sharecroppers. His father, William Hooker, was a part-time preacher. At age eleven, John Lee began to play guitar; one was given to him by blues singer Tony Hollins. When he was fourteen, his mother Minnie Ramsey remarried. His stepfather Will Moore (not to be mistaken for the Willie Moore who played guitar with Charley Patton and Son House), was a significant influence on Hooker's development, giving him some basic lessons on the instrument.

In 1933, Hooker moved to Memphis, Tennessee, and two years later to Cincinnati, Ohio, singing gospel with such groups as the Fairfield Four, as well as blues. Hooker arrived in Detroit, Michigan in 1943, at the height of wartime activity in the automotive plants. He got a job as a janitor, and performed at clubs and house parties. His recording career began in 1948, when his first manager, Elmer Barbee, helped connect him to producer Bernie Besman. On November 3, 1948, he recorded "Boogie Chillen'," which was issued on Modern, a label that would be home over the years to B. B. King and many other blues icons.

"Boogie Chillen'" hit number one on the Race records juke box chart in February 1949, much to the surprise of Hooker. He quit his day job. Other hits followed: "Crawlin' Kingsnake" (1949), "I'm in the Mood" (1951) on Modern, and numerous songs on the Regal, Gone, Staff, and Sensation labels. Because of his contractual obligations, Hooker recorded under various pseudonyms: Birmingham Sam, John Lee Booker, Texas Slim, Delta John, and others. He never changed his sound or style. He recorded for Chess from 1952 to 1954, continuing to moonlight on different labels.

In the late 1950s and early 1960s, he was associated with Vee-Jay Records, where he stayed until 1964. During this period his influence was strongly felt by the British blues scene, particularly with the releases of "Dimples" (1956) and "Boom Boom" (1962).

Solo Performer or Bandleader

Because of the profoundly idiosyncratic nature of his music, John Lee Hooker was most effective musically as a solo performer. By himself he could ramble at will, singing and playing whatever occurred to him, and he never failed to mesmerize his audience.

Because he was a storyteller first and foremost, his band recordings stand out less than his solo pieces. The LP That's My Story: John Lee Hooker Sings the Blues, produced in 1960 by Orrin Keepnews, provided Hooker with an enviable rhythm section consisting of jazz bassist Sam Jones and drummer Louis Hayes, who were with Cannonball Adderley at the time.

Although the trio sound is full, and Hooker appears relaxed, Hayes and particularly Jones get turned around repeatedly on such cuts as "I Need Some Money," "I'm Wanderin'," and "No More Doggin'." The odd meters, false starts, abrupt shifts of texture, and other characteristics of Hooker's music don't translate well to ensemble performance.

On "Blues Before Sunrise" (1956), he's accompanied by a small group of backing musicians obviously trained in the standard blues protocol. Hooker begins singing the verse at the sixth measure (instead of the first). The band, however, continues with the traditional arrangement of the song, and the contrast between what they're playing and what he's singing is quite dramatic.

John Lee Hooker had a unique strength and focus. He never counted measures or beats. Once the music got going he simply went his own way, for better or worse. These examples testify to his individuality but also speak very clearly to his limitations as an ensemble musician.

A Different Audience

Throughout the 1960s Hooker gained more fans among young whites, as opposed to the almost entirely black audience that was his before. The white fans were from the worlds of folk and rock. He performed at the Newport Folk Festival in 1960 and the Newport Jazz Festival in 1964. He toured England on a number of occasions and performed at hip rock clubs in New York and other big cities.

In 1970 Hooker left Detroit and moved to Oakland. He recorded with Canned Heat, a white blues-rock group whose founding members Bob Hite and Al Wilson had been strongly influenced by him over the years. This kept him in the rock limelight. His other recordings of the 1970s were not musically significant, and by the end of the decade his career had slumped. In 1980 he was inducted into the Blues Foundation's Hall of Fame, and appeared in the Blues Brothers movie the same year.

Resurgence

With the release of The Healer (1989, Chameleon), Hooker entered a new phase of his career. The record, produced by Roy Rogers, Hooker's former guitarist, had guest appearances by Bonnie Raitt, Carlos Santana, and Robert Cray. The CD, which outsold all previous Hooker recordings, won a Grammy Award for best blues recording. In 1990 he was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

A special tribute concert followed in New York City's Madison Square Garden, with many stars in the blues and rock fields performing. Continuing in the same vein, Hooker and Rogers released Mr. Lucky (1991, Point Blank) and again sold in big numbers, but the emphasis was on the guest stars. Hooker by now was really aging, and he couldn't keep up with the demands of recording at this level any more.

Until his death in 2001, Hooker shared with B. B. King the title of elder statesman of the blues. He was semi-retired for the last decade and performed or recorded rarely. He continued to receive awards, including a commemorative stamp bearing his photo in 1996 from the country of Tanzania. Knowing the financial pitfalls of the music business, Hooker over the years saved and invested money and lived comfortably, first near Los Angeles and then in Los Altos, a genteel area south of San Francisco. His four marriages yielded eight surviving children, Zakiya and Robert (both musicians), Diane, Karen, John, Jr., Shyvonne, Lavetta, and Francis.

What is the special appeal of John Lee Hooker? His music is demanding, an acquired taste. He reminds us of the griot tradition of African tribes. He possesses a magic that more polished and sophisticated performers lose, or never had in the first place. As B. B. King said many years ago about his dear friend and colleague, "Whenever they say true blues, pure blues, John Lee Hooker comes as close to it as anybody I've ever heard."

Because of the impossibility of accurately cataloging Hooker's five-decade recording career—perhaps the largest output of any blues performer—the reader is encouraged to examine a particular website, The World's Greatest Blues Singer. Compiled by Claus Röhnisch, this English-language website contains a full Hooker discography, a year-by-year recap of his life, selected obituaries and numerous other items of interest. There are also links to different Hooker (and related) websites. Röhnisch's site is updated frequently.

LENNY CARLSON

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Cohn, Lawrence, ed. Nothing But the Blues. New York: Abbeville Press, 1993.
Obrecht, Jas. "John Lee Hooker: Boogie All the Time." Living Blues no. 133 (May/June 1997): 12–21.
Sykes, Marc R. "John Lee Hooker." In St. James Encyclopedia of Popular Culture.

The Gale Group, 2002. http://www.findarticles.com/cf_0/g1epc/bio/2419200559/print.jhtml.

Transcription Books

- Carlson, Lenny, author/transcriber. John Lee Hooker: Vintage Blues Guitar. Pacific, MO: Mel Bay Publications, 1996.
DeVinck, Richard and Bernard Besman, eds. John Lee Hooker: Vital Blues Guitar: Authentic Tablature Transcriptions Off the Original Recordings. Ojai, CA: Creative Concepts, 1992.
Röhnisch, Claus. "John Lee Hooker: The World's Greatest Blues Singer." <http://w1.191.telia.com/~u19104970/johnnielee.html>.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

- First release, produced by Bernie Besman (1912–2003) at United Sound Studios, Detroit:
"Sally May" backed with "Boogie Chillen'" (November 3, 1948, Modern #20-627 B7003 and B7006).
John Lee Hooker: The Modern Detroit Years 1948–1955 (1994, Flair, V21Z39658).

HOPKINS, JOEL

b. 3 January 1904; Centerville, TX

d. 15 February 1975; Galveston, TX

Acoustic guitarist and country blues singer, Joel Hopkins started playing guitar at the age of nine, and began a part-time career in 1922, when he met Blind Lemon Jefferson and followed him for five years. Later, Joel Hopkins recorded alone with Mack McCormick for the British Heritage Label, and with his brothers John Henry Hopkins and Sam "Lightnin'" Hopkins, for Arhoolie, on February 16, 1964, and again in March 1965.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
Arhoolie Records website, <http://www.arhoolie.com/titles/340.shtml>.
The Hopkins Brothers. Joel, Lightning, & John Henry. 1991 [1964 and 1965], Arhoolie CD/CASS 340).

Discography: LSFP

See also Hopkins, Sam "Lightnin'"

HOPKINS, LINDA

b. Helen Melinda Matthews, 9 November 1925; New Orleans, LA

Vocalist. Recorded with Johnny Otis, 1951. Hopkins toured with the show Jazz Train, called the Broadway Express in Europe, 1960. Featured tribute to Bessie Smith, Me and Bessie, from January 1974. She has continued to play this role in parallel with work such as the album How Blue Can You Get (1982, Palo Alto 8034).

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Hess, Norbert. "I Ain't Bessie, The Story of Linda Hopkins." Blues Unlimited no. 124 (March/June 1977): 12.

Discography: LSFP

HOPKINS, SAM "LIGHTNIN' "

b. 15 March 1912; Centerville, TX

d. 30 January 1982; Houston, TX

Sam "Lightnin'" Hopkins was one of six children born to musician father Abe and mother Francis Sims. Two of Hopkins's brothers, Joel and John Henry, were also musicians. Hopkins's first instrument was a homemade guitar from a cigar box with chicken wire for strings.

Life

In the early 1920s at the age of eight Hopkins spent time with Blind Lemon Jefferson, whom he met at a country picnic. Jefferson allowed Sam to perform with him, and Hopkins eventually became Jefferson's guide, which developed a lifelong bond between the two. Hopkins left home at an early age; and spent much of his teen years traveling through east Texas doing small gigs. During this period, Sam developed much of his guitar style from his cousin, Alger "Texas" Alexander, a local legend who didn't play guitar, but had a free-flowing vocal style that was unrestricted with regard to the traditional twelve-bar blues form. Hopkins and Alexander traveled regularly throughout Texas and parts of Mississippi to play house parties and juke joints. Hopkins spent some time in jail at Houston's County Prison Farm during the mid-1930s for an unknown offense, and rejoined with Alexander when he was released.

They were performing together in Houston's Third Ward when talent scout Lola Anne Cullum caught their act and was immediately impressed with Hopkins. Cullum dropped Alexander from the duo and replaced him with pianist "Thunder" Smith. Sam Hopkins was instantly renamed "Lightnin'" Hopkins, and the new duo was quickly signed to Los Angeles-based Aladdin Records. On May 9, under the name "Thunder and Lightnin'" they recorded their first sides, "Katie May," later followed by "Shotgun Blues," "Short Haired Woman," "Abilene" "Big Mama Jump," and others.

With Aladdin, a "race records" label, Hopkins recorded forty-three of his earliest sides from 1946 to 1948. Hopkins's recording career is incredibly diverse. Reportedly, he worked for more than twenty different labels, which led to what is widely known as possibly the most extensive and complex discography in history (more than eighty-five albums). He often recorded for two labels simultaneously and delivered slightly different versions of the same tunes for both. His greatest hits include "Tim Moore's Farm" (1949) for Modern/RPM, "T-Model Blues" for Bill Quinn's Gold Star, a label he recorded with from 1947-1949, "Give Me Central 209," "Coffee Blues" (1952) on Sittin' in With, and countless other tunes on Jax, Mercury, Decca, and other labels.

Near the end of the 1950s, the style of Lightnin' Hopkins was somewhat forgotten due to a lull in interest in country blues. His popularity resurged in 1959 when Houston blues scholar Mack McCormick presented him as a "pure" folk-blues artist to a new generation of blues lovers. Throughout the 1960s Hopkins suddenly found himself performing for an entirely new audience in coffee houses, college campuses, and festivals across the country.

During this period, Chris Strachwitz heard Hopkins in a Houston club, and afterwards he rereleased the Gold Star sides on his Arhoolie label. In addition, musicologist Sam Charters recorded a lengthy session of tunes in Hopkins's tiny apartment and produced an album on the legendary Folkways Records label that same year. A European tour followed in 1964, along with a variety of new record deals on Jewel, Candid, Vee-Jay, Verve Prestige/Bluesville, and others.

In 1960 Hopkins performed for Queen Elizabeth II, and in Carnegie Hall with Pete Seeger and Joan Baez on the same bill. In the 1960s he opened for the rock group Jefferson Airplane and performed with the Grateful Dead. After a 1970 car crash, he stayed home most of the time, choosing to give concerts on his porch or at a local bar. Hopkins was diagnosed with cancer of the esophagus and died of complications due to pneumonia on January 30, 1982.

Lightnin' Hopkins. (Photo by Tom Copi, courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Music

Hopkins was a prolific songwriter who was known for drawing on practically any life experience and weaving an entire composition from it instantaneously. Consequently, there was an overwhelming wealth of material available to him at any given time to compose for the many labels he worked for, as he made up verses spontaneously and altered lyrics to fit any occasion. He often began singing a lyric and allowed the guitar to complete the vocal phrase. He was also well known for stopping in the middle of a song to tell a humorous story as part of the performance. He played both electric and acoustic guitar, although the raunchier music was documented during the mid-1950s when he recorded the Herald Records sides, which contain legendary recordings of what is known as the best electric guitar performances of Hopkins's career. Such high-energy tunes such as "Lightnin's Boogie," "Lightnin's Special," and especially "Hopkins' Sky Hop" had great impact on future generations of guitarists, including Texas-born guitarist Stevie Ray Vaughan, Wild Child Butler, Buddy Guy, John Hammond, Jr., and Hound Dog Taylor.

Hopkins chose to live life on his own terms, filling his days in pursuit of all of his favorite activities: liquor, women, music, gambling, fishing, and black rodeo shows. He hated to fly and refused to have a telephone. At home in Houston, his favorite places to perform were scattered among Dowling Street in the Third Ward district, as well as on West Dallas Street. He much preferred to play for local bars for a meager twenty dollars than to tour for a week and make two thousand. He always liked to be paid up front and in cash before he would record for a label or producer, and rarely provided more than one take for each song. Because of his erratic style of singing and guitar playing, it was incredibly difficult for sidemen to follow him, and he was more comfortable performing without accompaniment.

Hopkins's personality and music was best captured on film by Les Blank's critically acclaimed 1968 short film entitled The Blues According to Lightnin' Hopkins, which won the Gold Hugo Award at the Chicago Film Festival for Outstanding Documentary in 1970.

WAYNE E. GOINS

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 Abernathy, Francis, et al., eds. Juneteenth Texas: Essays in African American Folklore. Denton: University of North Texas Press, 1996.
 Bentley, Chris. "Lightnin' Hopkins: Last of the Great Blues Singers, A Folk Poet in the True Sense of the Word." Juke Blues no. 40 (1998): 36–40.
 Blank, Les. "Lightnin' Hopkins, 1912–1982." Living Blues no. 53 (Summer/Autumn 1982): 15.
 Bowden, Dan, ed. Mel Bay Presents Lightnin' Hopkins: Blues Guitar Legend. Mel Bay, 1995.
 Cohn, Lawrence, ed. Nothing But the Blues. New York: Abbeville Press, 1993.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

HORNBUCKLE, LINDA

b. 1955

Singer active in the U.S. Pacific Northwest. Early singing was in gospel and commercial background work. In the early 1990s she was lead singer of the band No Delay, which included former members of the Paul DeLay Band. In recent years she has been leading and recording under her own name.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Bonner, Brett, et al. "40 under 40." Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 77–90.

HORTON, BIG WALTER

b. 6 April 1918; Horn Lake, MS

d. 8 December 1981; Chicago, IL

Walter Horton, child of Emma and Albert Horton, moved while still quite young to Memphis, Tennessee. A child prodigy, Horton learned to play the harmonica by the age of five. As a youth, he played with Frank Stokes, Jack Kelly, Little Buddy Doyle, the Memphis Jug Band, and others. Stories of Horton recording with the Memphis Jug Band in the 1920s have not been substantiated.

In 1939, Horton accompanied guitarist Doyle on his OKeh recording session in Memphis. From 1951 to 1953, Horton recorded as vocalist and harmonica virtuoso backed by small combos, which variously included Joe Willie Wilkins, Pat Hare, Jack Kelly, Joe Hill Louis, Willie Nix, Albert Williams, and others. Singles by "Mumbles" were released on Modern, RPM, and Chess. In Memphis in 1953, Horton and guitarist Jimmy DeBerry recorded the instrumental masterpiece "Easy" (Sun), based on Ivory Joe Hunter's "Since I Lost My Baby."

Horton moved to Chicago in 1953, though he made frequent trips home to Memphis to visit his mother. He played briefly in Muddy Waters's band, taking Junior Wells' place. In 1954, Horton recorded as Big Walter and His Combo (States) and in 1956 as "Shakey" Horton (Cobra)—a name, like "Mumbles," that he detested. Argo released an LP in 1964. During his lifetime, recordings by Horton were issued on more than a dozen labels. A prolific sideman, Horton recorded with Johnny Shines (including 1953's "Evening Sun," famous for its compelling harmonica), Muddy Waters, Otis Rush, Jimmy Rogers (1956's "Walkin' by Myself" with its celebrated harp solo), Robert Nighthawk, Johnny Young, Willie Dixon, J. B. Hutto, Floyd Jones, Wild Child Butler, Koko Taylor, and others. In 1972–1973, Horton was reunited with Jimmy DeBerry in Memphis (1989, Crosscut).

Horton toured Europe with the American Folk Blues Festival and was included in the 1968 BBC documentary by that name. In his last two decades, Horton played many major festivals, clubs, and college dates but continued playing for tips on Maxwell Street. He appeared in the 1978 PBS-TV special Good Mornin' Blues and in a cameo, accompanying John Lee Hooker, in the popular Blues Brothers movie (1980).

Harris states that Horton was married to Anna Mae and had five children. In the 1970s, he was living with Fanny and their extended families on Chicago's South Side. On December 8, 1981, Horton was pronounced dead at Chicago's Mercy Hospital; official causes were "heart failure" and "acute alcoholism." Rumors persist that Horton had been beaten by members of his own household.

Adept at single-note playing, Horton was best known for the richness of his tone. Fields described Horton's playing: "masterpieces of power, feeling, and the element of musical surprise. He was a master at filling the harp with air; his playing had a full-throated resonance that has never been surpassed."

Influenced by Will Shade and Hammie Nixon, Horton influenced every blues harmonica player of his time, even the great and equally distinctive stylists/virtuosos Little Walter Jacobs and Sonny Boy (Aleck Miller) Williamson.

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Harris; Larkin; Santelli Field, Kim. Harmonicas, Harps, and Heavy Breathers: The Evolution of the People's Instrument. New York: Fireside, 1993.

O'Neal, Jim, David Whiteis, and Bruce Iglauer. "Big Walter Horton, 1918–1981." Living Blues no. 52 (Spring 1982): 52–53.

Rusch, Bob. "Walter Horton Interview." Cadence 5, no. 3 (March 1979): 7–9.

"Walter Horton." In Nothing But the Blues: An Illustrated Documentary, edited by Mike Leadbitter, pp. 85–87. London: Hanover, 1971.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Big Walter Horton with Carey Bell (1989, Alligator CD 4702).

Mouth Harp Maestro (1997, Ace CD 252).

Live at the El Mocambo (1998, Red Lightning CD 88).

Harmonica Blues Kings (2000, Delmark CD 712).

HOUSE, EDDIE “SON”

b. 21 March 1902; Riverton, MS

d. 19 October 1988; Detroit, MI

Son House was born in Riverton, a hamlet south of Clarksdale, Mississippi, that has since been absorbed into the town. The year of House’s birth is questioned by Dick Waterman who suggests House may have been thirteen or fourteen years older, but dissembled about his age to obtain work.

House’s father was an amateur horn player who also played some guitar. The family lived for a time in Tallulah, Louisiana, but after his parents separated and his mother died, House returned to the Mississippi Delta, where as an adolescent he worked on farms. At this time House also became involved with the Baptist religion, and by the time he was twenty he was preaching in a church near Clarksdale. Though blues were all around, House scorned such music. As he said later, “I just hated to see a guy with a guitar. I was too churchy!”

The next few years House fluctuated between preaching and manual labor. A love affair with a member of his congregation caused one sabbatical. The lovers slipped away to Louisiana where House worked on a ranch. When the affair ran its course, he wandered back to the Clarksdale area to take up preaching once again. Then, in his mid-twenties, House heard a guitar player named Willie Wilson (sometimes Willie Williams) playing bottleneck guitar and it changed his life. House bought a battered guitar. Wilson patched it up, put it in Spanish tuning, and soon House was accompanying him. Because Wilson never recorded, the extent of his influence on House is impossible to determine.

Soon House came under the influence of Rube Lacy and James McCoy. The moaning and foot stomping on Lacy’s only two surviving sides, “Mississippi Jail House Groan” and “Ham Hound and Gravy” (incorrectly titled “Ham Hound Crave”), became parts of House’s style. McCoy is an unrecorded obscurity, now known only for teaching House two songs tailor-made for House’s personality and musical sensibility: “My Black Mama” and “Preachin’ the Blues.”

By 1927, with this musical apprenticeship, House was performing around the Clarksdale area at juke joints and “frolics,” venues where he soon acquired strong tastes for whiskey and womanizing.

Surprisingly enough, after becoming a bluesman, House continued to preach for awhile, an unlikely combination of careers that speaks of the conflict between religion and blues that would bedevil him the rest of his life. As he sang in “Preachin’ the

Son House. (Photo by Joe Alper, © Frank Driggs Collection)

Blues,” “Whiskey and women would not let me pray.” A year later, his budding musical career was interrupted by the sort of incident that gave blues its dubious reputation. At a boisterous frolic in Lyon, House shot and killed a man. He claimed self-defense, but was sentenced to time at the state prison, Parchman Farm. In late 1929 or early 1930, House’s case was reexamined and he was released. The judge, however, advised him to leave Clarksdale forthwith. House caught a ride to Lula, a town seventeen miles north of Clarksdale, where, improbably enough, his musical destiny awaited him.

Grafton and After

While playing in the Lula railway station, House caught sight of Charley Patton for the first time, and soon he and Patton were hanging out and playing music. Opinions differ about the extent to which Patton and House actually played together in juke joints in the Lula area. Be that as it may, despite their different temperaments—Patton being a blithe spirit compared to the saturnine House—they spent several months together in early 1930, having blues, corn liquor, and women as shared interests.

That spring Arthur Laibley, who had produced Patton’s last session for Paramount, stopped in Lula to arrange another session. Patton told Laibley about House and two other musicians, the guitarist Willie Brown and a piano player named Louise Johnson, and thus was set one of the historic recording sessions in the history of blues.

Patton, with money from Laibley, hired Wheeler Ford, a sanctified singer in a Lula gospel group, to chauffeur the foursome to Paramount’s studio in Grafton, Wisconsin. Everyone drank except Ford. Johnson, who began the trip as Patton’s girl, dumped him for House before they reached Grafton.

House recorded six songs at the session; three filled both sides of a 78: “Dry Spell Blues,” “Preachin’ the Blues,” and “My Black Mama.” Two songs, “Clarksdale Moan” and “Mississippi County Farm Blues,” were issued, but no copy has ever been found. The latter song, which House composed on the spot, is likely a version of the song he would record in 1942 as “County Farm Blues.” An unissued test titled “Walking Blues” was found in 1985.

Only Patton got a modest hit from the session. Record sales had dwindled in the Depression, and Paramount folded two years later. House would not record again until 1941, and those recordings would not be commercial releases.

The Grafton trip began a long musical friendship between House and Willie Brown. For a time, House reverted to his former pattern of preaching and then going back to the blues, usually at Brown’s urging (it is said Brown did not like to sing). But with Patton’s death in 1934, House became the biggest star in the Delta, and thereafter it seems his blues reputation finally made it impossible to find a pulpit. For the rest of the 1930s, he and Brown played all over the Delta as well as Arkansas and Tennessee, occasionally with a drummer, Charlie Ross, and a trombone player, Little Buddy Sankfield.

Library of Congress Recordings

In August 1941 the folklorist Alan Lomax found House and recorded him for the Library of Congress. At Clack’s General Store near Lake Cormorant, House recorded “Levee Camp Blues,” “Government Fleet Blues,” “Walking Blues” (in which a passing train is heard in the background), “Shetland Pony Blues,” and “Delta Blues.” On the first three, House sings and plays guitar, accompanied by Willie Brown on guitar, Fiddlin’ Joe Martin on mandolin, and Leroy Williams on harp. House performs “Shetland Pony Blues” by himself. On “Delta Blues,” Williams accompanies on harp.

The next summer House recorded, unaccompanied, ten more songs for Lomax. “County Farm Blues” is a later version of the similarly titled song recorded at Grafton, based on “See That My Grave Is Kept Clean.” But where Jefferson’s song is in standard tuning, House plays his song in open G with a bottleneck. “Pony Blues” and “Jinx Blues” are drawn, respectively, from Patton’s two most important songs, “Pony Blues” and “Maggie,” though House probably learned them from Willie Brown. “American Defense” is a musical curiosity; with a melody similar to “Polly Wolly Doodle,” it is a waltz time piece about the war that is by turns oddly touching and slyly funny—one stanza describes General MacArthur’s fear “there won’t be enough chaps to shoot a little game of craps.”

The next year, 1943, House disappeared from the blues scene.

Rediscovery

Then, on June 23, 1964, Dick Waterman, Phil Spiro, and Nick Perls found House in Rochester, New York. The story made Newsweek magazine. House had moved there in 1943, and in the intervening years worked as a railroad porter and short-order cook. He had played occasionally, until on learning in 1953 of Willie Brown’s death he quit music entirely. Waterman convinced House to relaunch his career. Waterman became his manager, and the guitarist Al Wilson (later of Canned Heat) helped House relearn his old repertoire.

In 1965 House recorded Father of the Delta Blues, produced by John Hammond for Columbia Records and featuring Wilson on second guitar and harp. Incorporating new material with reshaping of older songs, it was one of the most successful recordings of the Delta blues made during the 1960s.

For the next five years House played folk festivals and coffeehouses in the United States and toured Europe. He also performed locally in Rochester, sometimes with Joe Beard, and several times at the Schaubroecks’ coffeehouse, the Black Candle. Then, in the winter of 1969–1970 House passed out drunk in a snow bank and his hands became frostbitten. As a result, he missed the biggest gig of his life; Waterman reports that Eric Clapton and Delaney of Delaney and Bonnie wanted House to open for them at their sold-out Fillmore East show.

House played only occasionally after this, sitting in sometimes with John Mooney. In 1976, his health deteriorating, House moved to Detroit where relatives helped care for him. He died there in 1988.

In the Delta blues, Son House shares the company of Charley Patton and Robert Johnson. Every song recorded at Grafton in 1930 is considered a blues classic. His bottleneck work is accomplished after only three years of playing. Striking lyrics abound: “My black mama’s face shine like the sun” is an image worthy of Pound, while “Preachin’ the Blues” paints a devastating picture of the Baptist religion:

I’m gonna get me religion, I’m gonna join the Baptist church
I’m gonna be a Baptist preacher, and I sho’ won’t have to work.

Likewise, the songs recorded in 1941–1942 are reckoned Delta blues classics. “Walking Blues” with Willie Brown and the others may be the best indication on record of what Delta blues sounded like in the juke joints of the 1930s, and indicates why House was a major influence on Robert Johnson and Muddy Waters.

DANIEL BEAUMONT

Bibliography

- AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Calt, Stephen, and Gayle Wardlow. King of the Delta Blues: The Life and Music of Charlie Patton. Newton, NJ: Rock Chapel Press, 1988.
Komara, Edward, “Blues in the Round.” Black Music Research Journal (1997): 3–36.
Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Pantheon, 1993.
Waterman, Dick. “Son House” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 84, January–February, 1989, pp. 48–49.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

- Pre–World War II recordings: “My Black Mama I,” “My Black Mama II” (1930, Paramount 13042); “Dry Spell Blues I,” “Dry Spell Blues II” (1930, “Paramount 12990); “Preachin’ the Blues I,” “Preachin’ the Blues II” (1930, Paramount 13013).
After rediscovery (1964 and later): Father of the Folk Blues (1965, Columbia LP 2417); Living Legends (1966, Verve-Folkways LP 3010); Delta Blues 1926–1969 (1969, Roots LP 339); The Real Delta Blues (1979, Blue Goose LP 2016); Delta Blues: Son House (Biograph BCD 118 ADD; the complete 1941–42 Library of Congress recordings); Son House and the Great Delta Blues Singers (Document DOCD-5002).

HOUSE OF BLUES RECORDS

CD label founded in association with the House of Blues chain of restaurant clubs. Most of its issues from 1995 through 1999 were of anthologies of regional styles or of instrumental styles, but a notable release of a single act was Left Hand Brand by the Gales Brothers of Memphis.

EDWARD KOMARA

HOUSE-RENT PARTIES

House-rent parties grew out of the need among black Americans living in northern cities to meet the excessive rents charged by landlords during the early twentieth century. The migration of southern blacks brought more people into overcrowded, segregated neighborhoods in these cities. High rents followed this increase in the demand for available housing. Rent parties allowed tenants to collect money and avoid eviction. The social occasion of rent parties provided musical entertainment performed by blues piano players.

The idea of the house-rent party originated, as Margaret Perry notes, in the black southern social event known as the shindig. Families historically provided themselves with extra money on occasion by hosting a party where they offered music and an opportunity for dancing. Guests paid a small fee to gain entrance. If they enjoyed the food and drink, they paid an additional amount to the host. The high quality of the food assured the host of good word of mouth in the neighborhood. People came back to a house that hosted a good party.

Blacks in the South enjoyed another social occasion that provided the inspiration for the house-rent party. Pound parties were community affairs where people brought food instead of money. Hosting groups accepted anything edible for admission to these parties. People, according to Clarence Williams, brought a pound of vittles that included chitterlings, pig’s feet, hog maw, and barbecue. The hosts shared the food among the guests and provided music and dancing as well.

The tradition of the community party in Chicago predates Prohibition. Often as rent day approached, the only way for some people to pay the landlord was to throw a party and charge admission. This social event was called “pitching boogie.” Tenants invited the whole neighborhood and collected payments of fifty cents, sandwiches, or liquor to those who came for the evening.

HOUSE-RENT PARTIES

The First World War stopped the steady flow of immigrant European labor into America's expanding industries in northern cities. Consequently, these industrialists recruited black Americans living in the South to fill the void in the labor pool. As the black migration began, Harlem in New York had an abundance of cheap housing available and landlords struggled to fill vacancies. As the steady flow of migrants arrived, however, these vacancies disappeared. An excessive rise in the charge for rents followed this demand for limited living space. On arrival in New York and other northern cities, many blacks found housing to be crowded and limited to segregated neighborhoods.

The tradition of the house-rent party grew in popularity in order to meet the extraordinary demands of high rents. Hosts usually gave the parties at the end of the month on a Friday or Saturday night. Often they promoted the party by placing a sign in the front window at street level announcing the event. Hosts sometimes printed cards with information about when and where the party would take place and handed them out.

Langston Hughes recalls the promise made on a house-rent party card. "We'll have oodles of girls, tall, slippery and slim. They can do the Mombo till it's too bad, Jim!" The card often promoted the party as if it were a social club. These events captured the attention of black writers and appeared in novels, short stories, and poems. House-rent party skits also appeared on stage in musicals and comedy routines. People called house-rent parties by an assortment of different names: parlor socials, Saturday night functions, social parties, and whist socials among others.

According to Hughes, house-rent parties distinguished themselves from two other kinds of Harlem parties. The top tier, or upper crust, social event might include guests like W. E. B. Du Bois or James Weldon Johnson. The next level down found Renaissance writers, critics, editors, social workers, and students from Harlem and Greenwich Village with everyone chipping in money to pay the local bootlegger.

House-rent parties attracted a large cross-section of average people. Single men and women went to meet other people. Couples rolled back the rugs and danced the lindy or the black-bottom on the bare floors. After work, truck drivers, railroad porters, salesmen, bellhops, cooks, and house cleaners all crowded in for the social occasion.

House-rent parties coincided with the advent of Prohibition. Consequently, they served bootleg liquor. Sometimes these events attracted other illegal activities and served as a front for prostitution. Whether or not the parties were legitimate, they became a refuge for blacks wanting to socialize away from the white tourist who frequented Harlem and the Cotton Club. Blacks also needed a place to relieve the stress of overcrowded urban living.

In cities other than New York, as Paul Oliver notes, the house-rent party inspired small business efforts called "good-time flats." Appearing much like a house-rent party in concept, they provided food, liquor, and live music. They also provided inexpensive prostitutes and private rooms for gambling. Like house-rent parties, they could turn violent. The police collected protection money to ignore the illegal activities. If the police failed to receive their payments and closed down the operation, it moved to another address.

The piano player provided the principal source of musical entertainment for house-rent parties. New York parties most often featured a stride piano player. In cities like Saint Louis, Chicago, and Detroit, the blues pianist played a style known as boogie-woogie. This style of piano playing developed out of the blues tradition found in lumber camps across the Deep South. Boogie-woogie piano playing was more complex and polyrhythmic than stride and more chromatic than ordinary blues. Pinetop Smith, Cow Cow Davenport, Crippled Clarence Lofton, Meade Lux Lewis, Albert Ammons, and Jimmy Yancey distinguished themselves as house-rent party piano players in the blues style.

House-rent parties inspired a number of blues songs. Bessie Smith recorded "House Rent Blues" in 1924; Hubie Blake and Broadway Jones recorded "House Rent Lizzie" in 1929; Johnny Dodds recorded "House Rent Rag" in 1926; Lil Johnson recorded "House Rent Scuffle" in 1929; Virginia Liston and Clarence Williams recorded "House Rent Stomp" in 1923; and Cripple Clarence Lofton recorded "House Rent Struggle" in 1939.

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

- Cushing, Steve. "House Rent Pianists." Chicago: Blues Before Sunrise Radio Broadcast, March 11, 2001.
- Floyd, Jr., Samuel A., ed. Black Music in the Harlem Renaissance. New York: Greenwood Press, 1990.
- Hughes, Langston. The Big Sea. New York: Hill and Wang, 1940.
- . Simple Stakes a Claim. New York: Rinehart & Company, 1957.
- Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning. New York: Horizon Press, 1960.
- Perry, Margaret. Silence to the Drums. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1976.

Ramsey, Jr., Frederic, and Charles Edward Smith, eds. Jazzmen. New York: Harcourt, Brace and Company, 1939.
Wintz, Cary D. Black Culture and the Harlem Renaissance. Houston, TX: Rice University Press, 1988.

HOUSTON

(See Texas)

HOUSTON, EDWARD WILSON "BEE"

b. 19 April 1938; San Antonio, TX
d. 19 March 1991; Los Angeles, CA

Texas-born Bee Houston taught himself guitar while in his teens, inspired by T-Bone Walker and Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown. By 1956, he formed his own group with twin brother "Bo," and during the next several years often backed touring acts such as Junior Parker and Bobby Bland. He moved to Los Angeles in 1961 and eventually joined Big Mama Thornton's band, and recorded on her 1968 Ball 'N Chain album for Arhoolie. Impressing Arhoolie owner Chris Strachwitz, Houston subsequently cut his own self-titled 1970 release that featured his stinging, fast-picked guitar, rough-hewn vocals, and effective songwriting over a tight, horn-driven band. He died from complications of alcoholism in 1991.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn); Harris; Larkin

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Bee Houston & His Highsteppers: The Hustler (1997, Arhoolie CD 9008).

HOUSTON GUITAR SLIM

b. Rayfield Jackson, 12 May 1935; Houston, TX

Guitarist who was influenced formatively by Lightnin' Slim and Guitar Slim (Eddie Jones). Performs mostly in the Houston area. Led his own band through 1994, then worked with guitarist Clarence Green until the latter's death in 1997.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Gallaher, Edwin. "Houston Guitar Slim." Living Blues no. 140 (July/August 1998): 50–51.

HOUSTON, JOE (JOSEPH ABRAHAM)

b. 12 July 1927; Austin, TX

Vocalist/tenor saxophonist. He first played alto saxophone and joined the Sam Houston College marching band when he was fifteen years old. Later in his teens he worked with Ray Charles in Orlando, Florida; toured with Gatemouth Moore for five months, leaving the tour in New Orleans, where he pawned his alto saxophone for fare to Houston, Texas, to join Amos Milburn on tenor saxophone for nine months of one-nighters. He then joined King Kolax's band for a tour of Texas and Oklahoma playing third alto sax. He returned to Louisiana with jazz-singer Betty Roche. In Baton Rouge, Louisiana, in 1949 he joined Big Joe Turner, with whom he made his first records for the local Rouge label. In 1949 he also recorded in Houston for Freedom under his own name. In late 1950 he launched his own jump/R&B combo, recording for Freedom, Macy's, and Modern, before relocating to Los Angeles in 1952. Numerous records on Imperial, Combo, and RPM, backed by nationwide touring, emphasized the fashionable honking style of the time but the band remained firmly rooted in jump-blues, featuring the leader's effective blues shouting (e.g., "Jump the Blues," 1949, Freedom, 1535; and "Goodbye Little Girl," 1949, first issued as Pathé 1561.381). In the 1960s he became a session musician at Crown but from the mid-1980s he reactivated his solo career, playing festivals in both America and Europe.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin
Johnson, Matthew. "Honkin' Joe Houston." Living Blues no. 92 (July/August 1990): 27.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

HOVINGTON, FRANKLIN "FRANK"

b. 9 January 1919; Reading PA
d. 21 June 1982; Felton, DE

Guitarist in blues, old-time, jazz, and black sacred music. Played at Pennsylvania house parties through the mid-1940s. He then played professionally in various bands in Washington, D.C., through the 1950s. He was discovered in Delaware by John Fahey, a chance meeting that led to some performing on the East Coast. His 1975 Flyright album Lonesome Road Blues is considered a late gem of acoustic blues.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn); Harris; Larkin
 "Frank Hovington" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 53 (Summer/Autumn 1982): 48.

Discography: AMGHOW LONG HOW LONG (SITTING ON TOP OF THE WORLD)

"How Long How Long" was first recorded as "How Long Daddy How Long" by Ida Cox, with "Papa" Charlie Jackson on banjo, in 1925 for Paramount Records (Paramount 12325). The song was later transcribed and published in a Paramount songbook. The form is of eight measures, split into a four-measure verse and a four-measure refrain. Harmonically the melody stays in one chord, using the flatted seventh scale step as an inflecting dissonance during the second four measures. Because of the eight-measure length and the simple nature of the tune, it may be of unknown origin and transmitted by tradition. Lyric antecedents may be found in John Lovell's The Black Forge (New York: Macmillan, 1972).

The 1928 recording of "How Long How Long Blues" for Vocalion (Vocalion 1191) by pianist/vocalist Leroy Carr and guitarist Scrapper Blackwell made the two a star team and established the song in the mainstream blues repertory. Carr's smooth easy vocal delivery facilitated by the electric microphone was a key to the record's popular reception. Carr and Blackwell would record two follow-ups as "How Long How Long" numbers 2 and 3, then sing the tune to new words such as "You Got to Reap What You Sow" (1928, Vocalion 1232). Cover versions abounded: Tampa Red (1928, Vocalion 1228), Kokomo Arnold (1935, Decca 7070), Amos Easton (Bumble Bee Slim) (1935, Champion 50008), and Blind Lemon Jefferson (1928, Paramount 12685, in a discomfited performance), among many others. It was picked up by Mississippi musicians, including recordings by Sam Collins (1931, ARC labels) and Skip James (titled for release as "How Long 'Buck,'" 1931, Paramount 13085). It is also said the song was among the first blues learned by Robert Johnson and Muddy Waters.

Yet the lyrics sung by the Mississippi Sheiks as "Sitting on Top of the World" are of a different sort, taking up more of the melody without the lengthy pauses found in "How Long How Long." Their release of "Sitting" in 1930 on Okeh 8784 was an explosive hit, and helped them to continue recording through 1931–1933, the worst years of the Great Depression. Other recording acts quickly made versions of their own or light reworkings, such as Charley Patton's

"Some Summer Day" recorded for Paramount some six months after the Sheiks' record. Other songs following the "Sitting" lyric pattern are "Things 'Bout Comin' My Way" recorded in Chicago by Tampa Red (1931, Vocalion 1637) as well as by the Mississippi Sheiks (1931, Okeh 8922), and "Six Feet in the Ground" (1934, Decca 7017) by St. Louis Jimmy Oden.

Robert Johnson devised a notable treatment of the melody to the words "Come On in My Kitchen." When he recorded it in 1936 for Vocalion, he performed the first take in a slow tempo, the second take at a much quicker pace. The slow take was first released in 1961, and its longtime availability makes it better known to today's listeners than the up-tempo take, which was the one released during Johnson's lifetime (Vocalion 03563). Bob Groom in 1976 noted several recordings in this "Kitchen" variant, including those by Cooper Terry (Corosello CLN 25021), Mickey Baker (Roots SL-517), Johnny Shines (BMC-2003), and Sparky Rucker (Traditional SR 372). White folk and rock versions in the 1960s and 1970s included those by David Bromberg, Delaney and Bonnie, and the Steve Miller Band, as well as an "aside" singing by David Crosby between the last two songs of the first Crosby, Stills, and Nash album (Atlantic SD 8229).

"Sitting on Top of the World" would continue to be performed after 1945, when Howlin' Wolf recorded it for Chess (Chess 1679) in 1957. The British group Cream adopted it into rock repertory in 1968 on its album Wheels of Fire (Atco SD 2-700), sung by bassist Jack Bruce with guitar accompaniment from Eric Clapton. In 1970, Howlin' Wolf and Clapton made a version together for the LP The Howlin' Wolf Sessions (Chess CH 60008).

During the 1980s, B. B. King made use of the melody as the basis for "Darlin,' You Know I Love You" (1982, Blues 'N' Jazz, MCA LP 5413), and of a related if broader melodic contour with altered ending measures for "There Must Be a Better World Somewhere" (1980, MCA LP 5162).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Groom, Bob, "Standing at the Crossroads: Robert Johnson's Recordings." Blues Unlimited no. 118 (March/April 1976): 17–20; no. 119 (May/June 1976): 11–14; no. 120 (July/August 1976): 15–17; no. 121 (September/October 1976): 20–21.

HOWARD, CAMILLE

b. 29 March 1914; Galveston, TX
 d. 10 March 1993; Los Angeles, CA

West Coast boogie-woogie pianist and singer. Howard developed her piano skills in Los Angeles and in the early 1940s joined the Roy Milton Orchestra. She made many recordings with the Milton band—notably “R. M. Blues”—both playing piano and singing. In 1946 she made her recording debut with the Pan American label. The following year, she joined Specialty, and scored a major hit with “X-temporaneous Boogie” (1948); the ballad flip, “You Don’t Love Me,” was also a hit. Her accompanists were Dallas Bartley (bass) and Roy Milton (drums). She garnered two more hits for Specialty, with “Fiesta in Old Mexico” (1949) and “Money Blues” (1951). Howard later recorded two West Coast sessions for Federal in 1953. Her last recording session was for Vee-Jay (1956).

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin Shaw, Arnold. Honkers and Shouters: The Golden Years of Rhythm & Blues, pp. 186–187. New York: Macmillan, 1978.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

HOWARD, ROSETTA

b. 1914; Chicago, IL
d. 1974; Chicago, IL

Blues singer who recorded in the 1930s with the Harlem Hamfats. In 1947, Howard made twelve sides with Chicago blues artists including Willie Dixon and Big Bill Broonzy. From the early 1950s she devoted herself to church, including Thomas A. Dorsey’s Pilgrim Baptist Church.

TOM MORGAN

Bibliography

AMG (Scott Yanow); Chilton; Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

HOWELL, JOSHUA BARNES “PEG LEG”

b. 5 March 1888; Eatonton, GA
d. 11 August 1966; Atlanta, GA

Howell was born into a farming family and taught himself guitar. After losing a leg in 1916 in a gun fight with his brother-in-law, he turned to music, busking on street corners in Atlanta. In 1925, he was jailed for bootlegging but the following year was heard by a Columbia Records scout and began a four-year recording career.

Howell’s records are a fascinating collection of unusual material. “Coal Man Blues” consists of a fragment of a song about a coalman and concludes with coal vendors’ street cries. “Skin Game Blues” is an elegant, evocative gambling song with a memorable chorus that was derived from the traditional “Coon-Can Game” and “The Roving Gambler.” And “Please Ma’am” is little more than one slightly varied line, repeated almost as if on a tape loop.

Howell often recorded with his gang, guitarist Henry Williams and fiddler Eddie Anthony, and they produced some remarkable wild dance music. Anthony and Williams both recorded on their own as well.

Solo, Howell tended toward more lugubrious songs, such as “New Prison Blues,” but often wandered away from the standard twelve-bar format into sixteen-bar or irregular formats.

He recorded once more in 1963 to raise money for his care—he lost his other leg in 1952—but his final recording was considerably less well regarded.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Bastin, Bruce. Red River Blues. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

HOWLIN' WOLF

b. Chester Arthur Burnett, 10 June 1910; White Station, MS
d. 10 January 1976; Hines, IL

Howlin’ Wolf was one of the most dynamic performers in the history of electric blues. Blessed with a voice that sounded like a raging chain saw, he stood six feet, three inches tall and weighed 275 pounds, with massive hands and feet. Wolf commanded immediate attention onstage. His tunes often contained a single chord or riff droning hypnotically under improvised rhythmic and lyric variations. Whether stalking the stage like a man possessed or crawling about on all fours like a wild beast, his intensity, growled vocals, falsetto moans, and powerfully direct harp playing rarely failed to astonish an audience.

Wolf was born Chester Arthur Burnett to Leon Dock Burnett and Gertrude Young on June 10, 1910, in White Station, Mississippi, a tiny railroad stop near West Point in the Mississippi hill country. Fascinated by music as a boy, he often beat on pans with a stick and imitated the whistle of the railroad trains that ran nearby. He also sang in the choir at the White Station Baptist church. When his parents separated, his father moved to the Delta. A few years later, Wolf's mother forced him to move out because he wouldn't work in the fields. He was taken in by his uncle Will Young, who treated him harshly. One childhood friend said Young was the meanest man between here and hell. Wolf's relationship with his mother was also troubled. Gertrude spent much of her adult life as a street singer, eking out a living by selling handwritten gospel songs to passersby, and she denounced her son for playing the devil's music.

At the age of thirteen, Chester ran away to the Delta to rejoin his father who lived on the Young and Morrow plantation near Ruleville, Mississippi. There, Chester became fascinated by local musicians, especially the Delta's first great blues star, Charley Patton, who lived on the nearby Dockery Plantation. When Chester's father bought him his first guitar in January 1928, Chester convinced Patton to give him guitar lessons. He later took harmonica lessons from Sonny Boy Williamson II (Aleck Miller), who was romancing his sister, Mary. He also learned from records by Blind Lemon Jefferson, Tommy Johnson, the Mississippi Sheiks, Jimmie Rodgers, Leroy Carr, Lonnie Johnson, Tampa Red, and Blind Blake.

From the start, Wolf's voice was startling—huge and raw like Charley Patton's, and even more powerful. He learned to play guitar and blues harp simultaneously, using a rack-mounted harp, and for awhile, he played music while wearing tiny wire-rim glasses like his idol Blind Lemon Jefferson. When he wasn't working on his father's farm, he traveled the Delta with other musicians such as Williamson, Robert Johnson, Johnny Shines, and Floyd Jones.

Drafted in 1941, Wolf went into the Army Signal Corps and spent most of his time in the service at Fort Lewis, Washington, and Camp Adair, Oregon. When he got an early release from the Army in November 1943, he returned to farming. He also played music on weekends at Lake Cormorant and elsewhere in northern Mississippi with Willie Brown and Son House.

In 1948, at age thirty-eight, he moved to West Memphis, Arkansas, where he put together a dynamic band that included harmonica players James Cotton and Junior Parker and guitarists Pat Hare, Matt "Guitar" Murphy, and Willie Johnson. Wolf and his Houserockers were soon the most popular band in West Memphis. He also got a spot on radio station KWEM, playing blues and endorsing farm gear.

In 1951, Wolf came to the attention of a young Memphis record producer, Sam Phillips, who took him into the studio and recorded "Moanin' at Midnight" and "How Many More Years," and leased them to Chess Records. Released in 1952, they made it to the top ten on Billboard's R&B charts. Wolf cut other songs in West Memphis for the Bihari brothers' label RPM. Chess eventually won the fight over Wolf, who moved to Chicago in 1953 and called the city home for the rest of his life. Phillips, who recognized musical talent (he later discovered Elvis Presley, Carl Perkins, Jerry Lee Lewis, Johnny Cash, and Charlie Rich), said that Wolf was his greatest discovery, and losing Wolf to the Chess brothers in Chicago was the biggest disappointment of his career.

Wolf wrote and recorded songs for Chess that became blues standards: "Smokestack Lightning," "Killing Floor," "Who's Been Talking," "Rockin' Daddy," and many others. Chess songwriter Willie Dixon also wrote classic blues songs for Wolf such as "Spoonful," "Little Red Rooster," "Evil," "Back Door Man," and "I Ain't Superstitious."

Wolf's great rival for Chicago blues supremacy was his sometime friend, Muddy Waters. Their rivalry continued through the 1960s, aggravated by Waters's temporary theft of Wolf's guitarist, Hubert Sumlin. Like Waters, Wolf was an ambitious man. Their competition, though friendlier than fans realized, forced both to struggle to be the best in blues.

Wolf was a no-nonsense bandleader. He paid his band members on time and withheld unemployment insurance. Wolf also stood up for his band and refused to let himself or his bandmates be taken advantage of. Jimmy Rogers, who played for years in Waters's band, has said that he could think of no better bandleaders than Howlin' Wolf. Saxophonist Eddie Shaw says: "I spent a lot of time with the man, not because of the money, but because I cared about him. The Wolf taught me a lot about the blues, a lot about dignity, a lot about self-respect.... He was one of a kind." Drummer Sam Lay said, "To be honest, he was like a father, man. I don't care what nobody say. I know what he was to me." Bassist Calvin Jones, who also played for Waters, said, "To me, there wasn't no better person than the Wolf."

In his later years, Wolf continued to perform with the intensity of a man half his age, often in small clubs that other well-known bluesmen had abandoned. Drummer S. P. Leary recalls, "He wasn't going to turn his people down to go play a job for the white people just because they give him a few dollars more, if he done already signed a contract here.”

In 1964, Wolf married his long-time sweetheart Lillie Handley, whom he had met in 1957 at Silvio's nightclub in Chicago. (His first wife, the sister of famed bluesman Willie Brown, died when Wolf was in his early thirties.) Wolf called Lillie a flower from the first day he met her, and he doted on her two daughters, Barbara and Bettye Jean. Despite his wild antics onstage, Wolf was a responsible family man offstage—honest, hardworking, and upstanding to a fault. He loved to hunt and fish, owned farmland in the South, volunteered with the local fire department, and was a proud member of the local chapter of the Masons.

Wolf's collaborator on many of his greatest songs was guitar wizard Hubert Sumlin, who played electric guitar with his bare fingers—an oddity for a Chicago bluesman. Sumlin's eccentric, angular attack made him a favorite guitarist of countless guitarists, including Jimi Hendrix, Eric Clapton, Jimmy Page, and Stevie Ray Vaughan.

During the 1960s, Wolf and Sumlin continued to record sizzling blues that anticipated rock and heavy metal—classic songs such as “Commit a Crime,” “Hidden Charms,” and “Love Me, Darlin.” In 1964, he toured eastern and western Europe with the American Blues Festival. In 1965, he appeared on the American rock television show Shindig with the Rolling Stones. In 1970 he recorded The London Howlin' Wolf Sessions in England with Eric Clapton, members of the Rolling Stones, and other British rock stars. It was his best-selling album, reaching #79 on the pop charts.

Wolf suffered several heart attacks in the early 1970s and was in an auto accident in 1970 that destroyed his kidneys. For the rest of his life, he received dialysis treatments every three days, administered by Lillie. Despite his failing health, Wolf continued to record and perform. In 1972 he recorded a live album at a Chicago club, Live and Cookin' at Alice's Revisited. In 1973, he cut his last studio album, Back Door Wolf, which included Shaw's boldly anti-racist “Coon on the Moon,” the autobiographical “Moving,” and “Can't Stay Here,” which hearkened back to Charley Patton.

Wolf's last major performance was in November 1975 at the Chicago Amphitheater. On a bill with many other stars, Wolf rose almost literally from his deathbed to perform many of his old stage antics. The crowd gave him a five-minute standing ovation, but backstage, Lillie had to call in a team of paramedics to revive him. He died two months later, after his heart gave out during an operation for a brain tumor. He is buried in Hines, Illinois, next to his beloved Lillie, who died on May 11, 2001.

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Segrest, James, and Mark Hoffman. Moanin' at Midnight: The Life and Times of Howlin' Wolf. New York: Pantheon, 2004.

