clever blues ("Grief Will Kill You" and "Hard Scufflin' Blues") in the same league with Sleepy John Estes's compositions. The harmonica player on those sides is said to be a young Walter Horton.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

- Russell, Tony. "The Mystery of Little Buddy Doyle." Blues World no. 21 (October 1968).

Discography: DGR

DR. DADDY-O

DR. DADDY-O

b. Vernon Winslow, 1 April 1911; Canton, OH
d. 13 December 1993; New Orleans, LA

First black deejay on the air in New Orleans, starting in 1949. In 1952, he was picked as one of the top ten radio personalities in the country. He helped popularize early New Orleans rhythm and blues.

TOM MORGAN

DR. HEPCAT

b. Lavada Durst, 9 January 1913; Austin, TX
d. 31 October 1995; Austin, TX

The first black disk jockey in Texas on Austin's KVET. He published The Blues and Jives of Dr. Hepcat based on his outlandish radio patter. As a piano player he was influenced by Pete Johnson, Meade Lux Lewis, and locally by Robert Shaw. He cut early records on Peacock, Uptown, and later recordings on Documentary Arts, Catfish, and DA/Arhoolie.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

- Govenar, Alan. Notes accompanying The Piano Blues of Dr. Hepcat (1994, Documentary Arts, Audio Cassette).
———, and Lavada Durst, The Blues and Jives of Dr. Hepcat. Racine, WI: Arcadian, 1994.
Templeton, Roy. "Lavada Durst aka Dr. Hepcat." Blues & Rhythm no. 105 (1995): 22.

See also Johnson, Pete; Lewis, Meade "Lux"; Shaw, Robert; Texas

DR. JOHN

b. Malcolm John Rebennack, Jr., 21 November 1940; New Orleans, LA

Pianist, singer, composer, producer. With early and extensive involvement in the recording scene as a session star, songwriter, arranger, and producer, Mack Rebennack would have had an accomplished career without inventing his popular Dr. John the Night Tripper performing persona. But he embellished his individual achievements with his creation of the quintessential Crescent City musical icon, giving new life and attention to the rich heritage of New Orleans music.

Rebennack, who released his first single at age eighteen, began as a keyboardist and guitarist on the 1950s New Orleans R&B scene, working with Professor Longhair, Frankie Ford, Joe Tex, and other established stars. He stepped into the spotlight for a few singles of his own but mostly remained in the background while adding arranging and producing to his credits in the 1960s. He also devoted himself solely to keyboards as a session player after injuring his hand in a gun accident.

After a series of brushes with the law in New Orleans, Rebennack relocated to California and by 1962 he was doing session work in Los Angeles with producer Phil Spector. Using leftover studio time from Sonny & Cher sessions, Rebennack assembled the multi-layered psychedelic funk masterpiece Gris-Gris in 1968 that introduced the Dr. John musical personality to the world. Its startling originality immediately attracted a cult of fans, including English rock stars Eric Clapton and Mick Jagger who appeared on the 1971 album The Sun, Moon & Herbs.

In 1973 Rebennack, backed by the Meters, had his biggest hit with In the Right Place, produced by Allen Toussaint. In the following years his recorded output was a musical gumbo of styles and situations as he did everything from solo piano albums to collections of pop standards, such as the 1989 release, In a Sentimental Mood, featuring a duet with Rickie Lee Jones. He also was involved in several special recording projects, including Triumvirate with Mike Bloomfield and John Hammond and Bluesiana Triangle with jazz drummer Art Blakey and saxist/flutist David "Fat-head" Newman.

Rebennack had a recording resurgence after signing with Blue Note Records, releasing the jazzy Duke Elegant in 2000, the roots-oriented Creole Moon in 2001, and N'awlinz: Dis, Dat or D'udda, his most involved project, a 2004 Crescent City super session featuring local guitar greats Walter "Wolfman" Washington and Snooks Eaglin and a cast of guest stars including B. B. King, Gatmouth Brown, Mavis Staples, and Willie Nelson.

Rebennack's candid, if admittedly idiosyncratic, autobiography Under a Hoodoo Moon was published in 1994. His prowess as a pianist, frequently overshadowed by the emphasis placed on his unorthodox vocals, was finally recognized when he won the 2004 W. C. Handy Award for Best Keyboardist.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

- AMG (Richie Unterberger); Larkin; Santelli
Del Grosso, Maureen. "Dr. John: Right Place, Right Time." Blues Revue no. 77 (August–September 2002): 8–12.
Dr. John and Jack Rummel. Under a Hoodoo Moon: The Life of Dr. John the Night Tripper. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1994.

Mandel, H. "Blindfold Test." Down Beat 51, no. 10 (October 1984): 49.

Discography: AMG

DRAIN, CHARLES

b. 31 May 1939; Eupora, MS

d. 18 March 1995; St. Louis, MO

Singer best known for his records with the vocal group The Tabs for the labels Vee-Jay and Wand in the early 1960s. Despite unsuccessful solo efforts for small St. Louis labels, he nurtured a local fan following. In later years he ran a car wash in St. Louis, singing in clubs on occasional nights.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Greensmith, Bill. "Charles Drain" [obituary]. Blues and Rhythm no. 102 (September 1995): 11.

DRIFTERS

Formed May 1953 in New York City. The Drifters, one of the finest of all R&B vocal groups, recorded hits with three different configurations between 1953 and 1965. Organized around the lead vocals of Clyde McPhatter, they regrouped behind Johnny Moore and then Ben E. King.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Discography

Clyde McPhatter & the Drifters (1956, Atlantic).

Rockin' & Driftin' (1958, Atlantic).

Save the Last Dance for Me (1962, Atlantic).

Under the Boardwalk (1964, Atlantic).

The Good Life with the Drifters (1965, Atlantic).

I'll Take You Where the Music's Playing (1965, Atlantic).

DRIFTING BLUES

"Drifting Blues," which has also been recorded as "Driftin' Blues," "Driftin' and "Driftin,'" and also simply "Driftin,'" was written by Charles Brown and recorded by Brown and Johnny Moore's Three Blazers on September 11, 1945. Many sources share the writing credits for this song with Johnny Moore and Eddie Williams (Williams being the bass player for the Three Blazers); however; the official release of Brown's complete recordings for Aladdin Records sites him as the sole composer. There also exists, as a clear antecedent to this song, "Walking and Drifting Blues" (Brown's original working title) recorded by Chicago bluesman Amos "Bumble Bee Slim" Easton, which was recorded on April 12, 1935. Although clearly different songs, there is little doubt that Brown drew inspiration from Easton's lyrics.

Commercially "Drifting Blues" was very successful for Brown, and his smooth vocal style would serve as a standard for several versions to follow. This smooth, "crooning" delivery would be perpetuated by artists such as Billy Eckstine, who recorded this title with Count Basie's Orchestra in 1959, as well as Sam Cooke on his 1963 Mr. Soul LP. Ray Charles also released a version of this song in the 1960s in which he begins with two verses from another of Charles Brown's songs entitled "Traveling Blues." By combining these two songs, Ray Charles is not only able to deliver his own interpretation of "Drifting Blues," but he is also able to expand on the wandering traveler motif of the original lyrics.

Curiously enough, Charles Brown would also record a song entitled "Cryin' and Driftin' Blues" eight years later in 1953. This song, short of a few minor changes, is musically identical to "Drifting Blues" yet the lyrical content is entirely different. This in itself is not a strange occurrence as blues players are notorious for reworking their pieces into "different" songs, but what stands out on this recording is that "Cryin' and Driftin' Blues" cites the songwriting credits to Jimmy Locks. On the occasion of this recording, Brown was no doubt trying to rekindle the enthusiasm of his earlier release and merely opted for a different lyricist to freshen up the song's delivery.

Other versions, by blues artists John Lee Hooker, Lightnin' Hopkins, Bobby Bland, B. B. King (Bland and B. B. King would also share a duet with this song years later), Albert King, and John Hammond, tend to treat this song as more of a straightforward blues and thus their vocal style is not in the familiar crooning style of the 1940s, 1950s, and early 1960s. These early blues versions would lead to interpretations by rock artists such as Paul Butterfield, Pete Townsend of the Who, Carlos Santana, the Marshall Tucker Band, and Eric Clapton. Clapton, on his live 1975 album, E. C. Was Here, shares a similar lyrical approach to Ray Charles's version years earlier. The difference lies in Clapton's choice to extend the song, not by adapting lyrics from Charles Brown's library, as Ray Charles had done, but by using Robert Johnson's "Ramblin' on My Mind" to embellish on the lyrical content of the song. By doing this Clapton, like Charles, is able to develop his own adaptation of this song while remaining true to the theme of the original lyrics. This song remains a staple in Clapton's live sets and he again recorded it on his 1994 From the Cradle CD. On this recording he gives it a very standard, acoustic, delta blues style interpretation, which, unlike the electric live version of 1975, is much more reminiscent of the easy delivery of this song in its earlier years.

DRIFTING BLUES

BRYAN GROVE

Bibliography

Wexler, Jerry. Booklet accompanying Ray Charles: Genius and Soul The 50th Anniversary Collection (Rhino 72859; five-CD set).

DRUMMOND

Label with sister imprint Sugar Hill, run in Detroit in 1956, with the Five Scalders and Baby Boy Warren as leading acts.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

DRUMS

The definition of “drum” varies from source to source. Many standard musical works define the drum as a membranophone, a shell with a membrane (head) that is struck with a stick or the hand. In ethnomusicology the definition is a bit looser, and includes such instruments as hollowed logs (log drums) and drums carved from wood with interlocking tongues (slit drums).

African Antecedents

The history of drums and the blues stretches back to Africa, where drums inevitably accompany song and dance in transmitting the knowledge, rituals, myths, beliefs, history, and values of African life. These aural and kinesthetic cues to culture and identity were carried to the New World, where people torn from their village societies struggled to retain last bits of “home.”

Musical instruments, and drums in particular, carry great cultural significance in Africa. Visual cues—size, structure, decoration, number—can convey nuances important in particular contexts. The size, structure, and height of a drum determine whether it is played sitting or standing; that coupled with decoration can indicate the drum's intended use: communication, dance, ritual, show of power. For instance, among the Akan of Ghana, the number and types of drums owned by a chief indicate his place in the hierarchy of chieftains; if his drums are removed or captured, he loses status. Drummers themselves are held in high esteem and treated with great respect, especially the “master drum” that calls the rhythms for the rest of the drums.

While drums with skin heads, wooden slit drums, xylophones, hand percussion, rattling or chiming items worn during dances, and finger tapping accompaniment on harps with hollow bodies and skin heads (e.g., kora) are typical African ways of producing rhythm, the human body is also considered an important instrument. Body percussion—stamping feet, clapping hands, “patting juba” (a precise order of striking body parts to accompany rhymes), percussive vocal accents—these are an integral part of dance, song, and storytelling. Most important to those far from home, body percussion is available even when instruments are forbidden.

Drums in the New World

Slaves arriving in the New World often found themselves unable to own drums for fear “drum talk” could lead to revolts on plantations. Denied the drum and all its cultural significance, people made do with what was available. The speed with which they found substitutes for familiar African instruments and became proficient in the music surrounding them is amazing. While some slaves had the opportunity to study music by observing their young charges do so, and even had access to keyboard instruments, most had to settle for instruments easily made and carried. The most popular of these was the fiddle, followed by the banjo, with its comforting similarity to the African harp. In the North, there were even carefully supervised fife and drum ensembles during Colonial times. But body percussion and singing remained the most available, easiest to play, and fastest to whisk out of sight, if need be.

In the early nineteenth century, New Orleans had a large and flourishing instrumental music scene that included opera, concerts, balls, dances, and parades; Creoles of color and freedmen studied classical music and instruments with members of the orchestras. The brass bands were especially popular, and several fine ensembles played for parades, Mardi Gras celebrations, picnics, and funerals. At night, members of those same bands played for dances and parties. This double duty led eventually to the evolution of the most elementary drumset, which allowed one person to sit and play the snare drum, bass drum, and struck cymbal that were traditionally carried and played by two people in a brass band. An enjoyable and informative description of New Orleans musical life and the evolution of the drumset can be found in the memoirs of Warren “Baby” Dodds, who is widely regarded as the father of modern jazz and blues drumming. In his memoirs, and in William Russell’s taped interviews and film footage, Dodds emphasizes traditional African values: respect for the drum, the role of the drum in ensemble work, and the drum’s ritual importance. This last is especially evident as he describes the traditional New Orleans funeral procession, emphasizing that only the snare drummer was empowered to call the band and mourners together for the march back from the cemetery.

Early Blues: Country and Theatrical

By the beginning of the twentieth century, the musical forms we now call blues and jazz had begun to emerge from the shared melting pot of their origins, including musical and cultural influences from Africa, field hollers, sacred music, brass bands, and singing. The genres are inseparable during this period; blues singers routinely called their ensembles “jass” or “jazz” bands, and jazz and dance bands played the blues in response to public demand. As usual, musicians played whatever they got paid to play without regard to what it was called. The music moved north with the Great Migration, and it did not take long for the vocal blues to make the vaudeville theater circuit, as the newspaper ads for performances by Bessie Smith, Alberta Hunter, “Ma” Rainey, Mamie Smith, and Ida Cox attest.

The rural blues of the South continued in their elemental form, which tended to feature voice and guitar, with the occasional washboard, diddley bow, one-string bass, finger thumping and heavy plucking on guitars, and foot stomping. However, blues acts on the vaudeville circuit played both urban and small-town dates, and soon switched to the more “sophisticated” instrumentation used by the other acts—piano, bass, horns, and drums.

Between 1920 and 1950, a steady stream of country bluesmen headed north for a better life, part of what would later be called the Great Migration. On reaching Chicago, they found themselves considered quaint and old fashioned. Northern bluesmen were working with pianos as a matter of course, and frequently employed horns, upright bass, and drums as well. The old washtub bass, jug, and foot stomp were nowhere to be found; to get a gig a rhythm player had to be able to play bass or drums. Here, hill country and New Orleans drummers found themselves at an advantage due to experience with the field drum and its classic rudimental style, the foundation of drumset technique. The fife and drum bands of northern Mississippi and Georgia used the traditional military rope-tensioned tenor and bass drums, which have a long and honorable history of their own but are not considered blues instruments. New Orleans parade drumming has its roots in that same tradition, though it derives more directly from the brass band tradition, which employed a 6- to 8-inch-deep snare drum and a bass drum with mounted cymbal.

Drummers in the classic fife and drum style include Jesse Mae Hemphill and G. D. Young; well-known parade band drummers from the early to mid-twentieth century include Louis Barbarin, Louis Cottrell, Dee Dee Chandler, Warren “Baby” Dodds, Cie Frazier, Tony Sbarbaro, and Zutty Singleton. Rudimentary drummers who successfully made the transition to the drumset include Warren “Baby” Dodds (Jimmy Bertrand’s Washboard Wizards, Jimmy Blythe’s Washboard Wizards, Beale Street Washboard Band, Sonny Terry, Bertha “Chippie” Hill, Lovie Austin, Lonnie Johnson), Jasper Taylor (Alberta Hunter, Thomas A. “Georgia Tom” Dorsey, Tampa Red), Tony Sbarbaro (Original Dixieland Jazz Band, Eddie Condon), and Zutty Singleton (Bessie Smith, Ada Brown, Jimmie Gordon, Victoria Spivey, Louis Armstrong, Jelly Roll Morton).

The Trapset

The “trapset” of the late 1910s and early 1920s was designed to let one person keep the beat going while improvising with a huge array of other sounds. A minimal set included a large (28-inch) bass drum with a 10-inch cymbal mounted near the pedal, a snare drum, and a cowbell and woodblock mounted on the bass drum rim. The sets used by traveling blues ensembles such as Ma Rainey’s Georgia Jazz Band and Mamie Smith’s Jazz Hounds were mindful of having to haul equipment, so they usually added only one or two 14-inch suspended cymbals and a mounted Chinese tom-tom; vaudeville theater sets that could stay put included timpani, gongs, Chinese temple blocks, and so many “traps”—whistles, bird calls, slapsticks, ratchets, tambourines, castanets, triangles, and other miscellany—that one or more “trap tables” were usually necessary to hold them all.

DRUMS

At this stage, the blues or jazz drummer with a traveling act was still very much tied to the brass band tradition. The bass drum was played on all beats in the measure, usually four to the bar, or two to the bar for marches. The cymbal was struck at the same time as the bass drum by means of a small attachment (slang: “dinger”) on the drum pedal, but there were no options beyond “on” and “off” until the advent of the “snowshoe cymbal.” The snowshoe was a pair of cymbals mounted on two long boards with a hinge and spring to keep them open. A strap held this contraption to the left foot so that the drummer had the option to play the cymbal without constant adjustment of the “dinger” on the bass drum pedal. The snowshoe soon evolved into the “low-boy,” a short pedal-driven pair of cymbals on a stand, and then into the “hi-hat” cymbals played with a pedal on a tall stand used from about the 1940s to the present. The snare drum was played in the marching band style, using rolls and flourishes as ornamentation. The most important snare drum technique during this period was the “press roll,” where the drumstick was pressed and dragged across the calfskin drumhead, producing a buzzing sound. A good press roll was compared to the sound of paper being torn, very even and of moderate volume. The traps were usually arranged on a trap table on top of the bass drum, with items like temple blocks, tambourines, triangles, wood blocks, and cowbells mounted on special holders so the drummer could strike them with a drumstick and make a smooth transition back to the press roll.

Urban Blues

Drums and the Amplified Blues

It was electrification that guaranteed the drums a role in the urban blues. The advent of the electric guitar and amplified bass meant the beat had to be loud enough for the entire band to hear it. Foot stomping and even trapset playing were not enough; even the sound of the big 28-inch bass drum on every beat diffused and was lost under the electric guitar and horns. Like their swing jazz colleagues who worked with horns, blues drummers switched to a smaller 26-inch bass drum, 14-inch wood snare drum, mounted tom-toms and floor toms, and used the bright sound of the 15-inch hi-hat and 20- to 22-inch ride cymbal to cut through the amplification. The band now depended on the drummer to get the rhythm rock solid and keep everything at a high enough sound level to signal the downbeat. The hi-hat beat evolved from a simple “chup” on two and four to a complex set of rhythms, taking advantage of the ability to get an entire palette of sounds from the open, shut, and partially closed vibrations of the “hats.” The typical blues patterns on both the ride cymbal and the hi-hats included the shuffle and straight eighth notes, with a 12/8 triplet pattern when appropriate. The blues drummers rarely used the dotted-eighth/triplet pattern so popular with jazz drummers.

Important blues drummers from this period include James “Peck” Curtis (“King Biscuit Time” on KFFA with Sonny Boy Williamson, Robert Lockwood, Jr., and Pinetop Perkins), “Baby Face” Leroy Foster (Sonny Boy Williamson, Little Walter, Sunnyland Slim, Muddy Waters), Clifton James (Billy Boy Arnold, Bo Diddley, Willie Dixon, Lafayette Leake, Koko Taylor), Sam Lay (Howlin’ Wolf, Muddy Waters, Michael Bloomfield, Otis Spann, Paul Butterfield, Eddy Clearwater), S. P. Leary (Howlin’ Wolf, Otis Spann, Carey Bell, Lowell Fulson, James Cotton, Johnny Young, Memphis Slim, Detroit Jr.), Odie Payne (Elmore James, Lafayette Leake, Magic Sam, Otis Rush, Little Brother Montgomery, Willie Dixon), Willie Smith (Muddy Waters, Pinetop Perkins, George “Mojo” Buford, Johnny Winter, James Cotton, Big Bill Morganfield), “Stovepipe” (Henry Gray, George Morris Pejoe), and Fred Williams (Big Bill Broonzy, Sonny Boy Williamson, Washboard Sam, Curtis Jones, Willie James, Walter Vinson, Bumble Bee Slim, Memphis Minnie, Ernest Lawler).

Blues and Rock ‘n’ Roll Drumming

By the late 1950s the equipment requirements of urban blues drummers and emerging rock ‘n’ roll drummers proved to be nearly identical, and in the 1960s the drumset available from the major drum manufacturers had settled into models appropriate for use in amplified settings. The two most common off-the-shelf options were the 20-inch and 22-inch “kits.” The 20-inch version included a 20-inch bass drum, 8-inch by 12-inch mounted tom, 14-inch by 14-inch floor tom, 14-inch hi-hats, 18-inch crash cymbal, 20-inch ride cymbal, and 5.25-inch by 14-inch metal snare drum. The 22-inch version had a 22-inch bass drum, 9-inch by 13-inch mounted tom, 16-inch by 16-inch floor tom, 14- or 15-inch hi-hats, 18-inch crash cymbal, 20- to 22-inch ride cymbal, and 6.5-inch by 14-inch metal snare drum. Other than the addition of both sizes of mounted toms in the late 1960s, these two drumset options have remained the standard for blues, R&B, Motown, and blues-infused rock 'n' roll.

Important drummers from this period include Fred Below (Eddie Burns, Floyd Dixon, Willie Dixon, Buddy Guy, John Lee Hooker, Louis Myers, Otis Spann, Koko Taylor, Little Walter, Muddy Waters, Junior Wells, Detroit Jr., Sonny Boy Williamson, Jimmy Witherspoon), Sam Carr (Buddy Guy, Jelly Roll Kings, Big Jack Johnson, Willie Lomax, T-Model Ford, Robert Walker), Roger Hawkins (Aretha Franklin, Otis Rush, Duane Allman), Al Jackson (Booker T and the MG's), Maurice Jennings (Willie Mabon), Chris Layton (Stevie Ray Vaughan), Earl Palmer (Meade "Lux" Lewis, T-Bone Walker, Fats Domino, Lloyd Price, Professor Longhair, Little Richard, Righteous Brothers, Ike and Tina Turner), Bernard "Pretty" Purdie (Cornell Dupree), and John "Jabo" Starks (Bobbie "Blue" Bland).

Untouched by Time

With the notable exception of the Grateful Dead's Mickey Hart and Bill Kreutzmann, blues-influenced music has remained virtually untouched by electronic drums and by the huge drumsets and drums popular in jazz fusion, heavy metal, and late twentieth-century derivatives of rock 'n' roll. Blues drummers of the twenty-first century play the same size and type of drumsets their mentors played in the 1960s, with the same classic results.

DEBORAH L. GILLASPIE

Bibliography

- Breithaupt, Robert B. "The Drum Set: A History" and "Drum Set Players." In Encyclopedia of Percussion, edited by John H. Beck. New York & London: Garland Publishing, 1995.
- Charters, Samuel. The Roots of the Blues: An African Search. New York: Da Capo Press, 1991.
- Chicago Defender*, national edition, 1905–1966. Chicago: Defender Company.
- Cohan, Jon. Star Sets: Drum Kits of the Great Drummers. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard Corporation, 1995.
- Cohn, Lawrence, ed. Nothing But the Blues: The Music and the Musicians. New York: Abbeville Press, 1993.
- Dodds, Warren "Baby," and Larry Gara. The Baby Dodds Story as Told to Larry Gara, rev. ed. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1992.
- Floyd, Samuel, Jr. The Power of Black Music. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Pantheon, 1993.
- Oliver, Paul, Tony Russell, Robert M. W. Dixon, John Godrich, and Howard Rye. Yonder Come the Blues:

The Evolution of a Genre. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

- Payne, Jim. Give the Drummers Some!: The Great Drummers of R&B, Funk & Soul. Katonah, NY: Face the Music Productions, 1996.
- Rowe, Mike. Chicago Blues: The City & the Music. New York: Da Capo Press, 1975.
- Stambler, Irwin, and Lyndon Stambler. Folk and the Blues: The Encyclopedia. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2001.

DUARTE, CHRIS

b. 16 February 1963; San Antonio, TX

Guitar stylist Duarte moved to Austin, Texas, at age sixteen and immersed himself in the active music scene, absorbing and assimilating an array of roots music influences. He played R&B with Bobby Mack, led a jazz fusion unit, and electrified fans at blues jams before finally forming the Chris Duarte Group. The release of Texas Sugar/Strat Magik in 1994 and Tailspin Headwhack in 1997 brought his guitar approach, more an enlightened extension of Stevie Ray Vaughan's than a mere emulation, to an international audience. In 2000 Love Is Greater Than Me and an appearance on the New Blues Blood compilation solidified his reputation.

MICHAEL POINT

DUKE

Record label (Tennessee, 1952). Owners: David James Mattis (b. October 1, 1914, St. Louis, MO; d. July 21, 2000, Wheeling, WV); Bill Fitzgerald. Memphis, Tennessee-based, this label's artists include Johnny Ace ("The Clock," "Cross My Heart," "My Song"), Bobby "Blue" Bland ("Army Blues," "Lovin' Blues," with B. B. King), Earl Forest ("Rock the Bottle," "Whoopin' and Hollerin'"), Bill Fort (with Bonita Cole), Rosco Gordon ("Hey, Fat Girl," "T. Model Boogie"), Gospel Travelers, and St. Louis Jimmy (Oden). In April 1953, Don Robey (of Peacock Records in Texas) acquired the label and name and moved the operation to Houston.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

- Bentley, Chris. CD notes for The Original Memphis Blues Brothers (2000, ACE [UK] CDCHD 265).
- Gart, Galen, and Roy C. Ames. "Partnership Blues" Chap. 3 in Duke/Peacock Records: An Illustrated History with Discography. Milford, NH: Big Nickel Publications, 1990.

- Moonoogian, George, and Roger Meeden. "Duke Records: The Early Years. An Interview with David J. Matthis." Whiskey, Women, And ... no. 14 (June 1984).
- Salem, James M. The Late Great Johnny Ace and the Transition from R&B to Rock 'n' Roll. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1999.

DUKE/PEACOCK/BACK BEAT

Don D. Robey established Peacock Records in Houston in 1949 to launch the recording career of Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown (the first release was "Didn't Reach My Goal" b/w "Atomic Energy," Peacock 1500) with almost thirty additional sides over the next ten years. Assisted by business partner and Buffalo Booking Agency owner Evelyn Johnson, Robey's artist roster grew with both secular acts (Memphis Slim and Floyd Dixon) and gospel acts (Original Five Blind Boys and the Bells of Joy). In 1950, the success of the Blind Boy's "Our Father" (Peacock 1550) established the winning formula of alternating releases of secular records with religious ones.

By the end of the summer of 1952 Robey had recorded or released singles by almost fifty different performers or groups, including the Dixie Hummingbirds and blues-shouter Willie Mae "Big Mama" Thornton. Robey's Lion Music published all the songs released by the label, usually with Robey taking coauthor credit. It was at this point that he acquired Duke Records, founded only a few months earlier in Memphis by David James Mattis, program director at WDIA. Mattis had cut "My Song" (Duke 102) with Johnny Ace, a record that created a demand that Mattis's limited capital could not supply. Robey offered a partnership, moved the entire operation to Houston (Earl Forest, Rosco Gordon, and Bobby Bland came with the deal), and squeezed Mattis out entirely within a matter of months. Robey employed the talents of Johnny Otis to make Ace a heartthrob and national R&B star.

The R&B record that made Peacock famous was Big Mama Thornton's "Hound Dog" (1953). When Sun Records released "Bear Cat" as an "answer song," Robey sued for copyright infringement and won, a landmark decision in popular music. Another lawsuit that Robey lost led him in 1973 to sell his entire music business interests to ABC/Dunhill for a reported $1,000,000. By then there was an inventory of two thousand unreleased masters, 2,700 copyrights, and a hundred contracted artists to Duke/Peacock/Back Beat/Song Bird/Sure Shot who owed their labels $250,000 in advance royalties. He served as consultant to ABC/Dunhill until his death in 1975.

JAMES M. SALEM

Bibliography

- Fisher, Craig. "Don Robey—A Lifetime of Music." Record World (March 24, 1973): 3, 24, 49.
- Gart, Galen, and Roy C. Ames. Duke/Peacock Records: An Illustrated History with Discography. Milford, NH: Big Nickel Publications, 1990.
- Leadbitter, Mike, ed. Nothing But the Blues. London: Hanover Books, 1971.
- Salem, James M. The Late Great Johnny Ace and the Transition from R&B to Rock 'n' Roll. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1999.

DUKES, LAURA

- b. 10 June 1907; Memphis, TN
d. 14 October 1992; Memphis, TN

A Memphis institution who danced, sang, and played banjo ukulele. She worked with Robert Nighthawk during the 1930s. She joined the Memphis Jug Band in the 1930s and later performed mostly with Dixieland groups, primarily for white parties and festivals. Recordings by Dukes have appeared on Wolf, Albatross, and Flyright.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
Hays, J. Fred. Goin' Back to Sweet Memphis. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

See also Memphis; Memphis Jug Band; Nighthawk, Robert

DUNBAR, SCOTT

- b. 1 July 1904; Deer Park Plantation, MS
d. 1 October 1994; Centreville, MS

Besides working in the native Lake Mary, Mississippi, area as a professional guide and fisherman, guitarist Dunbar recorded for Folkways in 1954, Matchbox in 1968, and a solo LP for Ahura Mazda in 1970.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
Bonner, Brett J. "Scott Dunbar" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 119 (January/February 1995): 67.
Ramsey, Frederick Jr. Been Here and Gone. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2000.

Wolfe, Karl Michael. Notes accompanying Scott Dunbar: From Lake Mary (2000, Fat Possum Records 80338-2).

DUNCAN, AL

b. Alrock Clifford Duncan, Jr., 8 October 1927; McKinney, TX
d. 3 January 1995; Las Vegas, NV

Longtime session drummer for Chicago labels Chess, Vee-Jay, Cobra, and others in blues, jazz, and gospel. Outside the studios he was known to play mostly in local jazz venues. He was closely associated with Jay McShann and Willie Dixon.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)
Brisbin, John Anthony. “Al Duncan” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 91–92.

DUNCAN, LITTLE ARTHUR

b. 3 February 1934; Indianola, MS

Duncan taught himself harmonica in 1953—learning to play upside down—after hearing his upstairs Chicago neighbor, Little Walter Jacobs, practicing. He played frequently with Little Willie Foster, Floyd Jones, and Jimmy Reed, whose influences are reflected in his repertoire and style. After retiring from his tavern, Duncan returned to music. Four titles recorded for Twist Turner were rereleased on Blues Across America, Chicago Scene (Cannonball). His first full-length effort, Singin’ with the Sun (1999, Delmark), featured eight original compositions and was followed by Live in Chicago! (2000, Random Chance).

JUSTIN O’BRIEN

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Discography

Singin’ with the Sun (Delmark DE-733).

DUNN, ROY SIDNEY

b. 13 April 1922; Eatonton, GA
d. 2 March 1988; Atlanta, GA

Early experience was in gospel quartet music, performing with his brothers. Upon moving to Covington, Georgia, and later Atlanta, he came to know blues greats Curly Weaver, Blind Willie McTell, and Buddy Moss. In his later years, he was a source of information on these musicians to researchers. After suffering serious injuries in a 1968 car wreck, he returned to performing full time.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Lee, Peter. “Roy Dunn” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 82 (September/October 1988): 38–39.

Discography

Know’d Them All (1976, Trix 3312).

DUNN, SARA

(See Sara Martin)

DUNSON, JOHNNIE MAE

b. 9 March 1921; Bessemer, AL

Drummer, singer, songwriter, and folk artist Dunson moved to Chicago in 1943 and played on Maxwell Street with Eddie “Porkchop” Hines. Said to have authored around six hundred compositions, Dunson wrote or cowrote a handful of Jimmy Reed’s songs, including “I’m Going Upside Your Head.” J. B. Hutto’s “Combination Boogie” was reportedly based on one of her numbers. She recorded four tracks for Chess in 1965, apparently unissued. In 2000 she released Big Boss Lady (Bogfire), a CD of all original compositions.

JUSTIN O’BRIEN

Bibliography

Moon, D. Thomas. “The ‘Evil’ Queen of Maxwell Street.” Blues Revue no. 56 (April 2000): 24.

Discography: LSFP

DUPONT, AUGUST “DIMES”

b. 28 November 1928; LA
d. 14 September 1997; New Orleans, LA

DUPONT, AUGUST “DIMES”

Saxophonist, and nephew of Danny Barker. Studied at the Snowhill Institute in Alabama. With guitarist Edgar Blanchard he founded the Gondoliers, an R&B and comedy band that lasted for twenty years. By 1970 he was working outside of music.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Hannusch, Jeff. “August ‘Dimes’ Dupont” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 137 (January/February 1988): 50–51.

DUPREE, AL “BIG AL”

b. 7 November 1923; Dallas, TX
d. 3 August 2003; Dallas, TX

Tenor saxophonist and pianist. Began career with Doug Finell in 1935–1936, then left in 1939 to attend Xavier University in New Orleans. Spent World War II working on aircraft engines. Afterward he returned to Dallas and joined Buster Smith’s Heat Waves of Swing. From the late 1940s until his death he worked in local Dallas cocktail lounges. He recorded his first CD in 1995, Big Al Dupree Swings the Blues (Dallas Blues Society label).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
Dupree, Al, with Tim Schuller. “Dallas Blues: Big Al Dupree.” Living Blues no. 129 (September/October 1996): 49–53.
Schuller, Tim. “Big Al Dupree” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 171 (January/February 2004): 63–64.

DUPREE, CHAMPION JACK

b. 23 July 1909 or 4 July 1910; New Orleans, LA
d. 21 January 1992; Hanover, Germany

New Orleans native Champion Jack Dupree, who was raised in an orphanage since he was a baby, learned piano from local musician Willie “Drive ‘Em Down” Hall. Hall taught Dupree his driving barrelhouse style, and by his mid-teens, Dupree was playing for tips throughout the French Quarter. He left New Orleans in 1930 and lived in Indianapolis, New York, and Chicago throughout the decade, and associated with several prominent pianists, including Leroy Carr and Peetie Wheatstraw. A successful boxing career in the late 1930s earned him his “Champion” moniker. Dupree made his first recordings for OKeh in Chicago in 1940 and 1941. Although no longer a resident of the city, Dupree’s New Orleans barrelhouse style remained intact and these recordings would influence future pianists Professor Longhair and Fats Domino.

An imaginative songwriter, he candidly detailed life’s realities and tribulations, exemplified on his 1941 classic “Junker Blues.” Dupree recorded for many small labels throughout the 1940s and 1950s, but his greatest commercial success came in 1955 with his top ten R&B hit “Walking the Blues” for King. In 1958, Dupree recorded the critically acclaimed LP, Blues from the Gutter, for Atlantic. The following year he became the first bluesman to move permanently overseas, and he performed and recorded prolifically in Europe throughout the next three decades. In 1990, Dupree made a triumphant comeback to the American blues scene with several prestigious tours and recording sessions. Champion Jack Dupree, who considered himself “the last of the barrelhouse piano players,” died of cancer at his home in Germany in 1992.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Santelli
Rosen, Joel N. “Champion Jack Dupree: The Godfather of New Orleans Blues.” Living Blues no. 97 (May/June 1991): 21–24.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

Blues from the Gutter (1992, Atlantic 782434-2).
New Orleans Barrelhouse Boogie (1993, Columbia/Legacy CK 52834).

DUPREE, CORNELL

b. 19 December 1942; Fort Worth, TX

Guitarist. Recording session superstar Dupree’s graceful soul guitar lines have been heard on more than twenty-five hundred albums by artists including King Curtis, Lena Horne, Lou Rawls, Esther Phillips, and Aretha Franklin, with whom he toured from 1967 to 1976. In addition to his solo career, Dupree was a member of the successful jazz/funk instrumental unit Stuff.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Dupree, Cornell. Rhythm and Blues Guitar. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard Corporation, 2000.

DURHAM, EDDIE

b. 19 August 1906; San Marcos, TX
 d. 6 March 1987; New York City, NY

Trombonist, guitarist, composer, and arranger. Durham worked minstrel shows with his brothers, then territory bands in the Southwest and Kansas City. He was a pioneer of electric guitar with Count Basie, 1937–1938, and a freelance arranger during the 1950s and 1960s. He tried his hand at performing again from 1969 with Buddy Tate, Harlem Blues, and Jazz Band.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
 Russell, Ross. Jazz Style in Kansas City and the Southwest. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1971.

Discography: LordSelected Recordings as Leader

Eddie Durham (1974, RCA LPL1-5029).
Blue Bone (1981, JSP 1030).

DURST, LAVADA

(See Dr. Hepcat)

DUSKIN, BIG JOE

b. 10 February 1921; Birmingham, AL

After experiencing some run-ins with the Klan, Joe moved with his family to Cincinnati when he was around six or seven. Although he had started playing piano in Alabama, Joe took up boogie-woogie piano and blues singing in earnest in Cincinnati, though against the wishes of a religious father who made Joe promise not to play any blues until after the father was dead. When his father died at the age of 105, Joe had been away from the blues for sixteen years, though he had met his hero and a primary influence Albert Ammons and Jimmy Yancey and performed at some USO shows and night clubs in Cincinnati during that time. He left regular performing for a job at the Post Office around 1945 until 1971, when he began performing again at clubs such as Dollar Bill's and Bogart's. Eventually, he began touring in Canada and Europe, recording for Arhoolie, Bluebeat, Wolf, Special Delivery, and other labels, and appearing at festivals such as the San Francisco Blues Festival in 1980 and the New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival in 1989. He continues to perform around Cincinnati and make occasional appearances outside the city, and is revered as one of the major living purveyors of the boogie-woogie style associated with Albert Ammons, Pete Johnson, and Meade Lux Lewis, best known for his "Cincinnati Stomp," and versions of "Well Well Baby" "Tender Hearted Woman," and "Roll 'Em Pete."

STEVEN C. TRACY

Bibliography

Larkin
 Tracy, Steven C. Going to Cincinnati: A History of the Blues in the Queen City. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.

Discography

Cincinnati Stomp (1979, Arhoolie 422; rpt. 1995).
Don't Mess with the Boogie Man (1988, Special Delivery 1017).

DYER, JOHNNY

b. 7 December 1938; Rolling Folk, MS

Blues harmonica player, combining Chicago style with West Coast sound. Dyer grew up on the Stovall plantation in Mississippi. He began playing professionally at age sixteen, advised by Robert Lee "Smok-ey" Wilson. In 1958, Dyer moved to California, where he was influenced by George "Harmonica" Smith. Dyer abandoned music for various jobs in the 1960s, but returned around 1982, touring and doing his first recordings with the L. A. Jukes, the Houserockers, and as a sideman. Guitarist Rick Holmstrom often produces Dyer's records.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

Larkin
 CD booklet from Johnny Dyer's Listen Up (featuring Rick Holmstrom) (Blacktop CD BT 1101).
 Krampert, Peter. "Johnny Dyer." E-Harmonica. http://www.eharmonica.net/johnny_dyer.htm.

Discography

Listen Up (featuring Rick Holmstrom) (1994, Blacktop CD BT 1101).
Jukin' (1995, Blind Pig).
Shake It! (1995, Black Top).
Lookout! (with Rick Holmstrom) (1996, Black Top).

See also Holmstrom, Rick; Piazza, Rod; Wilson, Smokey

E

EAGLIN, SNOOKS

b. Ford Eaglin, Jr., 21 January 1936; New Orleans, LA

Guitarist, singer. Arguably the most musically eclectic in a scene famous for musical eclecticism, Eaglin, known as the “human jukebox” to his fans, used his omnivorous appetite for esoteric material and his encyclopedic knowledge of American music styles to fashion a unique blues identity. The sightless Eaglin, determined to transcend the role of blind soul singer, was equally adept with early Broadway tunes and modern R&B, as well as everything between, and his live shows gleefully mixed and matched genres.

Eaglin began with a recording of the solo acoustic folk blues Country Boy in New Orleans album for Folkways in 1958 and That’s All Right, showcasing his twelve-string acoustic work, in 1961. But Eaglin was also playing in an R&B band with producer Dave Bartholomew and that was where his heart was, as evidenced by the Down Yonder compilation of funky oldies, and where his future would be.

Eaglin, always active on his home turf, enjoyed a career revival outside Louisiana in the late 1980s with a series of albums for the New Orleans–based Black Top Records label, beginning with Baby You Can Get Your Gun in 1987. Out of Nowhere in 1989 featured guest guitarists Anson Funderburgh and Ronnie Earl, as well as saxists Grady Gaines and Mark “Kaz” Kazanoff. An approximation of Eaglin’s unpredictable performances came with Live in Japan, where he segued effortlessly from the deep traditional blues of “Black Night” to personalized renditions of pop songs by the Isley Brothers and Stevie Wonder.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSFP

EALEY, ROBERT

b. 6 December 1925; Texarkana, TX

Singer, drummer, club owner. A major mentor and influence on a generation of Dallas/Fort Worth blues musicians, Ealey sang in church before moving to Dallas as a twenty-year-old. He formed the Boogie Chillen Boys in Fort Worth with guitarist U. P. Wilson and secured a lengthy residency at the Blue Bird Club, the blues epicenter of the Metroplex. Ealey eventually bought the club after performing in it for two decades. He didn’t record until the 1990s when he released several albums, including Turn Out the Lights, which featured guitarist Mike Morgan, and toured Europe with guitarist Tone Sommer.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin

Discography: AMG

EARL, RONNIE

b. Ronald Horvath, 10 March 1953; Queens, NY

Leading electric guitarist in contemporary blues since the 1980s. Became interested in blues guitar after hearing Muddy Waters with guitarist Louis Myers in Boston in 1975. The next year he left a teaching job to join John Nicholas and the Rhythm Rockers on a five-month tour, during which he stayed with Jimmie Vaughan for a one-month stay in Austin, Texas. Around 1977–1978 he adopted the surname Earl in honor of guitar hero Earl Hooker. In Boston around 1978 he performed and recorded with Sugar Ray Norcia and the Bluetones.

In 1979 he accepted an offer from Roomful of Blues to replace departing guitarist Duke Robillard. He remained with them through 1987, touring New England, the West Coast, and Europe. He formed Ronnie Earl and the Broadcasters in 1983, going full time with this group four years later. In the early 1990s he took a break to recover from drug and alcohol problems, then in 1993 he recorded with the Broadcasters the all-instrumental CD Still River for the Audioquest label. A 1997 contract with Verve Records brought The Colour of Love and much public and critical attention. Commercial overexpectation appeared to sour his relations with Verve, and a bout of manic depression hampered his activity through 2000. He disbanded the Broadcasters during the same period. Since 2000 he has performed as a solo artist in collaboration with others, and was recording for Telarc.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin; Santelli
“Blindfold Test.” Downbeat 64, no. 3 (March 1997): 57.
Jordan, Scott. “Ronnie Earl: An Introspective Look.” Blues Revue no. 31 (October 1997): 12–16.

Discography: AMG

EARWIG

Chicago-based Earwig Music is the child of producer Michael Robert Frank, an intensely dedicated blues fan with a particular fondness for the older styles of Delta and Chicago blues. Earwig’s first release (1979) was the Jelly Roll Kings, a raw, unadorned Delta trio with Frank Frost on harp, Jack Johnson on guitar, and Sam Carr on drums. Subsequent Earwig releases included CDs by Jack Johnson, Jimmy Dawkins, Louis Myers, John Primer, Louisiana Red, Lovie

Lee, Sunnyland Slim, and David “Honeyboy” Edwards. As of 2004, the label had released more than thirty-five blues albums.

Earwig founder Michael Frank started collecting records as a teenager in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, developing into a self-described “blues LP junkie.” After college, he moved to Chicago in 1972, hanging out nightly in the city’s neighborhood blues bars, absorbing the music, getting to know the musicians, and working part time at the Jazz Record Mart, owned by Delmark Record’s Bob Koester, who encouraged Frank to start his own label. To Frank, Earwig was a way of manifesting his 1960s-style activist spirit. “I wanted to produce records by people who weren’t being heard; in effect, promoting cultural justice for blues musicians through arranging better gigs and recording deals,” he told an interviewer. Earwig is also an artist management and booking company; its most notable client is Honeyboy Edwards, who Frank has managed exclusively since 1973.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

Frank, Michael Robert. Notes to Earwig Music 20th Anniversary Collection (1999, Earwig 4946); posted as “The Earwig Story.” <http://www.earwigmusic.com/>.

Selected Recordings

Various artists. Earwig 16th Anniversary Sampler (1995, Earwig 4933).
Various artists. Earwig Music: 20th Anniversary Collection (1999, Earwig 4946).

EASTON, AMOS

b. 7 May 1905; Brunswick, GA
d. 8 June 1968; Los Angeles, CA

Amos Easton, known as Bumble Bee Slim, was an early star on the Chicago blues scene of the 1930’s cutting more than 180 sides for a variety of labels. A first-rate singer and songwriter, he owed a large part of his success in his ability to emulate the popular Leroy Carr.

Born in Georgia, Bumble Bee Slim left after getting married while in his twenties. He moved with his family to Florida where he worked as a section hand. After separating from his wife he headed north to try his hand at music, making stops in Cincinnati, Indianapolis, and eventually Chicago.

He kicked off his recording career for Paramount in 1931. One coupling from this session, “Rough Ragged Blues” b/w “Honey Bee Blues,” wasn’t discovered until the 1990s and provides a rare glimpse of Easton’s guitar playing. His best-known tune was “Sail On, Little Girl, Sail On” covered as “Sail On Boogie” by T-Bone Walker, which later evolved into Muddy Waters’s “Honey Bee.” He recorded prolifically until 1937 also playing on records by Big Bill Broonzy, Cripple Clarence Lofton, and others.

Easton relocated to Los Angeles, in part because he was disillusioned with the recording business and in part because he had an idea that he could break into the movies. He came back to Chicago in the 1940s where he cut sides with Little Brother Montgomery but these were never released. Moving back to Los Angeles he cut four sides for the Specialty label with two appearing on its sister imprint, Fidelity, in 1951. He made his final recording, the album Bumble Bee Slim: Back In Town! for Pacific Jazz in 1962. He died of pneumonia on June 8, 1968.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Nowakowski, Konrad. “Amos Easton—The Mae West File.” Blues & Rhythm no. 184 (2003).
Zolten, Jerry. “The Rough Rugged Road of Bumble Bee Slim.” Living Blues no. 135 (1997): 42–45.

Discography: DGR

Selected Recordings in Reissue

Bumble Bee Slim: The Essential (2002, Classic Blues 200031).

See also Carr, Leroy; Chicago; Paramount; Specialty/Fidelity/Juke Box

EASY BABY

b. Alex Randle, 3 August 1934; Memphis, TN

Alex Randle lived in Michigan City, Mississippi, with his grandmother and uncle, both harmonica players, until he was seven, before moving back to Memphis to start school. He began to play harmonica himself and in the early 1950s he played professionally in and around Memphis while working odd jobs like shining shoes and running errands. When he had access to the juke joints and gambling houses of his area, he met and befriended Howlin’ Wolf, Sonny Boy Williamson II (Miller), James Cotton, Joe Hill Louis, and even played with many of them.

In 1956, he moved to Chicago and worked as a mechanic throughout the 1950s to 1980s while singing and playing informally in and around Chicago. He recorded an excellent album for Barrelhouse Records in 1979 with Eddie Taylor (guitar) and Kansas City Red (drums) demonstrating his strong harp playing and soulful vocals. Playing the devil’s music did not prevent him from having strong religious feelings and today he lives in an apartment building in the South Side of the Windy City, playing regularly in his church. He only performs occasionally—he played the Chicago Blues Festival in 1998 and 2000 and, in 2001, Wolf Records in Austria offered him his second opportunity to make an album under his name with two of Eddie Taylor’s sons, Eddie Jr. (guitar), and Timothy (drums), with Allan Batts (piano), Johnny B. Moore (guitar), and Sam Lay (drums), among others.

ROBERT SACRÉ

Bibliography

Brisbin, John Anthony, and Steve Wisner. “Easy Baby: We Seen Some Good Days.” Living Blues no. 144 (March/April 1999): 58–63.

Discography

The Master of Traditional Chicago Blues (2001, Wolf Records 120 805 CD, Austria).

EBONY (1)

Label owned by J. Mayo Williams in New York City and Chicago in 1945–1946. Ebony 1000 paired Jimmy Oden’s “Going Down Slow” with Sleepy John Estes’s “Some Day Baby.” Other notable artists were the Soul Stirrers (as the Five Gospel Souls), Lil Hardin Armstrong, and Bonnie Lee.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

EBONY (2)

Owned by Charles Priest in Chicago in 1952–1956. Four of its known issues were by pianist Little Brother Montgomery.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

ECKSTINE, BILLY

ECKSTINE, BILLY

b. William Clarence Eckstein, 8 July 1914; Pittsburgh, PA

d. 8 March 1993; Pittsburgh, PA

Singer and bandleader. Studied at Howard University in Washington, D.C. Eckstine began his professional career in Buffalo in 1934, then in 1939 joined the Earl Hines band in Chicago and had a blues hit with “Jelly Jelly” in 1940. Eckstine led a seminal but largely unrecorded bebop big band in 1944–1947. With his rich, smooth baritone and clear diction, he broke into network radio with ballads, unusual for a black singer in the 1940s. His repertoire was weighted toward romantic ballads, but he was an effective, if occasional, interpreter of songs in both blues and jazz contexts. His popularity peaked in the early 1950s, with records for MGM in lush string settings. He continued to perform on the cabaret circuit in later years.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

New Grove Jazz; Larkin
Friedwald, Will. Jazz Singing: America's Great Voices from Bessie Smith to Bebop and Beyond. New York: Scribner's, 1990.

Discography: Lord

Selected Recordings

“Jelly Jelly” (1940, Bluebird 11065).
“Blowin’ the Blues Away” (1944, De Luxe 2001).
Billy Eckstine Orchestra 1945 (1945, Alamac 2415).
“Caravan” (1949, MGM 10368).
Basie/Eckstine Inc. (1959, Roulette 52029).
My Way (1966, Motown 646).

EDISON

Founded in Orange, New Jersey, by Thomas Alva Edison, inventor of sound recording, the Edison company began issuing cylinders in 1894. Vertical cut discs, called Diamond Discs, followed in 1913. Edison personally supervised record issues and his personal and musical prejudices meant very limited involvement with blues. Helen Baxter was recorded in 1923. The only Race series comprised three releases in 1925 by Rosa Henderson, Viola McCoy, and Josie Miles. Cylinder issue continued in the Blue Amberol series, mostly of transfers from Diamond Discs, including all three of Helen Baxter’s titles. Both recording and issue were “suspended” in October 1929.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography: DGR

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.
Sutton, Allan. American Record Labels and Companies, An Encyclopedia. Denver, CO: Mainspring Press, 2000.

EDMONDS, ELGA

b. 1909; Champaign, IL

d. 26 August 1966; Chicago, IL

Born into a musical family, Elga Edmonds played a variety of instruments before settling on the drums in his late teens. He heard ragtime from his mother’s piano while growing up, and attended a local conservatory with his brothers. His studies gave his music a sober and committed attitude, while the musical camaraderie of his family—particularly of a flamboyant aunt—taught him the essentials of showmanship. He began his career as a jazz drummer in groups emulating the likes of Nat King Cole and other acts with crossover appeal. After gigging around throughout the 1940s to some acclaim, his break came in the person of Sunnyland Slim.

Slim introduced Edmonds to Muddy Waters, whose band was perfecting its electrically amplified blues band sound at the time Edmonds joined in 1950. He contributed much to the group during his tenure, preferring the straight-ahead on-the-fours beat bequeathed by his years as a jazz musician, rather than flashy syncopation. Edmonds grew inflexible on this point even as Waters pushed for the more urgent and aggressive sound that was gaining in popularity over the prevailing urban styles of blues. Rumors that Edmonds handed over his duties to uncredited sidemen on some Chess label sides, rather than play what Waters wanted, persist to this day. A split was inevitable; Waters needed a drummer who would do more than keep time, and Edmonds deemed anything other than anchoring the beat for his bandmates to be flamboyant. Waters dismissed Edmonds in 1956, but the drummer continued to draw on the strength of that association. He toured and played jazz for a time, but his increasing bitterness toward the music business and his disaffection with the blues soured his health, obliging him to retire from music in the mid-1960s.

JOHN OTIS

Bibliography

Santelli

Moon, D. Thomas. "All About the Beat: The Elga Edmonds Story." Living Blues no. 136 (November/December 1997): 36–43.

Discography: LSFPEDSEL

British record label, subsidiary of Demon Records, established in West London by Andrew Lauder in 1982. Dedicated to "making available again classic recordings of the past," Edsel's blues catalog included reissues from Columbia of albums by Taj Mahal, Son House, and Johnny Otis, and Otis Rush's Bullfrog label album.

HOWARD RYE

EDWARDS, ARCHIE

b. 4 September 1918; Union Hall, VA

d. 18 June 1998; Seat Pleasant, MD

Virginian Archie Edwards's main contribution to blues consists of his double role as musician and teacher who successfully tried to keep what he defined as "East Virginia blues" alive. Edwards started to play the guitar at a very early age under the influence of his father Roy, of Mississippi John Hurt and Blind Lemon Jefferson's records, and of white country music artists. At fifteen, Edwards performed in public at a local party for the first time. Then he worked outside music for many years before being drafted and settling in Washington, D.C., where he was employed by the government as a truck driver.

In 1959, he also opened a barbershop, which would soon become a meeting place for professional and amateur musicians and fans alike. His active interest in music was spurred again in 1963 after meeting his mentor Hurt. For the following three years Edwards accompanied the elder artist and regularly played locally. Immediately after retiring from his regular job, Edwards's talent was finally recognized, and he began to perform for larger audiences at major American and European festivals, including the renowned American Folk Blues Festival, and made few—though excellent—recordings issued on L+R Records, Mapleshade, and NorthernBlues. Though deeply rooted in tradition, Edwards was no mere copyist and contributed original songs such as "The Road Is Rough and Rocky," "Pittsburgh Blues," and "Duffel Bag Blues." A founding member of D.C. Blues Society, he was very proud when September 19, 1993, was declared Archie Edwards Day.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Pearson, Barry Lee. Virginia Piedmont Blues: The Lives and Art of Two Virginia Bluesmen. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990.

———. Notes accompanying Archie Edwards: The Toronto Sessions (2001, NorthernBlues Music NBM0006).

Discography: AMG

See also Hurt, John Smith "Mississippi John"; Jefferson, Blind Lemon

EDWARDS, BERNICE

Flourished 1930s

Bernice Edwards was raised in Houston with the talented Thomas family, which included Hersal Thomas, Hociel Thomas, and Sippie Wallace. She learned piano with the family, and later, with Black Boy Shine. In her teens she recorded two sessions for Paramount of mostly slow, emotional blues of which "Long Tall Mama" is a fine example. Her final 1935 session, with Black Boy Shine, featured some vigorous piano duets, including "Hot Mattress Stomp."

BOB HALL

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGREDWARDS, CHUCK

b. Charles Edward Edwins, 29 November 1927; Philadelphia PA

Singer and guitarist who initially began his career in New York City, and performed with pianist Sonny Thompson (1949–1953). In 1952 he settled in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, but continued to tour, and he made notable records for the Duke and Apollo labels (1952–1957). In 1967 his instrumental "Bullfight" (Rene 7001) was a hit, leading to a follow-up "Bullfight No. 2" and a cover version by jazz guitarist George Benson. In 1971 he formed his family group, the Edwards Generation. Since 1972 he has resided in San Francisco.

EDWARDS, CHUCK

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

LSFP

Gart, Galen. "I Got Loose: The Chuck Edwards Story." Blues and Rhythm no. 77 (March 1993): 14–15.

Discography: LSFP

EDWARDS, CLARENCE

b. 25 March 1933; Lindsay, LA

d. 20 March 1993; Baton Rouge, LA

Louisiana "swamp blues" style singer and guitarist. In the 1950s he performed in Louisiana and Mississippi with the Boogie Beats and the Bluebird Kings bands. He recorded with his brother, Cornelius Edwards, and Butch Cage in 1959–1960 sessions for folklorist Harry Oster. A day job at a scrap iron firm in Baton Rouge limited his performing opportunities for many years, but a few album recording and festival bookings came his way before his death.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin

Coleridge, Stephan. "Clarence Edwards" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 110 (July/August 1993): 50–51.

Discography: AMG; Larkin; LSFP

EDWARDS, DAVID "HONEYBOY"

b. 28 June 1915; Shaw, MS

Remarkable for his longevity as well as his musical accomplishments, Edwards was as a young boy a regular witness to performances by figures such as Charlie Patton, Eddie "Son" House, Sonny Boy Williamson II, Howlin' Wolf, and Tommy Johnson. In his early adolescence Edwards learned to play guitar with the help of friends Tommy McClellan and Robert Petway; by late 1932 he had left Shaw to work the picnic and juke joint circuit with Big Joe Williams. After a formative year with Williams, Edwards struck out on his own, playing around Greenwood, Mississippi, before moving to Memphis in early 1935; there he worked along the riverfront with the then-sixteen-year-old harmonica player Big Walter Horton. He returned home briefly but spent much of the following year playing around the South and living the hard scrabble life of a vagrant.

His travels brought him back to Greenwood, where, in 1937, he met Robert Johnson, whose now-legendary death Edwards witnessed the following year. Edwards spent the next two years playing in various situations across the South and made the acquaintance of a number of notable performers, including Elmore James, B. B. King, Teddy Darby, and Peetie Wheatstraw. In July 1942, folklorist Alan Lomax took Edwards to the Coahoma County Agricultural School in Clarksdale to record seventeen sides for the Library of Congress, including "Water Coast Blues," "The Army Blues," "Stagolee," "Just a Spoonful," "Spread My Raincoat Down," "Worried Life Blues," "Tear It Down Rag," and "I Love My Jelly Roll." Although he continued to travel and to perform (most notably with Little Walter Jacobs), Edwards did not record again until 1951. It was then, under the name of "Mr. Honey," that he made his first commercial recordings for the Houston-based Artist Recording Company,

David "Honeyboy" Edwards performs at the Chicago Blues Festival, June 2000. (Photo by Gene Tomko)

“Build Myself a Cave” and “Who May Your Regular Be,” as well as two unreleased sides, “Early in the Morning” and “Who Could Be Loving You Tonight.” In early 1953, Edwards, now using the name “Honeyboy,” came to Chicago to record a version of Sleepy John Estes’s “Drop Down Mama” for the Chess label; however, Chess did not release the song for nearly seventeen years. Nevertheless, Edwards relocated to Chicago in 1956, where he spent the next ten years playing in South Side clubs and at the Maxwell Street Market in relative obscurity.

From the mid-1960s interest in Edwards’s music intensified, thanks largely to both the American folk revival and the success of English blues-based rock bands such as Fleetwood Mac, with whom he performed in the late 1960s. In the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s Edwards made a number of well-received recordings for a variety of labels and toured across the United States, Europe, South America, and Asia. His memoir, The World Don’t Owe Me Nothing, was published in 1997. In 2002 he was the recipient of the United States’ highest honor for a traditional artist, the National Endowment of the Arts’ National Heritage Fellowship; that same year saw the release of Scott L. Taradash’s acclaimed full-length documentary on Edwards, Honeyboy.

DEAN A. MASULLO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Edwards, David “Honeyboy,” with Janis Martinson and Michael Robert Frank. The World Don’t Owe Me Nothing: The Life and Times of Delta Bluesman Honeyboy Edwards. Chicago: The Chicago Review Press, 1997.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Drop Down Mama (1990, MCA/Chess 93002); Delta Bluesman (1992, Earwig CD 4992); White Windows (1993, Evidence CD 26039); Crawling Kingsnake (1997, Testament CD 6002); The World Don’t Own Me Nothing (1997, Earwig CD 4940); Don’t Mistreat a Fool (1999, Genes CD 9914); I Catch Trouble (1999, Genes CD 9914); I’ve Been Around (2000, 32 Jazz CD 32185); Shake ‘Em on Down (2000, APO CD 2010); Mississippi Delta Bluesman (2001, Smithsonian Folkways CD 40132).

EDWARDS, FRANK

b. 20 March 1909; Washington, GA
d. 22 March 2002; Greenville, SC

Singer, guitarist, with rack harmonica. In 1941 he recorded for OKeh, including a rare rendition outside the Robert Johnson circle of musicians of “Terraplane Blues.” Except for the 1960s, he remained an active musician based in the Atlanta, Georgia, area.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Pete Lowry, “Some Cold Rainy Day. Part 3: Frank Edwards Story.” Blues Unlimited no. 99 (February/March 1973): 10–11.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

EDWARDS, “GOOD ROCKIN’” CHARLES

b. 4 March 1933; Tuscaloosa, AL
d. 17 May 1989; Chicago, IL

Singer and harmonica player. Raised in Alabama, Edwards moved to Chicago in 1949. In the early 1950s he performed in local clubs with Big Boy Spires, Otis Rush, Louis Myers, John Brim, and others. He joined Jimmy Rogers in 1955. Through the 1950s he had many opportunities to record but skipped them.

It appeared he had retired from performing during the 1960s. He returned in 1970 at a Detroit blues festival, after which he returned to Chicago. In 1975 he recorded his first and perhaps best work, Good Rockin’ Charles (Mr. Blues MB 7601) produced by Steve Wisner. He toured Europe in 1979, and continued performing around Chicago until ill health slowed him in 1983–1984. His harmonica style was grounded in those of John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson and Aleck Miller “Sonny Boy Williamson II,” but it was current in the 1950s alongside the styles of Little Walter Jacobs and Big Walter Horton. Stories abound of his hustling an extra dollar or two, one time explaining that the need resulted from “Reaganomics.”

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin
Illinois Slim. “Good Rockin’ Charles” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 88 (September/October 1989): 33.

EDWARDS, WILLIE

b. 25 July 1949; Hartford, CT

New England–based soul/blues guitarist and vocalist. Edwards has led various bands throughout New

EDWARDS, WILLIE

England since 1965. He released his debut album Everlasting Tears in 1997 on London-based JSP Records.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG

See also JSP

EGAN, WILLIE LEE

b. 1 October 1933; Minden, LA

Last name sometimes shown as Egans. Pianist. Moved to Los Angeles at age nine. Main keyboard influences were Amos Milburn, Hadda Brooks, and Camille Howard. Egan produced a string of piano boogie single records for the Mambo and Vita labels in 1955 and 1956, for which he is remembered.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)

Discography: AMG; LSFP

EL BEE (EL + BEE)

Label owned by John Burton in 1956 in Chicago. Its most collectible release is El Bee 157, Freddie King's debut ("Country Boy"/"That's What You Think").

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

EL, EDWARD H. "EDDIE"

b. 27 June 1914; Mound Bayou, MS

d. 1 June 1982; Chicago, IL

Postwar Chicago guitarist of the 1940s and 1950s. With the Blues Rockers he made six sides for the Aristocrat label that may be heard today as rock prototypes. Although he stopped playing in Chicago clubs around 1965, he was hired by labels as a side guitarist, notably by Delmark Records for Arthur Crudup's 1967 sessions.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Wisner, Steve, and Jim O'Neal. "Eddie El" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 57 (August 1983):15.

Discography: LSFP (see Blues Rockers)

ELECTRIC FLAG

Guitarist Mike Bloomfield formed the Electric Flag after leaving the Butterfield Blues Band in early 1967. The band featured singer Nick Gravenities (vocals), Barry Goldberg (organ), Harvey Brooks (bass), and Buddy Miles (drums), and a horn section. They made a strong debut at the Monterey Pop Festival, but the promise inherent in their powerful blues-rock explorations was never fulfilled. They recorded a film soundtrack, The Trip, before their official debut album, A Long Time Comin' (1968). Bloomfield departed before The Electric Flag (1969), and the band dissolved soon after. A brief reunion in 1974 featured all but Brooks of the original quintet.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger); Larkin; Santelli Brooks, Ken. The Adventures of Mike Bloomfield & Al Kooper with Paul Butterfield and David Clayton Thomas. Hampshire, United Kingdom: Agenda, 1999.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

The Trip (1967, Sidewalk ST5908).
A Long Time Comin' (1968, Columbia 9597).
The Electric Flag (1969, Columbia 9714).
The Band Kept Playing (1974, Atlantic 18112).

ELECTRO-FI

Label founded in Toronto in 1996 by Andrew Galloway with assistance from Gary Collver. Artists include Little Mack Simmons, Snooky Pryor, Mel Brown, Curley Bridges, Fruteland Jackson, Sam Myers, and Paul Oscher.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Electro-Fi website, <http://www.electrofi.com/> (accessed September 27, 2004).

ELEKTRA RECORDS

Jac Holzman and Paul Rickholt founded Elektra Records in 1950, with their first offices in Greenwich Village in New York. After buying out Rickholt in 1954, Holzman moved the label toward commercially viable artists like Josh White in the late 1950s and Paul Butterfield in the 1960s. Holzman sold the label in 1970, remaining its head until the label merged with Asylum three years later.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

Holzman, Jac. Follow the Music: The Life and High Times of Elektra Records in the Great Years of American Pop Culture. Santa Monica, CA: First Media Books, 1998.

Southall, Brian. The A-Z of Record Labels. London: Sanctuary, 2003.

Discography

Edwards, David, Mike Callahan, and Patrice Eyries. "The Elektra Story." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/elektra/elektrastory.html> (accessed December 18, 2004).

ELEM, ROBERT "BIG MOJO"

b. 22 January 1928; Itta Bena, MS

d. 5 February 1997; Chicago, IL

Bassist/guitarist/vocalist. Elem learned guitar as a boy from Robert Nighthawk and Ike Turner. After moving to Chicago, he landed gigs with local artists such as harpist Mad Dog Lester Davenport and guitarist Arthur "Big Boy" Spire. He switched to electric bass (still a novelty) in the mid-1950s, and formed Earlee Payton's Blues Cats with harpist Earlee Payton. They recruited guitarist Freddie King to handle the fretboard duties; this is the aggregation heard on King's debut single, "Country Boy," recorded for the El-Bee label circa late 1956. Elem remained in King's band, off and on, for about seven years. He also gigged locally with blues artists such as harpist Shaky Jake, Junior Wells, Jimmy Dawkins, and Luther Allison others.

Aside from his road work with King, he preferred to remain mostly a local artist; he was a dedicated family man, and he did not want to risk his day job for the uncertain life of a full-time musician. Perhaps partly for this reason, Elem had the opportunity to record only one album under his own name, 1994's Mojo Boogie (St. George). Nonetheless, he was an important figure in Chicago. In the latter years of his career, he often led the house band at Mister Tee's on West Lake Street, a West Side juke operated by former Freddie King percussionist T. J. McNulty. Here he put forth his high-velocity version of J. B. Lenoir's "The Mojo" (aka "Mojo Boogie"), on which his keening, tenor vocal delivery made him sound eerily like Lenoir himself.

DAVID WHITEIS

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda)

Paulus, George. "Obituary: Robert 'Big Mojo' Elem." Living Blues no. 134 (July/August 1997): 50-51.

Discography: AMG; LSFP (as Ealem)

11-29

"11-29," also appearing as "eleven twenty-nine," is a reference found in a number of blues songs dealing with the subject of court sentencing in southern states for criminal behavior. Still standing as law today in the state of Tennessee, the sentence for some crimes is not to exceed 11 months and 29 days, or just under a year. A sentence of 11 months and 29 days originally kept the convict from passing from local to state authority.

Whether or not "11-29" was a desirable fate remains a matter of opinion. The sentence was often the maximum for a misdemeanor crime, thus keeping the convict in local confinement as long as possible. This interpretation is borne out in a number of blues songs. Blacks were often given more severe sentences than whites in a local court of law.

The other view of "11-29" is that the convict was given a minimum sentence for a greater crime and was not allowed to pass into a state prison. But this also meant that the prisoner, on release, did not receive new clothing, some money, and a ticket home as was customary for parolees from a state prison. And the experience of either county or state incarceration during the historical period that shaped early blues lyrics was, in reality, very cruel.

Charley Patton refers to the "11-29" jail sentence of eleven months and twenty-nine days in "Jim Lee Blues, Part 1" recorded in 1929:

When I got arrested what do you reckon was my fine?
Say they give all coons eleven twenty-nine.

The injustice of the sentencing was not restricted to men. Women also found themselves on the receiving end of maximum sentences for local crimes.

Leroy Carr sings of the fate of his “gal” in “Eleven Twenty-Nine Blues” recorded in 1934:

Then I heard the jailer say, “Hello, prisoners.
All fall in line.
I’m also talking about that long-chain woman that got 11.29.”

References to “11-29” also are heard in the Furry Lewis song “Judge Harsh Blues,” recorded in 1928, and in the Romeo Nelson song “11.29 Blues,” recorded in 1929.

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

- Lichtenstein, Alex. Twice the Work of Free Labor. London: Verso, 1996.
- Myers, Martha A. Race, Labor & Punishment in the New South. Columbus: Ohio State University Press, 1998.
- Oliver, Paul. The Story of the Blues. London: Chilton Books, 1969.

See also Racial Issues and the Blues

ELKO

Los Angeles label, owned by John R. Fulbright, which issued less than fifty blues and gospel singles from 1951 to 1955 (with a brief revival in 1959) in a variety of numerical series. Clifton Chenier and Phillip Walker made their recording debut on Elko, which shows Fulbright’s ability to spot talent.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

- Bentley, Chris. “Elko: The Old House of Music.” Juke Blues no. 1 (July 1985): 15–18.

Discography: McGrath

See also Agee, Ray; Bender, D. C.; Chenier, Clifton; Egan, Willie Lee; Mickle, Elmon “Drifting Slim”; Nolen, Jimmy; Thomas, Jesse “Babyface”; Walker, Phillip

ELLIS, BIG CHIEF

b. Wilbert Thirkfield Ellis, 10 November 1914; Birmingham, AL
d. 20 or 21 December 1977; Birmingham, AL

Self-taught pianist who in the 1940s and 1950s contributed to recording sessions including those by

Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee for Capitol. His solo career was revived after moving from New York City to Washington, D.C., in 1972. He made a late-period album for Trix before his death from a heart attack.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Ron Wynn); Harris; Larkin; Santelli Selkowitz, Ira, and Susan Day. “Wilbert ‘Big Chief’ Ellis.” Living Blues no. 63 (January/February 1985): 28–35.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

ELLIS, TINSLEY

b. 4 June 1957; Atlanta, GA

Guitarist, singer. Raised in South Florida, Ellis took up the guitar at an early age and ultimately served as a major force in the advent of rocking southern blues. While attending Emory University, Ellis began making a name for himself on the Atlanta blues scene with bands such as the Alley Cats, which also included bassist Preston Hubbard, who would play with Roomful of Blues and the Fabulous Thunderbirds. In 1981 Ellis formed the Heartfixers with veteran singer/harpist “Chicago” Bob Nelson. The group soon became the rocking blues favorite of its region, regularly holding its own against the better-known southern rock bands of the era. Ellis took over vocals when Nelson left in 1983 following the recording of the band’s first two independent albums. The Heartfixers backed Nappy Brown on his 1984 comeback Tore Up but couldn’t expand their regional reputation.

Ellis took his trademark Gibson ES-335 guitar and went solo in 1988. The release, and subsequent popularity with radio, critics, and fans, of Georgia Blue on Alligator Records a year later made him a national artist. Ellis took advantage of the situation with constant touring while also releasing a series of albums, including Fanning the Flames, Trouble Time, Storm Warning, and the Tom Dowd-produced Fire It Up. He also did a guest spot on Jody Williams’s award-winning Return of a Legend album while releasing his own Kingpin on Capricorn in 1999 and Hell or High Water in 2002 and Hard Way in 2004 on Telarc.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin
Horowitz, H. "Tinsley Ellis: Atlanta's Heartfixer Rocks the Blues." Blues Revue no. 77 (August/September 2002).

Discography: AMGEMBRY, "QUEEN" SYLVIA

b. Sylvia Lee Burton, 14 June 1941; Wabaseka, AR
d. 28 February 1992; Chicago, IL

As a bass player, singer, songwriter, and sometimes bandleader, Sylvia Embry was a rare phenomenon on the male-dominated inner-city blues scene. A rudimentary bass player and singer of limited range but undeniable power, she expected and received respect from her peers. Embry moved to Chicago in 1961 and may have taken up bass from her first husband, Walter Eiland, a bass player. She is probably best known as an accompanist alongside her second husband, guitarist John Embry, with whom she appeared on Maxwell Street and in many South and North Side Chicago clubs. Her basic, no-frills style and dependability also earned her invitations to play with guitarists Lefty Dizz and Jimmy Dawkins.

Her lean discography includes After Work (1980, Razor Records) on which she shares equal billing with husband John, and Midnight Baby, an LP of original material recorded for L&R while on the 1983 American Folk Blues Festival European tour (reissued on Evidence). She also appeared on the tour's official recording as well as on a 1979 Delta Blues Festival recording, and on other anthologies, including four original numbers on Alligator Records' Living Chicago Blues, Vol. 4.

Embry, the mother of nine and later a foster mother, burdened with health and financial problems, returned to the Baptist church in the mid-1980s where she became involved in the gospel chorus. She reportedly wrote gospel compositions before her death from hypertension at the age of fifty. Perhaps anointed "queen" at a time when few women on the blues scene played as well as sang, Embry was a formidable presence on the bandstand. Her flat-picked bass lines provided ample support, and her equally unornamented vocals impressed with the strength of her personality.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

Larkin
O'Brien, Justin. "Queen Sylvia Embry." Living Blues no. 105 (September/October 1992): 45.

EMERSON, WILLIAM ROBERT "BILLY THE KID"

b. 21 December 1925; Tarpon Springs, FL

Pianist/organist born and raised in Florida. Emerson performed with several local groups, such as the Billy Battle Band and the Charley Bantley Combo. After attending Florida A&M, he joined the U.S. Air Force, where he was stationed in Greenville, Mississippi. It was here that he met Ike Turner and sat in, on guitar, with him at regional delta and Memphis gigs and later performed with Turner's Kings of Rhythm in Florida. Emerson's first recordings were made for Sam Phillips's Sun Records in 1954 and 1955, including "No Teasing Around," "The Woodchuck," and "Red Hot." While in Memphis, Emerson also performed with Phineas Newborn.

Displeased with the lack of success his Sun recordings had made, he soon moved to Chicago, where he played keyboards for a large number of recording sessions. He recorded under his own name for Vee-Jay (1955–1957), Chess (1958–1959), Mad (1960), M-Pac! (1963), and others. In 1966, he formed his own record label, Tarpon, on which he recorded Denise LaSalle and Matt "Guitar" Murphy. While Billy has recorded blues and worked with many blues musicians, such as Willie Dixon, Buddy Guy, Earl Hooker, Lonnie Brooks, Junior Wells, Sonny Boy Williamson II, and Robert Nighthawk, he has remained apart from the central blues community. His blues and R&B are tinged with altered chords and arrangements foreign to standard blues progressions. He often played jazz piano in upscale establishments.

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
O'Neal, Jim. "Living Blues Interview: Billy 'The Kid' Emerson." Living Blues no. 45/46 (Spring 1980): 25–48.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Sun/Phillips International/Flip; Turner, Ike

ERBY, JACK

b. John J. Erby, 20 September 1902; Fort Worth, TX

Earned a B.A. degree at Wilberforce University (Ohio) in 1924. Erby recorded as piano soloist and accompanist for the Columbia, Paramount, and OKeh labels through 1929, and toured with Victoria Spivey as well. He stayed in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, from 1930 through 1936, when he moved to Los Angeles, California. For many years he was pianist to Hattie McDaniel and Helen Humes. In the late 1940s he founded A Natural Hit label. He has been inactive in music since the early 1960s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

ESQUERITA

b. Eskew Reeder, Jr., 1935 (?); Greenville, SC
d. 23 October 1986; New York, NY

Aka Eskew Reeder, S. Q. Reeder, SQ Rita, The Magnificent Malucci. Nobody knows Esquerita's date of birth, although birth years of 1935, 1938, and 1940 have been given by writers. His name and life are also mysterious. After a youth spent playing piano around Greenville, he recorded in 1955 with the Heavenly Echoes, a gospel group from New York. He is considered to be a copy cat of Little Richard . . . who claims to have learned piano from Esquerita! With his outrageous hairdo, clothes, and manners he became an icon in the rock 'n' roll world, recording some of the wildest and weirdest sides ever for Capitol in 1958–1959. In the 1960s and 1970s, he made more R&B records for Minit, Instant, Everest, OKeh, Norton, and Crosstone, then disappeared from the scene.

ROBERT SACRÉ

Bibliography

Briggs, Keith. "Esquerita" [obituary]. Blues & Rhythm no. 30 (1987): 7–8.

Discography

Sock It to Me Baby (1989, Bear Family [D] BCD 15504; reissue).

ESTES, JOHN ADAM "SLEEPY JOHN"

b. 25 January 1899; Ripley, TN
d. 5 June 1977; Brownsville, TN

John Adam Estes was one of sixteen children born to Daniel and Millie (Thornton) Estes in Ripley, Tennessee, a small town located fifty miles northeast of Memphis. The family soon moved to nearby Jones, Tennessee, and Estes spent much of his childhood farming and picking cotton. Like most poor southern black children of the time, he received little formal schooling. In his youth, Estes was struck in his right eye with a piece of glass while playing baseball and lost his vision in that eye. The injury gave him a cast-eyed appearance, which earned him the nickname "Sleepy."

Estes took an interest in music while still a boy and his first instrument was a homemade guitar made out of a cigar box and broom wire. He received his first store-bought guitar not long after as a reward from his father for working hard in the fields. Early inspiration came from his father, who played the guitar, and an older brother who played banjo.

At age fifteen, Estes moved with his family to nearby Brownsville, Tennessee, a small community that would have an enormous impact on his songwriting and where he would reside for much of his life. He began playing area house parties and country suppers and associated with several prominent musicians, including Hambone Willie Newbern, who helped shape the young guitarist's early blues style. By the late 1910s, Estes, who had already earned a local reputation, teamed up with the talented eleven-year-old mandolin and guitar player James "Yank" Rachel. The pair frequently hoboed throughout Tennessee, Arkansas, and Missouri during the next decade and played house parties and fish fries throughout the region. In the mid-1920s, Estes and Rachel were joined by Brownsville jug and harmonica player Hammie Nixon, and the trio formed what would become a lasting relationship that would endure off and on for more than five decades.

In the late 1920s, Estes, Rachel, and Nixon relocated to Memphis and performed throughout the city. Around 1928, Estes and Rachel, along with jug and piano player Jab Jones, formed the Three J's Jug Band. On the recommendation of musician Jim Jackson, Estes made his first recordings for Victor in Memphis in September of 1929. His debut release was the splendid "The Girl I Love, She Got Long Curly Hair," which established Estes as a consummate singer and songwriter. The song featured Estes's plaintive singing underscored by his powerful poetic imagery. It also showcased Rachel's evocative mandolin playing, another key element of many of Estes's greatest early recordings.

The success of Estes's first record led to more recordings for Victor throughout the next year, despite the stock market crash of 1929. The following sessions for the label produced more classic recordings such as "Diving Duck Blues," "Milk Cow Blues,” and “Broken-Hearted, Dirty and Ragged Too.” Estes’s emotional singing was later aptly described by Big Bill Broonzy as “crying” the blues.

He moved back to Brownsville after his last 1930 recording session before relocating to Chicago several years later to join Nixon, who had recently recorded there. Billed for the first time on record as Sleepy John Estes and with Nixon accompanying him on harmonica, he recorded several excellent sides for Champion in 1935. Among these were “Drop Down Mama” and “Someday Baby Blues,” the latter of which would later be recorded by Muddy Waters and the Allman Brothers Band as “Trouble No More.” Big Maceo would slightly alter the song in 1941 and rename it “Worried Life Blues,” which also became a blues standard.

From 1937 to 1940, Estes recorded many of his most personal songs for Decca. During the course of four prolific sessions, he recorded two dozen compositions, many of which describe the trials and tribulations of his life as a poor black man living in the South. His deeply personal accounts covered subjects such as his near-drowning experience (“Floating Bridge”), his life as a hobo (“Hobo Jungle Blues” and “Special Agent”), and the burning down of a friend’s house (“Fire Station Blues [Martha Hardin]”). In 1941, Estes recorded for Bluebird as a member of the Delta Boys, as well as under his own name and affectionately immortalized two more Brownsville residents on “Little Laura Blues” and “Lawyer Clark Blues.” Estes returned to farming in Brownsville in the mid-1940s and married wife Olie in 1948. With his eyesight gradually failing over the years, he finally lost vision in his left eye in 1950 and became totally blind. Later that year, he recorded with Nixon for both Ora-Nelle and Sun and faded into obscurity for the next ten years.

On a tip from Big Joe Williams that Estes was still alive and living in Brownsville (many had presumed him dead), Chicago filmmaker David Blumenthal tracked him down in 1962 where he was living in stark poverty. Estes was then brought to the attention of Delmark label owner Bob Koester and he recorded the acclaimed LP The Legend of Sleepy John Estes. Although now totally blind, Estes’s guitar skills and singing remained undiminished. He recorded several more albums for Delmark, often reuniting with Rachel and Nixon, and during the next dozen years recorded for a variety of domestic and international labels, including Testament, Vanguard, and Storyville. With the Folk Blues Revival of the 1960s at its peak, Estes, often with Nixon and Rachel, toured extensively both nationally and abroad, and remained an extremely popular act for more than a decade. Estes performed at the 1964 Newport Folk Festival and the 1969 Ann Arbor Blues Festival, and also toured Europe with the American Folk Blues Festival package. He was also a popular draw in Japan, where he recorded several albums. Sleepy John Estes, one of the most distinctive voices and imaginative songwriters of the prewar blues era, died of a stroke in 1977 on the day he was to leave for a tour of Europe. Despite his seemingly successful career resurgence, Estes still lived in extreme poverty in the final years of his life and died penniless. In 1998, the city of Brownsville restored Estes’s shotgun shack and turned it into a museum to commemorate his life and music and that of his musical associates, Yank Rachel and Hammie Nixon.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- AMG (Barry Lee Pearson); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Chesborough, Steve. “Sleepy John Estes House Preserved.” Living Blues no. 141 (September/October 1998): 12.
Lornell, Kip, and Jim O’Neal. “Living Blues Interview: Hammie Nixon & Sleepy John Estes.” Living Blues no. 19 (January/February 1975): 13–19.
Tomashefsky, Steve. “A Sermon on Sleepy John Estes.” Living Blues no. 33 (July/August 1977): 11–14.
Welding, Pete. “Interview with Sleepy John Estes: Sleepy John Estes: Going to Brownsville” (Testament CD 6008).