Discography: AMG; LSF

Selected Recordings

Moanin in the Moonlight (1959, Chess LP 1434); Howlin' Wolf (The Rocking Chair Album) (1962, Chess LP 1469); The Real Folk Blues (1966, Chess LP 1502); More Real Folk Blues (1967, Chess LP 1512); Evil (1969, Chess LP 1540); The Howlin' Wolf Album (1969, Cadet/Concept LP 319); The London Howlin' Wolf Sessions (1971, Chess LP 60008); Message to the Young (1971, Chess LP 50002); Chester Burnett a/k/a Howlin' Wolf (1972, Chess LP 60016); Live and Cookin' at Alice's Revisited (1972, Chess LP 50015); The Back Door Wolf (1973, Chess LP 50045); London Revisited (1974, Chess LP 60026); Change My Way (1975, Chess LP CHV-418); Muddy & The Wolf (1982, Chess LP 9100); His Greatest Sides, Vol. 1 (1984, Chess LP 9107); Howlin' Wolf/Moanin in the Moonlight (1986, Chess 5908); Cadillac Daddy: Memphis Recordings, 1952 (1989, Rounder SS-28); Memphis Days: Definitive Edition, Vol. 1 (1989, Bear Family 15460); Memphis Days: Definitive Edition, Vol. 2 (1990, Bear Family 15500); The Chess Box (1991, Chess 9332); Howling Wolf Rides Again (1991, Ace 333); Ain't Gonna Be Your Dog (1994, Chess 9349); His Best (Chess 50th Anniversary Collection) (1997, Chess 9375); His Best, Vol. 2 (1999, Chess 12026).

HUFF, LUTHER AND PERCY

Huff, Luther Henry

b. 5 December 1910; Fannin, MS
d. 18 November 1973; Detroit, MI

Huff, Percy

b. 7 November 1912; Fannin, MS

Luther Huff played mandolin, Percy guitar. Their brothers, Willie B. Huff (b. 1905; Fannin, MS) and Johnny Huff, played guitar on occasion. Luther Huff served in World War II, after which he moved to Detroit, Michigan. Percy stayed in Jackson, Mississippi, and drove a taxi. While visiting in

HUFF, LUTHER AND PERCY

Jackson, Luther earned money for the return trip to Detroit by recording himself and Percy in a Trumpet Records session. The resulting four sides are cherished by collectors of postwar acoustic Mississippi blues. In 1957 Luther suffered a spinal and left shoulder attack, which was deemed by doctors as an Army injury, which then enabled him to receive disability checks. In 1968, Adelphi Records taped a session with Luther, Percy, and Willie.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
Eagle, Bob. "Luther Huff." Living Blues no. 22 (July/August 1975): 33–35.
Wardlow, Gayle Dean. "Luther and Percy: The Huff Brothers." Blues Unlimited no. 56 (September 1968): 4, 6.

Discography: LSFP

HUGHES, JOE "GUITAR"

- b. 29 September 1937; Houston, TX
d. 20 May 2003; Houston, TX

Singer, guitarist. A stalwart of the Houston blues scene for decades, Hughes stayed at home while his local friends and peers, which included Albert Collins, Lightnin' Hopkins, Johnny "Guitar" Watson, and Johnny Copeland, achieved international success. Originally inspired as a fourteen-year-old by T-Bone Walker, Hughes joined the Dukes of Rhythm in 1953 with Copeland as a bandmate. After establishing himself as a leader he settled into a Houston club residency while releasing a few singles on the side.

Hughes did occasionally venture outside his hometown as a backing musician. With Houston saxist Grady Gaines he was a member of the Upsetters, the barnstorming Little Richard group that served as the stage band for touring superstar soul revues. In the 1960s Hughes also worked regularly in the touring bands of Texas-based R&B singers Bobby "Blue" Bland and Al "TNT" Braggs.

Hughes, seemingly satisfied to be a local legend, maintained his low profile until 1985 when he toured Europe under the auspices of old friend Copeland. The overseas exposure and the acclaim it brought energized Hughes's interest in performing and revitalized his career, ultimately leading to his first full-length American album, If You Want to See These Blues, on Black Top Records, in 1989. He recorded two more albums as a leader, Texas Guitar Slinger in 1996 and Stuff Like That in 2001, on regional labels. Hughes also did guest spots on several recordings by fellow Houstonians, including Copeland's "Flyin' High" and "Breakfast Dance" by harpist Sonny Boy Terry.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl and Al Campbell); Larkin; Santelli Wood, Roger. "Joe 'Guitar' Hughes" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 169 (September/October 2003): 115–116.

Discography: AMG

HUMES, HELEN

- b. 23 June 1909; Louisville, KY
d. 13 September 1981; Santa Monica, CA

Helen Humes's birth date was long given as 1913, but her own later testimony to writer Helen Oakley Dance revealed she was actually born in 1909. Her father, John Henry Humes, was a lawyer. Her mother, Emma Humes (née Johnson), was a schoolteacher and was musical. She encouraged her to sing and to play piano, and later taught her to read music. She played with the local Sunday School band, which also featured trombonist Dicky Wells and trumpeter Jonah Jones.

She recorded two sessions for OKeh in St. Louis and New York in 1927 (her accompanists included guitarist Lonnie Johnson and pianist James C. Johnson). She worked in a bank and as a waitress before turning to a professional career as a singer in the mid-1930s, initially in Buffalo and then in New York City. She worked with Stuff Smith and Al Sears in the mid-1930s. Count Basie and John Hammond heard her sing with Sears in Cincinnati in 1937, and arranged for her to record as a vocalist with Harry James that year.

She was offered a job with Count Basie in 1937, but turned the offer down because the pay was too low (he hired Billie Holiday instead). She relented and joined Basie as Holiday's replacement in March 1938, and remained with the band until 1941. She shared the vocal spotlight with Jimmy Rushing, the band's blues specialist. As a result she was largely restricted to ballads and pop songs like "Dark Rapture," "It's Torture," and "Between the Devil and the Deep Blue Sea" rather than blues, although she did record "Blues for Helen" with a small group led by Basie in 1938. The recording remained unissued until the late 1950s, when it was issued by Hammond disguised as part of the “From Spirituals to Swing” concert of December 1938.

She worked as a singer at Café Society in New York after leaving the Basie band, where her accompanists included Art Tatum, Albert Ammons, Meade “Lux” Lewis, Pete Johnson, and Teddy Wilson. She moved to Los Angeles in 1944, and adopted more of a rhythm and blues style in the clubs of Central Avenue. A substantial hit with the jump blues “Be-Baba-Le-Ba” (with Bill Doggett) in 1945 cemented that shift. She recorded a series of blues and jump-blues sides, including “Unlucky Woman” and the instrumental “McShann’s Boogie Blues” with pianist Jay McShann; “Central Avenue Boogie,” “Pleasin’ Man Blues,” and “See See Rider” for Aladdin; and “Jet Propelled Papa” and “I Refuse to Sing the Blues” for Mercury with trumpeter Buck Clayton.

She appeared on film with Dizzy Gillespie’s big band in Jivin’ with Bebop in 1947, and toured with Norman Granz’s Jazz at the Philharmonic shows (1946–1951). She remained a popular draw in Los Angeles, and worked with Nat “King” Cole at the Club Oasis in early 1950. She signed to Discovery Records, and had another major hit with “Million Dollar Secret,” recorded live at impresario Gene Norman’s Rhythm & Blues Jamboree at the Shrine Auditorium that summer. (She revealed later that she had been paid only the original broadcast fee for it.)

She was joined by saxophonist Dexter Gordon on “Airplane Blues” and “Helen’s Advice” in 1951, and toured in a rhythm and blues showcase with Joe Turner and saxophonist Hal Singer. The demise of Discovery Records led to a switch to Modern, and then to Decca in 1952.

She recorded a number of sides for the label, and also made one single for the Los Angeles–based Dootone label in 1955. She toured Australia with vibraphonist Red Norvo in 1956, and made three albums for the Contemporary label in 1959–1961. She toured in Australia again in 1962 and performed in Europe with the American Folk Blues Festival tours in 1962–1963, alongside John Lee Hooker, Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee, and T-Bone Walker. She undertook a third tour of Australia in 1964, and remained there for ten months before returning to the United States. She retreated from the music business and returned to Louisville to care for her aging parents in 1967, but returned to performing when writer Stanley Dance persuaded her to join the Count Basie Orchestra for the Newport Jazz Festival in New York in 1973. She remained an active performer throughout the decade, and made further recordings for the Paris-based Black and Blue label, and for Columbia and Muse in the United States.

Her precise intonation and subtle control of dynamics and rhythmic inflections allowed her to approach a wide range of material with equal assurance. She was at home with sophisticated ballads, jazz standards, and earthy blues and R&B songs, and was an accomplished and expressive performer in all of these forms.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- AMG (Scott Yanow); Chilton; Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern Balliett, Whitney. “Just a Singer.” New Yorker (February 24, 1975): 98; reprinted in American Singers. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
 Dahl, Linda. Stormy Weather: The Music and Lives of a Century of Jazzwomen. New York: Pantheon Books, 1984.
 Dance, Stanley. The World of Count Basie. New York: Scribner, 1980.

Discography: AMG; DGR; Lord; LSPF

Selected Recordings

- “Alligator Blues” (1927, OKeh 8529); “Black Cat Blues”/“A Worried Woman’s Blues” (1927, OK 8467); “Be-Baba-Le-Ba” (1945, Philo/Aladdin 106); “Central Avenue Blues” (1945, Philo/Aladdin 122); “Pleasin’ Man Blues” (1945, Philo/Aladdin 125); “See See Rider” (1945, Philo/Aladdin 126); “I Just Refuse to Sing the Blues”/“They Raided the Joint” (1947, Mercury 8056); “Jet Propelled Papa”/“Blue and Sentimental” (1947, Mercury 8047); “Time Out for Tears”/“Married Man Blues” (1948, Mercury 8088); “Helen’s Advice”/“Airplane Blues” (1950, Discovery 535); “Million Dollar Secret” (1950, Modern 20-779); Helen Humes (1959, Contemporary 7571); Songs I Like to Sing (1960, Contemporary M3582); Swingin’ with Humes (1961, Contemporary M3598); Let the Good Times Roll (1973, Black and Blue 33050); Sneaking Around (1974, Black and Blue 33083); The Talk of the Town (1975, Columbia PC33488); Helen Humes and the Muse All-Stars (1979, Muse MR5217); Helen (1980, Muse MR5233).

HUMMEL, MARK

b. 15 December 1955; New Haven, CT

Harmonica player, singer, and occasionally songwriter who grew up in Los Angeles and moved to Berkeley in 1972. The son of a white methodist minister, Mark Hummel mixes influences from West Coast blues and the upbeat side of Chicago blues. From 1980, he toured under his own name or with the Blues Survivors, sometimes with Muddy Waters’s sidemen: drummer Willie “Big Eyes” Smith and bassist Robert Stroger. Hummel recorded his first LP in 1985, and debuted as a solo artist in 1992 with Hard Lovin’ 1990s.

Recorded for the Dutch label Double Trouble, Flying Fish, ToneCool, and currently Electro-Fi label. He revered Little Walter and James Cotton and has recorded with Brownie McGee, Charlie Musselwhite, Eddie Taylor, Sue Foley, and Charles Brown.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

“Mark Hummel Bio.” http://www.electrofi.com/bio_hummel.html.

Norton, Cathi. “Ridin’ the Highway. Mark Hummel.” Interview reproduced at http://www.markhummel.com/cathi_interview.html.

Townsley, Tom. “Mark Hummel.” Interview from Blues Connection reproduced at <http://www.island.net/~blues/hummel.html>.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Heart of Chicago (1997, ToneCool/Rounder, TC 1158).

Blowin My Horn (2004, Electro-Fi; live album).

HUMOR

Those for whom “blues” signifies a mood of “sadness” and “gloom” may be surprised to know that a large proportion of blues songs are humorous. Even a bluesman as somber as Son House got off the occasional funny line, singing in “American Defense” of General MacArthur’s concern that “there won’t be enough chaps to shoot a little game of craps.” Yet as soon as one considers the social setting in which blues was played this seeming paradox disappears. For blues was, for most of the past century, the dominant form of dance music in the black American community: Blues was good-time music. Moreover, the themes that dominate blues lyrics are ones commonly associated with comedy in many literatures. Most prominent in this regard are sex and love, which are by far the most common themes treated in blues lyrics. Yet many other topics are also mined for their humor in blues lyrics: human foibles like drinking and gambling, and even social institutions like religion and law.

Humor in Blues History

Comic lyrics were essential to blues from the beginning, often drawing on minstrel music, vaudeville lines, and medicine show routines, as exemplified by the repertoire of Jim Jackson. The song “Charmin’ Betsy,” recorded by Texas songster Ragtime Henry Thomas, whose repertoire reached well back into the latter decades of the nineteenth century, features lines like:

Well, a white man lives in a fine brick house
He thinks that’s nothin’ strange
We poor colored men lives in the county jail
But it’s a brick house just the same!

The repertoires of the classic blues singers like Bessie Smith and Ma Rainey were leavened with humorous lyrics, and country blues artists of the same period also made great play with satire and humorous lyrics. In “Mosquito Moan,” Blind Lemon Jefferson sang:

I believe I’ll sleep under a tin tub, just to let them bust their bad old bills (2×)
Well mosquitoes so bad in this man’s town, keep me away from my whiskey still.

Hokum blues, spurred by the hit “It’s Tight Like That” by Georgia Tom Dorsey and Tampa Red, drew on jug band music and vaudeville for bouncy, rag-influenced songs that abounded with double entendres like Bo Carter’s “Banana in Your Fruit Basket.” At the same time, female blues singers in the 1930s continued to turn out bawdy, funny songs like Georgia White’s “I’ll Keep Sittin’ on It If I Can’t Sell It.”

Even as hokum was a more emphatically comic version of blues in the 1930s, so too was rhythm and blues in the 1940s. In songs by Louis Jordan, Big Joe Turner, and Wynonie Harris, perennial themes—infidelity, gambling, drinking, slippery preachers, and so forth—were even more likely to receive comic treatment, while alliterative titles like “Flip, Flop and Fly” hearkened back to the nonsense verbalisms of hokum.

A comic perspective was common in Chicago blues of the 1950s and 1960s, and it is no surprise that two outstanding blues composers, Sonny Boy Williamson II and Willie Dixon, were also outstanding composers of humorous songs. Williamson’s wry comments on life and love are evident in the standards “Don’t Start Me to Talkin’,” “Your Funeral and My Trial,” and “Wake Up, Baby.” Many of Dixon’s humorous songs were performed by Howlin’ Wolf whose stage persona was especially well suited to songs like “Three Hundred Pounds of Joy,” “Built for Comfort,” and “I Ain’t Superstitious.”

Since that time, blues artists continue to turn the blues to comic ends. Albert Collins’s 1978 hit “Mastercharge” was such a devastating satire that the bank company sued him to change the title. The 2002 R&B song by Bill Coday “If I Can’t Cut the Mustard (I Can Still Lick Around the Jar)” might have been a hokum title.

Comic Devices

Blues over the years has rendered humorous such themes as infidelity, poverty, and jail by the same means found in comic literature the world over. First, purely rhetorical devices—that is, word play, hyperbolic language, outlandish metaphor, humorous nicknames, the use of nonsense words, especially to refer to taboo terms—are used. Second, the songs make use of comic reversal, by which is meant that the usual state of affairs—whether it be a piece of dialogue or a dramatic situation—is turned on its head. Third, in a more extended way, satiric and ironic treatments are given to “serious” themes. Needless to say, the various means in this threefold division are not exclusive. Far from it, a humorous song is likely to combine many comic devices.

The simplest form of word play is nonsense language. In the hit tune “It’s Tight Like That,” which spurred the hokum fad, the phrase “Beedle-Um-Bum” is a kind of scat phrase, both funny in itself and seemingly implying a sexual reference also. Blind Blake’s expression “Diddie Wa Diddie” makes the link to sex even more closely: “There’s a great big mystery, and it’s really been botherin’ me. . . . I wish somebody would tell me what ‘Diddie-Wa-Diddie’ means!”

Yet such invented phrases do not always have sexual references: Willie Dixon’s “Wang Dang Doodle” simply means a raucous party. The same song catalogues a series of humorous nicknames, some of which were drawn from actual people: “Tell Automatic Slim, tell Razor Totin’ Jim, tell Butcher Knife Totin’ Annie, tell Fast Talking Fanny . . . tell Kudu-Crawlin’ Red, tell Abyssinian Ned, tell ol’ Pistol Pete, everybody gonna meet. . . .”

Another common means of comic device can be called “reversal.” Typically, a stanza creates an expectation in the listener that it will be followed by a commonplace sentiment or even a cliché, but the lyrics defeat this expectation with a humorous reversal of the cliché. Most often this sort of reversal punctures some pretense and diminishes with the sense. The many examples of this type found say in Freud’s Jokes and Their Relation to the Unconscious could be matched by a number of blues lyrics that function the same way for comic ends.

An excellent example is B. B. King’s “Nobody Loves Me But My Mother,” which exploits the clichéd notion of blues as a gloomy, self-pitying genre to hilarious effect: “Nobody loves me but my mother—and she could be jivin’ too.” When delivered by King at live concerts with his masterful timing, the line never fails to elicit a roar of laughter.

A more subtle version of comic reversal is Lemon Jefferson’s line in “Shuckin’ Sugar Blues”:

I’ve got your picture and I’m going to put it in a frame (2×)

So if you leave town, we can find you just the same.

Implausible or exaggerated metaphor and simile can obviously be put to comic use, sometimes structuring a single stanza and sometimes an entire song. Metaphors for sex, common in blues lyrics, are often used for comic effect, as in Lonnie Johnson’s “Sweet Potato Blues” and “Tooth Ache Blues.” Blues lyrics are often condemned for the violence they depict—especially toward women. But James Cotton’s “Murder” plays on this for comic effect. “Murder” is metaphor for the almost unbearable sexual desire aroused by a woman of whom Cotton sings.

Irony, though not inherently comic, can serve humorous ends when the second meaning subverts and undercuts the obvious primary meaning. Moreover irony, as a figure, can structure not merely a line but an entire song. Here too it is well to note that in such cases the singer often creates a persona that must be understood by the audience to be different from himself for the irony and humor to work. Charley Patton’s “Spoonful” about cocaine use is an example. As Calt and Wardlow say, the song is likely based on a rag, and they speak of “its flippant, thematic treatment of its subject. . . .” Ostensibly a cautionary tale about the drug, Patton gives it an ironic reading, creating a spoken dialogue between an incredulous man questioning his woman about her devotion to that “spoonful.” Willie Dixon’s “I Ain’t Superstitious” provides another well-known example; again for the humor to work there must be an ironic distance between the singer and the persona portrayed by lyrics, “I ain’t superstitious . . . but a black cat just crossed my path. . . .”

Professor Longhair’s “It’s My Fault, Darling” from 1980 provides a more recent and hilarious example. Once again the topic is adultery—a subject that blues often treats in the light, racy manner of bedroom farces. What is more, parody also comes into play, since the title rewrites a common blues lyric “It’s all my fault, treat me the way you wanna do.” In serious treatments of this theme, the unfaithful man confesses that it is all his fault that his woman has left him due to his philandering. Professor Longhair parodies this by putting the line in the victim's mouth and having him assume the blame for finding his woman with another man, saying "I didn't know you had company, girl, I wasn't in no condition to fight."

HUMOR

These examples show the limits of another truism about the blues, that the blues is a deeply personal and emotional statement by the singer. For the humorous truth to emerge in the cases just mentioned, it is necessary for the audience to understand the ironic distance between the singer and the persona created by the lyrics.

Social Contexts of Humor

The social context of humor must also be noted. Although instrumental ability was appreciated by the audience, the vocal content of songs was perhaps more highly prized by the black audience. Clearly, humor and wry comment on life's difficulties were valued as pure entertainment, yet the use of humor extended further. Humor in blues is also a way of coping with one's problems and with defeating or at least mocking one's adversaries.

In this respect, one stark fact about the social setting of blues in its inception must be borne in mind. Blues originated in black rural communities segregated from white society, and while it would be misleading to think of the blues as "protest music," blues as secular entertainment is characterized by, at the very least, a covert stance of resistance toward those social conditions. Since the penalty for offending white society could be heavy, satirical lyrics about white politicians, Jim Crow, duplicitous plantation owners, and businessmen are relatively rare—but not entirely unknown. W. C. Handy, hired by the Memphis mayoral candidate E. H. Crump, composed a campaign tune for him, then surreptitiously added lyrics apparently based on the spontaneous singing along of the crowd. The result was the famous lines:

Mr. Crump won't allow no easy riders here (2×)
We don't care what Mr. Crump don't allow We're gonna barrelhouse anyhow.

Countless versions of these lines spread throughout the blues:

Mama don't allow no whiskey drinking here (2×)
Don't care what Mama say, we're gon drink whiskey anyway.

(Or: guitar or banjo playing, or boogie-woogie, etc.)

Certainly political/social issues apart from race were sometimes addressed. The Mississippi Sheiks' song "Sales Tax" features these verses:

Old Aunt Martha live behind the jail
The sign on the wall says liquor for sale
You know the sales tax is on it
Oh, the sales tax is on it
Oh the sales tax is on it everywhere you go.

Recorded during Prohibition, the proximity between bootleg liquor and the jail cannot but suggest the corruption of the law. In the 1930s, Sleepy John Estes rewarded a lawyer who won his case with "Lawyer Clark Blues":

Now Mr. Clark's a good lawyer
He good as I ever seen
He the first man that proved
That water run upstream.

Even the death penalty is the subject of humor in "Lectric Chair Blues" by Blind Lemon Jefferson:

I wonder why they electrocute a man after the one o'clock hour of the night (2×)
Because the current is much stronger, when the folkses turn out all the lights.

And insofar as the entirety of blues can be read as protest against life's conditions, among which white racism and repression were the foremost obstacles, some satire was done in a veiled language—"signifyin'" it has been called. Consider the ancient line in a pre-blues song Stanley Booth heard from Furry Lewis:

My ole miss, she promise me, when she die she set me free
She lived so long till her head got bald,
And God had to kill her with a white oak maul.

A more obvious target of satire was religion. Within the black community, blues for most of its history has existed in a permanent state of tension with black Christianity, exemplified by its well-known tag "the devil's music." Condemned by the preacher and his flock, not surprisingly, blues musicians struck back with barbs of comedy and satire against religion.

Charley Patton's "Elder Green Blues," based on the popular song "Alabama Bound," depicts two churchmen going to New Orleans to drink and whore. Son House's "Preaching the Blues" sketches an even more devastating portrait of a preacher:

Oh, I'm gon get me religion, I'm gon' join the Baptist church (2×)
I'm gon be a Baptist preacher, and I sure won't have to work.

The preacher is frequently depicted as a leech and an interloper, as in Hi Henry Brown's "Preacher Blues":

Preacher come to your house, you ask him to rest his hat
Next thing he want to know, “Sister where’s your husband at.” (2×)

Joe McCoy’s song of the same name:

He will eat your chicken, he will eat your pie
He will eat your wife out on the sly
Some people say a preacher won’t steal
But I caught three in my cornfield, one had a yellow, one had a brown
Looked over the mill and one was getting down.

The lyrics “Some people say a preacher won’t steal
. . .” were ubiquitous. They are found in Frank Stokes 1927 song “You Shall,” which begins also begins with a sendup of the Lord’s Prayer :

Our Father, who art in Heaven,
Preacher owed me ’leven and he only payed me seven
Thy kingdom come, thy will be done,
If I hadn’t a taken seven, I would’n’ a gotten none.

But the most prominent comic topic was sex—yet even here religious images could be used in such a way that the satire could cut both ways. Lucille Bogan’s ribald “Shave ’Em Dry” may serve as segue for this topic with its lines:

Now your nuts hang down like a damn bell-clapper
And your dick stands up like a steeple
Your goddamn asshole hangs open like a church door
And the crabs walks in like people.

All manner of topics related to sexuality are sources of comedy, ugly partners, for example, in Mary Dixon’s “You Can’t Sleep in my Bed”:

You’re too big to be cute, and I don’t think you’re clean
(2×)
You’re the darndest lookin’ thing that I ever seen.

In “Put It Right Here (Or Keep It Out There)”
Bessie Smith sang:

I had a man for fifteen years
Give him his room and board
Once he was like a Cadillac
Now he’s like an old worn out Ford.

Peetie Wheatstraw’s “The First Shall Be Last, and the Last Shall Be First” (which again deploys a religious allusion in a sexual context—a standard comic device) deals with a certain inhibition:

Well, the first woman I had, she made me get down on my knees (2×)
And had the nerve to ask me if I liked limburger cheese.

Even though male braggadocio is commonplace in blues, impotence also comes in for a comic treatment—and not only by women—in a song like “My Pencil Won’t Write,” first done by Bo Carter in 1931, later done in the 1970s by Muddy Waters. But the most important topic for comic purposes is infidelity, already addressed in so many of the preceding examples that I will only add one more example: Infidelity in Louis Jordan’s “I’m Gonna Leave You on the Outskirts of Town” is viewed humorously, when Jordan finds that none of his seven children look like him.

Blues’ comic treatment of sexuality in the midst of a puritanical culture makes it clear that humor in blues is an assertion of freedom from preconceived notions—from prejudices of all sorts, that is—and, hence, one is tempted to say that humor belongs to the essence of blues. Humor in blues deflates pretense, skewers sentimentalities, and affirms secular pleasures against religious taboos. Indeed, simply taking into account the theme of sexuality, the healthy effect of blues on American culture must be regarded as considerable insofar as the good humor and freedom with which sex is treated has had a great impact through various other forms of blues-influenced popular music, most prominently, of course, rock ’n’ roll.

More generally, if blues has a single dominant theme, it is probably, as Robert Palmer remarks, impermanence; blues offers images of coping with life’s pains and losses, and humor is among the most effective techniques for transforming pain into pleasure, and loss into gain. Hence, blues humor is about survival. As Furry Lewis, one of the wittiest of bluesmen, used to say, “Give out, but don’t give up—.”

DANIEL BEAUMONT

Bibliography

- Booth, Stanley. Liner notes for Fourth & Beale (1992).
Garon, Paul. Blues and the Poetic Spirit. San Francisco:
City Lights Books, 1975; rev. ed., 1996.
Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Penguin Book, 1981.
(The author also wishes to acknowledge numerous replies from Yahoo!’s prewar blues group.)

HUNT, DANIEL AUGUSTA “D. A.”

- b. 23 May 1929; Munford, AL
d. ca. 1964; Phoenix, AZ

A foundry worker, singer, and guitarist, D. A. Hunt recorded only one session for legendary producer Sam Phillips in Memphis in 1953, featuring the haunting “Greyhound Blues,” one of the deepest blues ever issued by the Sun label.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

HUNT, DANIEL AUGUSTA "D. A."

Bibliography

Escott, Colin, and Hawkins, Martin. Good Rockin' Tonight. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1991.

Discography: LSPF

Sun Records/The Blues Years (1996, Charly CD Sun Box 7; reissue).

HUNT, OTIS "SLEEPY"

b. 29 April 1923; near Pine Bluff, AR

d. 4 July 1998; Chicago, IL

Nicknamed for his frequent naps, even while playing poker. Hunt moved to Chicago in 1945, and began playing harmonica in an effort to win his first wife back from Howlin' Wolf. He performed mostly in Chicago clubs and at Oliver Davis's Delta Fish Market. Hunt contributed several tracks to the Lost American Bluesmen anthology CD for the Midnight Creeper label (Midnight Creeper 2002).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Brisbin, John Anthony. "Sleepy Otis Hunt." Living Blues no. 142 (November/December 1998): 55.

HUNT, VAN ZULA CARTER

b. Van Zula Carter, 1 September 1901; Somerville, TN

d. 4 May 1995; Memphis, TN

Memphis singer who performed in various black minstrel troupes including the Rabbit Foot Minstrels and Silas Green from New Orleans from 1917 through 1945. In 1930 she recorded "Sellin' the Jelly" for Victor with Noah Lewis, John Estes, and Hammie Nixon. In later years through the 1980s she regularly performed at local Memphis blues festivals.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Tremewan, Ed. "Van Zula Carter Hunt" [obituary]. Blues & Rhythm no. 102 (September 1995): 10.

Discography: DGR; LSPF

HUNTER, ALBERTA

b. 1 April 1895; Memphis, TN

d. 17 October 1984; New York City, NY

Earning international recognition with a career that spanned eight decades, Hunter began singing in Chicago circa 1912. Known as much for her tenacity and longevity as for her vocal style, Hunter was a versatile performer whose repertoire encompassed classic blues, popular show tunes, and French cabaret songs.

Born in Memphis, Hunter left for Chicago as a teenager, where she began singing at Dago Frank's, eventually working her way up to headlining at Dreamland. In 1921 Hunter left Chicago for New York where she made her first recordings for the Black Swan label. She soon switched to Paramount, recording frequently between 1921 and 1924, accompanied by notable artists, such as Fletcher Henderson, Louis Armstrong, and Eubie Blake. In 1923 she recorded with a white jazz band, the Original Memphis Five, which was rare at the time. Circumventing exclusive contracts with record companies, Hunter recorded under a variety of pseudonyms, including Josephine Beatty, for Gennett; May Alix (borrowing the name of her friend and recording artist) for Paramount, Famous, Harmograph, and Puritan; and Helen Roberts, for Silvertone.

Hunter never learned to read music, yet she composed many of her own songs, including "Chirping the Blues," "Mistreated Blues," and "Down South Blues." The most successful of her compositions, "Down Hearted Blues" (co-written with her accompanist Lovie Austin), was recorded by Bessie Smith in 1923 and is a classic blues standard. That same year Hunter replaced Smith at the Apollo in the musical revue How Come? Hunter spent the next several years touring and recording for Paramount and OKeh. In 1926 she recorded "Sugar" and "Beale Street Blues" for Victor records, featuring Fats Waller on the organ.

In 1927, Hunter left for Europe, where she played the Casino de Paris and the National Scala in Copenhagen, Denmark. In 1928–1929 she appeared as Queenie in Show Boat at the Drury Lane Theater in London, playing opposite Paul Robeson. Other engagements in London included BBC broadcasts from the Dorchester hotel with Jack Jackson's orchestra in 1934 and an appearance in Radio Parade of 1935. She also performed for NBC radio broadcasts from Europe and New York. Hunter performed at the Cotton Club in New York and joined the Cotton Club European tour in 1937.

Hunter spent much of the 1940s and 1950s abroad entertaining troops with the USO. In 1956, following the death of her mother, Hunter left the stage and started a new career as a licensed practical nurse. In 1977, forced to retire from nursing, and at the age of eighty-two, Hunter appeared at The Cookery in Greenwich Village to great acclaim. Her successful comeback resulted in a new album, Amtrak Blues, and the film score for Remember My Name. Hunter continued to tour and perform until shortly before her death in 1984. In 2003, Hunter's life and work was brought to the stage in Marion J. Caffey's off-Broadway production of Cookin' at the Cookery: The Music & Times of Alberta Hunter.

TREVOR S. HARVEY

Bibliography

- AMG (Scott Yanow); Chilton; Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern
 Harrison, Daphne Duval. Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
 Taylor, Frank C., and Gerald Cook. Alberta Hunter: A Celebration in Blues. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1987.

Videography

- Radio Parade of 1935* (1934).
Alberta Hunter: My Castle's Rockin' (1988).

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

HUNTER, IVORY JOE

- b. 10 October 1914; Kirbyville, TX
 d. 8 November 1974; Memphis, TN

Ivory Joe Hunter was one of the most prolific blues songwriters ever, a fine singer, and a talented pianist. Ivory Joe Hunter was his birth name; he grew up in a family with thirteen brothers and sisters. His father, Dave Hunter, played guitar, while his mother sang gospel songs. In his twenties, he worked as a radio program manager and from 1942 as a record company executive for his own label, Ivory. Although he did his first recording with archivist John Lomax for the Library of Congress in 1933, Ivory Joe Hunter began as a professional artist in the mid-1930s and went to the West Coast in 1942. His first successes were boogie songs released on King Records from 1947.

From 1950, his more relaxed style combined piano accompaniment with soft arrangements, sometimes jazzy, often including light brass (a trumpet or saxophone), drums and bass, quite similar to Charles Brown or Amos Milburn. A versatile artist, Ivory Joe Hunter wrote thousands of songs, from smooth

R&B ("Changing Blues," "Please Don't Cry Anymore," "No Money, No Luck") to ballads ("Guess Who"), jump blues, and on some occasions country music.

His best-known compositions from the 1940s include "Blues at Sunrise," "Pretty Baby Blues," "Landlord Blues," "Since I Met You Baby," and "I Almost Lost My Mind," which was covered by Pat Boone. Even Elvis Presley converted into top twenty hits three R&B compositions by Ivory Joe Hunter: "My Wish Came True," "I Need You So," and the upbeat "Ain't That Loving You Baby" (cowritten by Ivory Joe Hunter with Clyde Otis, and completely different from the Jimmy Reed song). Nevertheless, Ivory Joe Hunter's career declined from the early 1960s and he had definitively converted to country music by 1969.

Ivory Joe Hunter died of a lung cancer in November 1974. He should not be confused with Motown's first piano player from 1958 to 1963, Joe Hunter (born Joseph Edward Hunter, November 19, 1927).

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 African American Registry. "A Bright Star from Texas, Ivory Joe Hunter." http://www.aaregistry.com/african_american_history/1209/A_bright_star_from_Texas_Ivory_Joe_Hunter.
 R&B Music Primer. "Ivory Joe Hunter." <http://www.rhythmandtheblues.org.uk/artists/hunter.shtml>.

Discography: DGR;LSFP

Recorded for Ivory Records, Pacific Records (his own companies), 4 Star, King, MGM (from 1949), Atlantic (from 1954), but also Strand, Vee-Jay, Capitol, Paramount, Dot.

See also Presley, Elvis Aron

HUNTER, LONG JOHN

- b. 13 July 1931; Ringgold, LA

Raised on several secluded farms during his childhood, noted West Texas singer/guitarist Long John Hunter wasn't exposed to the blues until 1953 when he saw B. B. King perform, shortly after relocating to Beaumont, Texas. Awestruck by King's performance, Hunter purchased a guitar and began practicing diligently, and soon was playing with his own band throughout the Beaumont/Port Gibson area. He made his recording debut in 1953 with the regional hit "Crazy Girl," which was quickly picked up by Duke Records. Hunter continued to play around Beaumont until relocating to the popular border town of Juarez, Mexico, in 1957. He promptly landed a permanent daily gig at the premier nightspot, The Lobby, and showcased his powerful style of hard-edged blues and rock 'n' roll nightly there throughout the next thirteen years.

Hunter's acrobatic playing style and creative guitar work influenced many musicians who traveled to see his shows, including fellow bluesmen Phillip Walker and Lonnie Brooks, and rock 'n' rollers Buddy Holly and Bobby Fuller. Throughout the 1960s, Hunter recorded for the small Yucca label, and enjoyed some regional success. With the closing of The Lobby in 1970, Hunter continued to play his distinctive brand of Texas roadhouse blues in virtual obscurity until receiving national attention with his 1993 CD Ride with Me on Spindletop. He later signed with Alligator and was reunited with his old Juarez jamming partners Walker and Brooks on the successful collaboration Lone Star Shootout. Hunter continued to record several solo albums for Alligator and remained a popular festival draw in the United States and abroad.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Morthland, John. "Long John Hunter: Border Town Legend." Living Blues no. 116 (July/August 1994): 14–25.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Swinging from the Rafters (1997, Alligator ALCD 4853).
Ooh Wee Pretty Baby! (1999, Norton CED 270).

HURT, JOHN SMITH "MISSISSIPPI JOHN"

b. 8 March 1892; Teoc (Carroll County), MS
d. 2 November 1966; Grenada, MS

Birth year has also been listed as 1893.

Life

Blues and folk singer and guitarist. John Hurt grew up in a large family, one of eleven children. His birth date has also been given as July 3, 1893. His father died when John was two years old. He showed interest in music from an early age, and his mother bought him a guitar when he was nine years old. Hurt was entirely self-taught, learning songs from fellow field hands and others. He spent most of his life in Avalon, a small agricultural community where he picked crops, worked with cattle, and worked on the Mississippi River and, in 1915, on the railroad. He began entertaining locally at the age of twelve, playing square dances and house parties. In the early 1920s he began working with a white fiddler named Willie Narmour. This association eventually led to Hurt's being heard by a talent scout for Okeh records, Thomas J. Rockwell. Rockwell arranged for Hurt to record his first 78-rpm record in Memphis on February 14, 1928. He was paid twenty dollars per song, good money at the time for a Mississippi field hand. The following December Hurt traveled to New York, where he recorded the remainder of his Okeh sides in two sessions. During his week in New York he became acquainted with New Orleans guitarist Lonnie Johnson and the two played a good deal of music together. Hurt's recordings seem to have sold only moderately well in 1928–1929. Then the stock market crashed and the recording industry went into a deep slump with the rest of the economy. By this time Hurt was back in Avalon, Mississippi, doing farm work. He was employed by the WPA during the Great Depression, and his life reverted to the obscurity he had long been accustomed to.

In 1963 blues scholar Tom Hoskins tracked Hurt down to his hometown of Avalon and offered him the opportunity to come north to perform at the Newport Folk Festival. His first appearance in decades was an electrifying event for the folk revival movement. In the last three years of his life, Hurt was in great demand as a performer, and he made several recordings for Vanguard Records. He also appeared on television. There may not be surviving videotape of his 1963 appearance on the Tonight show with Johnny Carson (a large number of the shows were erased by an NBC employee), but an appearance on Pete Seeger's Rainbow Quest from 1966 survives. Hurt performs "Spike Driver Blues" and "You're Going to Walk That Lonesome Valley."

One of Hurt's former homes, a "shotgun shack" in Teoc, was purchased by family members and moved to land they own near Avalon. On the Fourth of July, 2002, the building was dedicated as a museum in Hurt's honor.

Music

Strictly speaking, it would be more accurate to call John Hurt a "songster" rather than a bluesman. Like most of the oldest southern black folk musicians to record, he had a broad repertoire of songs, only some of which were blues. Hurt also sang hymns, folk songs, bad man ballads, and other material. Musically, he is representative of the period just before blues emerged as the dominant folk music of the black communities of the south. Ragtime, reels, two-steps, and other now antiquated genres made up much of his musical background. Hurt's performances of the 1890s bad man ballads are particularly intriguing. These songs, such as "Frankie and Johnnie" and "Stackolee," are probably among the key immediate antecedents of blues music. Hurt's 1928 recording of "Frankie" probably indicates a good deal about the style and social context of the Mississippi musical environment at the dawn of blues. Hurt takes the piece at a rapid tempo, and gradually speeds up as he goes along. This invigorating style, probably derived from ragtime guitar style, would have been suitable for entertaining in a juke-joint environment, and could have been enjoyed by dancers of the ragtime and early jazz dances.

Mississippi John Hurt. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Hurt's vocal and guitar styles were atypical for a bluesman. His vocal production was gentle, almost a whisper, even when singing about murder and other acts of violence. It is a sound both seductive and reassuring. He was self-taught as a guitarist, and his technique was absolutely unique. His conception of melody, and of the importance of telling a story in music, pervaded his playing: "I always tried to make my strings say just what I say." To some extent, Hurt was a ragtime guitar picker, like Blind Blake and Reverend Gary Davis. He was less obviously virtuosic than they, Blake in particular, but his technique was every bit as subtle as either of theirs, and perhaps more diverse. Hurt kept up a steady bass with the thumb of his right hand, like many guitarists, but for the most part he did all the other work with his first finger and middle finger, resting his ring finger and little finger under the sound hole. This is particularly remarkable given the elaborate, filigreed passagework on some of his early work, such as the 1928 "Frankie." He worked in a fairly wide variety of keys for a bluesman, including G (highly convenient for his type of thumbed bass work), A, C, D, and E. Unlike such classic Delta blues masters as "Son" House, Hurt made only sparing use of bottleneck technique, using an ordinary pocketknife when he did so. He tended to reserve this for special effects, such as impersonations of speech, animal sounds, or train noises, as in his version of "Casey Jones."

Influence

During his lifetime Hurt’s influence was primarily local, a situation that did not change for many years. In 1952 Harry Smith issued his landmark record set Anthology of American Folk Music, which contained two of Hurt’s finest 1928 sides, “Frankie” and “Spike Driver Blues”; this gave Hurt a legendary stature as the folk music revival burgeoned during the next decade. However, it was Hurt’s reemergence in 1963 that finally made him a genuine celebrity, and in the last three years of his life his influence on young blues and folk musicians was intense and pervasive. Among the many important musicians to be influenced by him during the 1960s were Bob Dylan, Taj Mahal, Ry Cooder, John Fahey, Rory Block, Roy Book Binder, Eric von Schmidt, and Patrick Sky. Some, such as Stefan Grossman, deliberately apprenticed themselves to him, studying his style assiduously. Others, such as Fahey, created some of their finest original works in response to Hurt’s style or in tribute to him (for example, “Requiem for John Hurt” on Fahey’s 1967 album Requia).

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

Bibliography

- AMG (Bruce Eder); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Cohn, Lawrence. “Mississippi John Hurt.” Sing Out!, 14, no. 5 (November 1964):16.
Evans, David. Big Road Blues: Creativity and Tradition in the Folk Blues. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
Kay, George W. “Mississippi John Hurt.” Jazz Journal 17, no. 2 (February 1964): 24.
Obrecht, Jas. “Mississippi John Hurt.” <http://www.mind-spring.com/~dennist/mjhjas.htm> (accessed March 20, 2003).
Shelton, Robert. “City Lends an Ear to Country Singer.” New York Times (January 16, 1964).

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

- “Frankie” and “Nobody’s Dirty Business” (February 14, 1928; OKeh 8560; Memphis).
“Ain’t No Tellin’” and “Avalon Blues” (December 21, 1928; OKeh 8759; New York).
“Big Leg Blues” (December 21, 1928; OKeh matrix 40174-B; recorded in New York; unissued).
“Blessed Be the Name” and “Praying On the Old Camp Ground” (December 28, 1928; OKeh 8666; New York).
“Blue Harvest Blues” and “Spike Driver Blues” (December 28, 1928; OKeh 8692; New York).
“Louis Collins” (December 21, 1928; New York) and “Got the Blues Can’t Be Satisfied” (December 28, 1928; New York) (issued together as OKeh 8724).

“Stack O’ Lee Blues” and “Candy Man Blues” (December 28, 1928; OKeh 8654; New York).

Hurt’s complete early recordings have been reissued on several CDs, including Avalon Blues: The Complete 1928 OKeh Recordings (Columbia Legacy CK 64986); Mississippi John Hurt: 1928 Sessions (Yazoo 1065); and The Greatest Songsters (Document 5003; also includes Richard “Rabbit” Brown and “Hambone” Willie Newburn).

Later recordings include two originally issued on Piedmont Records and now available as Avalon Blues (Rounder 1081) and Worried Blues (Rounder CD 1082; a live recording from the Ontario Club in Washington, D.C.). More numerous are the Vanguard releases: Mississippi John Hurt Today! (Vanguard 79220); The Best of Mississippi John Hurt (Vanguard 19/20; live at Oberlin College, April 15, 1965); The Immortal Mississippi John Hurt (Vanguard 79248); and Last Sessions (Vanguard 79327).

HUTTO, JOSEPH BENJAMIN “J. B.”

b. 29 April 1926; Elko, SC

d. 12 June 1983; Harvey, IL

Guitarist, singer. Intensity, as expressed in raw, almost visceral vocals and slashing, high-volume slide guitar licks, was the most distinctive aspect of Hutto’s blues approach. Like kindred spirit Hound Dog Taylor his music was both ragged and relentless, the perfect sort of industrial strength “houserockin’ music” for the blue collar fans on Chicago’s West Side.

The irrepressible Hutto was a colorful performer with a penchant for sartorial splendor that included hot-pink suits and all manner of exotic headgear. His live shows, which featured extended forays deep into the audience, were interactive affairs powered by Hutto’s primal guitar pyrotechnics and larger-than-life vocals.

Hutto, one of a dozen children of a preacher, performed with the Golden Crowns Gospel Singers in Augusta, Georgia, before moving to Chicago in 1947 to expand his musical horizons. He worked day jobs as a painter and plumber while perfecting his musical abilities on drums and piano. But it was the slide guitar work of Elmore James that most fascinated him and he faithfully followed the guitarist from show to show.

Through practice and persistence Hutto taught himself to play guitar, later stating “can’t nobody but me be blamed for my style.” He also landed a steady gig, playing drums with Johnny Ferguson and His Twisters. But Hutto wasn’t happy being in the background and in 1954 he stepped center stage with his guitar and his new group the Hawks. He made his recording debut with a series of singles for the Chance label but he couldn’t break through the highly competitive Chicago blues scene.

Hutto endured almost a decade of tough times, working at a funeral parlor until his dramatic re-emergence in 1964. His reconfigured edition of the Hawks eliminated the role of bassist in favor of a lean and mean trio with two guitars and drums. In 1967 Hutto and the Hawks were featured on the historic Chicago/The Blues Today compilation, showcasing his unorthodox band and electrifying energy on five tracks. He built on the momentum a year later with the release of Hawk Squat! on the Chicago-based Delmark label.

For the next dozen years Hutto and an ever-changing version of the Hawks took their insistent, in-your-face blues directly to the fans. He recorded for an assortment of small labels, both in the United States and overseas, but it was in live action that his sizzling slide guitar work reached its zenith.

Upon the death of Hound Dog Taylor in 1976, Hutto inherited his hard-working Houserockers band and moved to Boston for the final phase of his career. He performed regularly while helping his nephew Little Ed Williams start his tribute band Lil' Ed and the Blues Imperials and had a Grammy dedicated to him for his participation in the Montreux Jazz Festival compilation Blues Explosion.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Weld, Dave. "J. B. Hutto" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 57
(Autumn 1983): 12–13.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

HY-TONE

Chicago blues and jazz label of the late 1940s. The label was operated by former guitarist and bandleader Freddie Williams (1898–1955) and jukebox operator Nathan Rothner (1912–2003). Opening in early 1946, the company initially was run out of Williams's Melody Lane Record Shop (and used the shop's name), but after a couple of releases Rothner came in and the label's name was changed to Hy-Tone. The company never got a hit, but blues pianist Memphis Slim made a number of outstanding recordings for the label. Hy-Tone was a true pioneer, coming out with the first recordings of blues pianist Sunnyland Slim, uptown blues singer Jo Jo Adams, blues shouter "Crown Prince" Waterford, jump band trumpeter and vocalist Bill Martin, balladeer "Bing" Williams, saxophonist T. S. Mims, and electric guitarist ace Floyd Smith under his own name. In addition, Hy-Tone put out a gospel series, notably three releases by famed singer R. L. Knowles. By the end of 1948, after some twenty-five releases, Hy-Tone was out of business.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert, and Campbell, Robert L. "The Hy-Tone Label, Part One." Blues & Rhythm no. 179 (May 2003): 4–7.
———. "The Hy-Tone Label, Part Two." Blues & Rhythm no. 180 (June 2003): 4–7.
———. "The Hy-Tone Label, Part Three." Blues & Rhythm no. 181 (August 2003): 4–7.

Discography: McGrath

I

I BELIEVE I'LL MAKE A CHANGE (DUST MY BROOM)

“I Believe I’ll Make a Change” was first recorded on February 25, 1932, by Aaron and Milton Sparks in Atlanta, Georgia, for Victor Records. This blues song is in a twelve-measure, three-phrase form with an AAB lyric scheme. The Sparks brothers’ recording was released on Victor 23359 as by Pinetop and Lindberg (Aaron and Milton, respectively), during the lowest time for the record industry during the Great Depression. Nonetheless, other musicians were to use the song’s melody on their own recordings, including Jack Kelly and His South Memphis Jug Band in 1933 (as “Believe I’ll Go Back Home,” Melotone M12812), Josh White (ARC labels including Melotone 13235, recorded on August 1, 1934), and Leroy Carr with Scrapper Blackwell (Vocalion 02820, recorded on August 16, 1934). Other version of “I Believe I’ll Make a Change” continued to appear through 1942, the most notable of which was Washboard Sam’s (Robert Brown) rendition for Bluebird (serial number 8184) in 1939; a copyright was registered by Brown with Duchess Music in 1942.

The tune is best known today by the title “I Believe I’ll Dust My Broom,” first recorded to those words by Robert Johnson on November 23, 1936, for the ARC labels (including issue on Vocalion 03475). Lyric antecedents for the “dust my broom” stanza have been noted (especially by Bob Groom in 1976) in such recordings as “Mr. Carl’s Blues” by Carl Rafferty with Roosevelt Sykes in 1933 (Bluebird B 5429), “Sagefield Woman Blues” by Kokomo Arnold in 1934 (Decca 7044), and “49 Highway Blues” by Big Joe Williams in 1935 (Bluebird B 5996). In addition to singing such new lyrics to the existing melody, Johnson accompanied himself on guitar to a “rocking” boogie beat on the fifth and sixth scale degrees of the prevailing chord.

The “Dust My Broom” version of the song would continue to be played as bluesmen traveled between Mississippi and Chicago. Arthur “Big Boy” Crudup recorded one version in March 1949 (released on Victor 50-0074), Johnson protégé Robert Lockwood another in November 1951 for Mercury 8260.

Elmore James is the post-World War II musician most identified with “Dust My Broom,” having four versions made between 1951 and 1962. The version for Trumpet Records (Trumpet 146) in Jackson, Mississippi, on August 5, 1951, was James’s first hit. Whether he learned the song from Robert Johnson in 1936–1938, especially when both men were living in Belzoni, Mississippi, is debatable, given the wide currency of the melody and lyrics since 1932 and especially since 1934. Nonetheless it became James’s signature song, and his backup band was known as “The Broomdusters.” The 1951 Trumpet version was also the subject of a controversy after James’s death regarding whether he had been recorded unaware during a rehearsal session. The matter was laid to rest when Trumpet owner Lillian McMurry released for publication copies of her contract with James, the copyright sheets, canceled checks, and a telephone call transcript with James. The musical impact of James’s various recordings remains. Recent performances by blues and rock musicians imitate his singing and his high-octave guitar lick, sometimes adding James-styled bottleneck slide guitar solos during the instrumental choruses.

I BELIEVE I'LL MAKE A CHANGE (DUST MY BROOM)

EDWARD KOMARA

I JUST WANT TO MAKE LOVE TO YOU

One of the most frequently covered of all blues songs, “I Just Want to Make Love to You” and its numerous title variations, such as “Just Want to Make Love to You” and “I Just Wanna Make Love to You,” are credited to Willie Dixon, the bassist in Muddy Waters’s great early 1950s band. The song is most often associated with Muddy Waters, though numerous artists of widely varying musical backgrounds have recorded it: Etta James, Freddie King, Memphis Slim, Denise La Salle, Van Morrison, Eric Burdon, Foghat, Buddy Guy, Eddy Clearwater, B. B. King, Barbara Carr, the Rolling Stones, and Isaac Hayes.

On Waters’s 1954 Chess Records version of this song, one can hear the full Chicago blues sound: the electrified Mississippi Delta blues captured by a phenomenal group of musicians, including Waters on guitar/vocals, Little Walter on harmonica, and Otis Spann on piano. Besides Muddy’s powerful vocals, this cut features Walter’s highly amplified, reverb-heavy harmonica solo that redefined the blues harmonica sound and solidified what would become generally known as the “Chicago blues sound”: a heavy rhythm section consisting of guitar/bass/drums punctuated by harmonica rhythm riffs and solos. Robert Palmer suggests that this “new” Chicago blues sound can initially be heard on Muddy’s 1950 “Louisiana Blues,” a reworking of the Delta blues standard “Rollin’ and Tumblin’,” which expanded the nonamplified “Bluebird sound” (a general term derived from many early blues artists who recorded on Bluebird Records) of preceding Chicago recordings such as those of Big Bill Broonzy, John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson, and Big Joe Williams.

Lyrics to Muddy’s version—as well as the stop-time, four-note repeating riff—have remained relatively unchanged over time, not only in the blues tradition, but also in rock performances including the Rolling Stones’ 1964 recording for Decca/London.

Versions by women such as Etta James and Denise La Salle express this song from a female perspective, in which the female is seeking sex and companionship. James’s live versions, on Rocks the House (1964) and Blues in the Night (1986), demonstrate how the original song can be adapted to fit the opposite sex’s point of view: in the lyrics she changes “man” to “girl” where appropriate, and says she wants “to cook your bread, just to make sure your well-fed.” In the latter version, James makes it quite apparent that she is invoking Muddy Waters’s version, as she turns “I Just Want to Make Love to You” (as listed on James’s CD) into a Muddy medley, by ending this tune with a couple of verses from Waters’s “Hoochie Coochie Man.” Denise La Salle’s 2000 version takes a similar approach to adapting Waters’s song to fit the female situation in the new millennium—by keeping this classic song close to the original with just a few necessary point-of-view changes.

JUSTIN WERT

Bibliography

- Barlow, William. Looking Up at Down: The Emergence of Blues Culture. Philadelphia, PA: Temple University Press, 1989.
- Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Penguin Books, 1982.
- Sonnier, Austin. A Guide to the Blues. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1994.

Discography (in Reissue)

- Buddy Guy. Blues Alive (1992, BMG video 80005).
- Denise La Salle. This Real Woman (2000, Odena Records).
- Eddy Clearwater. Cool Blues Walk (1998, Bullseye Blues 619614).
- Etta James. Etta James Rocks the House (1964, Chess 9184).
- . Blues in the Night (1986, Fantasy 9647-2).
- Muddy Waters. Chess Box Set (1989, Chess 80002).

ICHIBAN RECORDS

Ichiban was founded by Jon Abbey in Atlanta, Georgia, in 1985, and it released much blues and gospel, in addition to jazz and rap. A sampling of its singers include Trudy Lynn, Millie Jackson, Clarence Carter, and Charles Wilson, among many others. It is also a distributor for more than thirty-five independent labels.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Williams, Dave. “The Ichiban Story” [part 1]. Juke Blues no. 25 (Spring 1992): 14–17; [part 2]. Juke Blues no. 26 (Summer 1992): 22–24.

I'M A MAN (MANNISH BOY)

One of the great legendary crossover blues to rock 'n' roll songs is “I’m a Man (Mannish Boy).” The song starts with a deep, soulful “Oooh, yeah,” followed by a slight pause, then charges in with one grabbing note on electric guitar, followed by a three-note riff—and the audience is hooked. The blues call style, spelling out “M-A-N”—with lead vocal calling out the individual letters as the band hollers back enthusiastically “woo” and other exclamations—creates this classic blues song’s fabric.

The swirling dervish of rock ’n’ roll’s roots took curious paths in 1955, when the song was recorded by two, now-legendary performers: Bo Diddley recording “I’m a Man” and Muddy Waters recording his rebuttal “Mannish Boy.” Both versions of the song brought immense popularity and status to each musician, one cast with a decided rock ’n’ roll direction (Diddley) and one toward electric Chicago blues (Waters). Both musicians were catalytic to introducing their brands of this same now-classic song to the mass market via their both recording their relative versions of the song on Chess Records, which was a beehive of activity in Chicago in the 1950s.

Bo Diddley (aka Elias McDaniel) had grown up in the same home state as Waters: Mississippi. Diddley had a diverse musical background, having played and composed for the violin, while also playing the drums and guitar. Diddley described his core sound as trying to play “drum licks on a guitar,” with a hard-driving beat with electric edge.

Diddley had written the song “I’m a Man” after a decade of playing local clubs in Chicago, where he had migrated with his family as a youth. He originally cut a demo disk, with “Uncle John” as side A and “I’m a Man” on the flip side, at Chess Records’ studios in Chicago in early 1955. Owners Leonard and Phil Chess requested some personalization be done of the “Uncle John” cut. The final, rerecorded disk, with revised “Bo Diddley”/“I’m a Man,” was completed on March 2, 1955, at Bill Putnam’s Universal Recording Studio in Chicago. It hit the R&B charts immediately, landing on May 4, 1955.

The song very much encapsulated the considerable blues and rock ’n’ roll scene that had been heating up in Chicago. “I’m a Man” carried enough of a pack to add to Chess’s punches to a broader audience of white listeners that had already been feasting on the likes of songs by Chuck Berry, Buddy Guy, and Muddy Waters.

Muddy Waters (aka McKinley Morganfield) already had been setting his own blues bonfires since 1948 with the release of his first songs “I Can’t Be Satisfied” and “I Feel Like Going Home.” Waters performed in Chicago clubs along with notable bandmate Willie Dixon, who penned and served up an indelible backbeat for Waters’s powerful blues voice and mean blues electric guitar delivery.

Waters thus responded to Diddley’s “I’m a Man” with his version, “Mannish Boy,” later in the year of 1955. The song was one of many that affected the Rolling Stones. The Stones, who coined the name of their band based on one of Waters’s songs “Rollin’ Stone,” picked up the song and have performed it and also included it on the Love You Live album.

“I’m a Man (Mannish Boy)” also appears on the 1970 release Birth of Success by Jimi Hendrix, as well as live and studio versions by the Yardbirds.

Even today, the lasting sound and power of the song “I’m a Man (Mannish Boy)” has compelled it to be selected for major motion picture soundtracks for films such as Risky Business to Good Fellas to Ghosts of Mississippi.

MEG FISHER

Bibliography

- Clarke, Donald. “Diddley, Bo.” MusicWeb Encyclopaedia of Popular Music website, <http://www.musicweb.uk.net/encyclopaedia/d/D89.HTM> (accessed October 2001).
Welding, Pete. “Gone to Mainstreet.” In Bluesland. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1992.

I'M GONNA MOVE TO THE OUTSKIRTS OF TOWN

Originally titled “We Gonna Move (to the Outskirts of Town),” the classic prewar blues song was written and first recorded by William “Casey Bill” Weldon in 1936 for Vocalion Records. The song would be covered by dozens of blues, jazz, and rock musicians throughout the years, including Louis Jordan, Big Bill Broonzy, B. B. King, Ray Charles, Jimmy Rushing, Jimmy Witherspoon, Jazz Gillum, and Muddy Waters. Weldon, a remarkable slide guitarist who was often billed as “The Hawaiian Guitar Wizard,” featured his bottleneck style prominently on the original, but popular cover versions of the blues standard curiously did not incorporate the guitar technique.

Weldon’s classic composition effectively conveys two of blues music’s most enduring themes—love and jealousy. The singer expresses his plans to keep his woman faithful to him by moving away with her and living far from everyone else. He goes one step further in suggesting that he will also eliminate the need for any visitors, thereby removing all temptations. He intends on replacing the iceman with a modern refrigerator and his coal stove with a gas-burning system, as well as purchasing his own groceries, all to do away with the need for any deliverymen. The memorable final verse reiterates his paranoia with his desire to have children who have features that resemble his, thereby reassuring himself that his woman was indeed faithful to him.

I'M GONNA MOVE TO THE OUTSKIRTS OF TOWN

Piedmont singer and guitarist Blind Boy Fuller recorded a thinly disguised version of the song the following year titled "I'm Gonna Move (to the Edge of Town)," but Weldon's composition didn't receive major national attention until 1941 when it was covered by singing bandleader and musician Louis Jordan. Recorded on Decca as a slow blues with the title that is best known today as "I'm Gonna Move to the Outskirts of Town," Jordan's successful jump-blues style fit perfectly with Weldon's song, and its enormous popularity gave the singer his first hit record. The following year, Jordan wrote and recorded the witty answer song "I'm Gonna Leave You (on the Outskirts of Town)," which reached number three on the R&B charts. In Jordan's updated response, the frustrated singer admits that his original plan has failed, and he has now decided to leave her there.

The popularity of Jordan's version inspired many others to cover the song throughout the 1940s, 1950s, and 1960s. Swing bandleader Jimmie Lunceford's version made it to #17 on the Pop charts in 1942. Blues shouter Jimmy Rushing also recorded a popular version with the Count Basie Orchestra in April of that year. Rushing would record the song several times throughout his career and it became one of the songs most associated with the artist. The song was also among singer Jimmy Witherspoon's favorites.

In 1961, Ray Charles's version reached #25 on the R&B charts and it crossed over briefly onto the pop charts. B. B. King also featured the song in his performances, and it became one of the staples of his live shows throughout his long career.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Moore, Dave. Liner notes to Casey Bill Weldon: Complete Recorded Works 1935–1938, Vol. 2 (Document CD 5218).

Whitburn, Joel. Top R&B Singles: 1942–1999. Wisconsin: Record Research, Inc., 2000.

IMPERIAL

Founded in Los Angeles in 1946 by ex-NBC employee Lewis R. Chudd, the Imperial label made steady progress through its first years, mainly recording local West Coast acts—such as Lloyd Glenn, Poison Gardner, Jake Porter, and Charlie "Boogie Woogie" Davis—until the company began expanding in the late 1940s. Imperial was one of the first independent record labels to make forays into the blossoming New Orleans R&B scene in 1949 and the label was rewarded with big sellers by Fats Domino, Smiley

Lewis, Dave Bartholomew, and Jewel King. Bartholomew soon became Chudd's right hand in Crescent City, operating with Chudd's patronage as talent scout/A&R man/musical arranger/house band leader. During the 1950s, it was New Orleans in general, and Fats Domino in particular, that would prove to be the company's chief asset—leading Chudd to relocate to the Crescent City for several years—although the Imperial label remained in Los Angeles and continued to record other blues artists such as Li'l Son Jackson, Mercy Dee Walton, Smokey Hogg, Cecil Gant, Pee Wee Crayton, and T-Bone Walker.

Riding on the timely success of Fats Domino in the rock 'n' roll market with inoffensive hits such as "Ain't It a Shame," "Blueberry Hill," and "Blue Monday," Chudd and Imperial Records were easily able to weather the economic storm that threatened many other established independent labels, and continued to enjoy chart success with Domino and rockabilly recordings by, for instance, Ricky Nelson through to the early 1960s, when Chudd began expanding his portfolio with the purchase of Aladdin Records in 1961 and Minit Records in 1963. The last purchase stretched Chudd's finances just a little too thinly, resulting in Imperial and all of its subsidiaries—Colony (founded 1951), Bayou (1953), Catalina (1954), Moppet (1954), Post (1955), Knight (1958), and Bonnie (1962)—being sold to Liberty Records later that same year.

DAVID PENNY

Bibliography

Daniels, Bill. "Imperial 5000 Series 1947–1950." Whiskey, Women, And... 8 (March 1982): 12.

Ruppli, Michel. The Aladdin/Imperial Labels. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1991.

Discography: McGrath

"Imperial Album Discography," Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/imperial/imperiala.html> (accessed December 11, 2004).

Spirit of New Orleans: The Genius of Dave Bartholomew (1992, EMI CD 80184).

INSTANT

New Orleans-based label active from 1961 to 1972 and co-owned by Joe Banashak, Larry McKinley, and Irvin Smith. Artists included Chris Kenner, Art Neville, Chick Carbo, Ernie K-Doe, Huey Smith, and Larry Darnell. Valiant was a subsidiary.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

“Minit/Instant Album Discographies,” Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/imperial/minit.html#instant> (accessed December 18, 2004).

IRMA

Oakland label, operated by Bob Geddins (after whose wife it was named) and Isaac Neal Jr. from 1956 to 1958. The artist roster included Jimmy McCracklin, Johnny Fuller, Jimmy Wilson, Candyman McGuirt, Big Mama Thornton, and Houston guitarist Juke Boy Barner (Bonner), as well as a couple of vocal groups.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography and Discography

Cook, Les, Victor Pearlin, and Darryl Stolper. “Bob Geddins’ Bay Area Blues: Big Town 100/400 Series and Irma.” Juke Blues no. 9 (Summer 1987): 26–28.

See also Bonner, Weldon H. Phillip “Juke Boy”; Fuller, Johnny; Geddins, Bob; King, Al; McGuirt, Clarence “Candyman”; Oakland; Thornton, Willie Mae “Big Mama”; Wilson, Jimmy

IRONING BOARD SAM

b. Sammie Moore, 1939; Rock Hill (or Rockfield), SC

Ironing Board Sam, the stentoric singer and electric pianist with an enormous repertoire and earth-shaking delivery, earned his stage moniker in 1959 when he mounted the keyboard from an upright piano on an ironing board and rigged a primitive electrical hook-up to create an early electronic keyboard. His legend grew in the late 1970s by means of spectacular displays of stagecraft, which included his plan to parachute into New Orleans’ Jackson Square and his 1979 JazzFest appearance submerged with his piano in a tank of water. Woefully underrepresented on record, Sam continues to electrify audiences well into the twenty-first century.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Larkin
Hammond, Scott. “Steady Ironing Man: Ironing Board Sam.” Living Blues no. 23 (September/October 1975): 32–33.

Discography: LSFP

Smokin’: The Sounds of New Orleans, Vol. 2 (1994, WWOZ Radio).
The Human Touch (1995, Orleans).

IVORY RECORDS

Owned by “King Ivory” Lee Semiens in Houston, Texas, from 1957 to 1965. Artists included Semiens, D. C. Bender, and Lightnin’ Hopkins.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

J

JACKSON, ARMAND “JUMP”

b. 25 March 1917; New Orleans, LA
d. 31 January 1985; Chicago, IL

Jump-band style drummer who recorded on many Chicago blues sessions in the 1940s and 1950s, and on the first American Folk Blues Festival tour in 1962. As an entrepreneur, Jackson founded La Salle Records on which he issued music by Eddie Boyd, Eddy Clearwater, Little Mack Simmons, and himself.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne); Larkin

Discography: LSFP

JACKSON, BENJAMIN CLARENCE “BULLMOOSE”

b. 22 April 1919; Cleveland, OH
d. 31 July 1989; Cleveland, OH

Tenor and alto saxophone/vocal. He preferred “Moose” but the longer form of his nickname was generally used. He took up tenor saxophone in high school and by 1939 was in Freddie Webster’s band. Following residencies in Buffalo and Cleveland in the early 1940s, he joined Lucky Millinder’s band in 1944. In August 1945 he recorded with leading members of Millinder’s band, launching a career as a blues and jive singer that soon led to individual billing with Millinder. “We Ain’t Got Nothin’ (But the Blues)”/“Bull Moose Jackson Blues” (1945, Queen 4102) defined the style. In June 1948, he went solo with his Buffalo Bearcats whose recordings for King up to 1955 made them a leading jump/R&B combo, which undertook nationwide touring. He also achieved some notoriety for mildly risqué material such as “Big Ten-Inch Record” (1952, King 4580) and “Meet Me With Your Black Drawers On” (1953, King 4634). On later records he mostly left saxophone playing to sidemen and featured himself as a singer only. Though still making occasional records, he retired in 1959 and by 1963 was working as a waiter, while leading a trio for weekend gigs. After 1974, he made a gradual comeback, appearing regularly with the Flashcats after 1983 and touring Europe with the Johnny Otis Show in 1985.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli Millar, Bill. Liner notes for Big Fat Mamas Are Back in Style Again (1980, Route 66 KIX14, Stockholm).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

JACKSON, BESSIE
(See Bogan, Lucille)

JACKSON, BILL

JACKSON, BILL

b. 22 February 1906; Granite, MD
d. Unknown

Although he was due to sign for the Victor label in 1928, songster Bill Jackson didn't record before his discovery by Pete Welding in 1962. He is noteworthy for his nimble finger-picking guitar style in the East Coast tradition, his light vocals, and his memorable blues lyrics as in "22nd of November," a moving tribute to President Kennedy.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

Harris
Welding, Peter J. Notes to Bill Jackson (1962, Testament LP [2]201).

Discography

Can't Keep from Crying (1994, Testament CD 5007).
Long Steel Rail (1994, Testament CD 5014).

JACKSON, BO WEAVIL

Flourished 1920s

Aka Sam Butler. Guitarist and singer, noted for his distinctive singing and slide guitar technique. Jackson was discovered performing in Birmingham, Alabama, and recorded for the Paramount and Vocalion labels. Although Paramount publicity referred to him as coming from the Carolinas, experts believe his music to have traits of Alabama styles.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne); Larkin

Discography: DGR

JACKSON BROTHERS

Wilfred Jackson

b. 1920; Gary, IN

Harold "George Hack" Jackson

b. 1924; Gary, IN

Billy Jackson

b. 1929; Gary, IN

Brother swing group active in Los Angeles in 1949–1957 and led by oldest brother Wilfred. Their "We're Gonna Rock This Joint" (1952, RCA Victor 20-5004) is considered an example of proto-rock 'n' roll. Their success was dampened by a 1953 bandstand arrest of then-vocalist Billy Henderson for drug possession. Brothers Harold "George Hack" and Billy later were members of the Treniers.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Vera, Billy. "Gonna Rock This Joint." Blues & Rhythm no. 68 (April 1992): 4–6.

JACKSON, CALVIN (1)

Active 1940s

1940s West Coast singer who recorded two jump-style sides in Los Angeles in 1945 for the 4-Star label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: LSFP

JACKSON, CALVIN (2)

b. 1961; MS

Drummer from north Mississippi who recorded with Junior Kimbrough, R. L. Burnside, and various five-and-drum groups. By 1995 he had moved to Holland, continuing his blues drumming with local and visiting groups.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Bonner, Brett, et al. "40 Under 40." Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 77–90.

JACKSON, CHARLES "PAPA CHARLIE"

b. ca. 1880; New Orleans or Algiers, LA (unconfirmed)

d. Spring 1938; Chicago, IL (unconfirmed)

Although Jackson is the first commercially successful solo, self-accompanied (banjo, guitar, ukulele) male blues singer, hardly any factual biographical information is available. In 1924 The Paramount Book of the Blues (which is the source of Jackson's best known photograph) claims that he came from New Orleans. This is supported by his accent, and his regular rhythm may indicate experience as a band member [Smith]. He reportedly worked as a singer/performer on various touring minstrel/medicine shows across the United States during the 1910s. From the early 1920s he lived in Chicago, where he worked for tips in "Jew Town" and on Maxwell Street, and where he recorded most of his disc records. In 1926 Paramount sponsored his appearance at the Mardi Gras and afterward at the TOBA theatre in New Orleans. In December 1928 an ad placed by Paramount in the Chicago Defender depicts Jackson in a fairground setting and states that he "went down to the great Kentucky Sate Fair last summer." Apart from the fact that Jackson recorded one session in Milwaukee and another three in Grafton, Wisconsin, between September 1929 and May 1930, this is the only evidence that he also traveled outside Chicago. Until his probable death of alcoholism (other sources claim he committed suicide by jumping in the Chicago River), he lived on the west side of Chicago, where he frequently worked club dates. He may have been survived by his sister. (He should not be confused with jazz guitarist Charlie Jackson, who had recorded with the Tiny Parham Band in Chicago in 1928.)

On record Jackson played both guitar and a guitar banjo—a hybrid six-string banjo strung and fingered like a guitar. He incorporated a variety of melodic devices. One song would start with single note runs (flatpick style) and finger-picking patterns and then fly into chords played so fast that it seemed like the rhythm was actually the melody line. Although he is among the very few blues banjo players on records in his time, his style had a jazz flavor: He was probably one of the most technically proficient artists of his time in any genre [Website]. Jackson bridged the gap between the nineteenth-century songsters tradition and the country blues. His recorded repertoire is unusually diverse and sometimes reflects his minstrel experiences ("Don't Break Down on Me"). It embraces anything from straightforward collections of traditional verses ("Shake That Thing") to topical ("Judge Cliff Davies Blues") or autobiographical blues composed by himself ("Lexington Kentucky"). There is double entendre ("Shave 'Em Dry"), vaudevillian straight fare ("Your Baby Ain't Sweet Like Mine"), even affinities with hillbilly music ("I'm Going Where the Chilly Winds Don't Blow"). He was particularly well known for songs about Chicago landmarks ("Maxwell Street Blues"). The title that established him as a best-selling record star in 1924 was "Salty Dog Blues"; a couple of years later Paramount let him record the title again in the company of Freddie Keppard's Jazz Cardinals from New Orleans.

Jackson's most important impact probably lies in the fact that he paved the way for other male blues artists, not least his Paramount mates Blind Blake or Blind Lemon Jefferson, at a time when the business was dominated by female singers. As a blues banjoist he is, apart from Gus Cannon, almost a stand-alone figure; he used a "crossed notes" technique involving "returning to a chord," to facilitate finger-picking patterns. Especially in his links between choruses, some of the fingering patterns that later emerged in the jazz playing of Lonnie Johnson are identifiable ("Long Gone Lost John"). As a guitar player ("Jackson's Blues") he prefigured such performers as Leadbelly. As a small-voiced baritone blues singer, his most important influence is on his friend Big Bill Broonzy, the irony being that their one joint recording session for ARC in 1935 (Jackson's last recordings) remains unissued and apparently no tests have survived. Jackson himself obviously admired Blind Blake ("Forgotten Blues"), and on one occasion they recorded a duet ("Papa Charlie and Blind Blake Talk About It"). Jackson was an entertainer and one of the first blues recording artists to rely primarily on his own material, and the first blues singer to record happy-go-lucky, up-tempo music that made him popular among the black record-buying public [Calt]. But, as Smith has pointed out, white listeners and blues critics sometimes find fault with this lack of "deep intensity," or ponderously slow and sorrowful blues.

Jackson made his record debut in 1924 for Paramount, and his second disk became a best-seller. Most of his records during the next decade are self-accompanied blues (Paramount, 1924–1930; OKeh, 1934), but he also recorded with, or provided accompaniment for, Lottie Beaman, Blind Blake, Lucille Bogan, Bill Bronzy (1935, ARC unissued), Ida Cox, Amos Easton, Teddy Edwards, Hattie McDaniel, Ma Rainey, and Freddy Keppard's Jazz Cardinals. Paramount also issued a "Descriptive Novelty" on which the "Paramount All Stars" Blind Lemon Jefferson, Blind Blake, Will Ezell, Charlie Spand, The Hokum Boys, and Papa Charlie Jackson performed short excerpts from some of their recorded titles. The Broadway label used the pseudonyms "Casey Harris" or "Charlie Carter," respectively. A freak German Biberphon issue was mislabeled "Manhattan Roof Orchestra." Notable LP reissues are Yazoo L-1029 and Biograph BLP-12042. The complete oeuvre was reissued in chronological order on three Document CDs, DOCD5087–5089.

RAINER E. LOTZ

JACKSON, CHARLES “PAPA CHARLIE”

Bibliography

- Calt, S. “The Anatomy of a ‘Race’ Label, Part 2.” 78 Quarterly 1, no. 4 (1989).
- Calt, S., N. Perls, and M. Stewart. Liner notes for Papa Charlie Jackson: Fat Mouth 1924–27 (Yazoo LP-1029).
- Kent, D. Liner notes for Papa Charlie Jackson 1925–28 (Biograph BLP 12042).
- Olbrecht, J. “Papa Charlie Jackson.” Victrola and 78 Journal no. 9 (1996).
- The Paramount Book of the Blues*. (Port Washington, WI: 1924).
- “Preserve Maxwell Street.” Papa Charlie Jackson website, <http://www.openair.org/maxwell/papacj.html>.
- Smith, C. Liner notes for Papa Charlie Jackson Vol. 1 1924–1926 (Document CD DOCD5087-89).

Discography: DGR

JACKSON, CORDELL “GUITAR GRANNY”

b. 15 July 1923; Memphis, TN

Memphis rockabilly cult figure who came to national prominence by playing her instrumental “Knockin’ 60” on a Budweiser beer commercial in 1991. Her career dates back to performing with her father in the 1930s. She founded Moon Records in 1956, which she sustained while selling Memphis real estate.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

JACKSON, FRUTELAND

b. 9 June 1953; Doddsville, MS

Singer, acoustic guitarist, and teacher of blues-in-the-schools workshops.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Nelson, David. “Fruteland Jackson: ‘We Don’t have to Sing About Cows, Corn, and Plantations.’” Living Blues no. 117 (September/October 1994): 54–59.

JACKSON, GEORGE HENRY

b. 1936; Greenville, MS

Songwriter and singer. As composer he supplied top R&B hits to soul singers Clarence Carter (“Too Weak to Fight”) and Z. Z. Hill (“Down Home Blues”). In mainstream popular music, his songs were massive hits for Bob Seger (“Old Time Rock and Roll”) and the Osmonds (“One Bad Apple”). As singer he has recorded for Fame and Hi labels, later for MGM and Black & Tan.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Ed Hogan); Larkin

Discography: AMG (Ed Hogan); Larkin

JACKSON, GRADY “FATS”

b. 22 November 1927; Asheville, NC

d. 17 or 18 January 1994; Atlanta, GA

Saxophonist. Jackson played in Chicago with Elmore James and was a member of Little Walter’s 1954–1955 touring band before returning to Atlanta where he worked extensively with vocalist Billy Wright and recorded “Go Girl” in 1990 with Sil Austin and Mark “Kaz” Kazanoff as the Tri-Sax-Ual Soul Champs.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Bonner, Brett J. “Grady ‘Fats’ Jackson” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 115 (May/June 1994): 64.

JACKSON, JIM

b. 1884; Hernando, MS

d. 1937; Hernando, MS

Jim Jackson is one of the oldest blues guitarists to have come from Mississippi. He was a songster in the minstrel show tradition whose heavy strumming indicates a nineteenth-century origin for his songs. He recorded from 1927 to 1930 and his influential “Kansas City Blues” presumably was one of the world’s first gold records.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR

JACKSON, JOHN

b. 25 February 1924; Woodville, VA
 d. 20 January 2002; Fairfax Station, VA

After his discovery by folk revivalists in the mid-1960s, Jackson became one of folk-blues' best-loved purveyors of Piedmont-style acoustic blues guitar, with its alternating bass patterns, ragtime rhythms, and finger-picked melodies on the treble strings. Self-described (accurately so) as a "songster" who played not only blues but country music, old-timey dance tunes, ballads, reels, and folk songs. Jackson was raised in rural Rappahannock County, Virginia (about 80 miles southwest of, but worlds away from, Washington, D.C.) in a large, poor family that entertained itself with homemade music and old 78s (including those of his favorites, Blind Blake and Jimmie Rodgers).

Around age twenty-five, Jackson moved to Fairfax County, closer to D.C., but retained his lilting Blue Ridge drawl and old-fashioned manners—gentle and gracious but with a quiet dignity. He worked a variety of hard-labor jobs, including grave digging, having mostly abandoned his youthful hobby of playing at area house parties and country dances, until folklorist Chuck Perdue chanced upon him practicing at a Fairfax gas station in 1964 and took him to D.C. concerts of John Hurt and Mance Lipscomb, where Arhoolie Records' Chris Strachwitz met him and signed him on the spot. Jackson soon became a favorite on the folk-blues circuit, playing coffee houses and festivals. After three albums on Arhoolie, Jackson cut two for Rounder and one for Alligator. He was awarded a prestigious National Heritage Fellowship in 1986. In later years, he often performed with his son James.

Not an originator nor (despite some critical hyperbole to the contrary) a dazzling guitarist, Jackson nevertheless was an adept player with a delightfully eclectic repertoire and a personable performer who exuded good-natured warmth off-stage as well as on.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Barry Lee Pearson); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
 Benicewicz, Larry. "Remembering John Jackson: 1924–2002." Blues Art Journal, <http://www.bluesartstudio.at/NeueSeiten/J.Jacks.html>.
 Pearson, Barry Lee, and Scott Barretta. "Tribute to John Jackson." Living Blues no. 163 (June 2002).

Discography: AMG; LSPFJACKSON, LEE

b. Warren George Harding Lee, 18 August 1921; Gill, AR
 d. 1 July 1979; Chicago, IL

Guitarist, singer, songwriter known for his bright, slightly reverberated leads, epitomized by his "Apollo" instrumentals for Cadillac Baby and Carl Jones. Jackson was also an accompanist to J. B. Hutto and appeared on his Testament and Delmark LPs, and on ten sides with Roosevelt Sykes. His first issued recordings, "Fishin' in My Pond" b/w "I'll Just Keep Walking" (1956, Cobra), and "Pleading For Love" b/w "Juanita" (1961, Key Hole), were strong efforts for small independents. In 1974 he recorded his sole LP, Lonely Girl (Blues On Blues), and appeared on Ralph Bass's I Didn't Give a Damn If Whites Bought It, Vol. 5. Jackson went to Europe in 1970 with Willie Dixon's Chicago Blues All-Stars, and in 1979 was murdered in a domestic dispute.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

O'Brien, Justin. "All Around Man." Living Blues nos. 33/34 (Summer 1977): 4.

Discography: AMG; LSPFJACKSON, LIL' SON

b. Melvin Jackson, 17 August 1916; Tyler, TX
 d. 30 May 1976; Dallas, TX

In 1948, thirty-two-year-old Dallas mechanic and amateur bluesman Melvin Jackson cut a disk in an amusement arcade for a quarter. His friends urged him to send it to Bill Quinn of Houston's Gold Star Recording, which had launched a Race series the previous year. To Jackson's surprise, Quinn invited him to Houston to record. His Gold Star records sold well enough in Texas, Oklahoma, and Louisiana to attract the attention of Lew Chudd at Imperial Records. Now a full-time musician, Jackson recorded more than fifty sides for Imperial in Los Angeles and Texas between 1950 and 1954.

Jackson followed a path similar to that of Smokey Hogg, Frankie Lee Sims, and Lightnin' Hopkins—fellow Texas bluesmen who recorded in a dry and spare rustic blues vein rather than in the more modern, jazzy style of Texas guitarists Gatemouth Brown and T-Bone Walker. On Imperial, he recorded both solo and with a band, the latter marred by Jackson's idiosyncratic timing. His best remembered song is "Rockin' and Rollin'" (1951), usually known as "Rock Me" (as by Muddy Waters) or "Rock Me Baby" (as by B. B. King). (Despite some lyrical overlap, Jackson's song is not the same as Arthur Crudup's 1944 "Rock Me Mamma.") A shy and religious man whose personality was not well suited for show business, he quit blues after a 1956 car wreck en route from an Oklahoma gig, although Arhoolie's Chris Strachwitz coaxed him out of retirement long enough to record an album in 1960.

JACKSON, LIL' SON

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Texas

JACKSON, LITTLE WILLIE

b. 9 September 1912; Houston, TX

d. 13 February 2001; Los Angeles, CA

Blind bandleader, vocalist, and saxophonist who played swing jazz and jump-blues with some boogie elements. He formed the Honeydrippers with pianist Joe Liggins, and had the 1945 R&B hit "The Honeydripper." Recorded for the Aladdin, Specialty, Mercury, Honeydripper, and Blues Spectrum labels.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger)

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Aladdin/Score; Liggins, Joe; Mercury/Fontana/Keynote/Blue Rock; Specialty/Fidelity/Juke Box

JACKSON, MAHALIA

b. 16 October 1911 (1912?); New Orleans, LA

d. 27 January 1972; Evergreen Park, IL

Mahalia Jackson, dubbed the "Queen of Gospel Music," is generally regarded as the most influential figure in American gospel music. Jackson was born in

New Orleans and moved with her family to Chicago as a teenager. She began singing in Baptist churches located in both cities, notably Chicago's Greater Salem Baptist Church with the Prince Johnson Gospel Singers in the 1920s. Although Jackson exclusively performed spiritual music, her singing style was recognizably influenced by the secular genres of ragtime, jazz, and blues that she encountered while in New Orleans and Chicago. Specifically, blues legend Ma Rainey is cited as one of Jackson's early inspirations. Jackson is listed as a noteworthy influence by performers such as R&B singer Aretha Franklin.

Jackson began a solo career in the mid-1930s, initially under the Decca label, then for Apollo Records in 1946, and eventually for Columbia Records in 1954. She also had a popular radio program for CBS in the 1950s. Among Jackson's numerous recordings are the singles "God's Gonna Separate the Wheat from the Tares" (1937) and the best-selling "Move On Up a Little Higher" (1948), and albums such as The Power and The Glory (1960) and Mahalia Jackson Recorded Live in Europe (1961). Jackson collaborated extensively with gospel writer/composer Thomas A. Dorsey, and thanks to her growing popularity as a live performer, enjoyed international success, especially in Europe. Notable performances during the height of her popularity include the 1958 Newport Jazz Festival, the 1961 inauguration of President Kennedy, and the funeral of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., in 1968.

Jackson succumbed to heart failure in early 1972. She was posthumously inducted into the Gospel Music Association's Hall of Fame in 1978.

BEN MCCORKLE

Bibliography

Dahl, Linda. Stormy Weather. New York: Pantheon, 1984.
Jackson, Mahalia, and Evan McLeod Wylie. Movin' On Up. New York: Hawthorne Books, 1966.

Discography: AMG; DGR; Gospel Records 1943–1969

JACKSON, VASTI

b. 20 October 1959; McComb, MS

Best known as Katie Webster's longtime guitarist and arranger, Jackson has also backed artists as varied as soul singers Bobby Rush and Z. Z. Hill, jazz diva Cassandra Wilson, and zydeco star C. J. Chenier. His guitar style is polished and restrained, and contains both jazz and R&B influences.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Nelson, David. "Vasti Jackson." Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 27–34.

Discography

No Borders to the Blues (2003, Vasti Jackson Music).

JACKSON, WILLIS "GATOR" "GATOR TAIL"

b. 25 April 1928; Miami, FL
d. 25 October 1987; New York, NY

Saxophonist. Willis "Gator" Jackson combined fervor and showmanship with an underrated harmonic knowledge and sophistication. Jackson's sax skills were often underrated by critics who viewed his emphasis on melodic statement and preference for rhythmically frenetic compositions as evidence he lacked the skills or desire to play more challenging and experimental pieces. But Jackson had studied music theory in college, although his training was intensified during stints in Cootie Williams's group. Jackson also learned bop from the genre's masters, Charlie Parker and Dizzy Gillespie. His facility at delivering growls, smears, and background embellishments made vital musical contributions to vintage R&B and soul tunes, particularly sessions with former wife Ruth Brown. Jackson invented a special horn for ballads he dubbed the "Gator horn." This was a long instrument with a ball-shaped bell and a small opening that had a sound midway between a soprano and alto.

Jackson's greatest dates as a leader were small combo efforts, where he provided sterling, robust solos in a setting usually dubbed "soul-jazz." On these albums Jackson often used groups with an organist and guitarist, sometimes a second horn, plus a drummer and/or conga player. Jackson's finest ensemble was a trio with guitarist Pat Martino (then emerging as a star) and organist Carl Wilson. Jackson made outstanding releases for Prestige during the 1960s, most notably Thunderbird and Together Again! that matched him with Brother Jack McDuff. He also had some classic 1970s dates, among them Headed and Gutted, Bar Wars, and In the Alley.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

New Grove Jazz; Santelli
Burke, Tony. "Obituary." Blues & Rhythm no. 34 (1988): 6.

Discography: Lord

JACOBS, MARION WALTER

(See Little Walter)

JACQUE, BEAU

b. Andrus Espre, 1 November 1952; Duralde, LA
d. 10 September 1999; Kinder, LA

Accordionist, vocalist, composer. Beau Jacque took up the accordion in 1987 while recovering from a back injury. Upon his recovery, he formed the Zydeco Hi-Rollers, and fused zydeco music with elements of urban soul music, rock, hip-hop, and reggae. He was a best-selling artist for Rounder Records, and a top draw in New Orleans and the Louisiana bayou venues until his untimely death from a heart attack.

JOHN SINCLAIR/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Discography: AMG

JACQUET, ILLINOIS

b. Jean Baptiste Illinois Jacquet, 31 October 1922; Boussard, LA
d. 22 July 2004; Queens, NY

Saxophonist. Jacquet perfected his aggressive, almost exhibitionistic, tenor technique in Milton Larkin's territorial big band in Texas and then, at age nineteen, established his reputation via the success of his signature tune "Flying Home" with the Lionel Hampton Orchestra in 1941. Jacquet moved on to Cab Calloway's big band in 1943. In 1945 he joined the Count Basie Band for a couple of years before leaving to become a part of the Jazz at the Philharmonic all-star touring aggregation and ultimately to lead his own band. He recorded extensively for Savoy, Mercury, RCA, Epic, Atlantic, and other major labels.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: Lord

JAMES, CLIFTON

b. 7 October 1936; Chicago, IL

Chicago drummer best known for performing with guitarist Bo Diddley, heard on the latter's Chess

JAMES, CLIFTON

Records releases from 1955 through 1959. Formulated with Diddley the execution on drums and guitar of Diddley's signature "shave-and-a-haircut, two bits" beat pattern.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Cushing, Steve. "Behind the Beat of Blues." Living Blues no. 96 (March/April 1991): 12–23.

JAMES, ELMORE

b. Joe Willie James, 27 January 1918; Richland, MS
d. 24 May 1963; Chicago, IL

James, the son of Leola Brooks and an unknown father, was given his stepfather's name. Years later he became Elmore, distinguishing himself from friend and frequent playing partner, Joe Willie Wilkins.

James's family moved from farm to farm in Holmes and surrounding counties. In Canton, the James family adopted Robert Earl Holston, an orphan the same age as Elmore. The two boys learned on homemade instruments. Ajan Wilson is remembered teaching the boys guitar when the Jameses were living on a plantation near Tchula. Soon they were performing at Tchula's Midnight Grill. By 1937, James was working in the vicinity of Belzoni and playing music in various Delta locations; he was still known then as Joe Willie or "Cleanhead."

Sometime in the 1930s, James made the acquaintance of Robert Johnson and Sonny Boy Williamson (Aleck Miller). From the former he absorbed guitar technique and the song that became his theme, "Dust My Broom." Like Johnson, James was influenced by the recordings of Kokomo Arnold and Tampa Red. Williamson and James often worked together, including occasional performances on Williamson's King Biscuit Time radio show, which broadcast from station KFFA in Helena. In 1937, Elmore married Josephine Harris, the first of several short-lived marriages. Harris states that James had three children.

On July 24, 1943, James was drafted—serving with the Navy in the Pacific during World War II. Discharged November 28, 1945, James returned to Belzoni to find that his mother had left for Chicago and that Robert Holston had opened a radio repair shop in Canton. James assisted in his brother's shop while rebuilding his musical career. In 1946, James became aware of the heart condition that plagued him the rest of his life.

The year 1947 found James sharing a room with Williamson in Belzoni and sometimes accompanying him on his radio show sponsored by the patent medicine Talaho. When Williamson left for West Memphis and station KWEM, James returned to Canton. Heart problems slowed him down but he continued to gig in the area and worked occasionally with pianist Willie Love and His Three Aces.

In January 1951, in Jackson, Mississippi, James joined Joe Willie Wilkins, Willie Love, and drummer Joe Dyson backing Sonny Boy Williamson on his first Trumpet recording session. During the first half of 1951, James appeared on several Trumpet sessions with Williamson and Love and, on August 5, recorded his first record, "Dust My Broom," accompanied by Williamson on harmonica and Leonard Ware on bass. There has been much speculation and several stories circulated as to why James recorded only one song for Lillian McMurry's label. Wilkins, who was in the studio that day, said that Williamson and James got into an argument over Williamson's duplication on the harmonica of James's famous guitar lick. James never recorded for Trumpet again.

At this time, James was staying with Williamson and his wife Mattie on North Farish Street in Jackson. After recording his song, James returned to Canton. McMurry released it backed by Bobo Thomas's "Catfish Blues." Both songs were attributed to Elmo James. Trumpet 146 was Trumpet's biggest hit, ranking ninth on the R&B chart in April 1952.

Early in 1952, Joe Bihari of Modern Records recorded James in a Canton nightclub. James was still under contract to McMurry and she stopped Bihari from releasing any of James's records until the contract expired in late 1952. Bihari released "I Believe" (a "Dust My Broom" cover) backed with "I Held My Baby Last Night" on his new Meteor label. By February 1953, it too had reached the ninth rank on the national R&B chart.

Bihari switched James to his Flair subsidiary for his next single "Early in the Morning"/"Hawaiian Boogie" in June 1953. James continued to record for the Bihari brothers—with a brief lapse in 1953 in which he made a session for Chess resulting in one single, another version of his hit song—until 1956. In 1953, James recorded behind Junior Wells (States), Johnny Jones (Flair and Atlantic), and Big Joe Turner (Atlantic)—including the latter's hit "TV Mama."

By the end of 1953, James had returned to Canton and in 1954 hired Otis Ealey of Atlanta as his manager. James relocated to Atlanta and Ealey booked him on series of one-nighters through the South and Midwest.

The Biharis did not renew their contract with James, and in 1957 Mel London signed him to a contract with his new Chicago-based label Chief. In the company of J. T. Brown, Johnny Jones, Eddie Taylor, Homesick James, Odie Payne, and Wayne Bennett, James recorded some outstanding sides including “The Twelve Year Old Boy,” “It Hurts Me Too,” and the instrumental “Elmore’s Contribution to Jazz.” Rights to these recordings were purchased by Vee-Jay and they were quickly reissued.

Heart disease led James to return to Canton but, by November 1959, he was back in Chicago where New York record producer Bobby Robinson recorded him with his usual accompanists. That session produced one of James’s most copied songs, “The Sky Is Crying” (number fifteen on R&B chart). James recorded exclusively for Robinson’s Fire and Enjoy labels—with one second defection to Chess in 1960—for the remainder of his life, resulting in a corpus of more than forty sides, mostly recorded in New York City, including such favorites as “I Done Somebody Wrong” and “Shake Your Money-maker.” His remake of “It Hurts Me Too” charted at twenty-five in 1965.

While staying with Homesick James in Chicago, James suffered his last heart attack. Funeral expenses were paid by Chicago deejay Big Bill Hill; he was buried at the Newport M. B. Church in Holmes County, Mississippi.

James’s influence is widespread including Homesick James, Boyd Gilmore (both have been identified as his cousins), J. B. Hutto, Hound Dog Taylor, B. B. King, Albert King, and many more including a whole generation of rock guitarists both in the United States and internationally. Joe Willie Wilkins observed that any accomplished guitarist could replicate James’s licks but none has the genius to recreate his sound.

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

- AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
 Fancourt, Les. Liner notes for Elmore James, King of the Slide Guitar: The Complete Chief & Fire Sessions (1997, Charly CD Box 301).
 Franz, Steve. The Amazing Secret History of Elmore James. St. Louis, MO: BlueSource, 2003.
 Topping, Ray. The Classic Early Recordings, 1951–1956 (1993, Flair/Virgin CD Box).
 Wardlow, Gayle Dean. Chasin’ That Devil Music: Searching for the Blues. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

Reissues

- Fancourt, Les. Liner notes for Elmore James, King of the Slide Guitar: The Complete Chief & Fire Sessions (1997, Charly CD Box 301).
 Topping, Ray. The Classic Early Recordings, 1951–1956 (1993, Flair/Virgin CD Box).
Whose Muddy Shoes. (1991, Chess CD 9114).

JAMES, ETTA

b. Jamesetta Hawkins, 25 January 1938; Los Angeles, CA

Singer, songwriter. A powerful and versatile singer, Etta James is one of a handful of widely recognized women blues singers still recording and performing today. At an early age, Jamesetta Hawkins got her start singing in St. Paul’s Baptist church under the tutelage of James Earle Hines in downtown Los Angeles. She became quite a sensation in the church community, but not long thereafter Dorothy Hawkins, her mother, moved them up to San Francisco. However, Dorothy’s jazz club night life and obsession with the glamorous life led her to leave young Jamesetta in the care of Lula Rogers, a rooming house owner, who James referred to as “Mama Lu” or “Mama.” In her teenage years, James ran around with a rough street crowd in the Fillmore District but soon found the R&B-blues scene intriguing. Calling herself “Etta James,” she put together a trio called the Peaches (also James’s nickname) with a couple of neighborhood girls and got noticed by R&B musician/talent man Johnny Otis. The Peaches’ first hit single was “Roll with Me Henry” (1955) followed up by another hit “Good Rockin’ Daddy” (number six on the “Black Singles” charts) later that same year. The Peaches went on tour, beginning James’s remarkable national touring and local clubbing experiences and associations with a “who’s who” of R&B and rock ‘n’ roll stars such as Sam Cooke, Johnny “Guitar” Watson, Tina Turner, Charles Brown, Sam Cooke, Chuck Berry, Marvin Gaye, Jimi Hendrix, Keith Richards, Ruth Brown, Sly and the Family Stone, and Little Richard.

After some hard times concerning recording rights and royalties with Modern Records, James went to Chicago and eventually signed with Chess Records. In 1960 she had her first hit single for Chess, “All I Could Do Was Cry” (#2, Black Singles charts; #33, Pop Singles charts), which was soon followed by “At Last” (#2, Black Singles charts; #47, Pop Singles charts). Her successes continued in the early 1960s with “My Dearest Darling,” “Fool That I Am” “Stop the Wedding,” and “Something’s Got a Hold on Me”—all in the top twenty on Black Singles charts and top fifty on Pop Singles charts. As Leonard Chess recognized, Etta James was a great “crossover” artist—the first for Chess Records—who sold records to both black and white audiences. Meanwhile, her live performances were also successes. Recorded at a club in Nashville, Tennessee, in 1963, Etta James Rocks the House showcases her powerful vocals on stage, demonstrating the development of her individual blues sensibility: She translates well-known songs, such as Ray Charles’s “What’d I Say,” the medley of Jimmy Reed songs in “Baby What You Want Me to Do?,” and Muddy Waters’s “I Just Want to Make Love to You,” into her own dynamic expressions from smooth full-bodied soul to a growling scat-like imitation of a harmonica.

All of this success, while gratifying to James, brought her little fortune, especially as James struggled with drug addiction, and money was in high demand but often in short supply. Various extended family and music figures drifted in and out of her life, helping her to endure the hardships of addiction to heroin, some destructive romantic liaisons, and the demands of her life as a star recording artist and blues performer.

During the next stage of her career in the mid- to late 1960s, James recorded a few more hit blues and R&B singles, especially those on the LP Tell Mama (1968); its title track reached #23 on Pop Singles charts and #10 on the Black Singles charts, and a cover of Otis Redding’s “Security” reached #35/#11 on the same charts. But arguably the album’s most powerful number was “I’d Rather Go Blind” (the B-side to the “Tell Mama” single), a slow blues ballad that James sings with a unique sensitivity that teeters on the edge of tenderness and explosiveness. Produced by Jerry Wexler at Muscle Shoals, Alabama, Tell Mama is one of the finest recordings of James’s early career and of soul/R&B recordings of the 1960s. Despite this tremendous success, James’s personal life was traumatic: a newborn baby, Donto, to take care of; various scrapes with the law, especially in Alaska and Los Angeles, which only compounded her difficulty in caring for Donto, whose health was fragile; and continuous struggles with drug addiction.

While James’s struggles with addiction and abusive men caused her some difficult times in the 1960s, her blues records and performances were in high demand. In the 1970s, James’s recordings became less of a commodity in a market dominated by funk, rock ’n’ roll, and disco. James’s problems with the law continued in New York and then in Texas, where her husband Artis Mills took sole responsibility for possession of some heroin they had and spent a number of years in prison for the offense. Though devastated by this turn of events, James at least had a safe haven: a house in Los Angeles that Leonard Chess had paid for until his death in 1969 when the deed was handed over to James.

During this period, James continued to perform and record, making several LPs for Chess and one for Warner Brothers. Many of these recordings, while not popular successes like those in the 1960s, demonstrate the lasting power of James’s voice on such songs as “Losers Weepers” on the album of the same name; “Only a Fool” and “Leave Your Hat On” on Etta Is Betta Than Evah; and “Only Women Bleed” and “Sugar on the Floor” on Deep in the Night.

In the 1980s James’s home base continued to be Los Angeles. James performed around Los Angeles clubs and sang “When the Saints Go Marching In” at the opening ceremonies of the 1984 Olympics in Los Angeles. Some of her best albums of this period are the live recordings with Eddie “Cleanhead” Vinson—The Early Show and The Late Show—as well as the phenomenal studio LP, Seven Year Itch, which features a version of Otis Redding’s “I Got the Will,” “Come to Mama,” and one of the best slow blues tunes ever recorded, “Damn Your Eyes.”

In the 1990s and the new millennium, James has continued to record: her blues albums The Right Time (produced by Wexler) and Life, Love and the Blues (James’s sons, Donto and Sametto, join in on drums and bass, respectively) are excellent CDs with tunes that testify to James’s enigmatic, powerful phrasing, creating new renderings of classic soul and blues songs such as “Love and Happiness,” “Down Home Blues,” “Born Under a Bad Sign,” and “I Want to Ta-Ta You.” In 1994, James also ventured into recording a jazz LP—Mystery Lady: The Songs of Billie Holiday—which won her a Grammy for best jazz album.

As an artist, James never ceases to take chances with music: She sang the Rolling Stones’ “Miss You” in an appearance on the Tonight Show in support of Matriarch of the Blues (2001). Her latest CD, Burnin’ Down the House, became the number one blues album of 2002.

JUSTIN WERT

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 James, Etta, with David Ritz. Rage to Survive: The Etta James Story. New York: Da Capo Press, 1998.
 “Living Blues Interview: Etta James.” Living Blues 54 (Winter) 1982–83: 12–20.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

At Last! (1961, Chess 9266); Etta James Rocks the House (1964, Chess 9184); Etta Is Betta Than Evah (1975, Chess 19003); Deep in the Night (1978, Warner Bros. 3156); The Early Show: Blues in the Night (1986, Fantasy 9647-2); The Late Show (1987, Fantasy 9655-2); Seven Year Itch (1988, Island 91018-2); The Right Time (1992, Elektra 61347); Mystery Lady: The Songs of Billie Holiday (1994, Private Music 821142); Life, Love and the Blues (1998, Private Music 82162-2); Burning Down the House (2002, Private Music 11633).

JAMES, JESSE

b. Unknown

d. Unknown

Jesse James is a shadowy figure who recorded four sides for Decca in June 1936. He is also believed to be the pianist on three adjacent matrices by Walter Coleman, in which case he was probably involved in the Cincinnati blues scene. James was an exciting, if somewhat undisciplined, two-fisted barrelhouse pianist, with a hoarse, declamatory vocal style. He seems to have relied mostly on traditional material, as exemplified by his vigorous treatment of “Southern Casey Jones.” In James’s version, Jones is described unflatteringly as a “natural born Eastman” (someone who did not work or lived off a woman’s earnings) and his wife appears only too willing to accept the compensation for his death and take another husband. The explicit “Sweet Patuni” was understandably not issued at the time, but surfaced many years later on a bootleg “party” record. On “Highway 61,” also unissued, James is accompanied by an unknown jug player, who also participated in the subsequent Walter Coleman recordings. The legend that James was a convict, brought to the studio under guard for the session, and that he broke down before it was completed is wholly unsubstantiated. This fanciful story appears to have been based on the lyrics of “Lonesome Day Blues,” which contain several references to prison life. The latter, which has an outstanding piano introduction and a walking octave bass accompaniment, also contains the line: “I’ve been to the Nation, ’cross the Territor (y),” apparently a reference to a Native American reservation.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: DGRJAMES, NEHEMIAH “SKIP”

b. 9 June 1902; Benton, MS

d. 3 October 1969; Philadelphia, PA

Singer, guitarist, and pianist. Since the 1950s, James has been generally regarded as one of the greatest Mississippi blues musicians of the prewar period. His posthumous reputation rests mainly on eighteen titles recorded for Paramount Records in 1931, and to a lesser extent on a handful of albums made after his rediscovery by blues revivalists in the 1960s.

James was born and raised on the Woodbine plantation, fifteen miles south of Yazoo City, Mississippi. His father, Edward, a guitarist and bootlegger, abandoned the family as a wanted man in about 1907. An only child, James was raised by his mother Phyllis, who worked as a cook and babysitter for the plantation owners, and by his maternal grandparents. He studied guitar from the age of seven, and learned basic piano in high school. He left Benton around 1919 and for the next few years worked as a laborer in various locations in Mississippi and Arkansas. By 1924, he had returned to Benton, initially as a sharecropper, then as a bootlegger. He was also, it seems, active as a gambler and pimp. Music at this time—indeed for much of his life—was a sideline and, in the 1920s when he was acquiring a local reputation as a bluesman, bootlegging was a far more lucrative activity. Late in the decade he married Oscella Robinson, the sixteen-year-old daughter of a local clergyman, and around 1929, they moved to Dallas. The marriage quickly collapsed, his wife deserting him for his traveling companion, and, dispirited, James moved back to Benton.

In 1931 came the major recordings. James was persuaded to audition for H. C. Speir, music store owner and A&R man for the Race record industry. Speir sent him to Arthur Laibly at Paramount Records, and in February, at the Grafton studios, the classic sessions took place. Much to James’s disappointment, however, the records made little impact. The Race record market had collapsed with the Depression and the records hardly sold. His life changed direction in late 1931, when he was reunited with his father, who had become a minister, and persuaded James to join him in Dallas in the seminary he operated there. In becoming actively involved with religion, James abandoned the blues, refusing a further offer by Speir to record. He remained in Dallas until 1935, where he led a touring gospel group, the Dallas Jubilee Quartet. In 1937, again through his father, he moved to Selma, Alabama. By the early 1940s, he was working as a laborer in Birmingham, where he met his second wife Mabel. He returned once more to Bentonia in 1948, and to blues performing, although his traditional style was by now passé. In 1953, he moved to Memphis and then to Tunica, Mississippi, where he did menial work.

Skip James. (Photo by Julie Snow, courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Unbeknownst to James, his musical reputation had by this time grown to legendary status through reissues of the 1931 recordings. He was eventually located by blues enthusiasts in 1964, becoming one of the major rediscoveries of the burgeoning folk music revival. From then until his death five years later, he enjoyed the status of a folk-blues celebrity, performing on the concert, coffee house, and folk festival circuit. Adding greatly to his reputation was a cover of “I’m So Glad” by the British rock group Cream, which earned James six thousand dollars in royalties. In 1965, James left Mabel for his third wife Lorenzo and moved with her the following year to Philadelphia from Washington. He died after a long fight with cancer in 1969.

James was a complex, contradictory character. He was a solitary, misogynistic introvert, who, despite his outward restraint, was capable of extreme violence. (According to one biographer, he had psychopathic tendencies and probably killed at least one person.) His early years, spent in bootlegging, pimping, gambling, and blues singing, were apparently left behind after he became actively involved in religion in 1931.

However, one has the sense that his religious commitment was half-hearted: Although he was eventually ordained as a Methodist minister around 1942, it had no part in his subsequent livelihood. When, in the 1960s, he returned to blues singing full time, he apparently had few qualms about becoming reacquainted with the “Devil’s music.”