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

EVANS, DAVID HUHNE, JR.

b. 22 January 1944, Boston, MA

Blues historian, ethnomusicologist, record producer, and musician. Evans was trained as a classics scholar, receiving his B.A. from Harvard (magna cum laude) in 1965 with a senior thesis on “The Homeric Simile in Oral Tradition.” He turned to blues and American folklore in the mid-1960s, doing important field research in Mississippi and other southern states during the years of his graduate studies (M.A., 1967; Ph.D., 1976; both from the University of California at Los Angeles).

Among the older musicians Evans interviewed and/or recorded during this period were Babe Stovall, Roosevelt Holts, the Reverend Ishmon Bracey, the Reverend Rubin Lacy, Mager Johnson, and Houston Stackhouse. His first book, Tommy Johnson, was based on his master’s thesis, and added greatly to our knowledge of this important Mississippi

EVANS, DAVID HUHNE, JR.

bluesman. Big Road Blues, a far broader and more inclusive study, was derived from his dissertation. Despite its title, this work discusses early “city” or “commercial” as well as folk blues, achieving a rare and salutary synthesis of a broad spectrum of different blues styles and issues. Evans combines a deep involvement in oral history and folklore with a solid grounding in music. His field recordings, many of which have been issued on record and CD, are also of great value to blues scholars.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

Bibliography

- Evans, David. Tommy Johnson. London: Studio Vista, 1971.
———. Big Road Blues: Creativity and Tradition in the Folk Blues. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.

Selected Recordings as Producer

(Note: All compiled from Evans’s field recordings and/or studio recordings.)

- Goin’ Up the Country* (1968, British Decca LP 4931; reissued 1976, Rounder 2012).
Presenting the Country Blues: Roosevelt Holts (1969, Blue Horizon LP 7-63201).
It Must Have Been the Devil: Mississippi Country Blues by Jack Owens and Bud Spires (1971, Testament LP T-2222; reissued on CD with extra tracks, 1995, Testament 5016).
The Legacy of Tommy Johnson (1973, Matchbox LP SDM-224).
South Mississippi Blues (1973, Rounder 2009).
Afro-American Folk Music from Tate and Panola Counties, Mississippi (1978, Archive of Folk Song, Library of Congress LP L67; reissued 2000, Rounder CD 1515).
R. L. Burnside. Sound Machine Groove (1981, Vogue LP 513502).
Jessie Mae Hemphill. She-Wolf (1981, Vogue LP 513501).
Hammie Nixon. Tappin’ That Thing (1984, High Water LP 1003).
Houston Stackhouse (1910–1980) (1984, Wolf LP 120).
Hezekiah and the House Rockers (1987, High Water LP 1010).
Jessie Mae Hemphill. Feelin’ Good (1990, High Water LP 1012).
Bottleneck Blues (1995, Testament CD 5021).
Deep South Blues (1999, High Water CD 6513).
R. L. Burnside and the Sound Machine. Raw Electric 1979–1980 (2001, Inside Sounds CD ISC-0513).

See also Johnson, Tommy

EVANS, MARGIE

b. 17 July 1940; Shreveport, LA

A Louisiana-bred vocalist, Evans joined the Johnny Otis Show in 1969. She produced records, including six for Bobby “Blue” Bland, and recorded with artists such as Willie Dixon and B. B. King. An active supporter of blues culture, Evans serves as executive director and founder of Los Angeles Music Week.

STEPHANIE POXON

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
Boyer, Edward J. “Instrument for Unity; Singer’s ‘L.A. Music Week’ Seeks to Bridge Racial Gaps.” Los Angeles Times (December 11, 1995): B1, B6.
Jung, Maureen, and Jack Rhyne. “Live at the 5-4 Ballroom & Supper Club: Bringing the Blues Back to Central L.A.” Living Blues no. 121 (May/June 1995): 30–39.

Discography

- Mistreated Woman* (1982, L&R Records LR 42-050).
Another Blues Day (1984, L&R Records LR 42-060).

EVERETT, BETTY

b. 23 November 1939; Greenwood, MS
d. 19 August 2001; Beloit, WI

Chicago soul singer of the 1960s and 1970s whose expressive depth of vocal expression was put to use on everything from blues to light pop. Everett grew up in Mississippi singing gospel in church, but at age nineteen moved to Chicago and became ensconced in the city’s west side blues scene. She was discovered by Magic Sam who had her sing in his band at Mel’s Hideaway. That led to her signing to the Cobra label, where she recorded blues and hard soul, notably “Ain’t Gonna Cry” and “I’ll Weep No More.” She then recorded for Carl Jones’s C.J. label, her best work being “Why Did I Have to Go.”

In 1961, Everett recorded for Leo Austell four remarkable sides, which were sold to One-derful, the best of which was “Your Love Is Important to Me.” In 1963 she joined Vee-Jay, which saw her as a lighter soul singer with pop appeal. At Vee-Jay she became an international star, first with two great Brill Building songs that producer Calvin Carter picked up in New York, “You’re No Good” (1963) and “It’s in His Kiss (The Shoop Shoop Song)” (1964), and then a duet with Jerry Butler, “Let It Be Me” (1964). Her subsequent label associations were with ABC, Uni, Fantasy, and United Artists. Her last major hit was “There’ll Come a Time” (1968) for Uni.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. "Betty Everett: Thirty Years of Bitter-Sweet Recordings." Goldmine (April 10, 1987): 97–99.

Discography: LSFPEVIDENCE

Record label originally founded in 1991 in Conshohocken, Pennsylvania, by veteran music retailers Jerry Gordon and Howard Rosen as a way to fulfill their love for jazz. For its first few years Evidence focused on reissuing out-of-print jazz albums (particularly the Saturn catalog of Sun Ra), as well as distributing overseas recordings within the United States. But they soon expanded on their vision to include blues as well. Some of the early reissues included albums by Cephas and Wiggins, Paul deLay, Lowell Fulson, Eddie Kirkland, and Larry Davis. By the mid-1990s, Evidence had gotten the U.S. distribution rights to overseas albums by Billy Boy Arnold, Carey Bell, and Hubert Sumlin, giving the label a loyal following among blues fans.

By the late 1990s, Evidence had grown into a mid-sized blues and jazz label, and had begun issuing new recordings as well as the reissues. (Interestingly, in an interview with Jazz Weekly, Gordon said the blues portion of the Evidence catalog outsold the jazz the label was started for!)

By introducing new artists such as Carl Weathersby, Chico Banks, Ellis Hooks, Rico McFarland, and Eric Sardinas to the world, while also promoting underknown blues veterans like Melvin Taylor, Ted Hawkins, Billy Branch, and Jody Williams, Evidence has played an important role in the development and propagation of the blues in the 1990s and early 2000s. The label continues its dual path of recording new material and also finding recordings either no longer in print or not available in the United States, and reissuing them.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Skelly, Richard. "Evidence Music: Record Hounds Push Music That Matters." Goldmine 27 (May 4, 2001): 62. Evidence label website, <http://www.evidencemusic.com/>.

Discography

Evidence Blues Sampler (1992, Evidence 26000).
American Folk Blues Festival '62-'65: Highlights (1997, Evidence 26087).
Evidence Blues Sampler: Six (1998, Evidence 26098).

EXCELLO/NASHBORO

Ernest L. ("Ernie") Young (b. 1892; d. 1977), a Nashville businessman described as "the perfect Southern gentlemen, Colonel Sanders without the facial hair," launched Excello Records in 1952 as a division of Nashboro, a gospel label he had founded the previous year. Young was not a blues or R&B fan, but he saw the opportunity to tap into Nashville's black talent while other local studios concentrated on country music. He ran his labels out of modest quarters at 177 Third Avenue North, next door to his retail and mail-order operation, Ernie's Record Mart, which also served as a "one-stop" distributor of other indie labels. Additionally, he ran a publishing arm, Excellorec Music. Young's businesses benefited mightily from his synergistic relationship with Nashville's 50,000-watt R&B powerhouse, WLAC, on which he sponsored deejay John Richbourg's popular "Ernie's Record Parade" program.

Blues fans closely associate Excello with the swamp blues of artists like Slim Harpo, Lightnin' Slim, Lonesome Sundown, and Lazy Lester, and to a lesser extent with swamp pop by Warren Storm, King Karl, and Guitar Gable. Swamp blues has been described as "Jimmy Reed run through a pot of gumbo"; swamp pop was like Fats Domino "played in the key of heartbreak." Recordings in both genres were supplied to Excello by Crowley, Louisiana, producer J. D. Miller over an eleven-year period starting in late 1955. The biggest sellers from this arrangement were Slim Harpo's "Raining in the Heart" (released 1961) and "Baby Scratch My Back" (1966), Lightnin' Slim's "Rooster Blues" (1959), and Warren Storm's "Prisoner's Song" (1958)—the latter actually on Nasco, another Young label.

Excello also recorded its own material—an eclectic array of jump-blues, down-home country blues, doo-wop, and vocal groups, even the occasional gospel or rockabilly release. Many of Excello's sides have a delightfully down-home, earthy feel, exemplified by such quirky classics as the Blues Rockers' "Calling All Cows" and Jerry McCain's "Trying to Please." McCain drove from his home in Alabama for his sessions, but most of Young's artists came out of the fertile, if sometimes overlooked, black music scene of Nashville. Excello's home-grown hits during the mid to late 1950s included Arthur Gunter's "Baby Let's Play House" (covered by Elvis), the Marigolds' "Rollin' Stone" (covered by the Fontane Sisters), Louis Brooks & His Hi-Toppers' "It's Love Baby (24 Hours a Day)" (covered by Ruth Brown and Hank Ballard), Larry Birdsong's "Pleadin' for Love," and the Gladiolas' "Little Darlin'" (covered by the Diamonds). The cover versions of Excello hits often outsold the originals, generating additional publishing royalties for Young.

In 1966, Young retired, selling his businesses to the Crescent Company, which retained his long-time associate Shannon F. Williams to help run the labels. The company moved to new studios on Woodland Street; changed the Excello logo from its classic navy-blue and orange color scheme to pink, turquoise, and white; and began venturing into soul music on Excello and its new sister labels A-Bet and Mankind. Through the early 1970s, Excello reissued much of its swamp blues catalog on LP and produced new blues LPs in conjunction with Mike Vernon of England's Blue Horizon, but the company increasingly focused on Nashboro and the gospel market.

In 1994, the labels were acquired by AVI Enterprises, which sold them in 1997 to MCA/Universal. Its latest corporate owner has reached into the Excello vaults for a handful of reissues on its Hip-O imprint; Ace Records in the United Kingdom has dug deeper into those same vaults for more than thirty reissue CDs.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

- Broven, John. Notes to The Excello Story, Vols. 1–4 (1999, Hip-O/Universal CD 40149, 40150, 40156, 40157).
- Cullen, Thomas J. III. "Soul Patrol: The Excello Records Story." Blues Revue no. 52 (November 1999): 68–69.
- Turner, Bez, and Peter Gibbon. "Excello Records." Blues Unlimited nos. 131/132 (September/December 1978): 20–26 (includes listing of all Excello singles).

Discography: McGrath

- Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "Excello Album Discography." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/excello.html> (accessed February 15, 2005).
- LeBlanc, Eric. "Ernie Young" <http://www.island.net/~blues/eyoung.htm> contains a complete listing of the extensive Excello reissue series on Ace (UK).

Selected Recordings

- Various artists. Excello Records Vol. 1: Sound of the Swamp (1990, Rhino 70896).
- Various artists. Excello Records. Vol. 2: Southern Rhythm & Rock (1990, Rhino CD 70897).
- Various artists. House Rockin' & Hip Shakin', Vols. 1–3 (1998, Hip-O/Universal CD 40071, 40108, 40131).
- Various artists. The Excello Story, Vols. 1–4, (1999, Hip-O/Universal CD 40149, 40150, 40156, 40157).

See also Miller, Jay D. "J. D."; Nashville

EXCELSIOR/EXCLUSIVE

Los Angeles-based record labels begun by the songwriting brothers Otis and Leon René ("When It's Sleepytime Down South" and "Rock-in' Robin") in the early 1940s. Otis René, the president and producer of Excelsior, originally formed "The All Colored Recording Company" to record the brothers' songs. Excelsior was involved in the success of numerous acts, including Nat King Cole, Johnny Otis, and Jimmy Rushing. Leon René controlled Exclusive records, where he produced recordings by Joe Liggins and the Honey Drippers, Johnny Moore's Three Blazers, Charles Brown, Ivory Joe Hunter, Herb Jefferies, Mabel Scott, and others. Both labels fueled the Central Avenue blues scene by discovering and recording its unsigned talent.

The René brothers established the independent RGR Pressing plant (René-Gutshall-René) during World War II to speed their ability to get records to market. RGR's use of recycled records during the shellac shortages gives their discs a multi-hued appearance. The inability of the labels to convert to 45 rpm led to each company's closing; Excelsior's last records date from 1951 and Exclusive filed for bankruptcy in 1949. Leon René later cofounded Class Records.

BRIAN MOON

Bibliography

- Shaw, Arnold. Honkers and Shouters: The Golden Years of Rhythm and Blues. New York: Macmillan, 1978.

Discography: McGrath

See also Brown, Charles; Class; Cole, Nat King; Five Blind Boys of Alabama; Hunter, Ivory Joe; Liggins, Jimmy; Moore, Oscar; Otis, Johnny; Rushing, James Andrew "Jimmy"

EXCLUSION OF WOMEN FROM BLUES HISTORY

(See Women and the Blues)

EZELL, WILL

- b. 1896; Shreveport, LA
d. Unknown

One of the most important prewar barrelhouse pianists. He is an obscure figure whose reputation is based on recordings made between 1927 and 1931 for Paramount records both as solo pianist and as house accompanist for blues artists such as Lucille Bogan, Blind Roosevelt Graves, and others. His ten solo recordings are of special importance, synergistically combining ragtime with boogie-woogie into a powerful original style.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

Larkin

Silvester, Peter. A Left Hand Like God: The Story of Boogie-Woogie. London: Quartet Books, 1988.

Discography: DGR

As Unaccompanied Soloist

“Barrel House Man”/“West Coast Rag” (1927, Paramount [PM] 12549); “Ezell’s Precious Five”/“Crawlin’ Spider Blues” (1928, Pm 12729); “Barrel House Woman”/“Heifer Dust” (1929, Pm 12573); “Bucket of Blood”/“Playing the Dozen” (1929, Pm 12773).

As Leader

“Freakish Mistreater Blues”/“Hot Spot Stuff” (1929, Paramount [PM] 12914); “Just Can’t Stay Here”/“Pitchin’ Boogie” (1929, Pm 12855).

As Accompanist and Sideman

Blind Roosevelt Graves and Uaroy Graves. “Guitar Boogie”/“New York Blues” (1929, Paramount [PM] 12820); “St. Louis Rambler Blues”/“Sad Dreaming Blues” (1929, Pm 12961); “Staggerin’ Blues”/“Low Down Woman” (1929, Pm 12891).

Lucille Bogan. “Doggone Wicked Blues”/“Oklahoma Man Blues” (1927, Paramount [PM] 12514); “Kind Stella Blues”/“Jim Tampa Blues” (1927, Pm 12504); “War Time Man Blues”/“Women Don’t Need No Man” (1927, Pm 12560).

F

FABULOUS THUNDERBIRDS

Electric blues group that was a defining unit of the current Austin, Texas, club blues style. Formed in 1974 by guitarist Jimmie Vaughan and singer/harmonica player Kim Wilson. Other original members included bassist Keith Ferguson and drummer Mike Buck, with briefly vocalist Lou Ann Barton. During the mid- to late 1970s, it was the house band at Antone's club in Austin, and a little later the band was opening concerts for the Rolling Stones and for Eric Clapton. Early albums for Takoma and for Chrysalis through 1982 were critically well received but not high commercial sellers.

By 1982 former Roomful of Blues drummer Fran Christina had joined the band, followed by bassist Preston Hubbard in 1985 from the same group. In 1986, Tuff Enuff, the first LP delivered on a new contract with the Epic/Associated label, was an unexpected mainstream bestseller, with the title track becoming widely heard on radio, in bars, and in baseball parks. In 1990, Jimmie Vaughan began performing and recording more with his brother, Stevie Ray Vaughan. After the latter's death, he left the Thunderbirds to pursue a solo career. Duke Robillard and Kid Bangham were hired simultaneously as Vaughan's replacements in 1991. Wilson spent much of the 1990s on solo projects; the CD High Water was essentially a Wilson album released under the Fabulous Thunderbirds' name. In the late 1990s Wilson organized a new Thunderbirds line-up featuring guitarist Kid Ramos (formerly of the James Harman Band) and West Coast veteran keyboardist Gene Taylor.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli Kofford, Bret. "The Fabulous Thunderbirds: Absolutely Fabulous." Blues Revue no. 67 (July/August 2001): 8–13.

Discography: AMG

FAHEY, JOHN

b. 28 February 1939; Takoma Park, MD

d. 22 February 2001; Salem, OR

Guitarist, blues scholar, and writer, Fahey was one of the most colorful and idiosyncratic personalities of the 1960s blues revival. Both of Fahey's parents were musical. His first instruments were piano and clarinet. Fahey was exposed to country music in his youth. An encounter with Blind Willie Johnson's recording of "Praise God I'm Satisfied" instantly converted him into a blues fanatic. He pursued a career as a folklorist, earning a master's degree in folklore and mythology from the University of California at Los Angeles in 1969. His thesis, on Charley Patton, was published in book form in 1970. By this time he had done a good deal of fieldwork in Mississippi, rediscovering Skip James and participating in the rediscovery of Bukka White. He had also released several albums of solo blues guitar on his own Takoma Records label. He was signed by Vanguard Records, which issued three recordings of his work, including one of his finest albums, Requia, in 1967. In the early 1970s he made three ensemble albums for Reprise records. Of these, one, Of Rivers and Religion, contains some extraordinary blues and jazz performances. These range from original works to an absolutely faithful recreation of the 1928 record “Texas and Pacific Blues” by Frenchy’s String Band (a New Orleans group). Fahey continued to record for Takoma in the 1970s, although he no longer owned the label.

In the 1980s Fahey suffered grave personal and career setbacks. Following a divorce from his third wife he lost his home and was left destitute. In his last years he made a modest comeback. He also largely turned away from blues and the acoustic guitar, experimenting with the electric guitar in a more eclectic, sometimes avant-garde style. He also founded the CD label Revenant, issuing new recordings of his work and that of other “outsider” musicians. Reissues of some of his older recordings brought him some royalty revenue, but he continued to regard his career in music as something of a disaster.

Fahey was not a great master of guitar technique, and his abilities deteriorated with age and ill health. However, he had a remarkably broad range of guitar styles and sounds at his disposal, and made innovative use of recording technology. He used a remarkable variety of guitar tunings and was able to create atmospheric effects that have eluded other musicians. He found entirely new ways of extending the blues tradition, merging it with everything from the dissonances of modern classical music to Indian raga form. Moreover, some of his recordings of traditional and original blues compositions remain deeply moving and soulful. On balance, he was among the most important and interesting of the country blues revivalists for about a decade beginning in the mid-1960s.

Fahey’s master’s thesis on Charley Patton remains a milestone of blues scholarship. It was republished in book form, and more recently in the Patton boxed CD set Screamin’ and Hollerin’ the Blues. Fahey’s other writings, including notes to his own recordings, are as idiosyncratic and inconsistent as his music, vacillating between flashes of insight, displays of random erudition, and deliberately misleading hokum. Together with his recorded legacy, these writings constitute an important body of late twentieth-century folk art that is primitive without being naïve.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

Bibliography

Larkin
Fahey, John. Charley Patton. London: Studio Vista, 1970.

———. How Bluegrass Music Destroyed My Life. Chicago: Drag City Inc., 2000.

Selected Recordings

John Fahey/Blind Joe Death (1959); Death Chants, Break-downs, and Military Waltzes (1963); The Great San Bernardino Birthday Party (1966); Days Have Gone By (1967); Requia (1967); The New Possibility (1968); The Voice of the Turtle (1968); The Yellow Princess (1969); America (1971); Of Rivers and Religion (1972); After the Ball (1973); John Fahey Live in Tasmania (1981); Old Girlfriends and Other Horrible Memories (1992); City of Refuge (1998).

See also James, Nehemiah “Skip”; Patton, Charley; White, Bukka

FAIRFIELD FOUR

Formed in 1921, Nashville’s Fairfield Four became one of the most popular gospel quartets. The group hit their peak in the 1950s when group leader Reverend Sam McCrary recruited James Hill, “Preacher” Jones, and bass singer Isaac “Dickie” Freeman.

JIM THOMAS

Bibliography

Friskics-Warren, B. “Don’t Let Nobody Turn You Around” (interview with Isaac Freeman). No Depression no. 38 (March/April 2002): 86–92.

Discography: Gospel Records 1943–69

FAME

Rick Hall, with the assistance of Billy Sherrill and Tom Stafford, founded Fame (an acronym for Florence, Alabama, Music Enterprises) in 1959. Hall’s studio became the nexus of what was later dubbed the Muscle Shoals sound; their first hit was Arthur Alexander’s “You Better Move On” (Dot 16309) in 1962. The studio was primarily used by other record labels, especially Atlantic.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

Guralnick, Peter. Sweet Soul Music. New York: Harper & Row, 1986.

Discography: McGrath

FANTASY/PRESTIGE/BLUESVILLE/GALAXY/MILESTONE/RIVERSIDE RECORD COMPANIES

Fantasy Records grew from modest beginnings to acquire a string of the most important recording imprints in jazz and blues. The original label was established in 1949 by Max and Sol Weiss in Berkeley, California, in order to issue recordings by jazz pianist Dave Brubeck, who was also a partner in the venture. The pianist ended his partnership in 1955, and Saul Zaentz joined the company that same year as a salesman. He became President when he led a buy-out from the Weiss brothers in 1967.

Zaentz began the process of acquiring important jazz and blues recordings when Charles Mingus gifted him the Debut catalog as a wedding present in 1962 (Zaentz was about to marry Mingus's ex-wife, Celia). Galaxy was launched by the company in 1964 as a subsidiary label, but the really significant acquisitions came in the early 1970s. Buoyed by the commercial success of Creedence Clearwater Revival on the label, Fantasy took ownership of the catalogs of Bob Weinstock's Prestige (1971), including the important Bluesville catalog, described by Samuel Charters as "one of the last great sweeps of the blues as a social document"; Bill Grauer and Orrin Keepnews's Riverside (1972); and Keepnews's Milestone (1973). Keepnews was appointed to oversee the jazz productions in 1972, and Mike Kaffel succeeded Zaentz as President of the company in 1973. They instigated a massive reissue program of double vinyl LPs at single disc price ("two-fers"), mining the riches of the accumulated back catalogs, many of which Keepnews had produced at Riverside and Milestone.

The jazz reissue program was transferred to a new imprint, OJC (Original Jazz Classics), in 1983, reproducing straight reissues of original albums from the Riverside and Prestige archives. A companion label, OBC (Original Blues Classics), was launched to reissue the equally rich blues legacy on these labels, which recorded many—if not most—of the most important names in jazz and blues. Hundreds of albums have been reissued on both labels in the ensuing years in an ongoing program.

The Fantasy group continued to acquire labels, including Stax (1977), Contemporary (1984), Orrin Keepnews's Landmark (1985), Norman Granz's Pablo (1986), Specialty (1991), Takoma (1995), and Kicking Mule (1995).

KENNY MATHIESON

Further Reading

<http://www.fantasyjazz.com/html/about.html>.

FARR, DEITRA

b. 1 August 1957; Chicago, IL

Versatile singer of blues, soul, and popular music ballads. Was singing in local bands, including one with her uncle, by the mid-1970s. Earned a bachelor's degree in journalism at Columbia College, Chicago. Through the 1980s she was singing with pianist Erwin Helfer, and from 1993 through 1995 she was a featured vocalist for the band Mississippi Heat. She recorded her debut solo album, The Search Is Over, for JSP Records in 1997.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Khatchadourian, Sonia. "Deitra Farr: It's a Soul Thing."
Living Blues no. 133 (May/June 1997): 22–27.

FATTENING FROGS FOR SNAKES

On June 3, 1925, in New York City, during her last OKeh recording session, minstrel show veteran Virginia Liston recorded "I'm Sick of Fattening Frogs for Snakes." The expression "fattening frogs for snakes" predates Liston's record. Its use, in the African American folk vernacular, describes a situation in which someone provides goods or services to someone else and unintentionally benefits a third party—often referring to love relationships. Wolf interpreted it as "a proverbial expression of futility." In Sierra Leone, linguist Turner collected the similar proverb "fatten lizards for snakes" from Krio speakers, descended from freed American slaves.

Talley's 1922 collection of Middle Tennessee texts includes a song in which one man advises another not to give the speaker's girlfriend treats: "Quit yo' foolin', she hain't studyin' you! Youse jes fattenin' frogs fer snakes!" Other than its use of the proverb, this song has little relation to commercially recorded versions.

Liston described women seducing her man, "leeches" stealing her "peaches." Each verse documents her man's cheating, followed by "I'm sick of fattening frogs for snakes." Rosetta Crawford's 1939 Decca recording is a cover of Liston's.

"Fattening Frogs for Snakes," by Carrie Edwards (OKeh, 1932), was a new song. Edwards was less resigned to her fate than Liston, and in Columbia recording artist Clara Smith's cover, made a month later at her last recording date, Smith was not only "tired" but "angry" and "evil" and declared that it is not a "sin, for a woman to have two or three men."

Bumble Bee Slim (Amos Easton) was the first male to record "Fattenin' Frogs for Snakes" (1935, Vocalion). He portrayed a woman down on her luck (“no clothes,” “broke and hungry,” “out of doors”); he took up with her, she mistreated him. Easton introduced the chorus line “All these many years, baby, I’m just now seein’ my mistake,” which was incorporated into many later recordings. A string band, the Mobile Strugglers, cut a version of Easton’s “Frogs” for the fledgling American Music label in July 1949. Memphis Slim’s (Peter Chatman) “I See My Great Mistake” (1940, Bluebird) retains Easton’s chorus but with all new verses.

Three versions of Edgar Snead’s “I Ain’t Fattenin’ Frogs for Snakes” were recorded: the Ben Smith Quartet (Snead was a member) for Abbey (1949); the Larks’ doo-wop rendition (1951, Apollo); and Piano Red’s (Willie Perryman) barrelhouse piano performance (1954, released 1993, RCA).

Famed harp-blower/lyricist Sonny Boy Williamson (Aleck Miller) combined elements from Easton’s and Snead’s compositions to create his own distinctive statement in which he resolves to “correct all of my mistakes” (1957, Chess). Most subsequent recordings of “Frogs” are covers of Miller’s, including John Hammond (1982, Rounder), James “Blood” Ulmer (2001, Label M), and Patti Smith for the soundtrack of Amos Poe’s 1998 movie Frogs for Snakes.

Andre (Andrew “Blues Boy”) Odum’s 1967 Nation single, with B. B. King-style vocals and guitar, recounts his woman’s misdeeds, and Odum sounds, as in the women’s blues of earlier decades, resigned to his fate of fattening frogs for snakes.

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

- Prahlad, S. Anand. African American Proverbs in Context. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1996.
- Talley, Thomas W. Thomas W. Talley’s Negro Folk Rhymes. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1991.
- Turner, Lorenzo Dow. The Krio Language of Sierra Leone, West Africa. Volume I: An Anthology of Krio Folklore and Literature. Chicago: Roosevelt University, 1963.
- Wolfe, Charles K., ed. “Introduction.” In Thomas W. Talley’s Negro Folk Rhymes. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1991.

FEATURE

Owned by Jay D. Miller from 1951 to 1954 in Crowley, Louisiana. Fais-Do-Do was a subsidiary. Artists included Clarence Garlow, Lightnin’ Slim, Tabby Thomas, and Schoolboy Cleve White.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

FEDORA

From humble beginnings in 1993 as an outlet for a Fresno, California, blues fan’s recordings of local blues old-timers, Fedora by the turn of the twenty-first century was a fairly active operation dedicated to ferreting out and recording lesser-known, underrecorded authentic bluesmen. The label was founded by long-time Fresno resident Chris Millar (1952–), a drummer. Its second release, the West Fresno Blues masters, featured Hosea Leavy (brother of Calvin Leavy) and Harmonica Slim (Riley Riggins). That release led to gigs at Blues Estafette and other European blues festivals.

In 1997, Millar sold the label to Joe and Barney Field’s Jazz Depot of New York City, which also runs Highnote, successor to the Muse label. Millar serves as A&R man and session producer. In addition to recording artists from Fresno, central California, and San Francisco/Oakland, such as J. J. Malone, Filmore Slim, and Robert “Bilbo” Walker, Fedora has released CDs of Arkansas’ John Weston, Detroit’s Johnny Bassett, St. Louis’s Bennie Smith and Arthur Williams, New Orleans’ Jessie Thomas, Dallas’s Big Al Dupree, New York City’s Little Buster, Chicago’s Jimmy Dawkins and Homesick James, among others. Most Fedora releases have a down-home, juke-joint feel. In addition, the label released two albums of a techno-blues hybrid under the name Pig in a Can.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

- Bluestein, Evo. “California’s Blues Ambassador Chris Millar & the Blues West Review.” <http://lineonline.org/millar.html> (accessed January 14, 2005).
- Fedora label website, <http://www.jazzdepot.com/fedora.html> (accessed January 14, 2005).

Selected Recordings

- <http://www.jazzdepot.com/catalog/fedora.html> (accessed January 14, 2005).

FERGUSON, ROBERT “H-BOMB”

b. 1929; Charleston, SC

Aka “Cobra Kid.” Ferguson was raised in a religious family where it was forbidden to listen to the devil’s music. He began playing piano in his father’s storefront Baptist church when he was six and played at Sunday school; when alone, he started to shout the blues and to play boogie-woogie, influenced by radio programs and by Buddy Johnson’s band. When he was eighteen, he played professionally in Charleston's night clubs where he was discovered by Cat Anderson and encouraged to hit the road with jazz and/or R&B bands; he toured with Joe Liggins and his Honeydrippers, ending up in New York.

In 1950, he recorded for Derby, then for Atlas, Prestige, Chess (unissued), and Decca, but H-Bomb's biggest break came with Savoy Records in the mid-to late 1950s until rock 'n' roll hit his kind of R&B hard. He moved to Cincinnati and performed in nightclubs around the area until the mid-1960s, cutting a few sides for local labels (Finch, Big Bang, ARC, etc.) and appearing on shows with Hank Ballard, Fats Domino, Big Maybelle, Chuck Berry, and others, but in the early 1970s he was pushed into semi-retirement.

He made a comeback in the late 1970s, sporting his famous collection of wigs and jump suits, playing the piano and fronting his own band, recording new sides for the Radiation label and winning W. C. Handy Awards for a couple of songs in 1986 and 1989. He recorded again for Earwig Records in 1993 and toured Europe and festivals.

ROBERT SACRÉ

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin Pearson, Barry Lee. "'One Day You're Gonna Hear About Me': The H-Bomb Ferguson Story." Living Blues no. 69 (1986): 15–21, 24–26.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

Wiggin' Out (1993, Earwig 4926 CD).

FIDDLE

Technical Description

"Fiddle" is a generic term for bowed, stringed instruments played on the arm or shoulder. Because no bluesmen played violas, the term is synonymous with violin, and blues players referred to their instruments both as "fiddle" and "violin." Some musicologists, however, reserve the term "fiddle" for the violin played in folk contexts. The violin first appeared in Italy about 1530 as the soprano voice in a new family of stringed instruments. These differed from medieval European and Middle Eastern ancestors in that they had carved tops, fretless fingerboards, and four strings tuned in fifths. The violin is tuned G, D',

A', E'' though early blues fiddlers often tuned a whole tone lower than concert pitch.

The violin's construction has changed little since its invention. Sound boxes are about fourteen inches long, eight inches wide, and two inches deep. Two narrow sound holes ("F holes") flank a raised, thin bridge. Tops are composed of spruce or pine; ribs, backs, and necks of maple or birch. Strings were "cat gut" (sheep intestines) until the late 1800s. Metal strings were widely adopted in the twentieth century. Bows are constructed from a thirty-inch wood stick to which a ribbon of horse hair is attached. Rosin applied to the hair provides grip that causes the strings to vibrate. Prewar blues fiddlers played traditional acoustical violins, either mass produced or homemade copies. Electric violins introduced in the 1940s appealed to the players then active.

Adoption in Classical and Western European Folk Music, 1550–1900

In Ireland and Britain, as on the European Continent, violins either displaced older stringed instruments or were accepted as a new solo and ensemble voice. Classical and folk fiddling techniques in the 1600s and 1700s were similar because all players avoided higher positions and vibrato. The chin rest was not invented until the 1800s, so players tended to support their instruments with their hand and to hold them at the lower angle still favored by some fiddlers.

Distinct folk fiddling traditions evolved in different European communities. In most the fiddle occupied different roles, mimicking the human voice in song (slow airs) and providing driving rhythms for fast dances (jigs, reels, strathspeys, polkas). The instrument's portability and the itinerant nature of its players assured continuing cross-fertilization of traditions and styles. European immigrants imported both their instruments and their musical tastes. White settlers in the South brought both classical and Anglo-Irish folk fiddling traditions.

African Antecedents

Slaves also imported native instruments and musical traditions. Africa was home to a variety of bowed instruments. In West and Central Africa a goje, a one-stringed instrument with a hollow gourd body and round soundhole, was played with a short highly arched bow. (Tosh Hammond's brassy "one-string fiddle" with Butterbeans and Susie [1927] was probably unrelated.) The earlier survival of African instruments in America cannot be proven, but the construction of fiddles from gourd bodies by slaves may suggest the continuity of West African instrumental traditions, and the early use of a fiddle in Guadeloupe to collect money likewise suggests an instrument with a large sound hole, possibly revealing West African influences.

African earth bows have been identified as precursors of washtub basses, while musical mouth bows native to Mozambique have been suggested as the origin of similar instruments played by pockets of whites in the Appalachians and rural Arkansas.

African American Fiddle Traditions

Paul Oliver concludes that the “fiddle and the banjo were the most prominent of instruments used by the slaves and their immediate successors” (Savannah Syncopators, p. 25). Colonial sources document that slaves were accomplished fiddlers as early as the 1600s. Slaves fiddled for white dances and were permitted to fiddle for their own dances on Sundays and holidays. Instrumental combinations usually included one or more fiddlers, often accompanied by banjo and percussion. Fiddling provided a source of money that facilitated escape, and notices for fugitives frequently listed the ability to play well on the fiddle as a means of identification.

The musical content of African American fiddle playing in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries is unknown. Contemporaneous descriptions employed European musical terms. References to “Negro jigs” and “a Negro tune” might suggest distinctive African American elements (Epstein, pp. 121–124), but transcriptions of such Negro jigs do not preserve any unequivocal African characteristics. Kubik speculates nevertheless that slaves were familiar with African bowed instruments and thus learned the violin more easily, incorporating distinctive techniques into their fiddling that appealed to their non-African American audience.

Most slave fiddlers nevertheless played traditional instruments in conventional ways—though W. C. Handy recalled his fiddler grandfather’s description of a boy reaching over the fiddler’s left shoulder and drumming on the strings with knitting needles. Southern whites remarked repeatedly on the affinity of slaves for the fiddle. One wrote, “The supreme ambition of every negro is to procure a real violin” (quoted in Epstein, pp. 148–149). Strong interest in fiddle playing, often handed down from father to son, continued among African Americans in the rural South into the twentieth century. Because the fiddle was firmly associated with popular dancing and was not employed in church music, evangelical Christians began to denounce the instrument in the 1700s. Fiddlers were frequently featured in conversion stories, invariably abandoning the instrument upon receiving grace.

Prewar Blues

Dixon, Godrich, and Rye’s discography of pre-1943 blues and gospel recordings identifies sixty-eight fiddlers as principal artists or accompanists. Records preserve a variety of approaches firmly rooted in string band traditions. Typically a single fiddle with other instruments (most often including guitar) accompanied a vocalist. The fiddle either provided sustained obligato or mimicked the vocal line.

In contrast to many Anglo-American rural fiddlers, most blues fiddlers adopted a semi-classical posture, holding the instrument high on the shoulder and gripping the bow at the frog rather than over the hair. Right-hand technique employed heavy on-string bowing, limited string crossings, and bowed tremolo. Left-hand technique emphasized simple fingerings, slides into third and fifth positions, and few or no fingered ornaments such as trills and turns. The most distinct feature of blues fiddling was the free use of extremely broad vibrato produced by shifting (rather than merely rolling) the finger stopping the principal note. When preceded by ascending portamento, this anticipated the technique applied to Hawaiian guitars by blues players. While Oliver claims that this technique actually influenced blues guitarists (Savannah Syncopators), Palmer speculates that slide guitar technique evolved independently from African instruments as early as 1900 (Deep Blues, p. 46).

String Bands, Jug Bands, and Jazz

Blues comprised only part of the large repertoire of African American string bands in the 1920s. These bands often avoided blues for white and upper-class African American audiences. Some of the earliest recorded blues fiddling were Robert Robbins’s accompaniments to five Bessie Smith records (1924). Robbins played counterpoint and responses to Smith’s vocal line, producing a strong tone and displaying a mastery of the intonation, wide vibrato, and glissando that typified prewar blues fiddling.

Lonnie (Alonzo) Johnson (1889–1970) played fiddle in his father's New Orleans band before World War I where the repertoire was "strictly blues all the way on the violin" (in Oliver, Conversations with the Blues, pp. 78–79). Johnson moved with ease from blues to ragtime, and his fiddling singles from the same 1928 recording session were marketed under both race and hillbilly labels. His first recorded vocal-fiddle blues, "Falling Rain Blues" (1925), set the pattern for many others. The fiddle played an introduction, responded to vocals in early verses, and alternated solos on later verses. Double stop and tremolo interludes added variety. Johnson's recorded output also included a unique fiddle blues without vocal, "Five O'Clock Blues" (1926), and rare blues fiddle duets with his brother, James "Steady Roll" Johnson. Johnson eventually abandoned the fiddle for the guitar in the late 1920s, becoming a preeminent jazz guitarist for Bessie Smith, Duke Ellington, and Louis Armstrong.

The anonymous fiddler on the recordings of the Kansas City Blues Strummers (1926) provided countermelody and responses to the vocalist. Tom ("Bluecoat") Nelson, leader of a string band in Vicksburg, recorded several blues. On "Blue Coat Blues" (1928) he added a fiddled tag to his own vocal lines. Atlanta fiddler Eddie Anthony (d. 1934) performed and recorded with Peg Leg Howell and others in the late 1920s, moving effortlessly from ragtime to blues that incorporated intense slides and trills. Fiddler James Cole led his string band on up-tempo white rural dance numbers but could also wail blues as on "Window Pane Blues" (1932). The polished fiddling by Leroy Pickett in a duo with Cow Cow Davenport on "Stealin' Blues" (1934) suggests the hand of an accomplished studio accompanist, possibly with classical training. Pickett also accompanied Ma Rainey and Ivy Smith.

The Memphis Jug Band performed regularly at the Peabody Hotel, first with Milton Robie as fiddler, then with Charlie Pierce. On the band's last recordings (1934), Pierce's fiddle drives up-tempo dance tunes, with the jug adding a hokum touch. Will Batts, from Benton County in North Central Mississippi, fiddled regularly in the 1920s and 1930s, both with Jack Kelly's jug band in Memphis and with guitarist Frank Stokes. Recordings from 1929 and 1933 preserve the strident voice of his fiddle, while his simple fingerings and free tremolo suggest the influence of Delta fiddlers.

Tennessee fiddler Howard Armstrong ("Louie Bluie") first played with family string bands and then performed in Knoxville in the 1920s and 1930s with Ted Bogan and Carl Martin as the "Tennessee Chocolate Drops" and "The Four Keys." Dazzling pizzicato and melodic double stops reveal his origins as mandolin player. Armstrong preferred to play to white audiences "because they had the money"—with a repertoire ranging from Anglo fiddle tunes to Tin Pan Alley and vaudeville. His prewar bands recorded stomps and rags (1930, 1934) but not the blues that he reserved for "regular" (lower-class) African Americans. It was with a "low-down funky blues" that he defeated a New York fiddler in an impromptu contest.

String bands had adopted the Dixieland sound by the late 1920s. The fiddle sound of both Jess Ferguson with Whistler & His Jug Band (1927) and Clifford Hayes with the Dixieland Jug Blowers (1927) mimicked horns. Hayes crossed over to true jazz violin by 1929 when his Louisville Stompers recorded with formidable jazz pianist Earl Hines. The unknown fiddler with Peetie Wheatstraw and His Blue Blowers (1934) also adopted a brassy voice in jazzy exchanges with the trombone and clarinet.

Mississippi Delta Fiddling

A distinct style of blues fiddling evolved among a group of Mississippi Delta bluesmen. Lonnie Johnson was probably a common influence. The most commercially successful players to remain in the South were Lonnie Chatmon (d. 1942/1943) and his brother Bo Chatmon (var. Chatman and Carter) (1898–1964) from Bolton, Mississippi. From 1930 to 1935 Lonnie recorded with guitarist Walter Vincson (Jacobs) as the Mississippi Sheiks such hits as "Sitting on Top of the World" and "Stop and Listen." Bo recorded separately under his own name with Vinson (1928) and occasionally recorded and performed with the Mississippi Sheiks. The Sheiks were copied on four songs by the Alabama Sheiks (1931).

Henry ("Son") Sims (1890–1958) played with future blues guitar great Charlie Patton as early as 1910. Sims led string bands beginning in 1924 and recorded twelve sides as a duo with Patton in 1929–1930. Sims's sisters later recalled that he played without rosin, and his vigorous sawing produced some of the most "blistering" and "crude tonal qualities ever heard on a violin" (Wardlow, p. 13). On songs like "Tell Me Man Blues" (released under Sims's name), Patton's guitar backed up Sims's vocals and solo fiddling. Sims recorded blues with McKinley Morganfield (Muddy Waters) in 1941 and played regularly at the Riverside Hotel in Clarksdale through the late 1940s.

As a child William ("Big Bill") Broonzy played a crude homemade fiddle in hokum performances for white audiences in Mississippi and Arkansas.

After acquiring a violin, he developed a powerful tone with strong bowing and broad controlled vibrato. His fiddling was recorded in the early 1930s shortly after his move to Chicago. “Dad” Tracy from Memphis mastered the Delta sound, providing continuous countermelody to Joe Williams’s vocals and trading the limelight with Williams’s guitar on 1935 recordings.

African American and White Southern Fiddlers

With the rising popularity of blues, both African American violinists in Anglo American dance fiddling traditions and white country fiddlers adopted blues stylistic elements and added blues songs to their repertoire. Andrew Baxter, a Georgia fiddler with African American and American Indian ancestry, recorded Appalachian fiddle tunes and performed occasionally with white musicians in the 1920s. He recorded “Bamalong Blues” (1927) with his son Andrew on guitar. Kentucky African American Jim Booker (b. 1872) played and recorded with his Booker Orchestra but also recorded in 1927 with a white string band.

Georgia fiddler Fiddlin’ John Carson (1868–1949), a white mountain player in the Anglo-Irish tradition, recorded “John Henry Blues” in 1924 and later released two blues songs based on “Lonesome Road Blues.” Texas Swing fiddler Bob Wills (1905–1975) incorporated elements of African American music he heard in the 1920s into his fiddling. Bill Monroe (1911–1996), the father of bluegrass, accompanied legendary blues guitarist and fiddler Arnold Schultz (1886–1931) in the early 1920s and later acknowledged the influence of blues (Smith, pp. 23–33, 56).

Postwar Blues, Jazz, and Rock

The fiddle fell out of use among blues players beginning in the 1930s. Reasons included the soaring popularity of the guitar, which players like Lonnie Johnson and Broonzy adopted exclusively; the practice demands of the fiddle, which conflicted with the work life of most bluesmen during the Depression; and, perhaps, the association of the fiddle with older styles.

A few prewar fiddlers survived to benefit from the blues revival. Howard Armstrong reunited with Martin and Bogdan in 1970, performing for folk audiences and releasing successful LPs. The subject of a critically acclaimed documentary, “Louie Blueie” (1985), Armstrong received the N.E.A.’s National Heritage Award in 1990 and continued to tour into the twenty-first century. Claude (“Fiddler”) Williams (b. 1908, Muskogee, Oklahoma) played in string bands before moving to Kansas City where he began to play with prominent swing bands. He was the first guitarist to record with the Count Basie Band. He focused on swing violin after 1937, leading small groups for decades, and touring in Europe in the 1970s. In the 1980s Williams’s string band roots brought him to the national attention of folk audiences. He toured and recorded widely, performed at Clinton’s first inaugural, and won an N.E.A. National Heritage Award in 1998.

Other postwar players brought violin skills learned outside prewar fiddling traditions to tastes influenced by postwar jazz, electric, and urban blues. Jazz violin great Hezekiah Leroy Gordon “Stuff” Smith (1909–1967) studied classical violin before touring with jazz bands. His precise playing and restrained vibrato differed markedly from the technique of prewar blues players. Primarily a hot jazz violinist, Smith also occasionally performed and recorded fine blues such as “Old Stinkin’ Blues” (1965). Jazzman Remo Biondi (1905–1981) also studied classical violin as a child and played it as his first instrument, though his fame today rests on his guitar work for prominent mid-century big bands. Biondi fiddled restrained accompaniment on four songs blues recorded by Roosevelt Sykes in 1952.

John Creach took violin lessons as a child in Pennsylvania and studied classical violin in Chicago in the 1930s where he was attracted by urban jazz sounds. An early proponent of the electric violin, Creach moved to California during the war where his small jazz groups played a series of regular gigs for decades. Creach aspired to a thick horn-like sound, with note bending, trilling, accelerating vibrato, and slides up to high positions. Eddie “Cleanhead” Vinson observed, “He sounds more like a horn player than a violinist” (Setting the Record Straight video). In the late 1960s Creach was “discovered” by rock musicians, and from 1970 to his death he played and recorded regularly (under the moniker Papa John Creach) with the Jefferson Airplane and its spinoff rock groups. Fluent in a variety of genres, Creach also recorded straight-ahead blues with his own bands, notably on Papa Blues (1992).

Clarence “Gatemouth” Brown (born 1924 in Vinton, Louisiana, grew up in Texas), multi-instrumentalist and vocalist, recorded a few sides beginning in 1947 that laid a Texas swing fusion of blues, swing, and country—he claimed Bob Wills as an influence—over a driving rhythm that anticipated rhythm and blues. He later achieved commercial success, including a Grammy in 1982, mostly for vocals and guitar work.

Don (“Sugarcane”) Harris (1938–1999), classically trained violinist from Pasadena, recorded a series of R&B singles in the 1950s, most with Dewey Terry (as Don and Dewey). Harris toured with Little Richard in the 1960s before joining Frank Zappa in 1969. His electric rock fiddling is featured on several Zappa albums, including Hot Rats and Weasels Ripped My Flesh. In the 1980s and 1990s, Harris toured and recorded with English blues bandleader John Mayall, recorded with bluesmen Sonny Terry and Brownie McGee, and revived Don and Dewey.

Rock and R&B innovator Bo Diddley (Ellas McDaniel) studied classical violin for fourteen years. His electric violin, with soulful sliding, restrained vibrato, and pizzicato, is featured on “The Clock Struck 12” (1958). Best known for his distinctive guitar sound, which powerfully influenced early rockers, Bo Diddley explained, “The rhythm guitar sound that I started . . . I call the muted sound. I learned that from playing the classical violin. I taught myself to play it on the guitar, and now they call [the style] funk” (Bo Diddley booklet).

MICHAEL HOFFHEIMER

Bibliography

- DGR; Harris
 Boyden, David D. The History of Violin Playing from Its Origins to 1761 and Its Relationship to the Violin and Violin Music. London: Oxford University Press, 1965.
 Breathnach, Breandan. Folk Music and Dances of Ireland. Dublin: The Talbot Press, 1971.
 Broonzy, William Lee Conley. Big Bill Blues: William Broonzy's Story as Told to Yannick Bruynoghe. London: Cassell & Co. Ltd., 1955. The dates in this first edition were corrected in later printings but it contains an illustration by Paul Oliver of Broonzy playing a cigar box fiddle.
 Diddley, Bo. “Bo Diddley on Bo Diddley.” Booklet accompanying Bo Diddley (Chess Box CH3-19502).
 Epstein, Dena J. Sinful Tunes and Spirituals: Black Folk Music to the Civil War. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.
 Handy, W. C. Father of the Blues: An Autobiography. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1947.
 Kubik, Gerhard. Africa and the Blues. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999.
 Lieberman, Julie Lyonn. Rockin' Out with Blues Fiddle, 4th ed. New York: Huiksi Music, 2000.
 Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Pantheon Books, 1993.
 Nelson, Sheila M. The Violin and Viola. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1972.
 Oliver, Paul. Conversations with the Blues. New York: Horizon Press, 1965.

- . Savannah Syncopators: African Retentions in the Blues. New York: Stein and Day, 1970.
 ———. The Story of the Blues. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1997.
 Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Penguin Books, 1982.
 Sandys, William, and Simon Andrew Forster. The History of the Violin, and Other Instruments Played on with the Bow from the Remotest Times to the Present. London: William Reeves, 1864.
 Smith, Richard D. Can't You Hear Me Callin': The Life of Bill Monroe, Father of Bluegrass. Boston: Little, Brown and Company, 2000.
The New Grove Violin Family. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1989.
 Wardlow, Gayle Dean. “Henry ‘Son’ Sims: ‘Farrell Blues Mama, Sho’ Don’t Worry Me.” 78 Quarterly 1 no. 9 (n.d.): 11–16.
 Wiggins, Gene. Fiddlin’ Georgia Crazy: Fiddlin’ John Carson, His Real World, and the World of His Songs. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.
 Zwigoff, Terry. “Louie Bluié: The Life and Music of William Howard Armstrong, as told to Terry Zwigoff.” 78 Quarterly 1, no. 5 (1989): 41–55; 78 Quarterly 1, no. 6 (1990): 43–50.

Filmography

- Louie Bluié*. Director Terry Zwigoff. Pacific Arts Video, 1985.
Papa John Creach: Setting the Record Straight. Director Severson J. Palfi. 1987.

Selected Recordings

- Bessie Smith: The Complete Recordings, Vols. 1–2* (Columbia Legacy C2K 47091).
Big Bill Broonzy: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order (1927–1947), Vol. 3 (1934–1935, DOCD-5052).
Black Fiddlers: The Remaining Titles of Andrew and Jim Baxter, Nathan Frazier and Frank Patterson (1929–c. 1970) (DOCD-5631).
Bo Carter Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order 1928–40 (DOCD 5078-5082; 5 vols.).
Butterbeans and Susie Complete Recorded Works, Vol. 2 (1926–27) (DOCD 5545, featuring one-string fiddle playing of Tosh Hammond on two numbers).
Carl Martin/Willie “61” Blackwell (DOCD-5229).
Charlie Patton: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vols. 2 & 3 (DOCD-5010, DOCD-5011).
Claude “Fiddler” Williams: Swingin’ the Blues (2000, Rounder BYEY 9627).
Fiddlin’ John Carson: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order (DOCD-8014 to DOCD-8020; 7 vols.).
“Folks, He Sure Do Pull Some Bow!”: Vintage Fiddle Music 1927–1933 (2001, Old Hat CD-1003).
Frank Zappa: Weasels Ripped My Flesh (1970, featuring Don “Sugarcane” Harris). (Bizzare Reprise MS 2028)
Go Bo Diddley (Chess LP CH-9196).
Lonnie Johnson: Complete Recorded Works, Vol. 1 (DOCD-5063).
Mississippi Sheiks: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order (DOCD-5083 to DOCD-5086, 4 vols.).
Mississippi Sheiks: Stop and Listen (Yazoo 2006).

FIDDLE

Muddy Waters: First Recording Sessions 1941–46 in Chronological Order (DOCD 5146).

Papa John Creach: Papa Blues (1994, One Way CD 34511).

Peg Leg Howell and Eddie Anthony: Complete Recorded Works (MBCD 2004 and 2005; 2 vols.).

Roosevelt Sykes Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vol. 10 (1951–57) (BDCD 6050; Remo Biondi fiddle accompaniment).

Sonny & Brownie (1990; with Don “Sugarcane” Harris).
String Bands 1926–1929 (DOCD-5167).

Tommy Bradley–James Cole Groups: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order (1928–32) (DOCD-5189).

Violin, Sing the Blues for Me: African American Fiddlers 1926–1949 (1999, Old Hat CD-1002).

FIELD HOLLERS

Among the various styles that predated the emergence of blues music, field hollers are considered a major influence, and probably the most obvious link between African traditions and the blues. Originating from the primary functions of gathering animals, calling workmates, or sending information, they turned into a distinctive type of singing that was still remembered in several parts of the southern states until the second half of the twentieth century. Unlike other work songs, they were not intended to support physical effort by steady rhythm or emphasized vocalization; they were just a way to keep in touch with distant fellow workers or introduce some entertainment, during repetitive tasks or after hours.

Definition

Hollers or “whoops” do not belong to any particular community or place, and their usage is often associated with singing. A number of “field cries” have been introduced into various songs that are part of the huge pre-blues heritage collected from songsters like Leadbelly, among which many ballads, work songs, or religious tunes can be identified. But field hollers or “arwhoolies” involved hollering in the very act of singing. They were freely improvised songs, performed by field hands in scattered farming areas, in Texas or Alabama, as well as in the Mississippi Delta, which did not include any large plantations before slavery was abolished.

Although solitary singing can lead to a variety of patterns beyond description, the category of hollers that is referred to as a main inspiration for the blues obeyed some unwritten rules. They could be heard in several working places, among which were not only fields but also levee camps and penitentiaries.

They were never commercially recorded as such, but most of their features can be recognized in deliberate imitations like Texas Alexander’s “Levee Camp Moan” and “Section Gang” blues (1927) with Lonnie Johnson providing a modal, nonrhythmic, single-string accompaniment.

Description

A field holler is a succession of verses interrupted by silence or actual cries, shouts, calls, or comments, sung on a definite range of notes by a single performer. Each verse includes a single sentence, or two sentences related to each other, in which the singer chooses to emphasize several syllables, suggesting complex and irregular rhythmic patterns. Each line is a continuous melodic improvisation with several strong high-pitched accents, always ending on the tonic.

The most basic field hollers consist of one-line verses relying on the three degrees of a major chord, with a random number of accented notes, but the predominant structure is a two-line verse, a feature later found in the recordings of such blues singers as Texas Alexander, Jaybird Coleman, and William Harris, and one that is still traceable in early blues songs that exactly repeat the first line, only introducing some brief modal change at the beginning of the third line.

Most of the examples collected by Alan Lomax in different “state farms,” which still maintained labor conditions close to slavery in 1939 and ten years later, present a fairly regular pattern: a long yelled note, always the highest degree of the range, either initial or preceded by a short rising scale, echoed by a second, weaker accentuation, which divides the first line into two groups of syllables. The process is repeated in the second line with a different arrangement of lower notes, sometimes just one octave below, mostly ending with a typical modulation.

Field Hollers and Early Blues

The predominance of the major mode and the frequent use of the fourth degree of the scale as a linking note are among the main differences between field hollers and blues. The minor seventh, reputed to be of possible African heritage, is among the main emphasized notes together with the fifth and octave. Some hollers take a minor third as the peak note, introducing the same modal complexity as collective work songs.

As in many early country blues, each verse deals with a different subject, and their indefinite number accounts for the appellation “over-and-over,” which was also applied to these songs. French writer Gérard Herzhaft suggested that the practice of “catching verses in the air” may have been inherited from the traditions of the Creeks, Cherokees, or Choctaws who were the first inhabitants of Arkansas and the Mississippi Delta.

Themes do not differ much from blues themes and include personal relationships, travel, or home, with perhaps a marked insistence on nature or weather conditions. The late collection of these songs makes any assertion about lyrics problematic, but their reputation as early songs of protest is based on frequent references to the foreman or employer, as the “Captain” or “Mr. Charlie.” Proverb-like verses, division of the sentence into a “theme and response” scheme, as well as the constant use of the first person, relate them to a tradition of personal songs that predated the recording of blues and folk music.

Many blues titles were reminiscent of hollers until the end of the 1930s, and in spite of the successful “blues” form, which implied instrumental accompaniment, rhyming lines, and ballad-like structures, the vocals in several early country blues songs like Garfield Aker’s “Cottonfield Blues” obviously derived from them.

The African Heritage

Whether field hollers directly borrowed some of their features from African traditions or were mere adaptations of other traceable sources is as questionable as the origins of African American music as a whole. Unaccompanied singing or personal songs are by no means typical of African music, but some examples of praise songs by West African griots are based on similar patterns, with an initial shout forced to the higher limit of the voice, gradually decreasing in a long breathtaking melodic line. Whereas most forms of social music performed by Africans are closely associated with dancing, the loose tempo of field hollers suggests a quite motionless attitude, and yet their complex and irregular accentuations are reminiscent of polyrhythmic features.

The modal character of field hollers, the simplified scales that allow such embellishments as bends and melisma, and the various voice effects like falsetto singing belong to a traditional approach to music that must have been constantly fed back by the arrival of new slaves and the dispatching and mixing of populations, until the trade and slavery itself were abolished.

These retentions resulted in different musical styles that were often clear adaptations of some European structures. But field hollers, emerging from the hardest living conditions, were the assertion of an original style that was neither related to other musical forms like songs and ballads, nor commanded by any precise function as were work songs, religious songs, or dance music. They are the most identifiable type of secular, individual singing possibly heard at the turn of the century by musicians, composers, or vaudeville singers before the recording industry popularized blues music.

PATRICE CHAMPAROU

Bibliography

- Herzhaft
 Jackson, Bruce. Wake Up Dead Man: Afro American Work-songs from Texas Prisons. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1972.
 Southern, Eileen. “Afro-American Musical Materials.” The Black Perspective in Music 1, no. 1 (Spring 1973): 24–32.

FIELDS, BOBBY

- b. Robert Lee Fields, Jr., 11 September 1928; Chicago, IL
 d. 6 January 1981; Chicago, IL

Tenor saxophonist active in Chicago in the 1950s and 1960s. Toured and recorded with Buddy Guy, Ike Turner, and A. C. Reed, along with additional sessions with Sun Records and Modern/RPM in 1952–1954. In his last years, he worked as a security guard. Not to be confused with Bobby Marchan, who recorded as Bobby Fields for Ace Records in 1956.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- O’Neal, Jim. “Bobby Fields” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 50 (Spring 1981): 45.

FIELDS, KANSAS

- b. Carl Donnell Fields, 5 December 1915; Chapman, KS
 d. 7 March (also reported as 3 August), 1995; Chicago, IL

Drummer. Fields began playing in his teens in Chicago, later in New York. He worked with Ella

FIELDS, KANSAS

Fitzgerald, Eddie Condon, Cab Calloway, Willie “The Lion” Smith, Dizzy Gillespie, Mezz Mezzrow, and others. He was in Europe during 1953–1964, then returned to Chicago. His last recording was with Floyd McDaniels’s Blues Swingers in 1994.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- Leblanc, Eric. “Kansas Fields.” Blues and Rhythm no. 105 (Christmas 1995): 22.
Rusch, Bob. “Kansas Fields: Interview.” Cadence xii, no. 3 (1986).

FIELDSTONES

A Memphis electric blues band of the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s, with guitarist Will Roy Sanders and drummer Joe Hicks, performing renditions of prewar Mississippi blues and 1960s Memphis soul hits. They recorded an album for High Water label produced by David Evans.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger); Herzhaft; Larkin

Discography: AMG

FIFE AND DRUMS

History

The African American fife and drum tradition is one style of pre-blues music that has stubbornly remained alive into the twenty-first century. Because the institution of slavery in the United States as a rule outlawed the playing of any drums out of fear that they would be used to secretly communicate rebellion it was commonly believed that rural black drumming could not exist. Still, nineteenth-century accounts, including the WPA slave narratives, make mention of fife and drums being played by blacks. Speculation centers on the black musicians recruited for the Civil War or the army surplus instruments readily available after the war, but there are no definite answers on the real genesis of the music. What is clear is that musicians who were born during Reconstruction and its aftermath (1865–1895) were playing this style of music in a wide range of rural southern locales, including Mississippi, Georgia, Tennessee, and Virginia.

The Instruments

The music combines sources of early American military fife and drum music with strong African influence to create a truly unique sound. The combination of snares and bass drums is used in northern white fife and drum groups but the wooden fifes are replaced with cane fifes in the black groups. Most fife players make their own fifes from local cane. A hot iron poker is used to burn a blow hole and six holes for fingering.

Othar Turner, fife player and leader of the Rising Star Fife and Drum Band until his death in 2003 at the age of ninety-four, was particularly well known for the volume and the in-tune quality of his fifes. Although the fife is limited to its six notes, players make the swoops, slides, and bends of blues harpists by overblowing and false fingerings. They also use their voices to fill in between pitches at times, making whoops and yells in a manner also similar to the country harpists. Fife player Sid Hemphill (b. 1876; d. 1963) also played the quills or pan pipes, employing the same whooping technique on both instruments.

Earlier ensembles like Hemphill’s used rope snares common in military marching bands and large, old-fashioned bass parade drums. These gave a large booming sound, perfect for the outdoor dance music developed in a time prior to amplification. More recently these antiques have been replaced by wire snares and bass drums from commercial drum kits giving a crisper sound but still plenty of volume. The dancing to fife and drum is often a solo style and while the other participants watch, their hand-claps add another layer of rhythm to the mix. Turner used the term “kettles” to describe the snare drums. In most bands there are two kettles: the smaller and higher pitched one is called the “lead kettle” and the larger and lower pitched one is referred to as the “bass kettle.” Essentially the two snare drums are tuned an octave apart to clearly delineate them. Drums are tightened by holding them over a fire until the heads shrink. The drummers hold their instruments via straps and the snares are played with drumsticks and the bass with a mallet. Because of their mobility the ensemble can interact and move with the dancers in a way that echoes dance aesthetics found in West Africa.

Sid Hemphill

Folklorist Alan Lomax heard about Sid Hemphill's ensemble while collecting music in the Mississippi Delta in 1942. He finally caught up with Hemphill in the hill country of northeast Mississippi and recorded the group as both a string band and as a fife and drum (or quill and drum) ensemble. Hemphill was born near Como, Mississippi, in 1876 into a musical family and was proficient on nine instruments. He and his fellow musicians (Alec Askew, Lucius Smith, and Will Head) performed for both white and black audiences. They recorded examples using both the fife and a set of quills for the melody instrument. The fife lead pieces seem to come from the repertoire that they may have played for whites, including a march and a nineteenth-century popular tune titled "The Sidewalks of New York." The pieces that use quills either played by Hemphill or Askew are much more polyphonic and syncopated tunes, implying that they were reserved for when they played for black audiences.

Ed Young

In 1959 Lomax returned to the Mississippi Delta area on a trip funded by Atlantic Records. This time he recorded brothers Ed (b. 1908; d. 1974) and Lonnie Young with Lonnie Young Jr. This group was extremely polyrhythmic, sounding more African than almost anything Lomax had recorded anywhere in the South. Although this group only included a single snare played by Lonnie's son, Lonnie Jr., the real rhythm was the interplay between the fife and the bass drum. "Jim and John," "Oree," and "Chevrolet" were made on Lomax's state-of-the-art stereo recorder and later released by Atlantic as part of the Southern Folk Heritage Series. This made them the first fife and drum band to have commercial published recordings. Through Lomax's influence they were also the first ensemble to perform outside a folk festival, appearing at the Newport Folk Festival in the early 1960s.

Napoleon Strickland

Blues researcher George Mitchell came to the same area in 1968 where he found Napoleon Strickland and Othar Turner actively continuing the tradition. Mitchell's research resulted in the book Blow My Blues Away and devotes chapters to Othar Turner, the traditional picnics, and Jesse Mae Hill, Sid Hemphill's granddaughter. Although Turner was older, it was Strickland (b. 1924; d. 2001) who initially took the music beyond the hill country. He had been introduced to the fife by his father, but learned to make fifes from Turner. His energetic playing and singing in performances at blues and folk festivals in the 1960s and 1970s brought the music to a wider audience.

David Evans

Folklorist David Evans conducted research in Mississippi and in Waverly Hall, Georgia, where Mitchell had found another fife drum tradition still very much alive. The Georgia group was also a family band made up of brothers: J. W. Jones, James Jones, and Willie C. Jones. Although other ensembles were thought to exist in the area, only the recordings of the Jones family seem to have been made. "Old Hen Cackled, Laid a Double Egg" is as good as any of the recordings of the northern Mississippi style. The fruits of Evans research work can be found in his article "Black Fife and Drum Music in Mississippi" and in the recordings Traveling Through the Jungle: Negro Fife and Drum Band Music from the Deep South and Afro-American Folk Music from Tate and Panola Counties, Mississippi that brings together most of the important recordings of fife and drum music with the exception of the Young family band.

Othar Turner

By the early 1980s Como, Mississippi, felt strong enough about the positive impact of the success of Strickland to actually have an official "Napoleon Strickland Day." His career was cut short in the mid-1980s when he was injured in a car crash that forced him to retire. Ironically, it was Othar Turner (b. 1908; d. 2003), from the small community of Gravel Springs, near the towns of Como and Senatobia, twenty years his senior who shepherded tradition into the twenty-first century. He was a farmer who spent most of his life in the same local area. He learned fife from his neighbors as a child and learned the repertoire at picnics in the area. He performed with both Hemphill and Strickland and eventually with his own group called the Rising Star Fife and Drum Band, which was made up mainly of family members.

Turner began the tradition of a Labor Day picnic on his farm that served roasted freshly butchered goat and ended with a dance to the music of the Rising Star Fife and Drum band. This event progressed from a family event to a local gathering, to finally beckoning music fans from all over the world. In 1998 a full-length CD of his fife and drum music was released through the influence of Luther Dickinson, the guitarist for the North Mississippi All Stars. Everybody Hollerin' Goat is the first full-length CD devoted to a fife and drum ensemble. Whether this tradition will fade away or not will be determined by the musicians Turner trained and left behind. At the lead of his funeral in 2003 was his granddaughter Sharde Thomas who he had taught to play fife.

Othar Turner playing the fife at the King Biscuit Blues Festival in Helena, Arkansas, October 2001. Until his death in 2003, Turner continued to host annual fife-and-drum picnics on his small farm in Tate County, Mississippi. (Photo by Gene Tomko)

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

Evans, David. "Black Fife and Drum Music in Mississippi." In Afro-American Folk Art and Craft, edited by William Ferris, pp. 163–171. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1983.

Ferris, William. "Othar Turner: Cane Fife Maker." In Afro-American Folk Art and Craft, edited by William Ferris, pp. 173–180. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1983.

Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Dell Publishing, 1993.

Mitchell, George. Blow My Blues Away. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1971.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Sounds of the South (1993, Atlantic).

Othar Turner and the Rising Star Fife and Drum Band. Everybody Hollerin' Goat (1998, Birdman BMR 018).

Traveling Through the Jungle: Negro Fife and Drum Band Music from the Deep South (1995, Testament Records TCD-5017).

Afro-American Folk Music from Tate and Panola Counties, Mississippi (2000, Rounder Records 18964-1515-2).

See also Evans, David; Hemphill, Jesse Mae; Hemphill, Sid; Lomax, Alan; Smith, Lucius

FILMS

When moving film first appeared in 1898 it captured the public imagination as quickly and surely as recorded sound had done. Film, however, was at first a silent medium; when shown in theaters, it was accompanied not by a soundtrack but, often, by a house pianist, sometimes an orchestra, or occasionally some simple sound effects produced in-house. From the outset, experiments had been conducted to marry it to recorded sound, but the major problem was always synchronization. It took two separate operators and technologies to achieve any effect, the results being frequently clumsy and unconvincing. Furthermore, no one could devise a method that would last more than four minutes, the maximum length of a sound recording available at that time. Clearly, what was required was an integrated system.

Seeing the need, and sensing huge profits if it could be met, several companies began developing processes in the hopes that they would be the first to overcome the technical restrictions of the period. Current research indicates that an American named Lee DeForest was first, in 1923. His Phonofilm system “heard” sound as light waves, imprinting them on an integrated strip running alongside the film in the camera. Despite the technical successes he achieved, his determination to remain independent limited the growth of his invention.

DeForest’s system was, however, almost certainly the one used by the linguist and folklorist Dr. Milton Metfessell in 1926 when he conducted the experiment he termed “phonophography,” a study of African Americans in North Carolina. He made more than twenty-five short films of people singing, talking, laughing, and playing instruments. He filmed spirituals, popular songs, and a few blues, and was almost certainly the first person to do so. His research, published in the book Phonophography in Folk Music in 1928, and the film he shot presumably resides in the archives of the University of North Carolina.

In the meantime both the Western-Electric and Vitaphone companies were developing competing systems. Western-Electric opted for a synchronized disk operation that proved too bulky for most producers and directors. Vitaphone, however, had followed the same path as DeForest and in August 1926 successfully demonstrated its invention publicly in New York. By the following year the Fox Company had perfected “Fox-Movietone,” a system again based on integrated sound pressed onto the film, and sent their camera crews across America and the world with orders to bring back slices of real life for the fledgling newsreel industry. With no rules and a new medium to experiment in, the crews set out enthusiastically, returning with a wide range of human endeavor that included some African American spirituals, as well as secular track lining, chain gang and other work songs, and footage of the 1928 New Orleans Mardi Gras. This was the first time commercial film had pointed its lens at African American song.

Later that same year the major film companies sat down to agree on one standard system that would allow maximum flexibility and eliminate the incompatibility that competing systems would cause. Because Western-Electric had by now developed its own sound-on-film technology, and was able to offer the most favorable terms, the five dominant American companies agreed to adopt that system.

Despite the instant and enormous success of “talking pictures,” as they quickly became known, the major companies routinely ignored the blues, in almost all its forms. Columbia produced Mamie Smith’s 1929 short The Jailhouse Blues but remained unique in doing so. It fell to small independent companies to produce the well-known, if flawed, St. Louis Blues featuring Bessie Smith and the less-known Dark Town Scandals Review showcasing Sara Martin. Fox Movietone filmed Whistler’s Jug Band in 1930, providing us with the first—and almost last—glimpse of a real jug band, yet that footage remained unused at the time and has only survived through benign neglect. It has now been magnificently restored by film specialist Sherwin Dunner and is available on Yazoo Video/DVD 512.

Throughout the first half of the 1930s the film industry’s attention to anything remotely approaching blues remained, at best, sporadic. Trixie Smith in 1932, Lucky Millinder in 1933, two unidentified singers in a Ruth Etting short that same year, and Alberta Hunter and Alberta Perkins the following year are all that can now be recovered. Then, astonishingly, Leadbelly appeared for the “March of Time” series in 1935, although the result, like that for Bessie Smith, was both patronizing and distasteful. The songs he performed, truncated versions of “Goodnight Irene,” are good enough, but the dialogue between Leadbelly and John Lomax is well beyond the realms of good taste. An excellent unused outtake appears along with all the other Leadbelly film on Vestapol Video/DVD 13016, and there is still raw footage extant that has not been used.

The 1930s continued with only Mamie Smith and Trixie Smith appearing in 1938. As global war loomed, the situation remained largely unaltered; 1941’s Boogie Woogie Dream, featuring Albert Ammons and Pete Johnson in fine form, was a glorious exception and remains one of the finest pieces of blues-oriented music on film. Yet again, while the performance itself is superb, the contextual material surrounding it in the full film remains patronizing. The 1941 film The Blood of Jesus featured a short scene in a juke joint that, extraordinarily, employed Black Ace performing a specially recorded version of “Golden Slipper,” a tune he did not record again until 1960. Disappointingly, he is heard only briefly and not seen at all.

The first serious attempt at presenting African American music to its own audience occurred with the endeavors of the “Soundies” corporation. Between 1941 and 1946 the company produced a wide range of three-minute musical shorts, including pop, swing, country, humor, and jazz. Designed to be viewed in visual juke boxes played in public places, a selection of film loops was loaded onto the machine and projected through a screen-style viewer, the machine resembling nothing so much as an early console-model television. Truly the ancestor of the music video industry, the company filmed Louis Jordan, Bull Moose Jackson, Meade Lux Lewis, Rosetta Tharpe, Anisteen Allen, Roy Milton, Deryck Sampson, Trevor Bacon, and many others, providing today’s fans with a good selection of emerging R&B. This is now regarded as especially important since the company was active during the time of the Musicians Union’s ban on studio recording. The legacy provided by these short films is therefore one of the few tangible links between pre- and postwar black music that we have available to us now.

The “March of Time” series filmed Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry very briefly for a documentary on the Library of Congress in 1945, and Louis Jordan’s career in independent film produced a number of feature-length movies between 1946 and 1949 that featured great music and appalling plots. The best musical moments from these are available on BMG Video/DVD 80008. For the decade from the mid-1940s the attention afforded any form of blues remained very spotty. A few independent films appeared, aimed at the African American movie circuit; Boarding House Blues with Bull Moose Jackson, Burlesque in Harlem with JoJo Adams, the obscure but excellent Dick Barrow in Killer Diller, and a few others made the rounds but had no impact outside of the then-segregated African American film industry. Beyond that, only two appearances in movies by Josh White, Roosevelt “Booba” Barnes playing harmonica in Elia Kazan’s Baby Doll and a CBS television episode of “Odyssey” including Horace Sprott, are all that can be usefully gleaned from the period. Papa Lightfoot is reported to have appeared in a film entitled Spooky Loot but current research indicates no surviving copies.

It was the advent of rock ‘n’ roll that focused wider attention on African American music in any meaningful way. In the vanguard was a 1955 series variously titled “Showtime at the Apollo,” “Harlem Hit Parade,” or “Rock and Roll Review” that recut and repackaged a series of musical shorts filmed on stage at the Apollo Theater in New York. With no plot, simply linked by bandleader Willie Bryant, Joe Turner, Amos Milburn, the Clovers, Larry Darnell, Dinah Washington, and other R&B-oriented artists appeared in conjunction with jazz artists, dancers, and comedians. Backed by the Paul Williams orchestra, these performances hold up well today and, most importantly—notwithstanding a lack of an audience—were filmed “live,” rather than dubbed or mimed. Permutations of this material were broadcast on TV and shown in movie theaters nationwide. A video containing most of the best R&B is available on Storyville.

The huge and instant success of all forms of rock ‘n’ roll from 1955 onward spurred the making of a number of cheap, quickly turned out exploitation movies. Rock Around the Clock, Go Johnny Go, Rock Rock Rock, Rock Baby Rock It, The Big Beat, The Girl Can’t Help It, and Mister Rock & Roll all featured a variety of artists, white and black, who performed a wide catalog of songs that fell within the rock canon. Among the featured artists were Joe Turner, Chuck Berry, Little Richard, Roscoe Gordon, Fats Domino, the obscure but very worthy Preacher Smith and the Deacons and, casting the blues net more broadly, the Flamingos, the Moonglows, and Jackie Wilson. Most can be found on commercial videos. Production values are sausage-machine at best, the plots are generally trite, and the music is almost always mimed, but collectively they now form a document of some value. An extraordinary exception was the film Rockin’ the Blues, featuring Faye Adams, Reese LaRue, Pearl Woods, and others, inhabiting the same genre, sharing the same production values, but unique in that it was aimed at African American audiences. All of this endeavor was little enough when one considers what could have been achieved, but it pointed the way toward a higher profile for black popular music in the United States in general, and would spark a deeper involvement in documenting the blues.

In the meantime, Big Bill Broonzy had appeared in the film short Big Bill Blues in France in 1956. Seen often, but never in synch, it suffers from a certain pretentiousness on the part of the filmmaker but is still a valuable document. However, Broonzy’s later appearance on film, back in the United States, is of far greater value to us today. During this time frame Pete Seeger, working alone with a second-hand sound camera, had filmed Sonny Terry, J. C. Burris, a Cajun festival, a number of white folk artists, and also Big Bill in what became almost his final recorded performance. Although amateur, the film displays a man still at the apex of his art, effortlessly pulling chords from his guitar that others might only dream of. His magnificent "Guitar Boogie," although incomplete, as Seeger's film stock ran out partway through, is perhaps one of the few truly classic blues performances on film. Both Broonzy films are available on Yazoo Video/DVD 518 and almost all of Seeger's films are available on one Vestapol video, 13042. During this same period Seeger also set about restoring the long-ignored 1948 color footage of Leadbelly. His efforts, and those of his ilk, would fuel the next major turn of events, leading to a far greater profile for blues on celluloid than ever before.

By 1959, with the initial wave of rock 'n' roll abating, giving way to some extent to the "folk boom" that emerged in the late 1950s, the first serious widespread attempts at preserving traditional American music began to take shape. As the interest in all forms of American folk music gained ground, thanks to pioneering efforts by the likes of Chris Strachwitz and Sam Charters, the continued work of Alan Lomax and others, the blues began to receive its first serious attention from filmmakers. The 1960 Newport Festival was filmed by the United States Information Service, including wonderful performances by Muddy Waters, John Lee Hooker, Butch Cage & Willie Thomas, and Jimmy Rushing. In 1962 Sam Charters produced his film The Blues, a twenty-minute color short that has never been seen in synch but contains useful footage of Sleepy John Estes, Baby Tate, and J. D. Short, among others.

It fell to the German filmmaker Dietrich Wawzyn to undertake perhaps the first successful documentary about the blues. At the invitation of German SudWestFunk TV he spent the spring and early summer of 1963 traveling from California through Arizona and Texas to Louisiana. With a young Chris Strachwitz as soundman, Wawzyn filmed Lightnin' Hopkins, Mance Lipscomb, Whistling Alex Moore, Blind James Campbell, Black Ace, Willie Thomas, Lowell Fulson, and others for a German TV documentary entitled Die Blues. Shown once in 1963 and long inaccessible, all of Wawzyn's classic footage is now available on Yazoo Video 520.

The indefatigable Alan Lomax, in a heroic gesture that lay fallow for years, took two professional movie cameras and a sound crew to the Newport Folk Festival in Rhode Island in 1966. With a carte blanche from the organizers, he filmed artists both onstage and off, going so far as to construct a facsimile juke joint, stocked with nonfacsimile alcohol, to allow blues artists to perform with less inhibition. His efforts paid magnificent dividends; he filmed Son House, Bukka White, Skip James, Howlin' Wolf and his band, Ed & Lonnie Young's fife and drum band, and many other non-blues artists, amassing a superb archive of American folk music that simply sat on shelves for years, known by only a few and seen by fewer. Now restored and reedited, the best of it can be had on Vestapol DVD/Videos 13049 and 13050. The performances by Ed & Lonnie Young are almost certainly the very finest examples of traditional North Mississippi fife & drum playing ever made; the sets by Son House and Bukka White rank among the best on film, and the Skip James songs, the only ones currently available to the public, are superb. That said, perhaps the most stunning music to emerge from this summer session is the Howlin' Wolf set; to see Wolf play slide guitar and harmonica in the company of his regular band, in a loose, relaxed atmosphere, is to experience a truly great performance and one of the most satisfying of any visual images of the genre.

In 1967 a young filmmaker named Les Blank visited Houston and came away with a documentary that still remains an unassailable classic. The Blues According to Lightnin' Hopkins, also featuring Mance Lipscomb, Ruth Ames, and Billy Bizer, is one of the single best films ever made about the subject. Blank's subsequent film career has included A Well Spent Life, Always for Pleasure, and other films about aspects of American folk music and life and are all currently available on video through Blank's company Flower Films.

The same year guitarist Mike Stewart and others undertook a tour of the South that netted some interesting performances by Gus Cannon, Dewey Corley, Johnny Shines, Hacksaw Harney, Honeyboy Edwards, and others, the best of which can be seen on several Vestapol videos, the balance of which, including Muddy Waters, Johnny Young, and Willie Mabon at the Chicago Blues Festival, remain unused.

Elsewhere filmmaker John Ulman was quietly obtaining funding for his "Masters of American Traditional Music" project. Working within the walls of the University of Seattle, he was able to film and videotape a wide variety of visiting performers using both the university's closed-circuit TV system for monochrome and a single film camera for color. Over a three-year period, from 1967 to 1970, he managed to capture in-depth performances of great quality by Son House, Lightnin' Hopkins, John Lee Hooker, Brownie McGhee & Sonny Terry, Fred McDowell, Elizabeth Cotton, Gary Davis, Robert Pete Williams, Johnny Shines, and others, almost all of which are now available on a variety of videos/DVDs on Vestapol and Yazoo.

FILMS

Throughout the 1970s and into the 1980s efforts by a variety of filmmakers, operating within the framework of the University of Mississippi and the Center for the Study of Southern Culture, produced a catalog of interesting films covering aspects of Delta music and folklore. Perhaps the most engaging of these is William Ferris's Give My Poor Heart Ease, from 1975. Only twenty minutes in length, it nevertheless captures the essence of the blues and contains some remarkable performances by Son Thomas, Wade Walton, and B. B. King. Other films include the fine Delta Blues Singer—James "Sonny Ford" Thomas, Mississippi Delta Blues, Delta Blues Festival 1985, and several highly interesting gospel documentaries. All are available from the Center for the Study of Southern Culture at the University of Mississippi, Oxford.