It is partly these inner personal contradictions which make James’s artistry so powerful. At the heart of his music is a pervading sense of sadness. Even a light-hearted song like “Drunken Spree”—apparently a plantation song learned by James as a child—becomes tinged with melancholy in his version. Unlike peers such as Blind Lemon Jefferson or Charlie Patton, James rarely states his feelings in an open, direct way. However, far from detracting, this sense of held-back passion gives great poignancy to his work. From this point of view, he is closer to Mississippi John Hurt, although he lacks Hurt’s lightness: There is always a quality of controlled, brooding introspection to James’s performances. Perhaps the consummate example of this is “Devil Got My Woman,” which has become one of the most celebrated of Mississippi blues compositions. After a stark guitar introduction consisting of a series of chromatically falling harmonies over a tonic pedal (a device James used frequently), the voice enters with a wailing, modal three-measure phrase that forms the melodic basis for the entire work. The atmosphere is greatly enhanced by James’s eerie falsetto, which he used in a majority of his guitar-based songs. In this number, as much as in any recorded blues, there is a powerful sense of personal expression, as though James is actually experiencing the pain he sings about. This song is, in fact, probably autobiographical, as is clear from the last verse: “The woman I loved . . . took her from my best friend/But he got lucky, stoled her back again.” (James’s first wife had deserted him for his traveling companion less than two years before the song was recorded.)

James mastered both piano and guitar. What is perhaps more remarkable about that fact is that he adopted different, complementary styles on each instrument, as if each one fulfilled a different inner need. He generally uses the guitar as a continuous, interactive backdrop to his singing, whereas his piano playing tends to be deliberately disjointed and angular, almost an extension of his voice rather than an accompaniment to it. With both piano and guitar he incorporates frequent interludes and breaks.

His technical approach to both instruments is highly original. On the guitar, he adopted a three-fingered picking technique, used by only a few other blues guitarists, such as Patton and Hurt. Unlike them, however, he plucked with his fingernails like a classical guitarist, rather than using his fingers or a pick. He also used D minor, rather than open, tuning on all but two of the pieces in the 1931 recordings. This device, as well as the three-finger approach, he learned from Henry Stuckey, a friend from his youth, who was his first guitar influence, and with whom he was professionally associated in the 1920s. These innovations give his playing a most individual sound, and his distinctive approach, as well as his remarkable virtuosity, is seen in a number like his showpiece, "I'm So Glad." James's piano playing is no less distinctive, with unusual devices like rapidly repeated chords and glissandos being frequently used, the whole being underpinned by sparse, jagged chord voicings. In this, he seems to have been influenced by a musician called Will Crabtree whom he met while living on a sawmill camp in Arkansas around 1922, though just how great the influence is cannot be precisely determined because Crabtree never recorded.

James's repertoire shows considerable variety. Much of it is related to folk-blues, of course, and there are several "straight" blues in the 1931 session (e.g., "Four O'Clock Blues," "Cypress Grove Blues," "Hard Luck Child") as well as some more wayward examples ("Little Cow and Calf Is Gonna Die Blues"). Even less conventional are numbers like "Devil Got My Woman"—effectively a two-line blues—and "Illinois Blues," which has a most eccentric, though highly effective, five-line structure (AABBB). In addition there is a traditional eight-bar blues, "How Long 'Buck'," an idiosyncratic version of "How Long Blues," a song popularized by Leroy Carr, along with gospel songs ("Jesus Is a Mighty Good Leader," "Be Ready When He Comes") and "Drunken Spree," which may have originated as a plantation song. "I'm So Glad" is James's transformation of the 1924 pop hit "So Tired," by Arthur Sizemore, an obscure writer of pop and commercial blues numbers.

By common consent, the recordings from the 1960s fall short of the 1931 sessions. James had worked only intermittently as a musician in the intervening years, and, in any case, by the time of his rediscovery he was already battling cancer. As a result, his technical powers had faded, and the original freshness was lost. Nevertheless, they remain an important part of his legacy.

In terms of influence, James was too much of an individualist to have had many imitators among his contemporaries, although a notable exception is Robert Johnson who recast "Devil Got My Woman" (perhaps with the structure of Yola My Blues Away) as "Hellhound on My Trail."

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

- AMG (Cub Koda); Herzhaft; Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Calt, Stephen. I'd Rather Be the Devil: Skip James and the Blues. New York: Da Capo, 1994.
 Charters, Samuel. "Skip James." In The Bluesmen, pp. 71–80. New York: Oak Publications, 1967.
 Guralnick, Peter. "Skip James." In Feel Like Going Home: Portraits in Blues & Rock 'n' Roll. New York: Outerbridge and Lazard, 1971.
 Perrin, Jeff, transcriber. The Skip James Blues Collection. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 1998.

Discography

Note: An asterisk (*) means found in the transcription in Perrin in the Bibliography.

1931 Paramount Recordings

- *"Devil Got My Woman"/"Cypress Grove Blues" (Pm 13088); "Cherry Ball Blues"/ "Hard Time Killin' Floor Blues" (Pm 13065); "Illinois Blues"/"Yola My Blues Away" (Pm 13072); "Four O'Clock Blues"/"Hard-Luck Child" (Pm 13106); "Jesus Is a Mighty Good Leader"/"Be Ready When He Comes" (Pm 13108); *"Drunken Spree"/"What Am I to Do Blues" (Pm 13111); * "I'm So Glad"/*"Special Rider Blues" (Pm 13098); "How Long 'Buck'"/ "Little Cow and Calf Is Gonna Die Blues" (Pm 13085); "22-20 Blues"/"If You Haven't Any Hay Get on Down the Road" (Pm 13066). (Note: All reissued as The Complete Early Recordings of Skip James, Yazoo CD 2009.)

LPs and CDs

- Greatest of the Delta Blues Singers* (1964, Melodeon MLP 7321); A Tribute to Skip James (1964, Biograph ELP 12016); Today! (1966, Vanguard VRS-9219); Devil Got My Woman (1968, Vanguard VSD 79273); Live at the Second Fret: Philadelphia 1966 (1988, Document DLP 523); Devil Got My Woman: Blues at Newport 1966 (1996, Vestapol Video 13049); Rare and Unreleased (1998, Vanguard CD 79715-2); Boston 1964 and Philadelphia 1966 (2002, Document DOCD 5149); Bloomington 1968 (2002, Document DOCD 5633 and 5634).

JAMES, STEVE

b. 15 July 1950; New York City, NY

Guitar, mandolin, and banjo player; singer. Multi-instrumental acoustic folk-blues ace James moved to Tennessee in the early 1970s where he sought out Furry Lewis and others. He worked as a luthier and deejay in San Antonio in the mid-1970s before relocating to Austin. He began recording in the early 1990s, releasing Two Track Mind and American Primitive under his own name while making guest appearances on releases by Gary Primich, Angela Strehli, Candye Kane, Guy Forsyth, and others. His 1995 album Art and Grit featured guests Primich, Bob Brozman, and Ann Rabson and Boom Chang in 2000 had Alvin Youngblood Hart involved. James, who has also authored instructional books and videos and numerous magazine articles, released Fast Texas in 2003.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

- AMG (Dan Forte)
James, Steve. Inside Blues Guitar. San Anselmo, CA: String Letter Publishing, 2001.
———. Roots and Blues Fingerstyle Guitar. San Anselmo, CA: String Letter Publishing, 1999.

Discography: AMG (Dan Forte)

JAPAN

The first Japanese blues bands started to be heard around 1970. The land was a long way from the birthplace of the blues, and without any substantial black population, but blues nevertheless took root.

The so-called British Invasion of the mid-1960s aroused interest in the blues, or R&B, among fans of rock music. Although Japan has centuries of national history with its own distinct culture, the dominant culture after World War II became much more Americanized, and younger generations listened enthusiastically to rock and pop music from the United States. Many English words had been subsumed into Japanese with similar pronunciation. One example is the word “blues,” which was used as the title of some Japanese popular songs even before the war. There even was a “Queen of the Blues” who sold millions of records in her lifetime. However, this “blues” music was not the twelve-bar American blues, but just a slow lament in Japanese, which had probably been adopted as a Japanese rendition of vaudeville singing of songs like “St. Louis Blues.” (In Japanese, “blues” is usually pronounced and written as something like “bluce.”)

When the Rolling Stones, the Yardbirds, and Cream made the charts with their interpretation of African American blues, people became aware that an enormous musical culture existed in the urban centers of the north and cotton fields of the south. Radio stations were not keen on playing the blues and R&B, dismissing them as too ethnic to be accepted among the general public; however, the U.S. Armed Forces radio called the Far East Network turned out to be an important source for those interested in the music.

The pioneering reissue of vintage blues from the Chess catalog together with those of B. B. King from the Kent masters started in 1969, and they taught Japanese rock fans what the real blues was all about. The year 1971 even saw the release of a three-LP set of prewar blues, culled from the Victor/Bluebird catalog and ranging from Tommy Johnson to Jazz Gillum, which was better received than had been expected. B. B. King’s tour of Japan in 1971, following his hit “The Thrill Is Gone,” was perhaps the very first Japanese tour by any blues musician. Some Japanese blues bands, notably the West Road Blues Band, who opened for King, the Blues House Blues Band, and Yukadan (meaning “blue songs band”) who would later tour with Sleepy John Estes, started to gain popularity at the blues clubs such as Jittoku in Kyoto. By the end of 1974, general interest among rock fans led to the “blues boom.” The first Blues Festival featuring Robert Lockwood, who would be later called “God of the Blues” because of his authentic music and solemn features, the Aces (Louis and Dave Myers with Fred Below), and Sleepy John Estes/Hammie Nixon was an unexpected success. Lockwood’s sensitive, calm but very creative style, the core Chicago band beat sound of the Aces, along with the spirituality of the old blind man from Tennessee made a lasting impression. Since then, prominent blues artists have toured Japan two or three times a year.

Although the Blues Festival ended with its third session in 1975 with Otis Rush, Big Joe Williams, and Little Brother Montgomery, several attempts at holding annual blues showcases followed; the Blues Show! (1979–1986), the Japan Blues Carnival (1986–still ongoing), and the Park Tower Blues Festival (1994–still ongoing) have all been well received, mostly by enthusiastic fans craving for live blues. Some of the outstanding performances in the history of these festivals are Buddy Guy and Junior Wells (1975), Lightnin’ Hopkins (1978), Bobby Blue Bland and Gatemouth Brown (1978), Lowell Fulson (1980), Albert Collins (1982), James Cotton (1985), Otis Rush (1986), Little Milton (1988), Cab Calloway (1988), Lucky Peterson (1995), Snooks Eaglin (1996), and the Carter Brothers (1997). Of special note is the limited but zealous following, beginning in the 1970s, for deep soul music, which in Japan is distinguished from the blues. Both O. V. Wright and Otis Clay made memorable performances of modern soul music.

Long before so-called “world music” came to the fore, Japanese blues fans in the 1970s and 1980s had begun to look for music beyond American culture and their own. However, it was Stevie Ray Vaughan and Eric Clapton who attracted new generations of blues fans—or blues guitar fans. Whether or not the blues can keep stimulating another generations in the twenty-first century depends on how the genre evolves in the United States. In the case of a few Japanese bands, the music of blues, soul, funk, reggae, Latin, and African is well assimilated, and the cultural synthesis brought together to create unique and powerful music. Though blues still does not have a mainstream following in Japan, and no major labels have released notable blues albums, blues still retains its popularity. The independent label P-Vine started in 1975 with the Calvin Leavy LP, but now boasts some twenty-five hundred titles of CDs in blues as well as other genres. There is a popular bimonthly magazine called Blues & Soul Records; the magazine The Blues, first published in 1969, would later become the hip-hop/R&B magazine called Black Music Review, which celebrated its 300th issue in 2003. Chain stores such as Tower Records as well as smaller shops contain wide selections of import CDs from all over the world.

While the recession of the 1990s has still not completely abated, sales of blues albums have remained strong. It may well be the feeling of alienation in the days of globalization that maintains the popularity of blues in Japan.

YASUFUMI HIGURASHI

JARRETT, JAMES “PIGMEAT”

b. 8 December 1899; Cordele, GA
d. 5 September 1995; Cincinnati, OH

James “Pigmeat” Jarrett moved with his family to a mining camp in Rockhouse, Kentucky, when he was three years old and then to Cincinnati five or six years later. He was an active member of the Cincinnati blues scene from the 1920s, well known for improvising lengthy blues and stomps on such songs as “Mr. Freddie Blues,” “The Dirty Dozens,” and “Look at the People.” He appeared at Miss Kitty’s, Arnold’s, Coco’s, and various clubs in Cincinnati, at the Chicago Blues Festival in 1992, and at the Winnipeg Folk Festival. June 19, 1992, was declared Pigmeat Jarrett Day in Cincinnati.

STEVEN C. TRACY

Bibliography

- Tracy, Steven C. Going to Cincinnati: A History of the Blues in the Queen City. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.
Whitter, David. “Pigmeat Jarret” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 124 (November/December 1995): 55.

Discography

Look at the People (n.d., June Appal JA 035).

JARRETT, THEODORE “TED”

b. 17 October 1925; Nashville, TN

For years, the city of Nashville, Tennessee, was affiliated in the public mind with country music alone, despite the fact that other genres made a home in Music City U.S.A. Rhythm and blues was one, and Ted Jarrett was the most successful black entrepreneur in that field. From the 1950s to the 1960s, he ran any number of independent labels, including Calvert, Champion, Cherokee, and Poncello, and worked with countless acts, including the vocalists Gene Alison and Earl Gaines, both mainstays of that local scene. His biggest hit was Allison’s 1958 “You Can Make It If You Try,” later covered by the Rolling Stones. Attention to both Jarrett and the black music produced in Nashville was elevated in 2004 when the Country Music Hall of Fame and Museum in Nashville mounted “Night Train to Nashville: Music City Rhythm & Blues 1945–1970.” An autobiography by Jarrett, You Can Make It If You Try, has been announced.

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

Hoskins, Barney. Say It One More Time for the Brokenhearted. Country Soul and the American South. London: Bloomsbury, 1998.

Discography

Across the Tracks, Volume One (200-, Ace).
Across the Tracks, Volume Two (2004, Ace).

JAXON, FRANKIE “HALF PINT”

b. 3 February 1895; Montgomery, AL
d. Unknown

Frankie “Half Pint” Jaxon was a major figure on the early blues circuit, performing and producing shows and revues in theaters and clubs. Although he worked in New York early in his career, he is best known for his work in Chicago. He was an actor, singer, cornetist, and composer; his best-known compositions were “Fan It” (Vocalion 1257), “Corrine Blues” (Vocalion 1424), and “Fifteen Cents” (Vocalion 2603). Jaxon worked in vaudeville as a female impersonator, and is most famous for singing suggestive blues, especially those recorded with Tampa Red and “Georgia Tom” Dorsey on Vocalion. A short man, he was called “Half Pint” and used that nickname for his stage name.

JAXON, FRANKIE “HALF PINT”

Life

Frankie “Half Pint” Jaxon (aka Cotton Thomas) was born February 3, 1895, in Montgomery, Alabama. One of three children, he was orphaned at an early age. He worked the New World Café in Atlantic City with Willie “The Lion” Smith, then worked on the road in the Midwest, finally settling in Chicago in 1927 for an extended stay; in 1930 he did some club dates with Bennie Moten in Kansas City. He left Chicago and the music business in 1941, moving to Washington, D.C., to take a government job. Later he relocated to Los Angeles in 1944, and was not heard from after that.

Music

Jaxon’s most prolific period for appearances, productions, and recordings was in Chicago, where he lived from 1927 to 1941. His career can be tracked through the Chicago Defender newspaper, to which the following dates refer. During his time in Chicago, Jaxon produced and performed at the most famous jazz/blues venues on Chicago’s South Side. These included the Sunset Café (January 28, February 4 and 18, September 20, and October 7, 1922, and March 3, 1923), Entertainer Café (September 1 and November 3, 1923; March 29 and May 3, 1924), Dreamland Café (November 7, 1925), Metropolitan Theater (October 8 and 15, 1927; August 27, 1932); Grand Theater (April 20, 1929), Midnite Club (June 8, 1935), Apollo Theater at 47th Street (January 29 and March 19, 1927); Ritz Café (November 29, 1930); Regal Theater (December 26, 1931; September 30, 1933); Savoy Ballroom (May 27, 1933; April 6, May 4, and June 4, 1935); Dave’s Café (July 14, 1934); Navy Pier (August 25, 1934); and Harlem Café (December 27, 1941).

Radio and Recordings

Jaxon was considered a major radio star; he broadcast live on several radio stations in Chicago, including from clubs where his groups performed. For example, see Defender ads for WJJD, dated May 27, June 5, and July 1, 1933, and for WBBM, dated June 3 and September 30, 1933. He led Frankie Jaxon’s Hot Shots, Waves of Rhythm, and Quarts of Joy.

Jaxon recorded for several labels, including Black Patti, Decca, Gennett, Okeh, and Vocalion. He recorded with many early Chicago artists, including Henry “Red” Allen, Lil Hardin Armstrong, Buster Bailey, Barney Bigard, Glover Compton, the Harlem Hamfats, Freddie Keppard, Punch Miller, Ikey Robinson, Jasper Taylor, Bob Shoffner, and Casino Simpson.

Jaxon’s enduring fame is for blues recorded on Vocalion with Tampa Red and Thomas “Georgia Tom” Dorsey in 1929, including “Corinne Blues,” “Fan It,” “Fifteen Cents,” “It’s Tight Like That,” “Mama Don’t Allow No Easy Riders Here!,” and “My Daddy Rocks Me.”

DEBORAH L. GILLASPIE

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz
Chilton, John. Who’s Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street, 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.
Hoffman, Franz, and Ian Buckley. Jazz Advertised 1910–1967: A Documentation. Berlin: F. Hoffmann, 1997.
Smith, Willie “The Lion,” and George Hoefer. Music on My Mind: The Memoirs of an American Pianist. Garden City, NY: Doubleday & Co., 1964.

Discography: DGR; Lord

See also Black Patti; Decca; Dorsey, Thomas A.; Gennett; Harlem Hamfats; Moten, Benjamin “Bennie”; Okeh; Tampa Red; Vocalion

JAXYSON

Obscure (and primarily gospel) label operating in Oakland between 1948 and 1950. It issued the first record of Johnny Fuller (as Brother Johnny Fuller). Its only blues artists were “Goldrush,” a piano player not unlike Mercy Dee Walton, and “Black Diamond,” a guitarist from Texas (real name apparently James Butler).

RAY ASTBURY

Discography

McGrath

See also Fuller, Johnny

JAZZ

Distinction Between the Jazz Tradition and the Blues Tradition

Though a cloud of controversy surrounds its birth and early development, the position of jazz as a distinctively African American music is undeniable. Since its beginnings sometimes around the turn of the twentieth century, however, it has overstepped the confines of ethnicity and genre and is currently played and enjoyed throughout the world. Evolving from folk and popular sources, it is considered by many to be America's greatest artistic gift—a view that its global impact on both popular and art music supports. Over the years jazz has existed in a number of diverse though related styles. These include New Orleans- and Chicago-style Dixieland jazz, big band or swing, bebop, cool jazz, hard bop, funky or soul jazz, modal jazz, free jazz, jazz rock, and fusion. The fact that jazz is primarily an approach to performing music rather than a particular repertoire accounts, in part, for its continuing change and variety.

Jazz evolved from the fusion of black folk forms such as ragtime and blues with various popular and light classical music being created just before the turn of the twentieth century. Having existed in some recognizable form from about 1905, the heyday of the legendary though controversial cornetist Buddy Bolden, jazz currently embraces a plethora of popular music styles from Latin America and the Caribbean, Africa, and Asia, as well as diverse modern, classical, and avant-garde performance traditions.

Although its origins are obscure, the earliest forms of jazz emerged in cities such as New Orleans, Chicago, and Memphis. Jazz has a long prehistory, however, that began with the distinct rhythmic musical tradition brought to America by enslaved Africans and developed on southern plantations. Traditional African instruments were largely forbidden but West African performance practices such as call-and-response singing, foot stomping, and hand clapping survived and were common. This was particularly so in the performance of work songs and hollers in fieldwork and the spirituals in worship. European string instruments such as the violin and guitar were the earliest musical instruments adopted by African Americans. The African-derived banjo was also popular. With the approach of the reconstruction era, the brass and woodwind instruments so important to the musical life of city dwellers were incorporated. These were used primarily to accompany Spanish American War-era military marches, popular songs, and light classics popular among all classes and ethnic groups during the later years of the nineteenth century.

As the first decade of the twentieth century progressed, it became increasingly clear that a new music had evolved. Not yet labeled jazz, the music was still called ragtime and musicians referred to the manner of performing it simply as playing “hot.” “Hot” was a term used to describe the emotional warmth and intensity of this new music and the performance practices that produced them.

Although an exact line cannot be drawn between jazz and its precursors, ragtime and the blues are agreed to be its immediate predecessors.

Ragtime

Ragtime, which is primarily piano music, integrates complex African-derived rhythmic practices with the harmonies of light classics, parlor music, show tunes, and popular songs. Highly syncopated in a possible effort to duplicate African cross rhythms, it is conceivably the result of an African American banjo style being transferred to the piano. Ragtime as we have come to know it is a composed non-bluesy music. Whether this was true of its earlier itinerant stages before the style became formalized remains a question. First appearing after the Emancipation, when African Americans were free to work as itinerant musicians in saloons, dance halls, and brothels, it was widespread by the 1890s—especially in towns along the Mississippi River like St. Louis, and eventually New Orleans. Before the end of the nineteenth century it was also being played in New York, Baltimore, and other eastern cities. By the turn of the twentieth century it had outgrown the saloons where it developed and was popular throughout the country.

Scott Joplin, Eubie Blake, Tony Jackson, and Jelly Roll Morton, some of the greatest ragtime pianists, also composed. Consequently, sheet music became an important focus of home entertainment for families, both black and white, who owned pianos. In addition, ragtime was played by all types of instrumental soloists and ensembles. These ranged from string bands and brass bands to syncopated orchestras. The syncopated orchestras led in New York by James Reese Europe, Will Marion Cook, and others during the first two decades of the twentieth century, for instance, were deeply indebted to the precise contrapuntal style of piano rags. James Reese Europe, who was the most important East Coast figure in pre-jazz history, pioneered rhythmic concepts in ragtime that anticipated true jazz expression.

Blues

The blues was originally a completely separate music from ragtime and early jazz. It is believed to have developed along the Mississippi River during the 1890s and 1900s. While some writers place the genesis of the genre well back into the nineteenth century, no firsthand reference exists before the 1900s. “Memphis Blues” (1912), by W. C. Handy, one of the first published blues, was derived from and reflected the rural folk music of African Americans. The composition’s treatment of life’s hardships, through the use of insinuating melodies and sexual suggestiveness, had an immediate impact on the public. The blues is a unique vein that permeates all American popular music. And, of course, the blues is an inseparable component of all styles of jazz performance. An ability to play the blues is a mandatory skill for all jazz musicians.

Overlap and Crossover Between the Jazz Tradition and Blues Tradition

Vaudeville, minstrel shows, and carnivals presented the environment in which early jazz and the blues first met, were nourished and blossomed. Professional singer-entertainers, of which Ma Rainey and Bessie Smith were two of the most important, established what was to become known as the classic blues tradition. Ma Rainey’s country roots permeated her style and content, whereas Bessie Smith’s approach and sound reflected a city-oriented lifestyle. Classic blues crystallized as these vaudeville singers used both blues and blues-tinged popular songs to present commentaries on love and life. Along with an increasingly flexible approach to melodic lines and phrasing, they used shouts, groans, moans, and wails to heighten the impact of the lyrics they sang. By altering non-blues songs to fit the blues in format and feeling, they broadened the base of the blues market and effected changes in other types of popular singing.

Bessie Smith, who was accompanied by musicians such as Louis Armstrong, Sidney Bechet, and Fletcher Henderson on her recordings, developed vocal techniques as sophisticated as those used by instrumentalists. More than any other vocalist, she established the style and quality of the blues tradition. With the assistance of the jazz artists who accompanied her, she grounded the blues in the broader tradition of jazz.

The twelve-bar blues form is one of the most used forms for such interactions. It consists of three four-measure phrases reflecting a statement, a repeat of that statement, and an answer—the AAB form. An item of fundamental importance is the pause in the vocal line that traditionally provides space for an instrumental fill-in. Country blues singers usually accompanied themselves and provided this fill-in on guitar. Classic blues singers, on the other hand, were accompanied by jazz (stride) piano or jazz band in which the piano played the underlying beat and a solo horn improvised on the fill-in. This process is superbly illustrated on Bessie Smith’s recording of “Careless Love Blues” with Louis Armstrong providing the instrumental solo on the fill-in.

The close relationship between blues and jazz was nourished as classic blues singers and their jazz accompanists interweaved vocal melodies with the rhythmic and melodic improvisations of the accompanying instruments. Through the use of slurs, shakes, mutes, half-valves, and other devices, the bent tones, blue notes, and vocal timbre used by blues singers were mimicked by instrumentalists and added to the jazz vocabulary.

Prewar Era, 1900–1942

Early Jazz

By 1915, jazz had distinguished itself from other forms of African American music through an emphasis on improvisation and hot rhythm. Its first and most endearing style is generally referred to as New Orleans jazz. Many of the earliest known Jazz masters, including Buddy Bolden, Bunk Johnson, Kid Ory, Jelly Roll Morton, King Oliver, Sidney Bechet, and Freddy Keppard, were all from New Orleans. Further, by the beginning of the twentieth century’s second decade, Jelly Roll Morton and others were beginning to fuse blues spirit and harmonic elements with ragtime and other types of African American music. As a result, New Orleans has traditionally been regarded as the birthplace of jazz. This supposition was challenged when a group of writers insisted that jazz initially surfaced in several locations, particularly in the south and southwest, simultaneously. It is generally conceded though that New Orleans was jazz's first important center. The reason why jazz first crystallized in New Orleans may be due to the converging of several factors, not the least of which was the city's cultural diversity.

The mixed social environment created by the various layers of French, Spanish, Creole, African American, Haitian, and Indian cultures had reflections throughout the city. Musical activities ranged from European concert programs and traveling and minstrel shows to the performances of funeral, carnival, parade, and dance bands. In addition, a somewhat direct African influence emanated from Congo Square, a former slave auction site that later became an important open-air gathering place for the continuance of African and African-derived music and dancing. Finally, Storyville, the infamous red light district whose role in the birth of jazz has probably been overemphasized, encouraged a proliferation of brothels, gambling houses, and saloons where many of the early New Orleans musicians first performed.

Many of the early New Orleans jazz bands and performers, including Sidney Bechet and Jelly Roll Morton were Creoles. Until the late 1800s, this culturally distinct light-skinned group of African Americans had enjoyed a privileged position that placed them socially somewhere in between whites and blacks. Unlike their blacker counterparts, for example, many Creoles were trained musicians who had studied formally and were able to read and compose music. This changed, however, when a restrictive racial segregation law was enacted that included Creoles among those to be segregated. As time passed, non-Creoles such as Louis Armstrong and King Oliver were integrated into Creole bands.

By 1910 the diverse musical styles alluded to above had coalesced to produce a music almost exclusively associated with New Orleans. Unfortunately, no recordings have been found of jazz from this time period. How the music actually sounded can only be inferred from later recordings by New Orleans musicians, oral histories, and photographs. Cornetist Buddy Bolden is the person most often cited as the first New Orleans jazz musician. It seems fairly certain now, though, that the music he played was a mixture of ragtime and blues, perhaps with some traces of the emerging jazz feeling.

The typical New Orleans jazz group consisted of a front line and a rhythm section. The front line usually included one or more cornets, clarinet, and trombone. The rhythm section had either string bass or tuba, piano, and guitar or banjo. The function of the cornets, which were later replaced by trumpets, was to take the melodic lead. The clarinet played a countermelody and the trombone added a melodic bass line. The rhythm section provided the beat and filled in the harmonies. Blues-based songs formed the typical New Orleans jazz ensemble's repertoire.

Collective improvisation and solo improvisation were the two main types of improvisation used in early jazz. Solo improvisation exists when musicians take solos one at a time. Collective, or group, improvisation takes place when more than one musician improvises simultaneously. Collective improvisation was the identifying feature of New Orleans-style early jazz music as well as that of the later Chicago-related Dixieland style. Collective improvisation is used in the early recordings of Kid Ory, King Oliver, and Jelly Roll Morton. It can also be heard on recordings made by white bands such as the Original Dixieland Jazz Band, the New Orleans Rhythm Kings, the Wolverines, and Chicago's Austin High School Gang.

The first "jazz" recording was actually made in New York in 1917 by a white New Orleans-based ensemble called the Original Dixieland Jazz Band. Though James Reese Europe had recorded his black syncopated orchestra as early as 1913, and while Johnny Dunn and Kid Ory had recorded by the 1920s, the first representative New Orleans-style jazz recordings by black musicians were those made in the Midwest by King Oliver and Jelly Roll Morton in 1923.

The move by New Orleans jazz musicians from New Orleans to Chicago, thereby shifting the creative focus of jazz to the Midwest, is often linked to the closing of Storyville in 1917. Of greater significance was the Great Migration of southern African Americans to the north where greater economic opportunities presented themselves during the World War I years. New Orleans musicians found a receptive audience in Chicago and developed profitable solo careers. They also benefitted from a less hostile racial climate. Chicago-style Dixieland jazz came about when white musicians, inspired by the music of New Orleans jazzmen, attempted to emulate their style. In Chicago, individual solos became more important, the rhythm changed from 4/4 to 2/4, and the guitar replaced the banjo. In addition, the saxophone gained importance.

Because it can be played without outside accompaniment, the piano developed in more independent ways than other jazz band instruments. Stride piano, for example, combined the alternation of chords and single notes or octaves in the left hand with typical ragtime figures in the right. In essence it was ragtime laced with the improvisatory feel and looser rhythms of jazz. This ragtime-derived piano style proved influential on later styles of jazz. Several of the best swing era bandleaders, including Duke Ellington, Earl “Fatha” Hines, and Count Basie, were heavily influenced by Harlem stride pianists such as James P. Johnson, Fats Waller, Willie “the Lion” Smith, and Luckey Roberts. Other jazz pianists deeply indebted to stride include Teddy Wilson, Art Tatum, and Thelonious Monk. Even avant-garde bandleader Sun Ra played stride.

Boogie-woogie, another piano style, was created by untutored black musicians working in the rural south and highly developed in the house-rent parties of Chicago. Essentially a transfer of the twelve-bar blues to the piano, it involved the use of a simple repetitive bass combined with the playing of single figures with the right hand.

Big Band

Jazz continued to change as it moved north. By the time that Fletcher Henderson’s New York–based band made its first recordings in the 1920s, jazz was being played by much larger ensembles. In addition, considerable change had taken place in repertoire and style of playing. These big bands, using ten or more instrumentalists and carefully written arrangements, greatly resembled the refined dance orchestras popular at the time. While original blues formed the basis of the early jazz repertoire, jazz musicians of the 1920s began performing waltzes and popular songs. The polyphonic focus of the New Orleans front line was replaced by an antiphonal big band style. Here whole sections, often in call-and-response format with a single soloist, traded off unison or close harmony riffs (repeated figures). Whereas the typical New Orleans early jazz ensemble consisted of three horns and a rhythm section, big bands of this time generally contained a brass section consisting of three trumpets and one trombone, and three or four reeds (saxophones and clarinets). The swing bands of the 1930s were often expanded to include fifteen or more pieces. The rhythm section for the big band or swing ensemble consisted, most often, of piano, string bass, drums, and usually an acoustic guitar.

Though featured soloists were not known in the New Orleans style, the emergence of the full-fledged jazz solo improviser was probably the most important development of the big band era. No one did more to bring this change about than Louis Armstrong. Armstrong’s experiences in Chicago had demonstrated well the theatrical possibilities of successful solo building. During 1924 and 1925, while performing with the Fletcher Henderson band in New York, his impact on the band was so great that he was almost personally responsible for its change from a straight-laced dance band to a New Orleans–influenced style that would become known as swing. The recordings Armstrong made with his own groups during the 1920s featured not only the majestic tone and fresh phrasing of his brilliant trumpet, but his distinctive singing voice as well. Louis Armstrong sang the same way that he played and thus became the model for flawless jazz phrasing. He also popularized scat singing, which substituted nonsense syllables for words. His recordings of “Body and Soul” and “Stardust” during the 1930s demonstrated his uncanny ability to redefine popular songs in the jazz tradition. Armstrong’s 1929 fronting of a big band in New York presaged the movement toward Harlem as the new jazz capital and swing big bands as the prevailing sound. It also underscored the decline of Chicago and Chicago-style jazz.

Many of the greatest swing big bands, however, were not from Harlem but from Kansas City and the southwest. Known as territory bands, these groups had a much closer contact with the blues than those based in New York. In the bands that performed in Kansas City’s clubs and casinos, jazz and blues became so tightly fused that musicians made little or no distinction between the two. Kansas City, a terminal point for many vaudeville shows, a meeting place for country and city blues, and host to an extensive collection of mob-owned after-hours nightclubs, was the most important center for territory bands. A Kansas City jazz band style had been introduced in the early 1920s by Bennie Moten’s group. Count Basie, the pianist in the band during its final stage, brought the core of that band to New York in 1936. Marked by looser, four-to-the-bar rhythms, freer styles of soloing, and the extensive use of repeated figures called riffs, the Count Basie band, more than any other, featured the blues. It introduced a new generation of hard-swinging soloists that included Lester Young, Hershel Evans, and Buck Clayton as well as vocalist Jimmy Rushing. Rushing symbolized blues singers featured in the bands of Kansas City and the territories who, because of their strong voices and performance styles, were labeled blues shouters. Other influential singers from this category include Oran “Hot Lips” Page, Joe Williams, and Big Joe Turner. Turner’s “Shake Rattle and Roll” became one of early rock ‘n’ roll’s biggest hits when covered by Bill Haley and the Comets.

Interest in jazz and the blues was stimulated in 1938 when producer John Hammond rediscovered boogie-woogie pianist Meade “Lux” Lewis in Chicago. In addition to initiating the return of Albert Ammons, Pete Johnson, Jimmy Yancey, and other boogie-woogie pianists to positions of prominence, the rediscovery resulted in a temporary boogie-woogie craze. Although a piano style, boogie-woogie was successfully adapted for the big bands of Lionel Hampton, Count Basie, Erskine Hawkins, and others. Many white swing bandleaders including Woody Herman, Gene Krupa, Tommy Dorsey, Harry James, Bob Crosby, Les Brown, and Glenn Miller added up-tempo boogie-woogie numbers to their books during the 1940s.

The big band swing era was the only time that jazz could truly be considered the popular music of America. From the late 1920s through the early 1940s, dance bands led by Duke Ellington, Fletcher Henderson, Count Basie, Jimmie Lunceford, Andy Kirk, Teddy Hill, and Earl "Fatha" Hines, as well as those of Chick Webb, Cab Calloway, and Lionel Hampton, competed with the white bands of Benny Goodman, Paul Whiteman, Tommy Dorsey, Artie Shaw, and a host of others.

The band vocalist was another phenomenon that characterized the swing era. Billie Holiday, Ella Fitzgerald, Sarah Vaughan, Peggy Lee, Jimmy Rushing, Louis Jordan, and Frank Sinatra, among others, appeared as big band singers during this time.

The ascension of the soloist made celebrities out of jazz musicians like Louis Armstrong who became "stars" in both black and white communities in Europe as well as the United States. The big band era also introduced tenor saxophone stars such as Coleman Hawkins and Ben Webster.

Bebop and Modern Jazz Era, 1942–1959

Bebop

Charlie Parker came to New York in the early 1940s as an alto saxophonist in the southwestern band led by Jay McShann. This band, largely through Parker's innovations, was carrying the seeds of bebop. Parker, whose extraordinary technical facility and harmonic prowess was rooted in the Kansas City blues tradition, was to set the stage for the next generation of jazz musicians. Though bebop is often referred to as a reaction to big bands and swing, it is interesting to note that all of the bebop pioneers drew on their prior performance experiences with swing musicians, often in big bands. Earl Hines, Billy Eckstine, Coleman Hawkins, and Cootie Williams were mentors to many beboppers, while the big band led by Dizzy Gillespie in 1945 and 1946 was one of the first great bebop groups.

After Charlie Parker left Jay McShann, for example, he and Gillespie worked together in bands led by Hines and Eckstine, while Thelonious Monk and Bud Powell performed in groups led by Cootie Williams. Nonetheless, dissatisfactions did abound. Bebop's genesis was rooted in a perceived need for fundamental changes in the basic elements of melody, harmony, and rhythm. Inspired by the virtuosic playing and harmonic sophistication of players like pianist Art Tatum and tenor saxophonists Lester Young and Coleman Hawkins in the early 1940s, Parker and Gillespie moved toward a music noted for its complexity and a brand new difficult repertoire. Pianists Thelonious Monk and Bud Powell, and others such as trumpeter Fats Navarro and bassist Charles Mingus, were also founding members, as were white musicians such as pianists Lennie Tristano and Al Haig and alto saxophonist Lee Konitz.

Extended harmonies, flatted fifths, rhythmic complexity, and a return to the blues characterized bebop. A cult-like atmosphere enveloped its arrival that influenced the dress, speech, and mannerisms of its devotees. It was during this time that the concept of being "hip" and "cool" developed. The first hints of bebop emerged when drummer Kenny Clarke transferred the time-keeping function of the drum set from the bass drum to the high-hat cymbal, reserving the bass drum for rhythmic accents. This style was adopted by young drummers such as Max Roach and Art Blakey. Meanwhile, instrumental soloists were busily extending the harmonic limits of the blues and popular songs and struggling to develop a new but difficult to comprehend tonal vocabulary.

In the same sense that the New Orleans style defined early jazz, bebop established performance practices and procedures for what is still called modern jazz. The standard ensembles of bebop were small and generally consisted of a rhythm section of piano, bass, and drums and one or two horns. Solo format in the usual bebop combo included a statement of the theme in unison, improvised solos several choruses in length by each soloist, and a restatement of the theme in unison to take it out. Bebop brought to jazz a new repertoire of standards often based on the twelve-bar blues or derived from the chord changes of George Gershwin's "I've Got Rhythm." Beboppers experimented with everything. They played Latin jazz, they recorded with string accompaniments, and they experimented with the sonorities of twentieth-century European concert music. Sophisticated compositions and improvisations were increasingly geared toward listening. Bebop reached its height of popularity not in the dance hall but in the nightclubs and after-hours clubs of Harlem and 52nd street. Jazz solos became more rhythmically adventurous and tempos became faster as the music was relieved of its dance function.

JAZZ

New Orleans Revival, Rhythm and Blues, and Mainstream

Suddenly the pre-World War II jazz world erupted. Changes initiated by bebop's arrival, the lackluster swing scene, and restrictions due to the war effort sent the swing band environment into a tailspin. New taxes on cabarets and dance halls forced many venues to cut operating expenses. This led some to hire smaller bands and others to close. Many bandmen were drafted into the army. Gas rationing made touring increasingly difficult. The rationing of materials necessary for the manufacture of phonograph records and a ban on recording called by the American Federation of Musicians brought instrumental recording to a virtual halt for a two-year period.

Purists seized the opportunity to push for a return to the basics. Buoyed by the rediscovery of New Orleans trumpeter Bunk Johnson and the desire to find, present, and record jazz pioneers, they envisioned a return to the so-called "Golden Age of Jazz" that existed during the 1920s. In the wake of the 1938 "From Spirituals to Swing" concert at New York's Carnegie Hall and an interest in early jazz bubbling just beneath the surface since the swing era began, jazz in the 1940s saw a New Orleans revival and bebop running concurrently. The revival secured the continuation of the New Orleans tradition both at home and abroad. Because blues was so vital to early jazz expression, the revival also underscored its seminal position in the formation of jazz.

A crowd lines up for a 1947 jazz performance at New York City's Apollo Theater. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Discontented swing musicians accused bebop of being an elitist style and the reason why jazz was no longer America's popular music. While the argument has some merit, it is difficult to say conclusively that bebop was solely responsible for ending jazz's popular rein. Big bands, for example, were struggling years before bebop arrived. By the 1950s even the Count Basie and Duke Ellington bands were suffering the effects of economic problems and the dance rhythms emanating from R&B and early rock 'n' roll.

R&B artists such as Louis Jordan began filling the void left by dance-oriented swing bands and big band vocalists. Jordan, a saxophonist and former singer with the Chick Webb band, was one of the most popular performers of the 1940s. With his Tympany Five, a jump band that bridged the gap between swing and R&B, Jordan launched many similar groups and paved the way for rock 'n' roll. Using a shuffle boogie style, witty lyrics, and lively saxophone playing, the group produced a series of chart busters starting in the early 1940s that included "I'm Gonna Move to the Outskirts of Town" (1942), "Is You Is or Is You Ain't My Baby" (1944), and "Choo Choo Ch'Boogie" (1946).

In 1944, a traveling jam session called Jazz at the Philharmonic (JATP) was organized by impresario Norman Grant. Featuring an all-star lineup of mainstream jazz performers, JATP was a well-organized venture that has served as a model for the jazz festivals that have followed. Mainstream was a swing-oriented style that included the more easily absorbed elements of bop. Under the JATP banner, artists such as Lester Young, Illinois Jacquet, Flip Phillips, Ella Fitzgerald, Oscar Peterson, Gene Krupa, Charlie Parker, Dizzy Gillespie, Sarah Vaughan, Coleman Hawkins, Billie Holiday, and a long list of others performed in concert halls and auditoriums all over the world. Its great success was seen as a sign that audiences had been starving for the exciting extended improvised solos that had been increasingly absent in dance-oriented swing ensembles.

Cool Jazz, Hard Bop, and Modal Jazz

As the 1950s approached, the tendency toward unrest and excitement was replaced by a move toward calm and smoothness. Experiments with strings and European concert music influenced pianist John Lewis and former Charlie Parker trumpeter Miles Davis who led the way to a style later called "cool jazz." During the late 1940s, Davis began an association with a group of white musicians that led to the establishment of an unusual and historically important nine-piece group. This group, with arrangements by Gil Evans and featuring "non-jazz" instruments such as french horn and tuba, set the tone for the cool jazz sound and the era that was to follow. Evans, who had arranged for Claude Thornhill's band, established an important orchestral palette for the Miles Davis sound during the following decade. The ensemble's elegant, relaxed rhythms, complex and progressive harmonies, and intimate solo styles proved enormously influential to white musicians such as Gerry Mulligan, Chet Baker, Lennie Tristano, Dave Brubeck, George Shearing, and Stan Getz, as well as to John Lewis's Modern Jazz Quartet.

Cool jazz was a highly structured understated cerebral style that placed emphasis on what has been called the tuneful aspects of melody and played down the bluesy aspects of jazz performance. With the use of a less active, quieter rhythm section and an emphasis on ensemble precision and light vibratoless controlled sounds, it leaned more toward European performance practices than those of the African diaspora.

Davis maintained his interest in large ensemble-arranged music through the 1950s. Renewing his collaboration with Gil Evans in 1957, he continued his experiments with orchestrations derived from European concert music. This partnership resulted in the production of two of the most artistically and commercially successful albums of the era, Porgy and Bess (1958) and Sketches of Spain (1959).

Cool school experimentations ultimately resulted in a complete merging of jazz and European classical musical elements into a unified entity. Given the title "third stream" by white composer Gunther Schuller, this marriage has not been altogether successful among jazz audiences. Its concepts have been embraced, though, by such stellar jazz composers as John Lewis and George Russell.

In addition to cool jazz, Miles Davis managed to be in the forefront of a surprising number of other jazz styles. Included among those was hard bop, the other major trend of the 1950s. Hard bop, an aggressive bop played with a bluesy, funky delivery, featured long intense solos like those common to the 1930s cutting contests. Set in a riff-based, gospel-tinged framework and driven by the backbeat inflections of rhythm and blues, it includes among its exponents Horace Silver, Art Blakey and his Jazz Messengers, Sonny Rollins, Clifford Brown, Thelonious Monk, Charles Mingus, and Cannonball Adderly. Miles Davis's 1954 album Walkin' is considered to be the seminal work that signaled the change from cool jazz to hard bop.

Miles Davis's popular and influential album Kind of Blue (1959) introduced modal jazz. In modal jazz, improvisation is generated by modes or scales rather than by the usual chord changes. The use of modal scales slows down the harmonies and presents almost limitless possibilities for melodic extensions. These could, if desired, border on the brink of atonality. The members of Davis's ensemble on the recording included John Coltrane, Cannonball Adderly, and white pianist Bill Evans. Coltrane and Evans in particular incorporated this modal approach into their future work.

Breakdown of Blues Forms and Scales and the Reaffirmation of Older Black Music Forms in Jazz, 1960–1967

By the early 1960s jazz was reaching yet another crossroad. It was about to confront its biggest revolution since bebop. Change was taking place on many fronts and in many areas. Swing era jazz masters like Lester Young and Billie Holiday had died. So had Charlie Parker, Bud Powell, Clifford Brown, and other younger innovators whose premature deaths were due to heroin addition, mental illness, or accidents. Rhythmic and harmonic conventions established during the swing era had, since that time, been bent, reworked, and manipulated to the point of shattering. A growing number of players were beginning to feel that all possibilities had been exhausted. They reached the conclusion that running chord changes chained them to the background of the music and allowed them no room for true musical expression.

With this as a backdrop, Ornette Coleman, Cecil Taylor, and John Coltrane led the way for a whole new generation of musicians that included Albert Ayler, Archie Shepp, Marion Brown, Bill Dixon, Sun Ra, and Don Cherry. These artists embraced what was to become known as avant-garde or free jazz. In free jazz, implied tempos, unexpected harmonies and timbres, and often intense and lengthy solos were substituted for the swinging rhythms and melodies of traditional jazz. By the mid-1960s, even the theme–solo–theme structure so necessary to postwar jazz was being discarded. Instead a dissonant brand of collective improvisation was used; one that was similar to the energetic polyphony of early jazz. In an effort to play pure emotion, new roles were assigned to both soloist and accompanists. Timbre itself became a structural element focused on the projection of individualized sound. In its use of squeals, shouts, cries, moans, and blue notes, free jazz produced vocalized sound not too far removed from the melisma of early blues singers. It is perhaps no accident that Ornette Coleman and several other important free jazz players, including John Coltrane, Albert Ayler, and Pharaoh Sanders, had worked in rhythm and blues bands before becoming jazz artists.

Ornette Coleman is the person generally acknowledged to be most responsible for these changes in the music. His blues-based and strongly rhythmic music contained radical approaches to tone and tonality. Coleman's use of extremes of range including harmonics, purposely split notes, and his deliberate attempts to add colors by playing "out of tune" drew massive criticism from the community of well-tempered ears. In his album Free Jazz (1960), Coleman grouped eight musicians into two quartets and had them play against each other—improvising collectively and as soloists. The musicians had no previous rehearsal and the free improvisations were not based on pre-determined melodies, chord progressions, or structures. Five years later this same structural scheme was used to great effect by John Coltrane and a group of eleven players on his album Ascension (1965).

Free jazz musicians received inspiration from the civil rights activities that dominated the period. Using their music to address issues of race, black nationalism, and related concerns, they became extremely active in contemporary politics. They were often joined by Max Roach, Charles Mingus, and others from the previous generation. Many visited Africa during the 1960s, and some converted to Islam. Amiri Baraka and others in the Black Arts Movement considered the extended solos of John Coltrane to be authentic African American forms of great spiritual value.

The more that free jazz moved outside musical norms, however, the more it was berated by both traditional musicians and members of the general jazz audience alike. By the late 1960s, many free jazz musicians were seeking a way to move their alienated black audience back into the fold. Once again, it was Miles Davis who was in the forefront.

Jazz Since 1967

During the late 1960s, Miles Davis began incorporating electric instruments along with funk, rhythm and blues, and rock rhythms into his recorded work. This blending of traditional jazz styles with contemporary rock gave birth to fusion or jazz rock. Fusion became a controversial style that inspired accusations that Davis was selling out to the demand of commercial success. His hallmark album Bitches Brew (1969) fused jazz with almost every idiom then popular and shaped the style of the most popular jazz groups of the 1970s. Bitches Brew not only legitimized a whole new area of exploration and experimentation, but broadened the audience for jazz as well.

Spin-off groups led by former members of Miles Davis's various electric ensembles included Herbie Hancock's Headhunters, Wayne Shorter and Joe Zawinul's Weather Report, Chick Corea's Return to Forever, and John McLaughlin's Mahavishnu Orchestra. These groups enjoyed tremendous success with mass audiences and set the tone for the 1970s jazz rock movement.

In the 1970s, the purist mantle was carried by the Association for the Advancement of Creative Musicians (AACM). The Chicago-based organization was founded in 1965 by Muhal Richard Abrams and involved a group of musicians who had been playing in the city since the early 1960s. Espousing ideas of racial pride, artistic freedom, and economic independence, the AACM and its St. Louis offshoot, the Black Artists Group, have spearheaded many of the most important developments in jazz since the mid-1970s. AACM members Muhal Richard Abrams, Anthony Braxton, Henry Threadgill, and musicians from the Art Ensemble of Chicago, the most famous of the performing groups to grow out of the AACM, have all been important exponents of what they call creative music. With 1960s free jazz as a starting place, they used anything they found helpful from the entire ragtime to free jazz experience. AACM members also experimented with serialism, chromaticism, polytonality, and the use of extended unaccompanied solo on instruments other than the piano.

At no point in jazz history were as many options open to the jazz musician as there were in the 1980s and 1990s. Technological advances, the continued breaking of barriers between jazz styles, the broadening scope of cultural interactions, and a new emphasis on scholarship and institutional support set the framework for a new age of exploration.

The institutionalization of jazz in the 1980s was reflective of a growing interest in many areas of African American culture. Universities, symphonies, museums, and government agencies established programs that secured the position of jazz as an important national art form. By the 1980s, jazz masters were being honored and granted public awards at Washington, D.C.'s Kennedy Center; and local, state, and federal grants were being awarded in increasing numbers for jazz research, composition, and education. By the mid-1980s, a National Jazz Service Organization had been installed whose mission was to coordinate activities and function as a support system for the field of jazz nationwide. Jazz orchestras dedicated to preserving the repertoire and fostering new jazz compositions were established at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C., as well as at New York City's Lincoln Center and Carnegie Hall. In addition, jazz was being integrated into the repertoires of traditional symphony orchestras.

Since the 1970s, jazz musicians such as Mary Lou Williams, Max Roach, Archie Shepp, Jackie McLean, Donald Byrd, Bill Dixon, and Anthony Braxton, among many others, have held positions in universities throughout the nation. Though a history of formally trained musicians exists that extends from Lil Hardin Armstrong to Miles Davis and Wynton Marsalis, an increasingly large proportion of the best young jazz musicians now come from conservatories or university music departments. This type of training has presented to the field of jazz not only avant-gardists such as David Murray and Anthony Davis, who are firmly rooted in the broader jazz tradition, but bebop-derived traditionalists like Wynton Marsalis who has spearheaded a movement that has restored jazz to a level of prominence it has not seen for a great number of years.

Jazz is a pluralistic music. From the "Spanish Tinge" of Jelly Roll Morton's time to the world music explorations of John Coltrane, Yusef Lateef, Don Cherry, and Collin Walcott, jazz has adapted anything around it that might broaden its range. By the mid-1960s, jazz had made special use of Cuban and Brazilian rhythms, scales from India and the near east, and instruments from many parts of the world. Toward the end of the 1980s, a case had been made for the building of bridges between cultures along with a search for common roots and a universal energy. A staggering number of ethnic fusion and crossover styles have resulted worldwide. While improper preparation in cultural studies has led overall to superficiality, this is fertile ground that could reap enormous benefits in the future. Shakti, the Codono trio, and Oregon are three of the most integrated world music groups.

Fusion and crossover in the jazz and contemporary arena ranged from the jazz-flavored offerings of smooth jazz to cutting-edge free improvisations on funk and hip-hop foundations. Acid jazz, for example, was basically a dance music developed in London dance clubs during the 1980s. It combined jazz, soul, funk, and hip-hop in a somewhat updated version of the 1970s-style fusion performed by Donald Byrd and the Blackbirds. Working from another vantage point, major jazz players such as Max Roach and Brandford Marsalis, along with Steve Coleman and Greg Osby of Brooklyn's M-BASE collective, have experimented with the sounds of funk and hip-hop in more ambitious but traditionally oriented ways.

As jazz enters its second century, an eclectic assortment of younger musicians such as saxophonist

Joshua Redman, pianist Geri Allen, singer Cassandra Wilson, and trumpeter Nicholas Payton are joined in their quest to improvise of the history of jazz by veterans like pianist Andrew Hill who have reemerged with forward looking ideas for the twenty-first century.

LEONARD GOINES

Bibliography

- Berendt, Joachim E. The Jazz Book: From Ragtime to Fusion and Beyond. New York: Lawrence Hill, 1992.
- Collier, James L. The Making of Jazz. London: Macmillan, 1981.
- Driggs, Frank, and Harris Lewine. Black Beauty, White Heat. New York: W. Morrow, 1982.
- Floyd, Jr., Samuel A. The Power of Black Music. New York: Oxford, 1995.
- Harrison, Daphne Duval. Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
- Russell, Ross. Jazz Style in Kansas City and the Southwest. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- Schuller, Gunther. Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development. New York: Oxford 1968.
- . The Swing Era: The Development of Jazz 1930–1945. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- Shaw, Arnold. Honkers and Shouters. New York: Collier, 1978.
- Shipton, Alyn. A New History of Jazz. New York: Continuum, 2001.
- Stearns, Marshall. The Story of Jazz. New York: Oxford University Press, 1956.

JEFFERSON, BLIND LEMON

b. 24 September 1893; Couchman, TX
 d. December 1929; Chicago, IL

Blues singer and guitarist. Jefferson is one of the most original and creative forces in American vernacular music. The first country blues artist to achieve national popularity, he has had a unique impact on blues culture from the 1920s into the present. His reputation rests largely on a series of approximately one hundred recordings made for the Paramount record company between 1926 and his premature death in 1929.

Life

Little is known for sure about Jefferson aside from the bare facts of his biography. The youngest of seven children, he was born and raised on a small farm owned by his parents Alec and Classie in Freestone County sixty miles south of Dallas. It is unclear whether he was born with his visual handicap or whether it was the result of childhood injury or illness; in either case, there is a mass of circumstantial evidence to suggest that he was at least partially sighted rather than completely blind. Little is known of Jefferson's childhood, or his early musical involvement and influences.

Throughout his career, Jefferson worked as an itinerant musician, singing and accompanying himself on the guitar. (He also worked for a time as a bootlegger and, according to one source, as a wrestler.) He would wander from town to town, playing wherever he would be paid—at parties, picnics, on street corners, in brothels, barrelhouses, saloons, and perhaps even churches.

He started working professionally in his teens. By 1912, he was working over a wide area of Texas, including East Dallas, Silver City, Galveston, and Waco. For a time, he seems to have been based in Deep Ellum, the sporting house district of Dallas. Later in the 1910s, he began traveling further afield, to Arizona in 1917 and elsewhere. During the 1920s, he wandered extensively throughout the South, including Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Virginia, and the Carolinas.

A “signed” publicity photo of Blind Lemon Jefferson. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

While it would seem he was most happy performing solo, he also worked with others, either as a duo or occasionally as part of a small group. His most important musical association was with his fellow Texan Leadbelly, with whom he traveled around 1916. He also associated with a number of other musicians, some of whom (such as T-Bone Walker and Lightnin' Hopkins) went on to become major blues stars.

In late 1925, Jefferson was brought to the attention of the Paramount record company by Dallas music store owner R. T. Ashford. Paramount's signing of Jefferson was a courageous move, for his earthy sound and raw delivery were fundamentally different from the sophisticated approach of the female-dominated commercial blues market of the time. Paramount probably hoped that Jefferson would open up a market for down-home blues, just as white violinist Fiddlin' John Carson had managed to do for authentic hillbilly music with his 1923 recordings for OKeh.

The gamble paid off. Jefferson's records were an instant success and catapulted him from regional obscurity to national celebrity within the black community. For the remaining three years of his life, Jefferson recorded prolifically for Paramount's Race series and, on one occasion in 1927, for OKeh. He was probably the top-selling male blues artist of the 1920s, paving the way for a legion of rural blues recordings over the next decade.

Despite his success, which allowed him to maintain a chauffeur-driven Ford and a healthy bank balance, Jefferson's lifestyle was little affected. While he spent time in Chicago—where most of his recordings were made—he continued to work as an itinerant performer in the South. He died in mysterious circumstances in Chicago in December 1929, possibly of a heart attack or by freezing to death on the streets after losing his way during a blizzard.

Little is known of his personal life. It seems he married during the 1920s (his wife's name was Roberta and there are also reports of a son, Miles), though there is nothing to suggest that he ever settled into a stable domestic life. There are various legends about his personality—that he was alcoholic, that he physically abused his wife, for example—but there is no clear evidence to support these assertions.

Music

It is fortunate that Jefferson's recorded legacy, made over such a comparatively brief period, is so substantial. Nearly all of his records are self-accompanied on the guitar, though on a handful he is accompanied by piano. Most are of blues, a fact that probably reflects Jefferson's personal preference as well as those of the record-buying public. However, it is important to remember that Jefferson, like most other African American street musicians of his era, was as much a songster as he was a specialist blues musician, with a wide repertoire of gospel songs, spirituals, ragtime, and other folk material at his disposal.

Jefferson's style is an idiosyncratic blend of various southern idioms encountered during his extensive wanderings, in particular those of the Mississippi Delta and his native Texas. Nearly all his blues are in the standard three-lines-per-stanza format and use a conventional AAB text structure with melodies transplanted directly from the folk idiom. These elements aside, almost everything about his approach is startlingly personal.

His singing voice is one of the most distinctive in all blues, combining elemental power with a wide range, natural flexibility, and the frequent use of ornamentation. His phrasing is particularly unusual, with individual lines being shortened or lengthened according to his whim. For this reason, his blues are hardly ever exactly twelve bars long. For example, the opening stanza of the second recording of "Long Lonesome Blues," his first hit, is 16½ measures long, each of its three lines freely elongated. Although such asymmetry is not uncommon in early country blues artists, Jefferson carries it to an extreme: In his characteristic work, very little is regularly phrased.

Jefferson's guitar playing is outstanding both creatively and technically. He is noted mainly for his accompaniments (his only solo guitar recording is the virtuoso ragtime number "Hot Dogs"). These show a variety of approaches. Non-blues items such as the spiritual "He Arose from the Dead" and the proto-blues "Beggin' Back," along with four-line blues like "Wartime Blues," "One Dime Blues," and "See My Grave Is Kept Clean," are all accompanied in traditional style with the guitar mainly acting as a rhythmic backdrop for the voice. For straight blues, however, the guitar takes a greatly expanded role, frequently breaking the rhythm to provide a stark counterpoint to the voice. The tension between voice and guitar is enhanced by Jefferson's remarkable ability to handle the two lines independently, so much so that, when listening, it is often hard to conceive of the voice and guitar being the work of one man.

Another distinctive element of Jefferson's style is his improvisatory approach. Alternate takes of the same composition are never exactly alike. Jefferson constantly tinkers with details of performance like phrasing and timing. Accompaniments are often substantially improvised. For example, the guitar parts of the two surviving versions of "Got the Blues" draw on a common stock of ideas, but combine them in quite different ways. Lyrics are also altered between performances, most often to a minor extent. However, in certain instances, such as "Got the Blues" and "Matchbox Blues," more than two-thirds of the lyrics were probably improvised during the recording. Jefferson's spontaneous risk-taking gives an exciting edge to his performances. The sense of waywardness is at times increased by small fluctuations in tempo that often result in a momentary loss of the beat (for example, the first line of "Got the Blues," first version).

Jefferson is widely regarded as one of the greatest of blues poets. His use of metaphor is particularly striking. For example, the famous opening of "Got the Blues," where the blues is described as coming to Texas "loping like a mule." He is impressive not just for ability to create vivid images of this sort but, where appropriate, to extend them, which he does in a most imaginative fashion. The lyric for "That Crawling Baby Blues," recorded less than three months before his death, is based entirely on the metaphor of the baby as lover, on which it elaborates for its five verses. The result is one of the most compelling and harrowing statements of sexual rejection to be found in all folk poetry.

It is convenient to subdivide Jefferson's recording career into two periods, from ca. December 1925 to ca. October 1927, and from ca. February 1928 to September 1929. In the first period Jefferson's blues are mainly nonthematic and predominantly use traditional texts. During the second period, they are mostly thematic and mainly use nontraditional texts. (Some of these blues may have been the work of other composers although there is controversy over this point.) It seems likely that this change of direction came not from Jefferson but from Paramount, which was attempting to consolidate his commercial appeal. The fact that the blues from the second period are closer in approach to the commercial norm of the day has drawn much criticism. Certainly they are more conventional in certain ways than the recordings of the first period. But they are still of a remarkably high standard, and in fact it could be argued that the use of a thematic text allows Jefferson to develop his poetic imagery in a way that is not possible with a nonthematic text.

Influence

Jefferson's influence on his contemporaries was profound, as it was essentially through his agency that rural blues moved into the mainstream. His importance is shown by his being the first artist featured in The Paramount Book of the Blues (a ca. 1927 publication celebrating the company's top-selling race artists); by his inclusion on the 1929 Hometown Skiffle record by the Paramount All Stars; and by tributes after his death by Washboard Walter and John Byrd ("Wasn't It Sad About Lemon?") and Reverend Emmett Dickinson ("Death of Blind Lemon"; both tracks are 1930, Pm 12945). Jefferson has also had a seminal influence on later blues artists. Indeed almost every musician who plays country blues has felt his impact directly or otherwise. A number of his songs have become classics and have been much covered by other artists, particularly "Matchbox Blues," "Got the Blues," "See That My Grave Is Kept Clean," and "Black Snake Moan." His impact on popular culture in general is seen in the naming of various organizations in his honor, including the rock bands Jefferson Airplane and Blind Melon, the Swedish blues magazine Jefferson, and various blues clubs in North America.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

- AMG (Joslyn Lane); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
- Becket, Alan. "Two Country Blues Singers." New Left Review 29 (January/February 1965): 73-77.
- Charters, Samuel B. The Bluesmen. New York: Oak Publications, 1967.
- . The Country Blues. New York: Da Capo, 1975.
- Evans, David. "Blind Lemon Jefferson." In International Dictionary of Black Composers, edited by Samuel A. Floyd, Jr. Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn, 1999.
- Governar, Alan. "Blind Lemon Jefferson. That Black Snake Moan: The Music and Mystery of Blind Lemon Jefferson." In Bluesland: Portraits of Twelve Major American Blues Masters, edited by Pete Welding and Toby Byron, pp. 16-37. New York: Dutton Books, 1991.
- Groom, Bob, ed. Blind Lemon Jefferson. Blues World Booklet 3. Knutsford, England: Blues World, 1970.
- . "The Legacy of Blind Lemon." Blues World 18 (January 1968): 14-16; 20 (July 1968): 33-37; 21 (October 1968): 30-31; 23 (April 1969): 5-7; 24 (July 1969): 9-10; 25 (October 1969): 9-10; 27 (February 1970): 13-14; 28 (March 1970): 8-9; 29 (April 1970): 8-9; 30 (May 1970): 13-14; 35 (October 1970): 19-20; 36 (November 1970): 20; 40 (Autumn 1971): 4-6.
- Nilsson, Charley. "Blind Lemon Jefferson (1897-1930)." Jefferson 45 (Fall 1979): 24-28.
- Obrecht, James. "Big Boss Blues: Blind Lemon Jefferson—The First Star of Blues Guitar." Guitar Player 25 (July 1991): 46-49.
- Oliver, Paul. "Blind Lemon Jefferson." Jazz Review 2, no. 7 (1959): 9-12.
- Roberts, Bruce. "It's a Long Old Lane Ain't Got No End." Blues & Rhythm no. 119 (June 1997): 4-5.

- Swinton, Paul. "A Twist of Lemon." Blues & Rhythm no. 121 (August 1997): 4–9.
- Trubswasser, Gunther W. "Blind Lemon Jefferson." Blue Notes 7 (1970): 5–12.
- Uzzel, Robert L. Blind Lemon Jefferson: His Life, His Death, and His Legacy. Austin, TX: Eakin Press, 2002.
- . "Music Rooted in the Texas Soil: Blind Lemon Jefferson." Living Blues 83 (November/December 1988): 22–23.
- Venturini, Fabrizio. "Blind Lemon Jefferson: Bluesman Vagabondo." Musica Jazz 35, no. 2 (1979): 7–9.
- Virgo, E. S. "A Note on the Death Date of Blind Lemon Jefferson." Black Music Research Bulletin 10, no. 2 (1988): 14–15.

Discography: DGR

Selected Recordings in Reissue

- Blind Lemon Jefferson: The Complete 94 Classic Sides Remastered* (JSP Records 7706).
- Blind Lemon Jefferson: Complete Recorded Works* (Document 5017–5020).

JEFFERSON, BONNIE

b. Bonnie Lewis, 28 June 1919; Shoal Creek, AR

Singer and guitarist of pre-blues and country blues. Married Calvin Jefferson in 1949 and soon left Arkansas for Nebraska, then to the West Coast and San Diego. Initially learned guitar as a child, but became more interested in the instrument in the 1930s. Came to public attention through the efforts of guitarist Thomas Shaw and writer Lou Curtiss.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography: Harris

- Curtiss, Lou. "Bonnie Jefferson." Living Blues no. 17 (Summer 1974): 8.

JEFFREY, ROBERT ERNEST LEE "BOB"

b. 14 January 1915; Tulsa, OK
d. 20 July 1976; San Diego, CA

Piano was Jeffrey's preferred instrument, but he could also play guitar in the style of Blind Lemon Jefferson. He moved to Bakersfield, California, in the 1930s as part of the Dust Bowl migration, then to San Diego during World War II. In the 1970s he was part of the San Diego blues circle that included Tom Shaw and Bonnie Jefferson.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
Curtiss, Lou. "Robert Jeffrey." Living Blues no. 15 (Winter 1973/1974): 11.

JEMF (JOHN EDWARDS MEMORIAL FOUNDATION)

Founded in 1962 by the estate of John Edwards, the JEMF is an archive for early "hillbilly" and "race" music. In 1986, the collection left the University of California at Los Angeles to join the Southern Folklife Collection at the University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill. The JEMF has reissued blues, gospel, and old-time recordings on LP.

OLIVIA CARTER MATHER

Bibliography

- Cohen, Norm. "The John Edwards Memorial Foundation: Its History and Significance." In Sounds of the South, edited by Daniel W. Patterson, pp. 113–126. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina, 1991.

JENKINS, BOBO

b. John Pickens Jenkins, 7 January 1916; Forkland, AL
d. 15 August 1984; Detroit, MI

An important member of the Detroit circle of down-home blues musicians of the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s, Ronert P. "Bobo" Jenkins made his mark not only as a singer and guitarist, but as a promoter and record label owner. Jenkins had sung in a gospel quartet and played harmonica in Mississippi, and after serving in the army decided to move to Detroit. He was befriended by John Lee Hooker, who helped Jenkins get his first song recorded with Chess Records—the politically themed "Democrat Blues" of 1954. Jenkins would later update the lyric to "Watergate Blues" for his own Big Star label. Jenkins also had singles on the Boxer, Duchess, and Fortune labels. His Big Star operation began in 1964; three albums and several singles by Jenkins and other local artists were issued in the 1970s, when Jenkins helped to organize and promote Detroit's blues scene, which was overshadowed by the city's fame as the home of Motown.

JENKINS, BOBO

Like most other Detroit bluesmen, Jenkins worked by day in an automotive factory. The Big Star records he made in his studio by an assortment of mostly little known artists often had a rough, homegrown quality that limited their initial sales but have made them prime collectors' items today among blues and funk fans.

JIM O'NEAL

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Iglauer, Bruce, Jim O'Neal, and Nigel Watson, "Living Blues Interview: Bobo Jenkins" [part 1]. Living Blues no. 3 (Fall 1970): 9–12; [part 2]. Living Blues no. 4 (Winter 1970/1971): 27–28.

Discography: LSFP

JENKINS, DUKE

b. Herman Jenkins, 11 October 1928; Malvern, OH

Pianist, singer, and bandleader based in the Cleveland, Ohio, area from 1946 through the 1990s. His career highlights include recording sessions for Aristocrat (1949) and Cobra (1956–1957), a Cleveland television show (1955–1956), booking and promotions from Dave Clark (1956–1957), and a residency at the Eden Roc Hotel, Miami Beach (1959–1962).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Gart, Galen. "The Duke Talks: The Duke Jenkins Story." Blues & Rhythm no. 70 (June 1992): 20–21.

Discography: LSFP

JENKINS, GUS

b. 24 March 1931; Birmingham, AL
d. 22 December 1985; Los Angeles, CA

Pianist and vocalist, influenced by Walter Davis. Recorded for Chess in 1953 and then moved to Los Angeles, recording for Specialty, Combo, Cash, and Flash, and for his own Pioneer International and General Artists labels (he also leased sides to Tower and SAR). Jenkins retired from music as the 1960s ended. He took the Islamic name Jaarone Pharaoh.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Harmer, John, and Frank Scott. "An Interview with Gus Jenkins." Whiskey Women And... 5 (June 1973): 4–7.

Discography: LSFP

See also Chess/Aristocrat/Checker/Argo/Cadet; Combo; Davis, Walter; Flash; SAR/Derby

JENKINS, JOHNNY

b. 1939; Macon, GA

Rhythm and blues guitarist and singer. During much of his career he was associated with Capricorn label founder Phil Walden, who supervised Jenkins's albums Ton-Ton Macoute! (1970) and Blessed Blues (1996). He stayed mostly in Macon, Georgia, but personally knew Otis Redding and Jimi Hendrix.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

JESUS IS A DYING BED MAKER (IN MY TIME OF DYING)

"Jesus Is a Dying Bed Maker" or, as it is also known, "In My Time of Dying" was first recorded by Blind Willie Johnson for Paramount Records on December 3, 1927. Johnson, a gospel singer with a strong blues influence in his performances, set a standard with his rendition of this song that would be followed for decades. His use of a pocketknife as a slide to mimic different sections of the melody line, especially its repetitive chorus, was to be interpreted and embellished on by many artists including Charlie Patton, Bob Dylan (reportedly using a lipstick canister as a slide), and the British rock group Led Zeppelin.

Most of Johnson's work can be traced to early gospel origins where praising Jesus on one's dying bed is a common theme in the lyrical content of these songs. Johnson would not have considered himself a blues singer and, therefore, would not have drawn his inspiration from the burgeoning blues movement of his day but rather from the wealth of country gospel music in which he immersed himself. To illustrate this common theme in spiritual music, it is beneficial to consider the Jubilee Gospel Team's recording of "Lower My Dying Head," which was recorded less than a year after Johnson's version in September 1928. The fact that these songs, recorded in such a narrow time frame, share the common "death-bed scene" as well as a similar refrain and verse structure implies that Johnson's version is most likely a hybrid of lyrics and melodies from several different country church songs that he undoubtedly would have pieced together himself.

It can be argued that Johnson's development of this song is accomplished through the folk process within the gospel music setting. Charlie Patton's October 1929 recording for Paramount Records was the earliest of various performances by blues musicians. Other renditions by black secular musicians include those by Josh White, Mississippi Fred McDowell, Big Joe Williams, and Leadbelly. The reissues of these performances on LP records in the 1960s would enable the adoption of the song by folk-blues revival musicians and by rock bands.

Bob Dylan, in his self-titled debut album of 1961, uses a similar approach to Johnson's slide work, however, his slide emphasis relies more on the melody line mirroring the "so I can die easy" phrase rather than the "well, well, well" phrase emphasized by Johnson and Patton. Dylan's popularity, much like Patton's, ensured that this song would reach an entirely new generation of listeners. After the folk-blues revival of the 1960s waned, this song was to be interpreted by such mainstream artists as Led Zeppelin and John Mellencamp. Mellencamp's use of a dobro-style slide and backup female singers keeps his version of this song closely tied to its country gospel roots, whereas, Led Zeppelin's eleven-minute rock "epic," from their 1975 album Physical Graffiti, uses a repetitive electric slide phrase reminiscent of the acoustic slide work of Bob Dylan fifteen years earlier.

BRYAN GROVE

Bibliography

AMG

Charters, Samuel. Booklet accompanying The Complete Blind Willie Johnson (Sony/Columbia 52835; 2 CDs).

JEWEL/PAULA/RONN

Jewel was established by Stan Lewis in 1963 in Shreveport, Louisiana. In 1948 he opened his first retail record store in a small chain that would come to be known as Stan's Record Shop, and he advertised his business through sponsoring radio broadcasts on clear channel stations in Shreveport and Little Rock, Arkansas. By the end of the 1950s he was one of the largest record retailers in the South. After starting Jewel, Lewis added the Paula, Ronn, and Sue subsidiaries. His labels concentrated on blues, soul, and gospel, recording Lightnin' Hopkins, Lowell Fulson, Ted Taylor, Jerry McCain, and Frank Frost. Later he acquired and reissued 1950s blues recordings of defunct independent Chicago labels such as Cobra, Chief, and JOB.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Manus, Willard. "Spinning Tales with the Record Man: A Half Century of Stan Lewis Memories." Blues Access no. 26 (1996): 22–32.

Way, Albert. "Stan Lewis Honored in Shreveport." Living Blues no. 141 (September/October 1998): 15.

Discography: McGrath

JOB (J.O.B.)

Chicago blues label prominent in the 1950s. Although JOB was primarily a deep blues label, it also released gospel, soul, pop, calypso, and jazz material. Its blues artists included Floyd Jones, Sunnyland Slim, Snooky Pryor, J. B. Lenoir, Eddie Boyd, Johnny Shines, Little Hudson, Willie Cobbs, and King Kolax. In the early days of the label, recording was done professionally in the best studios in Chicago; latter-day JOBs were recorded as cheaply as possible, sometimes on location, and often sounded pretty rough. The label was opened in 1949 by Joe Brown (1897–1976) and presumed partner James Burke Oden (St. Louis Jimmy). During 1952, JOB scored a number one R&B chart hit in "Five Long Years" by Eddie Boyd. In 1953 Brown established a strategic alliance with Chance that produced a string of first-rate blues sessions, but by the end of the year JOB was back on its own again. There were further waves of recording activity in late 1956 (after the failure of the Abco label, which Brown had invested in); in 1958–1959, when Brown took over the Oriole label and got involved with the Ruler label; and in 1960. Thereafter, activity on JOB was increasingly sporadic. Joe Brown sold most of his masters to Jewel Records in 1972 and closed down JOB in 1974.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Rowe, Mike. Chicago Breakdown. London: Eddison Press, 1973.

Discography: McGrath

JOE DAVIS/DAVIS/BEACON

A music publisher since the dawn of the commercial recording business, Joseph Morton Davis had been a successful musical entrepreneur for nearly thirty years before setting up the Joe Davis Music Co. Inc. in New York City in late 1941. Beacon Records was incorporated early the following year (the name being taken from one of Davis's composer pseudonyms) and recorded the likes of Savannah Churchill, teenage boogie-woogie sensation Deryck Sampson, country blues guitarist Gabriel Brown, and jive vocal group the 5 Red Caps. By 1944, Davis's empire expanded with a string of new record labels, including Celebrity, a revitalized Gennett, and the eponymous "Joe Davis," the latter of which was responsible for some fine Champion Jack Dupree recordings. In early 1946, Davis launched the "Davis" record label, but within two years he had all but retired from the record business, resting on the laurels of past publishing and recording successes. From 1948 to around 1953 he leased recorded product to MGM Records; however, by 1953 he had begun to show interest in the recording business again, eventually reactivating some of his old labels and inaugurating a new label, Jay-Dee Records, to concentrate on the modern R&B sound of New York City.

DAVID PENNY

Bibliography

- Bastin, Bruce. "The Joe Davis Legacy." Whiskey, Women, And... no. 16 (Spring 1987): 18.
- . "Lenox Avenue Jump—New York R&B from Joe Davis in the 1950s." Juke Blues no. 2 (October 1985): 4.
- . Never Sell a Copyright—Joe Davis and His Role in the New York Music Scene 1916–1978. Chigwell, England: Storyville Publications, 1990.

Discography: McGrathSelected Recordings in Reissue

- Piano Boogie and the Blues* (1988, Krazy Kat LP KK802).
- Champion Jack Dupree: The Joe Davis Sessions 1945–1946* (1995, Flyright CD FLY22).
- Gabriel Brown: Mean Old Blues 1943–1949* (1996, Flyright CD FLY59).

JOHN HENRY

"John Henry" may be the best known folk song in the United States, and numerous blues singers from Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry to Pink Anderson and Memphis Slim have recorded it dozens (if not hundreds) of times. Nonetheless, its foundation and composition are controversial and scholars still disagree over many essentials of its history.

We can say the song is based on real, but unidentifiable, events involving a living African American miner, or tunnel-worker, that took place in Summers County, West Virginia, during the building of the Big Bend Tunnel on the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad during the period from 1870 to 1872.

In spite of the fact that John Henry was African American and that he occupies a specific terrain in African American folklore, the song has spread rapidly among whites as well as African Americans, and white musicians have had a considerable role in shaping the song into its current configuration. The white contribution to "John Henry" is evident from several perspectives. First, several early verses are similar to those found in the British ballads "Mary Hamilton" and "The Cherry Tree Carol." Other stanzas resemble "The Lass of Roch Royal." In addition, the African American folk song tradition rarely engages in the composition of lengthy narratives with such formal structure, form, and detail. Blues and blues ballads tend to be fragmentary and imaginistic commentary rather than detailed and descriptive reportage [Laws]. Henry Thomas's version of "John Henry" demonstrates these qualities.

Nonetheless, "John Henry" is a favorite among African American performers—as well as white—and the Two Poor Boys (Joe Evans and Arthur McLain) have produced an unusually intricate version of deftly interwoven guitar and mandolin lines behind the duet's singing. Big Bill Broonzy has recorded the song a number of times and his very last version is engaging and vigorous. While Broonzy displays expert flat-picking, versions by Gabriel Brown, for the Library of Congress, and Furry Lewis both display agile slide guitar styles.

There are many versions of "John Henry," most of which maintain some connection with the following stages of development: infancy and premonitions of death, the contest (and its preparations), his dying words, and the behavior of the women at the news of his death.

It is a song about work and not a work song, that is, it is not sung while working to a rhythm that matches and encourages the rhythm of the task. Related to "John Henry" is the work song, or hammer song, "Nine Pound Hammer" (a variant of which is "Take This Hammer"), which although sung to a different melody, often incorporates verses about John Henry.

Mississippi John Hurt's "Spike Driver Blues" is an excellent example of this latter combination, for its melody is that of the "Nine Pound Hammer" family, but it incorporates the line

This is the hammer that killed John Henry, but it won't kill me.

PAUL GARON

Bibliography

- Chappell, Louis W. John Henry: A Folk-Lore Study. Jena: Frommannsche Verlag Walter Biedermann, 1933.
- Johnson, Guy B. John Henry: Tracking Down a Negro Legend. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1929.
- Laws, Malcolm. "The Negro's Contribution to American Balladry." In Native American Balladry, rev. ed. Philadelphia: American Folklore Society, 1964.
- Williams, Brett. John Henry: A Bio-Bibliography. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1983.

Discography

- Henry Thomas. "John Henry" (1927, Vocalion 1094).
- Mississippi John Hurt. "Spike Driver Blues" (1928, OKeh 8692).
- Furry Lewis. "John Henry (The Steel Driving Man)" (1929, Vocalion 1474).
- Two Poor Boys. "John Henry Blues" (1931, Oriole 8080).
- Big Bill Broonzy. Last Sessions, Part 3 (1957, Verve V-3003).
- Gabriel Brown. Field Recordings, Volume 7, Florida 1935-1936 (Document DOCD-5587).

JOHN, LITTLE WILLIE

b. 15 November 1937; Camden, AR
d. 26 May 1968; Walla Walla, WA

Born William Edgar John in Arkansas; reference sources list birthplace as Camden or Cullendale, two towns near one another. Raised in Detroit; nicknamed "Little Willie" due to diminutive stature. John sang in a family gospel group, and by the early 1950s was guesting with big bands on their Detroit stops. At his debut session for King at age seventeen, he turned a novelty number, "All Around the World," into a transcendent R&B gem, his first hit (1955). Subsequent hits on King (1956-1961) included the bluesy torch ballad "Need Your Love So Bad," the sensual classic "Fever," the impassioned "Talk to Me, Talk to Me," and the heavily orchestrated pop tune "Sleep." Touring in the mid-1950s, his opening act was James Brown, who later recorded a tribute album to him. A notoriously fast-living character with a hot temper, John was convicted of manslaughter for stabbing a man to death in an after-hours Seattle club and died in prison two years into his sentence. He was inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1996. Sister Mable John was a Raellette who recorded solo for Stax.

Perhaps the best measure of the awesome artistry of R&B tenor singer Little Willie John is how savvy judges of talent reacted upon hearing him. When Johnny Otis saw the then-fourteen-year-old at a 1951 Detroit amateur show, he tried to get him recorded. A couple of years later, bandleader Paul "Hucklebuck" Williams took the teenage singing prodigy on the road. After an afternoon audition in June 1955, King Records' Henry Glover rushed to record him that very night. Later, Apollo Theater manager Robert Schiffman called John "the best male singer I have ever heard," adding, "He used to send chills up and down my spine, and I never met a singer who had that kind of emotion and feeling in his songs."

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

- AMG (John Floyd); Larkin
Grendysa, Peter A. Notes to Fever: The Best of Little Willie John (1993, Rhino CD 71511).

Discography: AMG; LSPF

JOHN R.

(See Richbourg, John)

JOHNNY NOCTURNE BAND

JOHNNY NOCTURNE BAND

West Coast band specializing in 1940s jazz and jump-blues music since the late 1980s, led by tenor saxophonist John Firmin. Through 1994 the band's featured vocalist was Brenda Boykin, since 1998 Kim Nalley.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (John Bush)
Gilbert, Andrew. "Swingin' Horn Refuge." Down Beat 67, no. 9 (September 2000): 52.

Discography: AMG

JOHNSON, AL "SNUFF"

b. 10 August 1913; Cedar Creek, TX
d. 18 January 2000; Austin, TX

Aka "Alfred," "Snuff." Singer, acoustic guitarist of blues and sacred music. Performed informally on weekends at house parties or at church from the 1920s onward. His first appearances for pay were in the late 1980s, mostly in or around Austin. The professional recordings of his music were made through the efforts of writer Alan Govenar in 1994.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Joslyn Lane); Larkin
Govenar, Alan. "Snuff Johnson: Black Cowboy Blues." Living Blues no. 116 (July/August 1994): 52–53.

Discography: AMG

JOHNSON, ALVIN LEE

b. Alvin Lee Johnson, 15 March 1944;
New Orleans, LA

Singer, composer, trumpeter, pianist. Al Johnson created his Mardi Gras R&B classic, "Carnival Time," in 1960 but failed to sustain a musical career. He drove a cab for years before resurfacing on the New Orleans music scene in the 1990s.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Discography

"Carnival Time," "Lena" (1960, Ric Records).
Mardi Gras Strut (2000).

JOHNSON, BIG JACK

b. 30 July 1940; Lambert, MS

Clarksdale, Mississippi, singer/guitarist Big Jack Johnson started out at age thirteen sitting in with his father's local blues and string band. Although his early musical influences were country artists, he soon immersed himself in the blues of B. B. King, Albert King, Howlin' Wolf, and Robert Nighthawk, and quickly developed his uniquely expressive guitar style. In 1962, Johnson sat in with Delta musicians Frank Frost and Sam Carr at the Savoy Theatre in Clarksdale and was subsequently hired. The trio, billed as Frank Frost and the Nighthawks, recorded for Sam Phillips's Phillips International label later that year. The group continued to play throughout the region, sometimes with Nighthawk and Sonny Boy Williamson II, but all three would not record together again until 1978 when blues aficionado Michael Frank decided to start a label specifically to record them. Dubbed the Jelly Roll Kings (after one of the group's 1962 songs), the trio recorded Rockin' the Juke Joint Down for the newly formed Earwig Records, which featured Johnson as a vocalist for the first time. Johnson decided to go out on his own in 1986 and recorded The Oil Man, a moniker he earned from his day job as an oil truck driver. He appeared in the 1992 film Deep Blues and occasionally reunited with Frost and Carr. A gifted songwriter, Johnson tackled such topical subjects as AIDS, spousal and drug abuse, and gangs. He continued to lead his own band performing worldwide more than two hundred dates a year. He has recorded for Rooster, Fat Possum, and M.C. Records.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Bonner, Brett. "Big Jack Johnson: The Oil Man." Living Blues no. 100 (November/December 1991): 22–26.

Discography: AMG

Big Jack Johnson: The Oil Man (1987, Earwig 4910CD).
The Jelly Roll Kings: Off Yonder Wall (1997, Fat Possum CD 80310-2).

JOHNSON, BLIND WILLIE

b. 22 January 1897; Independence, TX
 d. 18 September 1945; Beaumont, TX

Blind Willie Johnson was an influential gospel singer and guitarist whose music shares elements with those of country blues. He is regarded as one of the greatest slide guitarists.

Life

Only glimpses into the life of Blind Willie Johnson remain. What is known about the blind street singer comes from the often-contradictory remembrances of acquaintances and family, his thirty recordings, his death certificate, and, of course, legend.

Johnson was born in Independence, Texas, the son of Willie Johnson, Sr., and Mary Fields (Willie Johnson Sr. is the name recorded on Johnson's death certificate. His father has also been identified as George Johnson). Details of Johnson's childhood survive through his wife Angeline. His interests in religion and music began when he was still quite young. When he was five, he told his father that he wanted to become a preacher. Later that year, his father made him his first guitar out of a cigar box. About this time, Johnson's mother died and his father remarried. Willie Sr.'s new wife was unfaithful and took up with another man. When Willie Sr. beat her for her infidelity, she took her revenge by blinding young Willie by throwing lye in his eyes. He was seven years old.

Johnson spent his youth working as a street singer in Marlin, Texas, and later in Hearne, Texas. He appears to have married his first wife, Willie B. Harris, sometime in 1926 or 1927. A daughter survives from their marriage, Sam Faye Johnson Kelly, who was born in 1931. Johnson likely married his second wife, Angeline, in June 1928 or 1929. According to Angeline, the two met in Dallas, Texas, where Johnson was working as a street singer. It is possible that he was carrying on a relationship with both women at the same time.

Johnson recorded a total of thirty songs for Columbia Records between 1927 and 1930. His first session took place on December 3, 1927, in Dallas and produced six tracks, including some of his most well-known works: "Mother's Children Have a Hard Time," "Dark Was the Night—Cold Was the Ground," and "If I Had My Way I'd Tear the Building Down." His first release, "I Know His Blood Can Make Me Whole," was one of the best-selling 78s on Columbia's 140000 Race series. Johnson's records continued to sell well until the Depression worsened in 1930.

Johnson's second recording session was held in Dallas on December 5, 1928. The session produced four tracks. Accompanying Johnson on all four songs was Willie B. Harris on vocals. A third recording session was held a year later in New Orleans on December 10 and 11, 1929. The two-day session produced ten songs. After the session, Johnson stayed on in New Orleans for a month and sang in the streets. Legend has it that when Johnson sang "If I Had My Way I'd Tear the Building Down," in front of the Customs House on Canal Street, a passing policeman mistook Johnson's shouts as a threat and arrested him.

Johnson's final recording session was held in Atlanta on April 20, 1930, producing ten tracks. Joining him once more was Willie B. Harris. Harris later recalled meeting Blind Willie McTell, who happened to be recording at the same studio that day. Perhaps it was after this session that Johnson and McTell began touring together. In a 1940 interview with John Lomax, McTell recalled that he and Johnson "played together in many different parts of the states in different parts of the country, from Maine to the Mobile Bay."

From approximately 1930 onward, Johnson made his home with Angeline in Beaumont, Texas. Little is known of his life during these years. He likely continued to play music on the streets and at church functions. Evidence also suggests that he may have been working as a preacher. A 1944 Beaumont directory lists one "Reverend W. J. Johnson" and the "House of Prayer" at the same address of Johnson's last residence. What's more, his death certificate records his occupation as "minister."

Johnson died on September 18, 1945. The events leading up to his death are recorded by Angeline and by his death certificate. According to Angeline, in the weeks prior to his death, their house caught fire. She and Johnson slept within the charred remains, making do by laying newspapers over their wet mattress. As she recalled, Johnson grew sick and was refused entrance into the hospital because of his blindness. Days later, he died of pneumonia. Johnson's death certificate reveals a different story. It records a death from malarial fever with contributing causes of syphilis and blindness. The attending physician notes that he tended to Johnson for weeks prior to his death. Johnson was buried in Blanchette Cemetery in Beaumont on September 20, 1945.

Music and Influence

An early promotional ad from Columbia Records describes Johnson in a language that evokes an evangelical preacher, “Hear Blind Willie Johnson spread the light of old-time faith.” Although his music had a profound impact on the blues, Johnson was a gospel singer who recorded no blues music. His music drew from spirituals, hymn books, and popular hymns of the day. Like a preacher, Johnson also worked from his own knowledge of the Bible. For example, the most enduring of his songs, “If I Had My Way I’d Tear the Building Down,” is a retelling of the story of Samson and Delilah. In songs such as “Jesus Is Coming Soon” and “Jesus Make Up My Dying Bed,” Johnson uses rhetorical devices often used in sermons. Unsurprisingly, one of his earliest influences was a Marlin singer and preacher named Madkin Butler. Johnson’s own religious affiliation was with the Baptist Church, but the uninhibited passion of his harsh vocal performances and the images found in his music suggest Pentecostal influences. This may be due to his relationship with Willie B. Harris, who was associated with the Church of God in Christ.

Resurrected by performers such as the Reverend Gary Davis, Johnson’s music grew popular within the 1960s folk and blues revivals. Since then, it has been covered or adapted by artists as diverse as the Staples Singers, Eric Clapton, Bob Dylan, and the Grateful Dead. Johnson’s greatest influence on the blues is his slide guitar playing. He primarily played in an open D tuning, most likely with a pocketknife. He played with an emotive vibrato, creating melodic lines that served to double or counterpoint his vocals. His influence is apparent in the work of bluesmen such as Blind Willie McTell and Muddy Waters and, more recently, Duane Allman and Ry Cooder. His slide masterpiece, “Dark Was the Night—Cold Was the Ground,” has been described by Cooder as “the most soulful, transcendent piece in all American music.”

STEVEN GALBRAITH

Bibliography

- Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
 Charters, Samuel. Booklet accompanying The Complete Blind Willie Johnson (1993, Columbia Records).
 Corcoran, Michael. “The Soul of Blind Willie Johnson: Retracing the Life of the Texas Music Icon.” Austin American Statesman (September 28 2003): K1.
 Humphrey, Mark A. “Holy Blues: The Gospel Tradition.” In Nothing But the Blues: The Music and the Musicians, edited by Lawrence Cohn. New York: Abbeville Press, 1993.
 Johnson, Angeline. “Interview with Samuel Charters.” In Blind Willie Johnson Narrated and Documented by Samuel Barclay Charters in New Orleans, Louisiana, and in Texas (1957, Folkways Records).

- McTell, Blind Willie. “Interview with John Lomax” In Blind Willie McTell, 1940: Complete Library of Congress Recordings in Chronological Order (1990, RST Records).
 Obrecht, Jas. “Can’t Nobody Hide from God: The Steel-String Evangelism of Blind Willie Johnson.” Guitar Player 32, no. 6 (1998): 57.

Discography: DGR

Selected Recordings

The Complete Blind Willie Johnson (1993, Columbia Records).

See also Allman Brothers Band; Black Sacred Music; Charters, Samuel Barclay; Clapton, Eric; Columbia; Cooder, Ry; Davis, Reverend Gary; Forms; Lomax, Alan; McTell, Blind Willie; Texas; Waters, Muddy

JOHNSON, BUDDY

- b. Woodrow Wilson Johnson, 10 January 1915; Darlington, SC
 d. 9 February 1977; New York City, NY

Pianist and bandleader whose dance band success of the 1940s anticipated the rock ’n’ roll era. Johnson moved to New York City in 1938 and played small nightclubs. He began recording for Decca in 1939 with a small combo, and in 1944 began recording with a fourteen-piece big band. During World War II, Johnson was at the height of his career, recording a variety of ballads and jump tunes. His sister, Ella Johnson (b. June 22, 1923, Darlington, SC; d. February 16, 2004, New York), had joined the band as vocalist in 1940, hitting with “Please Mr. Johnson.” Other hit singles featuring Ella as lead were “When My Man Comes Home” (1944), “That’s the Stuff You Gotta Watch” (1945), and “Since I Fell for You” (1945). Arthur Prysock joined as a vocalist in 1943, and the band had a big hit with the Prysock-led “Because” in 1950.

In 1952, Johnson moved from Decca to Mercury, establishing himself on the label with “Hittin’ on Me” (1953), “I’m Just Your Fool” (1954), and “(Gotta Go) Upside Your Head” (1955). By the mid-1950s, Mercury was promoting Johnson as a rock ’n’ roll act, a designation that fitted his long-established beat-driven sound. On several of Alan Freed’s packaged shows, Johnson led his “Rock ’n’ Roll Big Band.” Johnson’s last three chart records were “I Don’t Want Nobody (To Have Love But You)” (1956 and 1960) and “Bring It Home to Me” (1956), both with vocals by Ella, and “Rock On!” (1957), with vocals by Buddy. After leaving Mercury in 1959, Johnson recorded for Roulette. His last recordings were with Old Town (1964).

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Chilton; Larkin; Southern Penny, Dave. "Walk 'Em Again." Blues & Rhythm: The Gospel Truth no. 40 (November 1988): 17–21.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

JOHNSON, CONRAD

b. 15 November 1915; Victoria, TX

Houston-based saxophonist, composer, and band-leader. Recorded for Gold Star, Eddie's, and other labels—under his own name or as leader of Connie's Combo, and as a backing musician. He directed the house band at the Eldorado Ballroom.

ROGER WOOD

Bibliography

Wood, Roger. Down in Houston: Bayou City Blues. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2003.

Discography: LSFP

JOHNSON, EARNEST "44 FLUNKEY"

b. ca. 1903; Durant, MS (?)

d. 12 May 1972; Greenville, MS

Earnest Johnson, born around 1903, was a highly rated pianist from Durant, Mississippi. He acquired his nickname because he was adept at The Forty-Fours and because he worked as a flunkey on the Y & MV railroad. He accompanied vocalist Tommy Griffin on a Bluebird recording session in 1936 in New Orleans. Johnson moved to St. Louis in the late 1930s and to Chicago after World War II.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

O'Neal, Jim. "Earnest 'Flunkey' Johnson." Living Blues no. 44 (Autumn 1979): 3.

Discography: DGR (Tommy Griffin entry)

JOHNSON, EDITH NORTH

b. 2 January 1903; St. Louis, MO

d. 28 February 1988; St. Louis, MO

Blues singer and pianist. Edith Johnson was the wife of producer Jesse Johnson and the sister-in-law of James "Stump" Johnson. She made some recordings from 1929 with interesting accompanists, including "The Honey Dripper" with Roosevelt Sykes. In 1961 she made her only postwar recordings.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
van Rijn, Guido, Cor Van Sliedregt, and Hans Vergeer. Notes accompanying Edith North Johnson: Honey Dripper Blues (1992, Agram Records AB 2016).

Discography: DGR; LSFP

JOHNSON, ERNIE

b. Winnsboro, LA

Dallas, Texas, singer of soul and soul-blues. Primary influences have been Bobby Bland, Z. Z. Hill, and Little Milton. First recorded for Movin' Records in 1968. His recent CDs have been released by Malaco/Waldoxy and Phat Sound.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Schuller, Tim. "Dallas Blues: Ernie Johnson." Living Blues no. 129 (September/October 1996): 46–49.

Discography: AMG

JOHNSON, HENRY "RUFÉ"

b. 8 December 1908; Union, SC

d. February 1974; Union, SC

Singer, guitarist, occasional pianist. Johnson occasionally performed guitar with a bottleneck. He became known as a blues singer outside his immediate community when around 1973 he was discovered and recorded by the Trix label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Lowry, Pete. "Henry 'Rufe' Johnson, 1908–1974." Living Blues no. 17 (Summer 1974): 6.

JOHNSON, HERMAN E.

JOHNSON, HERMAN E.

b. 18 August 1909; Scotlandville, LA
d. 2 February 1975; Zachary, LA

Deeply influenced by Blind Lemon Jefferson's 78s, country blues guitarist Herman Johnson was discovered by Harry Oster, who recorded him in Louisiana in 1961. Johnson retired from music in 1970 due to bad health.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Oster, Harry. Living Country Blues. New York: Minerva Press, 1975.

———. Smoky Babe/Herman E. Johnson: Louisiana Country Blues (1996, Arhoolie CD 440).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Jefferson, Blind Lemon

JOHNSON, JAMES PRICE

b. 1 February 1894; New Brunswick, NJ
d. 17 November 1955; New York City, NY

One of the most important early jazz pianists, Johnson was a sensitive accompanist to numerous female vaudeville blues singers, including Bessie Smith. He also recorded blues both solo and in groups, on disk and piano roll.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Brown, Scott E. James P. Johnson: A Case of Mistaken Identity. Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Press and the Institute of Jazz Studies, 1986.

Discography: DGR; Lord

As Unaccompanied Soloist

"Mama's Blues" (ca. 1917, Rythmodik E17933; Singa/Supertone 5228; piano rolls).

"Bleeding Hearted Blues" (1923, Vic 19123).

"Weeping Blues/Worried and Lonesome Blues" (1923, Col A-3950).

"Snowy Morning Blues" (1927, Col 14204-D).

"Backwater Blues" (1939, Voc 4903).

"Snowy Morning Blues" (1942, Asch 350-3).

Blue Moods 1/Blue Moods 2/ Blue Moods, Sex (1958, Folkways FG 3540).

As Leader

"Chicago Blues" (1928, Col 14334-D).

"Fare Thee Honey Blues" (1929, Col 14417-D).

As Sideman

Bessie Smith. "Preachin' the Blues/Back-Water Blues" (1927, Col 14195-D).

"Lock and Key" (1927, Col 14232-D).

"Sweet Mistreater" (1927, Col 14260-D).

"Blues Spirit Blues/Worn Out Papa Blues" (1929, Col 14527).

"He Hot Me Goin'/It Makes My Love Come Down" (1929, Col 14464-D).

"Wasted Life Blues/Dirty No-Gooder's Blues" (1929, Col 14476-D).

"You Don't Understand/Don't Cry Baby" (1929, Col 14487-D).

"On Revival Day/Moan Mourners" (1930, Col 14538-D).

JOHNSON, JAMES "STEADY ROLL"

b. ca. 1888; New Orleans, LA (?)

d. ca. early 1960s; East St. Louis, IL

Birth and death data possibilities from Harris. Brother of Lonnie Johnson, played piano, celeste, violin, guitar, and banjo. On record, he made "No Good Blues" b/w "Newport Blues" for OKeh in 1926, was a member of Henry Johnson's Boys and backed several other St. Louis blues singers in the 1920s. With his brother, he played on the riverboats in Charlie Creath's Jazz-O-Maniacs.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

JOHNSON, JAMES "STUMP"

b. 17 January 1902; Clarksville, TN

d. 5 December 1969; St. Louis, MO

James "Stump" Johnson was a St. Louis piano player who had a hit with the ditty "The Duck's Yas-Yas-Yas." The twenty-one songs James Johnson recorded from 1928 to 1932 provide a fascinating insight into the barrelhouse and brothel piano music of St. Louis during the Depression. The tunes are catchy, the piano playing is simple, but effective, and the lyrics are raw, but hilarious. His only postwar recordings were made in 1964.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR; LSFP

JOHNSON, JOE

b. 19 January 1942; Independence, LA

Harmonica, guitar. Raised in Greensboro, Louisiana, where he participated in high school gospel group, then in Guitar Grady's Strings of Rhythm from 1959 to 1967. In 1971 he formed his own group and became active in east Texas.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

La Rocca, Joe. "Joe Johnson." Blues Unlimited no. 90 (April 1972): 18.

Discography: LSFPJOHNSON, JOHNNIE

b. 8 July 1924; Fairmont, WV

d. 13 April 2005; St. Louis, MO

Pianist Johnnie Johnson learned to play on his family's piano as a child of four. In his teens he was influenced by Avery Parrish, the pianist in Erskine Hawkins's Orchestra, and Meade "Lux" Lewis whose "Honky Tonk Train Blues" formed the basis of his own "Johnnie's Boogie."

By the 1950s Johnson was leading his own trio at the Cosmopolitan Club in East St. Louis when one fateful New Year's Eve he hired Chuck Berry to replace his saxophonist. Berry became the star attraction, soon taking over the band and the pair developed an instinctive, integrated musical partnership, Johnnie's boogie rhythms becoming the perfect foil to Berry's ringing guitar. When Berry began to record for Chess, it was Johnson's piano that underpinned the music. He will forever be remembered for his sparkling contributions to "Maybellene," "Roll Over Beethoven," "Carol," "Let It Rock," and many other classic Chuck Berry songs.

Johnson also recorded with Albert King on some of his early 1960s Bobbin sides. However, it wasn't until the 1986 Chuck Berry—Hail, Hail Rock and Roll movie that he emerged from Berry's shadow, helped by praise from Keith Richards and Eric Clapton. Since then, Johnson has recorded six albums, including the 1992 "Best Traditional Blues" Grammy-nominated Johnnie B. Bad and played on numerous blues albums including those by John Lee Hooker and Buddy Guy. In 2002 Johnnie Johnson lost his royalties lawsuit claim to fifty percent composer credits for thirty Chuck Berry songs.

FRED ROTHWELL

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Fitzpatrick, Travis. Father of Rock and Roll. Houston: Thomas Cooke & Co., 1999.

Discography: AMGJOHNSON, L. V.

b. 1946; Chicago IL

d. 22 November 1994; Chicago, IL

Singer, guitarist, songwriter in Chicago soul and soul-blues. A nephew of Elmore James, Johnson was a guitarist on the staff of Stax Records, then played in support of Tyrone Davis. In the 1980s he went solo. His last CDs were for Ichiban Records in the early 1990s. He was also part owner of a Chicago steakhouse.

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn)

Discography: AMG; LSFPJOHNSON, LARRY

b. 15 May 1938; Atlanta, GA

Singer and acoustic guitarist proficient in pre-World War II Texas, Mississippi, and Piedmont styles.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Meyer and Al Campbell); Harris

Pomposello, Tom. "Living Blues Interview: Larry Johnson." Living Blues no. 16 (Spring 1974): 16–22.

Discography: AMG; LSFPJOHNSON, LEMUEL CHARLES "LEM"

b. 6 August 1909; Oklahoma City, OK

d. 1 April 1989; New York City, NY

Clarinetist and tenor saxophonist. He emerged out of the Midwest territory bands to settle in New York City in 1937. Active mostly in jazz, his blues work included recordings with Sam Price and as an early member of Louis Jordan’s Tympany Five.

JOHNSON, LEMUEL CHARLES “LEM”

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: DGR; Lord; LSFP

JOHNSON, LESLIE

(See Lazy Lester)

JOHNSON, LONNIE

b. Alonzo Johnson, probably 8 February 1889;
New Orleans, LA

d. 16 June 1970; Toronto, Canada

Lonnie Johnson was one of the most influential guitarists the blues has had, and arguably the most important blues guitarist of the 1920s. He was also a pioneer in the nascent field of jazz guitar. He performed and recorded with legendary figures from Louis Armstrong, Duke Ellington, and Bessie Smith to Texas Alexander and Sonny Boy Williamson. His recorded duets with the great white jazz guitar pioneer Eddie Lang are considered a standard of the genre.

Johnson was also a gifted singer and composer in the blues idiom. By 1932, as the Depression halted his recording work temporarily, he had produced 130 recordings, more than any other major blues performer of the time. He did most of these for the OKeh Race record label; Sony Columbia owns the masters and has reissued some of his most significant work.

Robert Johnson sometimes passed himself off as Lonnie Johnson on unsuspecting audiences. T-Bone Walker, B. B. King, and Jimi Hendrix have cited him as primary influences. Johnson played a major role in the evolution of the music and the technical approach to blues guitar.

Lonnie Johnson’s technical prowess as a guitarist was unrivaled during the late 1920s and early 1930s, the period of his greatest influence. He played very smoothly, and at faster tempos than any other guitarist of the day. He improvised many of his solos. He came from a musical family (one of thirteen children), early on learning violin, piano, banjo, and mandolin along with guitar.

He had no specific background as either a country or ragtime musician; however, researcher Pete Welding has written that since Johnson grew up in New Orleans, he would have heard various kinds of music around the ethnically diverse city.

According to blues scholar and guitarist Stefan Grossman, there is no footage of Johnson in performance, so modern listeners must imagine from the accounts of Johnson’s contemporaries. Big Bill Broonzy maintained that Johnson always used a flat pick. Because Johnson played broken chords and counterpoint like a finger-style player, it must be assumed that he played with pick and fingers, not exclusively with a pick. The majority of his music recorded during the 1920s was in the key of D major, or D position without a capo. He tuned both his six-string and his twelve-string D–G–D–G–B–E (low to high).

Like many virtuoso stylists on different instruments, Johnson had a tendency to accelerate tempo appreciably when playing solo. This is natural in the effort to create excitement for the listener, but also because the art of solo guitar playing, particularly at his unique level, had just come about. The only guitarists with comparable sophistication at the time were Eddie Lang, who played a very different style, and the great Southeastern ragtime blues guitarist Blind Blake. The concept of swing was not yet in full bloom when Johnson made his most popular recordings.