The 1980s and 1990s witnessed the rise of a number of independent filmmakers who have sunk time, effort, cash, and sweat into producing films that, ultimately, have met with limited commercial success despite their quality. Two good examples are Stevenson Palfrey and Robert Mugge. Palfrey's elegant Piano Players Rarely Ever Play Together featured Professor Longhair, Tuts Washington, and Allen Toussaint. Partway through filming Longhair suddenly died. The film took a new turn as a result, encompassing the funeral itself and the aftershock of losing New Orleans's master pianist. It has rarely been seen and is currently unavailable on video/DVD.

Robert Mugge's Deep Blues revisited the Mississippi Delta in the 1990s to see what was left. He managed to find not only excellent musicians but also interesting views on where blues was then, where it had been, and where it might be going. Mugge's insistence on treating the music as art rather than product meant that performances were presented in full. Jesse Mae Hemphill's "You Can Talk About Me" is not just a classic performance, but also a whole one. Shown sometimes in an edited format and often not at all, it remains a satisfying documentary that has been woefully underappreciated. It is now available as a DVD.

As the concept of the blues as part of mainstream American music gained ground throughout the last twenty years of the twentieth century, its profile altered and began integrating, to a degree, into mainstream entertainment. Thus we find Brownie McGhee appearing on Family Ties, B. B. King guesting on The Cosby Show, and Albert Collins in a cameo within the movie Adventures in Babysitting.

The flashpoint for this heightened interest is arguably the commercial success, in 1980, of John Landis's The Blues Brothers, now regarded as a comedy classic and sitting comfortably in cult status. Growing out of a series of appearances on Saturday Night Live, when the movie first appeared it offered the general public not just a helter-skelter collection of car chases and Tom-and-Jerryesque gunplay, but also music of some quality by John Lee Hooker, Walter Horton, Ray Charles, James Brown, Aretha Franklin, and Matt Murphy. The twin stars of this crazed epic, Dan Ackroyd and the late John Belushi, were both genuine blues fans. (Ackroyd has quietly funded the making of at least one blues documentary.) Their input, spiritually akin to the Rolling Stones' insistence on Howlin' Wolf appearing with them on TV, helped elevate the profile of blues in a larger public forum at a key time, and their efforts should now perhaps be seen in context as a part of blues history. Certainly many people were first exposed to blues as a result of The Blues Brothers.

As the twentieth century drew to a close, revisionist views began to emerge, celebrating traditional American music in a much less segregated forum than it had been placed for some years. Since about 1960, much research, discography, recording, and re-issue of classic material had focused exclusively upon just the blues. However, taking cues from Harry Smith's seminal 1952 Anthology of American Folk Music, at first Yazoo, then other companies like Old Hat have begun to take a broader view, mixing black and white traditions onto one CD. The visual side of this coin has been embossed by Palm Productions' American Roots Music, which emerged in 2001. A four-hour documentary, available on DVD and video, it casts a very wide net over many aspects of traditional American music and points the way toward further revisionism.

The blues is now accepted as part of the global musical landscape, yet at the same time the truly great performers, those who shaped the music, are now very few and far between. The future of the blues therefore lies not just in the hands of current performers but also in the views of historians. How they see the history and then choose to present it will greatly influence any future popular vision of the music. Approached intelligently, even shackled to the relative lack of archival performances (there's no film of Ma Rainey, Leroy Carr, Tampa Red, John Lee Williamson, Robert Johnson, Memphis Minnie, Leroy Foster, Baby Boy Warren, or even Jimmy Reed), it is possible, but challenging, to produce a balanced film history even with judicious use of talking heads, rostrum camera work, and soundtrack. Further, given that much extant footage is limited (Little Walter's only surviving footage is frankly poor), the problem is compounded. As we grow further from original sources, it becomes increasingly important to achieve balance. That said, there are some superb performances on film; one thinks of Lightnin' Hopkins at UCLA, Jesse Mae Hemphill in Deep Blues, and Buddy Guy in Chicago Blues. Using the extant material, it should be possible for filmmakers and historians to furnish future generations with a satisfying and enjoyable view of blues history, as well as using whatever new technology becomes available to ensure that archiving of current events remains ongoing.

Finally, bearing in mind that the catalog of blues on film is nowhere near as deep or embracing as it is on record, it should be seen in context, as a useful adjunct to blues history, adding to our knowledge and enjoyment by being able to draw on performances that otherwise we could no longer experience. To see Son House or Bessie Smith perform in those monochrome moments is to be reminded of how grateful we should be for the few morsels that survive, as well as irritated that so much escaped the camera's lens.

PAUL VERNON

Bibliography

- Metfessel, Milton Franklin. Phonography in Folk Music: American Negro Songs in New Notation. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1928.
- Vernon, Paul. African American Blues, Rhythm and Blues, Gospel and Zydeco on Film and Video 1926–1997. Aldershot: Ashgate Publishing, 1999.

Videography in Order of Citation

Times Ain't What They Used to Be (Yazoo Home Video DVD 512; including Bessie Smith excerpt and Whistler's Jug Band footage); Legends of Country Blues Guitar, Vol. 2 (Vestapol Video 13016; includes Leadbelly); Boogie Woogie Dream (1944, dir. Hans Burger; includes Albert Ammons and Pete Johnson); The Blood of Jesus (aka The Glory Road; dir. Spencer Williams; 1941, Amegro Films); Louis Jordan and the Tympany Five (BMG Video/DVD 80008); Boarding House Blues (dir. Josh Binney; 1948, All American); Burlesque in Harlem (dir. William Alexander, 1954); Killer Diller (dir. Josh Binney, 1948, All American); The Walking Hills (with Josh White; dir. John Sturges; 1949, Columbia Pictures); The Crimson Canary (with Josh White; dir. John Hoffman; 1945, Universal Pictures); Baby Doll (dir. Elia Kazan; 1956, Newtown Productions); Odyssey series, episode "They Took a Blue Note" (1956, CBS Television; with Horace Sprott); Rhythm and Blues at the Apollo (Storyville Video SV 6016); Variety at the Apollo (Storyville Video SV6017); Rock Around the Clock (dir. Fred F. Sears; 1956, Clover/Columbia); Go Johnny Go (dir. Paul Landres; 1959, Hal Roach Productions); Rock Rock Rock (dir. Will Price; 1956, Vanguard Productions); Rock Baby Rock It (dir. Murray Douglas Spurr; 1957, Freebar); The Big Beat (dir. William J. Cowen; 1958, Universal Pictures); The Girl Can't Help It (dir. Frank Tashlin; 1956, 20th Century Fox); Mister Rock and Roll (dir. Charles S. Dubin; 1957, Aurora Productions); Rockin' the Blues (dir. Arthur Rosenblum; 1956, Fritz Pollard Associates); Bill Broonzy and Roosevelt Sykes (Yazoo Video/DVD 518); A Musical Journey (Vestapol Video 13042); On The Road Again: Down

Home Blues, Jazz, Gospel and More, Filmed on Location in 1963 (Yazoo Video 520; previously titled Die Blues); Devil Got My Woman (Vestapol Video 13049); Delta Blues—Cajun Two-Step (Vestapol Video 13050); The Blues According To Lightnin' Hopkins (dir. Les Blank; 1969, Flower Films); A Well Spent Life (dir. Les Blank; 1971, Flower Films); Always for Pleasure (dir. Les Blank; 1978, Flower Films); Bukka White and Son House (Yazoo Video 500); Reverend Gary Davis and Sonny Terry (Yazoo Video 501); Mance Lipscomb and Lightnin' Hopkins (Yazoo Video 502); Elizabeth Cotton and Jesse Fuller (Yazoo Video 503); Fred McDowell and Big Joe Williams (Yazoo Video 504); Lightnin' Hopkins and Roosevelt Sykes (Yazoo Video 513); John Lee Hooker and Furry Lewis (Yazoo Video 519); Piano Players Rarely Ever Play Together (dir. Stevenson Palfi; 1982, Stevenson Productions); Deep Blues (dir. Robert Muggie; Oil Factory, 1991); Adventures in Babysitting (dir. Chris Columbus; 1987, Silver Screen/Tombstone; with an appearance by Albert Collins); The Blues Brothers (dir. John Landis; 1980, Universal Pictures); American Roots Music (2001, Palm Productions); Chicago Blues (dir. Harvey Cokliss; 1972, reissued on Vestapol Video 13095).

FINNELL, DOUG

b. 26 August 1903; Dallas TX
d. 1 August 1988; Dallas, TX

Dallas trumpet player, pianist, and vocalist who served as a mentor to local musicians through the 1980s. He was the pianist on T-Bone Walker's 1929 Columbia session, and he had a 78-rpm release of his own on Peacock in 1954.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Schuller, Tim. "Dallas Blues: Doug Finnell." Living Blues no. 129 (September/October 1996): 45.

Discography: DGR (under T-Bone Walker); LSFP

FIRE/FURY/ENJOY/RED ROBIN

Among the few black-owned record labels during the post-World War II R&B era, owned and operated by Bobby Robinson (b. 1919, South Carolina), a dapper and determined entrepreneur. In 1951, five years after opening a record shop on Harlem's 125th Street, Robinson formed his first label, Robin—soon renamed Red Robin to avoid a lawsuit. That label's early 1950s releases included Brownie McGhee, Jack Dupree, Red Prysock, and the Du Droppers.

Robinson founded Fury in 1957, the name reflecting his anger at having to start a new label to escape from bad distribution deals. Fire was initially Fury's publishing arm, but it became a recording label in 1959, after Fury became tangled in a legal dispute with rival Savoy Records over its biggest hit, Wilbert Harrison's "Kansas City" (#1 R&B and pop). Fire became known as a blues label, issuing singles and LPs by Lightnin' Hopkins, Elmore James ("The Sky Is Crying," #15 R&B hit, 1960), and Buster Brown ("Fannie Mae," #1 R&B hit, 1960).

Enjoy was launched in 1962; its first release was King Curtis's "Soul Twist" (#1 R&B hit, top 20 pop). Other Enjoy releases were by Titus Turner, Noble "Thin Man" Watts, and Elmore James ("It Hurts Me Too," #15 R&B hit, 1965).

Robinson's labels had two huge hits with New Orleans artists: Bobby Marchan on Fire ("There Is Something on Your Mind," #1 R&B, #31 pop, 1960) and Lee Dorsey on Fury ("Ya Ya," #1 R&B, top 10 pop, 1961). Other blues or blues-based Robinson recording artists included Tarheel Slim (Alden Bunn), Arthur Crudup, Sam Myers, Wild Jimmy Spruill, Mighty Joe Young, Lee Cooper, and Dr. Horse. Memorable releases in an R&B/soul vein included early 1960s hits by Gladys Knight and Don Gardner & Dee Dee Ford. Three other short-lived Robinson imprints were Flame, Everlast, and Whirling Disc.

Described admiringly by one commentator as a "wildcatting record man," Robinson single-handedly took care of the production and promotion for his labels. A typical Bobby Robinson release had a down-home quality to it, reflecting his desire to record music that was "pure, 100%, no water added."

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

Haig, Diana Reed, Bobby Robinson, and John Morthland. Notes to The Fire/Fury Records Story (1992, Capricorn 49009).

Discography: McGrath

Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "Bobby Robinson's Labels: Album Discographies." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/fire.html> (accessed January 14, 2005).

Selected Recordings

The Fire/Fury Records Story (1992, Capricorn 42009).

See also Robinson, Bobby

FIVE BLIND BOYS OF ALABAMA

Founded 1937 in Talladega, Alabama. A traditional Southern Gospel quintet known for both its longevity and fiery, soaring harmonies. Original members included Clarence Fountain, Jimmy Carter, George Scott, Olice Thomas, Johnny Fields, and Velma Traylor. The current line-up features leader and vocalist Fountain, vocalist Carter, and vocalist Scott, along with newer members Joey Williams (lead guitar), Ricky McKinnie (drums), Bobby Butler (rhythm guitar), and Tracy Pierce (bass).

Background

With their roots in prewar rural Southern Gospel, the Five Blind Boys of Alabama represent a living link between traditional nineteenth-century sacred black music and the evolving soul-gospel singing stylizations that have contributed so directly to contemporary blues, R&B, and rock. In 1939, the original quartet was formed at the Talladega Institute for the Negro Blind in Alabama, and originally recorded in 1948 as the Happyland Jubilee Singers. Soon afterward, they changed their name to the Five Blind Boys of Alabama, in response to the name of another gospel group, the Five Blind Boys of Mississippi. By 1949, the group had their first hit with the Coleman Records recording, "I Can See Everybody's Mother but Mine."

The 1950s represented a period of achievement for the Blind Boys. By participating in a continuing series of large gospel tours or "programs" involving several groups, they were able to perform before large audiences of upwards of 10,000 people in eastern American cities like Philadelphia or New York. ("All the big cities were big gospel towns," Clarence Fountain recalls.) At the same time, the group actively pursued radio work, visiting at as many as two radio stations a day—in two different states—to perform their current releases, such as "Heaven on My Mind."

Throughout the 1950s and into the 1960s, the Blind Boys recorded for a number of record labels, including Specialty (which issued another of their hits, "Oh, Lord, Stand by Me"), Vee-Jay, Savoy, Elektra, and others. However, with the rise of rock 'n' roll, the quartet saw their audiences and venues shrink significantly. In 1970, Fountain left the group to manage bookings for the gospel group the Mighty Clouds of Joy, effectively putting the Blind Boys into hiatus. Ten years later, in 1981, Fountain reconstituted the Blind Boys with its surviving original members and new personnel. A career breakthrough for the group followed in 1983, when they performed as part of the cast of The Gospel at Colonus, the Obie Award-winning Off-Broadway and Broadway musical drama created by Bob Telson and Lee Breuer. This opportunity led to their appearance on two original soundtrack albums in 1984 and 1988, which established their rediscovery by a new generation of listeners.

After recording three successful albums in the 1990s, the Blind Boys reached an even greater audience with their releases on Peter Gabriel's Real World label. Spirit of the Century (2001) featured a mix of traditional gospel songs along with contemporary songs reinterpreted by the group. Attracting broad critical praise, the album was awarded the 2001 Grammy Award for Best Traditional Soul Gospel Album. A follow-up album in 2002, Higher Ground, won a second consecutive Grammy Award for Best Traditional Soul Gospel Album, as well as a Dove Award from the Gospel Music Association as the Best Traditional Gospel Album. A holiday album, Go Tell It on the Mountain, was released in 2003.

Musical Contexts

To appreciate the evolution of the Five Blind Boys of Alabama as a musical group, one needs to understand the evolving nature of African American gospel music itself. Although tied to nineteenth-century church spirituals, the genre is essentially a twentieth-century phenomenon, sparked to large degree by the determinations and more than eight hundred gospel compositions of Thomas A. Dorsey, known as "The Father of Gospel Music." Dorsey, who as a young man had accompanied such blues singers as Ma Rainey, was moved to set religious verses to music that maintained the tonal and rhythmic values of blues and jazz. While initially banned by some churches, gospel quickly gained popularity through singers such as Mahalia Jackson and James Cleveland, and through smooth-voiced quartets like the Dixie Hummingbirds, the Fairfield Four, and the Five Blind Boys of Alabama.

However, gospel quartets, which had their heyday from the 1920s through the 1940s, have played another key role in the development of American popular music, by providing a springboard into secular music for singers in the 1960s. One of the first was Sam Cooke, originally a member of the Soul Stirrers quartet and a label mate of the Blind Boys. Others like Wilson Pickett, Aretha Franklin, Lou Rawls, and Johnny Taylor followed. Within this context, the crossover qualities of recent recordings by the Five Blind Boys of Alabama make sense, as gospel itself continues to be a highly inclusive musical medium. The Blind Boys' 2001 Spirit of the Century references blues, R&B, rap, Afro-beat, and folk in their song arrangements, but still maintains its emotional and spiritual core of gruff gospel shouts and impassioned singing.

DAVID BEAUDOUIN

Bibliography

AMG (Bil Carpenter); Larkin
The Blind Boys of Alabama website, <http://blindboys.com/main.html>.
The History of Gospel Music website, <http://afgen.com/gospel1.html>.
McGarvey, Seamus. "Oh Lord, Stand by Me." Blues & Rhythm no. 38 (1988): 17–20.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

The Original Five Blind Boys of Alabama (1959, Savoy LP 14044).
Marching Up to Zion (1970, Specialty LP SPS-2138).
Spirit of the Century (2001, Real World CD 50918).
Higher Ground (2002, Real World CD 12793).

See also Black Sacred Music

FIVE ("5") ROYALES

Active 1952–1965

Rhythm and blues vocal group, formed out of a sacred group, the Royal Sons. Members included guitarist Lowman Perkins, lead singer Johnny Tanner, tenor singer James Moore, tenor singer Obadiah Carter, and bass singer Otto Jeffries, who in 1953 was replaced by Eugene Tanner. Among their Apollo and King labels hits were "Baby Don't Do It," "Think," and "Dedicated to the One I Love."

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger); Larkin

Discography: AMG

FLASH

Los Angeles label, owned by Charlie Reynolds, which between 1955 and 1959 issued more than thirty singles in a 100 series plus a few others on subsidiary labels Pull and Canton. Artists included Sidney Maiden, Bee Brown, Haskell Sadler, James Curry, Gus Jenkins, Frank Patt, Guitar Shorty, and Slim Green.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

- Cook, Les, Victor Pearlin, and Darryl Stolper. "The Flash Story." Juke Blues no. 2 (October 1985): 8–11.
- Propes, Steve. "Confessions of a Flash Counter Girl." Blues & Rhythm no. 134 (November 1998): 10–13.

Discography: McGrath

See also Green, Norman G. "Guitar Slim"; Guitar Shorty; Jenkins, Gus; Maiden, Sidney; Patt, Frank "Honeyboy"; Sadler, Haskell Robert "Cool Papa"

FLEETWOOD MAC

English blues group, later international rock act. Founded 1967 by Peter Green (guitar), Mick Fleetwood (drums), and initially reluctant John McVie (bass, role held briefly by Bob Brunning) from Bluesbreakers. Slide specialist Jeremy Spencer joined as second guitarist; recorded two strong blues albums for producer Mike Vernon's Blue Horizon label. Recruited B.B. King–influenced Danny Kirwan as third guitarist. Fleetwood Mac recorded in Chicago in 1969 with Otis Spann, Willie Dixon, and others. They had several U.K. hits, including mysterious "Albatross," but increasingly moved away from blues. Green left in 1970 and was replaced by vocalist Christine Perfect. Spencer joined a religious cult. Many personnel changes occurred as the band transformed into a mainstream popular rock act by the mid-1970s.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- Graham, Samuel. The Authorized History: Fleetwood Mac. Los Angeles: Warner Brothers, 1978.
- Lewry, Peter. The Complete Recording Sessions 1967–97. London: Blandford, 1998.

Discography

- Fleetwood Mac* (1968, Blue Horizon 63200).
- Mr. Wonderful* (1968, Blue Horizon 63205).
- Blues Jam at Chess* (1969, Blue Horizon 66227).
- English Rose* (US) (1969, Epic 26446).
- The Pious Bird of Good Omen* (1969, Blue Horizon 63215).
- Then Play On* (1969, Reprise 6368).
- Kiln House* (1970, Reprise 6408).
- The Original Fleetwood Mac* (1971, CBS 63875).

FLEMONS, WADE

- b. 25 September 1940; Coffeyville, KS
d. 13 October 1993; Battle Creek, MI

Rhythm and blues singer who made a brief impact on record charts in the late 1950s and early 1960s.

Flemons was raised in Wichita, Kansas, but at age fifteen he moved with his parents to Battle Creek, Michigan. In 1958 he was signed by Vee-Jay and recorded a hit, "Here I Stand." His next hit, in 1960, was "Easy Lovin'." The flip side, "Whoops Now," got solid play in a lot of areas. In 1960, Vee-Jay put out the only LP on Flemons. He was at the peak of his success and toured the chitlin' circuit. Flemon's one stab at blues was a remake of the Percy Mayfield song titled "Please Send Me Someone to Love" (1961), his last chart record. But if there was any justice in the world Flemons would have likewise charted in 1964 with his definitive version of the haunting "I Knew You When," which Billy Joe Royal put high on the pop charts in 1965. Flemons was the keyboardist on the first two LPs of Earth, Wind, and Fire.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- Pruter, Robert. Liner notes for Wade Flemons, Here I Stand: 20 Greatest Hits (2000, Collectables COL CD 7251).
- . "Wade Flemons." Juke Blues no. 31 (Summer 1994): 27.

FLERLAGE, RAEBURN

- b. 13 July 1915; Cincinnati, OH
d. 28 September 2002; Chicago, IL

Ray Flerlage worked variously as a writer, lecturer, disk jockey, and record wholesaler, but was best known as a photographer of blues performers. He moved to Chicago in 1944, and served during the 1940s as midwest executive secretary for People's Songs, a national organization that used folk music to promote social causes. In that capacity he worked with Pete Seeger, Woody Guthrie, Leadbelly, Josh White, Big Bill Broonzy, and others. He was most active as a photographer between 1959 and 1972. Working exclusively in Chicago, he shot many of the top blues, jazz, and folk performers of that era.

His blues photographs include some of the most famous pictures ever taken of Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, Little Walter, Memphis Slim, Big Joe Williams, James Cotton, Junior Wells, and many others. They have graced numerous books, films, magazines, and record jackets. Active until his last illness, he was still providing images from his vast collection to producers and editors all over the world when he passed away.

The Photographs of Ray Flerlage

Ray Flerlage's photographs represent the primary visual documentation of the Chicago folk, blues, and jazz music scenes between 1959 and 1972. Though hardly the only chronicler of this period, his collection of images is by far the most comprehensive, and his work is highly regarded for its technical and artistic quality.

He studied photography under Harry Callahan at the School of the Art Institute of Chicago and the Institute of Design. Colleagues and influences were Chicago photographers Steve Deutch, Yuichi (Gene) Idaka, Jo Banks, Ted Williams, Jim Taylor, Aaron Siskind, and Wayne Miller, and New York photographer Dave Gahr.

Although he was active as a professional photographer for only slightly more than a decade, that decade was the 1960s: Flerlage documented artists who are immensely important to the development of popular music, and who are still popular today. Thus, his collected images have been indispensable to photo editors for more than 40 years—he took hundreds of pictures of Muddy Waters alone.

Most Flerlage photographs capture the artist in performance, often a small, urban club whose smoky ambiance gives the image a strong sense of place and time. He also found his subjects in homes, hotel rooms, dressing rooms, recording studios, rehearsal spaces, and on Chicago streets. Most of his images are in black and white, but a few rare color images, including an early series of Muddy Waters, have survived.

Flerlage was strictly freelance: He would photograph the subjects at his own expense, his customers would choose the ones that suited their needs, and they would purchase single-use reproduction rights for the images they wanted. Ray kept the rights to all his photographs, even his most famous ones. Those photographs were used to illustrate newspaper and magazine articles, and for record jackets. Nationally, Flerlage's pictures appeared in Down Beat, Rhythm & Blues, and Jazz; his primary local outlets were the Chicago Scene and the Daily News. Record company customers included Chess, Delmark, Prestige, Testament, and Bluesville. Later, his photographs would appear in dozens of books, starting with Charles Keil's Urban Blues (1966).

Ray's photos have continued to appear on record jackets as companies worldwide have released new collections of recordings from this extraordinary era. Exhibits of his photographs have been mounted at several galleries and museums, including the Delta Blues Museum in Clarksdale, Mississippi. Some of his most famous images have become popular icons on t-shirts and coffee mugs.

In 2000, ECW Press published a 152-page retrospective of Flerlage's blues photographs, Chicago Blues As Seen from the Inside: The Photographs of Raeburn Flerlage. It has sold well and was favorably reviewed by every major blues journal. As a result of the book's publication, Ray received the Blues Foundation's 2001 Keeping the Blues Alive (K.B.A.) Award for Achievement in Photography.

ANDREW M. COHEN

FLOWER, MARY

b. 1949; Delphi, IN

Singer and guitarist. Began as a folk revival guitarist in Denver, Colorado, in the 1970s. Since the 1980s she has performed mostly blues, especially those of the prewar era. Her style is marked by a husky voice and adept fingerwork on guitar.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder)

Discography: AMG (Bruce Eder)

FLOYD, FRANK "HARMONICA"

b. 11 October 1908; Pontotoc, MS

d. 7 August 1984; Cincinnati, OH

Birthplace also given as Toccopola, Mississippi. A white guitarist, harmonica player, and singer active since the 1920s, who by the 1950s had arrived at his prototype rock mix of blues and country music. Most of his early recordings were for the Sun label (which were leased to Chess) in 1951. Floyd was rediscovered in Millington, Tennessee, in 1972 by Stephen LaVere.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Marcus, Greil. Mystery Train. New York: Dutton, 1975.

FLYING FISH

Founded in 1971 in Chicago, Illinois; acquired by Rounder in 1996. Flying Fish was one of Chicago's small but highly influential labels, and largely the love affair of founder Bruce Kaplan (1945–1992). While blues was only one part of the Flying Fish catalog, several very good blues albums were issued. The label was acquired by Rounder Records following Kaplan's death.

JIM TRAGESER

FLYING FISH

Bibliography

O'Neal, Jim. "Bruce Kaplan" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 108 (March/April 1993): 51.

Discography

Big Twist & The Mellow Fellows. Big Twist & The Mellow Fellows (1980, FF-229).

Cephas & Wiggins. Dog Days of August (1986, FF-394).

Moses Racoec. Blues (1987, FF-454).

Satan & Adam. Harlem Blues (1991, FF-70567).

FLYNN, BILLY

b. 11 August 1956; Green Bay, WI

Flynn apprenticed, toured, and recorded with Jimmy Dawkins, and has also served with Otis Rush, the Legendary Band, Little Smokey Smothers, John Brim, and his own Flynn-tones and Smokedaddy bands. A composer of inventive instrumental blues as well as a songwriter of elegant simplicity, Flynn is noted as an eclectic specialist in postwar guitar idioms.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Discography

Jimmy Dawkins. Kant Sheck Dees Bluze (Earwig 4920).

The Smokedaddy Band (Easy Baby EB 400).

FODDRELL, TURNER

b. 22 June 1928; Stuart, VA

d. 31 January 1995; Blacksburg, VA

Acoustic guitarist versatile in blues, folk songs, and the occasional postwar blues. For his living he owned a general store with a gas station on Route 8 near North Carolina.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Wald, Elijah. "North Carolina Blues: Turner Foddrell: If It Sounds Good, I Do It." Living Blues no. 107 (January/February 1993): 33–34.

———. "Turner Foddrell" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 122 (July/August 1995): 60.

FOGHAT

Formed in 1971; disbanded in 1984; re-formed in 1994. Foghat was one of the most popular 1970s exponents of heavy blues—a hybrid of Chicago electric blues and rock and roll that grew out of late 1960s bands such as the Yardbirds. For many young whites in the late 1960s and early 1970s, blues-rock groups such as Foghat, the Allman Brothers Band, and Savoy Brown served as their first exposure to any form of the blues.

The band was formed in London in 1971 when guitarist "Lonesome" Dave Peeverett, bassist Tony Stevens, and drummer Roger Earl all left Savoy Brown, then added guitarist Rod Price to their ranks. The music of Foghat was more upbeat and boogie-shuffle oriented than Savoy Brown's, and Foghat's albums became favorites of the then-new album-oriented rock radio format.

While the band members emphasized writing their own songs, they also covered blues standards; their first album featured Willie Dixon's "I Just Want to Make Love to You," which became a staple of their live shows. Their fifth album, Fool for the City (1975), included a cover of Robert Johnson's "Terraplane Blues."

While not primarily a blues band (tending to share the bill with other rock bands, and performing at rock festivals), Foghat retained more blues elements than most "heavy metal" bands, and served as a kind of bridge between the increasingly divergent blues and rock worlds.

The band reunited in 1994, and recorded both a new studio and a new live album before Peeverett died of kidney cancer in 2000. The band has continued to record and tour with a variety of lineups since.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography

Foghat (1972, Bearsville 2077).

Fool for the City (1975, Bearsville 6959).

Live (1977, Bearsville 6971).

FOLEY, SUE

b. 29 March 1968; Ottawa, Canada

Guitarist and singer/songwriter. Relocated from Canada to Austin by blues promoter/record producer Clifford Antone, Foley made her recording debut in 1992 with Young Girl Blues, an impressive exhibition of Chicago stylings played on her trademark pink paisley guitar. By the time Ten Days in November was released in 1998 Foley had found her voice as a songwriter and had infused an R&B to her vocals. She returned to Ottawa, where she had performed Memphis Minnie tunes as a sixteen-year-old, to raise her son, added flamenco to her guitar repertoire, and released Love Coming Down in 2000, followed by Where the Action Is in 2002.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin Tipaldi, Art. "Sue Foley Follows Her Own Path." Blues Revue no. 70 (September 2001): 17–19.

Discography: AMG

FONTENOT, CANRAY

b. 16 October 1922; L'anse Aux Vaches, LA
d. 29 July 1995; Welsh, LA

A contemporary and associate of the renowned Ardoin family of Creole musicians, fiddler and singer Canray Fontenot was one of the last traditional Francophone musicians of Louisiana. While other Creoles of his generation helped develop the modern R&B-influenced zydeco form during the 1940s and 1950s, Fontenot hewed closely to traditional Creole music.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Bonner, Brett J. "Canray Fontenot" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 123 (September/October 1995): 55.
Templeton, Ray. "Canray Fontenot." Blues and Rhythm no. 103 (October 1995): 12.
Tisserand, Michael. The Kingdom of Zydeco. New York: Arcade Publishing, 1998.

Discography

Louisiana Hot Sauce, Creole Style (1992, Arhoolie 381).
Le Musique Creole (1996, Arhoolie 445; with Alphonse 'Bois Sec' Ardoin).
Cajun Fiddle Styles, Vol. 1: The Creole Tradition (Arhoolie 5031).

FORD, CLARENCE J.

b. 16 December 1929; New Orleans, LA
d. 9 August 1994; New Orleans, LA

Sideman who played clarinet and tenor and baritone saxophone with Fats Domino, Snooks Eaglin, Earl King, Dave Bartholomew, Little Richard, Pee Wee Crayton, Danny Barker, Professor Longhair, Art Neville, and Guitar Slim. Most were recorded at Cosimo Matassa's studio in New Orleans.

TOM MORGAN

Bibliography

Broven, John. Rhythm and Blues in New Orleans. Gretna, LA: Pelican, 1983.
Burke, Tony. "Clarence Ford" [obituary]. Blues & Rhythm no. 93 (1994): 14.

FORD, JAMES LEWIS CARTER "T-MODEL"

b. 1922; Forrest, MS

Delta bluesman known mainly in the Greenville, Mississippi, area until he began touring internationally in 1997. Learning electric guitar in his late 1950s, Ford's style can be described as a rhythmically undisciplined "boogie stomp," with explicit lyrics that tend toward violence and a voice known for its guttural, rasping quality.

DANIEL M. RAESSLER

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger)
McInerney, Jay. "White Man at the Door: Searching for the Last of the Bluesmen." The New Yorker (February 4, 2002): 54–63.

Discography: AMG

FORD, ROBBEN LEE

b. 16 December 1951; Ukiah, CA

Woodlake, California, also cited as birthplace. After forming the Charles Ford Band in 1969 in San Francisco, Ford was soon hired to accompany Charles Musselwhite. During the next two decades he played with George Harrison, Joni Mitchell, Miles Davis, and others. Defying any kind of categorization, Ford's guitar playing combines his blues roots with elements of jazz, pop, and rock, be it the bluesy pop style of Talk to Your Daughter (1988, Warner), certainly his biggest success, or his rather basic blues release Robben Ford & The Blue Line (1992, Stretch). Ford's fusion of styles is heard at its best on Blue Moon (2002 Concord).

THORSTEN HINDRICH

Bibliography

AMG (Scott Yanow); Larkin; Santelli
Arnold, Jeff, and Hemme Luttjeboer, eds. The Robben Ford Blues Guitar Collection. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 1995.
Koechlin, Stephane. "Robben Ford, Du soldat à l'officier." Soul Bag 141 (1996): 11.

Discography: AMG

FOREHAND, A. C. AND "BLIND" MAMIE

Asa "A. C." Forehand

b. 9 August 1890; Columbia, GA
d. 9 May 1972; Memphis, TN

"Blind" Mamie Forehand

Flourished 1920s

Believed to be husband and wife. They made four recordings for Victor in Memphis in 1927, singing sacred material and performing with guitar and finger cymbals. The delicacy of Mamie Forehand's singing and the street corner manner of performance have been the appeal of their records, especially on recent CD reissues.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)
"Obituary Notice." Living Blues no. 9 (Summer 1972): 3.

Discography: DGR

FORMAL

Chicago rhythm and blues label of the late 1950s and early 1960s. The label was founded by Angelo Giardini in 1958, but in 1959 it was taken over by independent record entrepreneur Don Talty (1911–1979). He released on Formal such acts as blues pianist and singer Willie Mabon, bluesman Young Guitar Red, jazz pianist Earl Washington, R&B vocalist Ace St. Clair (brother of Johnny Ace), and soul artist Jan Bradley. The label's biggest successes were with Jan Bradley (who hit nationally with "Mama Didn't Lie" in 1963) and Willie Mabon (who hit with "Got to Have Some"). Talty stopped putting out records on Formal in 1964, but continued to produce for other labels, such as Night Owl (a subsidiary label of Cuca Records, in Sauk City, Wisconsin), Adanti, and Chess. The 1970s saw the end of Talty's recording activities.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. "Don Talty and Formal Records." Juke Blues no. 19 (Spring 1990): 6–11.

Discography: McGrath

FORMS

Structures

Principles

As stated in the technical discussion in the Blues entry in this encyclopedia, blues forms may be said to have three dimensions: tone, including instrumentation and vocal sound; melody, including lyrics; and harmony. This entry on forms will concentrate on melody with lyrics, with some remarks on harmony.

Components

The typical notated music phrase component is four measures, each consisting of four beats per measure. The four measures, or at least three full measures with the first beat of the fourth measure, is roughly equivalent to the duration of a human breath exhalation. The four-measure component may be doubled, tripled, or as many times as necessary toward constructing eight-, twelve-, sixteen-, and thirty-two-measure song structures.

The lyric structure can be conveyed by letters starting with A, with a new letter from the alphabetical sequence introduced for each new lyric phrase. For example, the first lyric phrase may be designated with an A, its repeat also with an A, a new contrasting lyric with a B, and another repeat of the first lyric phrase with an A. Hence, the lyric structure would be AABA, and it would be taken into analysis of a song with the numbers of measures in which the song may be notated.

Note, however, that the AABA lyric structure, often used in sixteen-measure songs, should not be confused with the AABA harmonic chord progression often used in thirty-two-measure songs. In the AABA chord progression, it is the sequence of chords per eight measures of music that is given the letter designations, not the lyrics of the song. Therefore, when analysts make use of letter designations to describe the structure of the song, they must always be careful to state whether the letters refer to lyrics or to chord progressions.

EDWARD KOMARA

The Eight-Measure Form

The most common type of eight-measure form is that consisting of two four-measure phrases. Such examples would be Leroy Carr's "How Long How Long" and the early "East St. Louis Blues." The two phrases are dissimilar, yet the second leads from the first. The lyrics can be designated by letters as AB, that is, one phrase followed by a different but rhyming phrase. Among some skillful guitarists, the first four measures are a vocal lyric, the second four measures are an instrumental response, as in Charlie Patton's "Mississippi Boweavil Blues" (1929).

Another type is that of four two-measure phrases (2 + 2 + 2 + 2). The most well-known example of this is the basic chorus of "Catfish Blues," where silent rests mark off each phrase. Sometimes the lyric structure may be AB, but it is as likely to be ABCD, with the D lyric/melody repeated several times as a kind of coda before a new blues chorus is begun (as in Robert Petway's "Catfish Blues" [1941] or in Muddy Waters's "Still a Fool" [1952]).

EDWARD KOMARA

The Sixteen-Measure Form

It should be acknowledged that many older sixteen-measure blues, especially those adapted from black sacred music, can be transcribed in halved-note values in eight measures. One factor toward an appropriate transcription may take into account how the sacred model was presented in nineteenth-century printed sacred collections.

One of the older sixteen-measure blues lyric forms is the AAAB type, that is, with the first lyric phrase sung three times, then a contrasting closing line. Classic examples of this are Blind Lemon Jefferson's "See That My Grave Is Kept Clean" (1927) and Robert Johnson's "The Last Fair Deal Gone Down" (1936), both of which could be heard broadly as part of a "Careless Love" song group, which may be transcribed in eight as well as sixteen measures.

Another type is the sixteen-measure hokum tune, a typical melodic example of which is known in jazz as "I Wish I Could Shimmy Like My Sister Kate," but which Tampa Red sang to the words "What Is It That Tastes Like Gravy?" and Robert Johnson as "They're Red Hot." The harmonic chord progression to this melody is unusual for its dominant V chord to accompany each lyric phrase ending. Lyric structures may vary, but a common one is AABA (or AABA'), that is, the first lyric sung twice, a contrasting "punch" line as the third lyric, and then the A lyric, sometimes in a modified form as A'.

Sometimes the sixteen-measure blues may be split into two eight-measure phrases, either as verse-and-refrain chorus, or as an AA scheme, where the lyric is repeated twice. Skip James's "I'm So Glad" is an extreme example of AA, where each of the two identical eight-measure lyric phrases consists of a short lyric repeated several times. Additional types of sixteen-measure forms may be found, in accordance with the sacred tune or popular song from which the blues song was developed.

EDWARD KOMARA

The Twelve-Measure Form

The twelve-measure form (see example), known also as the twelve-bar blues or twelve-bar blues progression, is the most common and pervasive song structure in blues. It is generally based on a three-line rhythm scheme (AAB) with a specific harmonic pattern of I, IV, and V (the tonic, subdominant, and dominant) as triads or dominant seventh chords. The AAB components can be vocal song lines or instrumental themes and are grouped in four-measure sections. Assuming we are in the key or tonal center of C, the simplest twelve-measure form would follow this sequence:

- (A) Measures 1–4: the tonic chord (C or C7) for four measures
- (A) Measures 5–8: the subdominant (F or F7) for two measures, the tonic (C or C7) for two measures

FORMS

12-measure blues form

(B) Measures 9–12: the dominant (G or G7) for one measure, the subdominant (F or F7) for one measure, and the tonic (C or C7) for two measures

Common variations and refinements to the twelve-measure form include the use of the subdominant (F or F7) in the second measure, colloquially called the “quick IV,” the dominant chord (G or G7) in both measures 9 and 10, and a turnaround pattern in measures 11 and 12. The turnaround then is most often a tonic to dominant progression (C to G) that acts to prepare the tonic (C or C7) of the next blues chorus. In twelve-measure blues the turnaround can also follow a tonic–subdominant–tonic–dominant progression (C–F–C–G), as in B. B. King’s “Three O’Clock Blues.”

Other variations in the twelve-measure form are indigenous to the jazz genre. Artists like Charlie Parker and John Coltrane, in “Blues for Alice” and “Freight Trane” (written by Tommy Flanagan) respectively, expanded the harmonic content of the twelve-measure blues. These innovations (in C) include the use of a subdominant minor chord (Fm or Fm7) in measure 6; a secondary seventh chord (A7, the V of ii) in measure 8; a ii–V–I pattern (Dm–G7–C) in measures 9, 10, and 11; and various substitute turnarounds in measures 11 and 12. The latter can be found in Wes Montgomery’s “Sun Down” as a chromatically descending series of dominant seventh chords: (in C) C7–Eb7–D7–Db7.

The twelve-measure form became codified sometime in the early 1900s when it was adopted by various ensemble performers and composers as a standard. By the 1930s it was absorbed into the big band format of the swing era. “Blues in the Night” and “Frankie and Johnny” reflect the twelve-measure form in popular music. In the 1950s and 1960s many rock ‘n’ roll performers routinely used the twelve-measure form. Salient examples include Chuck Berry’s “Johnnie B. Goode,” Little Richard’s “Lucille,” Elvis Presley’s “Too Much,” and Carl Perkins’s “Blue Suede Shoes.”

The twelve-measure form was also employed for minor blues: Otis Rush’s “All Your Love,” and “The Thrill Is Gone,” arguably B. B. King’s best-known recording. Other blues artists maintained the twelve-measure form and harmonic content but altered the order of the tonic, subdominant, and dominant chords within the structure. Howlin’ Wolf’s “Little Red Rooster” and “Ain’t Superstitious” as well as Buddy Guy’s “Mary Had a Little Lamb” are examples of alternate harmonic patterns with the twelve-measure form.

Additional lyric schemes for twelve-measure blues include the (4 + 8) verse and refrain chorus, especially as heard in W. C. Handy’s “Hesitating [Hesitation] Blues,” Tampa Red’s hokum theme “Tight Like That” (1928), the 1930s/1940s standard “Bottle It Up and Go,” Robert Johnson’s “Sweet Home Chicago,” and in country music, Hank Williams’s “Move It on Over.” Also, the (8 + 4) verse and refrain scheme occur in early blues and blues ballads, especially “Frankie and Albert” (Frankie and Johnny), some versions of “Stagger Lee,” and Henry Thomas’s “Bob McKinney” (1927).

WOLF MARSHAL/EDWARD KOMARA

Forms: Alternate Structures

Many of the great blues composers and performers have chosen to deviate from standard twelve-measure, eight-measure, and sixteen-measure formal structures. Among the most definitive and asymmetric of these digressions is the nine-measure structure employed by Howlin' Wolf (and later Cream) in the song "Sitting on Top of the World." This composition (in F) is comprised of an unusual scheme that follows this sequence: the tonic chord (F and F7) in measures 1 and 2, the subdominant (Bb) in measure 3, the subdominant minor (Bb minor) in measure 4, the tonic (F) in measure 5, the dominant (C7) in measure 6, the tonic and dominant (F and C7) in measure 7, and a turnaround in the last two measures. The latter is a standard pattern that moves from the tonic to the subdominant (F and Bb) in measure 8 and from the tonic to the dominant (F and C7) in measure 9. Other alternate forms in blues do not present such marked deviations from harmonic rhythm, proportions, and overall structure. When Elvis Presley recorded his historic remake of the Arthur Crudup composition "That's All Right, Mama," he utilized a twenty-measure form. This piece is comprised solely of the standard I-IV-V content of the simplest blues but yields a different form through a relaxing and elongating of smaller internal sections. Its basic folk-like scheme follows this plan: a tonic chord (A) in measures 1 through 8, a subdominant chord (D7) in measures 9 through 12, a dominant chord (E7) in measures 13 through 16, and a return to the tonic (A) in measures 17 through 20.

Another class of blues songs in an alternate structure arises from the infusion of Tin Pan Alley's thirty-two-measure song forms into the blues genre. These pieces contain genuine blues content in terms of melody and harmony yet are cast in larger forms more typical of show tunes and popular songs of the 1930s and 1940s. Examples of such thirty-two-bar AABA forms include "Georgia on My Mind," "Willow Weep for Me," and "At Last." A different type of thirty-two-measure blues song is represented by Jimmy Cox's narrative-style blues "Nobody Knows You When You're Down and Out." Along similar lines, the idea of a thirty-two-measure blues with a bridge is epitomized in Jimmy Rodgers's "Walking by Myself." This hybrid composition exploits a thirty-two-measure AABA form in the vocal sections but reverts to a standard twelve-measure structure for improvised instrumental solos. Muddy Waters further expounded on the blues with a bridge in his recording of Willie Dixon's "I Just Want to Make Love to You." This piece remains one of the most striking alternate-structure blues arrangements in the genre. There the first verse (eight measures) was followed by a longer second verse (twelve measures) and harmonica solo (eleven measures) before the eight-measure bridge and the final verse are heard.

A different category of alternate-structure blues songs involves vamps. These are usually played over a single tonal center, chord, or rhythm figure. The vamp blues song is exemplified by compositions like "Spoonful," "Mellow Down Easy," "Smokestack Lightning," "You Need Love," and many of Albert Collins's Imperial recordings in the late 1960s.

WOLF MARSHALL

Melodic Sources and Influences: Religious Sources

The religious influence as pertains to blues melody and form is generally white in origin and of European ancestry. The Southern Pentecostal church tradition can be traced back to Biblical origins and spiritual text. Later blues-inflected Negro spirituals have their precedents in adaptations of Wesleyan hymns and Fasola singing of shape-note hymnals. Moreover, the supernatural aspects and transcendent quality of blues are often religious in mood and tone.

African slaves gravitated to the symbolism implicit in nineteenth-century Protestant hymns. Code words and double meanings were imposed by these African Americans on many of the pieces to suggest metaphors for freedom and renewal. In this sense "Crossing over Jordan" depicted death or a release from bondage. "Go Down, Moses" expressed hopes of reaching the North. "Bound for the Land of Canaan" was reinterpreted and repurposed to mean the land of Canaan was the North. Code words and double meanings remain attributes of the blues repertory to the present.

Religious songs afforded many African Americans a means of expression and the framework in which to extemporize, improvise, and alter themes. Refrains of many adapted hymns, like the chorus of "O, Gwine Away," permitted the interjection of secular elements into sacred songs. This met the need for expression within the incipient culture, which found release in slow chanted sections in "long meter" form, conveying sadness and poignancy, and faster shouts, indicative of joy and exultation.

The roots of the gospel tradition, of which R&B performers Ray Charles and Aretha Franklin are leading exponents, were planted with the application of European harmony, southern folk music, and the formal considerations of sacred songs to the tribulations and triumphs of the black American musical experience. As gospel music evolved it afforded the growing African American community greater opportunities to sing and emote with unrestrained fervor. In the twentieth century, gospel affected blues and rock

'n' roll musicians as diverse as Reverend Gary Davis, Blind Willie Johnson, Mississippi Fred McDowell, Little Richard, Sister Rosetta Tharpe, Elvis Presley, Sam Cooke, Jerry Lee Lewis, and the Staple Singers.

WOLF MARSHALL

Melodic Sources and Influences: Work Song Sources

Work songs are generally characteristic of vocal ensemble music created by field hands and work crews. These are "leader-and-response" forms, more commonly named call-and-response forms, in which a leader invokes a phrase (the call) and a vocal group answers (the response). Due to the steady, methodical nature of physical labor performed by workers (chopping of wood, beating of grain, boat rowing), these call-and-response songs fell naturally into regular rhythmic cadences. To plantation owners and bosses, the antiphonal sounds provided aural assurance that work was steady and productive. Such images were picturesque in the Old South. After the Civil War the erstwhile traditions of the South were continued when work songs became part of the standard practices of railroad work gangs and reconstruction labor crews. The use of group work songs in the penitentiary system maintained and carried the tradition beyond its application in times of slavery.

Field hollers developed from work songs. In this form a melody was introduced by a vocalist/field hand. This became a theme passed from one worker to another and then repeated later as an ensemble chorus. Each vocalist had his or her own style distinguished by a unique vibrato, inflections, glissandi, pitch bends, and embellishments. These ornamental factors have endured as permanent features of blues melody. They are generally modal in quality (usually the Dorian mode), utilize microtonal intonation (quarter-step deviations from equal temperament), and often apply yodel-like decorations to principal melody notes. The idiomatic modal and microtonal treatments of the third and seventh degrees of scales in blues melody, as well as larger antiphonal organization, are thought to have arisen from field hollers.

The call-and-response scheme of work songs and field hollers anticipated the three-part phrase structure of formalized blues music. The initial phrase in even the most contemporary blues songs invokes something akin to the work leader's call. It is echoed with little or no variation by a reiteration in a second, responsorial phrase of similar time span and character. This is then offset by a third, contrasting phrase, which serves to provide closure to the three-part structure. Though a clear connection with the content of work song sources has become blurred in the years that separated the Civil War and the post-World War II periods, the structural scheme of call and response has remained an attribute and identifier of blues music in a variety of subgenera. Disparate but telling examples are found in the phraseology and structure of significant postwar blues pieces such as T-Bone Walker's "T-Bone Shuffle" and "Stormy Monday," Muddy Waters's "Honey Bee" and "Rollin' and Tumblin'," Elmore James's "Dust My Broom," and B. B. King's "Sweet Little Angel" and "Rock Me Baby."

WOLF MARSHALL

Melodic Sources and Influences: Popular Non-Blues Sources

Popular and non-blues sources in the blues genre are more abundant and more discernible after the Civil War. Prior to that time such influences are generally confined to English popular ballads with their strict eight- and twelve-measure forms, conventional harmonic progressions, and three-line couplet-refrain arrangement. The European popular influence remained strong after 1870 however. Origins in Anglo-Scot folk music are evident in "John Henry," a ballad from the late nineteenth century which established the black folk hero. Others followed; notably "Frankie and Albert," "Eddy Jones," "Ella Speed," and "Duncan and Brady."

The tradition began with black performers who provided music for dances during the Colonial period. Slaves stripped of possessions and freedom developed skills on European instruments such as fiddles, flutes, guitars, and other portable instruments that were used to play dance music. In southern states plantation slaves often received formal musical instruction and were taught the popular jigs, reels, minuets, and country dances. A composition from this period referred to by Nicholas Creswell as the "Negro Jig" (1774) may well represent the first record of slave music that influenced a white populace.

In the late 1800s the cakewalks of the plantation walkarounds were employed by Missouri pianists like Tom Turpin ("Harlem Rag," published in 1897) and Scott Joplin ("Maple Leaf Rag," published in 1899). These composers merged the European instrumental tradition with African elements to begin the ragtime movement; a genre characterized by European forms and harmonic structures combined with blue notes, explicit syncopation, and rhythmic complexity. A boom in ragtime music generated an interest in black dance music that spread to the St. Louis World's Fair and subsequently to Chicago and the East. In this period the earliest manifestations of the New Orleans jazz schools, in which American marches combined with European and African traditions found their greatest fusion, raised polyphonic collective improvisation to an art form.

In the twentieth century, blues enjoyed cross-pollinating influences from jazz, Latin, Tin Pan Alley, and popular music such as country and western, rock 'n' roll, R&B, and even easy listening. Many of the earliest rock 'n' roll records of Elvis Presley are blues compositions in tone and pedigree. Conversely an artist like Ray Charles inflected country music with blues mannerisms in Modern Sounds in Country and Western Music (1962). By 1967 it was not unusual to hear Albert King crooning a light-hearted version of "The Very Thought of You," while Jimi Hendrix and Cream covered blues tunes by Muddy Waters and Howlin' Wolf.

WOLF MARSHALL

FORSYTH, GUY

b. Colorado

Singer, harmonica player, and guitarist active in Austin, Texas, in blues and blues rock. Leads and records with the own group, the Guy Forsyth Band, including three CDs on the Antone's label. Also participates in the local group, the Asylum Street Spankers.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Richard Skelly)
 Guy Forsyth website, <http://www.guyforsyth.com/> (accessed December 18, 2004).
 Isola, G. "Intro: Guy Forsyth: Slide Shaman." Guitar Player 31, no. 2 (February 1997): 24.

Discography: AMG

FORTUNE, JESSE

b. 28 February 1930; Macon, MS

Raised in Hattiesburg, Mississippi, Fortune settled in Chicago in 1952 and sang in clubs with, among others, Otis Rush and Buddy Guy, with whom he shared a piercing high voice. His two 1963 singles for USA, produced and mostly written by Willie Dixon, including the strikingly intense "Good Things" and the rumba-flavored "Too Many Cooks," attracted blues enthusiasts but brought no practical benefit for Fortune, who thereafter worked primarily as a barber. He began singing again in the 1990s with Dave Specter and the Bluebirds and has recorded Fortune Tellin' Man (1993, Delmark).

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl)
 Whiteis, David. "Jesse Fortune." Down Beat 60, no. 9 (September 1993): 15.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

FORTUNE/HI-Q

Founded in 1946 by Jack and Devora Brown, Detroit's Fortune Records issued many excellent blues, gospel, and doo-wop recordings throughout the following two decades. Along with subsidiaries Hi-Q, Strate-8, and Rendezvous, the label recorded such notable artists as John Lee Hooker, Doctor Ross, Eddie Kirkland, and Big Maceo.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- McGrath, Bob. The R&B Indies: Volume One. Canada: Eyeball Productions, 2000.

FOSTER, "BABY FACE" LEROY

b. 12 February 1923; Algoma, MS

d. 26 May 1958; Chicago, IL

Multitalented pioneer of the post-World War II southern blues resurgence in Chicago. His vocals, drumming, and guitar picking can be found on some of the greatest Chicago bar-band blues. Foster came to the city in 1945 in the company of Little Walter and pianist Johnny Jones, and then worked with Sunnyland Slim and John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson. His first appearance on record probably was as the guitarist on two sides Sunnyland Slim did for Opera, in 1947 or 1948. In a subsequent session, he played rudimentary drums on Tempo-Tone (1948) sides with Floyd Jones, Little Walter, and Sunnyland Slim. Foster made his first sides as leader for Aristocrat (1948), exhibiting an expressive ballad style similar to that of Doctor Clayton, lowering and raising the pitch with subtle artistry.

During 1948-1949, Foster played behind Muddy Waters in a couple of sessions for Aristocrat. In 1950, he recorded an extraordinary outing for Parkway; the band consisted of Muddy Waters, Little Walter, and Jimmy Rogers, while Foster took the drum chair. Foster was given artist credit (as the Baby Face Trio) on four sides, two of which made up a rollicking performance of the classic "Rollin' and Tumblin'," where on side one Foster sings the lyrics with exuberance and on side two does an eerie hum while his compatriots moan and shout. Foster then cut three sessions for JOB—in 1950, 1951, and 1952, concentrating largely on Clayton-styled ballads. He never recorded again, dissipating his career in alcoholism.

FOSTER, "BABY FACE" LEROY

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Rowe, Mike. Chicago Breakdown, pp. 74–76. London: Eddison, 1973 (published in the United States as Chicago Blues).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

FOSTER, LITTLE WILLIE

b. 20 April 1922; Dublin, MS
d. 25 November 1987; Chicago, IL

Little Willie Foster was born the son of Major Foster and Rosie Brown in Dublin, Mississippi, ten miles south of Clarksdale. (Researcher Sheldon Harris has given alternate birth data as April 5, 1922, Clarksdale, Mississippi.) Foster's mother died when he was five and he received little formal education, as he spent his childhood working the fields. His father was a local musician and taught him piano, and soon Foster was playing guitar and harmonica.

By 1942 he was working in Clarksdale, but moved to Chicago shortly thereafter. Foster started playing harmonica regularly around the city, often with Floyd Jones, Lazy Bill Lucas, and his cousins Robert Earl and "Baby Face" Leroy Foster. He also befriended Big Walter Horton, whose harmonica style he would emulate. Foster was a regular on Maxwell Street and the club scene from the mid-1940s through the mid-1950s. In 1955, Foster, with Jones, Lucas, and Eddie Taylor, recorded two classic sides for Parrot: "Falling Rain Blues" and "Four Day Jump." In 1956, Foster and band recorded two sides for Cobra: "Crying the Blues" and "Little Girl." Shortly after this session, he was seriously hurt from a gunshot wound to the head by a woman playing with a pistol at a house party. This career-ending injury partially paralyzed Foster and greatly impaired his speech.

In the early 1970s, he began sitting in around Chicago, but on January 6, 1974, Foster surrendered to police after fatally shooting his roommate. He pleaded self-defense, but due to his deteriorated condition from his brain injury, he was found not guilty by reason of insanity and was committed to a state hospital in 1975. Foster died of cancer in 1987.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Rowe, Mike. "Crying the Blues: Little Willy Foster's Story." Blues Unlimited no. 105 (December 1973/January 1974): 23.

Discography: LSFP

FOSTER, WILLIE JAMES

b. 19 September 1921; Dunleith plantation near Leland, MS
d. 20 May 2001; Jackson, TN

Harmonica player and singer; not to be confused with Little Willie Foster. Grew up in the Leland area with Jimmy Reed, and while young he saw performances by Muddy Waters and John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson. Served in World War II, and was stationed in England. Until the mid-1950s he split his time between Mississippi, Detroit, and Chicago. Eventually he settled in St. Louis, where he occasionally performed with Big George Brock. He returned to Mississippi in the mid-1960s, basing a music career around Greenville, sometimes leading his own band, at other times performing with Frank Frost, Asie Payton, and T-Model Ford. In the 1990s he made several CDs, notably At Home with the Blues (1993, RMD Music), My Life and I Found Joy (Palindrome), and Live at Airport Grocery (2000, Mempho). During the same decade, due to a foot infection, his legs were amputated. After his death, his body was buried in the same Holly Ridge cemetery where Charlie Patton lies.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Baretta, Scott. "Willie Foster" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 158 (July/August 2001): 85–86.

FOUNTAIN, CLARENCE

b. 28 November 1929; Tyler, AL

At the age of twelve, Clarence Fountain became a founding member of the (Original Five) Blind Boys of Alabama, whose members were students at the Talladega Institute for the Deaf and Blind. They made their first recording in 1948, and with the exception of a brief solo career attempt during the 1970s, Fountain has been the group's charismatic lead singer, with his gravelly vocals and high, long, falsetto wails.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

AMG (Five Blind Boys of Alabama)

See also Five Blind Boys of Alabama

FOUR BROTHERS

Chicago hard soul and blues label of the 1960s. The label and its subsidiary imprints, Bright Star and Hit Sound, were started in 1965 by one-stop distributor Willie Barney. His partners were Granville White and Jack Daniels, with the latter serving as A&R chief and producer. Headquarters were on the west side, at Barney's retail record store. Its blues artists included Junior Wells, G. L. Crockett, Andrew Brown, and Ricky Allen. The company's only national hit was G. L. Crockett's Jimmy Reed sound-alike, "It's a Man Down There" (1965), but Junior Wells's "Up in Heah" (1966) was a number one R&B record in Chicago. The principal hard soul acts were Johnny Moore and Tyrone Davis (who the company pioneered as "Tyrone the Wonder Boy"). The label essentially closed in 1967, when Jack Daniels moved to Mercury and took Junior Wells. Barney, however, occasionally revived the Four Brothers imprint during the next several decades.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. "Jack Daniels and the Four Brothers/Bright Story." Juke Blues no. 14 (Winter 1988/89): 8–13
 ———. "4 Brothers/Bright Star/Hit Sound/Label Listings." Juke Blues no. 15 (Spring 1989): 14–15.

Discography: McGrath

FOWLER, T. J.

b. 10 or 18 September 1910; Columbus, GA
 d. 22 May 1982; Lincoln Park, MI

Pianist and organist. Began career in early 1930s in Detroit suburb of Ecorse. Performed with trumpeter Clarence Dorsey in 1944; formed his own band in 1947. Acclaimed as a boogie-woogie pianist, Fowler ranked with Detroit Count (Bob White) and Ted Sheely. He had his own groups from 1947 onward. Recorded for Savoy, Paradise, and Sensation.

JIM GALLERT

Discography: LSFP

FOXX, INEZ AND CHARLIE

Inez Foxx

b. Inez Fox, 9 September 1942; Greensboro, NC

Charlie Foxx

b. Charles Fox, 23 October 1939; Greensboro, NC
 d. 18 September 1998, Mobile, AL

Brother and sister soul act of the 1960s and 1970s. Recording in New York, the duo's biggest hit was "Mockingbird," which was a top R&B and pop hit from 1963 and was frequently recorded by other acts (notably in 1974 by Carly Simon and James Taylor). Later hits by the duo included "Ask Me" (1964), "Hurt by Love" (1964), "No Stranger to Love" (1966), "Come By Here" (1966), "I Stand Accused" (1967), and "(1-2-3-4-5-6-7) Count the Days" (1967). In 1969, the duo broke up, and Inez continued to record as a solo artist. Charlie went into producing. Inez and Charlie Foxx were honored in 1995 with the Pioneer Award by the Rhythm and Blues Foundation.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Carpenter, Bil. "Inez and Charlie Foxx: A Family Affair." Goldmine (August 1, 1997): 20+.

FRAN, CAROL

b. 23 October 1933; Lafayette, LA

Singer and composer Carol Fran recorded for Excello ("Emmitt Lee"), Lyric, Port, and Roulette Records between 1957 and 1967, then spent fifteen years as a regional attraction before teaming with Texas guitarist Clarence Holliman for a series of well-received albums. Fran worked with the Don Conway Orchestra, Guitar Slim, Nappy Brown, Lee Dorsey, Joe Tex, and Clarence Holliman.

FRAN, CAROL

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Bonner, Brett J., and Brooks Tyler-Bonner. "Fran and Holliman: 'You Can't Fire Me and I Ain't Quittin'." Living Blues no. 116 (July/August 1994): 26–35.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

FRANCIS, DAVID ALBERT "PANAMA"

b. 21 December 1918; Miami, FL

d. 11 or 13 November 2001; Orlando, FL

Prominent swing and R&B drummer and bandleader, Francis was known for his exceptional technique and was highly desired as an accompanist and session player. His emphasis on the use of the bass drum to anchor the beat made him influential in the developing sounds of rhythm and blues and rock 'n' roll. He played on hundreds of recordings with such artists as Ruth Brown, Cab Calloway, Ray Charles, Big Joe Turner, and Dinah Washington.

Francis began playing drums as a child, gaining experience in marching bands and later George Kelly's big band. He moved to New York by 1938, where he worked with Tab Smith and Roy Eldridge (who gave him the nickname "Panama," after the hat he wore to the audition) before joining Lucky Millinder's band (1940–1945). Principally playing the Savoy Ballroom in Harlem, he also sat in with the Savoy Sultans. He then played with groups led by Bullmoose Jackson and Willie Bryant, before joining Cab Calloway's band (1947–1952). During this time he released recordings under his own name on the Gotham label, with other members of Calloway's group.

With larger bands breaking up, Francis found studio session work lucrative, and for a decade worked for several New York labels, including Atlantic Records, backing R&B and rock 'n' roll artists. The latter part of his career took him away from those styles and back toward the swing style he preferred. Francis appeared in several films, including shorts with Cab Calloway, Rock Around the Clock in 1956, and Lady Sings the Blues in 1972.

JEFF WANSER

Bibliography

New Grove Jazz

Dance, Stanley. The World of Swing, 2nd ed. New York: Da Capo Press. 2001.

Discography: AMG; Lord

See also Atlantic/Atco/Spark; Calloway, Cab; Drums; Gotham/20th Century; Millinder, Lucky

FRANK, EDWARD

b. 14 June 1932; New Orleans, LA

d. 13 February 1997; New Orleans, LA

Edward Frank, a New Orleans pianist, composer, and arranger, worked at Duke Records in the 1950s, coled a modern jazz quintet with saxophonist Fred Kemp, and collaborated with Chuck Carbo, Dr. John, and many others.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Hannusch, Jeff. "Edward Frank" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 134 (1997): 52.

FRANKIE AND JOHNNY

Vaudevillians recast "rough" material from black tradition for genteel whites and published it as "Frankie and Johnny" (1912, Leighton Brothers and Ren Shields). The tune commonly used for "Frankie," and sometimes "Stack Lee," follows a blues chord progression, maybe from tradition, and was published as a strain of "You're My Baby" (1912, A. Seymour Brown and Nat D. Ayer). The Leighton Brothers/Shields version has a different, non-blues tune.

In the Leighton Brothers/Shields version, Frankie and Johnny are "sweet-hearts," but when Johnny tells her that he has lost his heart to another "queen," "Miss Frankie" shoots him. Only "queen" and "Miss Frankie" suggest that she may be a prostitute. There is no indication that they are not white, as in some illustrations, plays, and movies. However, traditional versions speak of "This whore and her turtle dove" and state "She took that Nigger's life." Before 1912 the man and other woman were "Albert" and "Alice Fry." Later they increasingly followed the lyrics of the Leighton Brothers/Shields version, becoming "Johnny" and "Nellie Bly."

Twenty-three-year-old John Huston (of cinema fame) first published substantial evidence that "Frankie" is based on historic events in St. Louis, Missouri (1930). Further, he stated correctly that “Stack-o-lee” and “Billy” Lyons, and Duncan and Brady, characters in other well-known murder ballads, were St. Louis people.

In black “sporting” society, a mack (pimp and lover, “easy rider,” “fancy man,” “sweet man”) would try to multiply his woman’s earnings, primarily through gambling, to keep them both living “high” and dressed in splendor, St.-Louis-style. In 1899 Frankie Baker and her mack, seventeen-year-old Allen “Al” Britt, lived at 212 Targee Street. As a twenty-three-year-old light brown beauty, she was well known on the black “sporting wheel,” which included St. Louis, Omaha, Kansas City, Denver, San Francisco, and Chicago.

Baker and Britt had moved in together that year. By fall, Britt was consorting with eighteen-year-old Alice Pryor, another prostitute. On Sunday evening, October 15, Baker found them together at the Phoenix Hotel. They quarreled and she went home. In the early morning, Britt came home and they argued again. When he threatened her with a knife, Baker shot him through the liver with his pistol, which she had placed under a pillow. He died on October 19. Baker went free on a ruling of justifiable homicide. For many of the remaining years of her life, she lived in Portland, Oregon. She died in 1952 at Eastern Oregon State Hospital, Pendleton.

No credible evidence supports claims that “Frankie” antedates 1899 or suggestions that it is based on an 1831 North Carolina murder by Frankie Silver. It cannot be coincidence that traditional versions explicitly name Frankie Baker, Al Britt (as “Albert,” an obvious mutation), and Alice Pryor (as “Alice Fry”/“Pry”).

The popularity of “Frankie” is reflected in the diversity of the famous artists who have recorded it. These include Mississippi John Hurt, Leadbelly, Doc Watson, Pete Seeger, Bob Dylan, the Carter Family, Gene Autry, Charlie Poole, Johnny Cash, Stevie Wonder, Lonnie Donegan, Elvis Presley, Louis Armstrong, Anita O’Day, Ace Cannon, and Sammy Davis, Jr.

JOHN GARST

Bibliography

- Buckley, Bruce Redfern. “Frankie and Her Men: A Study of the Interrelationships of Popular and Folk Traditions.” Ph.D. dissertation, Indiana University, 1962. University Microfilms 6205017.
- Cray, Ed. The Erotic Muse, 2nd ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1992.
- David, John Russell. “Tragedy in Ragtime: Black Folktales from St. Louis.” Ph.D. dissertation, St. Louis University, 1976. University Microfilms 7622522.

Huston, John. Frankie and Johnny: A Play. New York: Albert & Charles Boni, 1930.

Place, Jeff. “Supplemental Notes on the Selections. Selection 21, ‘Frankie,’ Mississippi John Hurt.” In Anthology of American Folk Music, edited by Harry Smith. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Folkways, 1997 (Smithsonian Folkways CD 40090).

Selected Discography

Randolph, Vance, and G. Legman. Roll Me in Your Arms: “Unprintable” Ozark Folksongs and Folklore, Volume I, Folksongs and Music. Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1992.

FRANKLIN, GUITAR PETE

b. Edward Lamonte Franklin, 16 January 1927; Indianapolis, IN

d. 31 July 1975; Indianapolis, IN Active in the Indianapolis area, self-taught guitarist and pianist Franklin cut sides for RCA-Victor, with John Brim for JOB (1954), and a solo album for Bluesville (1961) that includes his signature song “Guitar Pete’s Blues.”

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
- Lornell, Kip. “Living Blues Interview: Guitar Pete Franklin.” Living Blues no. 9 (Summer 1972): 18–21.
- Rosenbaum, Art. Notes accompanying The Blues of Pete Franklin: Guitar Pete’s Blues (1993, Original Blues Classics OBCCD-560-2).

Discography: LSFP

FRANKLIN, REVEREND C. L.

b. Clarence LaVaughn Franklin, 22 January 1915; Sunflower County, MS

d. 27 July 1984; Detroit MI

A moving and eloquent speaker, Reverend Franklin pastored Detroit’s New Bethel Church, broadcast over WJLB, and recorded many of his sermons for Chess records. Father of singer Aretha Franklin; not to be confused with Reverend Cecil Franklin, Aretha Franklin’s brother and manager, who passed away in Detroit on December 26, 1989. Singer Bobby “Blue” Bland has stated in interviews that he was influenced in vocal delivery by Reverend Franklin’s broadcasts and recordings.

ANDREW M. COHEN/EDWARD KOMARA

FRANKLIN, REVEREND C. L.

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: Gospel Records 1943–1966

FRAZIER, CALVIN

b. 16 February 1915; Osceola, AR
d. 23 September 1972; Detroit, MI

Guitarist, singer, and composer Calvin Frazier began his travels in the early 1930s with Johnny Shines and Robert Johnson, settling in Detroit in 1935 to work with pianist Maceo Merriweather and record with Baby Boy Warren and T. J. Fowler.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris; Larkin
Paulus, George. "Motor City Blues and Boogie." Blues Unlimited no. 85 (October 1971): 4–6.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

FREEDOM/EDDIE'S

Eddie's was founded in 1947 by black former disk jockey Eddie Henry (d. 1952) in Houston; Freedom was founded in 1948 by Solomon M. Kahal (d. 1964). Kahal relied on Henry's advice, sales distributing, and initially for masters. Eddie's artists included Little Willie Littlefield and pianist Clarence Green. Freedom enjoyed hits with Goree Carter ("Rock Awhile," 1949, Freedom 1506), L. C. Williams ("Ethel Mae," 1949, Freedom 1517), Big Joe Turner, Joe Houston, and Clarence Samuels; many sessions were led by saxophonist Conrad Johnson. Freedom folded in 1951, Eddie's the next year upon Henry's death.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography and Discography

Ryan, Marc. "Let's Rock Awhile: The Story of Eddie's and Freedom Records." Blues and Rhythm no. 88 (April 1994): 4–9.

FREEMAN, DENNY

b. 7 August 1944; Orlando, FL

Guitarist, pianist. The Dallas-raised Freeman was a stalwart of the Antone's scene in Austin, Texas, performing with touring stars and recording with locals such as the Cobras and Lou Ann Barton. Freeman, who later relocated to Los Angeles, also released several solo albums, including Blues Cruise and A Tone for My Sins.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Dan Forte)

Discography: AMG (Dan Forte)

FREUND, STEVE

b. 20 July 1952; Brooklyn, NY

After moving to Chicago in 1976, Freund accompanied Big Walter Horton, Floyd Jones, and Homesick James, and worked fifteen years with Sunnyland Slim, learning to support harp as well as piano. He has led his own Bay Area band since the 1990s and has contributed precisely picked emotional guitar leads and tight rhythm on tours with the Legendary Blues Band, James Cotton, Koko Taylor, Luther Allison, Eddie "Cleanhead" Vinson, Boz Scaggs, and Little Charlie and the Nightcats. Freund has produced Henry Gray, Mark Hummel, Magic Slim, Snooky Pryor, and B. B. Odom. His own recordings include Set Me Free (1984, Razor), Romance Without Finance (1987, Red Beans) and Delmark CDs "C" for Chicago and I'll Be Your Mule, as well as considerable session work.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

AMG

Discography: AMG (Alex Henderson)

"C" For Chicago (Delmark DE-734).

FRISCO

Record Label (New Orleans, Louisiana, 1962–1964). Owners: Connie LaRocca (b. Constance Sculco, September 26, 1923; San Francisco, CA), Harold (Hal) Atkins. New Orleans, Louisiana-based, Frisco's artists include Warren "Porgy" Jones, Wardell Querzberg (as the Royal Dukes of Rhythm), Willie West (with Art Neville on piano), and Danny White ("Kiss Tomorrow Goodbye," "Loan Me a Handkerchief"). A few of Danny White's releases were leased to ABC-Paramount.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

- Broven, John. "The Frisco Label of New Orleans." Blues and Rhythm no. 128 (April 1998): 16–18.
- Jones, Tad. CD notes for The Frisco Records Story (1998, ACE [UK] CDCHD 679).

Discography: McGrathFROG/CYGNET

CD reissue label established in Walthamstow, London, England, by David French in 1994. Mainly devoted to reissues of vintage jazz and specializing in state-of-the-art remastering, often by John R. T. Davies, the label's remit has also included reissues by both jug bands and country blues artists. In 2001 the label embarked on a definitive reissue of Bessie Smith's recordings, which for the first time includes all surviving performances not issued in her lifetime. The associated Cygnet label programmed by Christopher Hillman and Roy Middleton has produced important reissues of jazz/blues groups associated with Jimmy Blythe and Bob Hudson.

HOWARD RYE

FROST, FRANK OTIS

- b. 15 April 1936; Auvergne, AR
d. 12 October 1999; Helena, AR

Frank Frost's musical interest started at age twelve, when he was taught piano by his father to play in church. Though forbidden to play blues, Frost learned the rudiments of blues guitar and harmonica, and by age fifteen was sneaking off into clubs to hear (and often sit in with) Sonny Boy Williamson II and Howlin' Wolf. He moved to St. Louis in 1951 and worked with Willie Foster, whom he credited as a major influence on harmonica. In 1954, Frost joined Sam Carr's band in St. Louis, and formed what would become a forty-five-year partnership with the drummer.

After stints with Williamson, his other harmonica influence, and Robert Nighthawk, Carr and Frost moved to Lula, Mississippi, and hired Clarksdale guitarist Jack Johnson. As Frank Frost and the Nighthawks, the trio recorded the 1962 classic Hey Boss Man! for Sam Phillips's Phillips International label, with Frost's delta harmonica and impeccably timed vocals showcasing many originals such as "Jelly Roll King." In 1966, Frost and Carr, with harmonica player Arthur Williams, recorded for Jewel Records.

Frost, Carr, and Johnson recorded again in 1978 as the Jelly Roll Kings on Michael Frank's Earwig label, which established them worldwide as the archetypical Delta blues band.

Frost appeared in the 1986 film Crossroads and recordings followed for Appaloosa, Fat Possum, and HMG. Years of hard living took its toll in the mid-1990s, and after serious health problems, he made his final public appearance at Helena's 1999 King Biscuit Blues Festival, with Carr by his side. Frost died four days later of cardiac arrest.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- Empson, Alan. "Frank Frost." Juke Blues no. 46 (Spring 2000): 64–65.
- O'Neal, Jim. "Frank Frost." Living Blues no. 7 (Winter 1971–72): 26–28.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

- The Jelly Roll Kings. Rockin' the Juke Joint Down (1993, Earwig 4901CD).
- Frank Frost. Harpin' On It—Complete 1966 Jewel Recordings (2001, Westside WESM633).

FULBRIGHT, J. R.(See Elko)FULLER, BLIND BOY

- b. Fulton Allen, 10 July 1907; Wadesboro, Anson County, NC
d. 13 February 1941; Durham, NC

Blues singer, guitarist. Fulton Allen was one of the ten children of Calvin Allen and Mary Jane Walker from the small country market town of Wadesboro in Anson County, North Carolina. Anson birth dates only date from 1913, so there is some confusion about his day of birth, but July 10, 1907, appears the most likely date. Little is known about his early years, but Fulton reached fourth grade in school.

His mother died in the early 1920s and in the mid-1920s Fulton's father moved the family to nearby Rockingham. It was there that Fulton met his future wife, Cora Mae Martin. In 1926 they married; Fulton was nineteen and his bride only fourteen years of age. In Rockingham his eyes began to trouble him. In 1927, when the couple had moved to Winston-Salem, Fulton began to lose his vision. He had to give up his work as a laborer at a coal yard because of his blindness and was forced to try to make a living playing the guitar. One sister and a brother also played the guitar, but Fulton had never done any serious practicing until 1927. In 1928 Fulton was completely blind. In 1929 Fulton and Cora Mae moved to Durham. They were very poor and Cora Mae applied for blind assistance in 1936.

Blind Boy Fuller. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

In July 1935 Fulton Allen made his first recordings for ARC in New York City under the pseudonym “Blind Boy Fuller.” He had been taken there by talent scout J. B. Long who first gave him some new clothes from his own shop. Blind Boy Fuller did not create a new style, but drew heavily on other artists. Blind Gary Davis was his mentor, but Blind Blake, Big Bill Broonzy, Julius Daniels, the Harlem Hamfats, Blind Lemon Jefferson, Carl Martin, Joe McCoy, Blind Willie McTell, Memphis Minnie, Buddy Moss, Yank Rachell, and Tampa Red were also sources of inspiration. His imagery was strong and the lyrics were inspired and clearly sung. He used a National Steel guitar with its great resonance and finger picked to further enhance the sound. In four days Fuller recorded twelve songs, accompanied by Blind Gary Davis on the first eight songs and with the extra dimension of Bull City Red’s refreshing washboard rattle on three of them. One of the 1935 songs, “Homesick and Lonesome Blues,” provides a rare glimpse of Fuller’s bottleneck guitar skills. A year later, in April 1936, Fuller was back in the New York studio. In two days he recorded ten solo pieces. One of them was “Truckin’ My Blues Away,” which was to become one of Fuller’s signature pieces.

In 1937 Fuller had to travel to New York no less than four times—in February, July, September, and December. Forty-nine songs were recorded at these four sessions. Bull City Red was with him in February and September. In September and December there was a second guitarist present: Floyd “Dipper Boy” Council (1911–1976), a truck driver who was known on his own records as “The Devil’s Daddy-in-Law.” The July sessions were recorded not for J. B. Long’s ARC, but for Mayo Williams’s Decca label. Fuller introduced Williams to his friends Richard and Willie Trice who were also recorded. Richard Trice recorded as “Little Boy Fuller” after 1943. J. B. Long was furious when he heard of the Decca recordings. Fuller had broken his contract; Long bluffed and threatened to sue. The result was that most of the Fuller Decca recordings remained unissued in Fuller’s lifetime. Long now drew up a real contract with Fuller and bought him a cheap car. Willie Trice was one of the chauffeurs. Fuller was paid twenty dollars per recording by Long. In September and December Fuller recorded for ARC again. In December he took with him harmonica virtuoso Sonny Terry from his home state of North Carolina.

In 1938 Fuller recorded in New York in April and in Columbia, South Carolina, in October. Sonny Terry was on both sessions and Bull City Red on the December one. “Big House Blues” refers to the prison where Fuller was locked up for shooting his wife in the leg, a case that caused a sensation because of Fuller’s blindness. The shooting was probably accidental, for Cora Mae and Alton were inseparable, and the case was dismissed. That same year, Fuller’s health took a downturn: in October 1938, he was diagnosed with arrested syphilis and suffered from problems with his kidneys and bladder.

Both Sonny Terry and Bull City Red were also present on the July 1939 date in Memphis. However, there is also a second guitarist on “You’ve Got Something There” and “Red’s Got the Piccolo Blues,” who may be Sonny Jones.

Fuller’s final recording year was 1940. Fuller was back in New York in March, together with Sonny Terry and Bull City Red and went to Chicago with Terry, Bull City Red, and Brownie McGhee. On March 5, Fuller recorded one of his signature pieces, “Step It Up and Go,” which he probably learned from Charlie Burse. On March 6, 1940, Fuller accompanied Sonny Terry on “Harmonica Stomp,” the only time he ever accompanied anyone on record. Brownie McGhee thought that he had never recorded with Fuller, but when Guido van Rijn played him “Precious Lord” from the final session he agreed that the vocal was his. This song and several other religious songs from 1940 were issued as by “Brother George and His Sanctified Singers.”

One month after his final recordings Fuller was in the hospital. On his deathbed he swore that he would cross over to the church if he recovered. It was not to be. Blind Boy Fuller died on February 13, 1941, from an infected bladder and a stricture of the urethra. He was buried at Grove Hill Cemetery, which fell into disuse and disrepair; Fuller’s grave, along with nearly all others in the cemetery, is now unmarked.

Fuller left an impressive recorded legacy of 129 separate master titles in addition to quite a few alternative takes. There is a surprising amount of variation in his repertoire and for a long time he was to remain an influential blues artist. Apart from his accompanists on the records, a few of the many blues artists he influenced are J. C. Burris, Carolina Slim, Pernell Charity, Arthur Gunter, Doug Quattlebaum, Tarheel Slim, Baby Tate, Curley Weaver, and Ralph Willis. On May 22, 1941, Brownie McGhee recorded for Okeh as “Blind Boy Fuller #2.” One of his songs was entitled “Death of Blind Boy Fuller.”

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

- AMG (Barry Lee Pearson); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Bastin, Bruce. “Blind Boy Fuller.” In Crying for the Carolines, pp. 9–34. London: Studio Vista, 1971.
 ———. “Blind Boy Fuller.” In Red River Blues, pp. 214–240. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
 Grossman, Stefan (ed.) and Bruce Bastin. Stefan Grossman’s Masters of Country Blues Guitar: Featuring Blind Boy Fuller. Miami: CPP/Belwin, 1992.

Discography: DGR

FULLER, JESSE “LONE CAT”

b. 12 March 1896; Jonesboro, GA
 d. 29 January 1976; Oakland, CA

Singer and guitarist, with kazoo and harmonica. Arrived in San Francisco in the 1920s, and turned to performing music in the early 1950s. He was a blues and folk music favorite on the 1960s and 1970s folk music and festival circuits.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O’Neal and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern

Discography: AMG; LSPF

FULLER, JOHNNY

b. 20 April 1929; Edwards, MS
 d. 20 May 1985; Oakland, CA

An eclectic artist, Johnny Fuller has recorded in California all kinds of music—down-home blues, city blues, slick blues, R&B, and country music—while retaining a large dose of his Mississippi roots, particularly in his guitar playing. He enjoyed some commercial success with “Johnny Ace’s Last Letter,” “Fool’s Paradise,” and “Haunted House,” but his earthiest sides like “Back Home,” “Buddy,” or “First Stage of the Blues” made him a strong reputation in the blues circles. He stopped his musical career in the late 1960s and made a living as a mechanic.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSPF

FULP, PRESTON

b. 1 November 1915; Stokes City, NC
 d. 23 October 1993; Winston Salem, NC

Among the last of Winston-Salem’s Depression Era bluesmen, Fulp worked at a sawmill, farmed tobacco, made whiskey, and played both blues and hillbilly music. One Musicmaker CD was released a few months before he died.