After performing around New Orleans as a youth, Johnson traveled to London with a musical revue in

A signed publicity photo of Lonnie Johnson. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

1917. When he returned, he found out that his entire family, except one brother, had succumbed to the influenza epidemic that was killing millions of people. Bereft, Johnson settled in St. Louis. There he made his first recording (playing violin and singing): “Won’t Don’t Blues,” with Charlie Creath’s Jazz-O-Maniacs on November 2, 1925. His first guitar recording, “Mr. Johnson’s Blues,” was recorded two days later for OKeh.

The following seven years were the high period of Johnson’s career. He was featured as a blues and jazz soloist and ensemble musician, writer of blues and other material he recorded, and a sought-after accompanist for the leading vocalists of the day. Perhaps his signature piece as a guitar soloist is the 1928 “Away Down in the Alley,” which provided for guitarists the same kind of milestone that Louis Armstrong’s “West End Blues” did for aspiring trumpeters and the rest of the jazz world. Johnson was one of the most popular black vaudeville performers, traveling the TOBA (Theater Owners Booking Association) circuit.

Johnson’s duets with Eddie Lang (who recorded under the pseudonym Blind Willie Dunn) merit special mention. The two guitarists each proclaimed these to be their favorite recordings. Lang provided a foil for Johnson’s fireworks, playing steady and imaginative rhythm guitar and occasionally soloing. Johnson blossomed in these sessions. The arrangements were made up on the spot in the studio. Such cuts as “Hot Fingers,” “Bullfrog Moan,” and “A Handful of Riffs” remain highlights of guitar literature for the ages. These were also the first major integrated recordings in the jazz or blues field.

He was married to the blues singer Mary Lou (Signifyin’ Mary) Johnson. They had seven children. His 1927 song “I Love You, Mary Lou” was written for her. The song is in a broader, Tin Pan Alley format. The lyrics have been called maudlin and the chords and melody rambling, but Johnson’s voice, intonation, and phrasing carry the performance.

Johnson enjoyed great longevity as an artist, supporting himself occasionally outside the music business when times were hard. Through changing popular tastes, he had a handful of records that hit the charts in the 1940s and 1950s. He was rediscovered in the early 1960s as part of the blues and folk music boom. He died in 1970 of complications from having been hit by a car.

Lonnie Johnson left a remarkable musical legacy, particularly for guitarists. Technical devices he established or popularized include vibrato, string bending, double stops, and melodic syncopation.

LENNY CARLSON

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 Carlson, Lenny, author/transcriber. Away Down in the Alley: The Great Blues Guitar of Lonnie Johnson. Pacific, MO: Mel Bay Publications, 1993.
 Cohn, Lawrence, ed. Nothing But the Blues. New York: Abbeville Press, 1993.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

- Cohn, Lawrence, prod. Lonnie Johnson: Steppin on the Blues (1990, CBS Records CK 46221; comprehensive liner notes by Pete Welding).
 ———. Great Blues Guitarists: String Dazzlers (1991, Sony Music Entertainment CK 47060).

JOHNSON, LOUISE

Active 1927–1940

Louise Johnson, according to Son House, was “a real young girl” at the time of her only recording session. She lived in the Clarksdale area of Mississippi and is believed to have been from Robinsonville. The pianist John “Red” Williams remembered her in Tunica in the late 1920s. According to Williams she was a small woman, about twenty years old, playing piano in a joint attached to the cotton oil mill quarters. By 1930 she was playing and living on Joe Kirby’s plantation near Claxton, Mississippi, on Highway 61.

Louise Johnson was an associate of Willie Brown, Charley Patton, and Son House, and recording director Art Laibley arranged for them all to record for Paramount in 1930. At the session Louise Johnson was said to be so nervous that she needed the verbal support of House and Brown to play, although this was denied by Laibley. After the session she continued to play in the Clarksdale area plantation juke joints, in the company of House and Brown. Around the early 1940s she is rumored to have moved to Memphis but no trace has been found of her there.

Four issued sides and one unissued alternate take represent Louise Johnson’s entire recorded output. The emotional quality of her singing and the ferocity of her piano attack makes these performances outstanding. On all of the recordings she accompanies her keening vibrato with a hard-hitting boogie piano, moving from a single-note figure to a walking octave bass. “On the Wall,” apart from its explicit sexual allusions, is also notable for its spectacular piano accompaniment, loosely based on the familiar “Cow Cow Blues” theme. “By the Moon and Stars,” “Long Ways from Home,” and “All Night Long Blues” feature more gritty vocals and great piano from

JOHNSON, LOUISE

Johnson, urged on by the encouragement of House and Brown.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

Hall, Bob, and Richard Noblett. "Louise Johnson Again." Blues Unlimited no. 115 (September/October 1975): 21–22.

Discography: DGR

JOHNSON, LUTHER "GEORGIA BOY" "SNAKE"

b. Lucius Brinson Johnson, 30 August 1934; Davisboro, GA
d. 18 March 1976; Boston, MA

Luther Johnson quit picking cotton in rural Georgia when Santa Claus brought him a guitar. In Chicago, he did stints behind Howlin' Wolf and Junior Wells before, around 1966, realizing his boyhood dream of backing Muddy Waters. Johnson, known by several nicknames including "Georgia Boy" and "(Creepin') Snake," had a feel for the music. What he lacked in flash or speed, he made up in feeling, so he was able to join Muddy playing bass—more than capable of adding a funky feel to the instrument—and wait for a guitar slot to open. He stayed with Muddy for nearly a decade, assuming the role of bandleader when Muddy was out for several months in 1970 after a car crash. Ultimately, however, Johnson had star dreams of his own. With Muddy, the band often performed a good part of the evening without the star, and Snake soon co-opted the boss's tune "Long Distance Call," complete with Muddy's gospel preaching at the song's climax. Snake settled in Boston, where he was embraced by the popular blues scene. His band became a training ground for many players, including Bob Margolin, David Maxwell, Babe Pino, and Mark "Kaz" Kazanoff.

ROBERT GORDON

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris
Gordon, Robert. Can't Be Satisfied: The Life and Times of Muddy Waters. New York: Little, Brown, 2002.

Discography: AMG

The Bluesmen of the Muddy Waters Blues Band (1967, Spivey 1008).
Luther Johnson with the Muddy Waters Blues Band (aka Chicken Shack) (1968, Douglas Records 781).

JOHNSON, LUTHER "HOUSEROCKER"

b. 15 July 1939; Atlanta, GA

Current Atlanta electric blues guitar favorite. Largely self-taught, Jimmy Reed and Lightnin' Slim had formative influences on Johnson. After some years in Atlanta bar bands, he formed the Houserockers in the 1980s. He has recorded for the Ichiban label since 1989.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O'Neal and Stephen Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG

JOHNSON, MARGARET

Flourished 1920s

Singer from Kansas City, MO who participated in variety of blues recording sessions in the 1920s, from urban blues and jazz with the Clarence Williams Blue Five, to rural styles with Leecan and Cooksey. In the 1930s she turned to piano accompaniment.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)

Discography: DGR

JOHNSON, MARY

b. 1905; near Jackson, MS (or circa 1900; near Eden Station, MS)
d. ca. 1970; St. Louis, MO

Mary Johnson, Lonnie Johnson's wife, was a St. Louis blues singer who recorded from 1929 to 1936 with wonderful accompaniment. After the war she turned to gospel music, but unfortunately no postwar recordings have survived.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR

JOHNSON, PETE

b. Kermit Holden Johnson, 24 or 25 March 1904;
Kansas City, MO

d. 23 March 1967; Buffalo, NY

Johnson dropped out of school at the age of twelve and took a variety of manual jobs including shipping clerk, shoe shine boy, movie usher, freight car loader, and slaughterhouse and laundry worker. His first instrument was the drums and he obtained a job with pianist Louis "Good Bootie" Johnson, who taught him the rudiments of the piano. He also learned ragtime from his uncle "Smash" Johnson, Myrtle Hawkins, Slamfoot Brown, and Stacey La Guardia. By the age of eighteen he was playing piano at house parties, and when Louis Johnson was the worse for drink, Pete Johnson took over. One of his first jobs with his own group was at the Backbiter's Club, a speakeasy on the north side of Kansas City, in an area known as "Little Italy." Here, around 1927, he met blues singer Joe Turner and began a partnership that lasted, off and on, for more than thirty years. Other places Johnson played included the Grey Goose and the Spinning Wheel, where he was the pianist with Herman Walder's Rockette Swing Unit. By the late 1920s Johnson was playing at the Hawaiian Gardens. When the Hawaiian Gardens was raided by the FBI, Johnson moved to the Sunset Crystal Palace at 12th and Woodlawn. Here he eventually had a seven-piece band together with vocalists Joe Turner and Henry Lawson. The band made radio broadcasts over W9XBY from 12 to 12:30 p.m. and played for dancing and the floor shows.

In 1936 John Hammond and agent Willard Alexander visited Kansas City and arranged for Johnson and Turner to appear at The Famous Door in New York. The trip proved abortive and their one other appearance, at the Apollo Theatre, Harlem, was not well received. Turner sang a ballad: "I'm Glad for Your Sake, Sorry for Mine" instead of their more familiar blues and boogie-woogie numbers. The duo went back to Kansas City but in May 1938 received a telegram from New York inviting them to audition for Benny Goodman's Camel Show. They got the job and signed with the Willard Alexander agency. Their big break came in December 1938, however, when John Hammond invited them to appear in his celebrated "From Spirituals to Swing" concert at Carnegie Hall. Riding on their success at the concert, Hammond obtained a residency for Albert Ammons, Meade "Lux" Lewis, Pete Johnson, and Joe Turner in Café Society, a popular New York nightclub. Many classic live broadcasts from Café Society followed, featuring various combinations of Ammons, Lewis, and Johnson on two pianos, billed as the Boogie Woogie Trio, with occasional vocals from Turner. Of the three pianists, Johnson was far and away the most sympathetic accompanist, and the outstanding "Roll 'Em Pete," "Cherry Red," and "Goin' Away Blues," featuring Turner's vocals and Johnson's vibrant piano, were recorded at this time. When Lewis and Turner left Café Society, Ammons and Johnson formed a regular partnership and appeared in many cities across the states. Johnson still accompanied Turner on engagements and recordings, however, and together they made some classic sides, including "Rebecca" and "Little Bitty Gal's Blues" in 1944.

Although known primarily as a blues and boogie pianist, Johnson had a wide repertoire of popular songs, and recorded some fine small group jazz dates with Hot Lips Page for Savoy in the mid-1940s. Johnson made trips to California in 1947 and 1948, where he performed with Ammons and Turner. Turner was able to adjust his style to the burgeoning teenage market and Johnson too recorded a number of jump band sides, including "Rocket 88," Parts 1 and 2, for Swing Time, which set the scene for the new R&B style.

In later years Johnson suffered a series of strokes that incapacitated him and he died on March 23, 1967, after a long illness.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

AMG (Scott Yanow); New Grove Jazz; Santelli Mauerer, Hans J. The Pete Johnson Story. New York, Frankfurt am Main: self-published 1965.

Discography: DGR; Lord; LSFPJOHNSON, PLAS

b. John Johnson Jr., 21 July 1931;
Donaldsonville, LA

Possessed of one of the richest, fattest tones ever heard on tenor saxophone, Plas Johnson will forever be associated with Henry Mancini's "Theme from the Pink Panther," for which he played the instrumental lead on the soundtrack. But he has also had an active career in blues and jazz, lending his tone to landmark recordings by other artists and recording some highly regarded soul-jazz albums of his own.

Born in Louisiana, Johnson and his brother, Ray, formed a jazz combo in New Orleans that was active locally for a few years before Plas struck out for Los Angeles in 1951 as a member of Charles Brown's band. In California, Johnny Otis added him to his revue, and Johnson also began doing session work. While he is best known for his film and television work (he was a longtime member of The Merv Griffin Show band), Johnson has also added his sax to recordings by B. B. King, Etta James, Albert Collins, Dr. John, T-Bone Walker, Arthur Prysock, O. C. Smith, Screamin' Jay Hawkins, and Aaron Neville, among many others.

On those rare occasions when he has recorded as a leader, Johnson has shown an affinity for the blues and soul-jazz similar to what he would have played during his brief stint with Charles Brown. On two albums in the mid-1970s for Concord, and on a series of releases in the 1980s and 1990s for Carell, Johnson's playing takes in soul and rhythm and blues, all tied together in a small-combo jazz setting.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Larkin

Greensmith, Bill. "Plas Johnson." Blues Unlimited no. 133 (January/February 1979): 12–15.

Discography: Lord

The Blues (1975, Concord Records 4015).

Keep That Groove Going (2001, Milestone 9319; with Red Holloway).

JOHNSON, ROBERT LEROY

b. 8 May 1911; Hazelhurst, MS

d. 16 August 1938; Greenwood, MS

Robert Leroy Johnson was a brilliant guitar technician and expressive singer who since his death at an early age has come to occupy a central position in blues history and legend.

Johnson was born in Hazelhurst, Mississippi, the son of Noah Johnson, a laborer, and Julia Major. Major had been abandoned by her first husband Charles Dodds; within a few years she located him in Memphis, Tennessee, and placed her toddler son Robert in his care. She married Willie "Dusty" Willis, a sharecropper near Robinsonville, Mississippi, in 1916, and took Robert back in 1918. He received some formal schooling perhaps as late as his teenage years.

Johnson's first instrument was the harmonica, which he played for his schoolmates. By or in 1929 he took up the guitar, with the intent to play music full time. Early on, he tried performing on guitar and harmonica, but he eventually concentrated his study solely on guitar. Also that year, he married Virginia Travis, who would die with her child during childbirth in April 1930.

Charlie Patton's half-year stay in Lula, Mississippi, in 1930, and Son House and Willie Brown's arrival in Robinsonville that summer would have afforded Johnson ample opportunity to view these musicians who had recorded for Paramount during that summer. Johnson's own efforts at performing at this time were unimpressive to House. A period of study and performance in Hazelhurst during 1930 and 1931, with the help of Grady, Alabama, guitarist Ike Zimmerman, brought a sudden improvement in Johnson's playing. He is also believed to have fathered an illegitimate son, Claude, with a local woman named Vergie (Virgie) Jane Smith. He returned to Robinsonville sometime in 1931, impressing House to the point of astonishment with his newly acquired guitar skills.

From 1931 through late 1932 or early 1933, Johnson appears to have traveled and performed throughout the Mississippi Delta, Jackson, Hazelhurst, and Hattiesburg. During this same period he married Caletta Craft, but the marriage was short lived due to his frequent travels and her illnesses. When in Jackson, he apparently traded songs with Johnny Temple, a protégé of Nehemiah "Skip" James. Temple would record the Son House "Walking Blues" melody as "Lead Pencil Blues" in 1935, and Johnson in turn would later create treatments to new lyrics of James's "22–20 Blues" and "Yola My Blues Away."

By 1934 Johnson added Helena, Arkansas, as a base. It may have been at this time that he made the first of several trips to St. Louis, Missouri, coming into contact at least with the music of Roosevelt Sykes, Peetie Wheatstraw, and Henry Townsend. In the Helena area he came to exert influence on two younger guitarists, Johnny Shines then of Hughes, Arkansas, and Robert Lockwood of Marvell. That Johnson had a relationship with Lockwood's mother Estella Coleman has led some writers to suppose a stepfather/stepson contact between these two musicians, although the men were only four years apart in age. Younger Mississippi Delta musicians who came to meet Johnson at this time include Aleck Miller "Sonny Boy Williamson II" and Chester Burnett "Howlin' Wolf."

In October 1936 Johnson had a successful record audition with Henry "H. C." Speir, a record store owner and talent scout, in Jackson, Mississippi. The following month Johnson recorded sixteen songs for the American Recording Corporation (ARC) in three sessions in San Antonio, Texas. The initial release, "Kind Hearted Woman Blues"/"Terraplane Blues," enjoyed great popularity and sales, and it was even noted in print by John Hammond in the March 20, 1937, issue of New Masses. Other notable titles from the 1936 sessions include “I Believe I’ll Dust My Broom,” “Sweet Home Chicago,” “Cross Road Blues,” “If I Had Possession over Judgment Day,” and reworkings of two Son House pieces, “Walking Blues” and “Preaching Blues (Up Jumped the Devil).”

In the spring of 1937 Johnson and Johnny Shines traveled with Shines’s cousin Calvin Frazier, who was moving north to evade retaliation for a 1935 shooting. The three went as far as Windsor, Ontario, but Frazier decided to settle in Detroit. Afterward, Shines recalled Johnson going to Chicago, New York, and St. Louis on the same trip.

Johnson enjoyed a second set of ARC sessions in July 1937, held in Dallas. He recorded thirteen songs, including “Hell Hound on My Trail” and “Love in Vain Blues,” none of which matched the sales of “Kind Hearted Woman Blues” upon their release in 1938–1939.

The remainder of 1937 and 1938 was spent performing in Mississippi and east Arkansas. During this time he made acquaintance with David “Honeyboy” Edwards near Itta Bena, Mississippi, and with Elmore James in Belzoni. Anecdotes of Johnson performing with a pianist and drummer, and of him playing an electric guitar, would be dated to this last year of life.

Johnson died on a plantation near Greenwood, Mississippi, on August 16, 1938. The death certificate records the local overseer’s opinion of death from syphilis, although oral accounts of his death by poisoning have received serious consideration from biographers and historians.

Columbia Records acquired the Johnson masters when it bought ARC in 1938. The recordings are now maintained by the Sony Corporation. The song copyrights were secured in 1978 by King of Spades Music, part of the Delta Haze Corporation.

Johnson’s surviving music may be grouped into three types, each indicative of a distinct time period. The first is his imitation of blues guitar masters through 1934, including those of Mississippi, especially Son House, Willie Newbern (“If I Had Possession over Judgment Day”), Skip James likely by way of Johnny Temple, and to a lesser extent Charley Patton (“The Last Fair Deal Gone Down”) and Arthur Petties. On “Stop Breaking Down Blues” he adopts the vocal mannerisms of Memphis Minnie’s “Caught Me Wrong Again” (1936). Johnson was influenced also by the 1920s records of guitarists outside the Delta, most clearly by those of Lonnie Johnson (“Malted Milk,” “Drunken Hearted Man”); stylistic echoes of Tampa Red and Blind Blake may be heard in Johnson’s own records.

A second type is Johnson’s imitation of blues pianists, especially Leroy Carr, Roosevelt Sykes, and Peetie Wheatstraw, of the early to mid-1930s. He successfully adapted for the guitar three kinds of piano boogie bass runs. One was the repeated monotone “stationary” bass (as heard on “Come On in My Kitchen,” “Me and the Devil Blues,” “Kind Hearted Woman Blues”) on the fifth scale tone of the prevailing chord. Another was the “rocking” bass alternating between the fifth and sixth scale tones of the prevailing chord (“I Believe I’ll Dust My Broom”; “Phonograph Blues,” take 2); recent notated transcriptions published by Hal Leonard suggest Johnson used an Aadd9 tuning (low to high E–B–E–A–C#–E) to facilitate the fretting of this bass pattern. The third boogie is the “walking” type on the fifth, sixth, and flatted seventh scale degrees of the prevailing chord (“When You Got a Good Friend”); transcribers agree that Johnson most likely tuned his guitar to standard E. The impact of Leroy Carr on Johnson extends also to his vocal singing style, even on songs that do not have piano-style accompaniments.

The third type of Johnson’s music is a harmonic, homophonic kind making use of inverted tonic (I), tonic-seventh (I7), and submediant (vi) chords sharply plucked on three or four strings. This style may be best heard on his “Terraplane Blues” and “Cross Road Blues.” How Johnson came to conceive and realize this kind of accompaniment is not documented, but Johnny Shines’s anecdote of Johnson singing and playing harmonica on Highway 61 around 1935, then afterward adapting those songs to the guitar, may be relevant here. Whether or not this is derived from his unrecorded harmonica style, it is strongly possible it originated with Johnson, because no antecedents for this accompaniment have yet been found on records.

Oddly, Johnson in his recorded repertoire appears to have used preexisting melodies that had already appeared on other musicians’ records by the time of his 1936–1937 recording sessions. His improvising skills lay in supplying a wide array of guitar ornaments and fills—licks between lyric phrases, and in engaging in a staggering display of lyric word play from word substitutions to phonetic imitation. His best and most virtuosic music performances, especially “Rambling on My Mind,” “Terraplane Blues,” and “Cross Road Blues,” exhibit his improvisational strengths to breathtaking effect.

During his lifetime, “Terraplane Blues” was Johnson’s best-known record. It is the basis of Frank Edwards’s “Terraplane Blues” (1941), still the one known commercially recorded treatment of a Johnson song before 1943 by a musician outside the Johnson circle.

Johnson exerted greater influence in person. His piano-style accompaniment was mastered by Calvin Frazier and Robert Lockwood, and his harmonic/homophonic style of guitar fills was taken up by Johnny Shines. Echoes of bottleneck slide sound may be heard in the later records of Honeyboy Edwards, Muddy Waters, and Elmore James. His songs were performed by these artists as well as by Howlin' Wolf and Floyd Jones. The adoption of some songs in St. Louis and Chicago may be due to Roosevelt Sykes.

The 1961 Columbia Records reissue Robert Johnson: King of the Delta Blues Singers brought his music to the attention of young white musicians, including Johnny Winter and Bob Dylan in the United States, and Eric Clapton and Rolling Stones members Brian Jones and Keith Richards, among others. Their adoption of his songs informed the blues-based rock music of 1966 through 1980. The 1990 compact disc reissue of Johnson's complete recordings led to a blues revival that decade involving talented musicians—black and white, young and old, male and female.

Research on Johnson has stood at the forefront of blues scholarship since John Hammond's unsuccessful effort to engage Johnson for the 1938 "From Spirituals to Swing" concert in New York City, and Alan Lomax's 1941–1942 Library of Congress recording trips to Mississippi. Rudi Blesh's depiction in Shining Trumpets (1946) of Johnson as a solitary, haunted bluesman set the tone for future writing by Samuel Charters and Paul Oliver. In 1966 Pete Welding published Son House's comment on Johnson: "He must have sold his soul to the devil to play like that." During the 1970s when white rock groups claimed to have done just that, some writers combined the House quote with a crossroads deal story associated with Tommy Johnson (unrelated) to emphasize the devil aspect of Johnson's lyrics. The most influential of these combinations, Greil Marcus's Mystery Train (1975), Robert Palmer's Deep Blues (1982), and Julio Finn's The Bluesman (1986), continue to shape cultural studies of Johnson and the blues. Historical research relies greatly on the work of Stephen LaVere, Mack McCormick (as reported by Peter Guralnick), and Gayle Wardlow (with some assistance from Stephen Calt). Many lyric transcriptions have been attempted, notably those published by Bob Groom in the Blues World Booklet No. 1 (1967) devoted to Johnson and the full set by LaVere in the 1990 Columbia reissue. Musical transcriptions of Johnson have been published since Blesh's inclusion of "Hell Hound on My Trail" in Shining Trumpets. The individual efforts of Woody Mann and of Scott Ainslie and Dave Whitehill paved the way for the recent transcriptions by Pete Billman (with Dave Rubin and Jim Schustedt). The study of Robert Johnson is sure to grow with each future innovation in blues research.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 Blesh, Rudi. Shining Trumpets: A History of Jazz. New York: Knopf, 1946.
 Finn, Julio. The Bluesman: The Musical Heritage of Black Men and Women in the Americas. London: Quartet, 1986; reprinted, New York: Interlink, 1992.
 Freeland, Tom. "Some Witnesses to the Short Life of Robert Johnson." Living Blues no. 150 (March/April 2000): 42–49.
 Guralnick, Peter. "Searching for Robert Johnson." Living Blues no. 53 (Summer/Autumn): 27–41, 1982; republished in book form with expanded back matter as Searching for Robert Johnson (New York: Dutton, 1989).
 Hammond, John. "Jim Crow Blues." New Masses (December 13, 1938): 27–28.
 Komara, Edward. "From the Archive" (chart of Robert Johnson melodic precedents). Living Blues no. 129 (September/October 1996): 12.
 Marcus, Greil. Mystery Train: Images of America in Rock and Roll Music. New York: E. P. Dutton, 1975.
 Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Viking, 1981.
 Pearson, Barry Lee, and Bill McCulloch. Robert Johnson Lost and Found. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2003.
 Rubin, Dave. Robert Johnson: A Step-by-Step Breakdown of the Legendary Guitarist's Style and Technique. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 2000.
 Schroeder, Patricia. Robert Johnson: Mythmaking and Contemporary Culture. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2004.
 Shines, Johnny. "The Robert Johnson I Knew." American Folk Music Occasional no. 2 (1970): 30–33.
 ———. "Ramblin'." Living Blues no. 22 (July/August 1975): 23–32.
 Townsend, Henry, and Pete Welding. "The Robert Johnson I Knew." Down Beat (October 31, 1968): 18, 32.
 Wald, Elijah. Escaping the Delta: Robert Johnson and the Invention of the Blues. New York: Amistad/Harper Collins, 2004.
 Welding, Pete. "Hell Hound on His Trail." Down Beat Music '66 (11th Yearbook, 1966): 73–76, 103.

Discography: DGR

Recordings and Selected Reissues

Reissues: Sony Columbia Legacy C2K 46222 [SCL], Robert Johnson, The Complete Recordings (remastered equivalent on Columbia C2K 64916); Columbia CL 1654 [CL], Robert Johnson, King of the Delta Blues Singers (reissued on CD on Columbia 65746 with one previously unissued alternate take).

Transcriptions: Anslie, Scott, and Dave Whitehill. Robert Johnson: At the Crossroads—The Authoritative Guitar Transcriptions (Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 1992) [AW]; Mann, Woody. The Complete Robert Johnson (New York: Oak, 1991) [M]; Billman, Pete. Robert Johnson: The New Transcriptions (Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 2000) [B].

Format: Title. Take number: label and matrix number/original issue/selected reissues/selected transcriptions, page numbers.

A. November 23, 1936, San Antonio, Texas

- “Kindhearted Woman Blues.” Take –1: American Recording Company [ARC] matrix [mx.] SA 2580-1/Vocalion 03416/SCL 46222, CL 1654/AW, 13–15; M, 10–15; B, 7–13. Take –2: ARC mx. SA 2580-2/Vocalion 03416/SCL 46222.
- “I Believe I’ll Dust My Broom.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2581-1/Vocalion 03475/SCL 46222/AW, 17–18; M, 78–81; B, 13–19.
- “Sweet Home Chicago.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2582-1/Vocalion 03601/SCL 46222/AW, 20–21; M, 88–89; B, 20–26.
- “Rambling on My Mind.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2583-1/Vocalion 03519/SCL 46222, Columbia CL 1654/AW, 23–24; M, 74–77; B, 27–32. Take –2: ARC mx. SA 2583-2/Vocalion 03519/SCL 46222.
- “When You Got a Good Friend.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2584-1/SCL 46222, CL 1654/AW, 26; M, 86–87; B, 33–38. Take –2: ARC mx. SA 2584-2/SCL 46222.
- “Come On in My Kitchen.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2585-1/SCL 46222, CL 1654/AW, 29–30; M, 66–67; B, 39–44. Take –2: SA 2585-2/Vocalion 03563/SCL 46222.
- “Terraplane Blues.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2586-1/Vocalion 03416/SGL 46222, CL 1654/AW, 31; M, 39–43; B, 45–52.
- “Phonograph Blues.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2587-1/SCL 46222/AW, 36–39; M, 16–20; B, 53–58. Take –2: ARC mx. SA 2587-2/SCL 46222/B, 59–65.

B. November 26, 1936, San Antonio, Texas

- 32–20 Blues. Take –2: ARC mx. SA 2616-2/Vocalion 03445/SCL 46222, CL 1654/AW, 41–43; M, 21–23; B, 66–73.

C. November 27, 1936, San Antonio, Texas

- “They’re Red Hot.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2627-1/Vocalion 03563/SCL 46222/AW, 45–46; M, 94–96; B, 74–76.
- “Dead Shrimp Blues.” Take –2: ARC mx. SA 2628-2/Vocalion 03475/SCL 46222/AW, 48–51; M, 24–26; B, 77–82.
- “Cross Road Blues.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2629-1/Vocalion 03519/SCL 46222 Take –2: ARC mx. SA 2629-2/SCL 46222, CL 1654/AW, 53–57; M, 44–48; B, 83–89.
- “Walking Blues.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2630-1/Vocalion 03601/SCL 46222, Columbia CL 1654/AW, 59–60; M, 52–53; B, 90–95.
- “Last Fair Deal Gone Down.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2631-1/Vocalion 03445/SCL 46222, Columbia CL 1654/AW, 62–63; M, 54–55; B, 96–102.
- “Preaching Blues (Up Jumped the Devil).” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2632-1/Vocalion 04630/SCL 46222, Columbia CL 1654/AW, 65–66; M, 68–70; B, 103–110.
- “If I Had Possession over Judgment Day.” Take –1: ARC mx. SA 2633-1/SCL 46222, CL 1654/AW, 68–71; M, 49–51; B, 111–118.

D. June 19, 1937, Dallas, Texas

- “Stones in My Passway.” Take –2: ARC mx. DAL 377-2/Vocalion 03723/SCL 46222, CL 1654/AW, 73–75; M, 56–58; B, 119–124.
- “I’m a Steady Rollin’ Man.” Take –1: ARC mx. DAL 378-1/Vocalion 03723/SCL 46222/AW, 77–78; M, 27–29; B, 125–130.
- “From Four Until Late.” Take –1: ARC mx. DAL 379-1/Vocalion 03623/SCL 46222/AW, 80–82; M, 92–93; B, 131–136.

E. June 20, 1937, Dallas, Texas

- “Hellhound on My Trail.” Take –2: ARC mx. DAL 394-2/Vocalion 03623/SCL 46222, CL 1654/AW, 84–88; M, 71–73; B, 137–142.
- “Little Queen of Spades.” Take –1: ARC mx. DAL 395-1/Vocalion 04108/SCL 46222, M, 30–31; B, 143–147. Take –2: ARC mx. DAL 395-2/Vocalion 04108/SCL 46222/AW, 90–91.
- “Malted Milk.” Take –1: ARC mx. DAL 396-1/Vocalion 03665/SCL 46222/AW, 93–95; M, 82–83; B, 148–152.
- “Drunken Hearted Man.” Take –1: ARC mx. DAL 397-1/SCL 46222/M, 84–85; B, 153–157. Take –2: ARC mx. DAL 397-2/SCL 46222/AW, 97–98.
- “Me and the Devil Blues.” Take –1: ARC mx. DAL 398-1/Vocalion 04108/SCL 46222/B, 158–162. Take –2: ARC mx. DAL 398-2/Vocalion 04108/SCL 46222, CL 1654/AW, 100–101; M, 32–35.
- “Stop Breakin’ Down.” Take –1: ARC mx. DAL 399-1/Vocalion 04002/SCL 46222/AW, 103–104; M, 62–63; B, 163–169. Take –2: ARC mx. DAL 399-2/Vocalion 04002/SCL 46222.
- “Traveling Riverside Blues.” Take –1: ARC mx. DAL 400-1/CL 1654 (CD reissue)/B, 170–176. Take –2: ARC mx. DAL 400-2/SCL 46222, CL 1654/AW, 106–111; M, 64–65; B, 177–183.
- “Honeymoon Blues.” Take –1: ARC mx. DAL 401-1/Vocalion 04002/SCL 46222/ AW, 113–115; M, 36–38; B, 184–188.
- “Love in Vain.” Take –1: ARC mx. DAL 402-1/SCL 46222/AW, 117–118; M, 90–91; B, 189–192. Take –4, possibly a recut of –2 or –3: ARC mx. DAL 402-4/Vocalion 04630/SCL 46222.
- “Milkcow’s Calf Blues.” Take –2: ARC mx. DAL 403-2/Vocalion 03665/SCL 46222/M, 59–61. Take –3: ARC mx. DAL 403-3/Vocalion 03665/SCL 46222, Columbia CL 1654/AW, 120–125; B, 193–197.

JOHNSON, SYL

b. Sylvester Thompson, 1 July 1936;
Holly Springs, MS

Chicago soul singer and record company executive of 1960s and 1970s. With his strong, sharp, and wailing voice, Johnson built a career in the 1960s and 1970s recording hard soul and blues. As a teenager, he began playing guitar in blues clubs, and in 1959 was signed to the Federal label. His twelve released sides for the label, however, only generated a few plays on local radio. His first hit, albeit locally, was “Straight Love, No Chaser,” for the Zachron label in 1966. He finally achieved national success in 1967 with “Come On and Sock It to Me,” recording for Twilight (soon changed to Twinight). Other hits quickly followed, notably “Different Strokes” (1967), “Is It Because I’m Black” (1969), and “Concrete Reservation” (1970). Johnson moved to Willie Mitchell’s Hi label in 1971 and continued his hit-making streak, notably with “We Did It” (1972), “Back for a Taste of Your Love” (1973), and the original hit version of “Take Me to the River” (1975). He also operated the Shama label at this time, producing such blues artists as Lee “Shot” Williams and Nolan Struck.

Like many classic soul artists, Johnson did not fare well during the disco era, but he did manage one final chart record that successfully combined disco with a blues sensibility, “Miss Fine Brown Frame” (1982). During the early 1980s, Johnson was recording predominantly blues, releasing some of his LPs on his Shama label. During much of the 1980s and 1990s, Johnson was largely out of the music business. He returned with an outstanding CD for Delmark, Back in the Game, in 1995. Later CDs were less successful, but Johnson continued to play blues festivals, sometimes with his brother, bluesman Jimmy Johnson.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. “The Syl Johnson Story.” Living Blues no. 122 (July/August 1995): 22–33.

Discography: LSFP

JOHNSON, TOMMY

b. ca. 1896; Terry, MS

d. 1 November 1956; Crystal Springs, MS

Tommy Johnson recorded less than twenty known sides, though there is evidence of others that have not yet been found, in a short two years from 1928 to 1929, but he became one of the most influential Mississippi bluesmen, a major figure remembered with enormous respect and admiration long after his death.

Tommy Johnson was born to Idell Johnson and Mary Ella Williams and was one of thirteen children, all apparently related to Lonnie Johnson through their father. One brother, the Reverend Ledell Johnson, who claims to have taught Tommy guitar, provided much of the information known about

Tommy. He ran away from home when he was either twelve or around eighteen (Ledell gave contradictory information on this) and worked as an itinerant musician in the Rolling Fork area. In 1915, he married Maggie Bedwell, an attractive fourteen-year-old who was later immortalized in “Maggie Campbell Blues.” (It should be mentioned here that Ishmon Bracey insists Maggie Campbell was a different Maggie, a former girlfriend of Johnson’s. But Johnson and Bedwell were living apart by this time, and his family felt the song was an attempt to win her back.)

Later that year the Johnson family moved to the Tom Sander plantation in Drew where Tommy started playing with Willie Brown and Dick Bankston, and Ledell recalled performing with Tommy and Charley Patton who visited the area to perform at juke joints and dances. Tommy wandered the small towns of the Delta and sometimes played with another Johnson brother, Mager, or Rube Lacey, Charlie McCoy, Ishmon Bracey, John Byrd, and Walter Vincent. He is remembered as a bad stutterer except when singing, and he emphasized his sibilants with a kind of hiss.

Johnson enjoyed spreading the rumor that he had been taught to play by the devil. In a story remarkably similar to the one that grew around Robert Johnson a decade later, Tommy claimed to Ledell he had gone to a crossroads at midnight and started playing, upon which the devil appeared and taught him tunings and playing techniques.

But considering Johnson’s companions such as Patton and Willie Brown it seems very likely that he picked up elements of his style from the two experienced musicians who were playing long before he started, although there is controversy over whether Tommy taught Patton the theme of “Pony Blues” (which he himself recorded as “Bye Bye Blues”) or whether Patton was the originator. Bracey insisted Tommy sang it first, but the tune was one of two that Patton reworked through his career. Interestingly, Patton’s other main tune, “Moon Going Down,” was also used by Johnson, and Johnson is also reported to have copied Patton’s showmanship by playing his guitar behind his back, a stunt which, in turn, influenced Howlin’ Wolf to add a few spectacles to his shows some thirty years later.

Tommy was a notorious womanizer who married several times. He was also a serious alcoholic, drinking anything—bay rum, canned heat, shoe polish, moonshine—as his brother recalled. It was a ruinous habit that wrecked his recording career and eventually killed him.

In 1927, Johnson and the similar but less gifted Bracey, were discovered by talent scout H. C. Speir (who also arranged recordings sessions for Patton and Skip James among others). He made test pressings of them above his store in Jackson and sent them to Victor who called the two men to Memphis in February 1928 with singer Rosie Mae Moore. According to Bracey, the bus went off the road en route and Rosie was injured. He obtained compensation for them but remained bitter that they never thanked him for it. Johnson was accompanied by Charlie McCoy on second guitar and the eight sides made for Victor (two takes unissued until the LP era, and a third apparently lost) remain the apogee of Johnson's craft: striking imagery, varied subjects, and perfectly integrated guitars. The first four sides were a mix of the original and the traditional and all show Johnson's clear, vivid voice at its best. He used a spine-chilling falsetto exactly where it heightened the tension of his songs, while his rather limited guitar, wonderfully underscored by McCoy's mandolin-like decorations, is a classic example of the workmanlike transcending its limitation to produce a supremely successful effect.

"Cool Drink of Water Blues" is largely traditional but Johnson had the ability to make a familiar theme sound fresh and new. The contrast with Patton's aggressive roughness is startling yet the singing remains hovering closely to the sound of the ancient cornfield holler. "Big Road Blues" is another collection of standard verses thrown together rather haphazardly with no real story line and the instrumental breaks, on which McCoy again demonstrated his immense skills, are more interesting than the vocals. But the song remained one of Johnson's most copied and was still being sung in Chicago clubs during the 1950s. Johnson's sister-in-law believed it had won a contest organized by Victor to find the best blues on a big road theme. (Bessie Smith was said to have come in second, possibly with "Long Old Road.")

"Bye Bye Blues," recorded the following day, adds little to what has already been heard apart from the mystery over the origin of its theme, but the fourth song was "Maggie Campbell Blues," possibly the best remembered of all his songs. It scarcely matters if Campbell was Bedwell or another woman—as David Evans wrote, "Its charm seems to lie in its very obscurity." On this side, possibly because of some kind of emotional involvement, Johnson's vocal was magnificent—deeper than before but emphasizing the emotional imagery with an involvement sometimes missing from his music, with both he and McCoy offering a peerless, complex accompaniment. Each of the four songs made the musicians thirty dollars and they received no extra royalties.

Johnson was back in Memphis alone in August the same year and he recorded four songs, two of which were unissued until the LP era. "Big Fat Mama" is a fine traditional blues with a superb guitar backing, but "Canned Heat Blues" remains Johnson's most personal and prophetic blues. Tommy would drink anything if he couldn't get whiskey, and canned heat, an alcoholic cooking fuel, could be strained and added to sugar and water to make a potentially fatal cocktail. It was also serenaded on record by Bracey, Willie Lofton, the Mississippi Sheiks, Sloppy Henry, and Keghouse. Knowing Johnson's predilection for the drink, "Canned Heat Blues" becomes a chilling self-epitaph.

Victor never asked Johnson back and it was 1929 before Paramount called him to Grafton, Wisconsin, at Speir's suggestion. Ishmon Bracey, who also recorded at the same sessions, said Johnson was so used to drinking canned heat, he went wild when he was offered whiskey. Reportedly, he became so drunk that he ruined nearly every take and kept hitting bad notes so Bracey claimed he played guitar while Tommy sang (perhaps on rehearsal run-throughs—the few surviving Paramounts seem not to bear this out). But his solo sides were excellent although his vocal approach had descended into a kind of brooding introspection, and his guitar work remained consistently inventive, especially for an alcoholic. Only the sides with the New Orleans Nehi Boys demonstrate a sad clash with Johnson's vocals, Kid Moliere's gas pipe clarinet, and the jazz sounds of the group resulting in a totally incompatible mix. A number of tracks from this session are still missing, although a test of one turned up at auction in 2001, an attempt to sing maudlin ballad "I Want Someone to Love Me."

It was a sad end to Johnson's recording career. Supposedly he received some payment for the Mississippi Sheiks version of "Big Road Blues," which they called "Stop and Listen Blues," but was too drunk to press for his full rights. He traveled the Delta with Bracey until they split over money, and was consistently popular with both black and white audiences. But his drinking got worse and often he couldn't play because of it and his sound became old fashioned. He developed prostate problems and told Bracey he wanted to give up drinking and become a preacher like him. After playing at Ledell's daughter's birthday party, he died quietly, possibly from a heart attack. A 1960s white blues-rock group named themselves Canned Heat after his record. Modern artists who have recorded versions of his songs are Boogie Bill Webb, Bubba Brown, Roosevelt Holts, Houston Stackhouse, Shirley Griffiths, John Dudley, K. C. Douglas, Robert Nighthawk and many more.

DAVID HARRISON

JOHNSON, TOMMY

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern

Calt, Stephen, and Wardlow, Gayle. King of the Delta Blues: The Life and Music of Charlie Patton. Newton, NJ: Rock Chapel Press, 1988.

Evans, David. Tommy Johnson. London: Studio Vista, 1971.
Wardlow, Gayle Dean. Chasin' That Devil's Music: Searching for the Blues. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

Discography: AMG; DGR

See also Bracey, Ishmon; Patton, Charley

JOHNSON, WALLACE

b. 8 October 1937; LA

Soul-blues singer based in New Orleans. From 1962 through 1972 he recorded twelve 45-rpm singles with producer Allen Toussaint. For the following twenty years, he worked as a longshoreman and as owner of Mr. J's club in Thibodaux, Louisiana. He returned to performing in 1993, and he resumed recording with Toussaint in 1995.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

JOHNSON, WILLIE LEE

b. 4 March 1923; Lake Cormorant, MS

d. 26 February 1995; Chicago, IL

Innovative guitarist Willie Johnson played on many of Howlin' Wolf's classic 1950s hits. He drifted into obscurity after Wolf fired him for fighting, but his molten, distorted tone greatly influenced blues guitarists from the 1950s on.

JAMES SEGREST

Bibliography

Harris

Brisbin, John Anthony. "Howlin' Wolf's Early Guitarists: Willie Johnson." Living Blues no. 124 (November/December 1995): 40–49.

JOLIET

Record label (California, 1971–1977). Owner: Bruce M. Bromberg ("David Amy") (b. 31 October 1941; Chicago, IL). This Los Angeles, California-based labels' artists include Prince Dixon, Johnny Fuller, Ted Hawkins ("Watch Your Step," with Phillip Walker), Lightnin' Hopkins ("Please Settle in Vietnam"), Bee Houston, John Littlejohn ("Dream"), Lonesome Sundown (Cornelius Green) (with Phillip Walker), Johnny Shines ("Skull and Crossbone Blues"), and Phillip Walker ("Laughin' and Clownin'"). Sessions during this period were sometimes produced with Dennis Walker, and were also issued on Advent (Johnny Shines), Alligator (Lonesome Sundown), Arhoolie (Bee Houston), Bluesmaker (Johnny Fuller), Playboy (Phillip Walker), Rounder (Ted Hawkins, Phillip Walker), and Vault Records (Lightnin' Hopkins).

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

Ellis, Ray. "A Good Influence: The Bromberg and Walker Story." Blues & Rhythm no. 76 (February 1993); no. 77 (March 1993).

Discography: McGrath

JONES, ALBENNIE

b. 29 November 1914; Gulfport, MS

d. 24 June 1989; Bronx, NY

First name sometimes shown as "Albinia." Jones was raised in Gulfport, Mississippi, but by 1932 had moved to New York City. She was a popular singer in Harlem clubs in the 1940s, and she worked comfortably and recorded with various urban blues and jazz musicians. A fall onstage in the early 1950s slowed her career, and not long afterward she retired from music. She died of leukemia.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Harris, Sheldon. "Albennie Jones" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 92 (July/August 1990): 47–48.

Discography: Lord; LSFP

JONES, ANDREW "JUNIOR BOY"

b. 16 October 1948; Dallas, TX

Son of a renowned jazz singer, Andrew Jones played the guitar in the bands of Freddy King, a friend of his mother, Bobby Patterson, Johnnie Taylor, and Charlie Musselwhite. His precise, concise, and efficient single-string Texas guitar style is matched by his sensitive vocals as featured in his own albums that he has lately been able to record.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Schuller, Tim. "Andrew Junior Boy Jones." Living Blues no. 129 (September–October 1996): 48.

Discography: AMG

Watch What You Say (1999, Bullseye Blues 9602).
Mister Domestic (2002, Galexc Records GLXC 7001).

JONES, BESSIE

b. Mary Elizabeth Jones, 8 February 1902; Smithville, GA
d. 4 September 1984; Brunswick, GA

Guiding member of the Georgia Sea Island Singers. Although she rarely sang blues, with her contralto voice she led the singers in traditional African American spirituals, children's songs, and slave songs.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
Jones, Bessie, with John Stewart. For the Ancestors: Autobiographical Memoirs. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1989.

Discography: LSFP

JONES, BIRMINGHAM

b. Wright Birmingham, 9 January 1937; Saginaw, MI
Harmonica player, saxophonist, guitarist active in Chicago. Played saxophone and guitar as sideman to J. B. Lenoir and Elmore James in the 1950s. Switching to harmonica in the mid-1950s, he has performed in the style of Little Walter.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

JONES, CALVIN "FUZZY"

b. 9 June 1926; Greenwood, MS

Guitarist and bass guitarist. Initially he began learning blues on harmonica at age nine or ten, but he soon switched to guitar. He moved to Chicago in 1947 and continued learning blues guitar from records. In the late 1940s he performed with Harmonica Slim, then led his own weekend bands while holding a weekday job at a plating shop. Upon getting laid off in the mid-1960s, he turned to music full time, performing bass for Howlin' Wolf through 1968, and shortly afterward for Fenton Robinson.

From 1971 through 1980 he was bassist for Muddy Waters, for whom he and drummer Willie "Big Eyes" Smith were the driving rhythm section. In 1980, Jones, Smith, harmonica player Jerry Portnoy, and pianist Pinetop Perkins left Waters to form the Legendary Blues Band. Upon Perkins's departure in 1984, Jones and Smith maintained the band with new musicians.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Tidwell, Emily. "Going Back to Where I Had Been: Calvin Jones and Willie Smith." Living Blues no. 99 (September/October 1991): 18–21.

JONES, CARL

b. 9 June 1913; Waxahachie, TX
d. 24 September 1985; Chicago, IL

Blues record company executive of the 1950s and 1960s. Jones moved to Chicago in 1937. He recorded for Mercury as a singer in 1945. He formed C.J. Records in 1955, and within a few years added the Firma and Colt subsidiary imprints. Notable blues performers on his labels were Little Mack Simmons, Slim Willis, Earl Hooker, Homesick James, Detroit Junior, and Betty Everett (with whom he recorded a duet). Jones was the first to record Hound Dog Taylor. In 1960, he had some local success with Bobby Saxton's "Trying to Earn a Living." Jones continued the label until his death, but in its last years the label was virtually moribund. He earned his living tending bar in the famed South Side blues club, Theresa's.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Baker, Cary. "Carl Jones—Surviving Chicago Blues Indie: The C.J. Records Story." Goldmine (March 1982).

JONES, CASEY

b. 26 July 1939; Nitta Yuma, MS

One of Chicago's top blues drummers in his prime, Casey Jones stepped out from behind the drum kit to embark on a career as a standup vocalist after he began to record his own blues albums in the 1980s and 1990s. Jones, whose first experience as a drummer came with a high school marching band in Greenville, Mississippi, got his first job with Otis Luke and the Rhythm Bombers not long after arriving in Chicago in 1956. During the 1960s he worked the Chicago clubs with Otis Rush, Freddie King, Howlin' Wolf, Koko Taylor, and other blues, R&B, funk, and soul acts, singing blues and Little Richard tunes on occasion. He played drums on sessions with Rush, Muddy Waters, Earl Hooker, Mighty Joe Young, Ricky Allen, McKinley Mitchell, and others.

In 1978 a band led by Jones and bassist Aron Burton was recruited to record and tour with Albert Collins as the Icebreakers. Jones stayed with Collins for six and a half years, and became a regular studio drummer for Alligator Records as well, recording not only with Collins but with Johnny Winter, Lonnie Brooks, and others, and with Rooster Blues artists Eddy Clearwater, Valerie Wellington, and Johnny Littlejohn. Jones was also a partner and coproducer with A. C. Reed, a fellow Icebreakers alum, in the Ice Cube label. His first recordings as a singer were R&B efforts released on the Mod-Art, EPI, and Ronn labels, and his own Airwax company. He switched to a more straight-ahead blues format for an LP on Rooster Blues in 1987 and three further releases on Airwax in the 1990s as he continued to promote his career as a blues singer in the Chicago clubs.

JIM O'NEAL

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Santelli Trageser, Jim. "What to Play and When to Play: Casey Jones." Living Blues no. 96 (March/April 1991): 43–45.
Zeldin, Beverly. Liner notes for Solid Blue (1987, Rooster Blues Records).

Discography: AMG

JONES, CLARENCE M.

b. 1889; Wilmington, OH
d. 1 June 1949; New York

Pianist/composer. A fine jazz pianist, he provided superb accompaniments on record for Monette

Moore ("Best Friend Blues," 1923, Paramount 12034) and Laura Smith ("Lonesome Refugee"/"The Mississippi Blues," 1927, Victor 20775). He joined the staff of Clarence Williams music publishers in 1932 and organized the Southernaires vocal group from 1933.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Kennedy, Rick. "Clarence M. Jones (1889–1949), Almost Forgotten (But Not Quite)." 78 Quarterly no. 9 (1995): 37.

JONES, CURTIS

b. 18 August 1906; Naples, TX
d. 11 September 1971; Munich, Germany

Blues and boogie-woogie pianist who made his biggest impact in the 1930s. Jones's first musical instrument was the guitar, but during the 1920s he switched to piano and began performing in clubs in Dallas. By the early 1930s, Jones was playing clubs and house parties in Kansas City, Kansas. He moved to Chicago in 1936. Not long afterward he made his first recording session, for Vocalion Records, yielding one of his most successful records, "Lonesome Bedroom Blues." From 1937 through 1939 Jones recorded some sixty sides for Vocalion. Following one session with Victor's Blue Bird imprint in 1940, Jones recorded some twenty-five sides for the revived OKeh label during 1940–1941. His last session for OKeh produced what has become a standard in the blues world, "Tin Pan Alley."

Jones was not given another opportunity to record until 1953, when Al Benson recorded a session on him for his Parrot label. One outstanding single, "Cool Playing Blues" b/w "Wrong Blues," was released, but further numbers that Jones cut remained in the vaults until Relic issued them in 1989. In the 1960s, when an LP market developed for white blues fans, Jones cut at least four albums, notably Trouble Blues (1960) for Bluesville and Lonesome Bedroom Blues (1962) for Delmark. After moving to Europe in 1962, he recorded another two albums in London.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)
Koester, Bob. Liner notes for Curtis Jones: Lonesome Bedroom Blues (1999, Delmark DD-605).

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSPF

JONES, DENNIS “LITTLE HAT”

Flourished 1929–1930, San Antonio, TX

Street singer and guitarist. His OKeh label records from 1929 and 1930 show him to be adept at finger-picking and executing boogie bass runs. He also provided guitar accompaniment to a Texas Alexander recording session.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli
Tilling, Robert. “Long Gone and Got Away Lucky.” Blues & Rhythm no. 135 (Christmas 1998): 4–8.

Discography: DGR

JONES, EDDIE “ONE-STRING”

Eddie Jones was recorded on the streets of Los Angeles in 1960 by folklorist Fredrick A. Usher. He accompanied himself on a homemade one-string instrument beating a steady rhythm under his singing and playing electrifying slide breaks between his vocal lines. He was thought to have been from the Memphis area.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

Evans, David. “Afro-American One-String Instruments.” In Afro-American Folk Art and Craft, edited by William Ferris, pp. 181–196. Jackson and London: University Press of Mississippi, 1983.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Diddley Bow

JONES, FLOYD

b. 21 July 1917; Marianna, AR
d. 19 December 1989; Chicago, IL

Singer/guitarist Floyd Jones grew up in the northern region of the Mississippi Delta, and often caught performances by Charley Patton and Tommy Johnson as a boy. Around 1930, Jones started playing the guitar, after graduating from a homemade instrument consisting of bailing wire nailed to a wall. He left home after his mother died in 1933, and spent the next ten years performing and hobnobbing throughout the region, often partnering himself with Howlin’ Wolf. In 1945, Jones settled in Chicago and began performing on Maxwell Street for tips. He soon teamed up with fellow Maxwell Street musicians Snooky Pryor and cousin Moody Jones and together they played an active role in shaping the tough, new postwar Chicago blues sound that was emerging from the bustling street.

Throughout the late 1940s and early 1950s, Jones recorded over a dozen songs for Marvel, JOB, Chess, and Vee-Jay, including the Chicago blues classics “Stockyard Blues,” “Hard Times,” and “Dark Road.” His powerful but somber writing style dealt mainly with social and economic hardships, such as poverty, disenchantment, and unemployment. Jones also appeared on recordings throughout the 1950s by Eddie Taylor, Little Willie Foster, and Sunnyland Slim, and continued to play in clubs and on Maxwell Street into the 1970s, often with Big Walter Horton. In 1966, he shared an album with Taylor for Testament and later appeared on the 1980 reunion album Old Friends for Earwig. Jones rarely performed in his later years due to poor health and died of heart failure at the age of seventy-two.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Herzhaft; Santelli
O’Brien, Justin. “The Dark Road of Floyd Jones” [part 1]. Living Blues no. 58 (Winter 1983): 4–13; [part 2]. Living Blues no. 59 (Spring 1994): 6–15.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Floyd Jones–Eddie Taylor: Masters of Modern Blues (1994, Testament CD 5001).
Various artists. Chicago Down Home Blues, Vol. 1 (1999, ABM ABMMCD 1064).

JONES, JAMES “MIDDLE WALTER”

b. 16 July 1935; Augusta, AR
d. 1 November 1986; Gary, IN

Harmonica player active in Chicago, Illinois, and Gary, Indiana, from the mid-1950s until his death. The nickname “Middle Walter” was given to him by Johnny Littlejohn, between “Big” Walter Horton and “Little” Walter Jacobs. Jones began playing bass in the mid-1970s when a lung ailment appeared. His last two years were as a member of the Kinsey Report.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

O’Neal, Jim. “James ‘Middle Walter’ Jones” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 74 (1987): 35.

JONES, JOE

JONES, JOE

b. 12 August 1926; New Orleans, LA

Singer, composer, arranger, producer. Joe Jones enjoyed a national hit with “You Talk Too Much” for Roulette Records in 1960, turned to producing with the Dixie Cups and other acts, and remains active as a composer and artists’ manager. He has worked with the Dixie Cups, Harold Battiste, Clarence Carter, Leo Nocentelli, and Derek Shezbie.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Larkin

Broven, John. “Behind the Western Sun. 2: Joe Jones.” Blues Unlimited no. 117 (January/February 1976): 12–15.

Discography

“You Talk Too Much” (1960, Roulette).

JONES, “LITTLE” JOHNNY

b. 1 November 1924; Jackson, MS

d. 19 November 1964; Chicago, IL

Johnny (sometimes spelled “Johnnie”) Jones was born in Hinds County, Jackson, Mississippi, on November 1, 1924, one of three children. Both parents were musicians; his mother Mary played piano in church and his father George was a guitarist and harmonica player. His younger cousin was pianist Otis Spann, and together they played house parties in the Jackson area in the late 1930s and early 1940s. Jones moved to Chicago in 1946 and befriended “Big Maceo” Merriweather, a popular pianist and recording artist, who became his greatest influence. Maceo suffered a stroke the same year, giving Jones the opportunity to take over the piano chair with Tampa Red, Maceo’s regular partner and the most popular Chicago blues artist at the time. Between 1949 and 1953, Jones and Tampa Red recorded a number of sides together, including “But I Forgive You” and “Sweet Little Angel.”

Jones also recorded with Muddy Waters in 1950, and in 1951 formed a regular band with slide guitarist Elmore James, from Canton, Mississippi. This band, with J. T. Brown on tenor and Odie Payne, Jr., on drums, played five nights a week at Sylvio’s on Chicago’s West Side, until 1957. They also recorded more than forty sides, including the classics “The Sky Is Crying,” “Crossroads,” “It Hurts Me Too,” and “I Can’t Hold Out.” Jones and James also backed Joe Turner on the 1955 hit “TV Mama.” In 1957 Jones formed a band with Magic Sam and Syl Johnson on guitars and S. P. Leary on drums, which had a residency at the Tay May Club in Chicago. After Sam was drafted, Jones freelanced, performing and recording with Howlin’ Wolf and Eddie Taylor. The collaboration with Wolf produced “Down in the Bottom” and “The Red Rooster” among others. From 1960 he began to have health problems and he died of lung cancer on November 19, 1964.

Although principally known as a sideman, Jones was a fine vocalist with a warm tenor voice, and did make a few recordings under his own name, of which the best known are “Big Town Playboy” and “Shelby County Blues.” An excellent shuffle boogie player, he was possibly the last truly two-handed blues pianist, switching between eight-to-the-bar and a heavy stride bass in tenths for a slow blues. Jones was a seminal figure in the rise to popularity of modern Chicago blues and, in addition to those mentioned, his deft, rolling piano work can also be heard on recordings by Jimmy Reed and J. B. Hutto.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Eagle, Bob. “Big Town Playboy: Johnnie Jones.” Living Blues no. 12 (Spring 1973): 28–29.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

JONES, LITTLE SONNY

b. Johnny Jones, 15 April 1931; New Orleans, LA

d. 17 December 1989; New Orleans, LA

New Orleans singer who had received his nickname “Little Sonny” from Fats Domino. He made records for Specialty and Imperial in 1952 and 1953. Until his death he was a local fan favorite, especially at the annual New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festivals.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Johnson, Matthew. “Johnny ‘Little Sonny’ Jones” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 92 (July/August 1990): 46.

Discography: LSFP

JONES, MAGGIE

b. Fae Barnes, 1900; Hillsboro, TX

Singer in black theater and clubs in New York City and Dallas/Fort Worth area in the 1920s and 1930s. Notable among her recordings are those made in several 1924 Columbia label sessions with cornetist Louis Armstrong and pianist Fletcher Henderson. Activity after 1934 unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGRJONES, MAX

b. Ronald Maxwell Jones, 28 February 1917; Bushey, Hertfordshire, England
d. 2 August 1993; Chichester, Sussex, England

For almost forty years (1944–1982) Jones fought the cause of jazz and blues in the English weekly music paper Melody Maker, interviewing and writing about visiting musicians and reviewing their records. Earlier he edited, with Albert McCarthy, the wartime magazine Jazz Music. His books include Louis: The Louis Armstrong Story 1900–1971 (with John Chilton; London: Studio Vista, 1971) and Talking Jazz (Basingstoke, Hampshire: Macmillan, 1987).

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

New Grove Jazz

JONES, MOODY

b. 8 April 1908; Earle, AR
d. 23 March 1988; Chicago, IL

Guitarist Jones joined his cousin Floyd Jones and Snooky Pryor around 1946 on Maxwell Street. His “Telephone Blues” and “Snooky and Moody’s Boogie” (the inspiration for Little Walter’s “Juke”), released on Old Swingmaster (1949), were among the first postwar Chicago blues recordings with a modern sound. He later recorded at least three additional tracks and accompanied Floyd Jones on his classic “Stockyard Blues.” Also worked and recorded with John Brim, Sunnyland Slim, and Johnny Shines.

Although he was considered by contemporaries to be the best guitarist on the Chicago scene, Jones quit music in the 1950s to preach.

JUSTIN O’BRIEN

Bibliography

Larkin
Rowe, Mike. “The Old Swingmasters: Moody Jones.” Blues Unlimited nos. 137/138 (Spring 1980): 4.

Discography: LSFPJONES, PAUL “WINE”

b. 1946; Flora, MS

Learned guitar from his father. Jones worked as a cotton laborer through 1971, then as a welder in Belzoni, Mississippi. Since 1995 he has been a Fat Possum label and touring artist, performing electric guitar with a drummer.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Gray, Stanfield. “Playin’ and Drinkin’ with Paul ‘Wine’ Jones.” Living Blues no. 132 (March/April 1997): 44–45.

Discography: AMGJONES, TUTU

b. John Jones, Jr., 9 September 1967; Dallas, TX

Singer, guitarist. The son of Dallas R&B guitarist John Jones grew up in a musical family that also included two uncles who were active on the local blues scene. As a teenager Jones worked as a drummer, first with lesser known locals and then with Texas soul singer Z. Z. Hill and Mississippi bluesman R. L. Burnside, but his goal was always to be in the spotlight. After working, both on stage and in the studio, with U. P. Wilson, Jones made his solo debut in 1994 with I’m for Real and followed it with Blue Texas Soul in 1996 and Staying Power in 1998.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Larkin
Schuller, Tim. “Tutu Jones.” Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 39–41.

Discography: AMG

JONES, WILLIE

JONES, WILLIE

b. William Martin Jones, 21 February 1920; Vicksburg, MS
d. 31 December 1977; Chicago, IL

Chicago jazz pianist and session musician of the post-World War II era. Beginning in 1945, Jones regularly played Chicago jazz clubs heading his own combo and worked as a backing musician on jazz, blues, and R&B recording dates. Jones played in a fast locked-hand style, with frequent dissonances. His one recording date under his own name, for Vee-Jay in 1954, was with his band associates—Betty Dupree (bass) and Earl Phillips (drums). His last session work was in the early 1970s, accompanying tenor sax player Tommy “Mad Man” Jones (no relation).

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Campbell, Robert L., Armin Büttner, and Robert Pruter. “The Willie Jones Discography.” Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/wiljo.html> (accessed May 21, 2004).

Discography: LSFP

JOPLIN, JANIS

b. 19 January 1943; Port Arthur, TX
d. 4 October 1970; Los Angeles, CA

Singer. Her career barely spanned five years and her biggest hit was posthumous, but the self-described “boozy blues broad” still managed to become a beloved counterculture icon and an enduring influence on almost all female vocalists who followed her.

Joplin performed folk-blues material in bars and coffee houses around her hometown before moving to Austin, Texas, to attend college. But she spent more time at Threadgill’s folk music hot spot than in class and ultimately relocated to San Francisco in 1966, joining the rock group Big Brother & the Holding Company. Her electrifying rendition of Big Mama Thornton’s “Ball & Chain” at the 1967 Monterey Pop Festival turned the media spotlight on the band and its second album, Cheap Thrills, capitalized fully on the attention by topping the charts in 1968.

Joplin’s first solo album, I Got Dem Ol’ Kozmic Blues Again Mama!, was recorded with the Kozmic Blues Band and she toured widely, playing festival dates throughout North America. She assembled an all-star backing unit, the horn-powered Full Tilt Boogie Band, for her final album, Pearl, but Joplin died, at age twenty-seven, before the album’s release, overdosing on heroin in a Hollywood hotel in October 1970. “Me and Bobby McGee” became a posthumous number one single in 1971.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Echols, Alice. Scars of Sweet Paradise: The Life and Times of Janis Joplin. New York: Metropolitan Books, 1999.

JORDAN, CHARLEY

b. ca. 1890; Mabelvale (Mabelville), AR
d. 15 November 1954; St. Louis, MO

Charley Jordan was a blues guitarist who recorded from 1939 to 1937, at a time when most artists had no recording opportunities because of the Depression. His closest partner was Peetie Wheatstraw, and their guitar-piano combination was one of the most successful ones of the 1930s. Jordan walked on crutches because of a spine injury incurred during a bootlegging shooting incident in 1928.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn); Harris; Santelli
Klatzko, Bernard. “‘Conspiracy’ Against Charley Jordan.” 78 Quarterly no. 1 (Autumn 1967): 39–41.

Discography: DGR

JORDAN, LOUIS

b. 8 July 1908; Brinkley, AR
d. 4 February 1975; Los Angeles, CA

Saxophonist, singer, and bandleader. The most successful black entertainer of the 1940s, and one of the few to cross over from so-called “Race” hits to the mainstream charts and white record buyers. His jump-blues recordings were an important precursor in the development of rock ‘n’ roll, although the arrival of that phenomenon finally ended his run as a major star.

His father was a musician and music teacher, and taught him to play clarinet and later saxophone (he was one of many musicians initially seduced by the look of the shiny curves of the instrument in a music store window, rather than its sound). He played a summer residence with bandleader Junie

Publicity photo of Louis Jordan. (Image courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Bug Williams while still in high school, and also performed with Fat Chappelle's Rabbit Foot Minstrels while in college in Little Rock, Arkansas.

He had mastered all of the saxophones by the time he left college, but his first-choice instrument was the alto saxophone. He played with a local band led by Jimmy Pryor, then moved to New York in 1929. He made his recording debut with the Jungle Band, a group of sidemen from the Chick Webb Orchestra. He returned to Little Rock for a time, then moved to Philadelphia, where he worked with Charlie Gaines, and was part of a band backing Louis Armstrong on a recording in 1932.

He worked with tuba player Jim Winter and Gaines, then recorded with Clarence Williams in 1934, which included his debut as a singer on record. He returned to New York and worked with drummer Kaiser Marshall, then joined Chick Webb's band in 1936, where he replaced Edgar Sampson. Webb's band was flying high at the Savoy Ballroom, and featured a stellar lineup, including Ella Fitzgerald (Jordan later recorded a duet with Ella, and also with Bing Crosby). Jordan handled introductions as well as playing, and the exposure helped raise his own profile.

He remained with the band until 1938, and recorded many sides with them. Although he later said he loved playing and singing the blues with the band, he left the group in order to form his own small band, a radical step at that time, when the big bands ruled the roost. Jordan's instinct proved sound, and the small group setting allowed him to exercise not only his talents as a musician and singer, but also his passion for showmanship and entertainment (he billed himself later as "Mr. Personality").

His first band went under the name of the Elk's Rendezvous Band, but he soon changed the name to Louis Jordan and His Tympany Five (although the band had no timpani and usually at least six members). The band boasted many fine players in the following decade, when Jordan achieved an unprecedented level of popularity for a black musician in America.

His style was based on a jump-blues formula, and his repertoire contained many novelty songs that proved hugely popular. The band built a following in a residence at the Capitol Lounge in Chicago, and then developed their familiar routines in Cedar Rapids, Iowa. The material and routines they worked up in the Midwest proved a sensation when they returned to Chicago, and Jordan's rise to stardom was under way. His first big seller was a blues, "I'm Gonna Move to the Outskirts of Town." It was the first of many hits for Decca, who transferred him to their newly launched Sepia Series in 1941, aimed at a white as well as black marketplace. The band took off, and Jordan became known as the "King of the Jukeboxes" as they racked up a succession of cross-over hits in the 1940s, which included perennially popular items like "Five Guys Named Moe," "Caldonia Boogie," "Choo Choo Ch'Boogie," "Beware," "Let the Good Times Roll," "Ain't Nobody Here But Us Chickens," "Reet, Petite and Gone," "Saturday Night Fish Fry," and many more. "Is You Is or Is You Ain't My Baby?" achieved the unique distinction of reaching number one on the country and western charts in 1944, the only black artist to do so until the arrival of Charley Pride two decades later.

Jordan and his band were featured in a number of films based around his songs, which have been seen as a forerunner of music videos. They included Five Guys Named Moe (1942), Ration Blues (1944), Caldonia (1945), Beware (1946), Reet, Petite and Gone (1947), and Look Out, Sister (1948).

He circumvented potential race problems at his concerts by arranging double dates, playing once for a black audience, and separately for a white one. Changing musical fashions began to erode his unchallenged supremacy in the charts by the end of the 1940s. Like his first, his last significant hit was a blues, “Weak Minded Blues” in 1951. He recorded again with Louis Armstrong in 1950, this time with equal billing, and put together a fourteen-piece big band in 1951, but it was a short-lived experiment.

His long association with Decca ended in 1952, and he went on to record for Aladdin and various other labels. His discs for Mercury in the mid-1950s featured some excellent jazz performances, a reminder that he was a very fine saxophonist as well as a great populist entertainer. He also recorded for Ray Charles’s Tangerine label in 1962. His music was highly influential in the development of rock ‘n’ roll. Bill Haley was a great admirer, and frequently acknowledged his debt to Jordan’s example, as did Ray Charles, Chuck Berry, B. B. King, and diverse other artists. Ironically, Jordan himself was unable to capitalize on the new craze, although his 1957 release on RCA, Rock ‘N’ Roll Call, was an attempt to remake some of his famous hits in the new style. He never recaptured anything like the same level of success, but continued to perform on the cabaret and cocktail lounge circuit, and to make the occasional album until his death from a heart attack in 1974.

His popularity has led critics to undervalue his work, but his popularity at the time of his greatest success was unarguable. His music proved to have staying power as well, and furnished the material for a very successful stage musical, Five Guys Named Moe, in 1990.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 Ake, David. “Jazz Historiography and the Problem of Louis Jordan.” In Jazz Cultures. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2002.
 Chilton, John. Let the Good Times Roll: The Story of Louis Jordan and His Music. London: Quartet, 1992.
 Garrod, Charles. Louis Jordan and His Orchestra (Discography). Zephyrhills: Joyce Record Club, 1994.
 Milkowski, Bill. Swing It: An Annotated History of Jive. New York: Billboard Books, 2001.
 Shaw, Arnold. Honkers and Shouters: The Golden Years of Rhythm and Blues. New York: Macmillan, 1978.

Discography: AMG; Lord; LSFP

Selected Recordings

“Honey in the Bee Ball” (1938, Decca 7556); “At the Swing Cat’s Ball” (1939, Decca 7609); “Doug the Jitterbug” (1939, Decca 7590); “You Run Your Mouth and I’ll Run My Business” (1939, Decca 7705); “A Chicken Ain’t Nothing But a Bird” (1940, Decca 8501); “I’m Gonna Move to the Outskirts of Town” (1941, Decca 8593); “Saxa-Woogie” (1941, Decca 8560); “I’m Gonna Leave You on the Outskirts of Town” (1942, Decca 8638); “Five Guys Named Moe” (1942, Decca 8653); “What’s the Use of Getting Sober (When You Gonna Get Drunk Again)”/“The Chicks I Pick Are Slender, Tender and Tall” (1942, Decca 8645); “Is You Is or Is You Ain’t My Baby?” (1943, Decca 8659); “Ration Blues” (1943, Decca 8654); “G. I. Jive” (1944, Decca 8659); “Mop Mop” (1944, Decca 8668); “Buzz Me” (1945, Decca 18734); “Caldonia Boogie” (1945, Decca 8670); “Salt Pork, West Virginia” (1945, Decca 18762); “Ain’t Nobody Here But Us Chickens”/“Let the Good Times Roll” (1946, Decca 23741); “Ain’t That Just Like a Woman” (1946, Decca 23669); “Beware” (1946, Decca 18818); “Choo Choo Ch’Boogie” (1946, Decca 23610); “Reet, Petite and Gone” (1946, Decca 24381); “Boogie Woogie Blue Plate” (1947, Decca 24108); “Open the Door, Richard” (1947, Decca 23841); “You’re Much Too Fat (and That’s That)” (1947, Decca 28444); “Beans and Cornbread” (1949, Decca 24673); “Cole Slaw” (1949, Decca 24633); “Saturday Night Fish Fry” (1949, Decca 24725); “Blue Light Boogie” (1950, Decca 27114); “Fat Sam from Birmingham” (1951, Decca 28983); “Weak Minded Blues” (1951, Decca 27547); “I Gotta Move” (1954, Decca 29880); “Dad Gum Ya Hide Boy”/“Whiskey Do Your Stuff” (1954, Aladdin 3223); “Gotta Go” (1954, Aladdin 3295); “Louis’ Blues” (1954, Aladdin 3249); Rock ‘N’ Roll Call (1956, RCA 66145); Somebody Up There Digs Me (1956, Mercury MG20242); Man, We’re Wailing (1957, Mercury MG20331); Hallelujah, Louis Jordan Is Back (1964, Tangerine 1503).

JORDAN, LUKE

b. 28 January 1892; Appomattox County, VA
 d. 25 June 1952; West Lynchburg, VA

Singer and guitarist based in Lynchburg, Virginia. His records, sporadically released after their 1927–1929 recording sessions, are today collector’s items. Much of his recorded repertoire was likely from vaudeville. His “Cocaine Blues” was rerecorded by white performer Dick Justice in 1929.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
 Kent, Don. “First and Last Days in Lynchburg: A Last Look at Lynchburg Luke.” 78 Quarterly no. 7 (1992): 71–78.

Discography: DGR

JOSEPH, PLEASANT

(See Cousin Joe)

JSP

Record label of John Stedman (Promotions), London, England, which commenced operations in 1978 as an adjunct to his activities as a concert and club promoter. Recordings by artists who visited Britain under his auspices have figured largely in the catalog, including Louisiana Red (1978), Professor Longhair (1978), Jimmy Rogers (1979), Jimmy Witherspoon (1981), Fernest Arceneaux (1981), Jimmy Dawkins (1985), and Hubert Sumlin (1989), along with albums by European residents Johnny Mars and Eddie C. Campbell and by visiting artists whose styles overlapped jazz and blues such as Gene “Mighty Flea” Connors, Hal Singer, and Jay McShann. Progressively the label became independent of the promotions, producing recording sessions in the United States. Buddy Guy was recorded live at the Checkerboard Lounge, Chicago, in October 1979. Further albums followed by Buddy and by Phil Guy, who was recorded in both Chicago and Britain, as were Carey and Lurrie Bell (1987–1988).

In the 1990s, the label launched the recording careers of several significant new artists, among them Guitar Shorty (1990), Larry Garner (1990), Tutu Jones (1993), and Ike Cosse (1997). Into the twenty-first century, JSP has produced chronologically organized box set reissues of vintage jazz and blues in superior sonic quality, including sets by Blind Lemon Jefferson, Charley Patton, and Blind Willie McTell, but has not neglected contemporary blues with noteworthy albums by Joe Louis Walker (2001 and 2002) and a project to market new artists “direct to midprice,” launched with sessions by Lil’ Dave Thompson and Lisa Bourne.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

JSP website, <http://www.jsprecords.com/> (accessed December 11, 2004).

JUBILEE/JOSIE/IT’S A NATURAL

Herb Abramson and Ahmet Ertegun founded Jubilee Records in 1946. A year later, the two created Atlantic Records and sold Jubilee to Jerry Blaine, who ran the label out of New York City until 1970. Jubilee excelled as an independent rhythm and blues label, finding early success with the Orioles. Often regarded as the first rhythm and blues vocal group, the Orioles originally appeared on Blaine’s short-lived “It’s a Natural” label in 1948, but, evidently after complaints that the label’s name was too close to National Records, they were moved onto Jubilee. In 1954, Blaine founded the subsidiary label Josie (JOZ), which had hits with rock ’n’ roll groups such as the Cadillacs and Bobby Freeman. Other notable rhythm and blues or blues-related artists who recorded with Jubilee or its subsidiaries include Memphis Slim, Carol Fran, and Dorothy Donegan. Selected Jubilee recordings have been rereleased on the British label, Sequel Records.

STEVEN GALBRAITH

Bibliography

Larkin (under “Abramson, Herb” and “Ertegun, Ahmet”); McGrath

Callahan, Mike. “Jubilee/Josie/Gross Album Discographies.” Both Sides Now website (November 6, 1997), <http://www.bsnpubs.com/jubjosie.html> (accessed October 7, 2004).

Johnson, John A. Big Heat Heat: Alan Freed and the Early Years of Rock & Roll. New York: Schirmer Books, 1991.

“Jerry Blaine.” Variety (March 14, 1973): 71.

“Orioles.” In Encyclopedia of Rhythm & Blues and Doo-Wop Vocal Groups, edited by Mitch Rosalsky. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 2000.

JUG

The use of the jug as a musical instrument is rooted in the long African American tradition of transforming everyday objects into makeshift musical instruments (see also the Rubboard and Spoons entries). To play the jug, the musician blows across the mouth of the instrument, which acts as resonator for the sound. Generally, the player also vibrates his or her lips to produce a buzzing sound, tightening and loosening the lips in order to produce different pitches; another technique involves the vocalization of pitches while blowing. Jug players have usually played earthenware jugs, though glass and metal jugs, oil cans, lengths of pipe, and bottles have also been utilized to achieve the same effect. The instrument has primarily been associated with the ensemble called the jug band, in which it typically functions as a bass instrument (playing a similar role to that of the tuba in early jazz bands). Other instruments commonly employed in jug bands have included the harmonica, kazoo, guitar, fiddle, mandolin, banjo, various percussion instruments, and even horns.

While there is evidence that jugs were used as folk instruments in several parts of the southern United States during the nineteenth century, scholars have generally traced the jug band’s origins to the African American groups that began emerging in Louisville around 1900. The most influential of the Louisville jug bands was the Dixieland Jug Blowers, led by fiddler Clifford Hayes and featuring the celebrated jug playing of Earl McDonald. Their recordings in the mid-1920s inspired the formation of numerous jug bands throughout the country, the most famous of which were organized in Memphis. Overall, the jug band sound in Memphis was characterized by a more rural, blues-oriented style than the heavily jazz-influenced approach of the Louisville jug bands. The most legendary Memphis groups were the Memphis Jug Band (often with Charlie Polk or Jab Jones playing the jug) and Cannon's Jug Stompers (featuring Gus Cannon, who blew into a railroad coal-oil can and played the banjo simultaneously).

In addition to playing blues, jug bands performed popular hits, minstrel songs, and dance tunes, and they were quite popular among whites as well as blacks during the 1920s and 1930s. Later, as the Great Depression drastically diminished record sales and as newer and more urbane musical styles emerged, jug bands became increasingly rare, and the jug virtually disappeared from commercial recordings by the late 1930s. During the folk revival of the 1960s, however, several new jug bands were formed (mostly by young white musicians), largely replicating the style of the Memphis jug bands. Today, a number of such groups still perform in this style.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

- Barlow, William. "Chocolate to the Bone: Urban Blues in the South," "Goin' Down Slow: Urban Blues in the Midwest." In Looking Up at Down: The Emergence of Blues Culture. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989.
- Olsson, Bengt. Memphis Blues and Jug Bands. London: Studio Vista, 1970.

JUKE JOINTS

Juke joints are spatial manifestations of blues culture, having significant presence in African American communities today. In his 1936 case study of Indianola, Mississippi, John Dollard observed that "Negroes experience much less security in their own homes and pursuits than do whites. Physical invasion of Negro privacy is not taken too seriously." During that time, African Americans exercised a system of communicating and moving within the prevailing environment with little or no detection by whites. Even since segregation, juke joints continue to be operated under the same conditions as before.

Juke joints are not permanent structures in a usual sense. They usually inhabit buildings originally built for other purposes, so as a result, no real physical commonality ties these buildings together. Proprietors and patrons reappropriate the available building and transform its space as a juke joint with complex yet subtle gestures. In this sense, the information offered in a juke-joint floor plan has to be supplemented with notes on the seen elements and unseen functions exercised in the actual space.

Drinking serves as a primary activity within a juke joint. In most southern states, juke-joint licenses are purchased at the local town halls for slight fees. Sometimes, though, juke joints operate without these licenses. Proprietors often purchase beer (usually Budweiser, Budweiser Light, and Anheuser-Light Natural Light) by the case at local stores or warehouses, then sell it to patrons by the can. Also, patrons freely bring hard liquor like Crown Royal Canadian whiskey into juke joints, a practice that is not legal but anyway acceptable according to juke-joint practices. It is interesting to note that many juke joints do not generate significant amounts of revenue for the proprietors, who usually keep full-time jobs and operate their juke joints on their own time. In such cases, they simply wish to provide social gathering places for their individual communities, where patrons can listen to blues and have a certain amount of freedom to drink, dance, smoke, and celebrate.

It is not surprising then, that the proprietors maintain very personal involvement with their juke joints and their patrons. Although the specific proprietors discussed later are men, female proprietors are not uncommon. The rules and expectations of conduct are imparted not by signs but mostly through oral understanding. Recognition of frequent customers is important to proprietors. The principle in operating a juke joint is about creating and sustaining a local intimacy, while ensuring a collective anonymity to outsiders.

A kind of escapism associated with the blues may be discerned in the celebratory and figurative décor inside a juke joint. Blues historian Paul Oliver wrote that blues music is a "rich storehouse of the fantasy production" of the lower class African American communities in the South. Juke joints thus have a visual as well as social "function." Participation in such a setting depends on one's knowledge, anticipation, and acceptance of the communal experience on and within its walls.

The events within a juke joint are not extraordinary: drinking, smoking, dancing, and listening to music. The covert nature of juke joints can be viewed by outsiders as protection under a low profile of such illegal activities as prostitution, drug use, and gambling that often occur inside. What seems anonymous to those outsiders is, once inside the juke joint, to the owner and patrons an intimate, even communal experience based on recognition of faces. Therefore juke joints are interactive, combining individual people, groups, physical space, music, and dancing, toward moving and blurring the boundaries between the tangible and the ephemeral. What occurs in a particular juke joint relies greatly on how people act within it. What follows are several individual examples.

Eddie Mae's Cafe, a juke in Helena, Arkansas, was home to musician Frank Frost (1936–1999). (Photo by Gene Tomko)

J. J.'s (Clarksdale, Mississippi)

J. J.'s occupies two former spaces that in the 1940s were The Belmont, a segregated café, and the OK Grocery store. The three front doors to this building are physical reminders of the segregation era. One was used by whites for the OK Grocery (African Americans entered through a back door no longer extant). The other two front doors were the “Whites Only” and “Negroes Only” entrances to the Belmont. J. J. closed the former “Negroes Only” door when he purchased the property in 1991.

With no formal signage designating this building a juke joint, J. J.'s depends on word of mouth for patronage, an indication of the oral dynamic in the local African American community. Nevertheless, the number of people coming to J. J.'s on busy nights sometimes is greater than the space's capacity. As a result the overflow spills out to the sidewalk in front of the building, where these patrons are almost always gathered during peak hours. The entrance functions at such busy times for the owner J. J. as a point of interaction with the patrons, sometimes as a filtering process. This is not to say that the entrance of J. J.'s necessarily operates as a way of turning people away, but rather to remove the initial anonymity among the patrons and the owner. The juke joint literally offers a place where everybody knows each other's name. The quasi-privacy offered at a typical public bar is not extended here. Entering a juke joint without participating in the initial greeting process like that at J. J.'s disrupts the social and oral dynamics of the local culture and would not be tolerated, because the regular patrons sort themselves out through dialogue, interaction, and response.

Poor Monkey's Lounge (Merigold, Mississippi)

The Poor Monkey's Lounge is owned by Willie "Monkey" Seaberry, a sharecropper on the Hiter Farm located in Merigold. Moving to Hiter Farm in 1954 at the age of thirteen, he started his juke joint with his older brother in a former sharecropper's shack located on the farm. In 1963, he moved into his juke joint because, by then, overseeing the juke joint had become his primary activity. This fusion at Monkey's of private home with public juke joint blurs the conventional realms between home and business. Like the former segregated café that now houses J. J.'s juke joint, this reuse of a 1940s sharecropper shack offers a link between the Jim Crow era and the present. Although he has the juke joint open for only a few hours per week, Monkey feels it makes a better home for him than an actual house. Originally the building consisted of only the main room. Since 1963, a poolroom, stage area, kitchen, and bedroom have been added.

Entering Monkey's requires a more intimate knowledge of the local community than J. J.'s. For one, this juke joint is located far enough off the main roads of Merigold that patrons must know its location beforehand. Monkey's fusion of home and juke joint increases the intimacy found between the patrons and proprietors. Like J. J.'s in Clarksdale, Monkey does not turn people away, but he uses the initial welcome into his juke joint to personalize his relationship with every person who crosses inside. Also, the patrons at Monkey's have been going there for many years; indeed, some are fellow Hiter Farm employees who have known Monkey since the 1950s. There is no listing of Monkey's juke joint in any directory, yellow pages, map, or other official guide. To show that his juke is open on a given night, Monkey turns on a single string of Christmas lights.

Junior Kimbrough's (Holly Springs, Mississippi)

Junior Kimbrough's burned in 2000, but in its time it offered a complicated example of the connection between community and space within a juke. Holly Springs lies about thirty miles northwest of the mostly white University of Mississippi in Oxford. For many years, Junior's developed a following of white university students and other Oxford residents who regularly frequented his juke on Sunday nights, which came to be referred to by Junior and his son Kinny (who took over the juke after Junior's 1998 death) as "white nights." According to Kinny, Junior's was open on other weeknights only for the local black community.

Like J. J.'s and Monkey's, Junior's didn't have signs identifying it as a public space. The building was an old store located about eight miles away from the closest commercial business. The attendance of a racially mixed crowd on Sunday nights may have changed the social scope of the juke temporarily, but Junior, Kinny, and the regular patrons maintained control by sharing awareness and oral information among themselves.

Junior's had colorful wall paintings that transformed the physical space into a metaphorical experience. The paintings ranged from abstract to portraiture, and some altered the nature of the space itself. The main walls were covered with floor-to-ceiling paintings of places such as a house settled within a landscape filled with trees, clouds, and water; a forest scene; a huge setting (or perhaps rising) sun on the poolroom wall; palm trees; and mountainscapes. The lintels within the main room had portraits of famous African Americans including Oprah Winfrey, Little Richard, Magic Johnson, and Martin Luther King, Jr. These paintings had been done by a local customer at Junior's request.

Do Drop Inn (Shelby, Mississippi)

The town of Shelby spans about three blocks off of Highway 61, with no major grocery store or restaurant, yet it has at least five jukes that are open at various times. They remain an important, if not altogether visible, piece of the Delta landscape. On most Friday and Saturday nights for the last twenty years, Earnest "Big E." Walker has operated the Do Drop out of an old lumberyard building. A maintenance worker for the town of Shelby during the week, Big E. grew up on a sharecropping farm in the Delta, and for a time he attended elementary school with Monkey. His present juke joint is the latest in a long line he has run throughout his life. He rents the building, and in most months the juke profits just cover the costs of his rent and liquor.

While the Do Drop does have a sign on the front of the building, it is known to patrons and local residents as "Big E.'s." Over the front door, "DO DROP INN” is painted directly on the shingles, and below that, “Big E. Place” [sic] is spray-painted there and again to the right of the front door. Despite these visual signs, Big E. told me his customers know the juke joint is open when they see his truck parked in front.

Shortly after opening at his current location, Big E. renovated part of the kitchen and bars, but the large open space remaining is taken up by the stage and patron areas. The transformation from lumber building to juke joint extends also to the walls. Similar to those at Junior’s, the paintings seen at Big E.’s depict scenes of celebration and, to a certain extent, escapism. They evoke another world within the Do Drop, particularly in the main room painting where the Do Drop Inn with Big E.’s truck floats in a fantasy world, surrounded by palm trees, in a visual promise that this is where paradise may be found. Other paintings show couples dancing, and huge, surreal champagne glasses clinking together, although champagne is never served at a juke. While less abstract than those at Junior’s, these wall depictions enclose the crowd and music in the same way.

Smitty’s Red Top Lounge (Clarksdale, Mississippi)

Smitty’s opened around 1950 on Yazoo Street, only two streets away from J. J.’s. Despite this proximity, patrons of one rarely go to the other. While talking with customers at J. J.’s in 1997, I was told by many that Smitty’s did not have a good crowd and was not where they felt welcome; a few days later Smitty’s regulars told me the same thing about J. J.’s.

Like the Do Drop Inn, Smitty’s consists of a large open area with the bar on one wall and the pool table stationed close to the front door. It also has a professionally made sign over the front door simply reading “Red Top Lounge,” without the “Smitty’s.”

Since it opened in the early 1950s, the Red Top Lounge has been operated successively by three men.

The current proprietor, James Alford, has owned and run it since 1993 and like Monkey he lives in his juke joint. Interestingly, Alford goes by the name Smitty, as did the two previous proprietors. Alford also runs a juke in West Helena, Arkansas, located about thirty minutes east of Clarksdale, where he does not use the name Smitty. The personal nickname “Smitty” belongs to the place Smitty’s. Just as historian Lawrence Levine wrote that no single person owned a blues song, no one person owns Smitty’s or, in a broader sense, designs or defines a juke joint.

JENNIFER NARDONE

Bibliography

Dollard, John. Cast and Class in a Southern Town. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1937.
 Gordon, Katrina Hazzard. Jookin’: The Rise of Social Dance Formation in African American Culture. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.
 Jones, LeRoi. Blues People: The Negro Expression in White America and the Music That Developed from It. New York: Morrow Quill Paperbacks, 1963.
 Levine, Lawrence. Black Culture and Black Consciousness: Afro-American Thought from Slavery to Freedom. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.
 Litwack, Leon. Trouble in Mind: Black Southerners in the Age of Jim Crow. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1998.
 Oliver, Paul. The Meaning of the Blues. Toronto: Collier Books, 1960.

JVB

Detroit label owned by Joe Von Battle in 1948–1959. Subsidiaries were Battle, Gone, Viceroy, and Von. Many of its issues were sermons by Reverend C. L. Franklin, with blues sides by Baby Boy Warren, John Lee Hooker, Calvin Frazier, Eddie Burns, and Washboard Willie.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

K

KANE, CANDYE

b. 13 November 1966; Ventura, CA

Proudly flaunting her past as a former X-rated model and actress, Candye Kane sings blues-based R&B, rock, country, and saloon songs with a larger-than-life persona that reminds one of classic blues singers like Bessie Smith. With a voice strong enough to match her confidence, Kane straddles most American styles with comfort and aplomb.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Stewart Mason)

Cote, M. "Candye Kane Belts Out the Blues with Attitude and the Former Porn Star Knows a Thing About Swing." Blues Revue no. 43 (December 1998): 16–17.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Home Cookin' (1994, Antone's 33).

The Toughest Girl Alive (2000, Rounder 619605).

KANSAS CITY

Kansas City was one of the quintessential music cities of the twentieth century. It gained national recognition with a distinctive sound that blended the blues with an up-tempo swing beat. The music scene peaked from the 1920s until the early 1950s. Charlie "Bird" Parker, Lester Young, Jay McShann, and Big Joe Turner are just a handful of the legends who sprang from the Kansas City area.

Kansas City, historically, was defined by its geographical relationship with the Kansas and Missouri rivers, both of which feed the Mississippi River. With its vast network of railroad lines converging in Kansas City, manufacturing, meatpacking, and other general commerce brought people together from throughout the Midwest region throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Important to the mix was the fact that Kansas City marked the center of the pre-Civil War struggles between slave states and free states. Although Jim Crow laws continued to be upheld either legally or through social mores until the 1960s, Kansas City's overall attitude and spirit enabled a sense of freedom for the African American population.

The other major item influencing the creation of the Kansas City sound was political in nature. Political strongman "Boss Tom" Pendergast, who controlled Kansas City's government and police force from 1920 to 1939 during both Prohibition and the Great Depression, provided a fertile ground where bootlegging, gambling, and prostitution could thrive—as did more than fifty nightclubs and juke joints that filled the city center and red light district.

The Kansas City Sound

Many performers who are considered "Kansas City blues" artists brought their roots and blues traditions from neighboring regional blues music hubs such as

KANSAS CITY

St. Louis, Chicago, Memphis, and Louisville. The most notable local Kansans and Missourians who rose to fame included the legendary saxophonist Charlie Parker, blues shouter Big Joe Turner, and singer/pianist Julie Lee.

The most typical performer of the Kansas City blend of blues and jazz of the 1940s was Jay McShann, who had played local Kansas City blues clubs for decades. His LP Blues from Kansas City captures the spirit and energy of the mixing of the blues with swing and bebop influences from Parker, drummer Gus Johnson, and vocalist Walter Brown.

The mystique and roaring good times of the scene were captured in such titles as “Kansas City Blues” by Jim Jackson, as well as “Kansas City” by Wilbert Harrison, which codified the blues music scene.

Juke Joints

The blues and jazz scenes through the heyday of the 1920s to 1950s centered in the bustling commercial downtown Kansas City area near the river bottoms.

The district between 12th to 18th streets, and from Central to Vine streets was lined with clubs, playing six nights a week to jam-packed crowds. Of the fifty or so blues and jazz clubs in downtown Kansas City, a handful of them provided stages on which blues legends could make their names.

One dynamic duo—owner Felix Payne and manager Thomas “Big Piney” Brown—had success in running two clubs. The Subway Club was a popular bar at the famous corner of 18th and Vine. They also owned and ran The Sunset Club. One of The Sunset Club’s bartenders, “Big Joe” Turner, was widely accepted as the greatest blues singer in Kansas City, with his powerful voice and ability to improvise with the band. His career started by him singing or shouting from the bar to accompany Pete Johnson on piano and Johnson’s supporting band. Turner’s connection to The Sunset Club provided links to other blues and jazz greats such as Bennie Moten (Bennie Moten Orchestra), Count Basie, and Andy Kirk—all of whom he would later tour with.

One of the most well-known club owners in Kansas City was Milton Morris, who owned and managed many venues throughout the years—ranging from his earliest venture, a “drugstore” that sold liquor “for medicinal purposes,” to the Hey Day Club, to Milton’s on Troost, which was made famous in Pee Wee Hunt’s song “Meet Me at Milton’s.”

Kansas City, Missouri, in the 1920s. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Milton’s provided the stage for Kansas City’s “First Lady of the Blues,” Julia Lee, whose star climbed while there. Although Lee had much national success, she stayed local to the Kansas City area for almost her entire career, playing at Milton’s for many years with her brother’s band, George E. Lee and His Novelty Singing Orchestra, until she migrated to the Cuban Room in the 1950s. Lee belted out husky, soulful numbers such as “Come On Over to My House Baby,” “He’s Tall, Dark and Handsome,” and “Snatch and Grab It,” which sold more than 500,000 copies.

Other major venues in Kansas City during the heyday were The Panama Club at 18th and Forest, where Bennie Moten performed, and The Vanity Fair at 12th and Walnut, where Andy Kirk & His Twelve Clouds of Joy played.

Contemporary Blues Scene

Kansas Citians appreciate their place in history when it comes to blues and jazz traditions. So it is no surprise to see the blues club circuit still vibrant, with new acts surfacing out of the area. The downtown and Westport areas host local, regional, and national acts at clubs such as Blayney’s at Westport and The Grand Emporium, which has been twice voted the “Best Blues Club in America” by the Blues Foundation.

Dozens of local acts in the four-state region actively circulate through the clubs. “Fast Johnny” Ricker, Big John & the 39th Street Blues Band, Lee McBee & the Confessors, and the Lonnie Ray Blues Band are just a handful of acts that fuel the local scene.

One of Kansas City’s top annually attended functions is the famous Kansas City Blues and Jazz Festival, which, in 2002, metamorphosed into the Kansas City Blues and Heritage Festival. More than 100,000 attend the annual event, held the third weekend of each July, with center stage at Liberty Memorial.

The Kansas City Blues Society connects the venues, bands, and fans by promoting blues music in the community and offering shared resources, such as websites and sponsorship of local events. And, in the spirit of cultivating young musicians in the blues tradition, the Mayfield Towns Memorial, a committee of the Kansas City Blues Society, facilitates music education using blues music as its inspiration.

MEG FISHER

Bibliography

- “Blues and Jazz.” In Kansas City Has the Blues. Experience Kansas City website, 2002, <http://www.experiencekc.com/bluesandjazz.html>.
- “Remembering Uncle Milton and All That Jazz.” JAM: Jazz Ambassador Magazine (October/November 1992).
- Russell, Ross. Jazz Style in Kansas City and the Southwest. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973.
- University of Missouri–Kansas City. “Club Kaycee—Kansas City Jazz History—Morris, Milton.” Club Kaycee website, July 1, 2000, http://www.umkc.edu/orgs/kcjazz/jazzfolk/morrm_00.htm.

KANSAS CITY RED

- b. Arthur Lee Stevenson, 7 May 1926; Drew, MS
d. 7 May 1991; Chicago, IL

Arthur Lee Stevenson was born in Drew, Mississippi, and owed his Kansas City sobriquet to a brief trip to that city after being rejected from the service in 1942. His first musical inspiration was David “Honeyboy” Edwards and by the early 1940s he was hanging around with Robert Nighthawk. One night the band’s drummer took ill right before a gig and he offered to fill in despite never having played drums before. He ended up playing drums for Nighthawk until around 1946. After his split with Nighthawk he briefly hooked up with Honeyboy Edwards. He had an uncanny knack for hustling gigs and began singing by this period. In the 1950s he formed a band with Earl Hooker and pianist Ernest Lane.

He moved to Chicago in the 1950s, occasionally sitting in with Muddy Waters. He formed a group with Walter Horton that included Johnny Young and Johnny Shines. During this period he played with Robert Lockwood Jr., Eddie Taylor, Jimmy Reed, Floyd Jones, Blind John Davis, Elmore James, and others. Starting with the Club Reno, he managed a number of Chicago bars and owned a couple as well. Through the 1970s and 1980s he held down stints at a number of Chicago clubs. His recorded legacy is slim with a handful of sessions for Barrelhouse, JSP, and Earwig. His last major engagement was at the 1991 Chicago Blues Festival where he finally received some overdue recognition. He died of cancer on his sixty-fifth birthday on May 7, 1991.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

- Larkin; Santelli
Brisbin, John. “Kansas City Red: Entertainin’ the Peoples.” Living Blues no. 96 (1991), 24–29.
- O’Neal, Jim, and Michael Frank. Notes accompanying Old Friends (1993, Earwig 4902 CD).

KANSAS CITY RED

Discography

Old Friends (1993, Earwig 4902 CD).

See also Chicago; Earwig; Edwards, David “Honeyboy”; Hooker, Earl; Nighthawk, Robert; Waters, Muddy

KAPLAN, FRED

b. 23 April 1954; Los Angeles, CA

Los Angeles pianist. As a child he first heard blues records at his father's furniture store. Lloyd Glenn was a mentor until his 1985 death. Kaplan was pianist for Hollywood Fats through the early 1990s. He has since recorded for Kim Wilson's Blue Collar label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Char Ham)

Discography: AMG (Char Ham)

KATZ, BRUCE

b. 19 August 1952; Brooklyn, NY

Blues organist. In the 1980s, Katz toured with Big Mama Thornton, Bo Diddley, Chuck Berry, Jimmy Witherspoon, and Johnny Adams. After receiving a master's degree in jazz from the New England Conservatory, he worked with Ronnie Earl for nearly five years. Now an instructor at the Berklee College of Music, Katz continues to record with his own band.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

AMG (Char Ham)

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Three Feet Off the Ground (2000, AudioQuest 1056).

KAZOO

Though it has commonly been regarded merely as a toy or novelty instrument, the kazoo has occasionally been used to great effect in popular music, particularly in blues and jazz performances. The kazoo is a submarine-shaped instrument, about five inches in length and usually made of metal or plastic, that modifies and amplifies the human voice. In the top of the instrument is a small opening, over which a membrane (nowadays typically made of waxed paper or plastic) is held in place by a screw-on cap or similar mechanism. As the player hums or sings into the larger end of the kazoo, the membrane vibrates and produces a nasal, buzzing timbre. The instrument's pitch and volume is entirely determined by the player's voice. A number of special effects are achievable on the kazoo, and skilled players have often used it to imitate other instruments, such as the trumpet, saxophone, and clarinet.

The kazoo is a type of “mirliton,” a term for any device that makes use of a vibrating membrane to alter a sound. For centuries, voice-modifying mirlitons have been utilized in musical contexts in many cultures around the world. Notably, this includes a number of communities throughout West and Central Africa, where people have made use of mirlitons in various ritual ceremonies (often as a means of disguising or “masking” the voice and at times representing the voices of spirits). In view of the kazoo's precursors in Africa, it is interesting to note that the original design for the instrument was reportedly created in the 1840s by Alabama Vest, an African American. The kazoo's African connections perhaps account for its later acceptance as a folk instrument by African descendants in the United States, a fact that is also likely attributable to the instrument's buzzing effects, a feature commonly considered musically appealing throughout many African cultures.

In the early twentieth century, kazoos began to be manufactured in significant quantities in the United States, and the instrument became quite popular in the 1920s. It can be heard on a number of seminal blues and jazz recordings from the era. In particular, the kazoo was regularly featured on recordings of jug bands (see the Jug entry), in which it was often used in conjunction with the harmonica to emulate the brass and woodwind sounds of early jazz bands. Such recordings include those of the Memphis Jug Band (featuring Ben Ramey's remarkable kazoo playing) and Cannon's Jug Stompers (often including Hosea Woods or Elijah Avery on kazoo). The kazoo was also commonly included in washboard bands and skiffle groups, and it was occasionally featured on early jazz recordings, most famously those by the Mound City Blue Blowers (with Dick Slevin's kazoo and Red McKenzie's comb-and-tissue-paper instrument, essentially a homemade mirliton with a sound like that of the kazoo). Probably the most renowned kazoo player in the blues is guitar legend Tampa Red, many of whose recordings throughout his career prominently feature the instrument, which he dubbed his “jazz horn.” Other notable blues musicians who have frequently played the kazoo include Hammie Nixon and Jesse Fuller. While the formation of new jug bands during the folk revival of the 1960s helped to reintroduce the kazoo to blues audiences, the instrument’s use in the blues idiom today is rare.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

Hopkin, Bart. “Mirlitons: Kazoos and Beyond.” Experimental Musical Instruments 5, no. 1 (June 1989): 4–8.
Stewart, Barbara. How to Kazoo. New York: Workman Publishing, 1983.

K-DOE, ERNIE

b. Ernest Kador, Jr., 22 February 1936; New Orleans, LA

d. 5 July 2001; New Orleans, LA

Rhythm and blues singer whose highly intimate and emotional vocal delivery made him a local legend around New Orleans and the Louisiana Gulf Coast. Raised by his aunt, K-Doe competed in talent shows in his youth with the likes of Art and Aaron Neville and Danny White. By age fifteen he established his reputation as an up-and-coming star, moving to Chicago at seventeen to reunite with his mother. Here he continued to compete and win local talent shows, and he sat in at local clubs with classic vocal groups like the Moonglows and the Flamingos.

His first recording date was in 1953 with United Records, and in the same year he returned to New Orleans to form the Black Diamonds. The group managed to cut some sides for Savoy before disbanding. In 1955 he recorded a split single with then-unknown Little Richard Penniman, as well as stints with Ember and other small labels. Although his records sold moderately during these years, in New Orleans his live performances were considered must-see events.

His best work comes from his period of association with Allen Toussaint and Minit Records in 1960. His breakout hit was in 1961, “Mother-in-Law,” a comic number that topped the national rhythm and blues chart and propelled him to stardom. Its success was fleeting, as Minit went out of business, and stylistic tastes among rhythm and blues audiences were changing. In the 1970s and early 1980s, K-Doe was performing to small audiences and recording to little sales, and he also was having problems with alcohol. In 1982, he began hosting a radio show in New Orleans and became well known for his on-air antics. He opened the Mother-in-Law Lounge in 1984, and he gathered civic recognition from then through the end of his life. He was inducted into New Orleans’s Hall of Fame in 1995.

JOHN OTIS

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Santelli
Hannusch, Jeff. “Ernie K-Doe at the Center of the Universe.” Living Blues no. 153 (September/October 2000): 26–31.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

KEB' MO'

b. Kevin Moore, 3 October 1951; Los Angeles, CA

Singer, guitarist, and composer Keb' Mo' was born and raised in Los Angeles, performing and recording rock and rhythm and blues under his given name of Kevin Moore throughout the 1970s and 1980s (including a stint with Zulu, which often backed Papa John Creach). In the late 1980s, Mo' began studying and then devoting himself to the traditional rural blues of the Mississippi Delta and, on the strength of several popular recordings, became the best-known exponent of acoustic rural blues.

His first recording under the stage name of Keb' Mo', an eponymously titled album in 1994, garnered him significant public attention for his covers of several Robert Johnson tunes performed in a style similar to what Johnson himself had done. However, as with fellow rural acoustic blues performers Taj Mahal and Corey Harris (with whom he is most often compared), Mo' performs and records new songs as well as standards. Like Mahal and Harris, Mo's own compositions meld both the traditional styles and other, more contemporary influences.

Mo' won Grammy awards in 1997 and 1999, and had won nine W. C. Handy Awards through 2002. Mo' has also been active on stage and television. He portrayed bluesmen in a pair of Los Angeles-based productions in 1990; in 1992, he again played an acoustic bluesman in Mark Harelik's musical biography of Hank Williams, Lost Highway, when it traveled San Diego's Old Globe Theatre and Chic Street Man was unable to continue the role. He has had guest spots on a number of popular television programs.

KEB' MO'

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin
Slaven, Neil. "Keb' Mo'." Blues & Rhythm no. 102
(September 1995): 9.

Discography: AMG

Keb' Mo' (1994, Epic 57863).
Just Like You (1996, Epic 67316).
The Door (2000, OKeh 61428).

KELLUM, ALPHONSO "COUNTRY"

b. 25 September 1943; Lakeland, FL
d. 24 March 2000; Rochester, NY

Bassist and guitarist best known for his years with James Brown. The "Country" nickname came from Brown bandmates who kidded Kellum for his ways acquired from growing up in Lakeland, Florida. He began playing guitar around age eight, and joined a small group, the Melody Hep Cats. In the late 1950s he traveled and worked in the northern United States as a migrant worker picking vegetables. In the early 1960s he performed in a few groups in Florida, occasionally backing in local guest appearances for Faye Adams and others. In 1963 James Brown hired him as a bassist. In 1965 he formed with Jimmy Nolen, a twin-guitar attack in Brown's Famous Flames. In 1970 he joined bandmates in leaving Brown over a dispute in pay, and he moved to Rochester, New York. He rejoined Brown from 1974 to 1977. Since then until his death, he worked and performed locally in Rochester, including a 1988 reunion of King Records musicians.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Crews, Nick. "There Was a Time." Blues & Rhythm no. 75
(January 1993): 10–11.