ANDREW M. COHEN

Bibliography

- Duffy, Timothy. “North Carolina Blues: Winston-Salem Blues. Part 1.” Living Blues no. 107 (January/February 1993): 35–39.
 ———. “Preston Fulp” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 113 (January/February 1994): 43.

FULSON, LOWELL

b. 31 March 1921; Tulsa, OK

d. 7 March 1999; Long Beach, CA

Fulson was a talented guitarist and vocalist but most of all he was a resilient performer and songwriter who effectively adapted to changing tastes and styles, consistently making a lasting mark in each subgenre before moving on.

Fulson, born on the Choctaw Indian Strip south of Tulsa, was proud of his Native American heritage but he was also fascinated by blues at an early age. After singing and playing socials as a child, he joined Dan Wright's string band in 1939 when it came through Ada, Oklahoma, playing guitar in the elaborate seventeen-piece big band. He then hit the road with folk bluesman Texas Alexander, working his way through Texas and ultimately settling in Gainesville in 1941 and working as a cook when the blues gigs dried up.

Following a U.S. Navy stint in Guam, Fulson returned to Oklahoma in 1945 and found employment as a cook again but soon decided to put his full time and energy into a music career. He relocated to Oakland, California, where he had been stationed during military boot camp, and he had a recording deal with Big Town Records within weeks. His first singles were country-tinged guitar duets with his brother Martin, but Fulson soon assembled a full band, one including Ray Charles on piano.

On the strength of a series of classic hit singles, including "Three O'Clock Blues" and "Every Day I Have the Blues," Fulson and his band, featuring saxist Stanley Turrentine in addition to pianist Charles, toured widely, performing at the Apollo Theater in 1951 and playing dates throughout the South. In 1954 Fulson, recording for the Checker affiliate of Chess Records, had his biggest career hit in "Reconsider Baby," a song recorded in Dallas with saxist David "Fathead" Newman sitting in. The song was subsequently covered by everyone from Elvis Presley to Prince.

But Fulson's relationship with Chess was a stormy one and the music produced was erratic and atypical of his usual sound. Chess demanded Fulson record in Chicago under their supervision and with their sidemen, who included Windy City legends Otis Spann and Willie Dixon. But their sensibilities were mismatched with Fulson's West Coast approach and he ultimately took over and produced his own sessions in Los Angeles with more sympathetic sidemen.

Fulson reinvented himself in 1960s, emphasizing a funky R&B persona in his recordings for Kent Records. He scored hits with "Black Nights" and "Tramp," the latter subsequently becoming a smash success for Otis Redding and Carla Thomas in 1966. Fulson moved on to Jewel Records in the 1970s and seemed to be nearing the end of his commercial career in the 1980s when his diminished touring and recording activity was highlighted only by One More Blues, an album recorded in France in 1984 with the Phillip Walker Blues Band.

It's a Good Day, released in 1988, kicked off another phase of Fulson's career. Hold On, with longtime friend and musical associate, West Coast pianist Jimmy McCracklin making his belated recording debut with Fulson, won the 1993 W. C. Handy award for Best Traditional Album to cap his comeback period.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Aldin, Mary Katherine. "Lowell Fulson." Living Blues no. 115 (May/June 1994): 10-27.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

FUNDERBURGH, ANSON

b. 14 or 15 November 1954; Plano, TX

Guitarist Funderburgh was carving out a low-key, but accomplished, career for himself on the Dallas scene when he joined forces with Sam Myers to create a synergistic blues success that upgraded both his music and its popularity. Funderburgh formed his band the Rockets in 1978 and built up a reputation as a no-nonsense live act. Funderburgh subsequently went solo in 1981, with his debut Talk to You by Hand, which also served as the first album released by the new Black Top Records label.

Funderburgh's partnership with Myers, a Mississippi-born harpist/singer who had worked with Elmore James and Robert Lockwood, began in 1986. It was both an immediate and enduring success, winning W. C. Handy Awards in 1988, 1992, and 1994 for best band while establishing itself as one of the hardest working and most popular American touring blues acts. The combination of Funderburgh's lean, stinging Texas guitar lines and Myers's soulful Delta-bred Chicago vocal stylings gave the band an unusually deep and diverse sound, one especially effective in live performances. In addition, Myers proved to be an excellent songwriter, beginning in 1986 with "My Love Is Here to Stay," his first recording with the band, and that allowed the band to personalize its repertoire as well as its signature sound.

The sound was put to good use on a series of critically and commercially successful albums, including Sins, the 1988 Handy winner for album of year, Rack 'Em Up, That's What They Want, and Change in My Pocket. Funderburgh brought the music home in 2003, emphasizing the basic blues sensibilities of his native state with Which Way Is Texas?, recorded, of course, in Austin.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Al Campbell); Larkin
Art Tipaldi, "Anson and Sam: Finding the Balance." Blues Revue no. 43 (December 1998): 12–15.

Discography: AMG

FUNK

Historical and Social Contexts

It is interesting to note that the three mainstream styles of African American popular music in the early and mid-1960s, Motown, Stax, and Chicago soul, were all in their own individual ways products of the central social/political facts of integration and the Civil Rights Movement. The story of Motown and Barry Gordy Jr., for example, was predicated on the rise of large-scale black capitalism partially inspired and made possible by the momentous changes of the times; whereas Stax and southern soul, on the other hand, can be seen as a product of the Civil Rights Movement in that they were founded squarely on the collaboration of black and white musicians. To paraphrase Peter Guralnick in Sweet Soul Music, southern soul music, purely and simply, grew out of the impulse toward integration. (In the South at the time, this was a political gesture, whether conceived as such or not.) Finally, Chicago soul in the mid-1960s tied directly to the Civil Rights Movement via both the lyric content and mode of performance of songs such as "People Get Ready" and "We're a Winner."

The Civil Rights Movement, as led by Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., brought about substantial and profound legal and social changes for black and white Americans. For many, the tenor of the time was optimistic—a new day was dawning, very soon all people would be free and equal and most of the garbage that had infected American life for close to four hundred years would shortly be a distant half-remembered relic of an earlier less civilized place and time.

Such a dream had a lot of resonance but proved ultimately to be naive. By 1967 there may not have been legally segregated washrooms and drinking fountains, blacks may not have had to ride at the back of the bus, and, theoretically, the same schools were open to all, but the reality for the vast majority of African American people was that their lives remained basically the same. They lived in segregated housing in areas of cities with the least social amenities, the schooling their children received was markedly inferior to what white children received, and they continued to be the last hired and the first fired in the job market, earning wages substantially lower than their white counterparts. In other words, equality wasn't even remotely at hand.

As this reality slowly made itself manifest, the tenor of parts of black America began to change. In 1966 during the James Meredith march in Mississippi the former Stokely Carmichael coined the phrase "Black Power." A year earlier Watts had burned in the first of the modern-day race rebellions. In 1967 Newark and Detroit would also burn. This new militancy no longer asked for equality and strove to achieve it by adopting mainstream (read "white middle class") standards of deportment. Instead, equality was assumed and demanded and black Americans were encouraged to celebrate and embrace everything black. Phrases such as "black is beautiful" emerged at this point in time. Africa was taken up psychologically as the motherland. African garb and African names achieved cultural currency, as did the "Afro" or "natural" haircut.

James Brown

Not surprisingly, these changes in beliefs and ideals, this re-Africanization of black culture, was reflected musically. In popular music the most radical example of these impulses was the development of funk by James Brown. In the simplest terms, Brown, beginning in 1967 with a record called "Cold Sweat," de-emphasized melody and harmony (that is, no chord changes within sections of a song, near spoken lyrics) while privileging rhythm (both in qualitative and quantitative terms—that is, employing more complex syncopated figures and using several different rhythm patterns at once to create interlocked grooves). This reconstruction of Brown's music could be interpreted as de-emphasizing parameters favored by Euro-American society while privileging sub-Saharan African characteristics, in effect re-Africanizing the music, thus paralleling the re-Africanization of African American society at large at the time.

For example, the rhythmically interlocking parts of “Cold Sweat” parallel the musicological and the sociological formations of African drum ensembles. All of the instrumental parts gain full meaning only in the context of the whole, and that meaning is primarily articulated through rhythmic relationships, secondarily through pitch relationships. The correlation between this type of rhythmic organization and a societal ideal tending toward pluralistic, yet interpersonal, and communal values is quite manifest. Everyone and every part is dependent, in a positive sense, on the individual contribution of everyone else. According to a number of scholars, including Richard Waterman, Kwabena Nketia, Robert Farris Thompson, and John Chernoff, interlocked drum patterns, or multi-part rhythmic structures as Nketia refers to them, reflect this very same societal ideal in African drum ensembles. In “Cold Sweat” the employment of interlocked grooves feeds into the concept of re-Africanization—both on the musical level of interlocked groove itself and on the social level of communal codependent gestures combining for a greater whole. In other words, re-Africanization is manifested on the concrete level in the musical gesture itself and on the symbolical level in the very fact that the musical whole replicates a particular societal ideal.

It could be argued that the grooves found in all African American and African American-influenced musics are in a sense interlocked. Here, though, due to the deprivileging of melodic and harmonic content, greater focus is brought to bear on rhythm. This, combined with what could be argued to be an intensification of syncopation at the level of the sixteenth rather than the eighth note, meant that, for many, funk automatically connoted Africa.

Sub-Saharan African musical practices, of course, have a richness and variety that goes far beyond the simplistic stereotype of African music as being rhythmically complex but melodically simple. Such a stereotype, as erroneous as it is, had cultural currency at the time with many, if not most, white and black North Americans. It is likely that this stereotype was understood as a truism by the majority of Brown’s audience as well as by Brown and his musicians. As such, its cultural meaning, its value as a semiotic sign connoting Africanness, holds.

Note that Brown himself has never connected funk to African musical practices. He saw funk as the development of something wholly new. The re-Africanization of black culture was a loose concept that tied most meaningfully to a general sense of a newly emergent pro-black consciousness-at-large that could be expressed in a variety of ways. Some of these ways tied directly to Africa while others simply connoted a strong sense of blackness that automatically resonated with the larger affinity of blackness and Africa on a general ideological level. Brown and everyone else intrinsically understood funk to be manifestly “blacker” than the music he had been creating up to this point and than most other forms of contemporaneous rhythm and blues, including Motown, Stax, and Chicago soul.

Cynthia Rose, in her book Living in America: The Soul Saga of James Brown, argues that while European cultures tend toward linearity with gestures having clear beginnings, middles, and ends, sub-Saharan African and African cultures tend toward an aesthetic of circularity where a process is continually repeated in a cyclic manner. Beginnings and endings are not as important as the fact of the process itself. Funk music, as manifested by “Cold Sweat,” is predicated on the latter aesthetic. This is yet one more way that funk manifests the notion of re-Africanization.

Within a year Brown had connected funk lyrically to the newly emergent black consciousness, specifically with the song “Say It Loud, I’m Black and I’m Proud.” Significantly, this would be his last top ten pop hit until 1985’s “Living in America.” Conversely, this was the beginning of his greatest success on the R&B charts. (Between 1968 and 1974 Brown had forty-one R&B hits, thirty-two of which went top ten. This is extraordinary testimony to the meaning Brown’s version of funk held for the black community in the United States at the time.) It would appear that as Brown’s music became understood as more African, it was encoded or at least decoded by blacks and whites as having a value and aesthetic system that was largely outside of the experience of most Euro-Americans. Consequently, most white Americans found little they could relate to while, in direct contrast, black Americans embraced funk as one of the most meaningful expressive forms of the time.

Given the adoption in the 1980s and 1990s, via the influence of Brown, of the aesthetics of both the interlocked groove and circularity in rap and the unparalleled acceptance of rap by white America, perhaps much of America has become in a certain sense Africanized, re- or otherwise.

Funk from the Late 1960s to the Present

In the late 1960s, the musical revolution kick-started by “Cold Sweat” was not lost on many of Brown’s contemporaries. In early 1968 Sly and the Family

Stone emerged from the Bay Area with a racially and sexually integrated ensemble that fused aspects of rock and soul over an ever increasingly syncopated funk groove. In Detroit, Norman Whitfield's late 1960s and early 1970s productions on the Temptations, Edwin Starr, and Undisputed Truth quickly emulated the hybrid style of the Family Stone. Other Motown artists, most notably Stevie Wonder and Marvin Gaye, began using funk rhythms on such early 1970s masterpieces as "Living in the City," "Boogie on Reggae Woman," "What's Going On," and "Trouble Man." In late 1969 Jimi Hendrix replaced the integrated Jimi Hendrix Experience with the all-black Band of Gypsies and began to wed his brand of psychedelic blues guitar lines with funk bass lines, rhythm guitar parts, and drum patterns. While the Band of Gypsies were short lived, for the rest of his life Hendrix continued to explore this fusion of blues melodic lines and funk rhythms.

At the same time that Hendrix was wedding blues to funk, jazz trumpeter Miles Davis was fusing his own blues-inflected jazz lines with funk rhythms, hiring Motown bass player Michael Henderson to anchor his 1970s fusion bands. Davis's 1972 album On the Corner represents a milestone in jazz funk. Other notable practitioners of jazz-funk included Davis alumni Herbie Hancock's Headhunters, Ramsey Lewis, George Duke, and Roy Ayers.

Funk also proved to be popular among soul musicians in the South. In New Orleans, Allen Toussaint's late 1960s and early 1970s productions on The Meters, Lee Dorsey, and LaBelle foregrounded funk-based syncopations. In Memphis, beginning with "Do the Funky Chicken" in late 1969, veteran R&B and soul singer Rufus Thomas wrote and recorded a series of funk records centered around both existing and newly created dance steps. Label mates The Staple Singers used a hybrid funk/reggae groove for their 1972 hit single "I'll Take You There."

Thomas's and The Meters' records reached deep into the essence of the funk, presenting the oeuvre in nearly minimalist form. At the opposite end of the sonic spectrum were Isaac Hayes's blaxploitation masterpieces. Beginning with the ground breaking "Theme from Shaft" in 1971, Hayes virtually defined the genre of black soundtrack writing. Action scenes in these films acquired much of their dramatic cache via the churning cauldrons of polyrhythm funk concocted by the ever more expansive maestro. A number of black songwriters subsequently penned funk soundtracks for blaxploitation films, the most notable being Curtis Mayfield's Superfly, Bobby Womack's Across 110th Street, and James Brown's Black Caesar and Slaughter's Big Rip-Off.

Beginning in the mid-1970s, a number of self-contained funk bands such as Graham Central Station, Funkadelic/Parliament, Bootsy's Rubber Band, the Ohio Players, the Bar-Kays, Kool and the Gang, Rufus, War, Mandrill, Tower of Power, Brothers Johnson, Fatback Band, Brick, Slave, Zapp, Cameo, Con Funk Shun, the Dazz Band and, to some degree, Earth, Wind and Fire became dominant representing the only real alternative to disco on mainstream black radio.

In the early 1970s, the heightened sense of blackness that was part and parcel of funk was partially signified by the use of additional percussive instruments, conga drums being ubiquitous on funk recordings between 1970 and 1975. Early 1970s black music in general was also marked by the adoption of the electric piano as the primary keyboard instrument replacing the organ and acoustic piano combination that had dominated in the soul era. By the mid-1970s, synthesizers had replaced the electric piano, with late 1970s Bar-Kays tracks containing a dozen or more synth parts, creating layer upon layer of timbre and syncopation.

Funk rhythms have been ubiquitous in many examples of both black and white popular music since the mid-1980s. Black artists such as Prince, Meshell Ndegeocello, and Lauryn Hill and white groups such as the Red Hot Chili Peppers, Primus, and Rage Against the Machine routinely integrate funk rhythms and funk sensibilities with a wide range of other influences.

ROBERT BOWMAN

Bibliography

- Brown, James, with Bruce Tucker. James Brown: The Godfather of Soul. New York: Macmillan, 1986.
- Guralnick, Peter. Sweet Soul Music: Rhythm & Blues and the Southern Dream of Freedom. New York: Harper & Row, 1986.
- Rose, Cynthia. Living in America: The Soul Saga of James Brown. London: Serpent's Tail, 1990.
- Vincent, Rickey. Funk: The Music, the People, and the Rhythm of the One. New York: St. Martin's Griffin, 1996.

G

GADDY, BOB

b. 4 February 1924; Vivian, WV
b. 24 July 1997; Bronx, NY

Bob Gaddy was born on February 4, 1924, in Vivian, West Virginia, a small coal-mining town. He was raised in North Carolina, growing up under the strong influence of traditional gospel music. During World War II while in the Navy, he was stationed in the Pacific and on the West Coast. Gaddy's traditional church music roots began to broaden as he absorbed the sounds he heard on the West Coast including blues, jazz, and boogie-woogie. Upon his discharge from the service in 1946, Gaddy moved to New York and became an active session pianist for Brownie McGhee, Sonny Terry, and others. In 1952 Gaddy recorded his first release, "Bicycle Boogie," on the Jackson label. During the 1950s he made several recordings for the Jax, Harlem, Dot, and Old Town labels spawning regional hits such as "Woe Is Me" and "Operator." Gaddy joined with guitarist Larry Dale to form the Houserockers, one of the top R&B groups in the New York/New Jersey area. As the blues revival of the 1960s waned during the 1970s, Gaddy worked as a cook at a midtown New York City Irish bar on Madison Avenue. In 1987 both Gaddy and guitarist Larry Dale were reintroduced to blues audiences when they were featured at the Blues Estafette in Utrecht, Holland, and in New York, they played with a local group, Killing Floor. (Gaddy recorded with Killing Floor on the OSA label), and they were featured (along with Roscoe Gordon) in a concert presented by the World Music Institute. Gaddy later recorded with Paul Oscher. His last known release was on the Lollipop label.

Gaddy often described his style of playing as "blues with rhythm." His tight joyful piano style and crisp vocals on standards such as "Flip Flop and Fly" or his own "Rip and Run" held onto a tradition that was both individual and of its time. His most comprehensive recording of "Rip and Run" first appeared on the Old Town label, and was then reissued on Ace and most recently on an expanded CD reissue on the Japanese P Vine label. Bob Gaddy died on July 24, 1997, at Veterans Hospital in the Bronx.

GEORGE BOZIWICK

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Broven, John. "Yeah, That's Bob Gaddy!" Juke Blues no. 8 (Spring 1987): 9-12.
Peters, Margey. "Bob Gaddy" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 136 (November/December 1997): 49-51.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

GAILLARD, BULEE "SLIM"

b. 1 (?) January 1916; Detroit, MI, or Santa Clara, Cuba
d. 26 February 1991; London, England

GAILLARD, BULEE “SLIM”

Birth data uncertain, whether date is January 1, 3, or 4, 1916, or whether he was born in Cuba (by Gaillard’s account) or in Detroit (according to a 1960 article). Renowned primarily for his comedic vocal inventiveness and showmanship, Gaillard also possessed considerable musical prowess on both guitar and piano, and is regarded as one of the seminal figures in jive music (the forerunner of jump-blues) in the 1940s. Gaillard concocted and practiced his own jive vernacular, incorporating suffixes such as “oreeny” and “vouty” into the lyrics of his compositions, which themselves contained such absurd titles as “Avocado Seed Soup Symphony” and “Serenade to a Poodle.” Gaillard’s primary mandate was to entertain, and his infectious style influenced many later blues performers.

DONNA LOWE/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Dreyfus, L. “Slim Gaillard.” Jazz Panorama no. 1 (1960): 6.
Milkowski, Bill. Swing It: An Annotated History of Jive.
New York: Billboard Books, 2001.
Penny, Dave. “Slim Gaillard” [obituary]. Blues & Rhythm
no. 60 (1991): 17.

Discography: Lord

GAINES, EARL

b. 19 August 1935; Decatur, AL

Soul singer whose style is strongly influenced by his formative years singing in church. While lead singer for Louis Brooks and His Hi-Toppers, Gaines sang lead on the group’s 1955 Excello hit single “It’s Love Baby (24 Hours a Day).” He went on to have several hits on his own in the 1960s and 1970s. He made a comeback to record with Appaloosa, Magnum, and Black Top labels in the 1990s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Larkin

Discography: AMG; LSFP

GAINES, GRADY

b. 14 May 1934; Waskom, TX

The older brother of guitarist Roy Gaines, tenor saxophonist Grady Gaines first found his place on the international stage as leader of the Upsetters, backing band for Little Richard. While Gaines did not play on the majority of Little Richard’s most influential recordings (Lee Allen is heard on them), in the decades since, Gaines has earned his own reputation as one of the hottest jump-blues acts around.

Raised in the Houston area, Gaines entered the music business as a member of the house band for Don Robey’s Duke/Peacock labels, recording behind Clarence “Gatemouth” Brown and Big Walter Price, among others. In 1955, Little Richard asked him to head up his touring band; two years later, Richard quit popular music to pursue the ministry, but Gaines kept the band together. During the next 15 years, the Upsetters backed everyone from Sam Cooke to James Brown, Curtis Mayfield to Jackie Wilson. In the early 1970s, Gaines returned home to Houston and ran the house band at a nightclub Robey owned. After Robey’s death in 1975, Gaines toured with singer Millie Jackson for a few years before retiring from the music business in 1980.

In 1985, Gaines returned to gigging around Houston. In 1988, his reconstituted Texas Upsetters, featuring his brother Roy and Clarence Hollimon on guitar, released Full Gain, which sold well enough to establish him as a favorite of the blues circuit. In the years since, Gaines has continued to tour and record under his own name, establishing himself as one of the main heirs to Louis Jordan’s jump-blues.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

- Larkin; Santelli
Damora, Robert. “Grady Gaines.” Living Blues no. 131
(January/February 1997): 44.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

- Full Gain* (1988, Black Top BT-1041).
Horn of Plenty (1992, Black Top BT-1084).

GAINES, ROY

b. 12 August 1937 (?); Waskom, TX

Texas guitarist and singer influenced and inspired by T-Bone Walker. Gaines spent the first half of his long career backing artists ranging from Bobby “Blue” Bland and Junior Parker to Billie Holiday and Ray Charles. For the past 20 years, he has been active as leader. He is the younger brother of saxophonist Grady Gaines.

Birth year has been cited as 1937 or 1934. After growing up in the Houston area idolizing Walker, at age sixteen Gaines moved to Los Angeles and joined the band of Little Milton. After returning to Texas, he backed Bland and Parker before touring with Joe Turner and then backing Chuck Willis. Work with King Curtis, Big Mama Thornton, Jimmy Rushing, Holiday, and even jazz luminary Coleman Hawkins followed. During the 1960s, Gaines kept busy with session work with artists including Charles, Stevie Wonder, and Aretha Franklin.

In the 1970s, Gaines played with his hero, touring with Walker until his death. He also worked with the Jazz Crusaders and their subsequent incarnation, the Crusaders. Since the early 1980s, Gaines has been recording and touring under his own name, playing an up-tempo Texas swing blues most reminiscent of Walker. During that time, he has issued a series of well-received albums and become a fixture on the blues circuit.

He hasn't completely abandoned his role as preeminent session guitarist, though, lending his sound to Quincy Jones's Color Purple soundtrack in 1985, joining Albert Collins and Joe Louis Walker on the Feds soundtrack (1988), and sitting in on Candye Kane's 1994 release, Home Cookin'.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Larkin
Shurman, Dick. "Gainesville Roy Gaines." Living Blues no. 37 (March/April 1978): 22–25.

Discography: LSFP

Full Gain (1988, Black Top BT-1041, with Grady Gaines and the Texas Upsetters).
I Got the T-Bone Walker Blues (1999, Groove Note 1002).
New Frontier Lover (2000, Severn 8).

GAITHER, BILL (1)

b. 23 February 1927; Los Angeles, CA
d. 24 August 1985; Los Angeles, CA

Tenor saxophonist best known for his work with singer Roy Milton.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: LSFP

GAITHER, BILL (2) "LEROY'S BUDDY"

b. 21 April 1910; Belmont, KY
d. 30 October 1970; Indianapolis, IN

Singer and guitarist of the 1930s, whose recorded performances show that his vocal style was heavily influenced by Leroy Carr (hence the nickname).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR

GALES BROTHERS

Recorded together one CD for the House of Blues label, Left Hand Brand (1995). Members consisted of Eric and Eugene Gales of the Eric Gales Band, and their brother Little Jimmy King (born Manuel Gales). All were from Memphis, Tennessee. Other family members include father Samuel Gales (1935–1999) and brother Daniel.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG

Discography: AMG

GALLAGHER, RORY

b. 2 March 1949; Ballyshannon, Eire (Ireland)
d. 14 June 1995; London, England

Guitarist and singer. Brought up in Cork, Gallagher's influences included Leadbelly, Buddy Guy, Freddie King, Albert King, Muddy Waters, and John Lee Hooker. He began playing guitar at nine and acquired his trademark battered Stratocaster at age fourteen.

Gallagher began performing in a showband in Cork as teenager, then formed blues-rock trio Taste in 1965. The band established its reputation, including a triumph at the Isle of Wight Festival 1970, then split in acrimonious fashion early in 1971. Gallagher formed his own trio with Gerry McAvoy (bass) and Wilgar Campbell (drums).

Gallagher recorded three albums in trio format, then added Lou Martin (keyboards), with Rod De'Ath on drums. The hard-working guitarist's honest, no-frills approach to blues rock (symbolized by his sartorial choice of denims and plaid shirt) won him a loyal following, and established his band as an international concert attraction. That approach can be heard clearly on his live albums of the period, including Live in Europe (1972) and Irish Tour '74. His gutsy, exciting guitar work and limited but passionate vocals were made for the live setting, but his studio albums were also strong. Gallagher retained his affection for country blues and slide guitar as well as the electric side of his work, and usually included such material in shows and recordings. He recorded with one of his idols, Muddy Waters, on The London Sessions (1972), and also appeared live with Albert King at Montreux in 1975.

The quartet disbanded after Calling Card (1976), but continued as a trio with McAvoy and Ted McKenna (drums) until 1991 (with a long break in the mid-1980s), then with Brendan O'Neil (drums) until 1994. His last band was a quintet/sextet without the long-serving McAvoy. Gallagher fell ill during a European tour in 1994 and died from complications following a liver transplant; thousands attended his funeral in Cork.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- Coghe, Jean Noel, trans. Laura Carson and Brian Steer. Rory Gallagher. Cork: Mercier Press, 2001.
 Muise, Dan. Gallagher, Marriott, Derringer, Trower: Their Lives and Music. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 2002.

Discography

Taste (1969, Polydor 583 042); On the Boards (1970, Polydor 583 083); Deuce (1971, Polydor 2383 076); Live Taste (1971, Polydor 2310 082); Rory Gallagher (1971, Polydor 2383 044); Live in Europe (1972, Polydor 2383 112); Blueprint (1973, Polydor 2383 189); Tattoo (1973, Polydor 2383 239); Irish Tour '74 (1974, Polydor 2659 031); Against the Grain (1975, Chrysalis 1098); Calling Card (1976, Chrysalis 1124); Defender (1987, Demon 98); Fresh Evidence (1990, Capo 14).

GANDY DANCERS

Gandy dancers were African American railroad workers in the early twentieth century whose rhythmic movements while laying and repairing track appeared to be like a dance. The origin of the term “gandy” was believed to be a reference to the Gandy Manufacturing Company of Chicago, which was thought to have produced track-laying tools and equipment in the early twentieth century. Records at the Chicago Historical Society indicate, however, no one has ever verified such a company existed. Others have speculated the derivation comes from the movements of the workers who shook their legs like ganders as they tamped down the ballast.

Gandy dancers worked in small groups and sang in time to their physical movements. A variety of songs sung at various tempos paced the workers during the tasks of dragging, lifting, and aligning rails, driving spikes, and tamping the ballast of the gravel beds. The caller would lead the singing, thereby coordinating the work and lifting the spirits of his crew. Due to the heavy weight of the rails, a unified effort on the part of the crew was essential to the precision, success, and safety of the work. The callers mixed bits and pieces from folk ballads and spirituals along with improvised lines that they made up on the spot. Alan Lomax points out that often the song was a signal to the foreman about how much work could be accomplished for the day:

We can't tamp no nine-mile section
 All in one day, buddy,
 All in one day, boy.

Frequently the caller would sing about sex and women during the final moments of a hard job where he would have been singing out a work directive before that. Because of the nature of the work, the songs were void of any overall narrative stories.

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

- Dornfield, Barry, and Maggie Holtzberg. Gandy Dancers (film). New York: Cinema Guild, 1994.
 Ferris, William. Blues from the Delta. Garden City: Anchor Press/Doubleday, 1978.
 Hubbard, Freeman H. Railroad Avenue: Great Stories and Legends of American Railroad. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1945.
 Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Pantheon Books, 1993.
 Ramsey, Jr., Frederic. Been Here and Gone. New Brunswick: Rutgers University Press, 1960.

GANT, CECIL

- b. 4 April 1913; Nashville, TN
 d. 4 February 1951; Nashville, TN

Pianist and vocalist. Gant's early career was spent working local clubs in Nashville during the mid-1930s and later with his own band on southern tours. In 1944, during army service on the West Coast, he asked to play the piano during the intermission at a Treasury Bond rally in Los Angeles. The impact was such that his commanding officer was asked to release him for further bond promotions. Billed as the “GI-Sing-Sation,” he performed in uniform. He soon began recording, enjoying immediate success with the ballad “I Wonder” (1944, Bronze 117), though most sales went to a slightly later version (1944, Gilt-Edge 501); many discographies incorrectly show these as identical performances.

As a blues-ballad singer, he was one of those dubbed “Sepia Sinatras” in recognition of their popularity with women rather than their singing style, but he was also an effective boogie pianist as “Cecil’s Boogie” (1944, Gilt-Edge 501) and “Boogie Blues” (1944, Gilt-Edge 502) show. After the war he returned to Nashville, where he made many recordings for Bullet, most of them with country music session musicians. Despite nationwide tours, his popularity declined and even though he recorded for Decca in 1950–1951 he was not able to duplicate his earlier successes despite fine records like “Shot Gun Boogie”/“Rock Little Baby” (1951, Decca 48200). He died of pneumonia.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

- Russell, Tony. The Blues Collection 88: Cecil Gant. London: Orbis, 1997.
 Templeton, Ray. “Down in Hogan’s Alley.” Blues & Rhythm no. 49 (January 1990): 6.

Discography: LSFP

GARCIA, JEROME JOHN “JERRY”

- b. 1 August 1942; San Francisco, CA
 d. 9 August 1995; Forest Knolls, CA

Guitarist and singer. Early influences included bluegrass of Bill Monroe and the electric blues of T-Bone Walker and Chuck Berry. Best known as lead guitarist in the Grateful Dead, which was formed in 1966 and disbanded after his death. As the focal band in San Francisco’s counterculture, their repertoire took in virtually all forms of American music, including blues, jazz, bluegrass, country, rhythm and blues, rock and roll, and psychedelia. Garcia’s solo projects and offshoots also reflected that diversity, including The New Riders of the Purple Sage, Old & In The Way (with David Grisman and Vassar Clements), and the Jerry Garcia Band. Garcia had health problems resulting from a combination of drugs and diabetes, and he died of a heart attack.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- George-Warren, Holly, et al., eds. Garcia. Boston: Little, Brown, 1995.

Greenfield, Robert. Dark Star: An Oral Biography of Jerry Garcia. London: Plexus 1995.

Discography

Selected Recordings as Leader

- Garcia* (1972, Warner Bros. 2582).
Almost Acoustic (1987, Grateful Dead 40052).
Jerry Garcia & David Grisman (1991, Acoustic Disc ACD-2).
Bluegrass Reunion (1992, Acoustic Disc ACD-4).
Lonesome Prison Blues (1992, Dead Man 014).
Blues from the Rainforest (1994, Grateful Dead 3901).

GARIBAY, RANDY JR.

Active since the mid-1950s

Singer and guitarist in Texas rhythm and blues, Hispanic music, and doo-wop. Started as a doo-wop vocalist in east Texas, eventually joining the Dell-Kings in a residency at the Las Vegas Sahara Hotel in the 1960s. Later he would assist on tour the O’Jays and Curtis Mayfield. He returned to Texas, founded the group Cats Don’t Stomp, and has since performed in the Texas and Hispanic music styles.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)

Discography: AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)

GARLAND, TERRY

- b. 3 June 1953; Johnson City, TN

Singer/guitarist who specializes in performing traditional, acoustic blues in a solo environment. Also known for playing a metal-body resonator guitar. Combines covers of classic songs from the blues canon with his own traditional-sounding compositions; also does blues interpretations of rock and other non-blues songs. First came to national attention in the early 1990s with a series of well-received recordings.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Niles J. Frantz)

Discography: AMG

- Trouble in Mind* (1991, First Warning 72705-75701-2; reissued by Planetary Music as 9024).

GARLAND, TERRY

Edge of the Valley (1992, First Warning 75713).
One to Blame (1996, Demon 775, 1996; reissued by Planetary Music as 9025).

GARLOW, CLARENCE “BON TON”

b. 27 February 1911; Welsh, LA
d. 24 July 1986; Beaumont, TX

Guitarist and accordionist. Although Garlow had a regionally successful recording career in the early 1950s, his most significant contributions were behind the scenes as a club owner, deejay, talent scout, and mentor. Garlow was working as a mailman in Beaumont, Texas, when T-Bone Walker inspired him to buy a guitar. He started playing locally and so impressed a Houston record company owner one night that he was in the studio the next day, recording “Bon Ton Roula.” He moved on to record for the Aladdin, Flair, and Goldband labels. Garlow also was directly involved in the rise of zydeco. He secured zydeco founder Clifton Chenier’s first recording session by holding a telephone next to a Beaumont bandstand so recording executive J. R. Fulbright could hear him.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
O’Neal, Jim. “Clarence Garlow 1911–1986” [obituary].
Living Blues no. 72 (1986): 41.

Discography: LSFP

GARNER, LARRY

b. 8 July 1952; New Orleans, LA

Growing up in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, singer/guitarist Larry Garner was exposed to the region’s thriving swamp blues legacy as a young boy, hearing performances by such local mainstays as Silas Hogan and Clarence Edwards. Garner was given a guitar by his uncle and began performing gospel music at age twelve with several local groups. Several years later, he started playing bass in his cousin’s rhythm and blues band and eventually stopped performing gospel entirely. After serving in the military upon graduation, Garner returned to Baton Rouge and took a full-time job at a local chemical plant, where he worked for nearly twenty years. In the early 1980s, he began attending local jam sessions at Tabby Thomas’s Blues Box, and spent the next several years playing part-time with local musicians such as Thomas, Hogan, and Henry Gray. He studied the recordings of B. B. King, Albert Collins, and Albert King as well as those by rock guitarist Santana, and gradually developed his own melodic guitar style.

Garner retired from his day job in the late 1980s to pursue music full time, and his imaginative and witty songwriting skills and modernized swamp blues sound landed him a contract with JSP Records. After two solid outings for the British label, Garner signed with Verve/Gitanes in 1995 and recorded the highly acclaimed You Need to Live a Little and Baton Rouge. Both releases featured Garner’s finely crafted songs, soulful singing, and strong guitar playing. He continued to tour both in the United States and Europe, with several releases on the German Ruf Records.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Khatchadourian, Sonia, and David Nelson. “Larry Garner: A Trailblazer Gets More Scars.” Living Blues no. 143 (January/February 1999): 19–27.

Discography: AMG

Larry Garner: Too Blues (1994, JSP CD 2111).
Baton Rouge (1999, Evidence ECD 26106-2).

GARON, PAUL

b. 7 July 1942; Louisville, KY

The foremost proponent of using surrealist theory to interpret the blues. A native of Louisville, Garon moved to Chicago in the late 1960s to work at Bob Koester’s Jazz Record Mart. He later became a used book dealer, specializing in jazz and blues. A founding editor of Living Blues, Garon articulated the magazine’s editorial position [in #12 & #13 (1973); again in issue #109 (1993)], which rejects a purely acoustical definition of blues in favor of one embedded in African American culture. He also edited a special issue (#25) on surrealism and the blues.

In Blues and the Poetic Spirit (1975; revised 1996, City Lights), Garon articulated the surrealist interpretation of blues as an inherently radical mode of thought: “The blues is a music that signifies the rebellion of the spirit, a body of song that achieves poetry by its insistent revolt and demand for liberation.” The book’s topics include whites and the blues, symbolic imagery in blues lyrics, blues as an “unalienated” form of expression, and the limitations of “realist” interpretations.

Garon's focus on poetic protest and the radical imagination in blues lyrics is mostly implicit in the biographical study The Devil's Son-in-Law: The Story of Peetie Wheatstraw and His Songs (1971, London: Studio Vista; revised 2003, Chicago: Charles H. Kerr). Woman with Guitar: Memphis Minnie's Blues (1992, New York: Da Capo), written together with Beth Garon, employs surrealist analysis explicitly in an extended analysis of topical themes and the subversive potential in Memphis Minnie's songs.

SCOTT BARRETT

Bibliography

Beasley Books website, <http://www.beasleybooks.com>.
 "Books on the Blues." Collector's Corner website, <http://www.abaa.org/pages/collectors/bc-blues.html>.
 Garon, Paul. "White Blues." Blues World website, <http://www.bluesworld.com/WHITEBLUES.html>.

GARRETT, ROBERT "BUD"

b. 28 January 1916; Free Hill, TN
 d. 24 November 1987; Free Hill, TN

In 1961, after a friend sent a demo to Ernie Young of Excello Records in Nashville, singer/guitarist Garrett recorded "Do Remember" and "Quit My Drinkin,'" sturdy blues in the style of 1940s Chicago. He recorded again for folklorists in later life, but the single is his most eloquent legacy.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: LSPF

GARRETT, VERNON

b. 18 January 1933; Omaha, NE

A gospel-influenced southern soul singer, Garrett has worked professionally from the 1950s on, but found his greatest success in the 1990s. He has been alternately based out of Los Angeles and Dallas since the 1980s.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Nelson, David. "Vernon Garrett: Hip and Happy." Living Blues no. 116 (July/August 1994): 48–51.

Discography

Caught in a Crossfire (1991, Ichiban 1128).
Too Hip to Be Happy (1994, Ichiban 1169).
Half Past the Blues (1997, Ichiban 24908).

GARY, INDIANA

Gary, an industrial city in northeast Indiana on the southern tip of Lake Michigan, was founded in 1906 by the U.S. Steel Corporation. The company made Gary a major steel production center, and the city grew largely as a result of settlement by European immigrants. By the 1920s, southern blacks and Mexicans began settling in the city. In 1930, the city had a hundred thousand residents, forty-five percent white immigrants and eighteen percent blacks. By 1950, Gary had a population of 133,000 and was thirty percent black.

The African American population was socially segregated in an area south of the downtown, centered along Broadway. The street became the hub of black business and entertainment, featuring retail stores, taverns, ballrooms, and record stores. Much of the black population came from the Deep South, and blues was often their music of choice. The large ballrooms, notably Barbara's Playhouse and Miramar Ballroom, featured big-name jazz and blues acts, such as LaVern Baker, Amos Milburn, Memphis Slim, Muddy Waters, and Ivory Joe Hunter. The smaller clubs, significantly the Pulaski Lounge, Tri-State Inn, and the Roadhouse, featured local blues musicians, notably Jimmy Reed, Albert King, Grace and John Brim, and John Littlejohn. Predominantly black Roosevelt High was often used for shows that featured such acts as blues singer Dorothy Fisher, balladeer Wellington Blakely, and the doo-wop group, the Spaniels. In the 1960s, the F&J Lounge featured name blues acts from Chicago, such as Otis Rush and Magic Sam, but also used Earl Hooker in the house band. Jazz musicians were less common in Gary, but in the early 1950s saxophonist John "Schoolboy" Porter recorded some local hits for Chicago-based Chance Records.

Gary had long been served by radio deejays catering to the black community, notably Eddie Honesty, who began on the ethnic station WJOB in 1932. By the late 1940s, two other radio stations, WGRY and WWCA, added black deejays to their programming, the best known being Jesse Coopwood, Sam Evans, and Vivian Carter. The deejays did much to promote the jazz, blues, and R&B acts that came out of that city.

Because adjacent Chicago dominated music recording, Gary had few record labels. Vivian Carter and Jimmy Bracken started their famed Vee-Jay label out of their record shop at 1640 Broadway in 1953, but the next year relocated to Chicago. Vee-Jay recorded many Gary acts, notably Jimmy Reed, Wellington Blakely, the Goldenrods, and the Spaniels. United in Chicago recorded another Gary doo-wop ensemble, the Five Cs. In the 1960s, record producer and singer Gordon Keith founded Steeltown records, and was the first to record the Jackson Five, the biggest R&B act to come out of the city. Keith also recorded for Chicago-based One-derful Records.

GARY, INDIANA

By the 1980s, Gary was more than eighty percent black. The biggest blues act that lived and worked in the city at this time was Big Daddy Kinsey, who recorded his debut album in 1984. Two sons in his band, Donald and Ralph, later formed the Kinsey Report, and both acts made a significant contribution to modern blues with hard rocking electronic blues.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- Hurley, Andrew. Environmental Inequalities: Class, Race, and Industrial Pollution in Gary, Indiana, 1945–1980. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1995.
- Mohn, Raymond A., and Neil Betten. Steel City Urban and Ethnic Patterns in Gary, Indiana, 1906–1950. New York: Holmes & Meier, 1986.

GARY, TOMMY

- b. 9 January 1909 or 1911 (?), Brownsville, TN
d. 31 July 1975; Memphis, TN

Influential harmonica player, worked with Sleepy John Estes, Robert Wilkins, Yank Rachel and other area musicians. Played American Folklife Festival in 1970. Recorded with Estes.

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

- Hay, Fred J. “Goin’ Back to Sweet Memphis”: Conversations with the Blues. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001.

Discography

- Mississippi Delta Blues Jam in Memphis, Vol. 2* (1993, Arhoolie CD 386).

GATES, REVEREND JAMES M.

- b. 14 July 1884; Hogansville (?), GA
d. 18 August 1945; Atlanta, GA

Reverend J. M. Gates was the most prolifically recorded black preacher of the prewar years. He was the grandson of an African slave and began to preach when he was in his thirties. In the late 1930s and early 1940s, he was pastor of several Baptist churches in Atlanta, Georgia. From 1926 to 1941 he recorded 220 sermons, monologues, and church songs for a variety of labels, of which Columbia, Victor, and OKeh were the most important. As a preacher he was fairly restrained in his delivery, but he was inventive, and often humorous, with a self-mocking edge at times. Gates usually offered a conservative and misogynist view of the world, but he was an enthusiast for the New Deal and spoke out strongly against racism, preaching a remarkable sermon addressed to “you Negro haters” on one occasion. He died in the same year, in the same manner and at about the same relatively early age as his beloved President Roosevelt, whom he had praised in more than one of his sermons. His funeral in Atlanta was said to be the biggest black funeral until the death of Martin Luther King, Jr.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Discography: DGR

GAYLES, BILLY

- b. 19 October 1931; Sikeston, MO
d. 8 April 1993; St. Louis, MO

Vocalist and drummer Billy Gayles became interested in blues and jazz as a teenager, after relocating to Cairo, Illinois. There, he learned to play drums and toured with Earl Hooker and Robert Nighthawk. Gayles settled in Clarksdale, Mississippi, in 1951 and joined Ike Turner’s Kings of Rhythm as a featured vocalist. A dynamic singer, he recorded with Turner throughout the 1950s and early 1960s for labels such as Flair, Federal, Cobra, and Shock. In the mid-1950s, Gayles moved to St. Louis and recorded his best-known single “I’m Tore Up” in 1956 for Federal. He split with Turner in 1963 and spent the remainder of his life playing primarily around St. Louis.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- O’Neal, Jim. “Billy Gayles.” Living Blues no. 113 (January/February 1993): 44–45.

Discography

- Ike Turner’s Kings of Rhythm. Trail Blazers (1997, King Records KCD 6017).

GAYTEN, PAUL

b. 29 January 1920; New Orleans, LA
 d. 29 March 1991; Los Angeles, CA

Pianist, composer, arranger, bandleader, and producer. Gayten was a pioneer of New Orleans rhythm and blues and one of the most important and influential figures in the postwar music scene there. His late 1940s recordings under his own name and masterful productions for Annie Laurie and Larry Darnell helped open the door for Crescent City artists to gain national exposure as hit recording artists well into the 1960s. An accomplished pianist, inventive composer, and astute arranger, Gayten organized his first band before World War II; by 1947 he had assembled New Orleans's most popular ensemble and was tearing up the city's top nightspots when he was signed by DeLuxe Records. Gayten immediately hit the R&B top ten with "True" and continued to chart with band singer Annie Laurie's "Since I Fell for You," "Cuttin' Out," and "I'll Never Be Free."

Gayten switched to Regal Records in 1949 and produced a pair of smash hits with vocalist Larry Darnell: the two-sided rap ballad "I'll Get Along Somehow" and the jump-blues classic "For You My Love." He moved his operation to OKeh Records in 1951 with modest success and then switched to Chess in 1954, where he returned to the charts with brilliant productions on Sugar Boy Crawford ("Jock-a-Mo"), Bobby Charles ("Later Alligator"), Clarence "Frogman" Henry ("Ain't Got No Home" and "But I Do"), TV Slim ("Flatfoot Sam"), and other New Orleans artists. He relocated to Los Angeles in 1960 to run the Chess office there and returned to record production in the 1970s with his own label, Pzazz.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O' Neal); Larkin; Santelli
 Nelson, David. "Paul Gayten" [obituary]. Living Blues
 no. 98 (July/August 1991): 40.

Discography: AMG; LSFPGEDDINS, BOB

b. 6 February 1913; Hybank, TX
 d. 16 February 1991; Oakland, CA

Record producer, songwriter, and occasional vocalist, Bob Geddins was the dominant figure in Bay Area blues from the mid-1940s to the mid-1960s. He moved to Oakland from Los Angeles in 1941 and, as well as working in the shipyard, also was a partner in a record shop on Seventh Street. Realizing that local artists were not being recorded he began (sometimes in partnership with others) a series of labels (Big Town, Down Town, Cava-Tone, Rhythm, Irma, Veltone, Gedinson's, Art-Tone, etc.) on which appeared all the finest artists the Bay Area had to offer. He was notable too as the first man to set up a pressing plant in the Bay Area, rather than get his records manufactured in Los Angeles. Among his many songwriting credits are "Mercury Boogie" (Sidney Maiden), "Haunted House" (Johnny Fuller), "Hello San Francisco" (Sugar Pie DeSanto), "Johnny Ace's Last Letter" (Johnny Fuller), "Tin Pan Alley" (Jimmy Wilson), and "My Time After a While" (Tiny Powell). His ventures were always undercapitalized and his business acumen was perhaps not the sharpest. As a consequence, he was never as successful commercially as artistically and always faced the danger of losing successful artists to bigger companies. Nonetheless his slow blues with doom-laden lyrics and mournful saxes defined the Oakland sound of his day and his ability to get the best out of his artists justify his claim to be "the father of the Oakland blues."

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli
 Mazzolini, Tom. "Living Blues Interview: Bob Geddins."
Living Blues no. 34 (September–October 1977): 19–30.
 Nations, Opal Louis. "Geddins & Son: Wizards of the Oakland Blues." Real Blues no. 8 (August/September 1997):
 38–46.

Discography: LSFP

See also Agee, Ray; Big Town; Bonner, Weldon H. Phillip "Juke Boy"; Boyd, Eddie; Caesar, Harry "Little"; Cava-Tone Recording; Douglas, K.C.; Fuller, Johnny; Fulson, Lowell; Irma; King, Al; King, Saunders; Maiden, Sidney; McCracklin, Jimmy; McGuirt, Clarence "Candyman"; Oakland; Powell, Vance "Tiny"; Rhythm; Robinson, L.C. "Good Rock-in"; Thomas, Lafayette Jerl "Thing"; Thornton, Willie Mae "Big Mama"; Walton, Mercy Dee; Wilson, Jimmy

GENNETT

Record label and company founded in 1917 by the Starr Piano Co. of Richmond, Indiana, and named for Starr executives Harry, Fred, and Clarence Gennett. Blues recording began with Daisy Martin about April 1921 and gathered pace in 1923 when Viola McCoy, Josie Miles, and Edna Hicks headlined a brief spurt of activity. Gennett never had a Race series but after 1924 printed "Race Record" on relevant issues, generally grouped in batches in the main series, the only company so identifying its African American catalog.

Only after the introduction of the electrically recorded "Electrobeams" in December 1926 did Gennett become a major blues label with Sam Collins, Cow Cow Davenport, and Irene Scruggs among its artists. A field trip to Birmingham, Alabama, in July–August 1927 netted Jay Bird Coleman, William Harris, and Bertha Ross. Gennett recorded blues for Black Patti in 1927, issuing some of these itself after Black Patti's demise, and also for Paramount in 1929. The last Race Gennett (7319 by Clara Burston) was released in December 1930 but the company continued to issue its subsidiary labels Champion and Superior up to the end of 1934, when Starr withdrew from record issue. Gennett was reorganized by Harry Gennett, who in the mid-1940s sold his wartime shellac allocation to Joe Davis. Davis revived the Gennett label with eight Race issues in a 5000 series but output was soon shifted to Davis's Beacon label.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

- DGR; Sutton
 Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
 Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.
 Tsotsi, Tom. "Gennett-Champion Blues, Richmond, Indiana (1923–1934)." 78 Quarterly no. 3 (1988): 49; no. 4 (1989): 77; no. 5 (1990): 78; no. 6 [1991]: 87; no. 8 [1993]: 95.

GEORGIA

Georgia, the largest state east of the Mississippi River, is defined geographically by six land regions. The three regions of the Piedmont, Atlantic Coastal Plain, and the East Gulf Coastal Plain dominate the majority of the land area. The three highland regions of the Appalachian Plateau, Appalachian Ridge and Valley Region, and Blue Ridge form a smaller tier of land at the top of the state.

The first people of this area were the Native American Cherokees who lived in the highland region to the north and the Creeks who lived in the lower elevations to the south. Spain's Hernando de Soto was the first European explorer in the region. France followed and explored the coastal islands and rivers. England subsequently claimed the area and named it Georgia in 1732. James Oglethorpe arrived the following year with a number of debtors released from prison to establish the last and southern-most of the thirteen colonies.

Georgia established slavery in 1749 to support its emerging plantation system. This agrarian-based economy expanded during the next century through a number of land cessions that displaced the Creeks and Cherokees. In 1795, a corrupt group of legislators sold off the entire western portion of the state that today makes up Alabama and Mississippi in what became known as the Yazoo Fraud.

The Civil War and the invasion of the Union Army under General Sherman left the economy and the infrastructure of the state devastated by the end of 1864. During the end of the nineteenth century, Georgia expanded its economic base with an increase in manufacturing. At the beginning of the twentieth century, the agricultural base expanded beyond cotton, as farmers raised corn, hogs, chickens, dairy cattle, peanuts, and tobacco.

During the twentieth century, Georgia struggled to balance its growing position in the South as a commercial and industrial center with its historical record of intolerance. As late as 1956, the Georgia legislature voted to add the Confederate battle flag to the state flag. Many saw this as a stand against social integration and a defiance of the federal mandate against segregated schools.

The Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., showed the region, the nation, and the world that social change could occur through nonviolent protest. His activism influenced Congress to pass the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. He received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1964.

Jimmy Carter emerged in the next decade as a progressive governor when he was the first person to win a statewide election by publicly denouncing segregation. He was elected president of the United States in 1976. In 2002, Carter became the second Georgian to receive the Nobel Peace Prize.

With the advent of sound recordings and radio broadcasts in the early twentieth century, rural and small town Georgian musicians and singers reached expanded audiences. Country music, first known as hillbilly music, gained prominence on WSB radio in Atlanta dating from the early 1920s. Fiddlin' John Carson recorded the first country hit record, "The Little Old Log Cabin," in 1923. Gid Tanner and Riley Puckett followed with their first recordings on Columbia in New York in 1924. Their band, the Skillet Lickers, appealed to a large country music audience during the 1920s and 1930s.

Blues music traces its origins in part to Georgia. Blind Willie McTell was born near Augusta and grew up near Statesboro. He recorded “Statesboro Blues” in 1927. Guitarist Hudson Whittaker, also known as “Tampa Red,” was born in Smithville. He pioneered the bottleneck style of slide guitar playing after moving to Chicago. Georgia White was born in Sandersville. She also gained prominence in Chicago as a blues singer in the late 1930s.

Gertrude “Ma” Rainey, born in Columbus, is often said to be the “Mother of the Blues.” She influenced Bessie Smith who sang in Rainey’s traveling show when Smith was just a teenager. Thomas A. Dorsey, or “Georgia Tom,” another Rainey musician, was born in Villa Rica. He distinguished himself as the creator of hundreds of gospel songs recorded by Mahalia Jackson and Elvis Presley, among others.

A number of jazz artists acknowledged their blues and Georgia beginnings. Composer and arranger Fletcher Henderson was born in Cuthbert and pianist Mary Lou Williams was born in Atlanta. Singer Joe Williams was born in Cordele and lyricist Johnny Mercer was born in Savannah.

In the 1950s, American teenagers discovered the blues roots of rock ’n’ roll. This form of music that was new to middle-class homes was known as rhythm and blues. A number of black performers born in Georgia gained airtime on white-operated radio stations during this period. Ray Charles, born in Albany, turned his career around in the early 1950s when he switched from the Nat “King” Cole style of singing to a southern gospel style. His hit recording “What’d I Say” was released in 1959.

“Little Richard” Penniman, born in Macon, electrified crowds with his piano playing and singing. He left some performances covered with only a raincoat borrowed from his stagehands after throwing all his clothing into the audience. Otis Redding, born in Dawson, distinguished himself as a singer of soulful ballads. Gladys Knight was born in Atlanta where she also formed her famous backup singers, the Pips. James Brown, born in Augusta, became the “Godfather of Soul.” The Kennedy Center honored James Brown with a lifetime achievement award in the performing arts in 2003.

The genre of blues music heavily influenced a number of southern rock bands at the end of the twentieth century. The first and most significant of these groups was the Allman Brothers Band and featured the talents of guitarist Duane Allman, his brother Greg Allman on piano, and Dickie Betts on guitar. Although none of these three were born in Georgia, they pioneered a new rock sound often using double lead guitars and two drummers after they moved to Macon.

Current blues artists with Georgia birth certificates include Tinsley Ellis, born in Atlanta, who has released a number of recordings with Alligator Records. Ellis trades on a scorching and relentless guitar style while acknowledging his debt to the originators of the blues musical form. Robert Cray was born in Columbus and first gained attention with the release of “Smoking Gun” in 1986. Cray’s music attracts both popular and blues audiences.

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

- AMG; DGR
 Cobb, James C. Georgia Odyssey. Athens: The University of Georgia Press, 1997.
 Coleman, Kenneth, ed. A History of Georgia. 2nd ed. Athens: The University of Georgia Press, 1991.
 ———. Georgia History in Outline. rev ed. Athens: The University of Georgia Press, 1978.
 Joyner, Charles. Remember Me. Atlanta: Georgia Humanities Council, 1989.
 Lornell, Kip. Introducing American Folk Music. New York: McGraw-Hill College, 1993.
 Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning. New York: Horizon Press, 1960.
 ———. The Story of the Blues. London: Chilton Books, 1969.

GEREMIA, PAUL

b. 21 April 1944; Providence, RI

Among the first white performers to master Robert Johnson and Willie McTell, prewar blues, and related music has been his lifelong profession. Peers and followers alike consider the conviction of his singing to be exemplary.

ANDREW M. COHEN

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

GIANT/GAMMA/GLOBE

Chicago soul label of the late 1960s. The company was founded in 1967 by the husband-and-wife team of Joshie Jo Armstead and Mel Collins. The firm both leased records to larger firms and put out records on their own Giant, Gamma, and Globe imprints. Their best successes were soul music productions of Ruby Andrews (who was recording for Zodiac), Joshie Jo Armstead (“A Stone Good Lover,” 1968), and Garland Green (“Jealous Kind of Lover,” 1969), the latter leased to Uni. Other artists included hard soul shouter Shirley Wahls, jazz singer Little Jimmy Scott, and blues artists Smokey Smothers, Lee Shot Williams, and Fenton Robinson. The company recorded its blues artists in Chicago under the aegis of Collins, but recorded most of its soul artists in Detroit with arranger Mike Terry under the aegis of Armstead. The company closed down in 1970.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. Chicago Soul. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

Discography: McGrath

GIBSON, CLIFFORD

b. 17 April 1901; Louisville, KY

d. 21 December 1963; St. Louis, MO

Aka "Grandpappy Gibson." One of record shop owner Jesse Johnson's discoveries, Gibson was an itinerant musician who recorded in 1929 and 1931 for QRS and Victor and accompanied R. T. Hanen (probably J. D. Short), Roosevelt Sykes, and even white singer Jimmie Rodgers. He was an inspirational, relaxed guitarist somewhat influenced by Lonnie Johnson with a pleasing voice and thoughtful lyrics, but has been curiously undervalued. After the war, he worked with a trained dog for tips and recorded for Bobbin in 1960 as Grandpappy Gibson.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

Complete Recorded Works 1929–31 (Document BDCD 6015).

GIBSON, JACK

b. 13 May 1920; Chicago, IL

d. 30 January 2000; Henderson, NV

Aka "Jockey Jack," "Tiger Jack," "Jack the Rapper." Radio personality, promoter, writer. From 1945 through 1962 he was active as an actor, then a disk jockey in Chicago, Atlanta, Louisville, Miami Beach, and Cleveland. For ten years he self-published his "Jack the Rapper" newsletter. From 1962 through 1972 he worked in promotions for Motown, Decca, and Stax, then marketing for Disney World in 1972–1976. He was founder and first president of the National Association of Jazz, R&B, and Gospel DJs of America, which eventually became the Black Music Association. The Treniers' "You Know, Yeah! Tiger" (OKeh 7012) was dedicated to him.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Moonogian, George, and Dan Kochakian. "You Know Yeah! Tiger: The Jack Gibson Story" [part 1]. Blues & Rhythm no. 72 (September 1992): 4–6; [part 2]. Blues & Rhythm no. 73 (October 1992): 4–5.

GIBSON, LACY

b. 1 May 1936; Salisbury, NC

Guitarist/singer Lacy Gibson began playing hillbilly, country, and gospel music as a child growing up in the rural Carolina hills. His parents both played guitar and banjo at mostly white country gatherings. He first heard blues music when his family moved to Chicago in 1949. He attended Roosevelt College for three years, where he studied music theory. He met many blues guitarists and learned some technique from Muddy Waters, Matt "Guitar" Murphy, Wayne Bennett, and others. Gibson began performing with a large number of bands at various nightclubs and recording sessions. He played rhythm guitar in sessions with "Billy the Kid" Emerson (M-Pac!), Willie Mabon (USA), Buddy Guy (Chess), Son Seals (Alligator), and even his then brother-in-law Sun-Ra (Chess). Although he performed with many blues artists, Lacy was more enamored with jazz guitarists. He even had a brief stint performing with Duke Ellington's band around 1958.

Gibson recorded his first song, "My Love Is Real," for Chess in 1963, though the company misattributed it to Buddy Guy. Lacy also recorded several singles for the small Repeto label. He gained some worldwide recognition with his album Switchy Titchy on the Black Magic label in 1982. In addition, Gibson has appeared on the Delmark, El Saturn, and Red Lightnin' labels.

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Herzhaft; Larkin
Whiteis, David. "Lacy Gibson: I Stepped Out of That Line." Living Blues no. 130 (November/December 1996): 26–33.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Emerson, William Robert “Billy the Kid”

GILLUM, JAZZ

b. William McKinley Gillum, 11 September 1904; Indianola, MS
d. 29 March 1966; Chicago, IL

Bill “Jazz” Gillum was one of the stalwarts of the Chicago blues scene of the 1930s and 1940s, enjoying considerable popularity as a harmonica player and vocalist. Orphaned at a young age and raised by a series of relatives, he taught himself to play first the harmonium, or pump organ, and then learned the harmonica from his two brothers. After stays in several Mississippi towns, working as a field hand and performing as a street musician, he left for Chicago, arriving there in 1923. He made his first record in 1934 for the Bluebird label, accompanied on guitar by Big Bill Broonzy. Their musical partnership produced many successful records for Bluebird and an enduring bitterness by Gillum over his claim to the authorship of the blues standard “Key to the Highway.” Gillum’s recordings featured collaborations with some of the most prominent blues artists of the era in addition to Broonzy, including Washboard Sam, Roosevelt Sykes, and Big Maceo Merriweather. Blues researcher Neil Slaven has noted that “it’s rare to hear Gillum straining for a note with either voice or instrument,” which neatly describes his musical technique and suggests an explanation for his popular success. Gillum recorded infrequently after 1950, and the decline of his later years was described by guitarist Mike Bloomfield in a chilling vignette in the book Me and Big Joe. He died in 1966 from a gunshot wound.

BOB RIESMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR; LSFPGILMORE, BOYD

b. 12 June 1910; Belzoni, MS
d. 23 December 1976; Fresno, CA

Postwar Mississippi Delta slide guitarist known for his recordings for the Sun and Modern labels in the early 1950s. Musical associates included Pinetop Perkins, Charlie Booker, Houston Stackhouse, Ike Turner, and Earl Hooker. It is believed he moved to California in the mid-1960s. His seeming elusiveness from blues researchers enhanced his later and posthumous reputations.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
O’ Neal, Jim. “Boyd Gilmore” Living Blues nos. 45/46 (Spring 1980): 94–95.

Discography: LSFPGIPSON, BYRON “WILD CHILD”

b. 10 January 1930; Burlington, IA
d. 30 January 1994; Peoria, IL

Singer, manager. After U.S. Army service in 1950–1953, he arrived in Los Angeles, California, as a singer and songwriter to Specialty and other West Coast labels. In 1955–1956 he was Little Richard’s road manager. For the following three years he formed a band with saxophonist Freddie Tickon. From 1959 on he stayed in Peoria, Illinois, initially performing with various groups, then as a one-man band.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Labinsky, Daria. “Byron ‘Wild Child’ Gipson” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 115 (May/June 1994): 63–64.

Discography: LSFPGLENN, LLOYD

b. 21 November 1909; San Antonio, TX
d. 23 May 1985; Los Angeles, CA

Pianist, composer, arranger. Lloyd Glenn was a prolific urban blues pianist who backed T-Bone Walker and Lowell Fulson and enjoyed R&B chart success with “Chica Boo,” “Old Time Shuffle,” and other early 1950s hits under his own name. He worked with Kid Ory, Marl Young, T-Bone Walker, Lowell Fulson, Clarence “Gatemouth” Brown, and Ray Charles.

JOHN SINCLAIR

GLENN, LLOYD

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli

Discography: Lord; LSFP

GLOVER

New York City–based label owned by Henry Glover and active 1959–1960. Its artists included Louisiana Red and Titus Turner.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

GLOVER, HENRY

b. 21 May 1921; Hot Springs, AR

d. 7 April 1991; St. Albans, NY

In his early career during the mid-1940s, Henry Glover worked as a trumpet player and arranger for bands led by Buddy Johnson, Tiny Bradshaw, and Lucky Millinder. Glover also began achieving success in the late-1940s as a hit songwriter for R&B artists. In 1948, he began a decade-long career at King Records, where he worked as a producer, songwriter, and A&R man. At King, Glover arranged and produced recording sessions for artists in both R&B (see the Rhythm and Blues entry) and country music, at times bringing the two styles together and signaling the rock 'n' roll explosion of the 1950s. After leaving King, Glover produced records for Old Town Records, for his own Glover label, and for Roulette, before rejoining King in the late 1960s. Blues albums produced by Glover in the 1970s included Muddy Waters's The Muddy Waters Woodstock Album and Paul Butterfield's Put It In Your Ear.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

Rumble, John W. "Roots of Rock & Roll: Henry Glover at King Records." Journal of Country Music 14, no. 2 (1992): 30–42.

GLOVER, LILLIE MAE HARDISON

(See Big Memphis Ma Rainey)

GOING DOWN SLOW (I'VE HAD MY FUN)

One of the most durable and resilient of the World War II era blues compositions, "Going Down Slow," by "St. Louis" Jimmy Oden, has remained in blues repertoires since it was first cut on November 11, 1941, and issued on Bluebird 8889. Oden himself recorded a sequel, "Bad Condition," in 1944, and RCA prepared a reissue of "Going Down Slow" to be issued simultaneously in 1945. "Going Down Slow" was reissued on RCA Victor 20-2598, while "Bad Condition" was issued on RCA Victor 20-2650.

It has been recorded more than forty times, with most versions retaining all or part of Oden's original lyrics. One of the first singers to cover "St. Louis" Jimmy's piece was Champion Jack Dupree who recorded it ca. 1945 on Continental 6066. In 1958, he returned with a stronger version recorded for Atlantic (LP 8019) and issued on his deservedly famous LP Blues from the Gutter. Ray Charles recorded it for SwingTime (ST 215) in 1949, as "I've Had My Fun (Going Down Slow)," well before his best-known Atlantic recordings. Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry waxed the song several times each. McGhee took the vocal on the pair's mid-1940s Alert 405, and Terry turned in a more resonant performance in the early 1950s on Bob Shad's Jax and Time labels (Jax 309, Time T70006).

The song's tale of slow death from venereal disease may not seem fit for such immortality, but the song has lived on in spite of its morbid flavor. Little Walter recorded it in Chicago in 1957, as "I Had My Fun" (Checker 945). The lively tempo of Walter's version may have signaled the subversion of the lyric's original message. In the best-known version of the song, cut for Chess in 1961 by Howlin' Wolf, Willie Dixon's spoken interjections directly contradict the original lyrics' theme of sober regret. Wolf only sings the first two verses, but before and between them, Dixon interposes his own humorous comments, about "enjoyin' things that kings and queens will never have" and about having "spent more money than a millionaire."

Muddy Waters recorded it in 1970 for a Stockholm radio broadcast on the Black Bear label (LP 903) and in 1971 at a live Chicago session, issued on Chess LP 680002. Eric Clapton recorded a version of it, and as recently as 1998, veteran Chicago bluesman Snooky Pryor recorded it in Toronto, Canada.

PAUL GARON

GOLD STAR

Houston recording studio and record label, founded by Bill Quinn. In 1947, Aladdin Records could not entice Lightnin' Hopkins to leave his hometown to record a follow-up to his first recordings with the label, so they had Hopkins record at Gold Star. After selling a few masters to Aladdin, Quinn decided to record Hopkins on his own label. With the success from Hopkins's records, Quinn released recordings of other local blues artists under Gold Star's "600" blues series, including "Lil' Son" Jackson and L. C. Williams. The label's production was limited—in some cases, less than a hundred copies per record were pressed—so in order for the records to reach a national audience, Quinn sold the masters of Gold Star releases to Aladdin's main competitor, Modern Records. By 1950, other record companies realized that Hopkins did not consider his contract with Gold Star to be exclusive, and Quinn soon left the recording business.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

Strachwitz, Chris. Liner notes to Lightnin' Hopkins: The Gold Star Sessions Vol. 1. (1990, Arhoolie CD/C 352).

Discography: McGrath

GOLDBAND RECORDS

Eddie Shuler's Goldband Records was run out of his small shop/recording studio in Lake Charles, Louisiana. His successes included the million selling "Paper in My Shoe" by Boozoo Chavis, which is considered the first zydeco recording, the only recordings of Cajun legend Iry Lejeune, and several Swamp Pop hits. Although not known for blues, Goldband issued important records for "Hop" Wilson, "Juke Boy" Bonner, and Lonnie "Guitar Jr." Brooks.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

Broven, John. South to Louisiana: The Music of the Cajun Bayous. Gretna, LA: Pelican Press, 1983.
Tisserand, Michael. The Kingdom of Zydeco. New York: Arcade Publishing, 1998.

Discography: AMG, pp. 61, 68–69, 110–111, 621; LSFP, pp. 20, 364; McGrath

See also Bonner, Weldon H. Phillip "Juke Boy"; Brooks, Lonnie; Chavis, Boozoo; Chenier, Morris "Big"; Lejeune, Iry; Wilson, Harding "Hop"

GOLDEN GATE QUARTET

Initial members: William Langford (1st tenor); Henry Owens (2nd tenor); Willie Johnson (baritone); and Orlandus Wilson (bass). One of the first professional quartets, the Gates formed in Norfolk, Virginia, in 1934. First recording in 1937, they emulated the Mills Brothers, incorporating that group's instrument impersonations and secular style, and dressed alike. Personnel changes over the years left Wilson the only original member by 1959, when the group relocated to France. Not counting their many postwar recordings, between 1937 and 1943 they recorded more than two hundred forty songs (including some air checks), and accompanied Leadbelly and Josh White for the Library of Congress.

ANDREW M. COHEN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin
Young, Alan. Woke Me Up This Morning: Black Gospel Singers and the Gospel Life, pp. xxv–xxvi, 56, 72, 78–83. Jackson: The University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

Discography: DGR

GOLDSTEIN, KENNETH

b. 17 March 1927; Brooklyn, NY

d. 11 November 1995; Philadelphia, PA

Dr. Kenneth S. "Kenny" Goldstein was the first of a generation of activist folklorists. Starting in the late 1950s he edited or produced more than five hundred LPs for Folkways, Stinson, Riverside, and Prestige Records, including recordings by Reverend Gary Davis, Lightnin' Hopkins, Sonny Terry, and Brownie McGhee. His well-crafted writing set the model for scholarly liner notes.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

Ben-Amos, Dan. "Kenneth S. Goldstein (1927–1995)." Journal of American Folklore 109, no. 433 (Summer 1996): 320–323.
Nelson, David. "Kenneth S. Goldstein" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 126 (March/April 1996): 62.

See also Stinson Records

GOLDWAX

A Memphis-based label whose sixty-plus singles, recorded between 1964 and 1969, are highly esteemed by fans of deep soul music. Goldwax was founded by Quentin M. Claunch (1922–), a Mississippi native with a country music background, with financial backing from Doc Russell, a Memphis pharmacist. Claunch was friends with Sun's Sam Phillips and a part-owner of Hi Records in the late 1950s. His first major signings were O. V. Wright and James Carr, local gospel singers about to go secular under the encouragement of songwriter Roosevelt Jamison. Goldwax released just one single by Wright (the classic "That's How Strong My Love Is") before losing him in a contract dispute with Peacock. The label is most closely associated with Carr, whose "You've Got My Mind Messed Up," "Throwing Water on a Drowning Man," and "Dark End of the Street" are considered masterpieces of deep soul.

GOLDWAX

Other Goldwax artists included the Ovations, featuring Sam Cooke sound-alike Louis Williams, George and Greer (George Jackson and Dan Greer), and Gene "Bowlegs" Miller. Although Goldwax recorded at various studios, its records had a signature sound, similar to Stax, but even more down-home and countrified, with muted horns, spare guitar, churchy organ, and the vocals front and center and soulful. After ceasing operations in 1969, the label was resurrected on a limited basis in the 1980s.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

Guralnick, Peter. "The Other Side of Memphis." In Sweet Soul Music: Rhythm and Blues and the Southern Dream of Freedom. New York: Harper & Row, 1986.

Discography: McGrath

Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "Goldwax Album Discography." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/bell/goldwax.html> (accessed February 14, 2004).

Selected Recordings

Various artists. The Goldwax Story, Vol. 1 (2001, Kent [UK] 203).

———. The Goldwax Story, Vol. 2 (2004, Kent [UK] 225).

GOODEN, TONY

b. 1939 or 1940, Illinois

d. 28 June 1980; Chicago, IL

Drummer associated most with Mighty Joe Young and Son Seals. His professional career effectively ended in 1978 when his right arm was crippled in a Norwegian train accident.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Iglauer, Bruce. "Tony Gooden" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 47 (Summer 1980): 33.

GOODMAN, SHIRLEY

b. 19 June 1936; New Orleans, LA

Singer and composer. Shirley Goodman began recording with partner Leonard Lee as Shirley & Lee ("The Sweethearts of the Blues") in 1952 and exploded out of New Orleans four years later with the R&B classic "Let the Good Times Roll." Worked with Leonard Lee, Dave Bartholomew, Earl Palmer, Mac Rebennack, Jessie Hill, and Harold Battiste.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

"Shirley Goodman: Sweetheart of the Blues." In "I Hear You Knockin'": The Sound of New Orleans Rhythm and Blues, by Jeff Hannusch, pp. 207–218. Ville Platte, LA: Swallow Publications, 1985.

Discography: LSFP

Mohr, Kurt. "A Shirley Goodman Discography." Shout no. 106 (1975/1976): 5–9, with additions in no. 108 (1976): 21.

GORDON, JAY

b. Charlotte, NC; active since 1990

Electric guitarist in the manner of Jimi Hendrix, Albert Collins, and Stevie Ray Vaughan. Based in Chicago, he has had a series of critically acclaimed CDs on the Blue Ace label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Scott Yanow)

Discography: AMG (Scott Yanow)

GORDON, JIMMIE

Flourished 1930s–1940s

Like Bumble Bee Slim, Bill Gaither, and Johnny Temple, Gordon was a journeyman studio singer of the 1930s, employed primarily to record, for the jukebox market, covers of hits by artists like Leroy Carr and Joe Pullum, as well as original numbers in similar idioms. A mainstay of the Decca catalog, he made more than sixty recordings, usually accompanied by piano, sometimes his own, and guitar, or by a small band with one or two horns. Although his manner may be too disengaged for current taste, his work often shows imagination and occasionally, as in “Graveyard Blues,” emotional depth.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Larkin

Russell, Tony. “Talking Blues: Blues Masters of the 30’s—Jimmie Gordon.” Jazz & Blues 1, no. 3 (June/July 1971): 29.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

GORDON, ROSCO(E)

b. 10 April 1928; Memphis, TN

d. 11 July 2002; Queens, NY

Born and raised in Memphis, influential rhythm and blues pioneer Rosco Gordon, Jr., got his musical start as a child learning on his mother’s piano. A naturally gifted musician, Gordon was entertaining family and friends with his talents on the piano by age seven. Growing up in the 1940s, his early inspirations came from the recordings of Nat “King” Cole, Charles Brown, and Ivory Joe Hunter and from catching performances of area musicians on Memphis’s bustling Beale Street. Around 1950, Gordon won first prize at the amateur show hosted by Rufus Thomas at Beale’s Palace Theater, which led to an appearance on Nat D. Williams’s WDIA radio show. The on-air performance was such a success that within days he began performing on his own show.

Gordon’s music soon caught the attention of Memphis producer Sam Phillips and in 1951 he made his first recordings at Phillips’s Memphis Recording Service. “Booted,” which featured Gordon’s uniquely overemphasized vocals and boogie piano rhythm, was leased by Phillips to both RPM and Chess simultaneously and quickly climbed to number one on the R&B charts in early 1952. Phillips’s leasing practices quickly prompted legal action between RPM and Chess over Gordon’s lucrative contract rights, with RPM eventually securing the artist. Gordon followed the success of “Booted” with the self-penned “No More Doggin” for RPM, which reached number two on the charts two months later. His relaxed, loping shuffle became known as “Rosco’s Rhythm,” a sound that would help inspire the music genre of ska, a forerunner of reggae, when his popular R&B records reached Jamaica.

Gordon continued to compose and record extensively throughout the 1950s and had releases on RPM, Duke, Sun, and Flip. In 1956, he recorded the regional dance hit “The Chicken” and toured with a live trained rooster as part of his performances. Gordon signed with Vee-Jay in 1959 and wrote and recorded “Just a Little Bit,” which reached number two on the charts and would eventually be covered by various artists, including Elvis Presley. In 1961, Gordon met Memphis singer Barbara Kerr and the two soon married. The following year, the couple moved to New York City where Gordon became active on the local music scene.

Throughout the 1960s and 1970s, Gordon, often with duet partner Kerr, recorded for ABC-Paramount, Old Town, Calla, and his own Bab-Roc label. Kerr died of cancer in 1984 and Gordon continued to perform sporadically throughout the next fifteen years. Gordon was able to regain the composing rights to much of his 1950s material after decades of not receiving royalties on his million-selling compositions. In 2000, he made a strong comeback with the critically acclaimed Memphis Tennessee for Stony Plain, in which he returned to his Beale Street roots and reaffirmed his status as a pioneer of 1950s Memphis R&B. In 2002, Gordon gave one of his last performances at the W. C. Handy Awards in Memphis during a tribute to Sun Records alongside old friends B. B. King, Little Milton, and Ike Turner. Rosco Gordon died of a heart attack at his home seven weeks later at age seventy-four.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Davis, Hank. “Roscoe Gordon.” Living Blues no. 49 (Winter 1980–81): 10–19.

Whitburn, Joel. Top Billboard R&B Singles: 1942–1999. Menomonee Falls, WI: Record Research, Inc., 2000.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Bootin’: The Best of the RPM Years (1998, ACE CDCHD 694).

Memphis Tennessee (2000, Stony Plain SPCD 1267).

GORDON, SAX

b. Gordon Beadle, 1965; Detroit, MI

Boston area tenor saxophonist in the jump-blues style. In addition to his own CD releases on the

GORDON, SAX

Bullseye label, he has recorded with Champion Jack Dupree and Duke Robillard.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Birchmeier)
Gordon Beadle's website, <http://www.saxgordon.com/> (accessed December 18, 2004).

Discography: AMG (Jason Birchmeier)

GOSPEL

(See Black Sacred Music)

GOTHAM/20TH CENTURY

Sam Goody launched the Gotham label in 1946. Focusing on blues, spirituals, and jazz, Goody's most successful artist was saxophonist/arranger Earl Bostic. In 1948, Goody sold Gotham along with Bostic's contract to Ivin Ballen of Philadelphia. Ballen's two labels, Apex and 20th Century, had been moderately successful, but he hoped Bostic could deliver a national hit. Instead, the breakthrough came from Ballen's new Gotham 600 gospel series, a 1949 release, "Touch Me, Lord Jesus" by Philadelphia locals, the Angelic Gospel Singers.

With that success, Ballen continued releasing Gotham and 20th Century sides from both local artists and catalogs acquired from other labels. Ballen's roster, strong in doo-wop, R&B, blues, and gospel, included artists Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee, John Lee Hooker, Champion Jack Dupree, Lee Andrews and the Hearts, the Capris, the Harmonizing Four, the Davis Sisters, and the Dixie Hummingbirds. By the late 1950s, Gotham and 20th Century were phased out as Ballen turned his attention instead to the record-pressing end of the business.

JERRY ZOLTEN

Bibliography

Bastin, Bruce. "The Gotham Gallery." Juke Blues no. 11 (Winter 1987/1988): 14–17.

Discography: McGrath

GRANDERSON, JOHN LEE

b. 11 April 1913; Ellendale, TN
d. 22 August 1979; Chicago, IL

Guitarist whose style was established in west Tennessee blues before World War II. He left his parents around 1927, making his way north to Chicago in 1928. For many years he worked as junkman, auto mechanic, and custodian. He performed around Chicago frequently, sometimes with John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson in the 1930s and 1940s, and with Robert Nighthawk through the 1960s. He recorded for Testament in 1962–1966 by himself and as part of the Chicago String Band (with Big John Wrencher, Johnny Young, and Carl Martin). Additional recordings were made for Aldephi. For the most part he ceased performing publicly in 1975, but he continued composing lyrics until his death. He suffered a stroke in February 1979, and he died that August of pancreatic cancer.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Swain, Tom. "John Lee Granderson 1913–1979" [obituary].
Living Blues no. 56 (Spring 1983): 39.

Discography: LSFP

GRANT, LEOLA "COOT"

b. Leola B. Pettigrew, 17 June 1893; Birmingham, AL

Aka Leola B. Wilson. Before World War I she toured widely as a dancer throughout the United States, Europe, and South Africa. In 1912 she married pianist Wesley "Sox" Wilson (1893–1958) and henceforth they worked as a team. They recorded much, especially before World War II, with jazz bandleaders like Fletcher Henderson. Grant's life after the 1958 death of Wilson remains unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR; LSFP

GRAVES, ROOSEVELT

b. 9 December 1909; Summerland, MS

d. 30 December 1962; Gulfport, MS

Guitarist and singer of blues and sacred material. Recorded in 1929 and in 1936 with his brother, whose name has been given as Uaroy or as Aaron. During their 1936 recording sessions in Hattiesburg, Mississippi, they joined pianist Cooney Vaughan for the highly regarded Mississippi Jook Band sides.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Santelli
Wardlow, Gayle Dean. "Blind Roosevelt Graves (1909–1962)." In Chasin' That Devil Music, pp. 191–195. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

Discography: DGR

GRAY, ARVELLA "BLIND"

b. Walter Dixon, 28 January 1906; Somerville, TX
d. 7 September 1980; Chicago, IL

Blind singer and bottleneck slide guitarist long active on Chicago's Maxwell Street, who was recorded in the 1960s and 1970s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSPF

GRAY, HENRY

b. 19 January 1925; Kenner, LA

Blues piano player Henry Gray was raised in Alsen, Louisiana, just north of Baton Rouge. He began teaching himself piano at age ten, and within a few years was playing music professionally in local clubs. After being discharged from the army in 1946, Gray moved to Chicago to become a full-time musician. He quickly befriended Big Bill Broonzy, Tampa Red, and Sonny Boy Williamson I, and developed his hard-driving piano style from mentor Big Maceo Merriweather. In the early 1950s, he joined Little Hudson's Red Devil Trio and gigged throughout Chicago. Gray's recording career began in 1952 when he backed Jimmy Rogers on several Chess sides. He went on to become an in-demand session musician for several prominent Chicago blues labels, and recorded with Little Walter, Bo Diddley, and Jimmy Reed, among others.

Gray recorded as a leader for Chess and Parrot in the mid-1950s with promising results, but the tracks were not issued. After playing with a who's who of Chicago musicians, Gray joined Howlin' Wolf's band in 1956 and gigged and recorded with him for the next twelve years. In 1968, Gray returned to Louisiana and became a longtime member of the Baton Rouge blues community and eventually formed his own band, the Cats. After a few European tours and recordings in the 1970s, he released his first domestic album on Blind Pig in 1988, and recorded and toured sporadically throughout the 1990s. Gray continued to be musically active into the twenty-first century, being regarded as an elder statesman of Chicago blues.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Hannusch, Jeff. "Henry Gray: Lucky Lucky Man." Living Blues no. 158 (July/August 2001): 21–25.

Discography: LSPF

Lucky Man (1988, Blind Pig CD 2788).
Plays Chicago Blues (2001, HighTone HCD 8131).

GREAT DEPRESSION

The Great Depression started with the Wall Street Crash of 1929, caused by overinvestment, and ended in 1940 with an economic upswing caused by war production.

The first time the term "the panic" was found in a post-Crash recording was when guitarist Hezekiah Jenkins recorded "The Panic Is On" in January 1931. The song depicts the results of the Depression for a variety of people. The selling of apples became the proverbial occupation for the unemployed, but Jenkins sings that the men may even have to resort to stealing and that some women see no way out but in prostitution.

While Herbert Hoover is popularly blamed for the Great Depression, the economic trends that caused the stock market crash, especially the popular practice of buying stock on credit, or on the margin, had begun well before he came into office. However, he believed that economic aid should come from state and local governments rather than the federal government. Thus, while he obtained funding for public works projects that would provide jobs, his administration did not provide any kind of direct aid to individuals or families, and most of the jobs provided by the public works went to whites. Many people, including many African Americans, lost their homes and went to live in shantytowns known as “Hoovervilles.” Hoovervilles were mentioned by J. D. Short in his 1933 “It’s Hard Time.”

Franklin Delano Roosevelt, the new Democratic president who entered the White House on March 4, 1933, announced that he wanted to come into the American homes “for a little fireside chat.” Roosevelt’s energetic personality helped restore confidence in the country and the economy. His administration created direct aid programs as well as a number of federally funded employment agencies on a scale much larger than Hoover had envisioned. Many blues songs of the period make references to these agencies.

The Civil Works Administration (CWA) was installed to guide America through the winter of 1933–1934. Joe Pullum, Reverend J. M. Gates, and Walter Roland sang how comforting it was to receive some cash instead of the second-rate products from the welfare stores.

The National Recovery Administration (NRA), which asked all employers to pay the same reasonable wages and to require the same hours, was a failure. Although Walter Vinson sang the glories of the NRA in January 1935, its codes were too complicated and it folded in May 1935.

Blues guitarist Carl Martin asked for a “Brand New Deal” and it came in the shape of the Works Progress Administration (WPA). From 1935 to 1943 the agency provided work for almost nine million people. Casey Bill Weldon sang about a WPA slum clearance project and Billie McKenzie worked as a prostitute to support her man, but was rejected as soon as her lover had found a WPA job. Peetie Wheatstraw sang three songs about the WPA in which the work on the projects and the 403 dismissal forms are discussed. Sonny Boy Williamson, Big Bill Broonzy, Louis Armstrong, Ida Cox, and Champion Jack Dupree also found musical inspiration in the WPA.

The Civilian Conservation Corps (CCC) provided work in national forests and parks for two and a half million young men. Washboard Sam had set his hopes on it after disappointing experiences with the WPA.

The Public Works Administration (PWA) provided “useful public works” at a cost of six billion dollars in the period from 1933 to 1939. Charlie McCoy is overjoyed with the change from “beef and meat” relief to real money, Jimmy Gordon begs the president to support the PWA, and Lonnie Johnson’s theme is the 403 dismissal note.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

van Rijn, Guido. Roosevelt’s Blues: African American Blues and Gospel Songs on FDR. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

GREAT MIGRATION

The Great Migration has been well documented in words, on canvas, and on film. A rural-to-urban migration, it embodied elements of cultural conflict, as generally poor, rural blacks made their way to northern metropolitan centers in numbers that affected the economic conditions and social relations in those destinations, as well as agricultural labor relations throughout much of the Deep South. Although thousands of black people migrated north throughout the nineteenth century, the Great Migration did not begin in earnest until World War I, a half century after Emancipation. It encompassed some six million migrants and it lasted for fifty to sixty years, commonly thought of as dwindling and then ending some time in the 1960s or 1970s. The Great Migration occurred in geographic “streams.” Most migrants from the southern Atlantic coast headed to Atlantic northern seaboard cities such as Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, while most migrants from the south central regions, including the blues hearth of the Yazoo Delta in Mississippi, left for midwestern cities, especially Chicago. Migrants brought their culture with them, including musical tastes and skills, and in this way the Delta (or country) blues made its way to Chicago where it would evolve into a more upbeat, self-affirming, and electric sound, called Chicago blues. Big Bill Broonzy, Arthur Crudup, Willie Dixon, Walter Horton, Howlin’ Wolf, Elmore James, Joe McCoy, Little Walter, Muddy Waters, Tampa Red, Junior Wells, John Lee (Sonny Boy) Williamson, and Sonny Boy Williamson II (Aleck Miller) were among the many blues players coming to Chicago as part of the Great Migration.

The Great Migration occurred for several reasons, both social and economic in nature. The end of Reconstruction and the departure of any substantial federal government presence left southern states to manage their own affairs. What evolved was a disenfranchisement of black people, a virtual apartheid society enforced by “Jim Crow” restrictions, and widespread violence, including lynchings. The federal Plessy v. Ferguson case established a legal basis for an apartheid society. An increased presence of the Ku Klux Klan during the 1920s clearly contributed to an atmosphere of fear. Economic conditions for most southern black people were dire as well. The sharecropping system soon evolved into a condition of perpetual debt for many black agricultural workers. The cotton-based agricultural economy throughout much of the South was depressed. Cotton was under attack by several factors, including the boll weevil, competition from the irrigated western states, and floods in the Mississippi and Yazoo Deltas in 1915 and 1916. Despite these reasons for blacks to leave the South, the Great Migration did not begin until there were economic opportunities for black people elsewhere.

The migration was facilitated directly by labor shortages in booming northern industries. World War I truncated the supply of industrial workers from Europe at the same time that many of those industries were experiencing substantial growth due to the expansionary U.S. economy and to the demands of warring nations for U.S. manufacturers' goods. Industrialists turned to the rural South with its ample supply of disaffected black people. Labor agents visited portions of the South, signing up able-bodied younger black males, securing them transport, usually via train, and making it possible for them to return, once established, for their families. Robert Abbott's Chicago Defender, a black-owned weekly newspaper read widely throughout the South, changed its stance because of these economic opportunities and began to encourage black migration to northern cities, offering letters attesting to the economic possibilities in northern cities and articles describing the relative freedom in those places, especially when compared to southern racial atrocities also described in the Defender's pages. Once earlier migrants were established, their kinfolk and friends often followed in a "chain" migration based on the earlier success stories. While conditions in the North were far from perfect they were generally superior to the climate of fear, the primitive housing conditions, the poor educational opportunities, and the hopelessness of the sharecropping system in the South. The World War I period has been termed the "first wave" of the Great Migration.

Movement from the rural South to northern cities continued throughout the 1920s and 1930s. A surge in migration during the 1940s, generally termed the "second wave," occurred with mechanization in southern agriculture, especially the mechanical cotton picker, the 1927 flood in the Yazoo Delta, and the upheaval of World War II, which again offered increased job opportunities for black people.

Black migrants from the Yazoo Delta in Mississippi tended toward Chicago, with the Illinois Central Railroad as their principal carrier and the South Side of Chicago as their usual destination. The Delta Blues, then, was carried along with this stream as a cultural trait. Its evolution into the "Chicago" or "urban" blues is an example of culture change brought about by the clash of rural and urban cultures. Blues players found they had difficulty being heard over the din in larger rooms and halls in the city and outside among the chaos of Maxwell Street, spurring an electrified amplification that was already well under way. Songwriters found that most younger urban black people were less interested in the old Delta themes such as poverty and personal crises than they were in more upbeat issues and feelings, reflective of the better economic times and more hopeful futures.

JOHN F. JAKUBS

Bibliography

- Grossman, James R. Land of Hope: Chicago, Black Southerners, and the Great Migration. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Lemann, Nicholas. The Promised Land: The Great Black Migration and How It Changed America. New York: Knopf, 1991.
- Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Viking Penguin, 1981.
- Trotter, Joe W. The Great Migration in Historical Perspective: New Dimensions of Race, Class, and Gender. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1991.

GREEN, AL

b. 13 April 1946; Forest City, AR

Singer, songwriter. Green's synthesis of secular and sacred created a unique and highly popular version of southern soul that upgraded the musicality of the subgenre while gaining it unprecedented international exposure.

At age nine he was singing in the family gospel group, the Green Brothers, which toured the South before settling in Grand Rapids, Michigan. But he was expelled from the group as a teenager for straying into secular music due to his admiration of Jackie Wilson. Green coped with the dismissal by forming his own group as a sixteen-year-old. He got his first taste of recording success in 1968 when his group the Soul Mates scored an R&B hit with "Back Up Train."

A year later Green was the opening act at a Hi Records package concert passing through Midland, Texas. The label's guiding force, trumpeter/producer/arranger Willie Mitchell, touring with his own "Soul Serenade" hit, convinced Green to return with him to Memphis and work with the label. The affiliation proved to be a historically significant and commercially successful one as Green and Hi Records crafted a sensual sound that was stylish, sophisticated, and eminently accessible to airplay.

A 1970 debut, Green Is Blues, served as a warmup for his next album, Al Green Gets Next to You, which began a run of hit singles that made him one of the best-selling artists of the 1970s. In 1972 "Let's Stay Together" became Green's first top ten single. It would be joined in rapid progression by a succession of enduring soul classics and radio favorites, including "Look What You've Done For Me," "Here I Am," "You Ought to Be with Me," and "Call Me."

Green's unbroken and ever-escalating string of success was ultimately interrupted by romance and religion. A bizarre incident involving an ex-girlfriend who poured boiling grits on him in the bathtub and then shot herself with his gun prompted Green in 1976 to become born again, but he also bought a church in Memphis and was ordained as a minister. He continued to record secular albums, although seemingly with less enthusiasm, but his fragile ballads couldn't compete commercially with the pounding beat of disco.

When Green fell from the stage at a Cincinnati concert he decided it was another sign steering him toward sacred music and he announced his total secular retirement. He recorded gospel albums in the 1980s and worked with Patti Labelle in the gospel musical "Your Arms Too Short to Box with God." He began to ease back into secular music with a performance on the 1988 Scrooged soundtrack but his subsequent releases achieved little attention or commercial success through the 1990s.

Green's songs never went away from radio airplay but the singer had to stage a public comeback to remind fans he remained a vital and viable musical force into the twenty-first century. He successfully did just that, headlining the 2003 Austin City Limits Festival to kick off a media-intensive national tour and releasing I Can't Stop on Verve Records the same year.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin
Green, Al, and Davin Seay. Take Me to the River. New York: HarperEntertainment, 2000.

GREEN, CAL

b. 22 June 1937; Dayton, TX
d. 4 July 2004, Lake View Terrace, CA

Guitar and vocalist who played jazz, blues, and doo-wop. His brother was guitarist Clarence Green (1934–1997). Green grew up in the guitar-rich environment of Texas, where he drew on Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown, T-Bone Walker, Albert Collins, Johnny Copeland, Johnny Guitar Watson, and older brother Clarence for inspiration. In 1954 Green joined Hank Ballard and the Midnighters. Tunes like "Don't Change Your Pretty Ways," "It's Love Baby (24 Hours a Day)," "Tore Up Over You," and "Open Up the Back Door" offered him ample opportunity to display his guitar prowess. Green recorded two double-sided 45s in 1958 for the Midnigher's Cincinnati-based Federal Records: "I Can Hear My Baby Calling"/"The Search Is Over," and the instrumentals "The Big Push"/"Green's Blues." He played on Connie McBooker and Quinton Kimble's RPM Records, served as the Houston sideman for artists such as Big Mama Thornton and Leo Baxter, and toured with Lowell Fulson.

A 1959 marijuana conviction sent Green to Texas prison for 21 months. After his release, he rejoined the Midnighters for a brief stint in 1962. Green's work became more influenced by jazz, and he worked in organ trios with such artists as Brother Jack McDuff and Charles Kynard. During the 1960s Green moved to Los Angeles and played studio sessions for artists like Ray Charles, Roberta Flack, and various Motown artists; he also worked with Sammy Davis, Jr., and Lou Rawls.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)
Shurman, Dick. "Blue Memories: Cal Green." Living Blues no. 24 (November/December 1975): 31–33.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Ballard, Hank; Brown, Clarence "Gatemouth"; Charles, Ray; Collins, Albert; Copeland, Johnny "Clyde"; Fulson, Lowell; Green, Clarence; Rawls, Lou; Thornton, Willie Mae "Big Mama"; Walker, T-Bone; Watson, Johnny "Guitar"

GREEN, CHARLIE

b. ca. 1900, Omaha, NE
d. February 1936; New York, NY

Early jazz/blues trombonist Charlie Green was born in Omaha, Nebraska, in 1900. Green played with the Fletcher Henderson Orchestra throughout the 1920s ultimately playing on several blues classics for Bessie Smith. These sessions immortalized Green with Smith's recording of "Trombone Cholly" (Columbia 14232-D) in 1927. Green's untimely death occurred in 1936 when he froze to death on the door step of his Harlem tenement.

BRYAN GROVE

Bibliography

Chilton; Larkin; New Grove Jazz

GREEN, CLARENCE

b. 17 June 1934; Mount Belvieu, TX

d. 13 March 1997; Houston, TX

Guitarist; brother of Cal Green. He was raised in Houston's Fifth Ward, where he saw his mother play guitar in the local Church of God in Christ congregation. His early music was in sacred performance, but his tastes shifted to blues, country music, and zydeco. From around 1951 through the early 1960s, he and local Creole bluesman Albert Redeaux formed Blues for Two, which at times had performing with them singer Lavelle White and guitarists Johnny Clyde Copeland and Joe Hughes. After Blues for Two disbanded, Green briefly formed the Cobras, and he also participated in Duke/Peacock studio sessions.

By the end of the 1960s he formed the Rhythmaires, which he maintained until his death. For seven years Trudy Lynn was his singer, and tenor saxophonist Wilbur MacFarland and pianist Leon Haywood were in various lineups. The Rhythmaires were a local favorite, and for many years the group played the Penzoil oil company Christmas party.

Green stayed in Houston, working days for Houston Light and Power electric utility. He recorded for small labels such as Shomar, Lynn, Master, and Pope. For many years writers mistakenly attributed his records to Galveston, Texas, pianist Clarence "Candy" Green and vice versa.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Shurman, Dick. "Clearing Up the Clarences." Living Blues no. 85 (March/April 1989): 32.

Wasserzieher, Bill. "Houston Blues: Clarence Green." Living Blues no. 131 (January/February 1997): 43.

GREEN, CLARENCE "CANDY"

b. 15 March 1929; Galveston, TX

d. 3 April 1988; Galveston, TX

Singer and pianist who spent much of his life traveling abroad, initially with the Merchant Marine (1945–1948), then as an itinerant musician (1954–1972) in Scandinavia and Europe. His recorded work done was mostly in Houston, Texas, in 1952, partly on a contract with Duke/Peacock, and also for the Monarch and Essex labels. Not to be confused with guitarist Clarence Green (1934–1997), brother of Cal Green.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Paul, Mike. "Clarence 'Candy' Green" [obituary], and Shurman, Dick, "Clearing Up the Clarences." Living Blues no. 85 (March/April 1989): 31–32.

Discography: LSFP

GREEN, GRANT

b. 6 June 1935; St. Louis, MO

d. 31 January 1979; New York City, NY

Guitarist. Early influences included Charlie Christian and Charlie Parker. His first experience was gained in St. Louis, then in New York from 1960, where he recorded extensively in hard bop and soul jazz settings for Blue Note, and became a central figure in the establishment of the organ trio as a popular phenomenon (his partners included Baby Face Willette, Larry Young, and Big John Patton). His direct, soulful playing was cast in an even more populist context in the 1970s, when he turned to more commercial soul and funk styles. His lyrical style was characterized by a linear horn-like approach that remained rooted in blues.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Green, Sharony Andrews. Grant Green: Rediscovering the Forgotten Genius of Jazz Guitar. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1999.

Mathieson, Kenny. Cookin': Hard Bop and Soul Jazz, 1954–1965. Edinburgh: Canongate, 2002.

Discography

Grantstand (1961, Blue Note 84086).

Born to be Blue (1962, Blue Note 84432).

Feelin' the Spirit (1962, Blue Note 84132).

Am I Blue (1963, Blue Note 84139).

Idle Moments (1963, Blue Note 84154).

GREEN, GRANT

Talkin' About! (1964, Blue Note 84183).

His Majesty King Funk (1965, Verve 68627).

Live at the Lighthouse (1972, Blue Note A 037 G2).

Iron City (Cobblestone 9002).

GREEN, JESSE

b. 23 August 1937; Delhi, LA

Drummer. Moved to Chicago in 1952. His first significant sideman work in blues was with Otis Rush in 1962, then later with Mighty Joe Young in 1962–1968.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Eagle, Bob. "Chicago's Sidemen." Blues Unlimited no. 110 (October/November 1974): 13–14.

GREEN, LIL

b. Lillian Johnson, 22 December 1919; Clarksdale, MS

d. 14 April 1954; Chicago, IL

Chicago blues singer of the 1940s and 1950s. Her immediately recognizable sly, astringent, and high-pitched voice so intimately defines the character of her songs that one hears true artistry in her music, most notably in her early 1940s hits, "Romance in the Dark," "Mellow Man," and "Why Don't You Do Right?" Green began performing in 1939, and the following year while singing at the Manchester Grill, she was discovered by blues producer Lester Melrose. He got her signed to RCA-Victor's Bluebird imprint, and her debut session, where she was accompanied magnificently by Big Bill Broonzy on guitar and Simeon Henry on piano, yielded one of the great blues ballads, "Romance in the Dark." The record became a standard, being recorded by such artists as Jeri Sullivan and Billie Holiday. Her next hit was "My Mellow Man" (1941), followed by the biggest record of her career, "Why Don't You Do Right?" (1941). The following year Peggy Lee recording with Benny Goodman had a huge hit with a swing version of the song.

Off her recording successes, Green toured the country playing all the large black clubs and the major theaters, generally with the Tiny Bradshaw Band. After World War II, RCA-Victor in attempt to give Green a more modern sound had her record with horn-driven combos, and even a big band, which was led by Howard Callender, who became her husband. But although hits were not forthcoming, Green continued to tour successfully into the late 1940s. After her Victor contract ran out in 1947, she recorded twice more, for Aladdin (1949) and then Atlantic (1951). In the 1950s Green continued to work the clubs in Chicago, but died in obscurity.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

AMG (Barry Lee Pearson); Harris; Larkin; Santelli Roland, Will. "Why Don't You Do Right By Lil Green." Metronome (April 1943): 22, 25.

Stewart-Baxter, Derrick. "Lil Green: A Tribute to a Great Jazz Singer." Jazz Journal 7 (August 1954): 27–28.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

GREEN, NORMAN G. "GUITAR SLIM"

b. 25 July 1907; Bryant, TX

d. 28 September 1975; Los Angeles, CA

This deep singer and down-home guitarist, who carried the Texas blues tradition into California, recorded some classic sides in the 1940s and 1950s, such as "Alla Blues," that would become some kind of a West Coast national anthem like "Tin Pan Alley." Shortly before his death, he was rediscovered by Johnny Otis who recorded his only album.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

Harris
Stolper, Darryl. "Slim's Green Story." Blues Unlimited no. 63 (June 1969): 11.

Discography: LSFP

Stone Down Blues (1970, Kent LP 549).

GREEN, PETER

b. Peter Greenbaum, 29 October 1946; London, England

Peter Green's Fleetwood Mac was one of the British bands most responsible for popularizing electric blues with young rock audiences during the 1960s. At his peak of popularity in the late 1960s, Green was considered a rival of Eric Clapton as the top British electric blues guitarist.

Green replaced Clapton in the Bluesbreakers in 1966. In 1967, he left to form Fleetwood Mac as lead guitarist and singer. Green's new band was just as immersed in Chicago blues as Mayall's, and Green's ability to write hit songs ("Albatross," "Black Magic Woman") won them a loyal following.

Green disappeared from public view after leaving Fleetwood Mac in 1970. He recorded sporadically in the late 1970s and 1980s before reemerging in the late 1990s, still playing Chicago-style electric blues.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Bruning, Bob. Blues: The British Connection: The Stones, Clapton, Fleetwood Mac and the Story of Blues in Britain. London, England: Helter Skelter Publishing, 2003.

Discography

Fleetwood Mac. Peter Green's Fleetwood Mac (1968, Blue Horizon 63200).
 ———. English Rose (1969, Epic 26446).
 John Mayall & the Bluesbreakers. A Hard Road (1967, London 502).
 Peter Green. Reaching the Cold 100 (2003, Eagle 20004).

GREENE, L. C.

b. 23 October 1921; Minter City, MS
 d. 24 August 1985; Pontiac, MI

Detroit-based guitarist whose records for the Dot and Von labels are notable if lesser-known examples of Mississippi rural blues migrated to a northern city. On most of his records, he performs with his cousin Walter Mitchell on harmonica.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
 O'Neal, Jim. "L. C. Greene" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 68 (1986): 36.

Discography: LSF

GREENE, RUDOLPH SPENCER "RUDY"

Active 1940s–1950s

Pianist, guitarist, and singer in 1950s jump rhythm-and-blues and early rock 'n' roll styles. He began in the 1940s as a T-Bone Walker imitator in Nashville. After a few years in Chicago, he moved to Florida in 1956. The next year during an Ember label session in New York City, he recorded his celebrated song "Juicy Fruit."

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)
 Penny, Dave. "Rudy Greene: The Blues Imitator." Blues & Rhythm no. 43 (March 1989): 18–20.

Discography: LSF

GREER, "BIG" JOHN MARSHALL

b. 21 November 1923; Hot Springs, AR
 d. 12 May 1972; Hot Springs, AR

Vocalist and tenor saxophonist who had considerable success with his own groups and as a featured member of the Lucky Millinder band. His "Got You on My Mind" for RCA Victor was a hit in 1952. Much of his career was guided by childhood friend Henry Glover, who had referred Greer to Millinder, and who later brought Greer to King Records as artist. By 1957 he had returned to Hot Springs, Arkansas, for the remainder of his life.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin

Discography: AMG; LSF

GREY GHOST

b. Roosevelt Thomas Williams, 7 December 1903; Bastrop, TX
 d. 17 July 1996; Austin, TX

Singer, pianist. Williams acquired his performing name as a young barrelhouse pianist who hopped trains to play juke joints, carnivals, medicine shows, and dances and then disappeared on the rails immediately afterward. He gained brief national attention with a Time magazine mention of his "Hitler Blues" during World War II but he ultimately tired of travel and settled in Austin, Texas, where he drove a school bus until he reached retirement age. He enjoyed a career renaissance as an octogenarian due to the efforts of Texas ethnomusicologist Tary Owens, who recorded him in 1987 on Catfish Records. After his rediscovery, Williams, who also released an eponymous album on Spindletop in 1992, performed regularly in Austin up until the time of his death.

GREY GHOST

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn); Larkin Owens, Tary. "Roosevelt T. Williams (The Grey Ghost)" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 130 (November/December 1996): 47–48.

Discography: AMG

GRIFFIN, BESSIE

b. 6 July 1922; New Orleans, LA
d. 10 April 1989; Culver City, CA

Griffin sang in church choirs and was discovered by New Orleans native Mahalia Jackson, who heard Griffin sing in 1951 at a celebration honoring Jackson. Two years later, she joined the Caravans for a year, eventually settling in Los Angeles. She made her reputation with her blues-drenched contralto voice and her willingness to perform in nightclubs and jazz festivals.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

Heilbut, Anthony. The Gospel Sound: Good News and Bad Times. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1971.

GRIFFIN, "BIG" MIKE

b. Lawton, OK

Singer, lead guitarist. Formative influences included Albert King, Albert Collins, and Paul Butterfield guitarists Michael Bloomfield and Elvin Bishop. Raised in Oklahoma, his professional career has been in Nashville, Tennessee. His CD releases have appeared on the Malaco/Waldoxy label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

GRIFFIN, JOHNNY

b. John Arnold Griffin III, 24 April 1928; Chicago, IL

Saxophonist. Associated with the so-called "tough tenors" school in the late 1950s and early 1960s. Combined elements of swing and bop within his hard-hitting style, and always excelled in blues form. Joined Lionel Hampton straight from school in 1945, and later had important associations with Art Blakey's Jazz Messengers (1957) and the Tough Tenors band co-led with Eddie "Lockjaw" Davis (1960–1962). Settled in Europe from 1963, continued to lead his own bands and tour as a "single" with local rhythm sections. Griffin earned his reputation for the fearsome speed of his playing, but he was also a highly expressive interpreter of ballads with a deep feeling for blues.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

New Grove Jazz
Bernotas, Bob. "Johnny Griffin." Saxophone Journal 6 (1994): 14.
Mathieson, Kenny. Cookin': Hard Bop and Soul Jazz, 1954–1965. Edinburgh: Canongate, 2002.

Discography: Lord

Selected Recordings

A Blowing Session (1957, Blue Note 1559); The Congregation (1957, Blue Note 1580); The Little Giant (1959, Riverside 1149); The Big Soul Band (1960, Riverside 1179); The Man I Love (1967, Black Lion 60107); Blues for Harvey (1973, Steeplechase 1004); Return of the Griffin (1978, Galaxy 5117); The Cat (1990, Antilles 422-848421-2); Chicago, New York, Paris (1994, Verve 314-527367-2).
With Eddie "Lockjaw" Davis. Tough Tenors (1960, Jazzland 931); Blues Up and Down (1961, Jazzland 960); Live at Minton's (1961, Prestige 7309, 7330, 7357, 7407); The Tenor Scene (1961, Prestige 7191); Tough Tenor Favourites (1962, Jazzland 976).

GRIFFIN, RAYMOND L. "R. L."

b. 9 December 1939; Kilgore, TX

Singer, club owner. Initial success came in Dallas, Texas, as a member of Big Bo and the Arrows. In pursuing his solo career, he took as his models singers Bobby Bland and Z. Z. Hill. He made a number of 45-rpm singles, including some for the All Platinum label with Al "TNT" Braggs producing. Since 1985 his Blues Palace (originally Blues Alley) has been a leading blues and soul venue in Dallas.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
Schuller, Tim. "Dallas Blues: R. L. Griffin." Living Blues
no. 129 (September/October 1996): 42–46.

Discography: LSFPGRIFFITH, SHIRLEY

b. 26 April 1907; Brandon, MS
D. 18 June 1974; Indianapolis, IN

Blues singer and guitarist. Although Griffith did not receive much critical acclaim during his lifetime, his controlled and expressive voice and his skillful guitar playing garnered him respect from many of the blues musicians with whom he played. Griffith was born in the small farming town of Brandon, but the family moved to Jackson, Mississippi, when Shirley was a small child. By age ten Griffith began learning guitar under the instruction of his aunt and uncle, and in his late teens Griffith had met Tommy Johnson, a noted blues singer and Jackson native. Johnson became Griffith's greatest musical influence and taught him the subtle art of blues music guitar accompaniment, particularly in the Mississippi country blues style. Johnson encouraged him to pursue a career in music and in 1928 Griffith moved to Indianapolis to pursue this dream.

Griffith made a modest living playing at local taverns in Indianapolis and there he met fellow musician Scrapper Blackwell and also Leroy Carr, one of the most popular blues singers of the 1930s. Griffith played with them both, most commonly at local parties, clubs, and taverns. Although Griffith continued playing music throughout his life, by the 1940s he no longer depended on his music for a living and instead held a variety of positions at the local Chevrolet automobile factory. He toured clubs on the East Coast with Yank Rachell in 1968, performed at the first Ann Arbor (Michigan) Blues Festival in 1969 and appeared at the Notre Dame Blues Festival in South Bend, Indiana, in 1971.

ERIN STAPLETON-CORCORAN

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
"Shirley Griffith." Living Blues no. 19 (January/February 1973): 3.

Discography: LSFPSelected Recordings

Saturday Blues: The Blues of Shirley Griffith (1961, Prestige/Bluesville).

Indiana Avenue Blues (1962, Prestige/Bluesville).
Mississippi Blues (1973, USA: Blue Goose Records).

GRIMES, LLOYD "TINY"

b. ca. 7 July 1916; Newport News, VA
d. 4 March 1989; New York City, NY

Guitarist. Birth date is unconfirmed. He claimed 1915, 1916, and 1917 at different times, while the Social Security death index suggests 1911. Grimes began his career as a drummer, then became a pianist and singer before settling on guitar around 1938, with a preference for the four-string model. He was influenced by electric guitar pioneer Charlie Christian. Grimes joined pianist Art Tatum in 1943 in a historic trio with bassist Slam Stewart. After leaving Tatum, he led his own groups, including one that recorded an important early bebop session with Charlie Parker on alto saxophone in 1944. He also worked with Billie Holiday during this period.

Grimes switched his focus to rhythm and blues in the late 1940s, leading a popular band known as the Rockin' Highlanders. The band ran until 1955 and recorded for Atlantic and Gotham. It featured saxophonist Jon Hardee and then Red Prysock, who wore kilts on stage and included a couple of Scottish music hall tunes in their jazz and blues repertoire.

Grimes had mainly studio work after 1958. He cut three jazz albums with blues bias as a leader for Prestige featuring Coleman Hawkins, Eddie "Lock-jaw" Davis, and Jerome Richardson. Ill health forced a two-year hiatus in 1964–1966, but he returned to performing and recording, including sessions with Johnny Hodges, Illinois Jacquet, and others, in late 1960s. He toured Europe in 1968 and 1970, the later occasion with Jay McShann and George Kelly, and with Arnett Cobb and Panama Francis in 1974.

He underwent a serious operation in the early 1980s, but returned to performing, and remained active in his last decade around New York and on the jazz and blues festival circuit.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli
Dance, Stanley. "Tiny Grimes." In The World of Swing.
New York: Scribners, 1974.

Discography: LSFPSelected Recordings

"Romance Without Finance" (1944, Savoy 532); "Tiny's Tempo"/"I'll Always Love You Just the Same" (1944, Savoy 526); Rock the House (aka And His Rockin' Highlanders) (1947–1953, Swingtime 1016); Blues Groove (1958, Prestige 7138); Callin' the Blues (1958, Prestige 7144); Tiny in Swingsville (1959, Prestige 1796); Profoundly Blue (1973, Muse 5012); Some Groovy Fours (1974, Classic Jazz 114); Big Time Guitar (United Artists UA 3232).

GRIMES, LLOYD “TINY”

GRISWOLD, ART AND ROMAN

Art Griswold

- b. 10 November 1939; Tillar, AR
- d. 18 November 2003; Sylva, OH

Roman Griswold

- b. 5 September 1936; Tillar, AR

Masters of raucous electric blues. While recuperating from a motorcycle wreck at age seventeen, Art Griswold received his first guitar. Eventually he migrated to Toledo, Ohio, where in 1959 he was joined by brother Roman. They formed a band, gained experience playing at Hines Farm in the early 1960s, then moved the band to Art's Tavern in 1965. By 1980 they were recognized as the mainstays of Toledo blues. Since Art's death, Roman has maintained the band as Roman Griswold and the Griswold Blues Band.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Pettengill, Michael. “Scaring the Good, the Bad, and the Ugly: Art and Roman Griswold.” Living Blues no. 92 (July/August 1990): 18–22.

Discography: AMG

GROSSMAN, STEFAN

- b. 16 April 1945; Brooklyn, NY

Acoustic guitarist. Grossman acquired a taste for acoustic blues, jazz, ragtime, and early folk guitar styles as a teenager, and studied on weekends with Reverend Gary Davis for eight years from the age of fifteen, absorbing all the veteran bluesman could teach him. His other major influences included Mississippi John Hurt, Charley Patton, Son House, Skip James, Fred McDowell, and Mance Lipscomb.

He formed the Even Dozen Jug Band in 1963 with Peter Siegel. He recorded his influential debut album How to Play Blues Guitar in 1966, a foretaste of things to come later in his career, when he chose to focus increasingly on the production of instructional books and videos over performing.

He was a member of the radical rock group the Fugs in 1966, and worked with Chicago Loop and Mitch Ryder in 1967. He moved to Europe in 1967, living for long periods in England and Italy, where he established a notable presence on the folk and blues circuits. He cofounded the Kicking Mule label with Ed Denson, a partnership that lasted until the mid-1980s, when Fantasy bought the catalog.

He returned to America in the early 1980s, and set up his Stefan Grossman Guitar Workshop and Vestapol Videos to produce and sell his teaching materials. His major contribution to the preservation and promulgation of acoustic blues guitar styles has lain in his pedagogical activities.

Although he is a virtuoso technician, he is at best an adequate vocalist, and much of his playing as a performer can seem dry and rather clinical. He is heard to best advantage in that context on some of his early records, and the double LP Stefan Grossman Live (1973).

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Grossman, Stefan. The Country Blues Guitar. New York: Oak Publications, 1968.
———. The Holy Blues: Gary Davis. New York: Robbins Music, 1970.

Discography

How to Play Blues Guitar (1966, Elektra EKL 324); Aunt Molly's Murray Farm (1969, Fontana STL 5463); The Grammercy Park Sheik (1969, Fontana STL 5485); Ragtime Cowboy Jew (1970, Transatlantic TRA 223); Yazoo Basin Boogie (1970, Transatlantic TRA 217); Stefan Grossman Live (1973, Transatlantic TRA 264); Bottleneck Serenade (1975, Transatlantic TRA 293); How to Play Ragtime Guitar (1975, Kicking Mule KM 115; with Ton Van Bergeyk); Country Blues Guitar (1977, Kicking Mule KM 145); Stefan Grossman and John Renbourn (1977, Kicking Mule KM 152); Thunder on the Run (1980, Kicking Mule KM 171); Under the Volcano (1980, Kicking Mule KM 162; with John Renbourn); Shining Shadows (1985, Shanachie 95002); Love, Devils & the Blues (1988, Shanachie 97001); Guitar Landscapes (1990, Shanachie 95002); Black Melodies on a Clear Afternoon (1991, Shanachie 98011/12); Northern Skies, Southern Blues (1997, Shanachie 97026; with Duck Baker); Shake That Thing: Fingerpicking Country Blues (1998, Shanachie 97027).

GUESNON, GEORGE “CURLEY” “CREOLE”

b. 25 May 1907; New Orleans, LA

d. 5 May 1968; New Orleans LA

Jazz banjoist, guitarist, and vocalist, Guesnon worked occasionally with blues musicians. In the mid-1930s he toured with Little Brother Montgomery’s Southern Troubadours. A brief stay in New York in 1940 led to work with Trixie Smith and with Jelly Roll Morton.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin, New Grove Jazz

Discography: DGR; Lord

GUITAR

Technical Description

A stringed instrument consisting of a neck approximately thirty inches long attached to a hollow, semi-hollow, or solid body usually made of wood, but also steel, plastic, or other synthetic materials. Most modern guitars have six steel strings, though twelve- and ten-string models also exist. Strings 6–4 (the heaviest) usually have a steel, bronze, or brass wrap over a solid steel core, while strings 3–1 (the lightest) are generally plain, solid steel on electric guitars. Classical and flamenco guitars use nylon for strings 1 and 2 and wrapped bronze strings for 6–3 (as do most flat-top acoustic guitars).

The strings are attached to the top of the neck, or headstock, by tuning machines made of steel with worm gears or by wooden pegs (classical and flamenco guitars) in slots that fit by pressure. At the bottom of the headstock the strings pass over a nut made of bone, brass, plastic, or other synthetic material, with narrow slots cut to hold them in place. They are then anchored at a bridge, or a tailpiece just below the bridge, and near the lower bout of the guitar. The distance between the nut and bridge is called the scale length and varies from twenty-four and a half inches for Gibson guitars to twenty-five and a quarter inches for Fender guitars. The neck has a thin veneer called a fingerboard, usually made of rosewood, maple, or ebony and glued to the front side of the neck into which the steel frets are seated.

Historical Development

The original ancestor of the guitar and, indeed, the first musical instrument, is likely the bow that was paired with arrows as a weapon. Around approximately 2000 B.C. the Assyrians had a stringed instrument called a chetarah as well as huge lyres the size of a harp. A bas-relief from Turkey circa 1300 B.C. shows what looks similar to a small, modern-day travel guitar. Various other cultures produced their own examples. The ancient Hebrews had the kinnura and the Greeks the cithara, from which a line can be drawn to the German fiedel, the French vielle, the English gittern, and the Spanish vihuela and guitarra in the medieval ages. In the twelfth century the Moors brought to Spain a fretted al-ud that would come to be called a lute and have a profound influence on the concept of standardized pitch. The ancestors of the modern Spanish guitar had many courses or pairs of strings and various tunings for hundreds of years. Six-string guitars finally appeared around 1810 and standard tuning of E–A–D–G–B–E (low to high) was documented in a Spanish instruction book in 1820. C. F. Martin was extremely important in helping to develop and popularize the flat-top acoustic guitar in America in the mid-1800s.

Acoustic Guitars

Acoustic flat-top guitars usually have round sound holes, though some have been made with f-holes or oval sound holes. The best have tops made of spruce for its resonant qualities, with sides and backs made of mahogany, maple, or rosewood. Cheap instruments made by Stella and Washburn were favored by blues guitarists in the prewar years and usually had straight, ladder bracing underneath the tops for support. Higher quality Martin and Gibson guitars used an X-bracing system that provides a more resonant sound and has become the accepted method on virtually all acoustic guitars. Arch top guitars with f-holes are constructed of similar materials but have a carved curve or arch to their tops, project a bright, cutting tone, and have traditionally been the instrument of choice for jazz guitarists.

Electric Guitars

Since approximately 1936 electric guitars have been amplified with electromagnetic pickups, made by wrapping thousands of coils of thin copper wire around a magnet. Smaller magnets, called pole pieces, stick up through the top of the pickup, one for each string, and are often adjustable in height in order to balance the volume for each string. A guitar cord or cable connecting to the amplifier sends electricity to the pickup via an input jack on the side or front of the instrument. The vibrating strings interrupt the magnetic field created by the pickups and a relatively weak electronic signal is sent back from the guitar to an amplifier where it is boosted in volume many times over. Most pickups are passive, but active pickups powered by onboard batteries have proved popular in recent years and provide a much louder signal from the instrument. Acoustic guitars of all types may be amplified by adding pickups.

GUITAR

African Antecedents

According to writer Christo van Rensburg, “Much [African] music is based on speech and the bond between language and music is so intimate that it is actually possible to tune an instrument so that the music it produces is linguistically comprehensible.” This distinction is especially important in light of the fretless stringed instruments found in sub-Saharan Africa that must be seen as precursors of vocal-like bottleneck blues guitar techniques.

The stringed bow as originally used to propel an arrow is likely the second musical instrument to come into being after the drum. In central Africa this manifests itself as the one-string children’s ground bow where one end of the string is attached near the top of a bent stick and the other end is secured to a tin can placed in a hole in the ground for resonance. The string is struck with the right index finger while the left hand stops the string at intervals along the string to create various pitches. The one-string diddley bow that was often attached to the side of a house or a barn in the Deep South in the prewar years and played with a slider is a variation. These two and the following examples fall in the chordophone family of instruments, where sound is produced by means of stretched strings. The Brazilian berimbau, brought to South America by slaves from Angola, is similar inasmuch as the pitch is selected by the left hand via a finger, thimble, coin, or small stone as the right hand strikes the string with a stick. The bow harp from Zaire consists of three to ten curved necks with strings that are plucked, whereas the harp has seven strings on a notched bridge attached to a half gourd as a resonator. Mozambique produced a lute featuring a single string on a neck stuck into a gourd that was bowed rather than plucked. The lyre from Kenya has five to twelve strings fastened to a resonator and is strummed. In Madagascar the vahiha is more like a zither, with sixteen strings that run the length of a bamboo body and are held in tension via small wedges, and was originally brought to the continent from Indonesia.

It is worth noting that the banjo, preceding the guitar in the blues, is unquestionably an African invention derived from stick and gourd instruments and was first known as the “banjar” or “banza.” Originally tuned much lower than what became common practice, it was first documented in Mozambique in 1678 and famously acknowledged by Thomas Jefferson in Notes on the State of Virginia in 1781: “The instrument proper to the [slaves] is the banjar, which they brought hither from Africa.”

Development and Dissemination Through 1890

The nineteenth century saw the gut string, classical guitar played by the upper classes and peasants alike develop into its nascent role of what would become the defining popular instrument of the twentieth century. Virginia planters and others in the original colonies, including Ben Franklin, were known to play in the eighteenth century. However, it was in the hands of freed slaves after the Civil War that the instrument that Beethoven once called a small orchestra in a box became the once and future “voice” of the blues.

Spanish explorers likely introduced the guitar to the American West where they eventually found their way into the callused hands of cowboys in the mid-1800s to provide entertainment around the campfire, and Union troops during the Civil War took guitars into the various campaigns for the same purpose. Most significantly, they undoubtedly left some behind in the South after the conflict to be picked up by emancipated blacks. They had been playing prototypical banjos for years along with other homemade, African-influenced “diddley bows” and stringed instruments. The improved playability and sound of the guitar must have proved enticing, though the thorough transition from banjo to guitar would take decades. Black musicians in the 1860s and 1870s played ragtime, minstrel songs, work songs, ballads, hollers, stomps, breakdowns, and proto-blues like “Frankie and Johnny” (later “Frankie and Albert”), believed to have been sung by Union soldiers stationed in Vicksburg, Mississippi, during the war.

The great folklorist and novelist Zora Neale Hurston described two or three guitarists playing a form of early boogie-woogie in the jukes (jooks) and lumber camps circa the 1880s before the louder and more cost-efficient practice of having one piano took over. A popular, affordable guitar manufacturer at this time was Lyon and Healey out of Chicago with their Washburn brand. Jefferson “Brock” Mumford is pictured around the turn of the century playing one with the legendary New Orleans cornetist Buddy Bolden.

None other than classical composer Antonin Dvorak stated in 1890 that the future of music in the United States would come from “what are called the Negro melodies.” Indeed, “Joe Turner Blues” appeared a few years later as the prototypical twelve-bar blues and popular music was profoundly changed forever. The guitar would prove to be the perfect accompaniment instrument for the blues with its ability to allow simultaneously fingerpicked bass lines, chords, and riffs.

Pre-Blues Guitar

A Louisiana plantation slave named Mary Reynolds once commented that on Saturday evenings people “brung fiddles and guitars and come out and play. The others claps they hands and stomp they feet and we young-uns cut a step around.” Photographs exist of Union soldiers holding guitars and it is reasoned that they left some behind in the South after the Civil War, contributing to the instrument’s disbursement. Though the banjo, or banzar, descended directly from stick and gourd instruments in Africa, was the more popular (or available) choice prior to 1890 when the first true rumblings of the blues were reported, guitars were obviously employed. The music played by “songsters” or “musicianers” (who often accompanied songsters) on the guitar and banjo was pre-blues consisting of white ballads and hymns adapted by blacks, minstrel tunes, reels, jigs, field hollers, work songs, and breakdowns. The latter also was a term associated with black dances and was characterized by an eight-measure, V7–I chordal pattern apparently derived from Stephen Foster’s guitar arrangement for his “Old Dog Tray” from 1855. “Pretty Polly,” a sixteen-bar British folk ballad that was condensed into an Africanized-Americanized twelve-bar version near the end of the nineteenth century, was known also to be played on the guitar. It was the prototype for the work song ballad “Po Lazarus,” which itself was the basis of Bob Dylan’s “Ballad of Hollis Brown” from 1963. The deeper, fuller tones capable of being extracted from the steel string guitar likely influenced all types of blues accompaniment around the turn of the century.

Prewar

The First Blues Guitarists

Jefferson “Brock” Mumford, Charley Galloway, T-Boy Remy, and Lorenzo Staulz all played blues and jazz with the legendary New Orleans “king” trumpeter Buddy Bolden in the late 1890s and early 1900s. W. C. Handy told a now famous tale about how in 1903 he heard a slide guitarist play in the railroad station in Tutwiler, Mississippi. The first guitarist that Charlie Patton may have heard was Lem Nichols on Heron’s plantation in the early years of the twentieth century. The common denominator for the first blues guitarists is that they went unrecorded. Consequently, a survey of prewar guitarists begins with the first country blues recordings and ends in the early 1940s.

1920s

Acoustic country blues guitar became a matter of record on or near October 24, 1923, when Sylvester Weaver from Kentucky accompanied singer Sara Martin on “Longing for Daddy Blues” backed with “I’ve Got to Go and Leave My Daddy Behind” for Okeh. On November 2 of the same year he was afforded the opportunity to wax the solo bottleneck instrumentals “Guitar Blues” backed with “Guitar Rag.” The latter is a blues guitar landmark, having been appropriated countless times including as “Steel Guitar Rag” by Bob Wills and the Texas Playboys in 1936. It was not until March 1926, however, when Blind Lemon Jefferson from Texas cut “Got the Blues” backed with “Long Lonesome Blues” for Paramount that the era of country blues began as the record companies saw the potential for profit among the black populace.

Country blues guitarists often performed solo and were not confined by regular meter, chord changes, or measures. Blind Blake and Mississippi John Hurt (ragtime), Tommy Johnson, Blind Willie McTell (twelve-string guitar), Ishman Bracey, Barbecue Bob, Henry Thomas, Furry Lewis, Robert Wilkins, Jim Jackson, Frank Stokes, Blind Willie Johnson, and Garfield Akers were only some of the most prominent. Guitar and piano duets appeared in the latter half of the decade (with Scrapper Blackwell and Leroy Carr leading the way) as did novelty and risqué “hokum blues” by the Hokum Boys and Cannon’s Jug Stompers.

The two most influential blues guitarists of the 1920s, however, would have to be Lonnie Johnson and Charley Patton. Johnson was perhaps the first to explore the potential of single-note lines and played solo and ensemble blues and jazz into the 1960s. Many country blues greats were “discovered” by white talent scout H. C. Speir in his furniture store/recording studio in Jackson, Mississippi, including Patton, the “Father of the Delta Blues,” who commenced recording in 1929 with “Pony Blues” backed with “Banty Rooster Blues.”

GUITAR

1930s

The 1930s saw Patton and others continue to perform and record solo and in small groups as the blues form, especially twelve-bar blues, started to become codified as with Johnny Temple and his cut-boogie “Lead Pencil Blues” in 1935. The Mississippi Sheiks became the most famous string band and contributed “Sittin’ on Top of the World” to the lexicon in 1930. Skip James, Carl Martin, Kokomo Arnold, Hambone Willie Newbern, Henry Townsend, Josh White, Bo Carter, Peetie Wheatstraw, Bukka White, and Big Joe Williams continued with and expanded on the country blues guitar tradition. Women such as Mattie Delaney, Geechie Wiley, and Elvie Thomas proved that they could play guitar in the same arena as the men. Son House worked with Patton and began his equally significant solo career with “My Black Mama” in 1930, as well as being the link to Robert Johnson and eventually Muddy Waters in the 1940s. Johnson, the “King of the Delta Blues,” had a short recording career (1936–1937) and life (1911–1938) but has come to be the most well-known and legendary prewar blues musician, in part due to the “cross-roads” myth that sprung up in the late 1960s. His “Sweet Home Chicago” and “Dust My Broom” are just two of his certifiable classics, but his music actually spelled the end of the ten-year span of acoustic country blues. In Chicago toward the end of the decade, Memphis Minnie, Big Bill Broonzy, and Tampa Red helped develop a form of urban combo blues out of which Minnie would rise to become a pioneer of the electric guitar.

Early 1940s

Robert Lockwood, Robert Johnson’s protégé, cut a handful of traditional acoustic country blues sides in 1941 including “Little Boy Blue” and “Take a Little Walk with Me” before going on to have a long career as a renown electric guitar sideman in the postwar years. Muddy Waters recorded a handful of titles for Alan Lomax and the Library of Congress in 1941–1942 before leaving the Delta for Chicago. Meanwhile, T-Bone Walker had been working out on the electric guitar, breaking through in 1942 with a powerful, swinging sound and style that would effectively end the era of the itinerant, “rambling” bluesman forever.

Development of the Electric Guitar

The concept of electrifying the guitar goes back at least to the 1920s. Walter Fuller, former head of design and production of electric instruments at Gibson, recalled finding pickups at the factory in Kalamazoo, Michigan, in 1933 that he believed had been made ten years earlier by Lloyd Loar. Around 1928 thirteen-year-old Les Paul took the needle from the family phonograph, jammed it into the wooden bridge of his acoustic guitar and connected it to a radio. It was a primitive solution, but it worked to a degree and led to his lifelong devotion to amplification and recording. Blues guitarist and pianist Henry Townsend claims a similar experiment around the same time. Note that in the mid-1920s the Dopyera brothers developed what would become the National Steel resonator guitar (a brass or steel-bodied acoustic instrument) as one answer to the problem of increasing the guitar’s volume. These unique instruments, particularly the Duolian model from the 1930s, would find favor in the hands of Delta bluesman like Son House and Bukka White.

In 1931 the Rickenbacher company made an aluminum-bodied Hawaiian guitar with an electromagnetic pickup nicknamed the “Frying Pan.” Rowe-DeArmond began manufacturing pickups in the early 1930s and the Dobro company produced a small run of amplified resonator instruments in 1932. It was not until 1936, however, that Gibson unveiled the first commercially successful electric guitar, the hollow body, arch top ES-150 (dubbed the “Charlie Christian model”) with matching EH-150 amplifier. T-Bone Walker would become a regular user of the upgraded ES-250 and other Gibson arch top electrics.

In the 1940s Les Paul, Leo Fender, and others were toying with the idea of a solid body guitar for the purpose of minimizing feedback, maximizing sustain, and expanding the tonal possibilities. Fender debuted the Broadcaster (Telecaster) as the first commercially successful solid body in 1947 and Gibson followed with the Les Paul in 1952. Along with Fender’s phenomenally popular Stratocaster (1954) and Gibson’s semi-hollow ES-335, 345, and 355 series (1958), much beloved by blues guitarists (including B. B. King with his “Lucille” model), these instruments would set the standard for sound and playability among blues artists down to the present day.

Postwar

Electric Guitar Pioneers

The story of postwar blues guitar is tied to the story of the electric guitar in America. Besides Les Paul, who had been obsessed with amplifying the guitar since the late 1920s, Eddie Durham, the trombonist, arranger, and guitarist, was seriously experimenting in the mid-1930s. While on the road with Count Basie in 1937 he met Floyd Smith, a ukulele and banjo player who was determined to play electric guitar. Following Durham's encouragement and help he would go on to record the first bluesy electric solo on "Floyd's Guitar Blues" with Andy Kirk in 1939 on an Epiphone Electric Hawaiian guitar. Concurrently, Charlie Christian in jazz and T-Bone Walker in blues were also woodshedding, but on six-string "Spanish" guitars with pickups. Walker's electric guitar debut in 1942 with "I Got a Break, Baby" backed with "Mean Old World" is considered the dawn of postwar electric blues with its sophisticated jazzy chord forms and fluid, horn-like solos. (Note: A tantalizing but unsubstantiated legend holds that Robert Johnson was seen in a Mississippi juke joint just before his death in 1938 playing electric guitar in front of a combo, his name painted on the bass drum.)

1940s

Aaron Thibeault "T-Bone" Walker, the "Father of Electric Blues," spawned generations of guitarists and his immense influence continues to the present day. Immediate and direct descendants were Johnny Moore (brother of jazz guitarist Oscar) with singer/pianist Charles Brown, Carl Hogan with jive talking, alto sax shuffle king Louis Jordan, and, most importantly, Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown. Moore was jazzier than Walker while Hogan, along with Roosevelt "Ham" Jackson and later Bill Jennings, adapted Walker's licks to the jump-blues style that was developing. Brown, by comparison, boogied hard and distorted his guitar in a manner that predated 1950s blues and rock 'n' roll.

In Chicago, Memphis Minnie and Jimmy Rogers started electrifying a style of urban blues with vestiges of country roots that Big Bill Broonzy and Tampa Red had been creating since the late 1930s. Minnie was not only a pioneering woman electric blues guitarist along with Sister Rosetta Tharpe (who played gospel and blues), but was the first to wear a strap and stand up and play. Tampa Red (Hudson Whittaker) was a master slide guitarist along with Robert Nighthawk (McCullum, McCoy), "Homesick James" Williamson, and later, his cousin, Elmore James. Muddy Waters arrived in Chicago in 1943, met Jimmy Rogers two years later, and switched to electric guitar, resulting in the epochal "Can't Be Satisfied" backed with "Feel Like Going Home" in 1948. The primal, amplified Delta blues laid the foundation for classic, postwar Chicago blues, taking them in the opposite direction of Walker and his followers. At the same time John Lee Hooker in Detroit was also parlaying his Delta roots into a unique style of overamped country boogie blues with "Boogie Chillen'."

1950s

Muddy Waters would reach his pinnacle in the 1950s with guitarists Jimmy Rogers, Pat Hare, and Luther Tucker supporting his keening slide. In 1951 Elmore James cut an electric slide version of Robert Johnson's "Dust My Broom," continuing a bottleneck trend that would hold sway for the next several years in Chicago. In Memphis, Chester "Howlin' Wolf" Burnett was waxing raw country blues with Willie Johnson playing swinging blues licks with grinding distortion. Riley B. "B. B." King had released his first recordings in 1949 in Memphis, but it was with "Three O'Clock Blues" in 1953 that the torch was passed from T-Bone. King introduced a sophisticated style of soloing based on fluid string bending and shimmering vibrato that would influence virtually every electric blues guitarist that followed. Almost overnight the spotlight shifted in Chicago from harmonica players to guitarists via Jody Williams's example and in tandem with Hubert Sumlin in Howlin' Wolf's band, ending up shining on the stinging West Side sound exemplified by Otis Rush, Sam "Magic Sam" Maghett, and George "Buddy" Guy. Little Milton Campbell in Memphis, Albert King in St. Louis, Freddie King in Chicago, Albert Collins in Texas, and Lafayette "Thing" Thomas and Jimmy Nolen on the West Coast also began their careers in the 1950s.

1960s

Freddie King and Albert King became major blues stars in the 1960s while B. B. King crossed over to the white audience late in the decade. Buddy Guy joined forces with harmonica ace Junior Wells and their

GUITAR

Hoodoo Man Blues in 1965 is cited as the first album to cross over to the white college audience. At the same time a “blues revival” was taking place that “rediscovered” and brought Mississippi John Hurt, Nehemiah “Skip” James, and Eddie “Son” House to festivals and coffeehouses. In conjunction with the pop music “British Invasion” led by the Beatles, Rolling Stones, and Yardbirds and with a counterculture rock movement sweeping the United States and Europe, white blues bands sprang up. In Chicago, the Paul Butterfield Band, a biracial unit, featured guitarists Mike Bloomfield and Elvin Bishop, while in New York the Blues Project had Danny Kalb. Johnny Winter from Texas signed a huge contract with Columbia Records. In the United Kingdom, John Mayall and his Bluesbreakers presented Eric Clapton, Peter Green, and Mick Taylor in a turn-about where English musicians, including Brian Jones and Keith Richards of the Stones, sent their skillful interpretation of classic black blues back to a white America that was largely ignorant of its existence.

1970s

The blues revival peaked and crested in the 1970s even as independent blues labels like Alligator in Chicago were recording important new talent like Theodore “Hound Dog” Taylor and Frank “Son” Seals. In the latter part of the decade Muddy Waters made a series of records with the help of Johnny Winter and “Steady Rollin” Bob Margolin that breathed fresh life into his classics and also contained new material. Similarly, Freddie King recorded and toured with Eric Clapton and his playing took on a decidedly rock edge as he was exposed to a broader audience. Roomful of Blues retrofitted the horn band sound of T-Bone Walker and jump-blues, making it exciting again with founder Duke Robillard and then Ronnie Earl pulling the strings. In Chicago, Magic Slim, Jimmy Johnson, Lonnie Brooks, and Carey Bell’s son Lurrie appeared on the Living Chicago Blues series.

1980s

A new blues revival was initiated in the 1980s by Stevie Ray Vaughan and Robert Cray with “Texas Flood” (1983) and “Strong Persuader” (1986), respectively. Vaughan’s virtuosic example inspired and continues to inspire legions of followers. Donald Kinsey, Lil’ Ed Williams, Carl Weathersby, Melvin Taylor, Maurice John Vaughan (no relation to Stevie Ray), and Kenny

Neal carried the banner for modern Chicago blues, and the Fabulous Thunderbirds, with Stevie Ray’s brother Jimmie, crossed over to rock radio with “Tuff Enuff.”

1990s

Women and exceedingly young guitarists were a blues phenomenon in the 1990s (see later section titled “Guitar Styles Since 1990”). Bernard Allison (Luther’s son), Chris Duarte, and Kenny Wayne Shepherd, among many others, carried on Stevie Ray Vaughan’s legacy while Jimmy Thackery, formerly of Washington, D.C.’s Nighthawks, and Tinsley Ellis, late of the Georgia Heartfixers, advanced their own style of high-powered blues guitar. Little Jimmie King (Manuel Gale) advanced the style of his former boss, Albert King. Fat Possum Records in Mississippi began chronicling the idiosyncratic, modal, juke-joint blues of David “Junior” Kimbrough and “R. L.” Burnside, while the contemporary dance blues of James “Super Chikan” Johnson and Roosevelt “Booba” Barnes belied an African American audience with funky tastes outside the mainstream. Buddy Guy, after a decade of neglect, signed with Silvertone Records and shot to the superstardom always predicted for him. Luther Allison followed on his heels only to be thwarted by an early death. In contrast, acoustic country blues artists Keb’ Mo’, Alvin Youngblood Hart, Corey Harris, Paul Geremia, Rory Block, and others showed the enduring viability of the genre following the startling sales of the Robert Johnson box set in 1990.

1960s Folk Music Rediscovery

The ascendancy in the late 1950s of rock ’n’ roll driven by electric guitars unwittingly led to the rediscovery and development of acoustic folk music in the 1960s. In 1959 the payola scandals helped foster alienation among some young people as a result of the commercialization of popular music. The same year the Newport Folk Festival had its debut with a lineup that boasted a rare mixture of white and black musicians. Idealistic college kids felt an empathy with the “purity” of the music and the “downtrodden” underclass represented by blues musicians.

From 1960 through to the latter part of the decade blues legends John Lee Hooker, Muddy Waters (solo and with his band), Mississippi John Hurt, Skip James, Son House, Bukka White, Mississippi Fred McDowell, Robert Pete Williams, Reverend Gary Davis, Lightnin' Hopkins, and Mance Lipscomb thrilled and amazed Newport audiences. Hurt, James, and most significantly House had been "rediscovered" by white blues fans that sought them out in the Deep South (or Rochester, New York, in the case of House) and helped them enjoy new, productive careers near the end of their lives. James, in particular, benefitted from the attention as Cream recorded his "I'm So Glad" in 1966 on their first album and the six thousand dollars in royalties paid for his later medical bills and funeral expenses.

The steel string flat-top acoustic guitar was the instrument of choice among the various performers and its pervasive presence created a boom. Gibson and Martin, the major acoustic guitar manufacturers, could not turn out "boxes" fast enough, with the smaller companies like Harmony also taking advantage of the situation. White acoustic blues cats, including John Hammond, Jr., John Fahey, Dave Van Ronk, and Stefan Grossman, performed in coffee houses and have taught country blues in workshops at folk festivals, thereby perpetuating a tradition that has ebbed and flowed but continues to the present time.

Rock Adaptations of Blues Guitar Techniques

Rock guitarists have drunk deeply from the blues well from the very beginning, along with hearty sips from country music and swing jazz. Pop music scholars like to debate which was the first rock 'n' roll record, with some pointing all the way back to Lionel Hampton's 1942 version of "Flying Home" starring Illinois Jacquet honking on the tenor sax. A good argument could also be made for Jimmy Preston's "Rock the Joint" (later covered by Bill Haley) by Chris Powell and the Five Blue Flames from 1949, a frenetic jump blues with guitarist Eddie Lambert beating on the strings like the missing link between T-Bone Walker and Chuck Berry.

Ike Turner's "Rocket 88" from 1951 featuring Jackie Brenston with His Delta Cats, however, introduces a honking, distorted boogie guitar line played by Willie Kizart that is clearly the foundation of much rock that followed. First recorded by Johnnie Temple in 1935, guitar boogie bass figures would be popularized by Robert Johnson and prominently show up decades later in the music of Chuck Berry, Little Richard, Jerry Lee Lewis, the Rolling Stones, ZZ Top, and southern rockers like Lynyrd Skynyrd. The most significant stylistic contribution to rock from the blues is the adaptation of the blues scale as the heart of rock soloing. Part of the appeal is the fact that the seeming major/minor ambiguity of the blues scale lends itself to be played over virtually any diatonic chord progression, whether in a major or minor key. Fluid, improvised solos directly inspired by B. B., Albert, and Freddie King began to be heard in the blues and blues-rock solos of Lonnie Mack in 1963. Blues-based rock soloing took off like a rocket in the late 1960s with guitar heroes such as Jimi Hendrix, Eric Clapton, Jimmy Page, Peter Green, Mick Taylor, Ritchie Blackmore, and Leslie West revving the blues scale to limits only previously visited by blues legends Pat Hare and Lafayette "Thing" Thomas. As Muddy Waters's drummer Willie "Big Eyes" Smith says, "Rock 'n' roll ain't nothing but blues speeded up."

Slide or bottleneck guitar, one of the most striking instrumental characteristics of the blues, has been slow to be incorporated by rock guitarists. Robbie Krieger of the Doors was one of the first in 1967 when he applied it to the psychedelic "End of the Night" as was Jeff Beck with "Beck's Bolero" in 1968. The Black Crowes in the 1990s, with guitarist Rich Robinson, were one of the few contemporary arena rock bands to employ the siren wail of electric slide guitar, while Jack White of the White Stripes is taking it into the new millennium.

Soul Guitar

Soul guitar is a direct outgrowth of blues and R&B guitar. It has its own set of distinct characteristics highlighted by chunky and arpeggiated rhythm guitar rather than single note, blues-style solos. "I Got a Woman" by Ray Charles from 1954 is often heralded as the dawning of soul music, with guitarist Wesley Jackson firmly embedded in the rhythm section. Sam Cooke's "I'll Come Running Back to You" and "You Send Me" from 1957, however, present soul pioneer Clif White's understated diatonic fills and smooth rhythm guitar. Starting around 1960 Curtis Mayfield with the Impressions and Ike Turner with Tina played funky, intertwining syncopated riffs and chords that would have a major influence on Jimi Hendrix. Steve Cropper behind Otis Redding on Stax Records in the 1960s and Cornel Dupree on Atlantic Records with King Curtis and others in the 1960s and 1970s are universally considered the premier soul guitar men. The "Funk Brothers" guitarists Robert White Joe Messina and Eddie Willis comped along on countless Motown hits in the 1960s, while Robert Ward continues to develop his unique style that began with his band the Ohio Untouchables backing the Falcons and Wilson Pickett on the classic "I Found a Love" in 1962.

Guitar Styles Since 1990

There have been four major developments in blues guitar since 1990. Number one is the continued emphasis on technical virtuosity that began with the debut of Stevie Ray Vaughan in 1983. Building on the influences of Albert King, Buddy Guy, Lonnie Mack, and Jimi Hendrix, Vaughan created a powerful style that showed great depth of feeling along with fretboard pyrotechnics. Following in his cowboy bootsteps in varying degrees have been Jimmy Thackery, Tinsley Ellis, Chris Duarte, Kenny Wayne Shepherd, Walter Trout, Smokin' Joe Kubek, and Michael Burks, among countless others.

The emergence of startlingly young blues guitarists like Jonny Lang, Nathan Cavaleri, Shannon Curfman, Jake Andrews, and Derek Trucks was an unprecedented phenomenon in the 1990s. Pubescent adolescents Lang and Curfman displayed mature-sounding blues voices well beyond their years in addition to considerable blues chops and authentic feel. Interestingly, many of the youngsters learned from their parents' record collections, which included classic rock like Led Zeppelin as well as blues. However, Andrews is the son of John Andrews, former guitarist with Tracy Nelson and Mother Earth in the 1960s, and Trucks is the nephew of Allman Brothers drummer Butch Trucks. It will prove instructive to see if this new wave of blues guitarists continues to grow musically in a genre known for careers that usually develop slowly over time and with seasoning.

Women with electric guitars strapped on stepped out front to play the blues to a greater degree in the last decade of the twentieth century than ever before. Debbie Davies, Deborah Coleman, Joanna Connor, Sue Foley, Susan Tedeschi, and Kris Wiley are proving with every hot lick that gender does not have to be a defining issue any more than race in the previously male-dominated world of blues guitar. Concurrently, a parallel situation has occurred in pop music, signaling increased opportunities for women across the (fret)board.

The last recent significant trend in blues guitar styles has been the ascendance of the North Mississippi hill country sound as promoted by Fat Possum Records in Oxford, Mississippi. Beginning with the late Junior Kimbrough, the list includes R. L. Burnside, Kenny Brown, Robert Belfour, T-Model Ford, and Little Axe. Kimbrough and Burnside in particular represent a style of country blues often based around a hypnotic one-chord vamp that is far removed from the majority of B. B. King/Stevie Ray Vaughan imitators on the current scene.

DAVE RUBIN

Bibliography

- Bacon, Tony, et al. Electric Guitars: The Illustrated Encyclopedia. Thunder Bay Press, 2000.
- Brozman, Bob. The History and Artistry of National Resonator Instruments. Fullerton, CA: Centerstream Publications, 1993.
- Dupree, Cornell. Rhythm and Blues Guitar. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 2000.
- Epstein, Dena. Sinful Tunes and Spirituals. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.
- Handy, W. C. Father of the Blues. New York: Macmillan, 1941.
- Hunter, Dave, et al. Acoustic Guitars: The Illustrated Encyclopedia. Thunder Bay Press, 2003.
- Hurston, Zora Neale. Folklore, Memoirs, and Other Writings (Mules and Men, Tell My Horse, Dust Tracks on a Road, Selected Articles). The Library of America, Vol. 75. New York: Library of America, 1995.
- Obrecht, Jas. Blues Guitar: The Men Who Made the Music. San Francisco: BackBeat, 1990; second edition, 1993.
- Rubin, Dave. The Best of Soul Guitar. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 2003.
- . Inside the Blues. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 1995.
- . 12-Bar Blues. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 1999.

GUITAR CRUSHER

b. Sidney Selby, 28 July 1931; Hyde County, NC

Aka "Bone Crusher." Born in rural North Carolina, Sidney Selby was brought up by his grandparents in a deeply religious home environment. A fascination with the blues set in early, but as his grandparents forbade the playing of such earthy music in the house, he was compelled to indulge his more secular musical tastes outside in the woods. He was also a passionate and talented gospel singer, however, and when he left home for New York at the age of fifteen, it was to begin a musical career that would make room for both gospel music and the blues.

Once in New York, he formed a group called the Gospel Wings and, later, a blues/soul combo called the Midnight Rockers (later renamed the Houserocking Melotones). Both were successful; by the 1960s, the Midnight Rockers were playing regularly in the New York and New Jersey areas, and were featured in showcases alongside such eminent names as the Drifters and the Isley Brothers. Things slowed down for Selby's blues group in the 1970s, however, as disco displaced blues and soul music on the radio charts. In 1982 he moved to Germany, where he found an enthusiastic audience for both the blues and gospel music; there he acquired yet another new nickname ("The Big Voice from New York") and formed a new gospel group called the Gospel Roots, with which he still performs. He has recorded several blues albums in Germany as well, and performs regularly in that capacity.

RICK ANDERSON

Bibliography

Burke, Tony, and Norman Darwen. "Doin' Good by Myself." Blues & Rhythm no. 107 (March 1996): 18–20.

Discography: LSFP

Googa Mooga (1995, Blue Sting 33).

GUITAR GABRIEL

b. Robert Lewis Jones, 16 October 1925 (?); Decatur, GA (?)

d. 2 April 1996; Winston-Salem, NC

There is much confusion about the background of Guitar Gabriel. According to his death certificate, Robert Lewis Jones was born to Robert Lewis and Matilda Jones. Some sources cite his father as the recording artist Sonny Jones; others as the North Carolina entertainer known as "Razorblade." A 1973 Social Security application lists his father as Robert Sanders Jones and his mother as Gertrude Hillhouse. The same document gives his birth dates as October 3, 1934, and his birthplace as Tuskegee, Alabama.

Regardless of Guitar Gabriel's statistics, he expressed an early interest in music. The family moved to Durham, North Carolina, when Robert was young. Influenced by the music of Blind Boy Fuller, Sonny Terry, and Reverend Gary Davis, Jones went on to travel throughout the United States in pursuit of musical fame.

By the 1970s, he had a regional hit in the Detroit area with the 45-rpm recording "Welfare Blues" on the Gemini label. The label renamed him "Nyles Jones." The album that followed, My South, My Blues, would lead to a bitter dispute over royalties and Jones's retirement from show business.

Jones moved to Winston-Salem where he sometimes played on the streets with Macavine Hayes until he met Timothy Duffy in the early 1990s and became the inspiration for Music Maker Relief Foundation. As "Guitar Gabriel," he went on to have a successful career, partly due to the efforts of Duffy. "Gabe," as he was known to friends, is buried in Evergreen Cemetery in Winston-Salem, North Carolina.

GAILE WELKER

Bibliography

Nelson, David. "You Got to Feel It to Do It—Guitar Gabriel." Living Blues no. 103 (May/June 1992): 24–39.

Discography

A Living Past (Music Maker MMCD 9401).
Blues Came to Georgia (Music Maker MMCD 23).
Came So Far (Music Maker MMCD 1294).
Deep in the South (Cello/Music Maker CD 91001-2).
Expressin' the Blues (Cello/Music Maker MMKCD 701).
Guitar Gabriel, Volume II (Music Maker MMCD 0494).
My South My Blues (Gemini S7101).

GUITAR JR.

b. Luther Johnson, 11 April 1939; Itta Bena, MS

Not to be confused with Luther "Georgia Boy" Johnson, Luther "Houserocker" Johnson, or Lonnie "Guitar Jr." Brooks, this long-time electric blues guitarist and bandleader is a dedicated proponent of the West Side style of postwar Chicago blues. First performing in gospel groups in Mississippi as a teenager, Johnson moved to Chicago with his family in 1955, where he soon began playing in bands fronted by Tall Milton Shelton and Big Mama Thornton. By the mid-1960s, Johnson was working in the band of his mentor, Magic Sam, whose stylistic approach to the electric guitar had a lasting impact on the young Johnson. In 1972, the Muddy Waters Band recruited Johnson, who in the meantime had acquired the nickname "Guitar Jr." and a growing notoriety in Chicago as an outstanding guitarist. During his eight years with Waters, Johnson released his first album, Luther's Blues, in 1976 on the French Black and Blue label, backed by members of the Muddy Waters Band, who at the time included guitarist Bob Margolin and pianist Pinetop Perkins. Subsequent recordings followed on the Alligator, Rooster Blues, Bullseye Blues, and Telarc labels. Moving to Boston in 1982, Johnson formed his band, the Magic Rockers, with whom he continues to record and tour. While his guitar playing remains true to his West Side roots, Johnson has more recently introduced other musical styles to his music, including country blues, jump-blues, and New Orleans funk.

DAVID BEAUDOUIN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Santelli
 Hunter, B. R. "Luther 'Guitar Jr.' Johnson." In The Rolling Stone Jazz and Blues Album Guide, 3rd ed., edited by John Swenson, p. 374. New York: Random House, 1999.

GUITAR JR.

Discography: AMG

Luther's Blues (1976; Evidence CD ECD-26010).
I Want to Groove with You (1990, Bullseye Blues CD-BB-9506).
Slammin' on the West Side (1996, Telarc CD 83389).

GUITAR KELLEY

b. Arthur Kelley, 14 November 1924; Clinton, LA

Acoustic "swamp" blues guitarist. Began playing guitar at rent parties and picnics in the late 1940s. During the next two decades he often performed with Lightnin' Slim and Silas Hogan. Selections of his music were released by the Arhoolie and Excello labels. Activity since 1974 is unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Santelli

Discography: LSFP

GUITAR NUBBITT

b. Alvin Hankerson, 22 or 23 November 1923; Fort Lauderdale, FL
d. 30 June 1995; Boston, MA

Grew up in Georgia, but moved to Boston in 1945. Began playing guitar in the 1950s. He enjoyed some local Boston fame during the 1960s folk music revival. Nickname "Nubbitt" refers to the loss of his right thumb tip in a hurricane at age three.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

GUITAR SHORTY

b. David William Kearney, 8 September 1939; Houston, TX

Singer, guitarist. Originally inspired by Guitar Slim's acrobatic stage act, Guitar Shorty's quest to "give them something to see as well as hear" led to a high-energy live show that was almost gymnastic in nature. He made his recording debut in 1957 on a Willie Dixon-produced session for Cobra Records but after a few more singles for Pull Records he fell into relative obscurity while living in Seattle and Los Angeles. His profile was raised in 1992 with the release of the W. C. Handy Award-winning My Way or the Highway album with Otis Grand. A series of Black Top Records albums, including Topsy Turvy with Clarence Hollimon and Carol Fran, and I Go Wild in 2001, followed.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl and Al Campbell); Larkin
Drwen, Norman. "He's One Hell of a Show." Blues & Rhythm no. 131 (August 1998): 8-9.
Tipaldi, Art. "Guitar Shorty: Jumpin' and Flippin'." Blues Revue no. 15 (Winter 1994/1995): 40-44.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

GUITAR SLIM

b. Eddie Lee Jones, 10 December 1926; Greenwood, MS
d. 7 February 1959; New York, NY

Arguably, one of the greatest blues performers ever was Eddie Jones, who performed under the name Guitar Slim. A dynamic guitar player, he coiled up to 350 feet of guitar cord on a reel behind him and he strolled through the audience, singing and playing to his enthralled fans. Sometimes, Guitar Slim would be carried on the shoulder of an assistant as he played. Several years later, Albert Collins, Houston's "Ice-man," would duplicate this practice at his concerts and his audiences would be similarly delighted.

At the age of five in Greenwood, Eddie's mother died (his father's whereabouts were unknown) and Eddie was sent to nearby Hollandale, Mississippi, to live with his grandmother. He made extra money in the cotton fields during those years and his dancing at local juke joints earned him the moniker "Limber Legs." He began playing with the Willie Warren band in the early 1940s. Besides his early mentor, Willie Warren, Eddie was influenced by T-Bone Walker, Robert Nighthawk, and Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown.

By the late 1940s, Eddie had relocated to New Orleans and perfected his persona. Besides the 350-foot cord, Eddie also dressed in wildly colored suits and dyed-to-match shoes. It was in New Orleans that Guitar Slim was born; the Guitar Slim sound, too, was different. Slim used heavily distorted overtones to give his audiences the “Guitar Slim” sound. This was about twenty years before Jimi Hendrix popularized a similar technique.

Jones biggest hit was “The Things That I Used to Do,” which sold more than a million copies and tracked R&B charts for twenty-one weeks, six of them at number one. Ray Charles was pianist at that session.

Jones died of pneumonia in New York City on February 7, 1959, his health weakened by years of alcohol abuse.

TOM FISHER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli Hannusch, Jeff. “Eddie ‘Guitar Slim’ Jones, 1926–1959.” Guitar Player 18, no. 3 (March 1984): 54, 57–58, 60–62, 126.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

The Things That I Used to Do (1970, Specialty Records SPS-2170).

Sufferin’ Mind (1991, Specialty Records SPCD-7007-2).

Atco Sessions (1996, Atco ATL0081760).

GUITAR SLIM JR.

b. Rodney Armstrong, 24 August 1952; New Orleans, LA

Guitar, vocals, composer. Guitar Slim Jr. continues the legacy of his father, Eddie “Guitar Slim” Jones, with his raw, soulful guitar, rough vocal attack, and expressive compositions, although his erratic personal life has hindered the development of his career.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O’Neal)

Discography

Story of My Life (1988, Orleans Records).

The Orleans Records Story (1999, Orleans Records).

Nothing Nice (Warehouse Records).

GUNTER, ARTHUR NEAL

b. 23 May 1926; Nashville, TN

d. 16 March 1976; Port Huron, MI

Guitar, vocals, composer. Arthur Gunter put Nashville’s Excello Records on the national map in the early 1950s with “Baby, Let’s Play House” but failed to sustain a professional career and made infrequent public appearances after moving to Michigan.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Kurutz)

Discography: LSFP; AMG

Anthologies

Baby Let’s Play House: The Best of Arthur Gunter (1995, AVI-Excello).

The Excello Story (1999, Rhino).

Black and Blues (Excello).

Blues After Hours (Blue Horizon).

Motor City Blues “Live” at the 1973 Ann Arbor Blues & Jazz Festival (Alive/Total Energy).

GURALNICK, PETER

b. 15 December 1943

Renowned writer on American roots music. A native of Brookline, Massachusetts, Guralnick began writing about music—blues, country, and soul—in the mid-1960s for alternative publications, including Boston After Dark, Boston Phoenix, Crawdaddy, and Rolling Stone. He developed a clean, direct style in which his presence was minimal, and created intimate, complex stories about artists who were often past their commercial, if not artistic, prime.

Guralnick’s first book, Feel Like Going Home: Portraits in Blues and Rock ‘n’roll (New York: Outerbridge and Dienstfrey, 1971), collected some of his earliest writings, including profiles of Muddy Waters, Howlin’ Wolf, Robert Pete Williams, Johnny Shines, and Skip James, as well as an essay on blues history and a portrait of Chess Records’ last days as a family-owned label. Guralnick, who received a B.A. in classics and an M.A. in creative writing from Boston University, taught school through the mid-1970s, when he made a full-time commitment to writing.

His second book, Lost Highway: Journeys and Arrivals of American Musicians (Boston: David R. Godine, 1979), demonstrated a refinement of his storytelling skills. Although much of the book’s focus is on country and rockabilly artists, there are profiles of Rufus Thomas, Bobby “Blue” Bland, Howlin’ Wolf, Otis Spann, and Big Joe Turner, as well as a revealing analysis of the Chicago blues scene in 1977. Sweet Soul Music: Rhythm and Blues and the Southern

Dream of Freedom (New York: Harper and Row, 1986), the final volume in his trilogy of roots music books, examined “southern soul,” a style defined more through its emotive qualities than geography. Compared with Guralnick’s previous books, Sweet Soul Music presented a more cohesive narrative, interweaving stories about musicians and recording studios, including Stax, Fame, and Muscle Shoals.

Guralnick ventured into fiction with Nighthawk Blues (New York: Seaview Books, 1980), which explored the tensions between a veteran blues performer and his young white manager during the 1960s blues revival. In 1982 Guralnick wrote the useful The Listener’s Guide to the Blues (no location: Facts on File) and also the same year he published the brief but lucid biographical study “Searching for Robert Johnson” (Living Blues no. 53 [Summer/Autumn 1982]: 27–41; reprinted in book form in 1989 [New York: Dutton]).

Guralnick spent most of the 1990s working on his triumphant two-part Elvis Presley biography; the first installment, Last Train to Memphis: The Rise of Elvis Presley (Boston: Little, Brown, 1994), is notable for its thorough review of the wide range of music that influenced Elvis as a young man.

Guralnick has served as a producer on recordings by artists including Charlie Rich, Johnny Shines, and Sleepy LaBeef, and written dozens of liner notes; he received a Grammy Award for his notes to Sam Cooke: Live at the Harlem Square Club (1986, RCA Victor/BMG).

Guralnick wrote the script for the film Sam Phillips: The Man Who Invented Rock ‘n’ Roll (2000), and worked closely with the 2003 film series The Blues, writing the script for Martin Scorsese’s film Feel Like Going Home and editing the accompanying book, Martin Scorsese Presents The Blues: A Musical Journey (New York: Amistad, 2003).

At the time of this writing, Guralnick has been working for several years on a biography of Sam Cooke.

SCOTT BARRETTA

GUTHRIE, WOODROW WILSON “WOODY”

b. 14 July 1912; Okemah, OK

d. 3 October 1967; Brooklyn, NY

A singer and prolific songwriter, Guthrie is most often associated with folk music, although his travels introduced him to a wide range of musical styles, including the blues, which he readily absorbed. In the wake of both the Great Depression and the Oklahoma dust storms of 1935, he traveled to Texas and subsequently joined other refugees in California. It was there, living among and playing to an audience consisting largely of impoverished migrants, that Guthrie would develop the artistic themes of dispossession and social protest that became his trademark, as some of his best-known compositions, including “Goin’ Down the Road Feelin’ Bad,” “Hard Travelin’,” and “I Ain’t Got No Home,” suggest.

In 1939 he traveled to New York, where he befriended and performed with other like-minded musicians, including Cisco Houston, Pete Seeger, Leadbelly, Sonny Terry, and Brownie McGhee. In 1940 Guthrie wrote his signature tune, “This Land Is Your Land,” and made landmark recordings both for Alan Lomax and the Library of Congress, and for Moses Asch, the founder of Folkways Records, as well as Dust Bowl Ballads for RCA Victor. After World War II Guthrie joined the Almanac Singers, who set the blueprint for a subsequent generation of folk groups. Guthrie then took a one-month appointment with the Bonneville Power Authority in Washington State, where he wrote nearly a song a day promoting federally controlled hydroelectric power. Returning to New York in 1946, he continued to write, record, and travel until, in the mid-1950s, he began to show the symptoms of Huntington’s chorea, the degenerative neurological disorder to which he succumbed at the age of fifty-five.

DEAN A. MASULLO

Bibliography

- Klein, Joe. Woody Guthrie: A Life. New York: Knopf, 1980.
Santelli, Robert, ed. Hard Travelin’: The Life and Legacy of Woody Guthrie. Hanover, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1999.

Discography

- Woody Guthrie: Columbia River Collection* (1987, Rounder CD 1036); Woody Guthrie: Library of Congress Recordings (1989, Rounder CD 1041-1043); Struggle (1990, Smithsonian Folkways CD SF 40025); Songs to Grow on for Mother and Child (1991, Smithsonian Folkways CD SF 45935); This Land Is Your Land: The Asch Recordings, Vol. 1 (1997, Smithsonian Folkways CD SFW 40100); Muleskinner Blues: The Asch Recordings, Vol. 2 (1997, Smithsonian Folkways CD 40101); Hard Travelin’: The Asch Recordings, Vol. 3 (1998, Smithsonian Folkways CD SF 40102); Buffalo Skimmers: The Asch Recordings, Vol. 4 (1999, Smithsonian Folkways CD SF40103); Dust Bowl Ballads (Rounder CD 1040); That’s Why We’re Marching: World War II and the American Folk Song Movement (Smithsonian Folkways CD SF 40001).

GUY, GEORGE “BUDDY”

b. 30 July 1936; Lettsworth, LA

Guitarist, singer, and songwriter. Buddy Guy was born July 30, 1936, in Lettsworth, Louisiana. As a teenager, he picked cotton on Louisiana farms and listened to the music of T-Bone Walker, B. B. King, and Lightnin’ Slim. In 1958, a year after recording some demos like “The Way You Been Treating Me” at a local radio station (WXOK in Baton Rouge), Buddy Guy went to Chicago to cut his first recordings for Cobra Records. His strong, flamboyant, self-taught style on electric guitar impressed many skilled guitarists like Otis Rush, Magic Sam, and Freddie King.

Buddy Guy soon went to Chess Records and from 1959 worked as a sideman for Chess artists such as Little Walter, Howlin’ Wolf, and Muddy Waters. Apart from that, he recorded in 1960 his classic song “First Time I Met the Blues,” with its composer, Eur-real “Little Brother” Montgomery, on piano. Buddy Guy already had a strong, intense, high voice, often overshadowed by his catchy guitar playing.

Buddy Guy was also part of an historical reunion that occurred at the Copa Cabana Club in Chicago on July 26, 1963, when a live recording was made with the finest Chicago bluesmen playing together: Muddy Waters, Howlin’ Wolf, Willie Dixon, Sonny Boy Williamson, and Otis Spann. Buddy Guy played guitar on all songs and sang lead on two titles: “Worried Blues” and “Don’t Know Which Way to Go.” He shared vocals with Muddy Waters and Willie Dixon for the opening tune, “Wee Wee Baby.” Although his guitar was sometimes a little out of tune, the musical performance and spirit of this concert were unmatched. That unique performance confirmed Buddy Guy’s status as a young musician, only twenty-seven years of age, who played with the living legends of the blues.

The 1960–1963 Chess period was a golden era for Guy. From 1965, Buddy Guy managed his own career and toured in the United States and Europe, adding saxes to his sound and making his guitar solos as intense and as complex as possible. The influence of B. B. King became more visible during that period.

In 1963, Buddy Guy met harmonica player Junior Wells in the Muddy Waters Blues Band. During the 1970s, Buddy Guy often toured with Wells; they recorded an album with Eric Clapton for Atco Records, titled Buddy Guy and Junior Wells Play the Blues (1972). On some occasions, Buddy Guy and Junior Wells opened for the Rolling Stones. Guy and Wells specialized in long, slow blues. But their records from the 1970s, recorded for labels such as

Buddy Guy performing at the Pocono Blues Festival, Lake Harmony, Pennsylvania, August 2003. (Photo by Gene Tomko)

Vanguard, Atco, Red Lightnin’, and Quicksilver, were often badly distributed and did not sell well.

Buddy Guy’s younger brother, Phil Guy (born April 28, 1940, in Lettsworth, Louisiana), is a lesser-known guitar player and singer. They have often recorded and performed together since 1969.

During the late 1980s, Guy’s reputation grew, and he became a guitar icon for many rock fans as well as performers. Noteworthy rock guitarists such as Jimi Hendrix, Eric Clapton, Stevie Ray Vaughan, and Mark Knopfler have considered Buddy Guy as a model. In 1985, Buddy Guy was inducted into the Blues Foundation’s Hall of Fame, and he has received many W. C. Handy Awards.

The 1990s saw numerous album releases from Buddy Guy, starting in 1991 with Damn Right, I’ve Got the Blues. In 1992, Rhino Records issued a compilation of his recordings from 1957 to 1981, titled The Very Best of Buddy Guy. However, his CD Feels Like Rain (1993) was received as a venture into rock music rather than a blues album, and did not sell well. Slippin' In (1994) marked a return into blues, with covers from Jimmy Reed to Lowell Fulson. But his most original album was Sweet Tea (2001), which included some electric and some acoustic country blues songs. This acoustic trend is confirmed with a CD released two years later, Blues Singer (2003), that owes much to Skip James, Son House, and the early John Lee Hooker.

GUY, GEORGE "BUDDY"

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
"Buddy Guy." LivinBlues website, <http://www.livinblues.com/bluesrooms/buddyguy.asp>.
Robble, Andrew M. "Buddy Guy: 'You Got to Play That Thing Like You Was Flyin' a Plane.'" Living Blues no. 112 (November/December 1993): 8–21.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Wells, Junior

GUY, PHIL

b. 28 April 1940; Lettsworth, LA

Phil Guy honed his guitar skills in Baton Rouge, playing with Big Poppa John Tilley and Raful Neal. In 1957 he and his brother, Buddy Guy, cut a demo at WXOK in Baton Rouge, the first recording for either of them. Phil Guy also recorded with Raful Neal before leaving his job as a runner with a law firm in Baton Rouge to move to Chicago and accompany Buddy on an influential State Department–sponsored tour of Africa in 1969. For several years afterward Guy played, recorded, and toured with his brother.

In the 1970s he started his own band, the Chicago Machine, and has been a dependable presence on the Chicago scene, employing such sidemen as Maurice John Vaughn and "Professor" Eddie Lusk. He has also worked with Koko Taylor, Son Seals, and others. Guy's notable domestic recording credits include appearances on five of Buddy's albums and Junior Wells's On Tap for Delmark. He has also recorded with Mojo Buford, Lurrie Bell, Jimmy Dawkins, Byther Smith, Big Mama Thornton, Son Seals, and Junior Mance. While his success at home has been comparatively modest, he has toured extensively in Europe and South America and has recorded as a bandleader for Wolf in Austria, Isabel in France, and JSP in England, which issued five Guy CDs, including the powerful, horn-driven Say What You Mean (2000).

Phil Guy's style is rooted in the heavily amplified, four-minute-plus, funky soul of his Louisiana peers, as opposed to the edgy, West Side Chicago sound with its staccato guitar bursts that is associated with Buddy. He has been seen by many as one of Chicago's overlooked guitar players, and has graciously endured the undeserved burden of being compared to his brother.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Darwen, Norman. "Phil Guy: Down in Louisiana." Blues & Rhythm no. 33 (December 1987): 4–7.
———. "Phil Guy: Up in Chicago." Blues & Rhythm no. 44 (May 1989): 22–24.

Discography: AMG

Say What You Mean (2000, JSP CD-2135).

GUY, VERNON

b. 21 March 1945; St. Louis, MO

Singer whose early career was with Ike Turner in 1963, making "You've Got Me" backed with "They Ain't Lovin' Ya" (sic) (Teena 1703) with the Turner band.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography and Discography

- "Stacey Johnson/Vernon Guy." Soul Bag no. 58 (October 1976): 18.

H

HADDIX, TRAVIS

b. 26 November 1938; Walnut, MS

Travis Haddix is a singer-guitarist who performs in a style that straddles Chicago electric blues and Memphis soul. He recorded a series of well-received albums from the late 1980s through the mid-1990s and has remained active as a performer since.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O'Neal and Al Campbell)

Discography: AMG (Jim O'Neal and Al Campbell)

Winners Never Quit (1991, Ichiban 1101).
I Got a Sure Thing (1993, Ichiban 1157).

HAIRSTON, "BROTHER" WILL

b. 22 November 1919; Brookfield, MS
d. 17 March 1988; Detroit, MI

Nicknamed "The Hurricane of the Motor City," Brother Will Hairston was a remarkable gospel singer because of the consistently topical and political nature of his songs. In the period from 1955 to 1972 he recorded gospel songs about Emmett Till, the Alabama bus boycott, President Kennedy, Little Rock Central High, the march to Montgomery, the war in Vietnam, and Martin Luther King at a time when most recording artists did not dare to speak out on these issues.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

Paulus, George. "Will Hairston: Hurricane of the Motor City." Blues Unlimited no. 86 (November 1971): 21.

HALL, RENÉ (JOSEPH)

b. 26 September 1911; St. Louis, MO
d. 11 February 1988; Los Angeles, CA

Guitarist, banjoist, trombonist, arranger. He became a session musician in the 1940s, recording R&B and vocal accompaniments for Jubilee and Domino, for which he was musical director, including "Irene's Blues"/"Put Your Money Where Your Mouth Is" (1950, Domino 305/308) by Max "Blues" Bailey. His 1952–1953 band featured singer/guitarist Courtland Carter.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Penny, Dave. Insert notes for Saxophony! Jubilee Honkers & Shouters (1995, Sequel NEMCD748, London).

Discography: LSFP

HALL, VERA

HALL, VERA

b. 1906; Livingston, AL

d. 29 January 1964; Tuscaloosa, AL

Hall was born and raised on small farm near Livingston, Alabama, where she learned songs from Rich Amerson and Blind Jesse Harris. Folklorist Ruby Pickens Tartt discovered her, which led to recordings by John and Alan Lomax and Harold Courlander. Alan Lomax made her the subject of a portion of his book The Rainbow Sign and included her "Another Man Done Gone" in his anthology Best Loved American Folksongs. Her "Wild Ox Moan" is considered the finest example of African American yodeling.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Lomax, Alan. The Rainbow Sign. New York: Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, 1959.

Owen, Laurella, and Pounds Brown. Virginia, Toting the Lead Row: Ruby Pickens Tartt, Alabama Folklorist. University: The University of Alabama Press, 1981.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

See also Amerson, Rich; Lomax, Alan; Lomax, John Avery

HAMILTON, LARRY

b. 21 March 1950; New Orleans, LA

Singer, songwriter based in New Orleans. Hamilton was a member of David Batiste and the Gladiators for more than ten years starting in 1965. An association with Allen Toussaint from the late 1970s eventually led to Hamilton's solo recording debut on Toussaint's NYNO label in 1997. Hamilton's compositions have been sung by Etta James, Irma Thomas, and Albert King, among others.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

HAMMOND, CLAY

b. 21 June 1936; Roseback, TX

Vocalist and songwriter best known as the composer of Little Johnny Taylor's number one R&B hit "Part Time Love." Hammond recorded for several labels in the 1960s, including Kent, Galaxy, and Duo Disc. He released singles for various labels after the 1960s and performed with the Drifters and Rivingtons on the oldies circuit.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger); Larkin

Discography: AMG

See also Drifters; Taylor, Johnny Lamar "Little"

HAMMOND, JOHN HENRY, JR.

b. 15 December 1910; New York City, NY

d. 10 July 1987; New York City, NY

Record producer, promoter, and critic. Hammond is regarded as perhaps the greatest talent scout in popular music history. His discoveries include many of the leading popular, jazz, and blues artists of his era, including Count Basie, Charlie Christian, Bob Dylan, Aretha Franklin, Benny Goodman, Billie Holiday, Lena Horne, Bruce Springsteen, and Sonny Terry. Through the promotion of these and many other artists, Hammond decisively influenced the course of American popular music over a forty-year period.

Hammond was from the top rung of American society, his mother Emily being a Vanderbilt heiress. After dropping out of Yale at age twenty-one, Hammond moved from the Upper East Side family mansion into a Greenwich Village apartment supported by a substantial private income. It was at around this time that he began to become actively involved in the promotion of black music, which had fascinated him since childhood.

The first blues recording he masterminded featured Bessie Smith (Okeh, 1933). This celebrated session was to be Smith's last, as further plans for Hammond to record her were thwarted by her death in 1937. He also produced an important recording session with another female icon of vaudeville blues, Ida Cox, in 1939.

Hammond was closely involved in bringing Count Basie to national prominence. He first encountered Basie's band by chance in Kansas City, and subsequently produced the first recording of Basie's orchestra (1936, Vocalion), featuring vocals by Jimmy Rushing. He produced further sessions with the band, and promoted it at every important opportunity. A highlight of Hammond's promotional endeavors was the 1938 "From Spirituals to Swing" concert in Carnegie Hall. This event brought to a mainstream audience for the first time a wide range of African American vernacular styles, not just jazz, but also blues and gospel. Blues/gospel artists taking part in the concert included Big Bill Broonzy, Sister Rosetta Tharpe, Jimmie Rushing, Mitchell's Gospel Singers, the harmonica player Sonny Terry, and a trio of boogie-woogie pianists: Meade Lux Lewis, Albert Ammons, and Pete Johnson. Such was the success of the concert that Hammond organized another in the same venue the following year.

Perhaps the most important consequence of these concerts was that they helped precipitate a nationwide fad for boogie-woogie that lasted well into the 1940s. Hammond had earlier been influential in the promotion of the style when it was almost unknown outside the race record market. In 1935, he had rediscovered Meade Lux Lewis who he recorded for English Parlophone, and he consistently championed the work of Ammons.

Hammond's promotional activities were determined by his political, as well as his musical, interests. He was a leading activist for leftist causes, and wrote regularly for left-wing periodicals such as The Nation and The New Masses (the latter had, in fact, underwritten the "From Spirituals to Swing" concert). A lifelong champion of racial equality, he was the first to promote racially mixed jazz bands on record and in performance. He joined the board of directors of the NAACP in 1935, and his association with that group lasted for three decades.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

- Fox, Ted. "John Hammond." In In the Groove: The People Behind the Music, pp. 1–24. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1986.
- Hammond, John, with Irving Townsend. John Hammond on Record: An Autobiography. New York, The Ridge Press, 1977.

Discography

The following are major blues-related recording sessions produced by Hammond.

Albert Ammons

- "Nagasaki"/"Boogie Woogie Stomp" (1936, Decca 749).
 "Early Morning Blues"/"Mil-or-Mo Bird Rag" (1936, Decca 975).

Count Basie/Jimmy Rushing

- "Boogie Woogie"/"Lady Be Good" (1936, Vocalion 3459).
 "Shoe Shine Boy" (1936, Vocalion 2441).
 "If I Could Be with You One Hour Tonight"/"Taxi War Dance" (1939, Vocalion 4748).
 "Jump for Me" (1939, Vocalion, 4886).
 "Rock-a-Bye Basie"/"Baby, Don't Tell on Me" (1939, Vocalion 4747).
 "What Goes Up Must Come Down"/"Don't Worry 'Bout Me" (Vocalion, 4734).

Ida Cox

- "Deep Sea Blues"/"Death Letter Blues" (1939, Vocalion 05336).
 "Four-Day Creep"/"Hard Times Blues" (1939, Vocalion, 05298).
 "Pink Slip Blues"/"Take Him Off My Mind" (1939, Vocalion 05258).

Meade Lux Lewis

- "Honky Tonk Train Blues" (1935, Parlophone R-2187).

Bessie Smith

- "Do Your Duty"/"I'm Down in the Dumps" (1933, Okeh 8945).
 "Gimme a Pigfoot"/"Take Me for a Buggy Ride" (1933, Okeh 8949).

HAMMOND, JOHN PAUL

b. 13 November 1942; New York City, NY

In the early 1960s, Hammond was a young cub in the folk-blues field. Now, in his fifth decade as full-time bluesman, he's a senior statesman. Live, he performs solo, doing upwards of two hundred gigs a year with acoustic guitar and racked harmonica. His nearly thirty albums to date present him in a variety of settings, including electric blues backed by such notables as Levon Helm, Robbie Robinson, Garth Hudson, Rick Danko, Bill Wyman, Mike Bloomfield, Duane Allman, Dr. John, Roosevelt Sykes, the Nighthawks, Little Charlie & the Nightcaps, Duke Robillard, Charlie Musselwhite, J. J. Cale, and Tom Waits. At Greenwich Village's Café Au-Go-Go in the mid-1960s he worked with a then-unknown Jimi Hendrix.

His father was legendary producer and Columbia A&R executive John Hammond. But his mother raised him after his parents divorced, and he asserts no conscious link between his illustrious father and his chosen path in music. As a teenager, he listened to Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, Chuck Berry, and Bo Diddley, then delved into country blues after hearing Blind Willie McTell and Robert Johnson. He taught himself guitar at age eighteen, began performing at nineteen, got a Vanguard recording contract at twenty, then hit the big time with a well-received set at the 1963 Newport Folk Festival. Besides Vanguard, Hammond has recorded for Atlantic, Columbia, Capricorn, Rounder, Flying Fish, Virgin/Pointblank, and Back Porch. Although an interpreter, not a songwriter, he composed the soundtrack to the 1970 film Little Big Man and narrated the 1991 documentary The Search for Robert Johnson.

HAMMOND, JOHN PAUL

Unfairly dismissed by some critics as a white musician trying to sound black, Hammond's legion of fans defend him against what might be termed "reverse racism," noting his lifelong commitment to blues and his mastery of the genre.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

- AMG (Richard Skelly); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Kofford, Bret. "John Hammond: Growing into the Blues." Blues Revue no. 57 (May 2000): 8–14.
Stambler, Irwin, and Lyndon Stambler. "John Hammond." In Folk & Blues: The Encyclopedia, 3rd ed., pp. 243–246. New York: St. Martin's, 2001.
Tipaldi, Art. "John Hammond." In Children of the Blues, pp. 173–179. San Francisco: Backbeat, 2002.

Discography: AMG

HAMPTON, LIONEL

b. 20 April 1908; Louisville, KY
d. 31 August 2002; New York City, NY

Vibraphonist, drummer, pianist, bandleader. Born in Louisville, but raised in Birmingham, Alabama. Hampton began playing drums in church, then with bands in Chicago and Los Angeles. He adopted vibes in 1930 and became the best-known practitioner of instrument in jazz, first with Benny Goodman and then as leader from 1937. "Hot Mallets" (1939) foreshadowed elements of bebop. His biggest hit was "Flying Home" in 1942, featuring saxophonist Illinois Jacquet. Hampton combined virtuosity with crowd-pleasing showmanship throughout his career, leading small and big bands that featured many illustrious sidemen, but added little new after the mid-1950s. Blues remained fundamental to his earthy, swinging music.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- Dance, Stanley. The World of Swing. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.
Hampton, Lionel, and James Haskins. Hamp: An Autobiography. New York: Warner Books, 1989.

Discography: Lord

Selected Recordings

- "Drum Stomp" (1937, RCA Victor 25658).
"Hot Mallets" (1939, RCA Victor 26371).
"Flying Home" (1942, Decca 18394).
"Hamp's Boogie Woogie" (1944, Decca 18613).
"Air Mail Special" (1946, Decca 18880).
Hamp and Getz (1955, Verve MV 2534).
Lionel Hampton's Jazz Giants (1955, Norgran 1080).
Newport Uproar (1967, RCA Victor LSP3891).

HANDY, WILLIAM CHRISTOPHER "W. C."

b. 16 November 1873; Florence, AL
d. 28 March 1958; New York City, NY

Songwriter, music publisher, folklorist, cornetist and trumpeter, known in his lifetime as the "Father of the Blues." Handy came from fairly comfortable circumstances by the standards of the time, and enjoyed a solid basic education. His father and grandfather were ministers in the African Methodist Episcopal church, and discouraged secular music. However, Handy was attracted to minstrel shows and brass band music, and set off to enter show business in his teens. He traveled to St. Louis in 1892 with a vocal quartet, intending to see the World's Fair, but it had been postponed for a year, and Handy was left stranded and destitute. However, while there, he collected a strand of black folklore, the text "My man's got a heart like a rock cast in the sea," that he would use twenty-two years later in his biggest hit, "St. Louis Blues."

Handy spent the 1890s polishing his musical skills, playing in brass bands in Kentucky and Indiana. In 1896 he joined Mahara's Minstrels as a cornet player and he worked his way up to bandmaster and arranger with this outfit in two stints, the first ending in 1900, the second in the 1902–1903 season. In between he taught at a black college in Alabama. In 1903 Handy became bandmaster of the black Knights of Pythias band in Clarksdale, Mississippi. This job lasted two years, and beginning in 1905 he was increasingly active in Memphis, the economic hub of the Mississippi Delta region. During these years he became fascinated with blues and other folk music and began arranging elements of these into publishable compositions. In 1909 Handy wrote "Mister Crump," a campaign song that helped elect Edward Crump mayor of Memphis. By this time Handy was an increasingly important Memphis bandleader in parks, roof gardens, and on riverboats. In 1912 he self-published his “The Memphis Blues,” partly based on “Mister Crump.” He sold the rights to the song for fifty dollars, a mistake he would regret for many years. In 1913, Handy founded Pace & Handy, a music publishing company with a shrewd young entrepreneur, Harry Pace, as the business end of the company. During the next few years Handy wrote and published most of his greatest songs: “St. Louis Blues,” “Yellow Dog Blues,” “Hesitating Blues,” “Joe Turner Blues,” “Beale Street Blues,” “Aunt Hagar’s Children Blues,” and many more. By the end of 1915 numerous vaudevillians, and such future blues greats as Bessie Smith and Clara Smith, were performing Handy’s songs in every black theater in the country.

W. C. Handy and Nat King Cole meet for the first time, New York City, 1952. (Photo by “Popsie” Randolph, © 1986 Frank Driggs Collection)

Handy made his first recordings in New York in 1917. By this time, he was already setting his sights on the north, and he relocated his firm to Tin Pan Alley in 1918. These were the glory years of Pace & Handy, with numerous recordings of their material bringing in a steady income and the firm burgeoning to include such future music leaders as composer William Grant Still and bandleader Fletcher Henderson on its staff.

At the beginning of 1921 Pace left the company to found Black Swan Records, taking the cream of the staff with him. Handy soon suffered severe business reverses in a wildly fluctuating economy, and he was also struck temporarily blind following unsuccessful oral surgery. For the next few years he struggled to keep his business going, now with a skeleton staff largely made up of family. By the late 1920s he was getting back on his feet. Although only partially sighted, he was enjoying a wealth of positive publicity, the early stages of the “Father of the Blues” legend. The services of an able attorney, music buff Abbe Niles, were crucial to Handy’s future success. Together they created a remarkable book, Blues: An Anthology, a landmark in establishing blues as a subject worthy of study. Recordings of Handy’s songs, particularly “St. Louis Blues,” were equally important. In 1928 Handy presided over a concert of black music at Carnegie Hall. The following year Bessie Smith made her only film, St. Louis Blues, and Handy was involved in production of the film.

In the last thirty years of his life Handy became increasingly famous both in America and abroad, as revered a figure as any African American. In 1933–1934 he participated in a nostalgic traveling show organized by Joe Laurie, and there were numerous swing and pop recordings of his songs. There were also heartaches. Elizabeth Price Handy, his first wife, died in 1937. In 1943, while in the New York City subway, Handy fell to the tracks, injuring his head. After this, he was totally blind until his death. There was also a growing undercurrent of doubt about his primacy as a blues creator. This began in 1938, when Down Beat magazine carried an attack by New Orleans jazz great Jelly Roll Morton, entitled "I Created Jazz in 1902, not W. C. Handy." While Morton's allegations were largely unproved, his great stature lent them automatic credence, and the damage to Handy's reputation has been lasting. Only in recent years has there been a renewed appreciation of Handy and his work.

Handy certainly did not create the blues, but his compositions, by his own admission partial arrangements of preexisting material, did more to bring them to public attention than the work of any other single musician. More than a dozen years before the advent of recordings of country bluesmen, Handy's publications, and recordings of them, created the first wave of interest in blues during the years around World War I. And, while some of his pieces, such as "The Memphis Blues," are essentially ragtime, others, such as "St. Louis Blues," contain the key elements, both tonal and literary, that would embody the generally accepted definition of blues in the 1920s.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

Bibliography

- AMG (John Bush); Herzhaft; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern Handy, W. C. Blues: An Anthology. New York: Boni and Boni, 1926.
 ———. Father of the Blues. New York: Macmillan, 1941.
 Hurwitt, Elliott S. "W. C. Handy as Music Publisher: Career and Reputation." Ph. D dissertation, Graduate Center of the City University of New York, 2000.

Discography: AMG; DGR; Lord

Selected Recordings

Handy's Orchestra of Memphis, September 1917 Columbia recordings: "Fuzzy Wuzzy Rag"; "Preparedness Blues" (rejected); "The Snaky Blues"; "Ole Miss Rag"; "That Jazz Dance"; "The Old Town Pump"; "Moonlight Blues"; "The Hooking Cow Blues"; "The Coburn Blues" (rejected); "A Bunch of Blues"; "Those Draftin' Blues" (rejected); "Sweet Child" (medley with "Make Me a Pallet on the Floor"); "Livery Stable Blues"; "The Storybook Ball" (rejected); "Sweet Cookie Mine" (rejected).

Handy's Memphis Blues Band, ca. September 1919 Lyra-tone recordings (all apparently rejected; no known copies): "Beale Street Blues"; "Joe Turner Blues"; "Hesitating Blues"; "Yellow Dog Blues."

Handy's Memphis Blues Band, January 1922 Paramount recordings: "St. Louis Blues"; "Yellow Dog Blues."

Handy's Memphis Blues Band, March 1922 Paramount recordings: "She's a Mean Job"; "Muscle Shoals Blues."

Handy's Orchestra, 1923 OKeh recordings: ca. January 5: "Aunt Hagar's Blues" and "Louisville Blues"; March: "Panama," "St. Louis Blues," "Down-Hearted Blues," and "Mama's Got the Blues"; April: "Sundown Blues" and "My Pillow and Me"; May: "Gulf Coast Blues" and "Farewell Blues"; ca. June 4: "The Memphis Blues" and "Florida Blues"; August: "Ole Miss Blues" and "Darktown Reveille."

Library of Congress recordings, Handy accompanied by own guitar, 1938: "I Walked All the Way From East St. Louis"; "Your Clothes Look Lonesome Hangin' on the Line"; "Got No More Home Than a Dog"; "Joe Turner"; "Careless Love"; "Getting Up Holler"; "Oh De Kate's Up de River, Stackerlee's In de Ben"; "Roll On, Buddy"; "Olius Brown"; "Sounding the Lead on the Ohio River."

W. C. Handy's Orchestra, 1939 Varsity recordings: "St. Louis Blues"; "Loveless Love"; "Beale Street Blues"; "Way Down South Where the Blues Began."

Handy made additional recordings, ranging from brief guest appearances to a set of archival recordings with family members and close associates, into the 1950s, and also appeared a number of times on television in the 1950s.

See also Black Swan Records; Hesitation Blues; Memphis Blues, The ("Mama Don' 'low" or "Mister Crump"); Smith, Clara; Smith, Bessie; St. Louis Blues

HANKERSON, ALVIN

(See Guitar Nubbitt)

HARE, AUBURN "PAT"

b. 20 December 1930; Cherry Valley, AR

d. 26 September 1980; St. Paul, MN

The son of Arkansas sharecroppers, Pat Hare started playing guitar at age ten, being taught early on by Joe Willie Wilkins. He was soon playing country fish fries in his uncle's band, and by 1948 was working with Howlin' Wolf in West Memphis. His dynamic playing caught the attention of Sam Phillips of Sun Records in 1952, and during the next two years he recorded behind numerous artists for the Memphis label, most notably Junior Parker, James Cotton, and Coy "Hot Shot" Love. Hare's overly amplified guitar and aggressive attack helped define the new urban blues that was developing in the city. In 1954, he recorded two Sun sides as a leader, including the prophetic "I'm Gonna Murder My Baby”—a violent theme that he would eventually act out.

Hare moved to Houston in 1954 and during the next three years recorded for Duke Records behind Parker and Bobby Bland. In 1957, he moved to Chicago and replaced Jimmy Rogers in Muddy Waters's band. He went on to record with Waters on many Chess sides and performed with him at the 1960 Newport Jazz Festival. By 1963, with his drinking and temperament becoming increasingly worse, Hare was fired by Waters and he moved to Minneapolis, Minnesota, to work with Mojo Buford. The following December, in an alcohol-fueled jealous rage, Hare murdered his girlfriend and a policeman. He was sentenced to life in prison where, as a model prisoner, he formed a jail-house band and occasionally played in public. Hare succumbed to lung cancer in 1980.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Santelli
Slaven, Neil, and Roger Dopson. Liner notes to Sun Records: The Blues Years 1950–1958 (1996, Charly Records CD Sun Box 7).

Discography: LSFP

HARLEM HAMFATS

The Harlem Hamfats group was formed in 1936 and signaled a new direction for the blues with the expansion of the repetitive groups of the 1930s into an explosive new sound including brass and reeds. The Hamfats really developed it into a vital, successful sound that led to similar groups like Tampa Red's Chicago Five and Big Bill (Broonzy's) Memphis Five.

The core of the band consisted of blues brothers Joe and Charlie McCoy who played and sang the rough vocals. But musicians who appeared regularly included trumpeter Herb Morand, pianist Horace Malcolm, and clarinetist Odell Rand among others and the unit was immensely tight and disciplined for a group formed simply for recordings.

The Hamfats played blues but with a strong jazz feel and overtones of Western swing, and accompanied vocalists including Rosetta Howard, Frankie Jaxon, and Johnny Temple as well as midnighting as Jimmie Gordon's Vip Vop Band. Its first record, "Oh Red," was a huge hit and the Hamfats recorded extensively until 1939 when their sound was too familiar to attract buyers. The McCoy's both died in 1950, but the Hamfats left an important recorded legacy that still delights today

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: DGR; Lord

HARMAN, JAMES

b. 8 June 1946; Anniston, AL

Raised in rural Alabama, Harman has been performing and touring since 1964, usually playing college fraternity parties and in local soul and blues venues. He moved to Southern California in 1970 and became settled in local blues activity, including performing behind guest artists Big Joe Turner and Johnny Guitar Watson. In 1977 he assembled his first James Harman Band lineup, which over the years has included Kid Ramos, Gene Taylor, Fred Kaplan, and Hollywood Fats. His self-sufficient approach to recording has worked best with small independent labels, his classic examples being the live recording Strictly Live in '85 (1990, Rivera) and the studio album Extra Napkins (1988, Rivera). A stylist in post-war harmonica grounded in Little Walter, Big Walter, and Sonny Boy Williamson II, he has worked mostly in good-time bar band material, although much of it is self-composed. Some songs share underlying concepts, such as those about touring life featured on his 1991 Black Top CD Do Not Disturb.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Larkin; Santelli
Tipald, Art. "James Harman." Blues Revue no. 36 (April 1998): 24.

Discography: AMG

HARMOGRAPH

Record label of the Harmograph Talking Machine Co., a subsidiary of the Shapleigh Hardware Co. of St. Louis. Introduced in 1921, it used Cameo masters, which included a Lucille Hegamin coupling, in 1922–1923 and thereafter drew from Paramount, including pseudonymous issues by Ida Cox, Alberta Hunter, and Ma Rainey. By mid-1924 masters were sourced from Pathé, including some vaudeville blues. Harmograph ceased trading in late 1925.

HOWARD RYE

HARMOGRAPH

Bibliography

Sutton

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

Whyatt, Bert. "Harmograph: A Numerical Listing." Storyville no. 56 (1974–1975), 50; no. 57 (1975), 97; no. 58 (1975), 135; no. 59 (1975), 175; no. 60 (1975), 208; no. 61 (1975), 16; no. 62 (1975–1976), 53.

———. "Harmograph Label: A Report." Storyville no. 92 (1980–1981): 54.

HARMONICA

Blues Harmonica History

The birth of the harmonica took place in Europe in the 1820s. Its design inspiration came from Asian mouth organs, such as the sheng, sho, or khen, which easily date back 3000 years or more. These are free-reed instruments, capable of producing one or more notes simultaneously while inhaling or exhaling, but only having a single common air hole and requiring the use of the fingers. The harmonica borrowed the free-reed principle and the ability to sound single or multiple notes while inhaling or exhaling, but added a separate air hole for each note, and arranged them linearly.

By 1830, harmonicas were being manufactured in at least six European towns and in America by musical instrument makers Zwahlen and Bazin; an instructional book was also published that same year by Bourne in New York. Harmonicas of that period had diverse tunings, but many were played by exhaling only and often lacked cover plates. They do not appear to have been marketed toward the poor or working classes.

The first significant event in blues harmonica history was when the ten-hole diatonic tuning system was invented by a Bohemian man named Richter, by no later than 1857. His tuning was only intended to allow for the playing of simple, major-key songs with very basic chord accompaniment, while inhaling and exhaling. By complete accident, Richter's tuning was also ideally suited for playing blues.

In 1878, mass-production machines used in the manufacturing of harmonicas were patented in Klingenthal, Germany, by Julius Berthold. By 1882, the M. Hohner Company was using these new machines, and by 1887, was producing well over one million harmonicas yearly, exclusively for the American market. With the combined production of the M. Hohner Company and numerous other European manufacturers, harmonicas became more plentiful and less expensive. The dawn of mass production launched their popularity throughout the American South. In his autobiography, W. C. Handy reminisced about his childhood in Alabama. "Sometimes we were fortunate enough to have a French harp on which we played the fox and hounds and imitated the railroad trains—harmonica masterpieces" (Handy, 1941, p. 17).

The most famous harmonica, the Marine Band diatonic, was introduced in 1896. Listing for around seventy-five cents at its inception, it is still produced, virtually unchanged in design, and remains the harmonica of choice for most professional players.

Blues Harmonica Types

The two types of harmonicas used in blues are the diatonic and the chromatic. The diatonic is by far the most common and is also known as the harp, French harp, blues harp, mouth harp, and mouth organ. They typically have ten holes with twenty reeds tuned to the seven-note diatonic scale of the labeled key, and are arranged so that a major tonic chord of the key (C on a harmonica labeled "C") can be played anywhere by exhaling and the dominant 7/9 chord of the key (G7/9 on a harmonica labeled "C") can be played by inhaling (see Figure 1). This is the Richter tuning system. Until the 1960s, these harmonicas were mainly available in seven keys: G, A, Bb, C, D, E, and F; all twelve became more readily available later.

The chromatic, used much less in blues, is heard mainly in urban blues from Chicago after 1952 and from the West Coast a few years later. Versions of it were around as early as 1830. The first popular design emerged in the 1910s, but it did not catch on until the 1920s. The chromatic is actually two diatonic harmonicas packaged as one and tuned a musical half-step apart. A button-controlled sliding shuttle mouthpiece, attached to both, diverts air from one into the other.

In the 1930s, the "solo tuning" was made widely available on the chromatic. It used the tuning scheme of holes 4 through 7 of the older chromatic tuning, which is the Richter diatonic tuning, and repeated them an octave higher and an octave lower. While the exhale chord remained the major tonic (C), the inhale chord became a minor sixth (Dm6) (see Figure 2). The solo tuning is the most popular tuning system used on the chromatic harmonica, which typically has twelve or sixteen holes. The earlier Richter-diatonic-tuned version of the chromatic is known as the Koch or the slide harp.

Blues Harmonica Playing

Tongue blocking, or blocking, refers to using the tongue to cover, or block out, one or more holes while playing. It allows for octaves, wide intervals, vamping, and warbling sounds, which have significant importance to the blues harmonica sound. Single notes are obtained by blocking out the undesired holes on one side of the mouth while playing the desired hole out of the corner of the other side.

Octaves and wide intervals are obtained by blocking out one or more middle holes, and playing single holes out of both corners of the mouth. One of the most recognizable blues sounds is produced when holes 2 and 5 are played simultaneously while inhaling on the diatonic. Many early diatonic players (Jazz Gillum, Daddy Stovepipe) and chromatic players (George Smith) used octaves and intervals almost continuously on some songs.

Removing or lifting the tongue when blocking easily produces chords. The combination of blocking and lifting gives a fuller sound that can actually mimic two players playing at the same time (DeFord Bailey, Palmer McAbee). It can also give the note a very full-toned, percussive attack, depending on how the player coordinates tongue motion with breathing (Sonny Boy Williamson I, Big Walter Horton). This is usually called slapping or vamping and is extremely common among the prewar and early postwar players.

By blocking and lifting repeatedly and rapidly, a very full-toned tremolo effect will result (George Smith, Little Junior Parker, James Cotton) and by moving, or wiggling the tongue from side to side across the holes, a warbling or wide trilling effect is obtained (Little Walter, Sonny Terry, Gwen Foster).

Puckering, also called pursing, lipping, or lip blocking, is another popular way to play single or multiple notes using only the lips. It is a more recent method of playing, with a few advantages over blocking. The tongue is free to produce trumpeting-like articulations (Sonny Terry, Little Walter, Junior Wells) or a fluttering effect from sounding the Spanish “R” (DeFord Bailey, Sonny Boy Williamson I, Big Walter Horton).

With puckering, the tongue can participate with more coordination when using the bending technique. Players influenced mainly by Paul Butterfield, John Mayall, and the stream of instructional books that emerged in the 1960s, 1970s, and 1980s, also favor the pucker, usually with the incorrect assumption that bending was not possible when blocking.

Bending is a technique used to alter the normal pitch of a note on the harmonica. It is recognized as one of the most distinctive blues harmonica sounds, yet its occurrence is a total accident of the harmonica’s design, the result of having two differently pitched reeds in one hole. At least two versions of “Mouth Organ Coon” recorded by Pete Hampton ca. 1904 contain rudimentary examples of bending and also give a nod to the Fox Chase. Bending was first skillfully recorded by Henry Whitter in 1923 and found described in print that same year. Numerous brilliant examples were recorded before the end of the decade. Though the Fox Chases and Train Imitations played by W. C. Handy and his friends in the early 1880s only imply the use of bending, they do depict a scene that was probably typical of its discovery and use.

Bending was certainly happened upon by many people. Depending on the player’s musical background and experience level, it was found to be a blessing or a curse. If it was a part of a player’s musical background, it was probably embraced and quickly incorporated, as was likely with the African Americans and rural, white Southerners. The curse of bending is that it can manifest itself as an uncooperative, unresponsive, and even dissonant instrument when one is not trying to bend. Additionally, when the bending sound was not a part of a player’s musical background, it was likely found to be a nuisance or unwanted noise.

Bending is used for two reasons: to obtain new, previously missing notes (new-note bending), and for various bluesy ornaments (ornamental bending). On the diatonic, this occurs while inhaling on holes 1 through 6 and exhaling on holes 7 through 10 (see Figure 1). It is possible to bend most of the notes on the chromatic, but because bending is less typical in the blues chromatic sound, the following descriptions pertain to the diatonic.

Ornamental bending is characterized by slow, mournful, swooping vocal-like fluctuations in pitch (Little Walter, Sonny Boy Williamson II, Big Walter Horton) or fast, aggressive, flashy ones (Will Shade, Sonny Terry, Big Walter Horton). The result, coming from a player who can control it, is an extremely intense and emotionally expressive sound.

New-note bending, as mentioned, is the sounding of notes other than those to which the reeds are tuned. Using this allows access to twelve previously missing notes, nine of which are not in the key of the harmonica. The notes essential to the blues sound, the blues notes, are among these new notes.

Overbending, also known as overblowing and overdrawing, is an advanced form of bending that is used to obtain the remaining, previously missing, seven chromatic notes. They are found while exhaling on holes 1 through 6 and inhaling on holes 7 through 10 (see Figure 1). When overbending is used with new-note bending, the player gains access to a three-octave chromatic scale. It is popular among some modern contemporary players mainly due to the influence of Howard Levy, although Blues Birdhead, aka James Simons, used it as early as October 13, 1929, on his song “Mean Low Blues.”

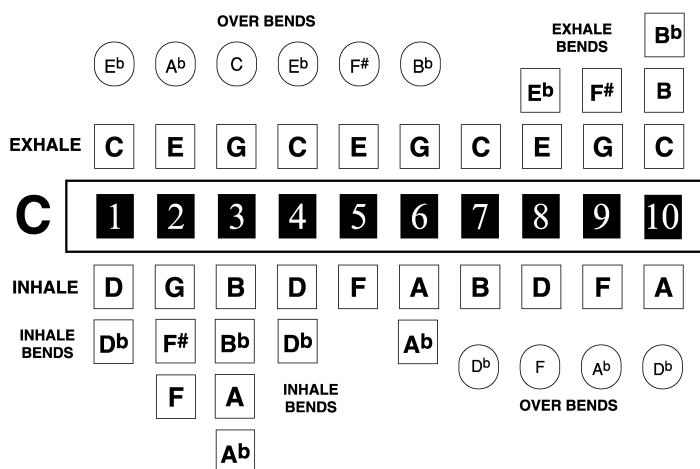

Figure 1: Ten-hole diatonic harmonica. (Illustration courtesy of Filisko Harmonicas)

Figure 2: Twelve-hole chromatic harmonica. (Illustration courtesy of Filisko Harmonicas)

The player’s hands are extremely important for obtaining various vocal-like effects, tremolo, and enhancing tone. A variety of hand grips can be used to close off part or all of the back of the harmonica, allowing for the effects and for the deepening of the overall tone.

Blues Harmonica Playing Positions

Despite the fact that all diatonic harmonicas are tuned to play in one specific labeled key, players eventually realized that it was possible, even advantageous, to play them in other keys. This has become known as playing the positions. Though never officially standardized, the musical “circle of fifths” is often used to differentiate the twelve possible positions. Before 1952 there were recorded examples of blues played in seven different positions on the diatonic harmonica: first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and twelfth. This is equivalent to playing a “C” harmonica in the keys of C, G, D, A, E, B, and F. That there were exactly seven keys derives from the fact that there are only seven distinct notes readily available on a diatonic harmonica.

Nonetheless, the vast majority of blues is still only played in second, first, and third positions, and in that order. The main reason is that these three positions have complete tonic chords with the potential to yield previously missing blues notes by bending, while inherently minimizing the possibilities of accidentally playing undesirable notes. Another reason is the influence of the strong playing traditions that came out of Chicago and Memphis.

Playing first position, or straight harp, is playing in the same key as the harmonica, or the exhale chord (key of C on a harmonica labeled “C”). Blues is most effectively played on holes 7 through 10 while exhaling because blues notes can be found on holes 8, 9, and 10 by bending. This was a very popular blues position in the prewar years, after which it began to lose favor. Jimmy Reed revived first position when he used it on numerous hit recordings for Vee-Jay records (Honest I Do; Bright Lights, Big City). Other players used it a little during that time but favored the lower four holes (Little Walter, Big Walter Horton, Sonny Boy Williamson II). The first known blues player who recorded using first position was Herbert Leonard on January 31, 1924 (with Clara Smith, "My Doggone Lazy Man"). This is also the first known blues harmonica recording.

Second position, cross, cross harp or choking, in simplest terms, uses the inhale chord as the key, or tonic chord (key of G on a harmonica labeled "C"), which is up a musical fifth. This is also the Mixolydian mode, or scale, popular in blues due to its flatted seventh note. The appeal of second position lies in its ability to obtain blues notes by bending, while inhaling on the same holes that also sound a dominant chord, a principle blues chord. It eventually became the standard blues position after the debut recording success of Sonny Boy Williamson I on May 5, 1937, and to a lesser degree Sonny Terry later that same year. Probably ninety percent or more of all postwar blues is played in second position.

The first known recordings of second position are those of the hillbilly artist Henry Whitter, who recorded at least three old-time blues tunes on December 12, 1923. Among them were the "Old Time Fox Chase" and "Lost Train Blues," solo harmonica pieces that were popular throughout the South, crossing all racial lines. The first African American to have recorded in second position was Sam Jones, aka Stovepipe No. 1, who recorded five non-blues tunes on August 19 and 20, 1924, and at least six unreleased blues songs. This was followed by examples from Herbert Leonard, Robert Cooksey, and Will Shade. But the earliest recorded player to capture second position's bluesy essence was Jaybird Coleman (ca. July 28, 1927, with vocalist Bertha Ross, "My Jelly Blues").

Third position is played a musical fifth above second position (key of D on a harmonica labeled "C"). Holes 4, 5, and 6 sound a minor chord when played together and become the new key, or tonic chord. This is the Dorian mode, or scale, popular in blues due to its flatted third and seventh notes. Though arguably more popular today than even first position, no recordings have been found using third position prior to December 29, 1951, when Little Walter first played it on the Muddy Waters song "Lonesome Day." Numerous other examples soon followed, by him and many others (George Smith, Junior Wells, James Cotton, Forrest City Joe).

Blues playing on the chromatic is usually in third position, taking advantage of its minor chord, inherent when inhaling (see Figure 2). Players tend to use the slide button little, if at all, unless it is predominantly held in, putting the harmonica in a key a half-step higher.

Blues Harmonica Playing Categories

All blues harmonica playing can fit into one of four categories: soloist, player and vocalist, instrumentalist, and sideman.

Harmonica soloists are mostly associated with the prewar players who played the Train Imitation, Lost John, Fox Chase, Mama Blues, and other call-and-response type pieces that featured the harmonica over the voice, if the voice was used at all. These pieces are seldom heard today. Notable players were DeFord Bailey, Palmer McAbee, Freeman Stowers, George "Bullet" Williams, William McCoy, Alfred Lewis, Roger Matthews, Sonny Terry, and Peg Leg Sam.

The harmonica player/vocalist category is the most common. The earliest approach was to play a verse of the melody in between the sung verses, which was also common in old-time music. This is represented by the recordings of Daddy Stovepipe, Stovepipe No. 1, Jaybird Coleman, Jazz Gillum, and Elder Roma Wilson. This approach was mostly abandoned after the recording debuts of Sonny Boy Williamson I and Sonny Terry, who usually used a call-and-response approach featuring the voice. The most well-known postwar harmonica player/vocalists are Little Walter, Sonny Boy Williamson II, Howlin' Wolf, and Jimmy Reed.

The harmonica instrumentalist category differs from the soloist in that it relies on accompaniment. Urban players Robert Cooksey, Blues Birdhead, and Rhythm Willie and country players Richard Sowell and Ellis Williams represent this in the prewar period. Many fine examples were recorded by jug band players Noah Lewis and Jed Davenport along with the Atlanta player, Eddie Mapp.

Little Walter set the new standard in the postwar period with his hit "Juke," followed by some thirty additional instrumentals including "Off the Wall," "Sad Hours," "Blue Light," and "Roller Coaster." The song "Honeydrinker" was recorded as an instrumental by numerous players (Little Walter, Papa Lightfoot) as was "Tommy Dorsey's Boogie Woogie" (Big Walter Horton, Louis Myers). Since the recording of "Juke," it is almost assumed that harmonica players have some instrumentals in their repertoire.

The harmonica sideman supports the vocalist or soloist. Many of the early instrumentalists doubled as sidemen; the most notable early sidemen were the jug band players Will Shade, Noah Lewis, and Jed Davenport. They were influential on the playing of Hammie Nixon, who recorded and worked behind Son Bonds and Sleepy John Estes. Hammie was an influence on Sonny Boy Williamson I, whose sideman work with Big Joe Williams, Robert Lee McCoy (Robert Nighthawk), and Yank Rachell is among his best playing. Sonny Terry started recording as a sideman for Blind Boy Fuller before his partnership with Brownie McGhee.

In the postwar scene, the importance of the sideman role was elevated, mostly due to the success of Muddy Waters and the popularity of Chicago blues. Harmonica players became such an essential part of the 1950s Chicago scene that bands had a hard time finding work without one. Playing with Muddy became the highest honor among players. Among those so honored were Little Walter, Junior Wells, Big Walter Horton, George Smith, James Cotton, Mojo Buford, Paul Oscher, and Jerry Portnoy.

Most Influential Players

DeFord Bailey was the premier soloist. His Train Imitation, Fox Chase, and other solo pieces were heard weekly throughout the South on the Grand Ole Opry radio program from 1925 to 1941. He recorded eighteen sides in 1927 and 1928; eleven were issued.

Sonny Terry, best known for his nearly forty-year partnership with Brownie McGhee, also recorded with Blind Boy Fuller, Leadbelly, and Woody Guthrie. In December 1938, he performed in the renowned "From Spirituals to Swing" concert at Carnegie Hall in New York. His playing was heard in two very successful Broadway shows (Finian's Rainbow, Cat On a Hot Tin Roof) and his image is featured on a 1998 U. S. Postage Stamp.

John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson I may be the most significant player in the history of the instrument and certainly one of the most imitated. He recorded for the Victor/Bluebird label from 1937 until his death in 1948. His debut recording session yielded the smash hit "Good Morning School Girl." Ten years of hits and great sideman work followed. He was the first to make the harmonica a legitimate instrument in blues. The next generation of players showed obvious signs of his influence.

Little Walter Jacobs was greatly influenced by Sonny Boy Williamson I. He started out as an amazing imitator, but his individual style soon emerged. He is the most significant postwar blues harmonica player. His May 1952 instrumental hit "Juke," which has become the blues harmonica anthem, showed the sophistication of his playing style and amplified sound. His sideman work with Muddy Waters and Jimmy Rogers are still prime textbook examples. Little Walter remains the player most well known for first using amplification and for helping to create the postwar Chicago blues sound.

Aleck Miller, aka Sonny Boy Williamson II, recorded for the Trumpet label from 1951 to 1954 and for Chess from 1955 until his death in 1965. His style was original, despite his stealing John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson's name. Predominantly an acoustic player, he was well known for his minimalist approach to playing, his generous use of hand effects, and nervous vibrato.

Big Walter "Shakey" Horton, also influenced by Sonny Boy Williamson I, is immortalized in his full-toned sideman work with Muddy Waters, Jimmy Rogers, Johnny Shines, Sunnyland Slim, and Willie Dixon. That he was also a master instrumentalist is clearly heard in his 1953 Sun recording of "Easy." He was the blues harmonica icon throughout the 1970s until his death in 1981.

George "Harmonica" Smith became the father of the "West Coast Harmonica Sound" after his move to California in the mid-1950s. He remains known for his Hammond-organ-like chromatic harmonica sound and his blending of Chicago blues with the Kansas City Swing.

Jimmy Reed will always be known for his fluid high-note bending in first position. Although he was not the only player doing this, he was the one who recorded the most hits with it.

James Cotton and Junior Wells were among the first players to use the harmonica with R&B and funk grooves. Both were equally capable of playing in the pure Chicago blues context.

Paul Butterfield's approach to playing blues has largely become the prototype for rock and fusion-flavored blues. He influenced many to start playing.

JOSEPH FILISKO

Bibliography

- DGR
- Bahnon, Henry T., and James F. Antaki. "Acoustical and Physical Dynamics of the Diatonic Harmonica." Journal of the Acoustical Society of America 103, no. 4 (April 1998): 2134–2144.
- Baker, Steve. The Harp Handbook. Music Sales/Wise Publications, 1999.
- Field, Kim. Harmonicas, Harps, and Heavy Breathers. New York: Cooper Square Press, 1993.
- Filisko, Joe. "Walter Horton Discography." CustomHarmonicas.com website, <http://customharmonicas.com> (accessed March 16, 2003).
- Glover, Tony. Blues Harp: An Instruction Method for Playing the Harmonica. New York: Oak Publications, 1965.
- , Scott Dirks, and Ward Gaines. Blues with a Feeling. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Haffner, Martin, and Christoph Wagner. Made in Germany—Played in USA. Germany: Harmonikamuseum Trossingen, 1993.

- Handy, W. C. Father of the Blues. New York: Collier Books, 1941.
- Hess, Norbert, and Klaus Kilian. "George Smith Discography." Blues Forum (Germany) no. 13 (Spring 1984): 12–16.
- Licht, Michael S. "Harmonica Magic: Virtuoso Display in American Folk Music." Ethnomusicology 24, no. 2 (May 1980): 211–221.
- Lorenz, Wolfgang. "Sonny Boy Williamson Discography." <http://home.t-online.de/home/mueller.lorenz/discog.htm> (accessed March 16, 2003).
- Minevitch, Borrah. How to Play the Harmonica at Sight. New York: Carl Fischer, 1923.
- Missin, Pat. "Pat Missin's Home Page." <http://www.patmissin.com> (accessed March 16, 2003).
- Morton, David. C. DeFord Bailey: A Black Star in Early Country Music. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1991.
- Portnoy, Jerry. Blues Harmonica Masterclass. International Blues Management, 1997.
- William Tonk & Bro. 1896, 1897 Catalogue of Musical Merchandise Etc.* Chicago.
- Yerxa, Winslow T. "Bending and Overblowing—All One Doughnut." Harmonica Information Publication, no. 4 (June 1994): 35–42.

Discography

- Little Walter. The Essential Little Walter (MCA Chess CHD2-9342).
- Terry, Sonny. Complete Recordings 1938–1945 (Document Records DOCD-5230).
- Various artists. Devil in the Woodpile Blues Harmonica 1926–1940 (Indigo Records IGOC-2032); Harmonica Masters (Yazoo 2019); Blues Masters Vol. 4: Harmonica Classics (Rhino R2 71124); Blues Masters Vol. 16: More Harmonica Classics (Rhino R2 75346); Harp Blues (Ace CHCHD 710).
- Waters, Muddy. The Chess Box (MCA Chess CD 3-80002).
- Williamson, Sonny Boy (I). The Bluebird Recordings (RCA 07863 66723-2).

HARMONICA FATS

- b. Harvey Blackston, 8 September 1927; McDade, LA
d. 3 January 2000; Los Angeles, CA

Harmonica player, vocalist, and songwriter who first appeared on the R&B scene with his 1962 hit "Tore Up." Joined the Bernie Pearl Blues Band and released the album I Had to Get Nasty in 1991. Collaborated with Pearl as an acoustic duo and recorded two albums for Bee Bump Records.

STEPHANIE POXON

Bibliography

- Rainsford, Mick. "Harmonica Fats." Blues & Rhythm no. 164 (November 2001): 10–13.

Discography: AMG; LSFP (as Blackston)

HARNEY, RICHARD "HACKSAW"

- b. 16 July 1902; Money, MS
d. 25 December 1973; Memphis, TN

"Hacksaw" Harney was a legendary guitarist amongst the guitarists of the Mississippi Delta, but there are very few recordings to substantiate his reputation. He reputedly played with a jazz orchestra in the 1920s and was said to have been equally talented on the piano. He made his living as a piano tuner and repairer and earned the nickname "Hacksaw" from the small hand saw he carried for his work.

In 1927 he and his brother Mylar auditioned for a Columbia Records field recording team in Memphis, but recorded only as accompanists for singers Walter "Pat" Rhodes and Pearl Dickson. Rhodes was a street singing accordion player from Ruleville, Mississippi, who may well be the oldest delta musician recorded. The contrast of his archaic style with the swing and sophistication of the Harney brothers makes for a fascinating record. Mylar was killed in a juke joint shortly after the recording sessions, but Richard continued to play with many of the most important musicians in the delta including Robert Johnson, Robert Jr. Lockwood, and Big Joe Williams. His influence was also spread by appearances on the King Biscuit Time radio show broadcast from Helena, Arkansas.

Harney recorded a single session in 1972 after being located by blues enthusiasts. He claimed to have not played a guitar in twenty years, but made a fine showing revealing a sophisticated finger style of guitar playing that is less of the delta and more of the swing of a performer like Blind Blake.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

- Calt, Stephen, and Wardlow, Gayle. King of the Delta Blues: The Life and Music of Charlie Patton. Newton, NJ: Rock Chapel Press, 1988.
- LaVere, Stephen. "Hacksaw Harney." Living Blues no. 18 (Autumn 1974): 7.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

- Harney's only session under his name: Sweet Man (1996, Blues Vault GCD9909).
- Harney's 1927 Columbia recording sessions: DGR, p. 215 (accompanying Pearl Dickson); DGR, p. 752 (accompanying Walter Rhodes).

See also Adelphi Records; Lockwood, Robert Jr.; Williams, Joe

HARPER, JOE

HARPER, JOE

b. Joe Martin, 5 May 1930; Raymond, MS
d. 24 February 1973; Chicago, IL

Learned guitar from father Robert Holmes, a gospel guitarist. Moved to Gary, Indiana, in 1955, then to Chicago in 1957. From the late 1950s until around 1966 he performed with Big Del and the Vibrators. From 1967 until his death from tuberculosis, he performed mostly with Carey Bell, but also made notable appearances with Jimmy Dawkins.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Eagle, Bob. "Chicago's Sidemen." Blues Unlimited no. 110 (October/November 1974): 13–14.

HARPO, SLIM

b. James Moore, 11 January 1924; Lobdell, LA
d. 31 January 1970; Baton Rouge, LA

Guitarist, harpist, singer, composer. The universal popularity of Harpo's laid-back but insistent blues approach took the muddy, atmospheric sound of Excello Records from tiny Crowley, Louisiana, to a worldwide audience. The smoldering sexuality of Harpo's songs, covered by acts as diverse as the Rolling Stones, Hank Williams Jr., the Kinks, and Lou Ann Barton, among many others, infused his music with an enduring signature style.

Harpo's parents died when he was a youth and he hit the streets as a performer, working dances, parties, and street corners as Harmonica Slim. He eventually got recording studio work on the recommendation of his friend Lightnin' Slim and after doing several sessions as a backing musician he cut his first single, the classic "I'm a King Bee."

But a Harmonica Slim already existed as a recording act on the West Coast so Slim Harpo came into being when his wife Lovelle simply reversed his name, took the slang term for the instrument, and added an O. It wasn't the only career assistance she provided; she also cowrote many of his most successful songs, including "I'm a King Bee."

The hits kept coming. The mournful "Raining in My Heart," which made its way onto the national pop charts in 1961, was even more successful than his first hit. It was, however, "Baby, Scratch My Back," the beneficiary of attention gained by the Rolling Stones recording "I'm a King Bee" on their first album, that became the biggest hit, enabling Harpo to finally play live shows in California and New York. He ultimately reunited with Lightnin' Slim and they toured together through the 1960s. Their first European tour was scheduled when a seemingly healthy Harpo, one of the cleanest living bluesmen of his era, unexpectedly died from a heart attack.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSPF

HARRINGTON/CLEARWATER FAMILY

One of the prolific families in the blues, the Harrington clan most notably includes Chicago veterans Eddy Harrington, better known as Eddy Clearwater, his cousin Carey Bell Harrington, and Carey's son Lurrie C. Bell. Eddy's uncle was Reverend Houston H. Harrington, the founder of the idiosyncratic Atomic-H label in Chicago. Reverend Harrington's sons, Joe (bass) and Vernon (guitar), once led a West Side band called the Atomic Souls.

Carey Bell fathered a number of blues-playing sons in addition to guitarist Lurrie: Carey Jr. (bass), Steve (harmonica), James (drums), and Tyson (bass). The younger Bells sometimes performed in their childhood years as the Ding Dongs. By extension or informal adoption, Carey Bell's "family" also includes pianist Lovie Lee (Edward L. Watson), who mentored Carey back in Mississippi and brought him to Chicago, and Lee's son Douglas Watson; prewar blues pianist Charley West was also the father of Carey's wife Dorothy (and, hence, grandfather to the younger Bell/Harrington children). To further extend the family tree into yet another prolific branch, Carey was also at one time married to Willie Dixon's daughter Patricia.

Carey Bell and Clearwater did not know they were related until they were together in the studio for a Rooster Blues session and a producer asked, noting that they both had the same last name and birthplace. The Harringtons started comparing notes and both traced their families back to the Macon, Mississippi, area.

JIM O'NEAL

HARRIS, COREY

b. 21 February 1969; Denver, CO

Though often viewed as revivalist or retro, Corey Harris's music is completely contemporary, reflecting a thorough knowledge of the complete American and African American music spectrum. Harris's past albums have included funk, reggae, soul, rock, country, and pop elements right alongside blues tunes, and he mixed African and world music ingredients with blues on the outstanding release Mississippi to Mali. Harris has been praised for his ability to take a musicological approach without lapsing into a dry, academic lyrical or performing stance.

Corey Harris's debut release, Between Midnight and Day, was labeled as a reworking of the music of Charlie Patton and Robert Johnson. But Harris has always preferred original works to repertory and covers, is equally at home with acoustic and electric instruments, and never confines himself to any single blues strain. Before becoming a musician, Harris studied anthropology at Bates College, and frequent appearances in African and European festivals have made him a dynamic advocate for musical and cultural eclecticism. Harris received his greatest mainstream exposure in 2003 following his participation in the great director Martin Scorsese's film Feel Like Going Home, one of several movies made for the 2003 "Year of the Blues" celebration, in which Harris's appearance with Mali music giant Ali Farka Toure was an unforgettable highlight.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

- AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin; Santelli
 Collier, Pat. "Corey Harris: Manifesting the Blues." Sing Out! 43, no. 2 (Fall 1998): 34–43.
 Frede, Ari. "Words Sound Power: The Blues Vision of Corey Harris." Living Blues no. 126 (March/April 1996): 22–33.
 Guralnick, Peter, ed., Martin Scorsese Presents the Blues. New York: Amistad, 2003.

Discography: AMG

HARRIS, DON "SUGARCANE"

- b. Donald Bowman, 18 June 1938; Pasadena, CA
 d. 1 December (?) 1999; Los Angeles, CA

Date of death also reported as 27 or 30 November. Violinist, guitarist. Family members were traveling carnival entertainers. Harris studied classical music at school in Los Angeles. He went on to form a doo-wop group, The Squires, in early 1950s, then worked with pianist Dewey Terry as Don and Dewey. He recorded with John Lee Hooker in 1959. He was the first electric violinist to make a genuine impact in blues and rock music. He devised a method of amplifying his violin by adapting a cartridge from a record player, giving him unprecedented power and aggressive attack.

"Sugarcane" acquired his nickname while working with Johnny Otis. He toured Europe with Little Richard in a band that also included a youthful Jimi Hendrix. He joined Frank Zappa in 1969, and contributed to the radical innovations on albums like Hot Rats (1969), Burnt Weeny Sandwich (1969), and Weasels Ripped My Flesh (1970).

Harris's first solo album, Keep on Driving, was released in 1970. He joined John Mayall for USA Union (1970) and remained with Mayall's touring band for several years in the 1970s, although a drug habit made him unreliable at times. He also worked with guitarist Harvey Mandel, and in blues-rock band Pure Food and Drug Act. He recorded several more albums as leader, and united with jazz-rock violinists Jean Luc Ponty and Michael Urbaniak for the album New Violin Summit in 1971. Harris recorded Changing Seasons (1980) with jazz violinist Billy Bang. He did further work with Zappa, Mayall, and John Lee Hooker in the 1970s, and then reunited with Dewey Terry in 1975, an association that continued until 1998. Harris recorded again with Mayall in 1994, but his career declined after 1970s. Pulmonary disease forced him to give up playing in 1998.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

Selected Recordings as Leader

- Keep on Driving* (1970, Musidisc 15060).
Sugarcane (1970, Epic 30027).
Fiddler on the Rock (1971, Musidisc 15062).
Choice Cuts (1972, Epic 31401).
Got the Blues (1973, Polydor 21283).
Cup Full of Dreams (1974, BSAF 68030).
I'm on Your Case (1974, MPS 21912).

HARRIS, HI TIDE

- b. 26 March 1946; San Francisco, CA

Vocalist and guitarist (both conventional and slide). According to researcher Sheldon Harris, birth name reportedly may have been Willie Gitry or Willie Boyd. Backed Jimmy McCracklin and John Mayall on record before playing on the soundtrack of the film Leadbelly (1975). In the late 1980s he moved to Japan and has recorded regularly for Japanese labels, while making occasional live appearances in the States.

RAY ASTBURY

HARRIS, HI TIDE

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
Hi Tide Harris profile, <http://www.diggitnow.com/hthprofile.html>.
Stewart, Alan. "The Baddest Young Guitar-Player on the Coast." Blues Unlimited no. 108 (June/July 1974): 11.

Selected Recordings

The Hey Day of Hi Tide Harris 1970s–90s (Tezu 0002).

HARRIS, HOMER

- b. 6 May 1916; Drew, MS
d. 16 October 2000; Chicago, IL

Vocalist known to record collectors for his 1946 Columbia label recordings with guitarist Muddy Waters and pianist Jimmy Clarke. Harris's interest in music had begun at the time of his move to Chicago in 1943. From then until 1956 he performed in Chicago clubs with Clarke (until the latter's death in 1952) or with Johnnie Jones.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Harris
O'Neal, Jim. "Blues Questions and Answers." Living Blues no. 12 (Spring 1973): 37.

Discography: LSFP

HARRIS, KENT L. "BOOGALOO"

- b. 1930; Oklahoma City, OK

Singer, songwriter, producer. Raised in San Diego, California, Harris moved to Los Angeles in 1952 after service in the U.S. Air Force. His 1955 Crest label recording of his song "Cops and Robbers" released by Bo Diddley; the same thing happened to his song "Clothesline," but this time it was the Coasters who garnered the higher sales. Later he began producing freelance, and he founded the Romark label in 1960.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Eagle, Bob. "Cops and Robbers: Kent L. Harris." Blues Unlimited no. 103 (August/September 1973): 9.

HARRIS, PEPPERMINT

- b. Harrison D. Nelson Jr., 17 July 1925; Texarkana, TX
d. 19 March 1999; Elizabeth, NJ

Guitarist, singer. After serving in the Navy in World War II, Harris moved to Houston in 1943. He devoted his full time to music a few years later and became a protégé of Houston blues patriarch Lightnin' Hopkins, who landed him (as Peppermint Nelson) his first recording session with the Gold Star label in 1948. Harris, whose mellow, laid-back singing style was surprisingly sophisticated for his country upbringing, gained some early attention with the regional favorite "Raining in My Heart" in 1950. But it was the surprise success of his "I Got Loaded" ode to alcohol a year later that made him a star, creating a blues subgenre in the process, one Harris repeatedly mined with follow-ups like "Have Another Drink and Talk to Me" and "Three Sheets in the Wind."

Harris relocated to California and served as a staff writer for Modern Records, writing lyrics for a series of B. B. King and Etta James hits. He also recorded under his own name, once with a youthful Albert Collins, for an assortment of small West Coast labels. But Harris couldn't get commercial traction for his career. After signing with Jewel Records in 1965, he ultimately returned to Houston and worked primarily in nonmusic jobs. Following several European festival appearances, Harris officially retired in 1988, spending his final years in Sacramento, California, before a brief move to New Jersey for family reasons. His final albums, Texas on My Mind, released in 1995, and the posthumous Shreveport Downhome Blues, released in 2003, combine with the compilation of his later work, Lonesome as I Can Be: The Jewel Recordings, to form the core of his recorded catalog.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Burke, Tony. "Peppermint Harris" [obituary]. Blues & Rhythm no. 139 (1999): 20.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

HARRIS, THURSTON

- b. 11 July 1931; Indianapolis, IN
d. 14 April 1990; Pomona, CA

Vocalist and saxophonist who recorded for Aladdin. Harris's biggest hit was 1957's "Little Bitty Pretty One."

TOM MORGAN

Bibliography

Nelson, David. "Thurston Harris" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 94 (1990): 54.

Discography

Little Bitty Pretty One (1984, EMI American LP SQ-17237).

HARRIS, TONY

b. March 1934; Austin, TX

Harris's early career and recordings through 1956 were in sacred music, including with the Traveling Four sacred group. Initial efforts in secular music through Art Rupe's Specialty label were futile, but his single "Chicken Baby Chicken" for Rupe's ex-wife Leona Rupe's Ebb label was a national hit in 1957. Subsequent blues and soul recording efforts did not sell well, but he continued performing and road-managing various musical acts. Since the 1980s he has sung both gospel and rhythm and blues, mostly around Los Angeles.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography and Discography

Nations, Opal Louis. "The 'Chicken Baby Chicken' Man: The Story of Tony Harris." Blues & Rhythm no. 115 (Christmas [December] 1996): 4-7; no. 117 (February 1997): 4-7.

HARRIS, WILLIAM "BIG FOOT"

b. ca. 1900

d. ca. 1930s

Delta blues guitarist and singer active in the Glendora, Mississippi, area through the early 1930s. An early discovery of blues talent scout H. C. Speir, Harris recorded for Gennett Records in 1927.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Wardlow, Gayle Dean. "'Big Foot' William Harris." 78 Quarterly no. 3 (1988): 45-48.

Discography: DGRHARRIS, WYNONIE

b. 24 August 1913; Omaha, NE

d. 14 June 1969; Los Angeles, CA

Birth year also reported as 1915. Singer, composer. Wynonie Harris was an immensely popular urban blues artist whose exuberant recordings of wildly imaginative compositions like "Grandma Plays the Numbers," "Good Morning Judge," and "Bloodshot Eyes" dominated the R&B charts between 1945 and 1952. A dynamic blues shouter and crowd-pleasing performer, "Mr. Blues" helped create the image of the flamboyant, hard-living show-business personality that served as the template for the rock 'n' roll stars of the 1950s and thereafter.

Harris was discovered by bandleader Lucky Millinder, who hired him as vocalist with his popular orchestra and featured him on the band's number one R&B hit, "Who Threw the Whiskey in the Well" (1945, Decca). Harris then went out on his own, recording for Apollo in 1946 before signing with King the next year. His first number one single for the label, a rollicking reading of Roy Brown's prophetic "Good Rockin' Tonight" (1948), inspired a young Elvis Presley to cut the song for his second Sun release several years later.

Harris extended the theme with "All She Wants to Do Is Rock" in 1949 and then released a series of bawdy jump-blues anthems that celebrated the joys of sex ("I Want My Fanny Brown," "Sittin' on It All the Time," "I Like My Baby's Pudding," "Lovin' Machine") and the woes associated with heavy drinking. But his songs were too adult oriented and risqué to allow Harris to cross over into the white rock 'n' roll marketplace of the mid- and late 1950s, and his career took an abrupt nosedive from which the singer never recovered.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli Collins, Tony. Rock Mr. Blues: The Life and Music of Wynonie Harris. Milford: Big Nickel, 1995.

Discography: LSFP

"Who Threw the Whiskey in the Well" (1945, Decca; with Lucky Millinder Orchestra); "Playful Baby" (1946, Decca); "Wynonie's Blues," "Around the Clock Blues" (1946, Apollo); "Good Rockin' Tonight," "Lollipop Mama" (1948, King); "Grandma Plays the Numbers," "I Feel That Old Age Coming On," "Drinkin' Wine Spo-Dee-O-Dee," "All She Wants to Do Is Rock," "I Want My Fanny Brown" (1949, King); "Sittin' on It All the Time," "I Like My Baby's Pudding," "Good Morning Judge," "Oh Babe!" (1950, King); "Bloodshot Eyes" (1951, King); "Lovin' Machine" (1952, King).

HARRISON, VERNON

(See Boogie Woogie Red)

HARRISON, WILBERT

HARRISON, WILBERT

b. 5 January 1929; Charlotte, NC
d. 26 October 1994; Spencer, NC

Rhythm and blues singer who recorded two songs that were to become rock classics: “Kansas City” (1959) to be covered by the Beatles in 1964, and “Let’s Work Together” (also, “Let’s Stick Together”) (1969), which was popularized in rock by Canned Heat in 1970.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Bonner, Brett J. “Wilbert Harrison” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 92.
Penny, Dave. “Wilbert Harrison.” Blues & Rhythm no. 96 (February 1995): 12–13.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

HART, ALVIN “YOUNGBLOOD”

b. Gregory Edward Hart, 2 March 1963; Oakland, CA

Singer and acoustic blues guitarist, considered one of the best to have emerged during the 1990s blues revival.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Jung, Maureen. “Acoustic Blues in Oakland: Alvin Youngblood Hart and Elmer Lee Thomas.” Living Blues no. 126 (March/April 1996): 34–39.

Discography: AMG

HART, HATTIE

Flourished 1920s–1930s

Hart’s tough, sexy delivery was first heard in 1930 on the Memphis Jug Band’s “Memphis Yo Yo Blues” and “Cocaine Habit Blues.” She recorded in 1934 with Allen Shaw and Willie Borum, and in 1938, under the name Hattie Bolten, in Chicago, where she may have moved to live.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Larkin
Olsson, Bengt. Memphis Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970.

Discography: DGR

HARVEY, TED

b. 21 December 1930; Chicago, IL

Drummer best known for his work with guitarist Hound Dog Taylor. Began as saxophonist as a teenager, continuing on that instrument and trumpet during service in the U.S. Army in the early 1950s. He took up drums while in the army. Fred Below was a significant influence, from whom Harvey learned the bass backbeat. Around 1961–1962 he began performing with Hound Dog Taylor, staying with him until the latter’s death in 1975. During his tenure with Taylor, Harvey received his first set of Ludwig drums, and he supported Taylor on the Houserockers albums for Alligator. In 1976–1978 he drummed for J. B. Hutto, then from 1978 through 1997 he was in the Jimmy Rogers Band.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Darwen, Norman. “Blues Players Was Really Playing Every Night.” Blues & Rhythm no. 118 (April 1997): 8–9.

HATCH, PROVINE, JR. “LITTLE HATCH”

b. 25 October 1921; Sledge, MS
d. 14 January 2003; Eldorado Springs, MO

Singer and harmonica player. He moved to Kansas City, Missouri, in 1946, and for many years worked days at Hallmark Cards. He performed in local clubs for more than fifty years. He recorded for the labels M&M, Modern Blues, and Analogue Productions Originals.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris
“Popular K.C. Blues Figure Dies.” Associated Press wire story, January 17, 2003.

HAWKINS, ERNIE

b. 22 September 1947; Pittsburgh, PA

Ernie Hawkins is an Anglo master of the early Piedmont and Texas acoustic blues styles. Hawkins apprenticed with Reverend Gary Davis in the 1960s before returning to Pittsburgh to work with Bobby “Niles” Jones, aka “Guitar Gabriel.” In the 1970s, Hawkins studied in Texas with Mance Lipscomb and Art Eskridge before launching his own professional career.

JERRY ZOLTEN

Bibliography

AMG (Ken Chang)

Discography: AMG (Ken Chang)HAWKINS, ERSKINE

b. 26 July 1914; Birmingham, AL

d. 11 November 1993; Willingboro, NJ

Trumpeter and bandleader. Billed as the "Twentieth Century Gabriel" for his high-note acrobatics, Hawkins led the 'Bama State Collegians from 1934, which became the Erskine Hawkins Orchestra in 1938. A popular success with "Tuxedo Junction" (1939) established the band (remade in 1950). The band had a real feel for both blues and swing, and included fine soloists, notably the brothers Dud (trumpet) and Paul (tenor saxophone) Bascomb, and pianist Avery Parrish, who wrote "After Hours," a blues hit for the band in 1940. The band was popular until early 1950s, when Hawkins reduced the band to a small group other than for special reunions. He remained active into the 1980s.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Deffaa, Chip. "Erskine Hawkins: Twentieth Century Gabriel." In In the Mainstream: 18 Portraits in Jazz. Metuchen: Scarecrow Press, 1992.

Discography: LordSelected Recordings

"A Study in Blue" (1938, Bluebird 10029); "Weary Blues" (1938, Bluebird 7839); "Gin Mill Special/Tuxedo Junction" (1939, Bluebird 10409); "Uptown Shuffle" (1939, Bluebird 10504); "After Hours" (1940, Bluebird 10879); "Bear Mash Blues" (1942, Bluebird 30-0813); "Tippin' In" (1945, Victor 20-3231); "Tuxedo Junction" (1950, Coral 60361); "Down Home Jump" (1951, King 4522); "Steel Guitar Rag" (1951, King 4514).

HAWKINS, SCREAMIN' JAY

b. Jalacy J. Hawkins, 18 July 1929; Cleveland, OH

d. 12 February 2000; Paris, France

Screamin' Jay Hawkins (born Jalacy J. Hawkins) was one of the most theatrical R&B singers of all time, remarked as years ahead of his time in his outlandish performances, which included gold and leopard skin costumes and notable voodoo stage props such as his smoking skull on a stick—named Henry—and rubber snakes. His stage act and mystique put a new point on the map of the blues, but also created a new element to mainstream media and popular culture.

Hawkins's biggest hit, "I Put a Spell on You," was originally conceived as a ballad. However, when he, guitarist Mickey Baker, and Sam "The Man" Taylor went to record the song while intoxicated, the resulting product was a raw, guttural track that became an instant success on the OKeh label in 1956. Soon after, Hawkins cemented his wild and bizarre voodoo persona, after being offered a three hundred dollar bonus by radio show host Alan Freed to pop out of a coffin on stage.

His personal evolution and character was fundamentally shaped by remarkable life stories. Legend has it that he spent his first eighteen months in a Cleveland orphanage before the Blackfoot Native American tribe adopted him. In addition to musical interest in his youth, he was also a prizefighter, winning the middleweight Golden Gloves title in 1947.

After the height of his career, in the 1950s and 1960s, film director Jim Jarmusch resurrected his career, featuring him in his remake of the film Mystery Train in 1989. He later appeared in A Rage in Harlem in 1991 and Dance with the Devil in 1997.

Hawkins's styles, sometimes referred to as "jump-blues" or "ghoul rock," have influenced many rock 'n' roll acts, including Black Sabbath and Alice Cooper. "I Put on Spell on You" continues to be covered in various stylistic formats, ranging from Them's soulful jazz interpretation to Pete Townshend's guitar acoustic style to Marilyn Manson's dark edge.

MEG FISHER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
White, George. "Screamin' Jay Hawkins: Shock 'N' Roll" [part 1]. Blues & Rhythm no. 31 (September 1987): 4–8;
[part 2]. Blues & Rhythm no. 32 (October 1987): 10–13;
[part 3]. Blues & Rhythm no. 33 (December 1987): 18–21.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

I Put a Spell on You (1957, Collectables LP 9006); At Home with Screamin' Jay Hawkins (1958, Columbia LP N-3448); The Night & Day of Screamin' Jay Hawkins (1965, Planet LP 1001); What That Is (1969, Phillips LP 600319); A Night at Forbidden City (1969, Sounds of Hawaii LP 5015); Screamin' Jay Hawkins (1970, Philips LP 600336); Portrait of a Man & His Woman (1972, Hot Line LP 10024); Screamin' the Blues (1979, Red Lightning LP 0025); Frenzy (1982, Edsel LP 104); Real Life (1983, Charly LP 163); Live (1985, Midnight LP 114); Feat of the Mau Mau (1988, Edsel LP 252); Live & Crazy (1989, Evidence LP ECD-26003); Black Music for White

HAWKINS, SCREAMIN' JAY

People (1991, Rhino LP R4-70556); Cow Fingers & Mosquito Pie (1991, Epic LP ET-47933); Stone Crazy (1993, Rhino LP 71184); I Shake My Stick at You (1994, Aim LP 1031); Rated X (1994, Performance LP 8237); Some-thin' Funny Goin On (1995, Bizarre/Straight LP 40105); She Put the Wammee on Me (1998, M.I.L. Multimedia LP 6121).

HAWKINS, TED

b. Theodore Hawkins, Jr., 28 October 1936; Lakeshore, MS

d. 1 January 1995; Los Angeles, CA

Ted Hawkins's life could be the credible basis for a blues song. He was born to a mother who was both an alcoholic and a prostitute, and he was in a juvenile reformatory by the time he was twelve. He took up music after seeing a performance by Professor Longhair, which prompted him to enter a talent contest. Upon release from the reformatory at age fifteen, the hapless youth earned a three-year term at Parchman Penitentiary for stealing a leather jacket. While there, he learned his mother had died of cirrhosis of the liver. Meanwhile, Hawkins was playing guitar and singing; his main influence was Sam Cooke, whom Hawkins idolized. He came to play a variety of material—soul, pop music, blues. Upon release he lived as an itinerant in various places including Chicago, Philadelphia, and Buffalo. He married twice in that period as well: The first ended in annulment by the bride's mother, the second in his wife's death from cancer. A third marriage lasted until his death.

In 1966, Hawkins bought a one-way ticket to Los Angeles. He searched to no avail for Sam Cooke's manager, but he recorded a single for Money Records. The single garnered no royalties for the artist, who, despairing of the music business, took his music to the streets. He began playing around the Ocean Front area of Venice Beach, busking on the boardwalks for spare change. During that period, Hawkins caught the attention of HighTone producer Bruce Bromberg, who took the nearly indigent singer under his wing. In 1971, Bromberg recorded sessions with Hawkins in a small group setting and solo. A single released on the Joliet label was the only part of those sessions released through 1982. Bromberg lost touch with the singer, and Hawkins had run afoul of the law again. Yet those sessions, released in 1982 on Rounder Records as Watch Your Step, brought Hawkins national recognition. At the request of a deejay, Hawkins moved to England and stayed for four years, where there and in Europe he was given overwhelming ovations from the audiences. Despite his success overseas, however, Hawkins returned to street performing in the United States. In the early 1990s, he was signed to Geffen Records by Tony Berg. The CD The Next Hundred Years was well received by the blues public on its release in 1994, and he seemed poised to return to the spotlight. Instead, he died on New Year's Day of the following year.

JOHN OTIS

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin Bonner, Brett. "Ted Hawkins" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 93.

Discography: AMG

HAWKINS, WALTER "BUDDY BOY"

Flourished 1927–1929

Guitarist and singer active in the southern states in the 1920s. It is believed (but not well documented) that he came from Blytheville, Mississippi. He recorded for Paramount Records in 1927 and 1929. In the 1929 session he recorded "Voice Throwin' Blues," an odd piece of ventriloquism to the melody of W. C. Handy's "Hesitation Blues."

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: DGR

HAYES, CLIFFORD

Flourished 1924–1931

Violinist and session leader of recordings, especially for Louisville jug bands with banjoist Cal Smith.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Scott Yanow)

Discography: AMG; DGR

HAYES, HENRY

b. 5 August 1923; Marlin, TX

Houston-based saxophonist, songwriter, bandleader, and producer. Recorded for Aladdin, Gold Star, Savoy, Peacock, and Mercury labels—as well as his own Kangaroo imprint. Produced the first recordings of Albert Collins, Joe Hughes, and Elmore Nixon.

ROGER WOOD

Bibliography

Govenar, Alan. Meeting the Blues: The Rise of the Texas Sound. Dallas: Taylor, 1988.

Wood, Roger. Down in Houston: Bayou City Blues. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2003.

Discography: LSFP

HAYES, ROLAND

(See Boy Blue)

HAZELL, PATRICK

b. 1945

Based in Washington, Iowa. Hazell taught himself boogie-woogie piano in the 1950s. From 1968 through 1980 he was a member of the Mother Blues Band. Since then he has performed as a one-man band at piano, harmonica, and drums. His recent work has been exploring other American soundscapes, especially his Vicksburg CD (2000), which is evocative of the 1863 Civil War siege.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda, Larry Belanger)

Discography: AMG (Cub Koda, Larry Belanger)

HEALEY, JEFF

b. 25 March 1966; Toronto, Ontario, Canada

Blind guitarist from Toronto who plays his electric instrument lap-style. Healey's major label debut See the Light (1989, Arista) was well received, including a hit ballad single "Angel Eyes." His four Arista releases were based in blues, but his subsequent work has branched into jazz and other types of music.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

Cote, M. "Jeff Healey and the Coolness Factor." Blues Revue no. 39 (July/August 1998): 30ff.

Discography: AMG

HEARTSMAN, JOHNNY

b. 9 February 1937; Houston, TX

d. 27 December 1996; Sacramento, CA

Multi-instrumentalist (guitar, bass, trombone, flute, all kinds of keyboard), songwriter, arranger, and, in his later career, vocalist). Brought up in Oakland, by the early 1950s he was playing piano in a local club and also learning guitar from Lafayette Thomas. He formed his own band, the Rhythm Rockers, which became one of the hottest in Oakland, and he worked for Bob Geddins, for Ray Dobard as A&R man for Music City, and for Ron Badger (Wax, Shirley); his distinctive guitar style "characterised by speedy fingerwork up the fretboard, as well as a moaning sound produced with the volume control" (Feld, p. 52) can be heard on many of the records made in the East Bay in the late 1950s and 1960s. In 1957 "Johnny's House Party," a two-part instrumental for Music City, was an R&B chart hit. A second Music City single did less well and instrumental singles for Big Jay, Red Fire, Triad, and Arhoolie in the early 1960s made little impact. Despite working in "the 'no man's land' between blues, jazz and funk" (Dick Shurman, Juke Blues 37 [Spring 1997]: 33) he gradually (having become a competent singer) became better known and began to appear at blues festivals both in the States and abroad. He also began to record again, with albums for Cat n' Hat (1983), Crosscut (1988), Alligator (1991), Have Mercy (1994), and Inak (1996), but perhaps never achieved the popularity which his many talents deserved.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli

Feld, David. "Johnny Heartsman 1937–1966." Blues Access no. 29 (Spring 1997): 52.

Nations, Opal Louis. "The Story of Johnny Heartsman and the Rhythm Rockers." Blues & Rhythm no. 176 (February 2003): 4–7.

Shurman, Dick. "Living Blues Interview—Johnny Heartsman." Living Blues no. 47 (Summer 1980): 5–14.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Geddins, Bob; Oakland; Thomas, Lafayette Jerl "Thing"

HEGAMIN, LUCILLE

b. Lucille Nelson, 29 November 1894; Macon, GA

d. 1 March 1970; New York City, NY

Among the first "classic blues" singers on phonograph records. Married pianist Bill Hegamin in

HEGAMIN, LUCILLE

1914, and after their divorce in 1923 she retained the surname. Hegamin was active in musical theater and cabaret. She recorded often in 1920–1926, with two additional titles in 1932. By the late 1930s she left music to become a nurse. She did return briefly to singing and recording for the Spivey label in the early 1960s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Scott Yanow); Chilton; Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

HELFER, ERWIN

b. 20 January 1936; Chicago, IL

Growing up on Chicago's South Shore, Helfer was drawn to traditional blues, boogie-woogie, and ragtime and befriended musicians Cripple Clarence Lofton, Baby Dodds, Grover Compton, Big Joe Williams, Eurreal "Little Brother" Montgomery, and Estella "Mama" Yancey, the widow of Jimmy Yancey. His first stage appearance was with Mama as a last-minute substitute for Montgomery in 1956.

While studying at Tulane he sought out New Orleans musicians, often breaking the segregation laws to do so. His 1950s field recordings of Doug Suggs, Speckled Red, and Billie Pierce released on his Tone label as Primitive Piano (reissued on Sirens) remain important, rare recordings of these early blues and boogie artists.

Helfer recorded twice with Big Joe Williams, once for Eli Toscano's Cobra label. He also sang duets with former house-rent pianist Jimmy Walker for Testament in 1964, and issued two LPs with drummer Odie Payne. For Red Beans, which he cofounded with Pete Crawford, he released a solo LP, Erwin Helfer Plays Chicago Piano (1986), and accompanied Mama Yancey on My Turn to Cry (1983, reissued on Evidence), on which he delivered a remarkably sensitive performance behind the elderly but still evocative vocalist. He shared the piano bench with Willie Mabon, Sunnyland Slim, Jimmy Walker, and Blind John Davis on Heavy Timbre, and with Barrelhouse Chuck Goering, Pinetop Perkins, and Detroit Junior on 8 Hands on 88 Keys—both for Sirens. A European release featured Helfer with former Five Blazes guitarist Floyd McDaniel.

His playing is featured on Sirens' I'm Not Hungry, But I Like to Eat—Blues with saxophonist John Brumbach, and St. James Infirmary with Skinny Williams.

Helfer, a teacher with advanced degrees, has mentored many musicians and singers and has hired those just starting out as well as veteran musicians, and to his credit has prolonged the careers of many elderly and overlooked artists. His musical movable feast has featured such musicians as S. P. Leary, Odie Payne, Jeanne Carroll, Clark Dean, Mama Yancey, Truck Parham, Floyd McDaniel, Barrelhouse Chuck, Pat Soul, Katherine Davis, Zora Young, and "Big Time Sarah" Streeter.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

Birnbaum, Larry. "The Apprenticeship of Erwin Helfer." The Chicago Reader (January 21, 1983): 1.
Moon, D. Thomas. "'The Rocks,' 'The Fives' and All That Jive." Blues Revue 31 (October, 1997): 35.

Discography

I'm Not Hungry, But I Like to Eat—Blues (Sirens SR-5001).
Maybe I'll Cry (Evidence ECD 26078-2).

HEMPHILL, JESSIE MAE

b. 18 October 1933 (?); near Como, MS

Various sources give her birthplace as near Como or Senatobia, and her birth date as 6 or 18 October, and the year as 1933 or 1934.

Jessie Mae Hemphill is living proof of the vitality and resilience of Mississippi traditional music. Born into a musical family and a relative of bluesman Doctor Ross, Hemphill started to play guitar, bass drum, and snare drum at a very early age under the influence of her grandfather Sid Hemphill, an accomplished multi-instrumentalist who was recorded by folklorist Alan Lomax for the Library of Congress in 1942. When she was young, Jessie Mae limited herself to playing secular songs at local country picnics and sacred songs at church meetings from the late 1940s to the late 1970s, when she started to make a career thanks to musicologist David Evans's encouragement. The recipient of three W. C. Handy Awards, Hemphill released an album for Vogue in 1981 (where in one track she played the diddley bow) and one for High Water Recording Company in 1990 (both reissued on High Water/HMG) and began to regularly tour the United States, Canada, and Europe, often accompanying herself on guitar and hand and foot tambourine. After recovering from a stroke suffered in December 1993, Hemphill still makes sporadic public appearances in her local area and Memphis, mostly singing a gospel repertoire. Deeply rooted in the old local tradition of fife and drum bands, Jessie Mae Hemphill’s guitar style is highly repetitive and percussive. Never in the twelve-bar format, her original songs either have a very danceable boogie rhythm (“Feelin’ Good”) or an introspective quality of their own (“Brokenhearted Blues”), with lyrics reflecting her personal experience.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Evans, David. Notes to Jessie Mae Hemphill: Feelin’ Good (1997, High Water/HMG 6502).
 Mitchell, George. Blow My Blues Away. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1971.

Discography: AMG

See also Hemphill, Sid

HEMPHILL, JULIUS ARTHUR

b. 24 January 1938; Fort Worth, TX
 d. 2 April 1995; New York City, NY

Saxophonist, composer. Although best known for his progressive jazz achievements as a founding member of the World Saxophone Quartet, Hemphill, also a published poet, played in Texas R&B bands and with Ike Turner in the 1960s before immersing himself full time in the jazz scene.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: Lord

HEMPHILL, SID

b. 1876; Como, MS
 d. 1963; Senatobia, MS

LSFP gives dates as 1887–1961. Sid Hemphill, the son of a slave fiddler, was an instrument builder, a multi-instrumentalist, and a songwriter. He and his band—Alec Askew, Lucius Smith, and Will Head—performed as both a string band with Hemphill on fiddle and as a fife and drum group with Hemphill on fife or quills. Equally adept at fiddle tunes or long ballads, he performed reels, popular songs, and spirituals for both black and white audiences in northern Mississippi. His quill playing was highly syncopated and displayed the closest ties to African music. Alan Lomax recorded him in 1942 and 1959.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

Larkin
 Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Dell Publishing, 1993.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

See also Fife and Drums; Hemphill, Jesse Mae; Lomax, Alan; Smith, Lucius.

HENDERSON, BUGS

b. 1944; Palm Springs, CA

Guitarist, singer. Artist’s website cites 1944 as birth year; 1943 cited by some researchers. Texas blues rocker Henderson grew up in Tyler, Texas, and experimented with everything from pop/rock, where he had a hit as a member of the Dallas-based Mouse and the Traps, to progressive country before dedicating himself to the blues in 1974 with his long-running band the Shuffle Kings. His recordings included Have Blues . . . Must Rock in 1998 and Backbop a year later.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Bugs Henderson website, <http://www.bugshenderson.com/> (accessed December 18, 2004).

Selected Recordings

Daredevils of the Red Guitar (1994, Flat Canyon 103).
That’s the Truth (1995, Flat Canyon 104).
Have Blues. . . Must Rock (1998, Burnside 29).
Backbop (1999, Burnside 34).
Heartbroke Again (2000, The Orchard 4231).

HENDERSON, DUKE “BIG”

b. S. C. Henderson
 d. ca. 1972 (?)

Active 1950s–1960s. Singer in the blues shouter style of Wynonie Harris and Big Joe Turner. Recorded in the 1950s for various labels including Apollo and Specialty. In the 1960s he turned to religion, becoming a minister in California and a gospel deejay on California and Mexico radio. He is thought to have died around 1972.

HENDERSON, DUKE “BIG”

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin

Discography: AMG; LSFP

HENDERSON, KATHERINE

b. 23 June 1909; St. Louis, MO

Niece of Eva Taylor; many of Henderson’s professional opportunities in stage and radio were made possible by her aunt. Active from childhood through the mid-1940s. Recorded in 1927 through 1930 in Clarence Williams’s sessions for Brunswick, QRS, and Velvet Tone. Her most notable side to historians is a vocal version of “West End Blues” with its composer King Joe Oliver on cornet (1928, QRS R7024).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

HENDERSON, MIKE (I)

b. 15 June 1944; Marshall, MO

Mike Henderson writes, sings, and plays guitar in the deep Delta blues tradition from his base in Oakland, California, where he is also a widely recognized painter, experimental filmmaker, and art educator at University of California–Davis. Has worked with Mike Bloomfield, Sunnyland Slim, and John Sinclair.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Discography

Oakland Blues (1998, Pathway CDs).
Only Time Will Tell (2001, Pathway CDs).

HENDERSON, MIKE (II)

b. 7 July 1951, Yazoo City, MS, or Independence, MO

Singer, slide guitarist, songwriter, active in Nashville, Tennessee. Since the 1990s he has led and recorded with the Bluebloods, in styles ranging from Delta blues, honky-tonk country music, and gospel. He has recorded for the RCA and Dead Reckoning labels.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin

Discography: AMG

HENDERSON, ROSA

b. Rosa Deschamps, 24 November 1896; Henderson, KY

d. 6 April 1968; New York City, NY

Vocalist. In 1918 she married and began touring with comedian Douglas “Slim” Henderson. She has recorded more than one hundred sides with artists including James Johnson and Fletcher Henderson. Pseudonyms include Flora Dale, Rosa Green, Mae Harris, and Bessie Williams.

ROBERT WEBB FRY II

Bibliography

Harris

Stewart-Baxter, Derrick. Ma Rainey and the Classic Blues Singers. New York: Stein and Day, 1970.

Discography: DGR

HENDRIX, JIMI

b. James Marshall Hendrix, 27 November 1942; Seattle, WA

d. 18 September 1970; London, England

James Marshall “Jimi” Hendrix was one of the most innovative and influential guitarists in history. Hendrix was renowned for his imaginative soundscapes and unique rock and pop stylings through such pieces as “Purple Haze,” “All Along the Watchtower,” “Foxy Lady,” “Hey Joe,” “The Wind Cries Mary” and the much-covered “Little Wing.” Though his affect on rock and blues musicians such as Eric Clapton, Stevie Ray Vaughan, Jeff Beck, Robin Trower, Yngwie Malmsteen, and Steve Vai is undeniable and profound, Hendrix also influenced R&B players such as Sly Stone and George Clinton and jazz icon Miles Davis. While he is frequently cited as the most important rock guitarist of all time, Hendrix was also a knowledgeable and convincing albeit iconoclastic blues musician as evidenced by his work on such recordings as his self-penned “Red House” and reinterpreted classics like “Killing Floor,” “Hoochie Coochie Man,” “Born Under a Bad Sign,” “Rock Me, Baby,” and “Come On.” In his lifetime Hendrix openly acknowledged the influence of Howlin’ Wolf, Muddy Waters, Albert King, B. B. King, Freddie King, Otis Rush, Buddy Guy, and Elmore James on his style.

Early Years

Jimi Hendrix was born on November 27, 1942, in Seattle, Washington, the first child of Al and Lucille Hendrix. He was originally named John Allen Hendrix and was called Johnny until his father renamed him James Marshall Hendrix in September 1946. Entirely self-taught Hendrix was drawn to music from an early age. In his youth he played the harmonica, violin, and piano, but ultimately settled on the guitar at around age twelve. Hendrix’s earliest influences included Buddy Holly, Eddie Cochran, Muddy Waters, Elmore James, and B. B. King. At seventeen Hendrix quit high school and joined the armed forces. After training in California he was assigned to the 101st Airborne Paratroopers and was stationed in Fort Campbell, Kentucky. Hendrix was a member of the elite “Screaming Eagles” squad and completed twenty-five successful jumps before suffering a broken ankle. He was honorably discharged soon after.

First Bands and Early Professional Years

While in high school Hendrix joined the Rocking Kings, a regional semipro group, and played his first gig at a National Guard armory. In the armed forces Hendrix met, befriended, and performed with fellow serviceman bassist Billy Cox in an R&B combo named the King Kasuals. Upon his discharge Hendrix adopted the itinerant lifestyle of a sideman, touring and occasionally recording with the Isley Brothers, B. B. King, Jackie Wilson, Sam Cooke, Little Richard, Ike and Tina Turner, King Curtis, Joey Dee, Wilson Pickett, and Curtis Knight. He settled in New York City in the mid-1960s. Hendrix briefly changed his professional name to Jimmy James in this period and formed a self-led group named Jimmy James and the Blue Flames. At this time he built a reputation and cult-like following in Greenwich Village with striking performances in local night clubs. There he experimented with feedback and electronic effects, perfected his famed stage antics, and developed an eclectic style that merged R&B, folk music, and free jazz with his rock and blues roots. Hendrix was encouraged and aided by Linda Keith, a girlfriend of Rolling Stone Keith Richards, who brought Chas Chandler to a performance at the Café Wha? in Greenwich Village. Chandler became Hendrix’s manager and arranged for him to relocate to London, England. There the two formed and launched the Jimi Hendrix Experience.

The Jimi Hendrix Experience

The Jimi Hendrix Experience was a trio formed in 1966 with Hendrix on guitar and lead vocals, Noel Redding on bass, and Mitch Mitchell on drums, and it was his most well-known group. The Experience made three official albums, toured internationally, and disbanded in 1969. Though the bulk of the Experience repertory consisted of original rock compositions by Hendrix, several blues pieces were recorded and performed live and in the studio. The most notable of these are his “Red House,” “Voodoo Child,” and the acoustic country-styled blues piece “Hear My Train a Comin’.” Also significant are Experience covers of Earl King’s “Come On,” Howlin’ Wolf’s “Killing Floor,” and Muddy Waters’s “Mannish Boy.”

Band of Gypsies

Band of Gypsies was Hendrix’s second group. Like his Experience, this band was a trio with Hendrix on guitar and vocals, longtime friend Billy Cox on bass, and Buddy Miles on drums and vocals. Formed in 1969 the trio recorded a number of blues pieces including “Once I Had a Woman,” an electric version of “Hear My Train a Comin’,” and Albert King’s “Born Under a Bad Sign.” Hendrix died just before midnight on September 17, 1970, in London, England, the result of drug-induced suffocation.

Instruments and Sound

Hendrix is closely associated with the Fender Stratocaster, an instrument also played by his blues heroes Buddy Guy and Otis Rush. He used right-handed models flipped over and restrung to accommodate his left-handed technique. Hendrix set new standards in sonics with his exploitation of the guitar’s timbres and manipulation of the vibrato bar. Unlike his forebears Hendrix preferred large, high-volume 100-watt Marshall amplifiers and 4×12 speaker cabinets.

HENDRIX, JIMI

A lifetime pioneer in electronic effects Hendrix embellished his sound with a Dallas-Arbiter Fuzz Face distortion unit, a Vox wah-wah pedal, a Mayer Octavia, and a Uni-Vox Uni-Vibe. On rare occasion he used a Gibson Les Paul or a Flying V for an alternate guitar tone.

Recorded Works

Are You Experienced? (1967, track issued in America on Reprise), Axis: Bold as Love (1968, Reprise), Electric Ladyland (1968, Reprise), Smash Hits (1969, Reprise), and Band of Gypsies (1970, Capitol) are the official releases issued during Hendrix's lifetime. A part of Hendrix's performance at the Woodstock Festival in 1969 was included on Woodstock (1970, Cotillion). Posthumous unofficial Hendrix albums and recorded live concerts include The Cry of Love, Rainbow Bridge, Isle of Wight, Hendrix: In the West, War Heroes, Loose Ends, Crash Landing, Midnight Landing, Nine to the Universe, The Jimi Hendrix Concerts, Johnny B. Goode, Band of Gypsies 2, Live at Winterland, Radio One, and the recently issued First Rays of the New Rising Sun and South Saturn Delta. Hendrix also appeared as a guest performer with Lonnie Youngblood, the Isley Brothers, Rosa Lee Brooks, Little Richard, King Curtis, Curtis Knight and the Squires, McGough & McGear, Eire Apparent, Buddy Miles, Lightnin' Rod, Stephen Stills, Love, and an unreleased album by the Ghetto Fighters. A posthumous all-blues Hendrix collection was issued in 1994 as Jimi Hendrix: Blues.

WOLF MARSHALL

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger and Sean Westergaard); Larkin; Santelli; Southern Murray, Charles Shaar. Crosstown Traffic: Jimi Hendrix and the Post-War Rock 'n' Roll Revolution. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1990.
Shapiro, Harry, and Caesar Glebbeek. Jimi Hendrix: Electric Gypsy. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1991.

Selected Transcriptions

Experience Hendrix. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard Corporation, 1998.

HENRY, CLARENCE "FROGMAN"

b. 19 March 1937; Algiers, LA

New Orleans R&B singer whose biggest hit, the 1956 novelty number "Ain't Got No Home," was improvised on the bandstand, Henry began his career playing piano and trombone with Bobby Mitchell from 1952 to 1955 before joining saxist Eddie Smith's band. Henry didn't have another hit until 1961 when he took an Allen Toussaint arrangement of "Don't Know Why But I Do" onto the charts, followed by similar success with "You Always Hurt the One You Love." He recorded with country instrumental stars Boots Randolph and Floyd Cramer and opened concerts for the Beatles in 1964 before settling back into the New Orleans club scene and a showcase set each year at the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSFP

HENRY, RICHARD "BIG BOY"

b. 1921; Beaufort, NC

d. 5 December 2004; Beaufort, NC

Learned guitar and busked in youth, but quit in the 1950s to fish and to preach. He returned to festivals and like venues in the 1980s, singing blues, gospel, and work songs. He was acutely aware of his songs' folkloric value.

ANDREW M. COHEN

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)

Discography: AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)

HENSLEY, WILLIAM P. "WASHBOARD WILLIE"

b. 24 July 1909; Phenix City, AL

d. 24 August 1991; Detroit, MI

Washboard, drums, percussion, vocals. Washboard Willie took up the washboard in 1940, moved to Detroit in 1948, and established himself as a popular multi-percussionist and bandleader, fronting his Super Suds of Rhythm from the early 1950s through the late 1970s. Hensley worked with Eddie Burns, Little Sonny, Calvin Frazier, and Boogie Woogie Red.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography

Whippin' That Board (1982, Barrelhouse Records; 1986, JSP Records, 1986).

Motor City Blues "Live" at the 1973 Ann Arbor Blues & Jazz Festival (1998, Alive/Total Energy).

Cherry Red Blues, Washboard Shuffle, Washboard Blues (JVB).

Detroit Blues (Blues Classics).

Natural Born Lover, Wee Baby Blues (Herculon).

HERALD/EMBER

Founded in New York City around 1951 by veteran music entrepreneur Fred Mendelsohn, the Herald label remained inactive until 1953 when Al Silver and Jack Braverman were taken on as partners, shortly before Mendelsohn sold his interest in the company to Jack Angel. Angel had formed the Ember label in early 1953 with Mercer Ellington, who similarly sold his interest in the label to Al Silver in the same deal. Herald issued older Chicago tracks by Little Walter and St. Louis Jimmy and Texas blues by Lightnin' Hopkins as well as scoring hits with Joe Morris's band, while Ember featured Rudy Greene and Cousin Leroy among the vocal groups. Both labels were wound up around 1964.

DAVID PENNY

Discography: McGrath

Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "Herald/Ember/Music Album Discographies" Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/herald.html> (accessed December 11, 2004).

Remembering the Roots of Soul #1: Heralding the Hits (2002, RPM CD SH248).

HERITAGE

British label. Founded in 1959 by Tony Standish, then assistant to the editor of Jazz Journal, Heritage produced twelve limited-edition LPs and an EP series that pioneered reissues of such artists as Blind Lemon Jefferson and Blind Blake. Contemporary artists included Arvella Gray and Buster Pickens (1960). Standish later revived the label in his native Australia.

HOWARD RYE

HERWIN (1943 AND BEFORE)

The record label of the Herwin Record Company of St. Louis, taking its name from proprietors Herbert and Edwin Schiele of the Artophone Company, phonograph makers and record distributors. Launched in late 1925, it was primarily a Race label, sold almost exclusively by mail order in the southern and midwestern states allegedly through advertising in journals circulated among farmers. It was first produced by the Starr Piano Company, then after 1927 by New York Recording Laboratories. The label's repertoire was derived from those companies' Gennett and Paramount labels; blues artists issued included Ardell Bragg, Charlie Patton, and Will Ezell. Releases ceased in mid-1929. The mailing list and remaining stocks were purchased by the Wisconsin Chair Co., Paramount's parent organization, in 1930, and the label then discontinued. The name was revived in 1967 by Bernard Klatzko for a series of significant reissue albums and was also used on five 78-rpm issues including Library of Congress field recordings by Bukka White and Son House and contemporary recordings by Skip James.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR; Sutton

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Godrich, John. "Herwin 92000 & 93000." Matrix 52 (1964): 3.

MacKenzie, John. "Herwin, Part One." 78 Quarterly no. 1 (1967): 19.

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

Wylar, Mike. "A Glimpse into the Past, 2: Herwin." Storyville 1, no. 2 (December 1965): 9.

HERWIN (1967 AND AFTER)

Trademark revived from 1967 through the mid-1970s by scholar/collector Bernard Klatzko for reissues on 78-rpm discs and 33-1/3 albums of pre-World War II musicians, including notable releases by Skip James, Charlie Patton, Gus Cannon, and Henry Thomas.

EDWARD KOMARA

HESITATION BLUES

Also known as "Hesitating Blues." A song (1915) by W. C. Handy. The folkloric roots of this piece have not been revealed. Its genesis may relate in some way to a craze for "hesitation" dances (hesitation waltz, hesitation tango) around the time the song was written. Handy's "Hesitating Blues" was registered for copyright on June 11, 1915. The very same day, the white

HESITATION BLUES

Louisville firm of Smythe and Middleton registered Billy Smythe's "Hesitation Blues," a remarkably similar piece. Ascribing this to sheer coincidence would strain credulity.

Although there have been some notable vocal recordings of the song, in its early years it was most popular on records as an instrumental. In this form it was recorded by Prince's Band (a Columbia Records in-house brass band), Handy's Orchestra of Memphis, and the brass band Lieutenant James Reese Europe brought back from service in World War I. However, by this time the "Hesitating/Hesitation" piece was quite popular as a song in black vaudeville. Bessie Smith was performing it by the end of 1915, as were a great many other black vaudeville artists. Particularly evocative is a reference to a May 1915 show staged for the benefit of the prisoners at the Indiana State Prison by J. C. Miles and Minstrels with Cole Bros. Shows (a variety troupe including circus acts). According to the report in the Indianapolis Freeman (June 3, 1916) among the best received acts were "... the band playing the 'Blues,' and when Mrs. Miles sang the 'Hesitating Blues' the riot commenced. A happy day for the boys within." In the 1920s, the song was recorded by several of the commercial blues singers, including Sara Martin and Eva Taylor.

In style, "Hesitating Blues," like many commercial blues of the pre-1920 period, combines elements of blues with ragtime in a fairly conventional framework. The song lacks the structural daring of "St. Louis Blues," being in major keys throughout, with a modulation from F to B-flat at the chorus. This chorus is not as strong as the verse, a curious structural imbalance not found in many successful popular songs. The verse, most likely the part of the song deriving from folk sources, also includes the best opportunities for pauses if the piece were used to accompany one of the "hesitation" dances. Not surprisingly, many later performers, especially from the folk tradition, omit Handy's chorus entirely. Many performers, such as Jelly Roll Morton, sang the piece with completely different lyrics from Handy's. This is particularly true in blues recordings, since the song's simple verse structure easily lends itself to the insertion of any of a number of common blues lyric tropes. In the jazz tradition, the song, in any form, has become less of a perennial than such other Handy numbers as "St. Louis Blues," "The Memphis Blues," and "Beale Street Blues." To the extent the song retained much vitality in the folk blues tradition, it was largely as a reversion to the original folk elements that Handy had used as his verse section in 1915.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

Bibliography

- Abbott, Lynn, and Doug Seroff. "They Cert'l'y Sound Good to Me": Sheet Music, Southern Vaudeville, and the Commercial Ascendancy of the Blues." American Music 14, no. 4 (1996): 402-454.
- Handy, W. C. Blues: An Anthology. New York: Boni and Boni, 1926.
- . Father of the Blues. New York: Macmillan, 1941.
- Rust, Brian. Jazz Records 1897-1942, 4th ed. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington House, 1978.

Selected Recordings

- Artists who recorded the song as "Hesitating Blues" included Prince's Band, Handy's Orchestra of Memphis, Jim Europe's 369th Infantry ("Hell Fighters") Band, Brown and Terry's Jazzola Boys, Esther Bigeou, Bobby Leecan, Jelly Roll Morton, Muggsy Spanier, Little Brother Montgomery, and Big Maybelle.
- Artists who have recorded the song under the "Hesitation Blues" title include the Victor Military Band, Al Bernard, Sara Martin, Eva Taylor, Leadbelly, the Reverend Gary Davis, Jesse Fuller, Wingy Manone, and Nat Gonella.

HESS, CHICAGO BOB

Singer and electric slide guitarist in postwar electric Chicago styles of blues and rock. Active mostly on the southeast coast, especially South Carolina. In 2001-2004 he led the house band at the House of Blues in Myrtle Beach.

HEATHER PINSON/EDWARD KOMARA

HI RECORDS

Hi was founded in Memphis in 1957 by Ray Harris with five partners including Joe Cuoghi, a co-owner of the local Poplar Tune record store. They established the label's Royal Recording Studio on South Lauderdale in Memphis, in the former Royal Theater. Its early hits were instrumentals performed by a group led by former Elvis Presley bassist Bill Black, or by saxophonist Ace Cannon. Willie Mitchell (1928-) was among the studio musicians from the late 1950s through the 1960s, and he eventually became the leader of the Hi house band. In 1970, the same year Cuoghi died, Mitchell bought Ray Harris's share of the ownership, and he became president of Hi Records, developed the 1970s Hi Records sound with heavy bass and drums and the Memphis Horn group, and with that sound he produced hit records with singers Al Green, Ann Peebles, and Syl Johnson. He left Hi in 1979, two years after the label was bought by Al Bennett. During the 1980s some Hi material, especially the Al Green albums, was reissued by Motown, and currently it is reissued on CD by EMI Special Products.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Guralnick, Peter. Sweet Soul Music: Rhythm and Blues and the Southern Dream of Freedom. New York: Harper and Row, 1986.

Official Memphis Hi Records website, <http://www.hirecords.com/home.htm> (accessed February 12, 2005).

Discography: McGrath

Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "Hi Records Album Discography." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/hi.html> (accessed February 13, 2005).

HICKS, CHARLIE

b. 11 March 1900; Lithonia, GA

d. 28 September 1963; Cairo, GA

Aka Charley Lincoln. Despite his manic laughter on records by Nellie Florence and his brother, Barbecue Bob, Charlie became a depressive alcoholic after Bob died in 1931. He was later jailed for a shooting and died in prison. He was probably taught his singular guitar style by Savannah (Dip) Weaver, Curley Weaver's mother. He began playing with Bob, and soon gained a contract of his own, but his songs were generally gloomy and he was dropped in 1930.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Harris; Santelli

Bastin, Bruce. Red River Blues. Chicago: University of Illinois Press, 1986.

Discography: DGR

HICKS, EDNA

b. Edna Landreaux, 14 October 1895; New Orleans, LA

d. 16 August 1925; Chicago, IL

Vocalist. Half-sister of Lizzie Miles, first married to Will Benbow. Hicks was touring with traveling shows by 1916. She married John Hicks ca. 1920 and recorded during 1923–1924, including "Down on the Levee Blues"/"Lonesome Woman Blues" (1924, Paramount 12204). She died from burns caused by a domestic accident.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

HICKS, ROBERT

(See Barbecue Bob)

HIDE AWAY

One of the most popular blues instrumentals of all time, the influential hit single "Hide Away" was recorded by Freddie King and released on Federal Records as the B-side of the song "I Love the Woman" in March 1961. An immediate success, the song charted for nineteen weeks and eventually reached #5 on the R&B charts. It also crossed over to the pop charts where it made it to #19. The song's impact was so great that it quickly became a mandatory staple of blues bands throughout the country, and it continues to be a standard for countless blues and rock musicians performing today.

King based "Hide Away" on a then-unrecorded instrumental that Chicago singer and slide guitarist Hound Dog Taylor played regularly throughout West and South Side Chicago clubs in the 1950s, including the popular Mel's Hide Away Lounge in the West Side. Known for his highly energetic and exuberant performances, Taylor created the catchy melody using his riveting slide style. Taylor's influential song, often referred to as "Taylor's Boogie," first inspired guitarist Magic Sam and then King to work out bandstand versions of their own.

In early 1961, just weeks before King's "Hide Away" was released, Magic Sam recorded "Do the Camel Walk" for Chief Records, an instrumental closely based on "Taylor's Boogie." Issued as the B-side of the single "Every Night About This Time," the song featured the main riff of "Hide Away," but employed a slightly slower tempo than King's song and featured a saxophone prominently to accent its bouncy rhythm and provide the main solo. "Hide Away" on the other hand, which was recorded the previous August, was an obvious showcase for King's guitar alone.

Named after Mel's Hide Away Lounge, King's song incorporated several familiar melodies and borrowed ideas into its many instrumental breaks, the first of which was taken from Jimmy McCracklin's 1957 hit single on Checker titled "The Walk." Another acknowledgment went to jazz, film, and television composer Henry Mancini, whose famous bass line from the theme to the 1950s television show “Peter Gunn” was featured. King also worked in a section that effectively used diminished chords that he learned from guitarist Robert Lockwood. These memorable sections added to the song’s appeal, but ultimately it was Taylor’s endearing melody over the chugging Chicago shuffle rhythm that made the song so successful.

HIDE AWAY

The tremendous popularity of “Hide Away” prompted King to record many more up-tempo blues instrumentals for Federal, several of which would become standards on their own. “San-Ho-Zay” made it to number 4 on the R&B charts several months after “Hide Away” was released, and “Sen-Sa-Shun,” “In the Open,” and “The Stumble” would also become instrumental bandstand favorites. The highly regarded all-instrumental album Let’s Hide Away and Dance Away with Freddy King was released in 1961 and contained many of King’s most popular early 1960s titles.

“Hide Away” has been recorded by many blues and rock musicians throughout the years, including Eric Clapton, Lonnie Brooks, Stevie Ray Vaughan, and Magic Slim.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- Fox, Darrin. “Patron Saint: Freddie King.” Guitar Player 38, no. 7 (August 2004): 52–53, 184–186.
Schuller, Mit. “Freddie King: 1934–1976.” Living Blues 31 (March/April 1977): 7–11.
Whitburn, Joel. Top R&B Singles: 1942–1999. Wisconsin: Record Research, Inc., 2000.

HIGGINS, CHARLES WILLIAM “CHUCK”

b. 17 April 1924; Gary, IN
d. 14 September 1999; Los Angeles, CA

One of the founders of the “honking” tenor sax style, he moved to Los Angeles in 1940, forming his first band after the war. He recorded prolifically during the 1950s for Combo, DooTone, Specialty, and other labels, but then became a music teacher and performed and recorded only sporadically thereafter.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

- AMG (Ron Wynn)
Dawson, Jim. “Chuck Higgins.” Goldmine 18, no. 4, issue 312 (July 10, 1992): 24, 26, 178.

LeBlanc, Eric. “Chuck Higgins.” Blues & Rhythm 150 (June 2000): 16–17.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Combo; DooTone/DooTo/Authentic; Specialty/Fidelity/Juke Box

HIGGINS, MONK

b. Milton Bland, 3 October 1936; Menifee, AR
d. 3 July 1986; Los Angeles, CA

Record producer. Earned a B.A. in music at Arkansas State University, with additional study at the Chicago School of Music. Broke into the record business as producer and arranger at the One-derful Records label. His notable work was as coproducer with Al Bell of Bobby Bland sessions in the 1970s and 1980s. He was also an excellent tenor saxophonist, playing on a hit solo single “Who Dun It” backed with “Ceatrix Did It” (St. Lawrence label).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Larkin
“Monk Higgins 1936–1986” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 72 (Fall 1986): 41.

HIGGS, GEORGE

b. 1930; near Speed, NC

Singer, harmonica player, and acoustic guitarist, in the Piedmont blues styles of Sonny Terry and Peg Leg Sam. He performs widely at festivals, concerts, and academic symposia. Among his honors is the 1993 North Carolina Folk Heritage Award from the North Carolina Arts Council.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Ainslie, Scott. “North Carolina Blues Part 2: George Higgs: The Songs I Sing Is a Feelin’ to Me.” Living Blues no. 108 (March/April 1993): 27–29.

HIGH WATER

Label begun in 1979 by Dr. David Evans and Memphis State University (later University of Memphis).

Specializes in the music of Memphis and north Mississippi including the Fieldstones with Wilroy Sanders, Jessie Mae Hemphill, and early recordings of Junior Kimbrough and R. L. Burnside.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Nilsson, Charley. "David Evans and High Water Records." Jefferson no. 91 (1990): 8–13.

HIGHTONE

Founded 1983 in Oakland, California. Although HighTone has never been a blues-only label, it has issued quite a few first-rate and influential blues, gospel and R&B recordings over the years, particularly of West Coast artists who might otherwise have been overlooked.

HighTone Records was founded as a way to sell Robert Cray's second album, Bad Influence, when larger labels didn't show any interest. Founders Bruce Bromberg, who had produced Cray's first album for Tomato Records and was putting the second together, and Larry Sloven were both veterans of the recording industry and were able to use their professional contacts to gain good distribution for their new label, helping ensure its success.

In addition to Cray, Joe Louis Walker found his first national audience with HighTone, as did both James Armstrong and Jessie Mae Hemphill. Blues veteran Phillip Walker had The Bottom of the Top, an out-of-print album from the early 1970s, reissued by HighTone in 1989 and saw his career surge. HighTone has also issued sides by the Jelly Roll Kings and Chicago pianist Henry Gray, and reissued numerous out-of-print recordings by artists such as Johnny Shines, David "Honey Boy" Edwards, Sleepy John Estes, and Mississippi Fred McDowell. There have also been albums by L.A. doo-wop veterans The Calvanes, and gospel troupes The Pattersonaires and The Spirit of Memphis Quartet.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

HighTone label website, <http://www.hightone.com/> (accessed December 11, 2004).

Discography

Robert Cray. Bad Influence (1983, HighTone 8001).
 Joe Louis Walker. The Gift (1988, HighTone 8008).
 Phillip Walker. Bottom of the Top (1989, HighTone 8020).

HIGHWAYS

The development of highways in the twentieth century increased American mobility and transformed the nation into a culture dominated by the automobile. With the development of highways, the southern region became more accessible to the rest of the country and moved out of its isolation. This newfound mobility contributed to the migratory shift of rural black people from southern states to northern cities. The experience of this movement found its way into the body of blues music.

History

The need for better roads in the United States became a growing political concern during the 1890s. Until this time, railroads had enjoyed a period of unprecedented growth for more than a half-century. Where roads and turnpikes had come into existence for the forty-year period following the Revolutionary War, that development stopped as railroads expanded in the nineteenth century. In the 1890s, changes occurred that led to the emergence of a highway system of paved road surfaces that would come to span the entire country.

The Populist movement in the late nineteenth century demanded that government provide farmers with improved roads in order to get their crops to markets. This Populist sentiment led to the creation of the Office of Road Inquiry under the direction of the Department of Agriculture in 1893. Three years later, the U.S. Postal Service began the free delivery of mail to all rural areas in the country.

At the close of the nineteenth century, America's unpaved road surfaces made for difficult travel. When roads became wet, driving a horse and wagon or an automobile was impossible. These conditions led Charles Bland, the mayor of Charlotte, North Carolina, to say in 1902 that "North Carolina was saved from the invasion of Sherman because the roads were so bad he could not get through." This comment came at the height of the Good Roads movement. Progressive politicians in the South and elsewhere spoke of the great need for paved road surfaces to a growing consensus.

While the Good Roads movement gained public support from state to state, the conditions of roads improved only marginally. By the time of World War I, the automobile industry had grown significantly to the point that there was a need for better highway surfaces to keep pace with the growing use of cars. In 1916, Congress passed legislation to fund a system of primary highways in the United States. Congress initially prohibited convict labor in the planning and construction of this federal highway system. When President Woodrow Wilson signed the bill into law, however, convict labor had been reinstated by its formidable lobby. Convicts had been a primary source of labor in building the levees and the railroads of the South and now they would be a primary labor source in building the highways.

HIGHWAYS

While the original purpose of the Good Roads movement had been to improve local roads for farmers, the larger need to promote interstate travel replaced this purpose. Progressive politicians such as Mayor Charles Bland of Charlotte saw that a new system of highways for the South would promote the social and ideological ties to other regions of the country. This larger need created a progressive mind-set of bureaucratic expertise that would drive the legislative and technical development of highways for the next fifty years in the United States. The Bureau of Public Roads enjoyed a broad agreement in public opinion and gained oversight of state construction of federal highways in 1921. This consensus continued until 1936, and during this period, rural America became more closely tied to urban America.

Beginning in 1936, the popular support of the Bureau of Public Roads began to diminish. While the federal system of highways succeeded in connecting rural areas to urban areas, promoting individual and family travel between states and improving commerce, it also brought about a new problem. Traffic congestion became a growing concern in the towns and cities that the federal highway system had connected, and the growing dependency on automobiles magnified this problem.

A new consensus emerged in 1956 with the emergence of the interstate highway system. This new system proposed to address the problem of urban access. Where federal highways had stopped at the city limits in the 1920s and the 1930s, the new interstate system would go through large and medium-sized urban areas. The idea was for automobiles to enter and exit cities with more ease. Automobiles, buses, and trucks came to challenge the place of the railroad as the primary source of ground transportation in America. This newly developed system of travel dominated the way of life in the nation and altered its social order.

Social Change

The rural South found that it was challenged by the social changes brought about by the early development of highways. The United States entered World War I the year after President Wilson signed the first road improvement legislation in seventy-five years. From the beginning of the war in 1914, immigration from Europe stopped, as did the flow of laborers into American factories. The need for men to fill uniforms in the army of the United States made for even fewer men to work in the factories in the northern region. This shortage of labor forced factory owners to look elsewhere for the manpower to keep the factories open.

African Americans in the South were recruited to come and work in the North. Not only were they promised jobs, but they were also promised better schools for their children and freedom from the reality of Jim Crow violence that threatened their daily life. As white Southern landowners saw the initial benefit of paved roads and highways that would carry their crops from farm to market, they also saw their source of labor beginning to leave.

The migration out of the South for many African Americans continued after the end of World War I. As better highways began to encourage interstate travel, even more people moved away from the grinding poverty of the sharecropper's existence. Spencer Crew notes that while many traveled out of the region by train, there were thousands who left in automobiles, buses, and trucks. When they arrived in their new cities, they often found that they were forced to live in segregated neighborhoods.

The migration from the South continued during the 1920s and 1930s as more people moved along America's new federal highways to a different life. The conditions of sharecropping changed after World War II. Whereas many rural blacks were restricted from leaving the land that they farmed because of an impossible debt load, they found in the late 1940s that their labor was no longer needed. Newly developed machines made farming far less labor intensive than it had been. Consequently, many blacks who had stayed and lived in the rural South were displaced from the land that they had worked for their white landowners for generations. During the late 1940s and early 1950s, another wave of migrants traveled along highways to a new life.

As more people relocated to cities in the South and outside the region, there was a growing political awareness that urban highways could be expanded and cities could be made more accessible to automobile, bus, and truck traffic. When the experts decided on routes for the new urban highways, they looked at the segregated areas of many cities where the black migrants of the rural South had settled. As more interstate highways cut into the hearts of American cities, they did so while displacing large segments of blacks from their neighborhoods.

Influence on Blues Music

The working conditions for most rural blacks in the South governed by Jim Crow laws were extremely harsh. As more paved roads were constructed in the farming areas of the region, landowners achieved easier access to their markets while sharecroppers saw a way to leave the difficult conditions of their lives. This migration continued over several decades. By 1960, close to 50 percent of black migrants living in the city of Chicago were from the Mississippi.

Many of these migrants from the Delta region of Mississippi followed along U.S. Highways 49, 51, and 61. Highway 49 ran from Jackson to Clarksdale in Mississippi. Highway 61 ran from New Orleans to Vicksburg, Memphis, St. Louis, and on to Minnesota. Highway 51 ran from New Orleans to Jackson, Memphis, and on to Illinois. Blues artists followed these routes, too. Paul Oliver notes that the blues artist sang about these highways from the direct experience of having traveled on them. Roosevelt Sykes recorded “Highway 61 Blues” in 1932; Joe Williams recorded “Highway 49” in 1935; and Curtis Jones recorded “Highway 51 Blues” in 1938.

Highways also took people and blues artists to juke joints that were established away from towns. Most juke joints were located off the highway and hidden from view. They were found by following directions provided by word of mouth. Revelers in these early juke joints drank, danced, argued, and often fought each other. They could become violent scenes as the hours wore on into the night. As dangerous as they could become, they offered blues artists a valuable venue for performance.

In the 1920s, record talent scout Henry C. Speir sometimes traveled from his Jackson record store to the Delta to see blues artists like Charlie Patton and Tommy Johnson by driving on various Mississippi two-lane highways. A decade later, John and Alan Lomax began traveling throughout the southern states with a five-hundred-pound recording machine installed in the trunk of their car, with the aim of recording blues, work chants, and other types of music by white and black Americans in oral cultures.

The dismal conditions of rural life in the South in the early twentieth century motivated many blacks to abandon their lives as sharecroppers. As many decided to leave, they had only a limited orientation as to how and where to go. Often there was only a dirt road leading away from the land they lived on and the sun in the sky for direction. Setting out on foot, migrants could hope for a ride on the back of a friendly wagon or truck going away from the farm. Their plan was to get to a numbered federal highway where they could look for the odd numbers leading north.

Blues artists like other black migrants knew that once they got to a federal highway, they had to get a bus ticket for the final part of the journey. Whereas they might be able to get a friendly ride deep in the rural world they were leaving, they could not often get a ride on a passing truck and might even be arrested for vagrancy. Once convicted, the migrant could be sentenced to work on a chain gang in building or maintaining the highway. State archives show thousands of men and women met this fate across the South.

Finding their way along the highway was only part of the challenge for the migrants. They also had to subsist as best they could and often the challenge was overwhelming. Blues lyrics note that this experience was a lonely one and that often friends, family, and lovers had been left behind. They had to live off the land and sleep in the open before they could get to a place that might be better than the place they had left.

Peter Guralnick notes that the metaphor of the highway is central to the blues artist. It represents that something vital is sought and gained by going down the road. It is also the process of losing what was once possessed. Blues music like all music is carried on the air and is as temporal an experience as moving down the highway from one place to another.

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

- Crew, Spencer R. Field to Factory: Afro-American Migration 1915–1940. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution, 1987.
- Ferris, William. Blues from the Delta. Garden City, NY: Anchor Press/Doubleday, 1978.
- Guralnick, Peter. Lost Highway: Journeys & Arrivals of American Musicians. Boston: David R. Godine, Publisher, 1979.
- Hott, Lawrence R., and Tom Lewis. Divided Highways: The Interstates and the Transformation of American Life (film). Washington, DC: WETA-TV, 1997.
- Jensen, Jamie. Road Trip USA: Cross-Country Adventures on America's Two-Lane Highways. Chico, CA: Moon Publications, 1996.
- Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Pantheon Books, 1993.
- Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning. New York: Horizon Press, 1960.
- Preston, Howard Lawrence. Dirt Roads to Dixie: Accessibility and Modernization in the South, 1885–1935. Knoxville: The University of Tennessee Press, 1991.
- Seely, Bruce E. Building the American Highway System: Engineers as Policy Makers. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1987.

HILL, BERTHA “CHIPPIE”

HILL, BERTHA “CHIPPIE”

b. 15 March 1905; Charleston, SC
d. 7 May 1950; New York

Singer and dancer. Hill moved to New York in 1919, appearing with Ethel Waters. She then toured with Ma Rainey and worked solo on the TOBA circuit in the early 1920s before moving to Chicago, where she performed and recorded blues with important musicians such as Louis Armstrong, Thomas A. Dorsey, and Tampa Red (1925–1929). Between 1930 and 1945, she worked only intermittently in music. In 1946, she recorded for Circle and resumed an active career until her death, caused by a hit-and-run driver. She is particularly associated with the classic song “Trouble in Mind” by Richard M. Jones.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

AMG (Scott Yanow); Chilton; Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern Blesh, Rudi. Shining Trumpets: A History of Jazz. New York: Knopf, 1946.
Harrison, Daphne Duval. Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1988.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP; Lord

HILL, JESSIE

b. 9 December 1932; New Orleans, LA
d. 17 September 1996; New Orleans, LA

Percussionist, song writer, and vocalist who wrote and recorded “Ooh Poo Pah Doo,” for Minit record producer Allen Toussaint in New Orleans. Performed with Professor Longhair, and recorded and wrote songs for Dr. John.

TOM MORGAN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)
Broven, John. Rhythm and Blues in New Orleans. Gretna, LA: Pelican, 1983.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

HILL, JOSEPH “BLIND JOE”

b. 1931; Pennsylvania
d. 17 November 1999; Los Angeles, CA

Blind from glaucoma. Hill was a one-man band (harmonica, guitar, drums) based in Akron, Ohio, for some years, then on the West Coast. While in Akron in the mid-1970s, he recorded his LP Boogie in the Dark for George Paulus’s Barrelhouse label (Barrelhouse BH-08).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn)
Thomas Schuller, “Akron’s One-Man Band: Blind Joe Hill.” Living Blues no. 30 (November/December 1976): 12–13.

Discography: AMG

HILL, KING SOLOMON

b. ca. 1897; McComb, MS
d. ca. 1949; Sibley, LA

Hill—real name probably Joe Holmes—was closely connected with Sam Collins and traveled with Blind Lemon Jefferson and Rambling Thomas. Extensive research by Gayle Dean Wardlow has suggested his nom-du-disque came from the King Solomon Hill community near Yellow Pine, Louisiana.

Holmes married Roberta Allums, the source of much information about him, in 1918, and they had one daughter. He wandered through Louisiana and Texas playing and in 1932 was invited with Ben Curry and Marshall Owens to record for Paramount, playing guitar with a cow bone.

Curiously, two of the songs each had two takes—one sung in a ferocious falsetto in Sam Collins’s style and the other in a normal voice. One coupling rediscovered in 2002 includes a tribute to Jefferson, “My Buddy Blind Papa Lemon,” while “Gone Dead Train” is a masterly travelogue listing the places he visited on the Southern and Illinois Central railroads and almost equaling Blind Willie McTell’s superb “Travelling Blues” on the same theme. After this one session, King Solomon Hill disappeared from records although Joe Holmes continued hoboing and playing for the rest of his life. He was ludicrously identified as Big Joe Williams in the 1960s but his real story is told in depth by Gayle Dean Wardlow.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Wardlow, Gayle Dean. “One Last Walk Up King Solomon Hill.” Blues Unlimited nos. 148/149 (Winter 1987): 8–12.

Discography: DGR

HILL, MICHAEL

b. 29 June 1952; New York City, NY

Guitarist, singer, composer. One of the few modern blues artists to devote the bulk of his attention to sociopolitical concerns, Bronx bluesman Hill stayed true to the core sensibilities of the music while expanding it with a hard-edged synthesis of Hendrix-influenced rock, topical tunes, and worldbeat rhythms.

After picking up the guitar at age eighteen, Hill formed a group with several siblings in 1973. He moved on to a series of significant sideman gigs, playing live and in the studio with Little Richard, Carla Thomas, Archie Bell, and others. In the mid-1980s he became involved with the Black Rock Coalition after working with Vernon Reid. He formed the seven-piece Bluesland in 1987 and then streamlined it into the trio Blues Mob as an outlet for his socially conscious original material. Hill made his recording debut with Sooner or Later on Flying Fish in 1992. He released a trio of albums on Alligator, beginning in 1994 with Bloodlines, with Reid as a guest. After his Alligator stint Hill added Larger Than Life in 2001 and the double-disc Electric Storyland Live in 2003 to his recording catalog.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin Gussow, Adam. "Interview with Michael Hill." Living Blues no. 173 (July/August 2004): 18–27.

Discography: AMGHILL, RAYMOND

b. 29 April 1933; Clarksdale, MS

d. 16 April 1996; Clarksdale, MS

Tenor saxophonist for Jackie Brenston and Ike Turner during the 1950s. Played the saxophone solo on the 1951 Brenston/Turner release "Rocket 88" (Chess 1458). Toured with Albert King in the late 1960s. He spent his last years in Clarksdale, taking up guitar.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

O'Neal, Jim. "Raymond Hill" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 137 (March/April 1997): 74–76.

Discography: LSPFHILL, ROSA LEE

b. 25 September 1910; Como, MS

d. 22 October 1968; Senatobia, MS

Like her father Sid Hemphill, Rosa Lee Hill was discovered by Lomax. She was a singer and guitarist strongly rooted in the Northern Mississippi model and highly rhythmic blues tradition. She only recorded three sides. She greatly influenced her niece Jessie Mae Hemphill.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

Mitchell, George. Blow My Blues Away. New York: Da Capo Press, 1984.

Discography: LSPF

The Blues Roll On (1965, Atlantic LP 1352).
Mississippi Delta Blues Vol. 1 (1994, Arhoolie CD 401).
Southern Journey Vol. 3 (1997, Rounder CD 1703).

HILL, Z. Z.

b. Arzell Hill, 24 September 1941; Naples, TX

d. 27 April 1984; Dallas, TX

Singer. Revitalized the sound and appeal of Southern soul music through a string of hit singles, including the anthemic "Down Home Blues." With his brother Matt frequently acting as his producer, Hill created a personalized and popular vision of Southern R&B that successfully overcame the dominance of disco on the airwaves and record charts. As Bobby "Blue" Bland declared, "Z. Z. kept us all working. Having 'Down Home Blues' be a hit really helped me and everybody else singing real R&B because it got people to pay attention to the music again." Birth year 1941 cited by Hill to Jim O'Neal in a 1982 Living Blues interview. September 1935 is cited by other researchers.

Hill was originally a member of the Spiritual Five gospel group but his love of blues was never far from the surface, even as he chose a performing name, the distinctive Z. Z. initials, because of its similarity to that of his hero B. B. King. After playing around Dallas for a few years, Hill recorded his debut single "You Were Wrong" in 1964 in California for his brother's label. It gained enough attention to get him signed by Kent Records, where he released a succession of singles, none of which achieved much commercial success.

Hill was successful on a series of record companies in the 1970s but his best work, including "Down Home Blues," came after he signed with Malaco in the 1980. Hill, who won the best soul vocalist W. C. Handy award in 1983 and 1984, was just beginning to take his fame and music to a higher level when he died of a heart attack.

HILL, Z. Z.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
O'Neal, Jim. "Living Blues Interview: Z. Z. Hill." Living Blues no. 53 (Summer/Autumn 1982): 17–15.

Discography: AMG

HILLERY, MABEL

b. 22 July 1929; Lagrange, GA
d. 24 April 1976; New York City, NY

First name sometimes spelled "Mable." Singer of traditional African American music including blues and ballads. During the 1960s she performed often at colleges and folk festivals, including tours with the Georgia Sea Island Singers. In the 1970s she made her base in New York City.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Southern

Discography: LSFP

HINTON, ALGIA MAE

b. 29 August 1929; Johnston County, NC

Piedmont guitarist of blues and dances. Through 1978 she performed mostly within her local community, but since then she has appeared in occasional festivals, and she was filmed for Alan Lomax's American Roots film series.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

MacDonald, Mary Anne. "North Carolina Blues. Part 2: Algia Mae Hinton: Keep Us Dancing and Kept Us Singing." Living Blues no. 108 (March/April 1993): 25–26.

HINTON, EDWARD CRAIG "EDDIE"

b. 15 June 1944; Jacksonville, FL
d. 28 July 1995; Birmingham, AL

Vocalist and guitarist whose style blended gospel-tinged R&B and country. Hinton contributed to hits by several artists, among them Percy Sledge, Joe Tex, and Boz Scaggs. He also cut four solo albums, among them the evocative Letters from Mississippi (1988, Almathea; reissued on Mobile Fidelity 749).

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Larkin
Nelson, David. "Eddie Hinton" [obituary with solo album discography]. Living Blues no. 123 (September/October 1995): 55–56.

HISPANIC INFLUENCES ON THE BLUES

In at least two areas, southern Texas and New Orleans, the influences of Hispanic music cultures on African American blues have been apparent. Despite barriers of ethnicity, race, and language, musicians in these regions have selectively adopted and syncretized performance ideas and musical styles. In the Texas–Mexico border region, down-home blues guitarists were influenced by the lifestyle of Mexican street singers and their chordophonic musical traditions. And in New Orleans, Cuban rhythms particularly affected a school of blues pianists who developed the New Orleans "sound" of rhythm and blues.

Texas

Historical conditions in Texas and Mexico have been conducive to the development of musical syncretisms between African Americans and Hispanics. In those areas where Spain utilized large numbers of slaves, especially the West Indies and northern portions of South America, social and cultural integration among blacks and Spanish colonists occurred at a much faster pace than it did in the British colonies. In the North American southwest, Estevanico, a free black Spaniard, played a key role in the exploration of New Mexico and Arizona. The unplanned growth of a new racial stock, the mestizo, in the huge area of Nueva España was the result of the lack of miscegenetic stigma against Spanish, Indian, and African mixing.

Sympathetic interracial attitudes have also been reflected in the history of border relations. The border as a symbol of economic, social, and cultural freedom for African Americans goes back to the 1830s when substantial numbers of slaves fled to Mexico, often assisted by Mexicans. In the 1848 Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, Mexico made a vain attempt to have slavery permanently abolished in the territories it was forced to cede to the United States.

In the twentieth century, the social and miscegenetic attitudes of Mexicans and blacks resulted in a familiarity that found expression in the blues lyrics (travel to Mexico, Mexican partners, the status of Mexicans) of African American recording artists such as Texas Alexander, Blind Lemon Jefferson, Six Cylinder Smith, Memphis Slim, Charlie Segar, Big Bill Broonzy, and Frankie Lee Simms. The life histories of African American itinerant performers also reveal the acculturative conditions of the Texas–Mexico region. For a time vaudeville blues singer Ma Rainey lived in Mexico. Texas blues singer and jack-of-all-trades Lefty Wing Gordon reportedly often crossed the border. Robert Lee McCoy, aka “Robert Nighthawk,” took his band on tour as far as Mexico. Alabama native Johnny Watson, who would gain later fame on Chicago’s Maxwell Street as “Daddy Stovepipe,” went to Mexico in 1937 and played in towns and cities along the Gulf coast. In the 1960s Houston blues pianist Elmore Nixon frequently enjoyed playing before Mexican audiences across the border.

Such citations from social history, blues lyrics, and the lives of black entertainers point to a significant and largely unwritten history of Mexican and African American interaction. Whenever and wherever such interactions have taken place, African Americans have been confronted with a vigorous chordophonic tradition. Since the introduction of the vihuela de mano (the antecedent of the modern guitar) by the conquistadores, all classes in Mexican society have exhibited a widespread use of this and related chordophones. Américo Paredes has shown that unlike the a cappella traditions of so much Anglo-American ballad singing, the late eighteenth, nineteenth, and early twentieth centuries along the border were a time when singing was usually accompanied by the guitar.

African Americans in Texas came into contact with this tradition of guitar accompaniment through an obvious occupational role model for musicians—the wandering Mexican street singer, the itinerant trovador, cantador, ciego, or guitarerro. As the traditional descendants of Spanish medieval and renaissance juglares and trovadores, Mexican trovadores populares or cantadores were solitary singers who accompanied themselves on finger-style guitar in public places for monetary donations. Often, these folk professionals were engaged in the creation and propagation of Mexican ballads or corridos in oral or broadside form.

Descriptions of the roving lifestyle of Mexican street singers approximate accounts of their African American counterparts. Twentieth-century references to blind entertainers is particularly relevant to blues. The many itinerant blind African American street singing blues musicians who have been interviewed, cited by discographers, and discussed by such knowledgeable informants as Angeline Johnson, wife of the legendary Blind Willie Johnson, are often accounted for by the explanation that stigmatized black males in the postbellum South had few economic options other than becoming preachers or street singing entertainers and bluesmen. The severe social and economic oppression of these stigmatized persons lends itself to such an argument, but it does not explain the historical existence of such occupational role models. From the sketches of the Spanish painter Francisco Goya in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries to the testimonies of fieldworkers in folklore in the twentieth, it is evident that many peripatetic guitar-playing cantadores have been afflicted with the stigma of blindness and might, therefore, have provided such a role model. Mexican sources reveal the singing of nineteenth-century corridos by blind minstrels or ciegos. Similarly, Alan Lomax in the 1930s collected border ballads in Brownsville, Texas, from José Suarez, the blind town minstrel. Blind Mexican American street musicians in the Southwest have also been cited by Manuel Peña, Alice Corbin, and Aurora Lucero-White.

Given the proximity of such cultural models, it might be argued that language has acted as a barrier between Black and Mexican. The aural language of music, however, often strikes a common cultural note. Thus, the well-known virtuosity of many Mexican guitarists has often aroused the interest of black musicians. One scholar has documented Lightnin’ Hopkins’s admiration for the technical skills of Mexican guitarists. In a now legendary incident, an ambivalent sense of respect for, and fear of, expertise may have prompted Robert Johnson to hide his hands during recorded performances, from Mexican guitarists, at his ARC sessions in San Antonio, by facing a room corner.

John “Knocky” Parker, a European-American musician who played with Blind Lemon Jefferson, has remembered the prevalence of guitars in Texas and a pervasive “Spanish” melodic influence that affected African American style and repertoire. The paucity of commercially recorded evidence for such a syncretistic development may be accounted for in part by the actions of on-location recordists from commercial record companies who generally discouraged blacks and Mexicans from playing and singing each other’s music, since they had ready access to the “real thing.” In actual social conditions, however, field researchers have ascertained that blues musicians who encountered Mexican guitarists had no qualms about playing Mexican music. In 1962 McCormick taped Texas blacks playing guitars and singing in Spanish in Nuevo Laredo, Mexico. David Evans’s complete repertoire analysis of Crystal Springs, Mississippi, blues singer Mott Willis reveals a number of waltzes, including one entitled “The Mexican Waltz,” which Willis “learned in Mexico on one of his trips with a minstrel show” from blues musician Tampa Red.

With regards to African American musicians who adopted Mexican musical styles, the performances of wayfaring Blind Lemon Jefferson, who grew up on the Mexicia Road of Wortham, Texas, who had affinities for Mexican “browns,” and whose anomalous guitar style has been an inspiration to countless musicians, exhibit such influence. Jefferson’s music and that of Mexican cantadores shared many stylistic likenesses: The guitar was used in a complex fashion as an accompanying rhythmic device but also as a complementary and independent voice; finger-style guitar was employed; instrumental introductions and instrumental breaks between sung stanzas were common; breaks often began with high treble notes, sometimes in harmony, and then descended a scale into final, full chord strums, struck several times and often punctuated with rapid attacks on the bass strings.

More immediate musical links with Mexican players may be heard in the music of Blind Lemon Jefferson’s partner, Huddie Ledbetter, aka “Leadbelly,” who migrated to Dallas from Louisiana, met Jefferson in 1912, and played regularly with him for five years. A talented singer and multi-instrumentalist (guitar, mandolin, accordion, and harmonica), at some point Leadbelly encountered Mexican made bajo sextos and twelve-string guitars, instruments originally from central Mexico that at the time were emerging, along with the accordion, as core instruments of border conjuntos. As researchers have noted, Leadbelly’s twelve-string guitar techniques developed from the bass figures of barrelhouse pianists and Mexican twelve-string guitarists. A comparison of Leadbelly’s twelve-string bass runs with those of accomplished Mexican-American singer-musician Lydia Mendoza reveals startling similarities in rhythms and marcato attack; for example, consider Lydia Mendoza’s “El Lirio” (the lily) (1934) and Leadbelly’s rendition of “Sweet Jenny Lee” (1948). Given the popularity of waltz rhythm among cantadores, it is noteworthy that one of the first songs Leadbelly adapted to the twelve-string guitar was “Irene,” a waltz he learned from his uncle Bob Ledbetter.

New Orleans

Hispanic influences on African American blues musicians in New Orleans are intricately intermingled in a cosmopolitan musical heritage that features a complex chordophone other than the guitar—the piano. Interestingly this unique Hispanic–African American blues heritage only reached the attention of international music critics in 1970, through the “rediscovery” of Henry Roeland Byrd (1918–1980), better known as “Professor Longhair,” by British rhythm and blues fans who were familiar with his few early recordings. The ensuing international publicity among blues enthusiasts along with a triumphant appearance at the 1971 New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival sparked a resurgence of Professor Longhair’s career and a popularity that continued to escalate until his death in 1980. A musician’s musician, Longhair was the local mentor of many postwar blues, rhythm and blues, and rock ‘n’ roll artists including Huey Smith, Dave Bartholomew, Fats Domino, Alan Toussaint, James Booker, and Mac Rebennack. It was Professor Longhair’s use of Hispanic, African-Cuban sounds that make his piano blues a stylistic standout. One does not have to be an ethnomusicologist to sense the Latin rhythms of his music. Byrd himself described his style as incorporating “rumba, mambo, and Calypso.” One analyst has interpreted his piano playing as “a superimposition of very fast triplets on a syncopated 8/8 rumba beat.” When asked where he obtained this Latin influence, Longhair often attributed it to his stint with the Civilian Conservation Corps in 1937, a time when he “played with a lot of West Indians, Puerto Ricans, Jamaicans, Spanish boys, Hungarians.” He also maintained that he heard Latin rhythms on Mexican radio stations while working with the Corps in Brownsville, Texas. Others maintain that his bass runs are direct adoptions from the Cuban son, an antiphonal musical form that developed during the second decade of the twentieth century.

The Latin inflections that Professor Longhair melded with blues were in turn based on the remarkable rhythmic syncretisms of Spanish and African music cultures that evolved in Cuba; such African-Cuban rhythms have been evident in New Orleans since the nineteenth century, through both direct contact and through the Cuban-influenced music of Mexican and other Latin American immigrants and visitors. The constant beat in virtually all traditional Cuban polyrhythmic dance forms is voiced by clave, a 3–2, sometimes 2–3 pattern, played over two measures. Reflecting these patterns, the habanera was the initial African-Cuban dance rhythm to have an impact on New Orleans music. Scholars have speculated that this rhythm reached there via Cuban immigrants, New Orleans musicians who joined circus work crews that toured Cuba, and/or by New Orleans musicians who took part in the Spanish-American War (1898).

Lidia Mendoza ca. 1936. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Sheet music evidence also attests to a Mexican link. Habanera rhythm attained great popularity in Mexico by the 1870s and danzas employing it were played in New Orleans by a succession of Mexican marching bands and orquestas that toured the city beginning in 1884. These ensembles continuously infused New Orleans with various kinds of Hispanic music and resulted in the extensive publication of sheet music, a development that was later bolstered by a national blues craze begun with W. C. Handy's publication of "Memphis Blues" in 1912 and "St. Louis Blues" in 1914, both of which employed habanera rhythms, a result of Handy's tours in the island republic.

Professor Longhair's best known antecedent-contemporary pianist who used Latin rhythms was Ferdinand "Jelly Roll" Morton (1890–1941), the multitalented New Orleans composer-musician and self-proclaimed "inventor of jazz," whose work often reflected what he described as the "Spanish tinge" of New Orleans music. Interestingly, Morton, who took guitar lessons from "a Spanish gentleman in the neighborhood" as a youngster, was familiar enough with the blues idiom at the beginning of the century to compose a regional piece, "New Orleans Blues" (1902), which syncretized a blues progression with a Latin beat. While Morton's fame generally rests on his jazz and ragtime compositions, he went on to compose and record many other blues including "Jungle Blues," "Winin' Boy Blues," "Buddy Bolden's Blues," "Mamie's Blues," "Michigan Water Blues," "Cannon Ball Blues," "Futuristic Blues," and "Tom Cat Blues," many of which exhibit the "Spanish tinge." Although he was certainly one of the most sophisticated, musically trained New Orleans ragtime piano "professors," Morton's complex style also reflected his close association with New Orleans blues musicians of the barrelhouse circuit and the Latin musical traditions of his home city.

The Crescent City blues sound and its derivatives are so much a part of the international blues scene today that it is easy to lose sight of their origins. Syncretized blues with Latin beats have been played by Louisiana blues musicians such as Guitar Gable ("Guitar Rhumbo"), Lazy Lester ("Blowin' a Rhumba"), and Edgar Blanchard ("Blues Cha-Cha") as a matter of course, and it has become commonplace for blues pianists and blues bands outside the New Orleans orbit to play blues rumbas. Thus, blues pianists such as Detroit's Vernon Harrison (aka Boogie Woogie Red) and Texan-Californian Lloyd Glenn have performed their own rumbas ("Red's Rhumba," "Conga Rhumba"), and Mississippi's great Albert King authoritatively played blues such as "I Get Evil," and "Crosscut Saw" with rumba rhythms.

Moreover, the simultaneous development of other Hispanic–African American musical fusions in this century such as Cubop, the Hispanic soul blues of Ray Charles ("What'd I Say," "Mary Ann"), salsa, and the bugalú might appear to muddy the waters of regional vernacular song. Yet what is so remarkable about Spanish-tinged New Orleans blues, however, is its sense of place. From the title of Jelly Roll Morton's "New Orleans Blues" to Professor Longhair's "Mardi Gras in New Orleans" and "Big Chief," to Dave Bartholomew's "Carnival Day" and the Hawketts's "Mardi Gras Mambo," it is clear that New Orleans blues musicians have often been inclined to use the Spanish tinge when aurally identifying their home city.

Clearly the unique history, particular ethnic mix and geographic position of New Orleans predisposed it to continuous infusions of Latin and African cultural ideas. A gateway to the Caribbean and Latin America where barrelhouse and honky-tonk blues pianists coexisted with their jazz and ragtime counterparts, New Orleans' cosmopolitan milieu nurtured cultural distinctiveness that emerged in musical styles—one of these was a form of blues with the rhythmic underlay of clave. And this musical tradition is a time-honored one.

Conclusion

While this discussion has emphasized the influences of Hispanic music-cultures on African American blues musicians in Texas and New Orleans, the other sides of these coins remain unexplored. To what extent did the music-cultures of African American blues musicians affect their Hispanic counterparts? Pioneer mariachi accordionist Narciso Martinez recorded blues for Victor and Bluebird in the 1930s, and one student of Cuban vernacular music has maintained that blues and "blues licks" have always been evident in Cuban bands. Thus a total picture of the musical syncretisms created by African American blues musicians and Hispanic musicians remains far off.

PETER NARVÁEZ

References

- Arnold, Charles A. The Folklore, Manners, and Customs of the Mexicans in San Antonio, Texas; reprinted 1971. San Francisco: R and E Research Associates for University of Texas.
- Broven, John. Walking to New Orleans: The Story of New Orleans Rhythm & Blues. Bexhill-on-Sea, East Sussex: Flyright, 1977.
- Campa, Arthur L. Spanish Folksong in the Southwest. Albuquerque: University of New Mexico Press, 1933.

- Charters, Samuel. Recorded commentary for Blind Willie Johnson (1957, Folkways F63585).
- Corbin, Alice. Foreword. In Spanish Folk Songs of New Mexico, by Mary R. Van Stone. Chicago: n.p., 1926.
- Cowley, John. "L'Année Passée: Selected Repertoire in English-Speaking West Indian Music, 1900–1960." Keskidee: A Journal of Black Musical Traditions 3 (1993): 2–42.
- Diáz del Castillo, Bernal. The Conquest of New Spain. Baltimore, MD: Penguin, 1963.
- Driggs, Frank. Jacket notes for Robert Johnson: King of the Delta Blues Singers (1962, Columbia LP CL 1654).
- Evans, David. Big Road Blues: Tradition and Creativity in the Folk Blues. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1985.
- Gage, Thomas. Travels in the New World. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1958.
- Grovenar, Alan. Meeting the Blues. Dallas: Taylor Publishing, 1988.
- Hague, Eleanor. Spanish-American Folk-Songs. Lancaster, PA: American Folk-Lore Society, 1917.
- Hannusch, Jeff. I Hear You Knockin': The Sound of New Orleans Rhythm and Blues. Ville Platte, LA: Swallow Publications, 1985.
- Jones, Tad. "Living Blues Interview: Professor Longhair." Living Blues 26 (1976): 16–21, 24–9.
- Lomax, Alan. Mister Jelly Roll: The Fortunes of Jelly Roll Morton, New Orleans Creole and Inventor of Jazz; reprinted 1993. New York: Pantheon.
- Lomax, Alan, et al. Fourteen Traditional Spanish Songs from Texas. Washington, DC: Pan American Union, Music Division, 1942.
- Lomax, John A., and Alan Lomax. Negro Folk Songs as Sung by Lead Belly. New York: Macmillan, 1936.
- Lucero-White, Aurora. Literary Folklore of the Hispanic Southwest. San Antonio, TX: Naylor, 1953.
- Lummis, Charles F. "New Mexican Folk-Songs." Cosmopolitan 13 (1892): 720–729.
- McWilliams, Carey. North from Mexico: The Spanish-Speaking People of the United States. New York: Greenwood, 1968.
- Mendoza, Vincente T. El Romance Espanol y el Corrido Mexicano. Mexico: Universidad Nacional Autonoma, 1939.
- Miller, Dale. "Lydia Mendoza: The Lark of the Border." Guitar Player 22, no. 8 (1988): 38–41.
- Mullen, Patrick B. "A Negro Street Performer: Tradition and Innovation." Western Folklore 29 (1970): 91–103.
- Narváez, Peter. "Living Blues Journal: The Paradoxical Aesthetics of the Blues Revival." In Transforming Tradition: Folk Music Revivals Examined, edited by Neil V. Rosenberg, pp. 241–257. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.
- . "The Influences of Hispanic Music Cultures on African-American Blues Musicians." Black Music Research Journal 14 (1994): 203–24.
- Odum, Howard W. Rainbow Round My Shoulder. n.p.: Grosset and Dunlap, 1928.
- Otto, John Solomon, and Augustus M. Burns. "John 'Knocky' Parker—A Case Study of White and Black Musical Interaction." JEMF Quarterly 10, no. 1 (1974): 23–26.
- Palmer, Robert. "Professor Longhair: Deep South Piano and the Barrelhouse Blues." In Bluesland: Portraits of Twelve Major American Blues Masters, edited by Pete Welding and Toby Byron, pp. 158–175. New York: Dutton, 1991.
- Paredes, Américo. With His Pistol in His Hand. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1958.
- Peña, Manuel. The Texas–Mexican Conjunto: History of a Working-Class Music. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1985.
- Robb, J. D. Jacket notes for Spanish–Mexican Folk Music of New Mexico (1952, Folkways LP FE 4426).
- Roberts, John Storm. The Latin Tinge: The Impact of Latin American Music on the United States. Tivoli, NY: Original Music, 1985.
- Simmons, Merle E. The Mexican Corrido as a Source for Interpretive Study of Modern Mexico. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1957.
- Stewart, Jack. "The Mexican Band Legend: Myth, Reality, and Musical Impact; A Preliminary Investigation." Jazz Archivist: A Newsletter of the William Ransom Hogan Jazz Archive 6, no. 2 (1991): 1–14.
- Strachwitz, Chris. Jacket notes for Texas–Mexican Border Music. Vols. 2 and 3 (1974, Folklyric LPs 9004 and 9005).
- Strachwitz, Chris, and James Nicolopolulos. Lydia Mendoza: A Family Autobiography. Houston, TX: Arte Public Press, 1993.
- Tannenbaum, Frank. Mexico: The Struggle for Peace and Bread. New York: Knopf, 1968.
- Taylor, Paul S. An American–Mexican Frontier. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1934.
- Wolfe, Charles, and Kip Lornell. The Life and Legend of Leadbelly. New York: HarperCollins, 1992.

Discography

- Alexander, Texas. "Section Gang Blues" (1927, OKeh 8498).
- Bartholomew, Dave. "Carnival Day" (1950, Imperial 5064).
- Blanchard, Edgar. "Blues Cha-Cha. Troubles, Troubles: New Orleans Blues from the Vaults of Ric & Ron" (1988, Rounder CD 2080; recorded 1959).
- Boogie Woogie Red (Vernon Harrison). "Red's Rhumba" (on Blue Ivory; released 1977, reissued 1991, Blind Pig CD BP74591).
- Bronzy, Big Bill. "Key to the Highway" (1941, OKeh 06242).
- Gillum, Jazz. "Key to the Highway" (1940, Bluebird B8529).
- Glenn, Lloyd. "Conga Rhumba, Old Time Shuffle" (1990, Black & Blue CD 59.077 2).
- Guitar Gable (Gabriel Perrodin). "Guitar Rhumbo" (1956, Excello 2094).
- The Hawketts. [1954]. "Mardi Gras Mambo, Mardi Gras in New Orleans." (reissued 1987, Mardi Gras Records CD MG1001).
- Jefferson, Blind Lemon. "Dry Southern Blues" (1926, Paramount 12347).
- King, Albert. "I Get Evil" (1961, Bobbin 135).
- . "Crosscut Saw" (1966, Stax 201).
- Lazy Lester (Leslie Johnson). "Blowin' a Rhumba. Lazy Lester Rides Again" (1987, King Snake LP, KS 007).
- Leadbelly (Huddie Ledbetter). "Sweet Jenny Lee, Leadbelly's Last Sessions" (1953, Folkways LP FA 2942 D).
- Memphis Slim (Peter Chatman). "Empty Room Blues" (1940, Bluebird B8615).
- Mendoza, Lydia. [1934]. "El Lirio. Lydia Mendoza: Mal Hombre" (reissued 1992, Arhoolie CD 7002).
- Professor Longhair (Henry Roland Byrd). [1949]. "Mardi Gras in New Orleans." (reissued 1987, Mardi Gras Records CD, MG1001).
- . [1954]. "Tipitina, Mardi Gras in New Orleans: Professor Longhair" (reissued 1990, Nighthawk Records CD, NHCD-108).

- . [1964]. “Big Chief, Pt. 1, Pt. 2, Mardi Gras in New Orleans” (reissued 1987, Mardi Gras Records CD, MG1001).
- . [1974]. “Rum and Coke, Rock ‘n’ Roll Gumbo” (reissued 1985, Dancing Cat Records LP, DC-3006).
- Segar, Charlie. “Key to the Highway” (1940, Vocalion 05441).
- Simms, Frankie Lee. “Rhumba My Boogie” (1954, Specialty 487).
- Smith, Six Cylinder. “Oh Oh Lonesome Blues” (1930, Paramount 12968).

HISTORIOGRAPHY

Early History

The first significant collection of black song was edited by William Francis Allen, Charles Pickard Ware, and Lucy McKim Garrison in 1867 (Slave Songs of the United States, New York: A. Simpson, 1867). James Trotter’s Music and Some Highly Musical People: Sketches of the Lives of Remarkable Musicians of the Colored Race (Boston and New York: Lee and Shepard; Charles Dillingham, 1878) was another pioneering work. But the first blues verses appeared in Will Thomas’s Some Current Folk-Songs of the Negro (Austin, TX: Folklore Society of America, 1912). The 1920s saw four different perspectives emerge to focus on the blues as a body of song: academic analysis of folk songs, literary creations, songbooks, and commercial advertisements.

In the 1920s, the then-newly established press at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill launched a pioneering series of folklore studies that included two books by Howard W. Odum and Guy B. Johnson, The Negro and His Songs (1925) and Negro Workaday Songs (1926). The latter work especially emphasized blues and commercial recordings, an unusual perspective for folklorists of the time. Simultaneously, from Harvard University Press came Dorothy Scarborough’s On the Trail of Negro Folk-Songs (1925) and Newman Ivey White’s excellent American Negro Folk-Songs (1928).

W. C. Handy’s Blues: An Anthology (Boni and Liveright, 1926) was the first collection of blues songs issued by a trade publisher to the general public. The same year, composers Porter Grainger and Bob Ricketts issued their How to Play and Sing the Blues Like the Phonograph and Stage Artists (New York: Jack Mills, 1926). A year later, Paramount Records, who had been issuing “race” records since 1922, released The Paramount Book of Blues (Port Washington, WI: New York Recording Laboratories, 1927). It not only contained thirty songs with music, but it also carried six portraits of Paramount artists like Ma Rainey and Blind Lemon Jefferson, along with brief biographies.

Harlem Renaissance writers like Langston Hughes (Weary Blues, New York: Knopf, 1926), Claude McKay (Banjo, New York: Harper, 1929), and Sterling Brown (see “Ma Rainey” in Southern Road, New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1932) wove strands of blues inspiration through their works, while the white sociologist Howard W. Odum penned a trilogy of blues-influenced novels about a character he dubbed “Black Ulysses” (see, for example, his Rainbow Round My Shoulder, Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1928).

Finally, “race” record advertisements in African American newspapers like the Chicago Defender provide a graphic history of the blues recording industry, its releases, and its artists. These colorful and often degrading advertisements appeared in many papers throughout the 1920s and are reproduced in many blues histories.

1933–1942

In 1933, Louis W. Chappell published his prodigious study of the folklore hero John Henry (John Henry: A Folk-Lore Study, Jena: Frommannsche Verlag Walter Biedermann). There had been an earlier study by Guy B. Johnson (John Henry: Tracking Down a Negro Legend, Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1929), but the scholarly presses were relatively silent during the 1930s. Several parallel developments compel our attention, however.

With funds from the Council of Learned Societies and ties to both the Macmillan Company and the Library of Congress, in June 1933, John Lomax and his young son Alan began the first of their famous African American song-collecting trips through the South. Their labors have been tallied in many Library of Congress publications—see, for example, Checklist of Recorded Songs in the English Language in the Archive of American Folk Song to July, 1940. (Washington, DC: Library of Congress Music Division, 1942). Countless songs have been issued, and more are still being released. In 1929, Zora Neale Hurston wrote of her folklore collecting, but the work wasn’t released until 1935 (Mules and Men, Philadelphia: Lippincott). Thus, she was an experienced field worker when she studied anthropology under Franz Boas and went back into the field, occasionally joining Alan Lomax as she did in Florida in 1935.

The Lomax's American Ballads and Folk Songs (New York: Macmillan, 1934) contained a sizable component of African American material, but in 1936, they released Negro Folk Songs as Sung by Lead Belly (New York: Macmillan), the first biography of a blues singer.

These were the years of the New Deal and change was in the air. The Popular Front may have kindled the spark that ignited the first folk song revival in the late 1930s, but collector of African American songs Lawrence Gellert had been publishing selections from his field work in the cultural journal of the Communist Party of the United States, New Masses, since 1930. By 1936, he was able to publish Negro Songs of Protest (New York: American Music League), and he released a companion volume several years later, titled Me and My Captain (Chain Gangs) (New York: Hours Press, 1939). By this time, Leftist interest in "indigenous" African American music had gained significant momentum, and John Hammond produced his first "From Spirituals to Swing" concert under the sponsorship of the New Masses. The legendary Robert Johnson was scheduled to play at this venue, and his name appears in the New Masses advertisements for the concert. Hammond soon discovered that Johnson had already died, and Big Bill Broonzy replaced him.

Simultaneously with the Leftist interest in folk song came the interest of serious jazz scholars, typified by Fredric Ramsey and Charles Edward Smith's collection of essays, Jazzmen (New York: Harcourt, Brace, 1939) with its essay on blues by E. Simms Campbell.

John W. Work, in 1940, released his American Negro Songs and Spirituals (New York: Crown, 1940) and the eve of World War II saw the publication of W. C. Handy's autobiography, Father of the Blues (New York: Macmillan, 1941), marking the winding down of the career of the prolific composer. Also, in 1941, Sonny Payne began to broadcast from Helena, Arkansas's KFFA, just two weeks before the bombing of Pearl Harbor. With the second Sonny Boy Williamson and under the sponsorship of Interstate Grocer's King Biscuit Flour, the radio show "King Biscuit Time" was born.

PAUL GARON

World War II–1958

Pioneers

One measure of the spreading interest in blues was the varied fields that sought to encompass it in their research. The jazz discographers Albert McCarthy and Dave Carey (with Ralph G. V. Venables) incorporated all the known blues releases on 78 rpm in The Directory of Recorded Jazz and Swing Music, a six-volume release that covered the letters A–Lo before being discontinued. (Also known as Jazz Directory [cover title], Fordingbridge, Hampshire: Delphic Press, 1949; London: Cassell and Company, 1957). This was the first blues discography.

Jazz writers such as Rudi Blesh emphasized the importance of blues in their work. In his Shining Trumpets (Knopf, 1946), he devoted fifty pages to blues, analyzing its origins, history, and structure. By the late 1950s, Derrick Stewart-Baxter was writing a regular blues column for Jazz Journal, "Blues on Record," and Paul Oliver wrote frequently on blues for Jazz Monthly.

James McKune and Bernard Klatzko in New York, Francis Smith in England, Max Vreede in Holland, and Werner Benecke in Germany began to systematically collect blues 78 issues. This geographical diffusion of interest was also signaled by the frequency of foreign concerts given by U.S. blues or blues-related performers. Leadbelly's 1949 performance in Paris marked the first such visit, although black jazz artists had been performing in Europe for decades. Josh White toured Europe in 1950 and Big Bill Broonzy followed in 1951, performing in both Paris and London and returning in 1952. Lonnie Johnson played in Europe in 1952. Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry crossed the Atlantic in 1958, as did Muddy Waters and Otis Spann. These visits carried knowledge of the blues to a much larger audience than was available in the United States, and the singers were made welcome enough that a number of them, like Champion Jack Dupree, Memphis Slim, and Eddie Boyd, stayed on as expatriates.

Two important autobiographies appeared in the mid-1950s: Ethel Waters's His Eye Is on the Sparrow (with Charles Samuels, Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1951) and Big Bill Broonzy's Big Bill Blues (as told to Yannick Bruynoghe, London: Cassell and Company, 1955). Broonzy's story was keen on insight and particularly revealing of the everyday life of a blues singer.

Recordings

Blues LPs began to appear from three sources: field recordings, studio recordings, and reissues of earlier 78 issues. Moe Asch had been recording Leadbelly since 1944 and issuing his songs on the Asch label, among others, but soon began to issue Leadbelly material on long-playing records, thus breaking new ground in the use of this new medium. Folklorist

Harold Courlander's 1950 field trips resulted in the six-album set on Asch's Folkways label, Negro Folk Music of Alabama, issued during the period from 1950 to 1956. Frederic Ramsey traveled the South from 1951 to 1957, harvesting remarkable field recordings of Horace Sprott and others. These were issued on three albums in the Folkways series, Music from the South. Meanwhile, a younger generation of field workers began to comb the United States. One of the earliest of these was Samuel B. Charters, whose mid-1950s trips in the southern United States resulted in the Folkways recordings of Furry Lewis, Lightnin' Hopkins, and others. Simultaneously, in the Midwest, Robert Koester recorded Big Joe Williams and Speckled Red for future release on his Delmar label. Under its new name Delmark, this would become one of the longest lived blues labels in the United States.

Folkways used studio recordings, on-location material recorded during radio shows or concerts, and field recordings often made in the home of a folklorist. One of the first such blues LPs—lacking the more diverse “folk” material typical of Leadbelly's repertoire—was a ten-inch LP on Folkways by Brownie McGhee, issued ca. 1951.

Soon the record companies seized on a new source of blues material. Early 78 releases could be reissued on the new long-playing medium. In 1953 Riverside began reissuing the recordings of Blind Lemon Jefferson on ten-inch LPs. but it was in 1952 that Folkways, again, released what was to become one of the most important reissues in the field of folk music.

Harry Smith's Anthology of American Folk Music was a set of six LPs issued in three albums with extensive notes provided by Smith. The selection of material was diverse, consisting as it did of blues, reels, gospel, cajun, and ballads by artists like Charlie Patton, Henry Thomas, Jim Jackson, and Cannon's Jug Stompers, interspersed among titles by the Bentley Boys, Darby and Tarleton, and the Carter Family. Its eighty-four tunes gave the listener an indispensable view of the breadth of American folk music, and provided a healthy surge of new inspiration to the burgeoning folk revival. Folk performers from Bob Dylan to Joan Baez claimed to have been energized by it, and it gave many collectors a clearer view of the diversity of their goals. For those just learning about the blues, it introduced them to dozens of new artists.

As their exposure to blues increased, it was not surprising that young whites would also want to play the blues. One of the first white blues practitioners, the United Kingdom's Alexis Korner opened a “blues club” in 1954 with Cyril Davies. In the United States, Barbara Dane had her first job (with Turk Murphy, in 1956). A few years later

Jerry Silverman wrote the first how-to book aimed at new white aspirants, Folk Blues (New York: Macmillan, 1958). Interpreting “folk blues” rather liberally, Silverman collected 110 pieces, with “In the Pines” and “Titanic” and “Get Thee Behind Me, Satan” interspersed among more conventional selections like Little Brother Montgomery's “Vicksburg Blues,” Blind Lemon Jefferson's “Bad Luck Blues,” and Leadbelly's “Leavin' Blues.”

1959–1970

Modern Criticism Begins

The period from 1959 to 1970 was truly the dawn of modern blues criticism. Dozens of major works were issued by trade houses and music specialty publishers, while academic houses remained relatively silent.

Samuel Charters's The Country Blues (New York: Rinehart, 1959) and Paul Oliver's Blues Fell This Morning (London: Cassell, 1960) appeared within a year of each other, the latter carrying an introduction by Richard Wright. The Country Blues was a popularly written introduction to the blues, from W. C. Handy to Lightnin' Hopkins, with emphasis on the “race” recording labels and brief biographies of major artists like Barbecue Bob, Robert Johnson, and Blind Boy Fuller. Oliver's more scholarly work emphasized the connections between the lyrics in the blues and the everyday life of rural and working class African Americans, and he printed hundreds of recorded examples to illustrate his themes.

Amiri Baraka's Blues People (written under the name LeRoi Jones) was a cultural, political, and musical history of African Americans (New York: Morrow, 1963) that opened new political doors to blues criticism. Unfortunately these thresholds were not crossed for another decade. Another unique work of the period was the autobiography of pianist, songwriter, publisher, record promoter, and more, Perry Bradford (Born with the Blues, New York: Oak, 1965) It was Bradford who arranged Mamie Smith's 1920 OKeh session that changed the history of popular recording by marketing an African American singer who performed in an African American style.

Oliver and Charters remained active, and in doing so they often established major patterns that blues criticism would follow for the next several decades. Oliver had already written a short biography of Bessie Smith (Bessie Smith, London: Cassell, 1959) issued in Cassell's “Kings of Jazz” series (the only blues singer so honored), and in 1970 he produced a pictorial history, The Story of the Blues (London: Barrie and Rockliff, 1969) that is still useful today. His 1960 field trip to the southern United States produced Conversation with the Blues (London: Cassell, 1965), a compilation of blues singers' first-person testimonies about the lives they led. In 1968 Oliver published Screening the Blues (U.S. title: Aspects of the Blues Tradition), a collection of essays on various themes in the blues (London: Cassell).

After a study of blues poetics (The Poetry of the Blues, New York: Oak, 1963), Charters compiled a group of biographies, both to flesh out the brief sketches in The Country Blues and to introduce new figures. The Bluesmen (New York: Oak, 1967) introduced Charlie Patton, Robert Johnson, Blind Lemon Jefferson, Texas Alexander, and more to a new, wider audience.

Urban Blues (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966) by Charles Keil was one of the first academic blues analyses. Harry Oster's Living Country Blues (Detroit: Folklore Associates, 1969) came shortly afterward. Keil applied the techniques of the sociologist to understand the role of the urban blues artist. While few have followed in his footsteps, his work was an inspiration for many readers. Oster supplied a vast array of blues lyrics culled from his song-collecting expeditions to Louisiana prisons and the surrounding countryside. These were prefaced with a lengthy literary analysis of the blues. This was an approach to the blues that a number of other studies would pursue.

More remarkable insights about the blues came from the field of African American literature. Ralph Ellison's penetrating observations in his essay collection, Shadow and Act, were built on by his colleague Albert Murray in Murray's first book, The Omn-Americans (New York: Outerbridge & Dienstfrey, 1970). Nor was literature the only field to offer an unusual perspective. Fredric Ramsey, Jr.'s 1950s photographic study of the African American south and its inhabitants has yet to be matched (Been Here and Gone, New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1960).

The 1960s was a decade of great discographical achievement as well. Jazz writer and publisher Walter C. Allen published Dan Mahoney's discography of Columbia race records, Columbia 13/14000-D Series (Stanhope, NJ: Walter C. Allen, 1960), and it was followed a few years later by the first comprehensive blues discography, Blues and Gospel Records 1902–1942, by Robert M. W. Dixon and John Godrich. (London: Storyville, 1963). In 1970 they provided a guided tour of this discography in their Recording the Blues (London: Studio Vista, 1970), a history of the many field trips undertaken in the South by the recording companies of the 1920s and 1930s. Mike Leadbitter and Neil Slaven had been compiling details on postwar blues for some years, and in 1968 produced Blues Records, January 1943 to December 1966 (London: Hanover), a companion to Dixon and Godrich's "prewar" discography.

Recording the Blues was one of the first books issued in the blues series edited by Paul Oliver, with the assistance of Tony Russell. The first four books were also published in the United States and they included Oliver's own study of the African roots of the blues, Savannah Syncopators, Russell's analysis of shared trends among black and white folk musicians, Blacks, Whites and Blues, and Derrick Stewart-Baxter's history of the vaudeville-influenced blues singers of the 1920s, Ma Rainey and the Classic Blues Singers. The four titles were all published by Studio Vista in 1970.

Other biographical or regional studies to appear in the series included John Fahey's book on Charlie Patton, which featured lyric and music analysis as well (Charley [sic] Patton), Bengt Olsson's history of the Memphis blues artists, Memphis Blues and Jug Bands, and Karl gert zur Heide's Deep South Piano, which focused on the music of Little Brother Montgomery and his friends. William Ferris's study of improvisation and composition, Blues from the Delta, rounded out this group of releases that Studio Vista issued in 1970.

Our picture of the publishing accomplishments of this decade would not be complete without mentioning several significant but specialized works. Eric Sackheim published a handsome collection of transcribed lyrics, augmented by the drawings of Jonathan Shahn. The Blues Line (New York: Grossman, 1969) may have been the first blues art book. Finally, two children's books on blues appeared the same year, Carman Moore's story of Bessie Smith, Somebody's Angel Child (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell, 1969) and Frank Surge's compilation of biographies, Singers of the Blues (Minneapolis: Lerner, 1969).

The Belgian magazine R & B Panorama (Brussels, 1960) was one of the first blues magazines, although a close contender is Robert Koester's Jazz Report from St. Louis which evolved into Blues News ca. 1960 in Chicago. Anthony Rotante and Paul Sheatsley's discographical Blues Research, an offshoot of Record Research, also appeared at that time. The United Kingdom's Blues Unlimited, edited by Simon Napier and Mike Leadbitter, became the first English-language blues magazine, and Bob Groom's Blues World began in 1965. Chris Strachwitz's American Folk Music Occasional (United States, 1960) provided a depth and breadth not available in other publications; the second issue (1970) was coedited by Pete Welding who had begun reviewing blues LPs for Down Beat in 1960. Jefferson (Sweden) and Soul Bag (France) both began in 1968. Jefferson may be the oldest blues magazine still in existence. Not until 1970 did the United States have its own blues magazine, Living Blues, also still publishing.

Performers Past and Present

Print media are not our only source of information about blues activity in the 1960s. Classic blues performances originally issued on 78s in the 1920s and 1930s were beginning to appear on twelve-inch LPs. The Heritage label (United Kingdom) reissued Memphis Minnie and Blind Lemon Jefferson, while RBF (another Moe Asch label) issued The Country Blues to accompany Samuel Charters's book of the same name. As with the Harry Smith anthology, Folkways (and Samuel Charters) were introducing an increasingly large audience to blues artists such as Leroy Carr, Bukka White, Tommy McClennan, and others.

Meanwhile, in New York city, Pete Whelan and Bill Givens, with the assistance of Bernard Klatzko, who wrote the liner notes and supplied many of the 78s to the Origin Jazz Library, reissued the first LP of Charlie Patton's work. Looking askance at the relative urbanity of some of the selections on The Country Blues LP, they issued Origin's second LP, Really! The Country Blues, containing work by Ishman Bracey, Skip James, William Moore, and others.

Some years later, in 1967, Nick Perls (New York) founded his Yazoo label, which was to become the major label reissuing blues 78s. Up until this time, the major labels had been relatively inactive in terms of blues reissues, but in 1970, Columbia reissued and repackaged the complete work of Bessie Smith in a heavily promoted set of ten LPs. This set greatly increased the popularity of the blues.

Many of the greatest blues singers were still alive and came to the attention of young white blues enthusiasts in the 1960s. Their work, and the work of more contemporary blues artists, rapidly began to appear on LP. Prestige established their Bluesville label in 1959–1960 and began their lengthy series by issuing LPs by Al Smith, Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry, and Willie Dixon. Robert Koester issued his first blues LPs—by Speckled Red and Big Joe Williams—almost simultaneously, and soon began to record other artists like Sleepy John Estes and Junior Wells. One of the most successful labels, Arhoolie, was founded in 1960 by Chris Strachwitz. Arhoolie consistently produced quality blues LPs, either taken from 78s or recorded live (both in the studio and in the field). Mance Lipscomb and Lightnin' Hopkins were important artists for Arhoolie in those years. Hopkins was to become the subject of one of the first blues film documentaries, Les Blank's The Blues According to Lightnin' Hopkins (1969).

Many of these same performers began to appear at blues festivals, both in the United States and abroad. The American Folk Blues Festivals began to travel overseas in 1962. Only at the end of the decade did blues festivals start to appear regularly in America. The Ann Arbor Blues Festival (1969) was the first; the Washington (DC) Blues Festival (1970) was the first to be produced by African Americans.

Young devotees began to comb the South looking for singers and information about them. They refined their techniques and scoured birth and death records, marriage records, city directories, phone books, census reports, and even police files. Interviews with these recently located singers appeared in books and magazines.

Other white enthusiasts took up playing the blues. One of the first of these was Barbara Dane who appeared in a feature in the November 1959 issue of Ebony (and was the first white woman to be so featured). Bob Dylan appeared on the scene in 1961–1962, featuring remakes of tunes by Bukka White, Henry Thomas, and others. In Chicago, Paul Butterfield, Elvin Bishop, and Mike Bloomfield were joined by Charlie Musselwhite from Memphis as they visited South Side blues clubs to learn from their heroes. Even before the Butterfield Blues Band formed in 1963, John Fahey had begun recording his blues-inspired guitar music. The trio of John Koerner, David Ray, and Tony Glover (Minneapolis) issued their first record in 1963, while in England, where Alexis Korner already reigned, Jo An Kelly began to record. Kelly made a private pressing EP in the mid-1960s, right around the time Eric Clapton joined John Mayall's Bluesbreakers.

Instructional guides for playing the blues began to appear. Stefan Grossman generated a cottage industry with these tutorials, beginning with his The Country Blues Guitar, Volume I: Mississippi John Hurt, the Memphis Sound and Then Some (New York: Oak, 1968).

With all this exposure, mainstream sources began to take note of the blues. Sing Out, which began in 1950, began to print more blues pieces, as did the folk magazines Broadside (1962) and Little Sandy Review (1960). Even Rolling Stone and Newsweek had occasional pieces of blueslore. Jazz and folk festivals noticed the blues well before blues festivals came into being. The Newport Jazz and Folk Festival of 1960 featured blues artists, and by 1963 featured them regularly. The University of Chicago Folk Festivals (1961) frequently had blues acts like Ed and Lonnie Young.

Contemporary American drama reflected the wider interest in the blues when Edward Albee's play The Death of Bessie Smith first opened, in Berlin, in 1960.

1970–1983

Background and History

Three important books helped place the blues in historical context. John Lovell, Jr.'s mammoth undertaking Black Song: The Forge and the Flame (New York: Macmillan, 1972) was a comprehensive study of the development of the African American spiritual. Dena Epstein's Sinful Tunes and Spirituals: Black Folk Music to the Civil War (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977), elucidated a period of development for black folk music little known to blues followers at that time. And Lawrence Levine's Black Culture and Black Consciousness (New York: Oxford, 1977) surveyed black culture in the light of its social and psychological meanings to African Americans, grounding his findings in the material and historical matrix of Black life in America. Like Paul Oliver's Blues Fell This Morning (q.v.), only more vast in scope, Levine's work enabled blues aficionados to understand how, why, and from what fabric the blues emerged.

A number of important historical regional and stylistic studies were published in the 1970s. Mike Rowe's landmark study of the Chicago blues, Chicago Breakdown (London: Eddison Press, 1973), is still the most definitive book on the subject. Bruce Bastin documented the blues of the Eastern states, from Georgia through the Carolines, in one of the final entries in Paul Oliver's blues series, Crying for the Carolines (London: Studio Vista, 1971). William Ferris's Blues from the Delta (Garden City, NY: Doubleday/Anchor Press, 1978), an analysis of improvisational techniques among a group of Delta blues artists, was an expanded version of his entry of the same title in Oliver's blues series. (London: Studio Vista, 1970). Blues in New Orleans was documented in John Broven's Walking to New Orleans: The Story of New Orleans Rhythm and Blues (Bexhill-on-Sea: Blues Unlimited, 1974). One work of blues history that emphasized the Delta was Robert Palmer's Deep Blues (New York: Viking, 1981), one of the most popular books on blues ever to be released.

The University of Illinois Press continued to publish important blues studies such as Jeff Todd Titon's analysis of the music of the Early Downhome Blues (Urbana, 1973). Titon also integrated his material with aspects of the daily life of rural working class blacks, and was one of the first authors to review actual record and phonograph sales figures. David Evans's Big Road Blues (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982) studied patterns of creativity in a group of Mississippi blues musicians. Blues and the Poetic Spirit, by Paul Garon (London: Eddison Press, 1975), was a controversial psycho-poetical study of the blues, drawing on Marxism, psychoanalysis, and a surrealist view of poetry. A more orthodox history was supplied by Giles Oakley's The Devil's Music: The History of the Blues (New York: Taplinger, 1977), a tie-in with the BBC documentary of the same name, produced a year earlier.

Works like George Mitchell's Blow My Blues Away (Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1971) and Robert Neff and Anthony Connor's Blues (Boston: David Godine, 1975) consisted largely of first-person testimony by blues artists. Peter Guralnick's popular Feel Like Going Home (New York: Outerbridge and Dienstfrey, 1971) was based on such material, largely rewritten. His Lost Highway (Boston: David Godine, 1979) was in a similar format, but also covered country and rock and roll singers, as well as blues artists.

Singers and Their Songs

Several significant biographies appeared in this decade, one of the most noteworthy being Chris Albertson's life of Bessie Smith, Bessie (New York: Stein and Day, 1972). Mother of the Blues: A Study of Ma Rainey (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1981) was the first blues book by a woman author. Related was Sally Placksin's 1982 work on women musicians, American Women in Jazz. 1900 to the Present. Their Words, Lives, and Music (New York: Seaview, 1982), although it emphasized jazz artists more than blues performers. The Devil's Son-in-Law: The Story of Peetie Wheatstraw and His Songs, by Paul Garon (London: Studio Vista, 1971), was the last entry in Paul Oliver's blues series, making an even dozen releases. Samuel Charters released Sweet as the Showers of Rain (New York: Oak, 1977), which, like The Bluesmen, contained short biographies of important performers such as Memphis Minnie, Sleepy John Estes, and Bukka White.

Arnold Shaw's biographical history of blues and R&B, Honkers and Shouters (New York: Macmillan, 1978), was aimed at a more popular audience, as was Charles Sawyer's The Arrival of B. B. King (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1980).

A single entry represented the field of discography, Max Vreede's study of race releases on the Paramount label of Port Washington, Wisconsin, Paramount 12000 13000 (London: Storyville, 1971).

But a new field was coming into its own: blues songbooks and instruction books. A. X. Nichols had already released a mass-market paperback collection of blues lyrics, sans music, Woke Up This Mornin' (New York: Bantam, 1973), but books like Woody Mann's Six Early Blues Guitarists (New York: Oak, 1973) were aimed at those wanting to learn to play the blues. Samuel Charters's Robert Johnson (New York: Oak, 1973), Chris Albertson and Gunther Schuller's Bessie Smith: Empress of the Blues (New York: Schirmer/Walter Kane, 1975), and Paul Oliver's Early Blues Songbook (London: Wise, 1982) contained words and music, but without the how-to component. In the next decade, two significant collections of blues lyrics appeared: Jeff Titon's Downhome Blues Lyrics: An Anthology from the Post-World War II Era (Boston: Twayne, 1981) and Michael Taft's Blues Lyric Poetry (New York: Garland, 1983).

Hettie Jones's Big Star Fallin' Mama (New York: Viking, 1974) was one of the few blues children's books published during this decade, but a number of literary efforts were published that were aimed at an adult audience. Albert Murray, whose musings on the role of blues in jazz were published in 1976 by McGraw-Hill (Stomping the Blues), released the first novel in his blues trilogy, Train Whistle Guitar (New York: McGraw-Hill, 1974). Augustus Arnold, brother of bluesman Billy Boy Arnold, and writing as Julio Finn, produced Nefario (London: Allison & Busby, 1974), while Peter Guralnick, who had already published several collections of short stories, wrote the novel Nighthawk Blues (New York: Seaview, 1980). Blues poet Sterling Plumpp released his The Mojo Hands Call and I Must Go (New York: Thunder's Mouth), just a year before Alvin Greenberg's play, Love in Vain: The Life and Legend of Robert Johnson, was released as a paperback original by Doubleday (Garden City, NY, 1983).

Black Perspectives in Music began to appear in 1973, an indication of the deepening interest academics were taking in the blues. In 1981, the Blues Archive at the University of Mississippi was established and two others soon appeared: the Chicago Blues Archive at the Chicago Public Library (1981) and the Center for Black Music Research (1983) at Columbia College, Chicago. Public interest was also drawn to more popular venues like the Delta Blues Museum in Clarksdale, Mississippi.

Also on the popular side, Robert Crumb's blues-related artwork began to appear in stories, short pieces, and on album covers. Peter Guralnick's The Listeners Guide to the Blues (Facts on File, 1982) was the first release in what would become a very popular field. Eric Townley clarified arcane references on blues (and jazz) records in Tell Your Story: A Dictionary of Jazz and Blues Recordings 1917-1930. (Chigwell: Storyville, 1976). Although helpful to most listeners, it was aimed largely at a non-American audience.

The year 1980 saw the first airing of Steve Cushing's long-lived radio show, Blues Before Sunrise. The same year John Landis's Blues Brothers appeared in theaters across the country, reviving the blues in a way few people anticipated.

A landmark publication that has maintained its usefulness throughout the decades, Sheldon Harris's Blues Who's Who, was released in 1979 by Arlington House and kept in print in subsequent years by Da Capo. Indeed, Da Capo's series of blues reprints, inaugurated in the late 1970s, gave new life to many works in the genre.

1984-2002

History

The two most popular eras for blues criticism were the 1960s and the period under discussion. Several publications of this era were noteworthy for their elegance. Nothing But the Blues, edited by Larry Cohn (New York: Abbeville, 1993), may have been the first coffee-table book, but the scholarly level of its essays, by experts like Jim O'Neal, Mary Katherine Aldin, and others, belies such a glib appellation. More adventuresome in layout was Bill Wyman's Blues Odyssey (New York: DK Publishing, 2001), a handsome history of the blues with hundreds of artist photos, label shots, and more. William Barlow's social history of the blues, Looking Up at Down: The Emergence of Blues Culture (Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1989) linked the lives of the singers with the social conditions that produced the blues, while Francis Davis's The History of the Blues (New York: Hyperion, 1995) was a popularly written account, tied in with a TV documentary.

Sufficient works had been produced by this time that several blues writers were able to produce collections of their or others' work. Paul Oliver's best record liner notes were collected under the title Blues Off the Record: Thirty Years of Blues Commentary (Tunbridge Wells, UK: Baton, 1984). Gayle Dean Wardlow published many of his articles and field research reports as Chasin' That Devil Music: Searching for the Blues (San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998), while several books in Paul Oliver's blues series (Savannah Syncopators, Recording the Blues, and Blacks, Whites and Blues) were collected in Yonder Come the Blues (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001). Perhaps the most notable sign of the blues' maturity was the appearance of Steve Tracy's Write Me a Few of Your Lines: A Blues Reader (Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 1999), a 600+-page compendium of excerpts from books and essays by more than forty blues scholars.

Greatly expanding an earlier work, Bruce Bastin's Red River Blues: The Blues Tradition in the Southeast (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986) was a meticulous history of the blues from the East Coast states, with much information on nonrecorded artists. Barry Lee Pearson focused on Archie Edwards and John Cephas in Virginia Piedmont Blues (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990), and Steve Tracy surveyed blues from the Queen City in Going to Cincinnati (Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.)

Paul Oliver produced an extraordinary study in Songsters and Saints: Vocal Traditions on Race Records (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984), a study of the diverse vocal traditions that functioned as sources for race records. Jon Michael Spencer's Blues and Evil (Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993) surveyed the influence of religion on blues, while Guido van Rijn's Roosevelt's Blues: African-American Blues and Gospel Songs on FDR. (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997) was a comprehensive review of blues dealing not only with the president, but with World War II, the WPA, and other topics of the era.

Autobiographies and biographies were the most abundant of the blues publications for the decade, some coming from trade houses and others from university presses. Willie Dixon (with Don Snowdon) wrote I Am the Blues (New York: Da Capo, 1989), and Mance Lipscomb's reminiscences were edited by Glen Alyn in I Say Me for a Parable (New York: Norton, 1993). The highs and lows of Johnny Otis's career appeared in Upside Your Head! (Hanover, NH: Wesleyan University Press, 1993), while Buddy Guy's assertions alternated with Donald E. Wilcox's commentary in Damn Right I've Got the Blues: Buddy Guy and the Blues Roots of Rock-and-Roll (San Francisco: Woodford Press, 1993). Henry Townsend (with Bill Greensmith, A Blues Life, Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1999), David "Honeyboy" Edward (The World Don't Owe Me Nothing, Chicago: Chicago Review Press, 1997), and Yank Rachell (by Richard Congress, Blues Mandolin Man, Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2001)—all bluesmen who started out in the 1920s—were published in the last decade of this century. Voices as diverse as Jimmy Reed, Eddie Boyd, Muddy Waters, Houston Stackhouse, and many more artists whose interviews have appeared in Living Blues have been collected by the original reporters, Jim O'Neal and Amy van Singel, in Voice of the Blues: Classic Interviews from Living Blues Magazine. (New York and London: Routledge, 2002).

Other works conformed to a more familiar biographical approach, although Robert Sacre's collection of papers on Charlie Patton was the result of the first such blues symposium that he organized in Leige, Belgium (Voice of the Blues. Charley Patton and the Mississippi Blues Traditions. Influences and Comparisons, Leige, Belgium: Presses Universitaires Leige, 1987), and Julio Finn's The Bluesman (London: Quartet Books, 1986) was only partially a biography of Robert Johnson and partially a disquisition on voodoo and blues.

Jazz critic Helen Oakley Dance released a detailed biography of T-Bone Walker (Stormy Monday: The T-Bone Walker Story, Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1987). Steven Calt, coauthor with Gayle Dean Wardlow of a biography of Charlie Patton (King of the Delta Blues: The Life and Music of Charlie Patton, Newton, NJ: Rock Chapel Press, 1988), released his controversial biography of Skip James in 1994 (I'd Rather Be the Devil: Skip James and the Blues, New York: Da Capo).

Five major artists all received full-scale biographies during this period, although Robert Johnson's was slight due to a lack of available material (Peter Guralnick, Searching for Robert Johnson, New York: Dutton, 1989). The Life and Legend of Leadbelly, by Charles Wolfe and Kip Lornell (New York: Harper-Collins, 1992), finally gave the Leadbelly legend its due, while Paul and Beth Garon combined the details of the life of Memphis Minnie with a study of her songs (Woman with Guitar. Memphis Minnie's Blues, New York: Da Capo, 1992.) Sebastian Danchin's "Blues Boy": The Life and Music of B. B. King (Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1998) helped clarify the life history of a star who had been heretofore only obliquely glimpsed. The life of Muddy Waters, first sketched by Sandra Tooze in Muddy Waters: The Mojo Man (Toronto: ECW Press, 1997), was brought forth in greater detail by Robert Gordon's Can't Be Satisfied: The Life and Times of Muddy Waters (Boston: Little, Brown, 2002).

Daphne Duval Harrison was the first African American woman to publish a full-length blues study. Her Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s (New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1988) is still a major source of information on Sippie Wallace, Edith Wilson, Victoria Spivey, and others. Angela Davis's study in social protest was another groundbreaking stroke in the history of black women's struggle (Blues Legacies and Black Feminism: Gertrude "Ma" Rainey, Bessie Smith and Billie Holiday, New York: Pantheon, 1998).

Varying Perspectives

In 1988, Robert McLeod began his mammoth undertaking of transcribing all the blues songs reissued by Yazoo and Document (Yazoo 1-20, Edinburgh: PAT, 1988, etc.). Michael Taft had already issued the immense three-volume Concordance to accompany his earlier work (Blues Lyric Poetry: A Concordance, New York: Garland, 1984).

The blues was stirring artistic and literary inspiration and nowhere was this more true than in Houston Baker, Jr.'s stunning analysis of black literary works, Blues, Ideology and Afro-American Literature: A Vernacular Theory (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984). The plastic arts inspired an exhibition for which Richard J. Powell prepared an excellent catalog, The Blues Aesthetic: Black Culture and Modernism (Washington, DC: Washington Project for the Arts, 1989).

The art form most in the service of the blues has always been photography, and many excellent collections appeared during this period. Half photographic essay, half history of Texas blues, Alan B. Govenar's Meeting the Blues (Dallas: Taylor, 1989) was an early entry in the field, but not the only one with a regional basis. Chicago and the Delta were the focus of two other works: Stephen Greene's Going to Chicago (San Francisco: Woodford, 1990) and Birney Imes's Juke Joint (Jackson: University of Mississippi Press, 1990), with an introduction by Richard Ford. James Fraher interspersed his photographs with testimony from the musicians themselves in The Blues Is a Feeling: Voices and Visions of African American Blues Musicians (Shorewood: Midwest Traditions, 1998), and Marc PoKempner took a Southside blues club as his focus in Down at Theresa's: Chicago Blues (Munich: Prestal Verlag, 2000).

Ray Flerlage's penetrating studies had been appearing on album covers and in books for decades, but it wasn't until 2000 that he published Chicago Blues as Seen from the Inside (Toronto: ECW). Jeff Dunas's unusual and formal blues portraits appeared in his State of the Blues (New York: Aperture, 1998), which was graced with a preface by John Lee Hooker.

The first comprehensive blues bibliography appeared in 1989 (Mary L. Hart, Brenda Eagles, and Lisa N. Howorth, The Blues: A Bibliographic Guide, New York: Garland), although it has been superseded by the more recent A Blues Bibliography, by Robert Ford (Bromley, Kent: Paul Pelletier, 1999).

Laurie Wright's encyclopedic discography, OKeh Race Records, the 8000 "Race" Series (Chigwell, UK: Laurie Wright, 2001) was a significant discographical publication of this period, as was Chris Smith's amazingly detailed study, That's the Stuff: The Recordings of Brownie McGhee, Sonny Terry, Stick McGhee and J. C. Burris (Shetland: Housay Press, 1999).

Paul Oliver's The Blackwell Guide to Blues Records (Cambridge: Blackwell, 1989), with each chapter by a different blues scholar, established a more scholarly tone for its several editions than was achieved by more popular guides that soon flooded the market. Two more encyclopedic guides to the blues appeared during this interval: Robert Santelli's biographical The Big Book of Blues (New York: Penguin, 1983) and Gerard Herzhaft's Encyclopedia of the Blues (Fayetteville: University of Arkansas Press, 1992).

Christiane Bird produced the first comprehensive club guide, The Jazz and Blues Lover's Guide to the US (Reading, MA: Addison-Wesley, 1991).

The venerable Blues Unlimited published its last issue (#149) in the winter of 1987, but several excellent magazines had already arisen to replace it: Blues & Rhythm: The Gospel Truth in July 1984 and Juke Blues in June 1985, both from the United Kingdom. The Black Music Research Journal debuted in 1988. Blues Revue first appeared, as a tabloid, in 1991.

Johnny Parth founded Document Records in Austria in 1990 with the purpose of reissuing every prewar blues 78; a few years earlier, Smithsonian had acquired the entire Folkways catalog, an enormous repository of blues and other folk forms.

Two important industry histories have appeared in recent years: Peter Goldsmith's Making People's Music: Moe Asch and Folkways Records (Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1998) and Nadine Cohodas's story of Chess Records, Spinning Blues into Gold (New York: St. Martin's, 2000).

PAUL GARON

HITE, LES

b. Leslie Leroy Hite, 13 February 1903; DuQuoin, IL
d. 6 February 1962; Santa Monica, CA

Alto saxophonist and bandleader, active mostly in jazz but also made significant blues recordings with T-Bone Walker. Raised and educated in Illinois, Hite made his way as a musician to California in 1924. In 1925–1928 he performed in various Los Angeles bands. In 1929 or 1930 at Frank Sebastian's Cotton Club he began leading a band including vibraphonist/drummer Lionel Hampton and George Orendorff; it isn't clear if Hite took over Paul Howard's Quality Serenaders in which they were in, or if he simply hired them away. With this group Hite performed and recorded with Louis Armstrong in 1930–1931, and he kept it through September 1939, with film appearances and occasional East Coast stints.

In late 1939 he took over Floyd Turnham's band with whom he recorded "T-Bone Blues" (Varsity 8391) with vocalist/guitarist T-Bone Walker and with guitar solos from Frank Pasley, an important record toward the rhythm and blues style. Through 1945 he led additional bands, but after World War II he retired from bandleading. His subsequent career was as partner in a music booking agency.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz (Wayne Schneider)
Burke, Tony, and Dave Penny. "Les Hite's Orchestra 'T-Bone Blues,' 1935–1942." Blues & Rhythm no. 9 (1985): 8.

Discography: LordHITE, MATTIE

b. ca. 1890; New York City, NY
d. ca. 1935; New York City, NY

Spent singing career in New York City, except for a four-year stint from 1915 to 1919 in Chicago. Two of her 1923–1924 recording sessions were accompanied by Fletcher Henderson at piano. Activity after 1932 unknown or unconfirmed.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGRHOEKE, ROB

b. 9 January 1943; New York City, NY
d. 9 November 1999; Krommenie, Netherlands

A pianist in the boogie-woogie style. His Rob Hoeke Rhythm and Blues Group enjoyed some success in Holland in 1965 and 1966. He recorded again in the 1980s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger)

Discography: AMG (Richie Unterberger)HOGAN, SILAS

b. 15 September 1911; Westover, LA
d. 9 January 1994; Scotlandville, LA

Guitar and harmonica player, Silas Hogan reflected the swamp blues sounds of his heroes: Jimmy Reed, Lightnin' Slim, and Slim Harpo. Hogan remained in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, for the most part and made several recordings before becoming a resident artist at Tabby Thomas Blues' Box in Baton Rouge. His son Samuel continues to perform.

HEATHER PINSON

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Bonner, Brett J. "Silas Hogan." Living Blues no. 115 (May/June 1994): 62–63.

Discography: AMG; LSFPHOGG, JOHN

b. 5 August 1912; Westconnie, TX
d. 11 November 1997; Los Angeles, CA

Singer and guitarist; cousin of Andrew "Smokey" Hogg. Learned some guitar from Pee Wee Crayton. Music was secondary to Hogg's day jobs, but he did take some opportunities to record commercially in 1951 for the Mercury and Octive labels.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

HOGG, SMOKEY

b. Andrew Hogg, 27 January 1914; Westconnie, TX
d. 1 May 1960; McKinney, TX

Guitarist, singer. Not to be confused with guitarist Willie Anderson Hogg, born in 1908 and also nicknamed "Smokey." Country blues purveyor Hogg, a fan of Peetie Wheatstraw and a cousin of Lightnin' Hopkins, worked with Texas slide guitarist Black Ace in early 1930s. He made his recording debut with Decca in 1937 and achieved his first hits a decade later for the Blue Bonnet label. He wrote the R&B hit "Broken Hearted" for Floyd Dixon in 1949 and had R&B two hits of his own, "Long Tall Mama" in 1948 and "Little School Girl" two years later. He recorded prolifically until the last few years of his life with his best-known work coming via a series of singles for Specialty Records in the early 1950s.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR; LSFP

HOLDER, ACE

b. Albert Holder, 18 December 1937; Evergreen, AL

Singer and harmonica player. Learned harmonica at age twelve; formative influences were Aleck Miller "Sonny Boy Williamson (II)" and Little Walter, then later Jimmy Reed and Little Junior Parker. Holder moved to Los Angeles, California, in 1957, and from 1960 through 1967 he made several singles for the small labels Pioneer International, Vanessa, Lulu, Movin, and Downey.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Stolper, Darryl. "A Talk with Ace Holder" (with discography). Blues Unlimited no. 139 (Autumn 1980): 33.

Discography: LSFP

HOLE, DAVE

b. 30 March 1948; Heswall, England

Idiosyncratic slide guitarist Hole rose from obscurity in Australia to international acclaim. Raised from age four in Perth, Hole returned to Australia in 1972 after a stint in London and achieved a regional reputation. His 1990 self-financed Short Fuse Blues was brought to the attention of Guitar Player magazine and then Alligator Records, resulting in a recording contract. His personalized technique reversed the standard style by placing the slide on the index finger with his hand hanging over the guitar neck. This unusual technique, combined with the ferocity of his music, made his 1993 North American debut a major success and led to regular recording and touring.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Sandra Brennan and Al Campbell)
Obrecht, Jas. "Dave Hole: Deep Blues and Devastating Slide from Down Under." Guitar Player 25, no. 7 (July 1991): 21–22.

Discography: AMG

HOLEMAN, JOHN DEE

b. 4 April 1929; Orange County, NC

Piedmont blues acoustic guitarist with a marked influence from Blind Boy Fuller. Has worked as farmer and bulldozer operator. Since 1976 he has made performing appearances outside of North Carolina, often with Fris Holloway. He has made one CD recording with Mapleshade Records.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Pearson, Barry Lee. "North Carolina Blues: John Dee Holeman: Bull City Blues." Living Blues no. 107 (January/February 1993): 31–32.

HOLIDAY, BILLIE

b. Eleanora Fagan Gough, 7 April 1915; Baltimore, MD, or Philadelphia, PA

d. 17 July 1959; New York City, NY

An utterly distinctive voice, a cruel and abbreviated childhood, a tumultuous stint as singer with an early edition of the Count Basie Orchestra, a string of broken romances, and a long-standing drug habit that led to an early death have all combined to make Billie Holiday one of the great tragic legends of American music.

What is often overlooked in the fixation on the pathos of her life (which has been well documented in numerous biographies) is the important role Holiday played—along with Basie, Louis Armstrong, Jay McShann, and a handful of others—in bridging the worlds of jazz and blues. For if generally classified as a jazz singer, few artists have ever been as completely at ease in both worlds as Holiday—a lesson she may have taken from her short time with Basie, but which more likely was simply inherent to her sense of the music. Holiday also penned several classics of the blues canon, songs such as “Fine and Mellow,” “Billie’s Blues,” “Don’t Explain,” and “God Bless the Child.”

The product of a broken home, Holiday’s childhood was rough by any standard. By most accounts, Holiday was raped at age ten, and began working as a prostitute while still a young teenager after her mother moved them to New York City. (However, this should all be tempered with the knowledge that Holiday was reported to often embellish or even fabricate her own history, and there is even doubt about her role in the writing of her autobiography, Lady Sings the Blues.) She began singing at local clubs as a way to earn money, taking her name from the film star Billie Dove.

Her big break came in the early 1930s when, while still a teenager, she was discovered by John Hammond—one of the first major discoveries in his legendary career, which would later include Basie, Bob Dylan, Bruce Springsteen, and Stevie Ray Vaughan. Hammond introduced her to Benny Goodman, who was just starting out himself, and in 1933 Goodman hired her to sing with his small combo for a two-song recording session. Stretches with Jimmie Lunceford and Fletcher Henderson followed, and for most of 1937 she sang with Basie’s band before leaving (or being tossed out, depending on the account) to join Artie Shaw’s outfit. In addition to starring as the singer for these well-known big bands, Holiday also recorded under her own name during this time period, and a 1937 recording of “Carelessly” reached the top of the charts. This recording shows a singer whose approach to the music is upbeat, bright, and sassy—utterly unlike the darker, brooding material to follow. Many critics and fans hold that her late 1930s material is her best. There is little doubt that her voice was at its strongest during this period, although she was often stuck with stock Tin Pan Alley material.

It was shortly after quitting the Shaw orchestra that Holiday’s cult status began to be formed. In a now-legendary encounter, she agreed to sing a song brought to her by a fan at a live performance. The song was “Strange Fruit,” a harrowing account of racial lynchings in the South, and while banned by most radio stations, it became a hit via jukebox. Its success despite radio censorship helped fuel the Holiday legend.

From the late 1930s to the mid-1940s, Holiday was one of the most popular entertainers in the nation—on a par with Basie, Goodman, Duke Ellington, Glenn Miller, Frank Sinatra, and Ella Fitzgerald. She had numerous hits, was a top-draw live performer, and was making very good money.

An unhappy love life and a tendency toward substance abuse began to take their toll by the mid-1940s. Most reports indicate she was already regularly using heroin as early as 1944, along with abuse of alcoholism and marijuana. In 1947, she was arrested on drug charges and checked herself into a detoxification program. Five years later, she again enrolled in a detox program.

A five-year stint recording for jazz impresario Norman Granz (1952–1957) provided her numerous opportunities to record with some of the greatest talents in the jazz world—and many of her recordings from this era rank with her best. But her vocal range, never extensive, was already shrinking, her tone becoming rougher at the edges.

Much as Frank Sinatra did after the rupture of his vocal cords, Holiday responded to her new vocal limitations by pouring even more emotion into her performances. Many fans and critics prefer her last few years’ work as her most moving and revealing.

A 1957 television special titled “The Sound of Jazz” paired Holiday with her former friend from the Basie years, saxophonist Lester Young, plus saxophonists Ben Webster and Coleman Hawkins and other jazz stars, for a performance of Holiday’s own blues standard, “Fine and Mellow.” Most critics regard this as her last great performance. A subsequent album, Lady in Satin, her last, maintains a mixed reception among her fans.

Two years after performing with Young, Webster, and Hawkins, she was dead from complications of her long years of alcohol and drug abuse.

Despite the title of her autobiography, Holiday didn’t sing many straight blues songs. But even her covers of Tin Pan Alley hits had a broad swath of the blues running through them. It was blues as interpreted by Count Basie, Charles Brown, or Jeannie Cheatham: a sophisticated, uptown jazz setting. Holiday’s music was at the heart a synthesis of jazz, blues, and American pop, and to try to pigeonhole her into any of these categories is to deny the talent that transcended genre.

JIM TRAGESER

HOLIDAY, BILLIE

Bibliography

AMG (John Bush); Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli
Dufty, William, and Billie Holiday. Lady Sings the Blues.
London: Penguin, 1956.
O'Meally, Robert. Lady Day: The Many Faces of Billie Holiday. New York: Little, Brown and Company, 1991.

Discography: Lord

Selected Recordings in Reissue

Lady in Autumn: The Best of the Verve Years (1991, Verve/Polygram 849434).
The Commodore Master Takes (2000, Polygram 543272).
Lady Day: The Best of Billie Holiday (2001, Columbia/Sony 85979).

Videography

The Sound of Jazz (1957, CBS).
Lady Day—The Many Faces of Billie Holiday (1991, Kultur).

HOLLIMON, CLARENCE

b. 24 October 1937; Houston, TX
d. 23 April 2000; Houston, TX

Guitarist. Rarely seen, but frequently heard, Clarence Milton Howard Hollimon, a product of the Houston Fifth Ward blues scene that produced Albert Collins, Johnny Copeland, and Lightnin' Hopkins, established himself as a Gulf Coast blues legend whose stylish guitar lines were emulated by his better-known contemporaries as well as by a succeeding generation of Texas blues players.

Often skipping high school classes to do so, Hollimon was an early Duke Records session star, heard to best advantage on a series of classic Bobby "Blue" Bland hits recorded in 1956–1959. He toured briefly with Big Mama Thornton and before joining Charles Brown's touring band when he graduated. He first met his future wife and musical partner Carol Fran, a member of Guitar Slim's band and later bandleader for Joe Tex, while playing in Brown's group in the 1958. He married her in 1983.

Hollimon tired of the road in 1960 and left Brown to return to the studio, working with O. V. Wright, Buddy Ace, Lavelle White, and Ernie K-Doe, among others. After being coaxed back out on to the road to back Nancy Wilson in 1964, Hollimon relocated to New York City, doing session work with Chuck Jackson and Dionne Warwick for Scepter Records. He returned to Houston within a year but the rise of disco and the fall of Duke Records made the 1970s a lean era.

As a result of saxist Grady Gaines's lobbying with Black Top Records, the lean Hollimon, nicknamed "Gristle" by Brown for both his wiry frame and musical resilience, got his second wind as a session star in the 1980s, appearing on albums by Anson Funderburgh, Guitar Shorty, Marcia Ball, Solomon Burke, and the Tri-Sax-Ual Soul Champs, among others. He and Carol Fran also got to finally go into the studio under their own name, recording Soul Sensation and See There! in the early 1990s.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Santelli
Wood, R. "Obituaries." Living Blues no. 152 (July/August 2000): 114.

Discography

Topping, Ray. "Hunting for Hollimon." Juke Blues no. 16 (1989): 22–23.

See also Fran, Carol

HOLLINS, TONY

b. ca. 1900–1910, possibly Clarksdale, MS
d. ca. 1959, possibly Clarksdale, MS

Influential Delta blues singer and guitarist Tony Hollins was reportedly raised on a plantation outside of Clarksdale, Mississippi, and played throughout the area in the 1920s and 1930s. He met a young John Lee Hooker in Clarksdale and was a major influence on the aspiring bluesman, even providing Hooker with his first guitar. Hollins recorded seven sides for Okeh in June 1941 in Chicago, including "Crawlin' King Snake," "Married Woman Blues," and "Cross Cut Saw Blues" (which predates Tommy McClennan's version by three months). Hollins relocated to Chicago in the late 1940s and recorded his final session in 1951 for Decca with pianist Sunnyland Slim.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris

Discography: DGR; LSFP

HOLLOWAY, RED

b. James Wesley Holloway, 31 May 1927; Helena, AR
 Tenor and alto saxophonist. Smoky-toned, blues/soul/jazz. Started out in Chicago. Holloway worked with Roosevelt Sykes and Nat Toles before starting his own quartet in 1952, which he maintained through 1960. He sometimes worked with Red Saunders's house band at the Regal Theater. He also participated in recording sessions with Otis Rush (1956) and Pee Wee Crayton (1956–1957). In 1960 he relocated to New York, and from 1963 through 1966 he toured with Brother Jack McDuff. After a brief return to Chicago, he migrated to Los Angeles in 1967, where at the Parisian Room he led the house band.

DENNIS TAYLOR/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: LordHOLLYWOOD FATS

b. Michael Leonard Mann, 17 March 1954; Los Angeles, CA
 d. 8 December 1986; Los Angeles, CA

Guitarist. A principal figure in the West Coast blues revival of the 1980s, Hollywood Fats, nicknamed by Buddy Guy, influenced a generation of aspiring California blues guitarists while humbling multitudes of accomplished professionals. And he did it in an unfortunately short period of time, dying at thirty-two. Hollywood Fats, who was already playing guitar as a preteen, was both precocious and prodigiously talented in his childhood. His father would drive him to local blues clubs to play and he was subsequently befriended by Shakey Jake, who procured his first professional job, backing singer Big Sadie, at age fourteen.

Freddie King and Magic Sam served as influences and mentors and word soon spread about the talented teenager. A gig with J. B. Hutto and the Hawks was his first touring job and it led to work with Albert King, John Lee Hooker, Jimmy Witherspoon, and Muddy Waters. He left Muddy Waters to form the first Hollywood Fats Band in 1975 and added Canned Heat ex Larry Taylor on upright bass in 1976. The band's Rock This House, a live recording from 1979 was later released by Black Top Records. Hollywood Fats worked extensively, both live and in the studio, with West Coast bandleaders James Harman, where he was paired with guitarist Kid Ramos for awhile, and Rod Piazza, where he worked on Harpburn, in the 1980s. He also recorded three albums with William Clarke, one with Canned Heat and briefly explored roots rock when he replaced Dave Alvin in the Blasters.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin

Forte, Dan. "Hollywood Fats, 1954–1986." Guitar Player 21, no. 2 (February 1987): 14.

"Obituaries." Living Blues no. 73 (1987): 38.

HOLMES BROTHERSWendell Holmes

b. 19 December 1943; Plainfield, NJ

Sherman Holmes

b. 29 September 1939; Plainfield, NJ

Popsy Dixon

b. 26 July 1942; Virginia Beach, VA

Gib Wharton

b. 15 September 1955; Mineral Wells, TX

The Holmes Brothers band was mainly composed of Wendell Holmes on guitar, Sherman Holmes on bass, and friend Popsy Dixon on drums, along with the collaborative efforts of Gib Wharton on pedal steel guitar. The band was largely based in New York after the brothers, Wendell and Sherman, moved there around 1959. The brothers played in several bands before forming the Sevilles in 1962, and they accepted an invitation to play as the house band at Gibson's. They developed a style of their own with a mixture of blues, soul, gospel, and R&B and got the opportunity to play with Shep and the Limelites, John Lee Hooker, Jerry Butler, and the Impressions.

Wendell played with "Wild" Jimmy Spruill, Inez and Charlie Fox, and finally with Tommy Knight where he met Popsy Dixon. In 1979, Sherman found

HOLMES BROTHERS

Wendell and Popsy Dixon a gig at an East Village bar called Dan Lynch's. It was at this club that the Holmes Brothers along with Popsy solidified their three-part vocal harmony which was heard by producer Andy Breslaw who introduced them to Rounder Records. The group signed a recording contract with Rounder Records in 1989, and a year later In the Spirit was released leading to a series of performances and five European tours in just two years.

The Holmes Brothers were invited by Peter Gabriel to travel to his studio in Bath, England, and record a compilation album called A Week in the Real World along with their own album entitled Jubilation. Breslaw also encouraged them to act in the movie Lottoland by John Rubino and to record the soundtrack. The Holmes Brothers continue to perform and record in New York with their flexible ability to play almost any style of music.

HEATHER PINSON

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography

In the Spirit (1990, Rounder 2056).
Where It's At (1991, Rounder 2111).
Jubilation (1992, Real World).
Soul Street (1993, Rounder).
Promised Land (1996, Rounder).
Speaking in Tongues (2001, Alligator Records AL 4877).
Righteous! The Essential Collection (2002, Rounder).

HOLMES, WRIGHT

b. 4 July 1903; Hightower, TX
d. 12 September 1970; Houston, TX

Singer/guitarist Holmes played in the Dowling Street area of Houston in the 1930s and 1940s and recorded a few sides in 1947, notably a garbled, eccentrically accented, seemingly impromptu yet mesmerizing "Alley Special." Soon afterward he forswore the clubs and, when interviewed in 1967, was playing only in church.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Smith, Chris. "'Alley Special': Wright Holmes." Blues & Rhythm no. 36 (May/June 1988): 19.

Discography: LSFP

HOLMSTROM, RICK

b. 30 May 1965; Fairbanks, AL

While growing up in Alaska, he was introduced by his radio disk-jockey father to blues and early rock 'n' roll. After moving to California in 1985, he began hearing live blues, then began playing it himself as guitarist. His two Black Top albums with harmonica player Johnny Dyer led to better performing opportunities, including a tenure with Rod Piazza. His solo efforts range from straight blues to avant-garde.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Char Ham)
Bays, K. "Flying Solo: How Rick Holmstrom Went from Purist to Techno-Blues Visionary." Blues Revue no. 80 (February–March 2003): 19–22.

Discography: AMG (Char Ham)

HOLT, NICK

b. 15 January 1940; near Grenada, MS

Bassist; brother of Magic Slim. Lived near Grenada, Mississippi, until 1956. Early singing and musical training was in the church. Also played a "one-string" wire attached to the side of a house wall. He moved to Chicago, and soon began working in Big City Laundry until 1969. He began playing bass for Magic Slim in 1960, eventually making music with his brother a full-time career in 1978.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Ulrey, Lois. "Nick Holt." Magic Blues no. 2 (1991): 18–21; excerpts published as "Nick Holt: I Can Holler Too." Living Blues no. 136 (November/December 1997): 23.

Discography

You Better Watch Yourself (1998, Wolf Records 120.883).

HOLTS, ROOSEVELT

b. 15 January 1905; Tylertown, MS
d. 27 February 1994; Franklinton, LA

A relative and disciple of Tommy Johnson, Holts's importance lies in his ability to combine elements learned from his influential mentor (see the song "Big Road Blues"). David Evans extensively recorded him in 1966. Two albums were issued in his name, one for Blue Horizon and one for Arhoolie.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

- Evans, David. "Roosevelt Holts Interview." Blues Unlimited 116 (November/December 1975): 9–11.
 Ryan, Marc. The Franklinton Muscatel Society (1993, Blue Moon CDBM 091).

Discography: LSFP

See also Johnson, Tommy

HOME COOKING

Label founded in the mid-1980s by Roy Ames, initially featuring Houston-area blues musicians; the first releases included recordings of Weldon "Juke Boy" Bonner, T-Bone Walker, and Lightnin' Hopkins. Many releases, whether of living or deceased musicians, have been criticized in print for raw demonstration-quality production and for apparent lack of creative input from the living musicians.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Danchin, Sebastian. "Home Cooked Texas Blues: Roy C. Ames." Soul Bag no. 121 (Autumn 1990): 14–17.
 Sherman, Jim. "It's the Roy Ames Way: Texas Rip Off." Blues Access no. 20 (Winter 1994/1995): 10–20.

HOMESICK JAMES

b. James Williamson, 30 April 1910; Somerville, TN

A contemporary and acquaintance of Robert Johnson, Son House, Johnny Shines, Big Joe Williams, Elmore James and other major blues luminaries, Homesick James has been described as the quintessential bluesman—a guitarist who evolved from itinerant Delta songster to Chicago-based recording artist and performer.

Citations of his birth date and year have varied, from 30 April or 3 May, and from 1905, 1910, or 1914. Some sources list his birth name as John William Henderson. Williamson ran away from home at an early age, playing at dances, picnics, and fish fries throughout Mississippi, Tennessee, and North Carolina during the 1920s. During that period, he met and worked with Sleepy John Estes, Yank Rachell, and Blind Boy Fuller, the latter of whom he names as his mentor. Moving to Chicago in 1930, Williamson worked at various clubs and juke joints both in the city and throughout the South during the next two decades, recording briefly with the Victor label in Memphis, Tennessee, in 1937. He also performed as a sideman to blues artists Big Bill Broonzy, Albert King, and Memphis Minnie, his reported girlfriend, as well as forming his own touring band in 1938. However, it was not until 1951 that he recorded several sides for the Chance Label in Chicago. One song, "Homesick," became a local hit in 1952 and led to Williamson's nickname. From 1955 to 1963, he played rhythm guitar with the Broomdusters, a band led by his supposed second cousin, slide guitarist Elmore James. Since James's death in 1963, Williamson has continued to record for a number of labels, and to tour both in the United States and internationally, where he enjoys an enthusiastic following.

DAVID BEAUDOUIN

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Santelli
 "Homesick James." Centerstage Chicago website, <http://centerstage.net/music/whoswho/HomesickJames.html>.
 Obrecht, Jas. "Homesick and Elmore James: Sonic Secrets of One of the Greatest Blues Bands." Guitar Player 27, no. 9 (September 1993): 68–85.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

HOOCHIE COOCHIE MAN

"Hoochie Coochie Man" is a pivotal song in the history of the blues. Written by Willie Dixon and first recorded for Chess Records by Muddy Waters on January 7, 1954 (with Dixon playing the bass), "Hoochie Coochie Man" was an instant hit for Waters and was soon on its way to becoming a definitive song in the Chicago blues style as well as a seminal song to what was to become rock 'n' roll. Dixon reportedly first presented the lyrics to this song and its classic, often imitated, da-dadada-dum rhythm to Muddy Waters in the men's room of The Zanibar, a Chicago nightclub where Waters enjoyed a regular performance schedule. Waters then talked his band through the chord changes at the beginning of their next set and, according to Dixon, received such a positive response from the audience that they played it two or three more times that evening. It soon became the biggest hit of Waters's career, spending three months on the Billboard charts, reaching the number three position.

In "Hoochie Coochie Man" Dixon combines several aspects of Delta blues, New Orleans jazz, African American culture, and pop music of the day. At this point in his career, Muddy Waters was relying mostly on reworking traditional Delta blues into an electric, band-oriented setting. With "Hoochie Coochie Man," Dixon enables Waters to break away from this formula, while still remaining true to his blues roots. By maintaining the standard I-IV-V7 musical structure of the blues and also by lyrically relating some of the superstitious beliefs held by many rural blacks of the day, Dixon, via Waters, is able to maintain the connection with the black audience as he begins to embellish on this time-tested musical structure and thus help to carry the blues to its next inevitable level. Dixon also employs a musical stop-phrase, common in contemporary New Orleans jazz styles of the day, which allows for an instrumental phrase to be played over a short silence. Dixon draws from this stop-phrase delivery, yet, instead of using an instrumental phrase over this silence, in the case of "Hoochie Coochie Man," he implants an a capella vocal phrase over the two and a half beats of silence. Waters uses a similar stop-phrase beat earlier in 1953 with his recording of "Mad Love (I Want You to Love Me)." Although this song uses a very similar beat, it does not remain faithful to the rhythmic "punch" produced by Dixon's stoic attention to the two and a half beats of instrumental silence.

After Waters's success, "Hoochie Coochie Man" would become a staple in the sets of many blues artists to follow including B. B. King, Buddy Guy, and John Hammond, as well as Willie Dixon himself. It would also work its way into the set lists and recordings of many rock artists including Chuck Berry, the Allman Brothers, Eric Clapton, and Jimi Hendrix.

Waters would also revisit this stop-phrase beat many times throughout his career, as would many of his contemporaries. In another of his signature songs, "Mannish Boy," Waters employs this musical phrase verbatim as well as using lyrics of sexual bravado and superstitious beliefs reminiscent of those used in "Hoochie Coochie Man." This classic blues phrase would eventually work its way into the psyche of modern culture by being featured in musical genres from folk to rock and even children's songs as well as being used in television and radio commercials.

BRYAN GROVE

Bibliography

AMG

Filene, Benjamin. Romancing the Folk: Public Memory and American Roots Music. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 2000.

Gordon, Robert. Can't Be Satisfied: The Life and Times of Muddy Waters. New York: Little, Brown and Company, 2002.

Palmer, Robert. Booklet accompanying Muddy Waters: The Chess Box (MCA CHD3-80002; 3 CDs).

Snowden, Don. Booklet accompanying Willie Dixon: The Chess Box (MCA CHD2-16500; 2 CDs).

HOOD, WILLIE

(See Rhythm Willie)

HOODOO

Hoodoo is one of the most misunderstood phenomena of North American black culture. The blues above any other cultural creation formulated within black society has maintained a direct relationship with hoodoo. If hoodoo is the religion of the blues, then the blues is the anthem of hoodoo.

Before venturing into the specifics of the mutual relationship between the blues and hoodoo, it would be best to clear up some of the misunderstandings regarding hoodoo. To begin, the word "hoodoo" is not a transposition of the word "Voodoo." They are two entirely different words often used synonymously but nonetheless incorrectly. Further confusion over these two words is evident in instances where hoodoo and Voodoo are practiced in the same geographical location, such as New Orleans. Hoodoo is a fragmented system of magic and medicine, while Voodoo, as the word is spelled in New Orleans, is a religion.

In general, a religion is comprised of certain components working together to form a cohesive body of ritualistic activities generally performed within a collective body. Throughout the world, one can find religions that are comprised of hierarchical leadership, often in the form of priests, ministers, pastors, deacons, bishops, church elders, queen mothers, and other clerical titles. In general, the hierarchical leadership within a given religion facilitates communal engagements. In addition most religions have a specific location for worship services, be it a temple, a church, a synagogue, or a shrine. More often than not, religions are comprised of acts of ritual, which join the roles of hierarchical leadership and communal engagement. These can take the form of baptismal services, rites of passage, secret society oaths, or a child-naming ceremony. Finally, most religions provide a process for the act of worship, and/or insist that its adherents express measures of placation, reverence, and faith to at least one, if not more, spiritual beings. All of these elements are dependent on the operations of each other to create a functioning religion in its purest sense of the word. These are the basic structural elements of nearly any given religion, which should not be confused with the individual practice of religion. Structurally speaking, hoodoo is not comprised of those features that would constitute a religion.

With few exceptions, most enslaved Africans in North America were acculturated under the hegemony of Protestant Anglo-American Christian slaveholders and as such were unable to maintain relations to the structural religious elements of their former African spiritual systems. Of those few exceptions in North America where Africans were enslaved and may have practiced non-Protestant faiths, such as Catholicism in Louisiana, and the Quaker faith in the Northeast, one will still find the practice of hoodoo. Slave territories with majority Catholic populations afforded enslaved Africans a wider opportunity to mask and redirect the pluralist aspects of African cosmology. Some of the likely factors that created these opportunities are perhaps the large isolated communities of enslaved Africans coupled with some structural similarities between Catholicism and African cosmology as well as the fundamental feature in nearly all African cosmological systems to be inclusive of other spiritual paradigms. The existence of these and other factors kept alive the present-day New World black religions such as Brazilian Candomble, Cuban Lukumi, Puerto Rican Santeria, Haitian Vodun, and New Orleans Voodoo.

Hoodoo adherents in slave-holding areas dominated by the Protestant faith were forced to collapse their understanding of multiple spiritual forces into the dichotomous Protestant spiritual forces: Jesus or the devil (savage). As an evolutionary result of years of lost cultural knowledge, hybrid cosmological thoughts, and the suppression and oppression of African religious expression, hoodoo has no defined deities. Hoodoo's major spiritual counterpart was Southern Protestant Christianity and in comparison to the whole of African cosmological thought, it is a rather restrictive spiritual system. While religion was doled out to blacks in highly controlled, minute formulations during the better portion of slavery it was virtually force fed to them during the last fifty years of slavery. Within this process, the option for spiritual transposition is limited by the lack of pluralistic spiritual expressions, which are not found in Southern Protestantism.

What Is Hoodoo?

Hoodoo is a highly individualized practice of magic and medicine formulated from an admixture of cultural beliefs. Note that, while the structural elements of ritual, spiritual placation, communal engagement, hierarchical leadership, and specific sites of worship are absent in hoodoo, hoodoo is not absent from the other New World black religions listed previously. Through the combined use of magic, medicine, and the interpretation of dreams and signs, hoodoo is concerned with the primary issues of love, health, prosperity, revenge, and protection. Although it would be incorrect to assume that hoodoo does not have strong elements of early European and Native American cosmological influences, the core formulations of hoodoo and the blues are rooted in African cosmological foundations. These foundations, which are present in both hoodoo and the blues, break down in the following manner: a proactive standpoint, transformation, and magic and medicine, as discussed next.

Proactive Standpoint

One who has a proactive standpoint believes that human beings are able to effectuate earthly changes in their day-to-day life through the means of supernatural engagement. In the case of hoodoo this takes place on a very individual basis through the use of charms usually constructed from a combination of found objects, roots, herbs, personal articles, animal parts, dirt, and, most importantly, focused intention. Personal intention can override any of the powers found within the objects used and this fact further personalizes the inherent individuality found in hoodoo.

Transformation

Transformation is the belief that various means of supernatural engagement will transform an individual's circumstances. Generally this transformation is believed to take place immediately. In the Robert Johnson song "Hellhound on My Trail," he is immediately affected by the "hot foot powder" and sets upon the road to "ramblin'." Transformation in the hoodoo system takes place within three basic concepts: Magic is the use of charms and personal objects, laying of tricks, and employing of herbs for curative and malevolent reasons, and magic is used where situations are temporally altered. Dreams provide a source of personal divination. Signs act as a form of precautionary forecast.

Hoodoo, while being a far flung child of African cosmology, is still predicated on the belief that all objects as well as occurrences in the universe, such as signs and dreams, contain their own life force. This life force is both secular and sacred, acting as a fluid energy and maintaining an ebb and flow within the daily lives of human beings. Within hoodoo one need only know how to direct these life forces in order to gain the desired results. Within various cultures the concept of a life force is described in many ways: the Yoruba of West Africa call it “ache,” in China it is called “Chi,” and in Mali, it is known as “Nommo.” Under the system of hoodoo one would generally employ the help of a root or hoodoo doctor. It was believed that such a person better understood the natural forces of the universe, and would then combine their knowledge of these forces along with the customer’s intentions to enact transformation of a given situation. With the advent of manufactured hoodoo products, and the migration of blacks to urban areas, the root or hoodoo doctor was gradually removed from this equation.

Magic and Medicine

There is the belief that magic and medicine can be both harmful and curative, while simultaneously serving as an agent of transformation. It is not uncommon for hoodoo to be referenced as evil and the blues to be referenced as devil’s music. Two cultural reasons can account for this phenomenon. First, the concept that hoodoo causes illness was often overemphasized within the minds of blacks as they negotiated the superimposed Protestant cultural phenomena of good versus evil. Ma Rainey’s “Black Dust Blues” provides a good example of hoodoo in blues acting as a causative agent for illness. A jealous woman accuses the narrator of stealing her man, and swears revenge; later, the narrator finds black dust sprinkled around the entrance to her house and is beset with illness. While the story is one of revenge, the song also illustrates hoodoo’s employment as an agent to counter inappropriate social behaviors. Yet within the dominant society, the act of causing illness would stand out because it does not fit within the larger social framework of either Christian morals or American jurisprudence. Under such cultural paradigms it is clear how hoodoo came to be perceived as evil.

Second, blacks employed hoodoo as a means to “negotiate oppression” very much in the same manner in which they employed the blues to articulate oppression. It would not be in the best interest of the dominant culture to allow black agency through the usage of hoodoo, therefore, hoodoo had to be framed as acts against society mores.

Actions of aggression employed through the use of hoodoo are often not contextualized for their necessity of use among an institutionally marginalized population, and are all too often only understood as behaviors contrary to Christian mores. This phenomenon has often been applied to both the blues and hoodoo, thereby associating both with the devil. Hoodoo as a whole operates as a social mediator and spiritual law enforcement tool with blues as its informant. On a continuum from slavery to the present, hoodoo has become far more associated for the harm it can do, as opposed to any good it has to offer.

Hoodoo’s role as a social mediator is clear when we listen to the blues. By examining a few lyrics from any blues song that references “goffer dust,” we are better able to see this issue. Goffer dust is commonly thought to be graveyard dirt, and primarily used to direct illness against another. This important hoodoo ingredient has been employed perhaps more often than any other ingredient found in blues songs. Harry Middleton Hyatt in Volume 1 of his Hoodoo—Conjuration—Witchcraft—Rootwork documents nearly thirty instances of the use of goffer dust. Within these instances, there are at least half a dozen different meanings of what goffer dust is and how it is employed. The following lyrical excerpts illustrate not only the various ways in which goffer dust is utilized, but also the means in which it is employed as a tool for social mediation.

“I Don’t Know”

(Cripple Clarence Lofton)

Getting sick and tired of the way you do

Time, Mama, I’m gonna poison you

Sprinkle goffer dust around your bed

Wake up some morning, find your own self dead.

“Hoodoo Blues”

(Bessie Brown)

I’m on the war path now, I’m mean and evil I vow

Some woman stole my man, to get even I’ve a plan

Gonna sprinkle ding’ ’em dust all around her door.

Goffer Dust

The key to understanding these lyrics and the many more like them would be to understand that blues is not merely music, it is working class black American culture expressed in musical form. The isolation of blues as music delimits its identity and commodifies working class black American culture into a product employed by external society members as a peeking window. Therefore it is no wonder that over the years the only interpretation that lyrics of this nature obtained were that of acts of malevolence. But, these lyrics are weighted with contradiction, which cannot be simply explained away, by merely focusing on their malevolent nature. Take for example, Cripple Clarence Lofton's "I Don't Know": "Sprinkle goffer dust around your bed / Wake up some morning, find your own self dead." The title of the song, "I Don't Know," suggests ambivalence. The song's lyrics speak of a looming death. Lofton's mate has treated him poorly, and she must pay. But, Lofton also speaks of the ability to "wake up" and find [her] "own self dead." Clearly a literal death cannot be interpreted by these words. Other lyrics, which play on undoable actions, peppered with words of kindness, begin to shatter the concept of complete malevolence as the driving motive for the use of hoodoo. Lofton wants his mate to understand that she has committed an act of transgression, and that, while civil court may not be an option, the use of hoodoo is.

On the surface, the blues, like other black musical genre before it, appeared to be nothing more than "Negro" entertainment. But at its core were encoded life's lessons. Blacks of the southern industrial agricultural labor force relied heavily on both hoodoo and blues, as both a source of entertainment as well as a guide and informant.

Although there are gender differences to these experiences, simple examination of the blues illustrates that women as well as men, equally conveyed their messages of a harsh life via the theme of "love gone wrong."

Hoodoo is further operationalized in the blues as lyrics that describe the desire and need to travel. These lyrics represent issues of transformation where the act of traveling serves as the actual mojo. The phrase "Leaving this morning," is echoed frequently throughout the blues, and is not just a message about a fast get away, but symbolizes empowerment, the agency to alter one's situation.

In African cosmology, it is change and the personal enactment to spark such change that defines agency for humans. Such an understanding is clear upon examination of the blues and hoodoo within the framework of African cosmology. For example the word "mojo," from the Kikongo language and culture means "spiritual spark," "force," or "soul". In the music of the blues the use of a "mojo" activates transformation while allowing both performer and listening audience opportunity to communicate with the supernatural world. Blues acts as "Nommo," the West African concept meaning to literally speak transformation into being.

Blues songs on the subjects of sex and food represent larger issues of self-control. As the blues was developing so were initial opportunities for working class blacks to exercise personal desires with regard to their choice of sexual mates, as well as their consumption of food items. These two combine to create some of the most outlandish blues lyrics, such as: "Put a little sugar in my bowl"; "Jelly roll"; "Now I'm goin' to put in my order mama, for two weeks ahead. I'd rather eat your cookin' than my own home bread. You's a love makin' mama. . . ." To some people, these lyrics may seem to indicate issues of immorality in black society, and if that was the case, it had to do with larger issues of social injustice, whereas by contrast issues of sexuality and food were pleasures and necessities of life not requiring moral condemnation.

Hoodoo and the blues are the magic and sound that emerged from the dust of North American enslavement and the dry air of Jim Crow. And the two could only take shape within the mythic riddle-laden hoodoo as it served a religion-like function for the blues, while the blues saluted hoodoo in the best way it could by keeping its "mojo workin'."

PHOENIX SAVAGE-WISEMAN

Bibliography

- Bahemuka, Judith Mbula. Our Religious Heritage. Nairobi, Kenya: Thomas Nelson & Sons Ltd., 1983.
- Boles, John. Masters & Slaves in the House of the Lord: Race and Religion in the American South 1740-1870. Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1984.
- Carter, Keith. Mojo. Houston, TX: Rice University Press, 1992.
- Creel, W. Margaret. A Peculiar People: Slave Religion and Community—Culture Among the Gullahs. New York: New York University Press, 1988.
- Davis, Francis. The History of the Blues. New York: Hyperion Press, 1995.
- Davis, Rod. American Voodoo: Journey into a Hidden World. Denton: University of North Texas Press, 1998.
- Duval-Harrison, Daphne. Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
- Earl, Riggins. Dark Symbols, Obscure Signs: God, Self, & Community in the Slave Mind. Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1993.
- Fulop, Timothy, and Albert Raboteau. African-American Religion: Interpretive Essays In History and Culture. New York: Routledge Press, 1997.
- Herron, Leonora, and Alice Bacon. "Conjuring and Conjure Doctors." In Mother Wit from the Laughing Barrel, edited by Alan Dundes. New York: Garland Publishing, 1973.
- Hurston, Zora Neal. "Hoodoo in America." Journal of American Folklore 44, no. 174 (1931).
- Hyatt, Harry. Hoodoo—Conjuration—Witchcraft—Rootwork, Vols. 1-5. Hannibal, MO: Western Publishing, 1970.

HOODOO

- Jackson, Bruce. "The Other Kind of Doctor: Conjuring and Magic in Black American Folk Medicine." In African-American Religion: Interpretive Essays in History and Culture, edited by Timothy Fulop and Albert Raboteau. New York: Routledge Press, 1997.
- Levine, Lawrence. Black Culture and Black Consciousness: Afro-American Folk Thought from Slavery to Freedom. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.
- Mitchell, Faith. Hoodoo Medicine: Gullah Herbal Remedies. Columbia, SC: Summerhouse Press, 1999.
- Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Penguin Book, 1981.
- Savage, Phoenix. The Evolution of Hoodoo in Mississippi and Contemporary Black Health.
- Spencer, Jon Michael. Blues and Evil. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993.
- Voeks, Robert. African Medicine and Magic in the Americas. New York: American Geographic Society, 1993.
- Watson, Wilbur. Black Folk Medicine. New Brunswick, NJ: Transaction Books, 1984.
- Unpublished master's thesis. University of Mississippi, Oxford, 2001.

HOOKER, EARL ZEBEDEE

- b. 15 January 1929; Quitman County, MS
d. 21 April 1970; Chicago, IL

Among his peers, Earl Hooker is widely considered the greatest guitarist of his generation. His wild performances attracted a loyal following wherever he went as he entertained the crowds by playing behind his back, picking the guitar with his feet or teeth, or doing flips on stage without missing a note. Hooker always had a predilection for the latest electric guitar technology, becoming famous for his double-neck guitars and even making the wah-wah pedal work in a blues context. In addition to blues he had incorporated country and western music in his repertoire early on. Hooker was the archetype of the rambling bluesman, having spent most of his life on the road. Along the way he cut singles for a host of tiny labels that did little to get the word out. The result was that he remained little known outside the insular blues world until the late 1960s.

Born in the Mississippi Delta (1930 is sometimes cited as a birth year), Earl Zebedee Hooker arrived in Chicago as a child. As a youngster he began playing music in the streets with future blues artists Bo Diddley and Louis Myers. He met Robert Nighthawk in Chicago in the early 1940s and it was Nighthawk who became his primary influence, teaching him the rudiments of his remarkable slide technique. Hooker would eventually surpass his mentor, developing an entirely new language for the slide guitar. Hooker frequently ran away from home, often heading down South to play music. During these trips he reunited with Nighthawk and played with Ike Turner, Sonny Boy Williamson, and others. He formed the Roadmasters in the early 1950s and with constantly changing personnel played all over the country for the next twenty years.

Hooker's initial recordings were in 1952 for King with Johnny O'Neal, cutting sides the following year for Rockin' and Sun. By the early 1950s he was back in Chicago cutting singles for Argo, C.J., and Bea & Baby before joining with producer Mel London (owner of Chief and Age) in 1959. For the next four years, he recorded both as sideman and leader for the producer, backing Junior Wells, Bobby Saxton, Lillian Offitt, Ricky Allen, Big Moose Walker, and A. C. Reed plus cutting notable instrumentals like "Blue Guitar" and "Blues in D-Natural." He also contributed slide work to Muddy Waters's 1962 Chess waxing "You Shook Me." After Age folded Hooker recorded sporadically between 1964 and 1968 for tiny outfits like Cuca, Jim-Ko, Duplex, and again for C.J.

He finally drew increased attention during the late 1960s starting with Two Bugs & A Roach, his first full-length album, for Arhoolie in 1968. In 1969 he hooked up with ABC-BluesWay churning out several albums for the label in addition to playing on records of BluesWay artists such as Andrew Odum, Johnny "Big Moose" Walker, Charles Brown, his cousin John Lee Hooker, and others. In late 1969, Hooker traveled to Europe to play in the American Folk Blues Festival. By this time, he was quite ill with advancing tuberculosis, a condition he battled his entire life, and after his return was admitted to a Chicago sanitarium where he passed away on April 21, 1970.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Danchin, Sebastian. Earl Hooker: Blues Master. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2001.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings in Reissue

Play Your Guitar Mr. Hooker (1993, Black Top 1093).
Two Bugs & A Roach (1993, Arhoolie CD-324).
Earl Hooker: Simply the Best (1999, MCA 11811).

See also ABC-Paramount/BluesWay; Arhoolie/Blues Classics/Folk Lyric; Chicago; Hooker, John Lee; Kansas City Red; Nighthawk, Robert; Sun/Phillips International/Flip; Turner, Ike; Walker, Johnny Mayon "Big Moose"; Wells, Junior

HOOKER, JOHN LEE

b. 22 August 1917; near Clarksdale, MS
 d. 21 June 2001; Los Altos, CA

John Lee Hooker is known as The Hook, King of the Boogie, and Godfather of the Blues. He was a giant of the form and a unique performer. Unlike Lonnie Johnson, T-Bone Walker, or B. B. King, highly gifted musicians and professional showmen who had a profound influence on younger generations of guitarists, Hooker was a storyteller, a completely untutored, unstructured, and unselfconscious artist who could not be imitated.

Along with Lightnin' Hopkins, he is the most-recorded figure in the history of the blues. His guitar playing was percussive, without orthodoxy or connection to Mississippi, Texas, or any other perceived regional style. His lyrics were often spontaneous and ran roughshod over niceties like the twelve-measure structure and other conventions of form. He could moan, scream, plead, hum, or scat; in the same verse he might speak, waver with a wild, seemingly uncontrollable vibrato or simply sing—on pitch—in a very sonorous and melodious voice. Part of the tension with John Lee Hooker was that he was so incredibly unpredictable. He listened only to his inner logic. The mysterious qualities he brought to a performance are perhaps as evocative of the centuries of African American experience as anything that has ever been. There is no possible way to imitate an artist like John Lee Hooker.

He played finger-style (not with a flat pick) on both electric and acoustic guitar. He used open string keys, primarily E and E minor, when in standard tuning. For many songs, particularly boogies, he used open tunings in A major (low to high: E–A–E–A–C#–E) or G major (D–G–D–G–B–D). He played in both duple (straight eighth) and triple (shuffle) rhythms, and used several different strumming techniques, including what appears to be his own take on the Carter Family Strum.

Early Years

Hooker was born near Clarksdale, Mississippi (some sources say Vance, Mississippi), to a family of

John Lee Hooker. (Photo by Tom Copi, © Frank Driggs Collection)