KELLY, JO ANN

b. 5 January 1944; London, England
d. 21 October 1990; London, England

British singer active from the 1960s until the late 1980s, with a vocal style reminiscent of pre-1940 Mississippi singers such as Memphis Minnie.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Chris Nickson); Larkin
Holland, M. "No Ordinary Jo." Folk Roots no. 71 (May 1989): 34–35.

Discography: AMG

KELLY, PAUL

b. 19 June 1940; Miami, FL

Songwriter-singer Kelly has recorded a handful of albums, but remains best known for songs he has written for others, mostly in the soul/R&B styles, including the Staples Singers, Irma Thomas, and Johnnie Taylor.

JIM TRAGESER

Discography

Gonna Stick and Stay (1992, Bullseye Blues 9523).

KELLY, VANCE

b. 24 January 1954; Chicago, IL

South Side Chicago electric guitarist. Self-taught, at age fifteen he was accompanying singer Mary Lane. A term with A. C. Reed in 1987–1990 brought him some exposure, as well as advice from B. B. King to use fewer tone effects. His music has been issued on the Wolf label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)
Sharp, Steven. "South Side Special." Living Blues no. 110
(July/August 1993): 29–35.

Discography: AMG

KELTON, ROBERT "BOB"

b. 1 January 1908; Kansas City, KS
d. 19 May 1996; Castro Valley, CA

Guitarist who joined Jimmy McCracklin's Blues Blasters in 1943. When McCracklin began to tour regularly, Kelton preferred to remain in the Bay Area and formed his own band. He recorded a session for Aladdin in 1950 and one for Rhodesway in 1980, but mostly performed in local clubs.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Mazzolini, Tom. "Bob Kelton: Early Oakland Blues." Living Blues no. 62 (Winter 1984): 14–16.

Discography: LSFP

See also Aladdin/Score; McCracklin, Jimmy

KEMBLE, WILL ED

Last name also spelled Kendall, Kendle. Talent scout in prewar Texas blues and hillbilly music, based at Kemble Brothers Furniture Company in Fort Worth, Texas, in the 1920s and 1930s. The store's record department stocked a wide range of music, including popular music, blues, jazz, and hillbilly. Bob Wills was among the white musicians influenced by the blues records offered there.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Townsend, Charles R. San Antonio Rose: The Life and Music of Bob Wills. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1976.
Wardlow, Gayle Dean. "A Quick Ramble with Ramblin' Thomas, Jesse Thomas, Will Ezell, Bessie Tucker, Elzadie Robinson, and Texas Talent Scouts R. T. Ashford and the Kendle Brothers [sic]." Blues Unlimited no. 141 (Autumn/Winter 1981): 14–15.

KENNEDY, JESSE "TINY"

b. Jesse Kennedy Jr., 20 December 1925; Chattanooga, TN

Came to initial fame as a blues shouter for Jay McShann in 1949. Two years later he was with the Tiny Bradshaw Orchestra. Kennedy recorded as a solo artist for Trumpet in 1951–1953, and for RCA subsidiary Groove in 1955. Activity since 1955 unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl), Larkin

Discography: LSFP

KENNER, CHRIS

b. 25 December 1929; Kenner, LA

d. 25 January 1976; New Orleans, LA

Chris Kenner was a convincing singer and brilliant composer ("I Like It Like That," "Land of 1000 Dances," "Something You Got") but a reluctant performer who proved incapable of building on his Allen Toussaint-produced hits. Many sources give January 25, 1976, as his death date, although his Living Blues obituary gives January 28, 1977.

JOHN SINCLAIR/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
"Obituaries." Living Blues no. 26 (1977): 8.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

KENT, WILLIE

b. 24 September 1936; Shelby, Sunflower County, MS

Willie Kent was first introduced to the blues as a child growing up in Mississippi. In 1952 his family relocated to Chicago where Willie was able to hear the blues played live in clubs. In 1957 he began working as a singer and started playing guitar the year after, though he switched to the bass in 1959. During the 1960s Kent worked with blues artists such as Hip Linkchain and Jimmy Dawkins and recorded a live album with Willie James Lyons in 1975 for the MCM label. The year 1989 brought the release of I'm What You Need, Kent's first release with his band The Gents.

ROBERT SORICELLI

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Brisbin, John Anthony. "Willie Kent: Learn to Follow and Then to Lead." Living Blues no. 108 (March/April 1993): 6–15.

Discography: AMG

KEY TO THE HIGHWAY

With its simple but distinctive melody and evocative lyrics, "Key to the Highway" is near the top of the list of universally recognized blues standards. The vivid images ("when the moon peep over the mountain") and emotional urgency (“I got to leave here runnin’ because walkin’ is most too slow”) have inspired some of the most influential artists in blues and other genres to record and perform it.

KEY TO THE HIGHWAY

The song’s origins are murky. It is often associated with Big Bill Broonzy, but it was first recorded by pianist Charlie Segar for Vocalion in February 1940. Jazz Gillum and Broonzy then played on each other’s recordings of it, Gillum (with Broonzy on guitar) for Bluebird in May 1940 and Broonzy (with Gillum on harmonica) for OKeh a year later. Broonzy told oral historian Studs Terkel that he had based the melody on one he had heard originally as a child in the South played on the banjo by his uncle, and credited Segar with composing new lyrics. Gillum maintained that he had written both words and music at the request of producer Lester Melrose, who then gave it to Broonzy. Broonzy’s powerful final version from his last recording session in 1957 reinforced his connection with the song. Despite the conflicting claims of authorship, the song carries an indelible association with the African American blues musicians born in the South who invoked their rural origins when they migrated North in the first decades of the twentieth century and recorded in urban centers such as Chicago.

Several prominent musicians recorded noteworthy versions of “Key to the Highway” in the years following World War II. When harmonica star Little Walter recorded it for Chess Records in August 1958, it became his last top ten hit, rising to number six on the Billboard charts. Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee produced numerous versions, and their 1952 recording for Jax in particular raised the song’s profile among a generation of blues fans internationally as it appeared on their multiple reissued collections in the 1960s. John Lee Hooker’s 1952 session for Modern features Eddie Kirkland on second guitar striving to replicate Broonzy’s phrases; Hooker also covered the song in later solo versions. Other artists who have recorded it include Clifton Chenier, Dinah Washington, Jimmy Witherspoon, Mance Lipscomb, and Freddie King.

The most widely known rendition of the song for general audiences came when Eric Clapton and Duane Allman included it on their best-selling 1970 album titled Layla and Other Assorted Love Songs, performed by the short-lived band Derek and the Dominos. This established the song as a staple in the blues-rock repertoire, and Clapton’s many performances of it in succeeding decades have included a recorded duet with B. B. King. The song’s durability may be in some part a testament to its connection to famous performers, who themselves were honoring their artistic heroes, but its glimpses of a retreating figure who must “walk this highway until the break of day” seem to resonate with any generation for whom a highway serves as a potent and ambiguous symbol.

ROBERT RIESMAN

Selected Recordings

Big Bill Broonzy: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vol. 11 (17 December 1940–6 March 1942) (1993, Document DOCD-5133).

Derek and the Dominos: Layla and Other Assorted Love Songs (Polydor CD 531820).

Jazz Gillum: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vol. 2 (16 December 1938–4 July 1941) (1993, Document DOCD-5198).

John Lee Hooker, The Complete, Vol. 5 (2004, Body & Soul CD BS 2500).

Little Walter: His Best (1997, MCA/Chess CHD9384).

Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee Sing the Blues (Sony Music Special Products CD A26430).

The Big Bill Broonzy Story (1999, Verve CD 314547555-2). Various artists (including Charlie Segar). Piano Blues: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order—Vol. 2 (1927–1956) (1993, Document DOCD-5220).

See also Broonzy, Big Bill; Clapton, Eric; Gillum, Jazz; Hooker, John Lee; Little Walter; McGhee, Brownie; Terry, Sonny

KEYNOTE

Record label (New York, 1942–1947). Owner: Eric Bernay (Eric Bernstein, b. March 25, 1906, Odessa, Russia; d. November 2, 1968, New York City, NY). Artists included George Barnes, Marie Bryant, Roy Eldridge, Coleman Hawkins, Milt Hinton, the Keynoters (with Nat King Cole), Willie Smith, Lester Young, Dinah Washington (“Evil Gal Blues,” “Salty Papa Blues,”), Josh White (“Hard Times Blues,” “House of the Rising Sun,”). The label was sold to Mercury Records in 1948.

ROBERT EAGLE

Discography: McGrath

KID STORMY WEATHER

- b. Edmond Joseph, place and date unknown
- d. Unknown

Barrelhouse pianist and vocalist from New Orleans who recorded only two sides, “Short Hair Blues” and the prison song “Bread and Water Blues,” for a Vocalion mobile field unit in Jackson, Mississippi, in 1935. Stated to have been an early influence on Professor Longhair and other New Orleans pianists, and to have been active in the honky-tonks around South Rampart. Little is known about his life and career.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

zur Heide, Karl Gert. "Kid Stormy Weather." Blues Unlimited no. 79 (January 1971): 11–12.

Discography: DGR

KILLING FLOOR (THE LEMON SONG)

The influential postwar blues song "Killing Floor" was written by Howlin' Wolf and recorded by the singer in 1964 for Chess Records. Driven by the dual guitars of Hubert Sumlin and Buddy Guy and the propulsive rhythm section of bassist Willie Dixon and drummer Sam Lay, the song exemplified Howlin' Wolf's raw vocal power and effective songwriting. Although its initial release did not make it to the R&B charts, the song went on to become one of Howlin' Wolf's most enduring compositions and was subsequently covered by many blues and rock musicians, including Jimi Hendrix, Albert King, Fenton Robinson, and Big Jack Johnson, as well as the blues-rock group the Electric Flag.

The term "killing floor" refers to the bloodstained area of a slaughterhouse where animals are put to death before being butchered. When someone is metaphorically placed "on the killing floor," they are in a dire, almost hopeless position. The use of this troubled expression in recorded blues dates back to 1928 when it was mentioned by singer and guitarist Arthur Petties in "Two Time Blues." Petties mournfully sings that his two-timing (or cheating) women are keeping him "on that killing floor." Son House also uses the phrase in his 1930 Paramount recording "Dry Spell Blues." Throughout the coming year, the term appeared in the title of two blues songs—Kansas City Kitty and Georgia Tom's "Killin' Floor Blues" and Skip James's "Hard Time Killin' Floor Blues." Both House and James used the phrase figuratively to describe the troubled times and hardships that accompanied the Great Depression.

Howlin' Wolf's use of the term follows Petties' example of relating it to a love affair that has gone bad and of the realization of the betrayal, but he also emphasizes his feelings of deep regret for initially not doing anything about it. In Howlin' Wolf's composition, the singer blames himself for not listening to his "first mind," or instincts, and not ending the relationship early on after the first signs of trouble.

Now he feels he is trapped in a disastrous affair with no way out.

The blues-influenced British rock band Led Zeppelin recorded "The Lemon Song" in 1969, which consisted mainly of lyrics taken directly from "Killing Floor." The song also used a similar, albeit slowed down, bass line like the one used in Howlin' Wolf's composition. "The Lemon Song" also borrowed a verse from Robert Johnson's "Traveling Riverside Blues," a sexually suggestive lyric that supplied the song its title. Released on the band's second album, writing credit for "The Lemon Song" was claimed by Led Zeppelin. ARC Music, which owned the publishing rights to Howlin' Wolf's "Killing Floor," sued the band for copyright infringement and the case was settled out of court in 1972 for an undisclosed sum of money.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Dixon, Robert M. W., John Godrich, and Howard Rye. Blues and Gospel Records 1890–1942. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.

Segrest, James, and Mark Hoffman. Moaning At Midnight: The Life and Times of Howlin' Wolf. New York: Pantheon Books, 2004.

KIMBROUGH, DAVID, JR.

b. 3 January 1965; Holly Springs, MS

Aka David Malone. Multi-instrumentalist and vocalist Kimbrough began playing music as a boy at the house parties of his father, guitarist David "Junior" Kimbrough. After serving a term in the Mississippi State Penitentiary, he was recorded by the Fat Possum label in 1994 and 1995 (as David Malone), updating his father's style with gospel, funk, and R&B influences. Further trouble with the law has hindered his career since.

DAVID NELSON

Bibliography

Nelson, David. "David Kimbrough: Popnotic Blues for the Year 2000." Living Blues no. 132 (March/April 1997): 40–43.

KIMBROUGH, JUNIOR

b. David Kimbrough, Jr., 28 July 1930; Hudsonville, MS

d. 17 January 1998; Holly Springs, MS

KIMBROUGH, JUNIOR

One of the most idiosyncratic stylists in modern blues, Kimbrough's style of music was raw yet complex, traditional but up to date enough to draw crowds of dancers to the house parties and juke joints he ran in Marshall County, Mississippi, for close to forty years. He picked up the guitar as a youngster, influenced by his father, older brothers, and sister. Kimbrough supposedly learned some lessons from Fred McDowell as a boy, and his music was closely related to the modal style of north Mississippi guitarists McDowell and R. L. Burnside. He also grew up around and influenced rockabilly pioneer Charlie Feathers. An undercurrent of hillbilly music was apparent in his style, and his blues also carried traces of pre-blues string band and fife-and-drum music and had a distinctive West African feel.

By the late 1950s he had incorporated his highly personal style into a band format, adding drums, second guitar, and later electric bass. During the 1990s, a younger generation of north Mississippi musicians, including Kimbrough's sons David and Kent and several of Burnside's sons, gave Kimbrough's music a harder edge, with touches of funk and rock. Kimbrough became known to wider audiences through his appearance in the 1991 documentary Deep Blues and his 1990s recordings for the Fat Possum label. Since his death, his songs have been adapted by Buddy Guy and other blues musicians, as well as a number of prominent rock 'n' roll bands.

DAVID NELSON

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli
Nelson, David. "David 'Junior' Kimbrough." Living Blues no. 139 (May/June 1998): 50–52.

Discography: AMG; LSFP (as Junior Kimball)

KIMBROUGH, LOTTIE

Flourished 1920s–1930s

One of the most distinctive singers in Kansas City, Kimbrough recorded for four companies, including the short-lived and black-owned local label Meritt, sometimes under her married name of Beaman. A bizarre 1928 collaboration for Gennett with the entrepreneur and wannabe performer Winston Holmes yielded the poignant "Lost Lover Blues" and "Wayward Girl Blues" and the even finer "Going Away Blues" and "Rolling Log Blues," all exquisitely accompanied by guitarist Miles Pruitt. The latter two titles, which she remade the following year for Brunswick, have been frequently recorded by later singers, among them Rory Block and Buffy Ste. Marie.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR

KING, AL

b. Alvin K. Smith, 8 August 1923; Monroe, LA
d. 21 January 1999; Oakland, CA

Vocalist and songwriter who became active in music in the Bay Area after the war, but first recorded after moving to Los Angeles in 1951 for the Recorded in Hollywood label. Two years later he recorded again with a vocal group, the Savoys, on Combo. The record sold well locally but the group broke up and Al went solo. In 1954, back in Oakland, he recorded for Music City and in 1957 for Irma (as Alvin Smith and the Angels). In the late 1950s duets with a female singer called Nettie appeared on Christy and Art-Tone. In 1964 he adopted the nom de disque Al King and made a single for Triad that Atlantic picked up and issued on Shirley and followed up with another single. His next recording (in 1965) was for his own label Flag. This was leased by the Sahara label in Buffalo, New York, and gave Al his only chart hit with "Think Twice Before You Speak," which reached number thirty-six in the R&B charts. Sahara issued a further four singles and then he moved to Modern who in 1968–1969 put out four singles (produced by Maxwell Davis) on Modern and Kent. In 1970 Ronn issued two singles, also Maxwell Davis productions. After that Al ceased to record and became a local artist, with club gigs and the occasional festival appearance. A CD for Forevermore in 1998 showed that he was singing as well as ever but his sudden death prevented a revival of his music career.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Collins, Tony. "'On My Way'—The Al King Story." Juke Blues no. 27 (Autumn 1992): 9–13.
Nelson, David. "Al King" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 145 (May/June 1999): 54.

Discography: LSFP

See also Combo; Davis, Maxwell; Geddins, Bob; Irma; Jewel/Paula/Ronn; Modern/Flair/Meteor/Kent/RPM; Recorded in Hollywood/Hollywood/Cash/Lucky/Money

KING, ALBERT

b. 25 April 1923; Indianola, MS
d. 21 December 1992; Memphis, TN

Albert King was one the most influential contemporary electric blues guitarists.

Life

King was born in Indianola, Mississippi. His birth name is usually recorded as Nelson, although that was likely the surname of his stepfather, Will Nelson. King's birth name is probably either Blevins or Gilmore, the two surnames recorded for his mother, Mary. Controversy also surrounds his birth date, which is recorded on his death certificate as April 25, 1923.

Around 1928, King's mother remarried and the family relocated to Forrest City, Arkansas. King was first introduced to the blues through Blind Lemon Jefferson, who he saw performing in nearby towns. King's stepfather played the guitar, but he would not let him play it. King would have to settle for a diddley bow that he made himself when he was about six years old. He later upgraded to a homemade cigar box guitar.

King did not own a proper guitar until he was eighteen. He later recalled that he practiced for five years before performing in public. Among the blues artists that influenced him at this time were Lonnie Johnson, Howlin' Wolf, and T-Bone Walker, who perhaps had the greatest influence on King. Although he wasn't yet ready to perform on the guitar, King sang in a local gospel group called the Harmony Kings.

Around 1950, King moved to Osceola, Arkansas. He worked days as a bulldozer driver and played guitar with the local group called Yancey's Band.

Albert King. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

He later performed with the In the Groove Boys, the house band for the T-99 club. About this time, he adopted the name “King,” likely a nod to the success of B. B. King.

King relocated to Gary, Indiana, in 1953, where he played drums for Jimmy Reed and John Brim. Later that year, King recorded for the Parrot label out of Chicago. The session produced five tracks including the release “Bad Luck Blues” and “Be on Your Merry Way.” King found little success with the single and returned to Osceola in 1954.

King moved to East St. Louis in 1956, where he worked the local clubs through the early 1960s. In the summer of 1959, he began recording with the St. Louis-based label Bobbin Records. The label leased some of King’s tracks to the more prominent King Records. The result was his first successful single, “Don’t Throw Your Love on Me So Strong,” which charted on the R&B charts in December 1961. In May 1964, King recorded for the Coun-Tree label out of East St. Louis, producing singles that found modest success in the Midwest.

The biggest break in King’s career came in 1966, when he signed with the Stax label. A year later, he released the landmark album, Born Under a Bad Sign. Backed by Stax’s superlative house band, Booker T. and the MGs, and the Memphis Horns, King perfected an influential hybrid of blues, soul, and R&B. In February 1968, legendary concert promoter Bill Graham invited King to open for Jimi Hendrix and John Mayall and the Bluesbreakers in a series of four shows divided between the Fillmore West and the Winterland. King was an immediate hit and became a regular at the Fillmore in the months that followed. His first headlining performance is preserved in his Live Wire/Blues Power album. With the combined success of Born Under a Bad Sign and his Fillmore gigs, King established himself as a crossover artist, reaching both the blues community and the young, primarily white, rock ‘n’ roll audience. Along with contemporaries such as B. B. King, Howlin’ Wolf, and Muddy Waters, he also became a principal musician of the 1960s blues revival.

Through the early 1970s, King continued to record for Stax, releasing I’ll Play the Blues for You in 1972 and I Wanna Get Funky in 1973. Backed by the Bar-Kays and the Memphis Horns, he continued to develop his soulful blues style, to which he now added elements of funk. King left Stax in 1974, when the label ran into financial troubles.

After stints on the Utopia and Tomato labels and a period of not recording, King signed with Fantasy Records in 1983. The move provided him with newfound success. His first record with Fantasy, San Francisco ‘83, was critically acclaimed and earned him his first Grammy nomination. The following year, he released I’m In a Phone Booth, Baby, which also received a Grammy nomination.

Throughout the 1980s and early 1990s, King continued to play the blues festival circuit and often toured internationally. King died in Memphis of a heart attack on December 21, 1992, at the age of sixty-nine.

Music and Influence

At an imposing 6 foot 4 inches, King was a commanding presence on stage. His guitar playing was equally powerful. Although he was left-handed, he played right-handed guitars upside-down without restringing. This helped create his distinctive sound, which emphasized long, dynamic string bends created by pulling down on the strings, rather than pushing up. A Gibson Flying-V named “Lucy” became his trademark guitar. King is best known for his guitar playing, but he also had a smooth, soulful vocal style, which allowed him to move gracefully into the genres of R&B and funk. He was also famous for his monologues, as captured in his live classic “Blues Power” and radio favorite “I’ll Play the Blues for You (Parts 1 and 2).” His warm, playful rapport with the audience made him a concert favorite.

The long reach of Albert King’s influence cannot be underestimated. His signature guitar licks have become staples of electric blues guitar. The impact of his most influential album, Born Under a Bad Sign, was as immediate as it was powerful. Months after its release, Eric Clapton and Cream were adapting King’s “Oh, Pretty Woman (Can’t Make You Love Me)” into “Strange Brew.” Other songs from the album, such as “Crosscut Saw,” “Laundromat Blues,” and the title track, became instant blues standards. In addition to Clapton, King influenced some of the finest modern blues and rock guitarists including Michael Bloomfield, Jimi Hendrix, Jimmy Page, Robert Cray, and Johnny Winter. King’s influence, however, is most immediately present in the guitar playing of Stevie Ray Vaughan.

STEVEN GALBRAITH

Bibliography

- AMG (Daniel Erlewine and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Forte, Dan. “Albert King: Power Blues.” Guitar Player 11, no. 9 (1977): 38–39, 66, 68, 70, 72, 76.
- Greensmith, Bill. Booklet accompanying Albert King: The Ultimate Collection (1993, Rhino Records).

Point, Michael. Liner notes to reissue of Albert King: Born Under a Bad Sign (2002, Stax Records).

Stone, Calen D. "Albert King." In Contemporary Musicians, edited by Michael L. LaBlanc, Vol. 2, pp. 119–121. Detroit, MI: Gale Research, 1989.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

Selected Recordings

Albert King: Born Under a Bad Sign (1996, Stax Records).
Albert King: The Ultimate Collection (1993, Rhino Records).

See also Bloomfield, Michael; Bluesbreakers; Brim, John; Clapton, Eric; Cray, Robert; Cream; Hendrix, Jimi; Howlin' Wolf; Jefferson, Blind Lemon; Johnson, Lonnie; Oh Pretty Woman (Can't Make You Love Me); Reed, Jimmy; Vaughan, Stevie Ray; Walker, T-Bone; Winter, Johnny

KING, BNOIS

b. 21 January 1943; Delhi, LA

Guitarist in electric jazz/blues style. Learned guitar on an instrument that his grandmother performed for herself to play sanctified religious music. Learned blues and jazz initially through jazz bandleader James Moody. Spent much of the 1960s performing jazz with Sonny Green, initially in Amarillo, Texas, then in Wichita Falls, Kansas. He switched between day jobs and music in the 1970s, eventually moving to Dallas, Texas, in 1979. He met Smokin' Joe Kubek in the mid-1980s, with whom he began writing blues songs and singing. His formative influences in blues include Jimmy Reed, Chuck Berry, Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, and John Lee Hooker.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Ottensman, Don. "Dual Guitar Blues." Blues & Rhythm no. 122 (September 1997): 4–7.

KING, BOBBY

b. 28 July 1944; LA

Vocalist Bobby King absorbed Cajun/zydeco and gospel influences around Lake Charles before moving to Los Angeles in 1962. Beginning in the mid-1970s, King, teamed with Terry Evans, provided vocal backups for Ry Cooder. King would later work with Bruce Springsteen, Lyle Lovett, and John Fogerty before resettling in Lake Charles where he currently performs exclusively gospel music.

JERRY ZOLTEN

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Paul, Alan. "Riffs: Bobby King and Terry Evans." Down Beat 58, no. 3 (March 1991): 13.

KING, CHRIS THOMAS

b. Chris Thomas, 14 October 1964; Baton Rouge, LA

Singer, guitarist, composer, actor. The son of swamp bluesman Tabby Thomas was on stage at his father's Baton Rouge, Louisiana, club at age nine, playing with big-name touring blues talent. A couple of decades later he was on the movie screen, portraying blues legends; first Tommy Johnson in O Brother Where Art Thou? and then Blind Willie Johnson in The Soul of a Man, director Wim Wenders's contribution to the Martin Scorsese PBS Blues series.

But the cinematic work of Thomas, who also appeared in several blues documentaries, was only the most publicly visible aspect of the creativity of one of the most eclectic and adventurous of modern bluesmen. Beginning with a roots simple debut on Arhoolie in 1986, his recordings included everything from classic acoustic standards to electrifying topical rock and blues hip-hop permutations.

Thomas's early travels, which took him full circle to Louisiana in 1996, included extended stints in Austin, Texas, Denmark, and Los Angeles. In each location he experimented with a different sound, often on a different record company. Most of the experimentation involved strong infusions of rock, rap, and hip-hop sensibilities, usually incorporated into traditional blues material.

After his return to Louisiana, Thomas continued to alternate back-to-the-basics blues releases like "Red Mud" with contemporary, politically charged recordings such as "Dirty South Hip-Hop Blues." In the wake of the success of the O Brother Where Art Thou? movie and subsequent tour, Thomas focused his attention on sweeping historical recordings that offered an overview of the evolution of blues. He plays only infrequent live dates although he did perform with his father at the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin; Santelli

Sinclair, John. "Chris Thomas King: 21st Century Blues." Living Blues no. 168 (June/July/August 2003): 26–37.

Discography: AMG

KING CURTIS

b. Curtis Ousley, 7 February 1934; Fort Worth, TX
 d. 13 (or 14) August 1971; New York City, NY

Tenor, alto, soprano saxophones; R&B tenor saxophone great. One of the most influential R&B saxophonists, Curtis was known for his crisp, rapid-fire staccato approach—a style that was to cross musical genres. Son of a guitar player, Curtis got his first sax at age twelve. By the time he was thirteen, he was gigging around Fort Worth, Texas, and two years later had his own R&B band. He moved to New York City in the early 1950s after graduating from high school and quickly became part of that city's studio scene, playing on many of the R&B sessions from the mid-1950s through the 1960s. Curtis is featured on The Coaster's "Yakety Yak," Bobby Darin's "Splish Splash," and Ben E. King's "Spanish Harlem," as well as on recordings by Sam Cooke, the Drifters, and the Shirelles.

His long association with Atlantic/Atco began in 1958 as a session player. Curtis played on several of Aretha's finest recordings including the famous sax solo on "Respect." He had a number one R&B single in 1962 as a leader with his funky instrumental "Soul Twist" on the Enjoy label. In 1965, he signed with Atlantic/Atco as a bandleader. Curtis had hits with his songs "Memphis Soul Stew" and an instrumental version of "Ode to Billie Joe" (from his 1967 King Size Soul album). His band the Kingpins became Aretha's backing unit (captured live on the recording Live at the Fillmore—one set with Aretha, and one with his band). King Curtis was tragically murdered outside his New York City apartment in August 1971.

Bibliography

AMG (Bob Porter); Santelli; Larkin

Discography: AMGKING, EARL

b. Earl Silas Johnson IV, 7 February 1934; New Orleans, LA
 d. 18 April 2003; New Orleans, LA

Guitarist, pianist, singer, composer. King, involved in almost every aspect of the blues in a career that spanned five decades, was a cornerstone of the modern New Orleans scene. King held court—writing songs, dispensing wisdom, and arranging live shows and recording sessions—in the back of the Tastee Donuts location at the corner of Prytania and Louisiana streets, a site later paid tribute to on his album Glazed. His importance to New Orleans music was so enormous and enduring that the parade of local legends dropping by for donuts made the shop look like a backstage area of the Jazz & Heritage Festival.

After winning several local talent contests King formed his first band, the Swans, when he was fifteen. After meeting and befriending his mentor Guitar Slim, King made his recording debut (as Earl Johnson) in 1953 with New Orleans songwriter Huey "Piano" Smith on piano, cutting the single "Have You Gone Crazy."

King, like most guitarists in Texas and Louisiana, was first and foremost a T-Bone Walker fan, but he was such a good student of his mentor that he was able to impersonate Guitar Slim on a 1954 tour after the guitarist was injured in an auto accident. He eventually developed his own admittedly eccentric guitar style, one that innovatively extrapolated aspects of both Walker's and Guitar Slim's work.

He signed with Specialty Records in 1954 where his name, intended to become the stage name King Earl, was inadvertently reversed through a pressing plant mistake. King kept the new name but changed record companies, signing with Ace where his debut "Those Lonely, Lonely Nights" became his first major national hit.

Armed with a hit record, King began to tour steadily, performing in package shows with New Orleans stalwarts Smiley Lewis, Gatemouth Brown, and bandleader/producer Dave Bartholomew. It was Bartholomew who would produce King's 1960 Imperial Records hit "Trick Bag," the song that would become his signature tune. He also put the Crescent City standard "Come On," which evolved into "Let the Good Times Roll," into circulation.

King devoted most of his attention to songwriting in the 1960s, composing a string of hits for Fats Domino, Professor Longhair, Johnny Adams, and Lee Dorsey, among others. He also went into the studio and did sessions for Motown that were never released.

After the 1983 Black Top Records release of Glazed, a collaborative effort with the big band Roomful of Blues that earned a Grammy nomination, King's career had an upswing and he began to play festival dates. Sexual Telepathy, in 1990, and Hard River to Cross, in 1993, were significant additions to his recording catalog. The European recordings Street Parade and New Orleans Street Talkin', both rereleased in the United States in 2002, were recorded later in the decade.

In addition to his albums as a leader, King also appeared on numerous significant recordings by his

New Orleans peers, including “Runnin’ Partner” by bassist George Porter Jr., “Checkout Time” by James “Thunderbird” Davis, and several releases by the Meters, Nappy Brown, Professor Longhair, and others. His close connection with the Crescent City scene continued even after his death—he was laid to rest sharing a burial vault with New Orleans singer Ernie K-Doe.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
 Hannusch, Jeff. “Masters of Louisiana Music: Earl Silas Johnson IV (Earl King).” Offbeat 16 (June 2003): 22.
 Jones, Tad. “Living Blues Interview: Earl King” [part 1]. Living Blues no. 38 (May/June 1978): 7–19; [part 2] Living Blues no. 39 (July/August 1978), 17–22, 39–43.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

KING, EDDIE

b. Edward Lewis Davis Milton, 21 April 1938; Talladega, AL

Lead guitarist. Orphaned at age twelve, he came to Chicago in the 1950s and began playing guitar in local clubs. “Little” Mack Simmons, Detroit Jr., Willie Cobbs, and Koko Taylor are among the musicians with whom he worked. Since the early 1980s he has been based in Peoria, Illinois. He has recorded several CDs on his own, and as a member of the Burning Chicago Blues Machine.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne); Larkin

Discography: AMG (Eugene Chadbourne); Larkin

KING ERNEST

b. Ernest Leon Baker, 5 May 1939; Natchez, MS
 d. 5 March 2000; Santa Maria, CA

Soul-blues vocalist. In the 1960s, King Ernest recorded in New York for Barry and in Chicago for Sonic, Funk, Mercury, and Blue Soul. He then worked outside music in Los Angeles; on retirement he returned to music and recorded albums for Evidence and Fat Possum, the latter being released posthumously.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
 Dirks, Scott. “King Ernest: The Second Time Around.” Blues Access no. 29 (Spring 1997): 38–41.]

Discography: AMG; LSFP

KING/FEDERAL/QUEEN

Formed in Ohio in 1943 by Sydney Nathan as a country label, King Records foundered after its first few releases and was relaunched in late 1944 from a new address on Brewster Avenue in Cincinnati. Nathan believed in total control, so the Brewster Avenue address housed a recording studio, record pressing plant, printing press, design studio, warehouse, and distributorship in addition to the label’s offices.

The label’s R&B subsidiary, Queen Records, was launched in 1945 with releases from Bull Moose Jackson, Slim Gaillard, Walter Brown, and Annisteen Allen; however, because Nathan did not really understand black music, some of the early R&B material was not recorded by Nathan, but brought in from other labels, mostly from J. Mayo Williams’s stable of small labels and from Sam Goody in New York City. Queen’s only real successes were Nathan’s own recordings by Bull Moose Jackson, so Nathan discontinued Queen in 1947 to concentrate on the main label, and all the R&B disks were reissued in the new R&B series of the King label proper.

King quickly established itself as a major independent record label, signing a succession of successful recording artists such as Lonnie Johnson, Earl Bostic, Ivory Joe Hunter, Wynonie Harris, Todd Rhodes, Tiny Bradshaw, Sonny Thompson, Eddie “Cleanhead” Vinson, and Bill Doggett in the late 1940s and early 1950s. Having his own complete setup in the Midwest, Nathan became a magnet for small labels who were eager for a distribution deal and, in this way, he was able to form partnerships with labels such as Gotham, Miracle, DeLuxe, and Sensation. This also left him in prime position to move in on any promising artists that these labels should discover, and to buy the struggling label for a good price when it began to go under.

Never really getting to grips with rock ‘n’ roll in the 1950s, King continued to aim its recorded product at an adult-oriented audience and when the veteran

A&R specialist Ralph Bass joined the company in 1950 he was given a new subsidiary, Federal Records, to manage from his base in New York City. Federal began by plundering the extensive King vaults for previously unissued material, but the label's first major new find was the vocal group the Dominoes, led by Billy Ward and featuring the soulful lead singing of Clyde McPhatter. King's major find in the 1950s was James Brown, who would become the "Godfather of Soul" in the 1960s, but who had trouble getting a release out of Nathan when he auditioned in 1955. He, nevertheless, went on to score major R&B chart hits on Federal between 1956 and 1960, and even greater success between 1961 and 1971 when he was switched to the main King label.

Nathan died in 1968 and six months later the record company that he had headed for a quarter of a century was sold to Starday Records. It is currently owned by Gusto Records Inc. of Nashville.

DAVE PENNY

Bibliography

- Daniels, Bill. "Queen Records." Whiskey, Women, And ... 11 (June 1983): 12.
 Ruppli, Michel. The King Labels. 2 vols. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1985.

Discography: McGrath

- Edwards, Dave, and Mike Callahan. "King/Federal/Deluxe Story." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/king/kingstory.html>.
The King R&B Box Set (1995, King KBSCD-7002).

KING, FREDDIE

b. Freddie Christian, 3 September 1934; Gilmer, TX
 d. 28 December 1976; Dallas, TX

Guitarist and singer. He was born Freddie Christian, but later adopted his mother's maiden name as his professional name, styling himself Freddy until sometime in the mid-1960s, and thereafter Freddie. He claimed that his playing reflected both his country and city influences. At well over six feet and with a bulk to match, he cut an impressive figure on stage with his trademark Gibson guitars, and was a powerful and energized performer capable of generating immense excitement. His singing was less striking than his playing, but at his best he was able to invest a song with a raw emotional force. He was brought up in rural Texas, and by his own testimony began playing guitar at the age of six. He was familiar with country blues styles and with artists like Blind Lemon Jefferson and Lightnin' Hopkins. Nonetheless, his own music tended to reflect the urban and electric influence of Chicago, where he took up residence after finishing school in 1950. He worked in a steel mill for a time while easing his way into in the West Side blues scene, and was befriended by Muddy Waters, Jimmy Rogers, Robert Lockwood, and other musicians in the city.

He began to perform, initially as a sideman and then as a leader of his own group. He cited Jimmy Rogers and Eddie Taylor as important influences in the evolution of his own mode of finger-picking. He developed a distinctive hard-hitting guitar style, using a combination of steel finger-pick and plastic thumb-pick. He made his recording debut in 1957 for the El-Bee label, but came to wider attention with his instrumental record "Hide Away" (sometimes referred to as "Hideaway"), made for King Records through their subsidiary, Federal Records, in 1960. The tune owed its name to Mel's Hideaway Lounge, a noted Chicago blues club. He acknowledged that the primary inspiration for the tune had come from a boogie shuffle by Hound Dog Taylor, which he had adapted to his own needs.

It provided his only top forty hit, and became a staple of the blues repertoire. He went on to record a number of albums for the label in both vocal and instrumental formats, working with pianist and arranger Sonny Thompson. Other significant recordings from his King/Federal albums include "Lonesome Whistle Blues," "Just Pickin'," "I'm Tore Down," "The Stumble," and "Have You Ever Loved a Woman." Some of his records for the label were unashamedly commercial rather than genuine blues recordings, and capitalized on the fad for novelties of the era, including boss nova and surfing.

He moved back to Texas in 1963, basing himself in Dallas. He left King Records in 1966, claiming later that he was tired of being told what songs to record. He continued to perform regularly, and signed to the Atlantic Records subsidiary Cotillion after a two-year recording hiatus. He turned out two records for the label, Freddie King Is a Blues Master (1969) and My Feeling for the Blues (1970), but complained that his guitar was overshadowed by the weight of the band arrangements.

It was an era when the admiring testimony and overt emulation of white blues and rock musicians helped propel many of their original influences back into the limelight, and brought their music to a new audience on the rock circuit. His career had been boosted by the praise of English musicians like Eric Clapton and John Mayall, and he began to appear at major rock venues and festivals. He fared rather better in the studio when he left Cotillion and signed to Leon Russell's Shelter label, working with the American rock artist on arguably his best album, Getting Ready... (1971), and two subsequent disks, the live Texas Cannonball (1972) and the more patchy Woman Across the River (1973).

When Shelter faltered over both business and personal problems, it was Eric Clapton who persuaded the guitarist to sign for the RSO label run by his manager, Robert Stigwood, in 1974. The recordings he made for the label, Burglar (1974) and Larger Than Life (1975), revealed a greater pop and funk influence in his work. He seemed to be moving away from the bedrock blues that had sustained his music, although his live shows remained considerably more blues-rooted. Where that direction might have led became a moot point when he was taken unwell after a Christmas Day concert in Dallas and admitted to hospital. He was suffering from pancreatitis and bleeding ulcers, and subsequently heart failure. He died in hospital three days later at the age of forty-two.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- AMG (Stephen Thomas Erlewine and Cub Koda); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Flippo, Chet. "Freddie King and His Heavy Blues." Rolling Stone 96 (November 25, 1971): 16.
 Forte, Dan. "Freddie King." In Rollin' and Tumblin': The Postwar Blues Guitarists, edited by Jas Obrecht. San Francisco: Miller Freeman Books, 2000.
 Grasso, Skip. Freddy King: Vital Blues Guitar: Authentic Tablature Transcriptions Off the Original Recordings. Ojai, CA: Creative Concepts, 1994.
 Schuller, Tim, Bruce Iglauer, Hans Schweitz, and Janne Rosenqvist. "Freddie King." In The Voice of the Blues: Classic Interviews from Living Blues Magazine, edited by Jim O'Neal and Amy van Singel. New York: Routledge, 2002.

Discography: AMG; LSF

Selected Recordings

"Country Boy"/"That's What You Think" (1957, El-Bee 157); "Hide Away" (1960, Federal 12401); Freddie King Sings (1961, King 762); Let's Hide Away and Dance Away (1961, King 773); Bossa Nova and Blues (1963, King 821); Bonanza of Instrumentals (1964, King 928); Freddie King is a Blues Master (1969, Cotillion SD9004); My Feeling for the Blues (1970, Cotillion, SD9016); Getting Ready ... (1971, Shelter 8905); Texas Cannonball (1972, Shelter 8913); Woman Across the River (1973, Shelter 8919); Burglar (1974, RSO 4803); Larger Than Life (1975, RSO 4811).

KING, "LITTLE" JIMMY

- b. Manuel Gales, 4 December 1964; Memphis, TN
 d. 19 July 2002; Memphis, TN

Born Manuel Gales, he fashioned his stage name from his influences Jimi Hendrix and Albert King. He was mentored by Albert King, with whom he toured in 1988–1991. He recorded four CDs as a solo artist, and one with his brothers as the Gales Brothers. He died unexpectedly of an apparent heart attack.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Barretta, Scott. "Little Jimmy King" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 166 (November/December 2002): 88–89.
 Bonner, Brett. "Little Jimmy King." Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 56–59.

Discography: AMG

KING, RILEY B. "B. B."

- b. 16 September 1925; Itta Bena (near Indianola), MS

B. B. King is the leading figure in the blues today, the music's best-known performer and its greatest ambassador. His trademark guitar fills, sharp and sweet at the same time, burst forth from trusty "Lucille," and the whole world responds. He sings in a melodious and soulful voice about the life he has led and the trials he has survived in love and in the music business he has been a part of for more than fifty years. He is intelligent and articulate, friendly and humble, knowledgeable in music and many other subjects, and one of the hardest working people in the business.

Awards have included honorary doctorates at Yale and Berklee College of Music, the 1990 Presidential Medal of the Arts, 1991 National Heritage Fellowship, and the 1995 Kennedy Center Honors. He was a founding member of the John F. Kennedy Performing Arts Center. He also cofounded the Foundation for the Advancement of Inmate Recreation and Rehabilitation (FAIRR). He has been awarded innumerable music industry honors: Grammy Awards, W. C. Handy Awards, NAACP Image Awards, and Downbeat Critics' Poll. The list goes on. No one else in the blues field has ever been so honored.

B. B. King in performance in Columbia, South Carolina, April 2003. (Photo by Gene Tomko)

Childhood

Riley B. King was born in the Mississippi Delta, and picked cotton throughout his youth. At age five his parents split up. He credits his schoolteacher, Luther Henson, as his first and perhaps most important influence because Henson gave him hope and let him know that there was a world beyond the cotton fields. The Reverend Archie Fair of the Elkhorn Baptist Church next to his school provided him with his first exposure to the guitar.

His mother died at age twenty-five, possibly of diabetes and lack of medical care. Riley—at age ten—began living alone in the sharecropper's cabin in the hills of Kilmichael where he had lived with his mother since she moved them from the Delta. He was very much a loner, and spent a lot of time listening to recordings of Blind Lemon Jefferson and Lonnie Johnson on his aunt's Victrola. Since no one read to him as a child, he became an avid moviegoer: cowboy-singer stars like Gene Autry and Tex Ritter provided him with a model he liked. More than just shooting straight, they sang and got the girl. His first guitar was a fifteen-dollar Stella.

King began his performing career as a gospel singer with three other boys as the Elkhorn Jubilee Singers, attempting unsuccessfully to imitate the Golden Gate Quartet. But he soon gravitated to the blues as a truer personal expression and because there was more money to be made. In his mid-teens he heard T-Bone Walker for the first time on record. King himself says that his greatest musical debt is to Walker.

King married his first wife, Martha Lee, and did basic training in the U.S. Army in 1944, only to return to Indianola to work in the fields growing cotton.

After World War II, King went to Memphis, living with his cousin Bukka White. White played a primitive brand of Mississippi slide guitar blues, in contrast to what would become King's signature smooth and urbane style. But when King was younger, White performed in the farm country and talked to King about the guitar, the music, gambling, and life in the big cities beyond the Delta. After moving back home one last time for a year, King settled in Memphis in 1947.

Becoming a Professional

He got his first taste of the music business by approaching Aleck Miller "Sonny Boy Williamson," who played harmonica and had a radio show on KWEM in West Memphis, Arkansas. King convinced Williamson to allow him on the program. His singing and guitar playing were an immediate local hit. He then went on WDIA, the powerful Memphis station that played black music, first with a ten-minute daily spot performing blues and hawking an alcohol-based tonic called Pepticon. The white ukulele-strumming radio host Arthur Godfrey, who had a relaxed manner and success with advertising, provided King with a prominent model for his career at this critical point.

In 1949, he became a full-time disk jockey on WDIA, known as the Beale Street Blues Boy (later shortened to "B. B.>"). He educated himself in blues and jazz by listening to the records at the station and by expanding his contacts in the thriving musical community to include Robert Lockwood and Bobby Bland. His recording career also began that year.

In 1951, he recorded his first number one R&B hit, "Three O'Clock Blues" for the Modern label. It was recorded at Sam Phillips's Sun Studio and stayed at number one for seventeen weeks in 1952. He toured based on this hit and performed at the New York's Apollo Theatre, among other prized venues on the black music circuit. He became a nationally known name on the circuit, considering himself an R&B artist like Fats Domino and Percy Mayfield.

King in Full Swing

Other hits followed. Most successful and acclaimed by critics were "Sweet Little Angel" and "Every Day I Have the Blues" from the mid-1950s. During this period King recorded for the Bihari Brothers in Los Angeles, who owned Modern and its subsidiaries: RPM, Kent, Crown, Flair, and Meteor. One of the professionals who was most supportive of King was Maxwell Davis, a Los Angeles-based arranger and producer who helped shape King's early sound and direction. Davis worked with King on many of his best records, providing simple but intelligent—and very bluesy—horn and rhythm charts that fit King's musical temperament perfectly.

King's career has been documented by numerous singles, LPs, and CDs from the 1950s to the present. The unique and profoundly influential characteristics associated with his music were already in evidence in his best-selling recordings from the first decade. His relationship with Lucille is a perfect example of call and response. Lucille is a thin hollow-body Gibson guitar that he plays with a flat pick. In his autobiography he says that there have been seventeen Lucilles. He doesn't play rhythm guitar in the conventional sense, accompanying himself as he sings. Lucille has her own voice, and from her come fills, biting or smooth, staccato bursts or long easy phrases, in response to B. B.'s heartfelt vocal pleadings. When he sings, the band plays, and Lucille is silent.

This is unlike most other guitarists who keep a steady chord or riff pattern going behind the vocal.

It is pure antiphony (the musical term for call and response), and is a characteristic that goes back to the African roots of this music and black culture in general. King doesn't consider himself a virtuoso guitarist. He sees himself learning new things all the time, and existing within technical limitations that some other players don't have. He's truly a modest person.

For years, indeed decades, King maintained a remarkably demanding schedule of touring. Often he played more than three hundred dates a year. The record is 342 in 1956. He has a reputation for treating his band and other employees very well.

After switching to ABC/Paramount in 1962, King made what is one of the greatest blues recordings ever, Live at the Regal, at the esteemed theater in Chicago. But as riveting as the performance was, it didn't move his career along as he expected it would.

The late 1960s brought King together with Sid Seidenberg, who was to be his manager from that point forward. Seidenberg connected King with Joe Glaser, Louis Armstrong's agent, and put things together for him in a better and more logical way than before. Seidenberg also came up with the idea of B. B. King performing for rock audiences and sharing the stage with his acknowledged disciples. These moves, accompanied by his success with "The Thrill Is Gone" in 1970, put King in the international limelight. He opened concerts for the Rolling Stones, among others, at the Fillmores East and West.

In 1988 he performed with U2 on Rattle and Hum to much acclaim. His featured vocal, "When Love Comes to Town," won an MTV Video Music Award. Although struggling with diabetes, weight, and other health problems for a number of years, he remains active concertizing, greeting fans at his nightclub in Memphis, and enjoying the interest in this music that he, more than anyone else, has done to create.

B. B. King has fifteen children, all by different mothers. In his own words, he is not a good father, "but no one has loved his children more than I have." He has led a very complicated but ultimately satisfying life on the road; he has never really stopped traveling the United States and the world performing for adoring crowds. His musical children number in the millions.

LENNY CARLSON

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Keil, Charles. Urban Blues. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966.

KING, RILEY B. "B. B."

King, B. B., with David Ritz. Blues All Around Me: The Autobiography of B. B. King. New York: Avon Books, 1996.

Kostelanetz, Richard. The B. B. King Companion. New York: Schirmer, 1997.

Transcription Books

Note: There are a number of these; these are two more recent ones:

King, B. B., and Jeannette DeLisa. King of the Blues. Miami, FL: CPP/Belwin, 1993.

Rubin, Dave. The Best of B. B. King: King of the Electric Blues Guitar. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 1997.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Note: Because B. B. King is still alive and because there is such a surfeit of recorded material and other information about him, the following websites provide the best sources for a current discography:

Official B. B. King website, <http://www.bbking.com> (updated frequently). <http://www.worldblues.com> (original catalog numbers and dates listed; updated less frequently than preceding entry).

KING, SAUNDERS

b. 13 March 1909; Staple, LA

d. 31 August 2000; Los Angeles, CA

Guitar/vocal. As a child, King played piano, banjo, and ukulele in his preacher father's Oakland church. He switched to guitar in 1938 for NBC broadcasts with a gospel quartet, the Southern Harmony Four, in which he sang tenor, and took up electric guitar after hearing Charlie Christian. He was in Jake Porter's band before forming his own sextet in 1942 and recording with them for Rhythm. "S. K. Blues" (1942, Rhythm 3) entered the repertoire of many other singers. After war work with Special Services, he resumed bandleading and recording for Rhythm and later Specialty, Aladdin, and Flair in a musical idiom that mixed swing and jump/rhythm and blues and extensively featured his own blues singing. "Write Me a Letter Blues"/"Swingin'" (1946, Rhythm 206) and "St. James Infirmary Blues"/"Little Girl" (1949, Aladdin 3027) document the group's development. They continued to play, mainly around Los Angeles and San Francisco, into the early 1950s after which recording opportunities declined. His last session in 1961 included a remake of "S. K. Blues" (Galaxy 712), after which he retired, though he still played in church and occasional blues gigs. In the 1960s he held a long residency at a club in Sunnyvale, California. In 1979, he guested on an album by his son-in-law, the rock guitarist Carlos Santana.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Notini, Per. Liner notes for Saunders King: What's Your Story, Morning Glory (1982, Blues Boy BB303, Stockholm).

Obrecht, Jas. "Saunders King." Living Blues no. 126 (March/April 1996): 46–55.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

KING SNAKE

Founded in 1983 (Sanford, Florida) and run by bassist/producer Bob Greenlee, the King Snake label issued quite a few stellar blues, swamp blues, R&B, and roots rock albums during the late 1980s through 2003. Artists such as Kenny Neal and Raful Neal had their first solo albums issued on King Snake, while Lucky Peterson, Bill Wharton, Noble "Thin Man" Watts, and Sonny Rhodes had some of their best releases come out on King Snake.

Greenlee founded the label after converting a carriage house on his property into a studio in 1983; the label's first release came in 1986: "Don't Let This Happen to You" by singer Root Boy Slim.

Largely the vision of Greenlee (who played bass on most King Snake releases), the label encompassed not only traditional and contemporary blues, but blues-influenced Southern rock and urban soul as well. Former Grinderswitch member Dru Lombar's Dr. Hector & The Groove Injectors found a home for their Southern boogie on King Snake, as did future Mavericks' guitarist Nick Kane, with his group Iko-Iko. On the soul side, King Snake issued sets by singers Erica Guerin, Chicago Bob Nelson, and Roy Roberts.

With Greenlee's death from cancer in February 2004, his family scaled back operations—continuing to support the existing catalog, and new releases from artists already in the King Snake fold.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

King Snake website, <http://www.kingsnakerecords.com/> (accessed December 18, 2004).

Selected Recordings

Bill Wharton. South of the Blues (1994, King Snake 23).

Iko-Iko. Snowstorm in the Jungle (1988, King Snake 9).

Kenny Neal. Bio on the Bayou (1987, King Snake 5).

Sonny Rhodes. The Blues Is My Best Friend (1994, King Snake 22).

KINSEY, LESTER “BIG DADDY”

b. 18 March 1927; Pleasant Grove, MS
 d. 3 April 2001; Gary, IN

Singer, slide guitarist, and harmonica player, Kinsey was a leading force on the Gary, Indiana, blues scene. His three sons—Donald, Ralph, and Kenneth—founded the Kinsey Report band in 1984, when Kinsey recorded Bad Situation, the first of his four albums. He recorded for Rooster Blues, Blind Pig, Verve, and Polydor. Kinsey so idolized Muddy Waters that he later became a featured attraction in a Muddy Waters tribute band that toured in the 1990s, and recorded his I Am the Blues album with former Waters band members.

JIM O’NEAL

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O’Neal); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
 Dahl, Bill. “Big Daddy Kinsey and the Kinsey Report.”
Living Blues no. 75 (1987): 16–20.

Discography: AMGKINSEY REPORT

Formed in 1984 in Gary, Indiana. The family band formed by the sons of Delta bluesman Lester “Big Daddy” Kinsey fused rock, reggae, and contemporary urban blues stylings. Guitarist/vocalist Donald, who, billed as B. B. King Jr., performed with his father as a thirteen-year-old and worked and recorded with Albert King in the early 1970s, also had an extensive career in reggae, including recording and touring with Peter Tosh and Bob Marley. Drummer Ralph, who joined Donald in the rock group White Lightning, and bassist Kenneth formed the core of the band. It made its recording debut in 1988 with Edge of the City.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O’Neal); Larkin; Santelli
 Dahl, Bill. “Big Daddy Kinsey and the Kinsey Report.”
Living Blues no. 75 (1987): 16–19.

Discography: AMGKIRK, ANDREW DEWEY “ANDY”

b. 28 May 1898; Newport, KY
 d. 11 December 1992; New York, NY

Bandleader and bassist. He is best known for leading the Kansas City jazz band the Clouds of Joy, which included the remarkable pianist and arranger Mary Lou Williams, then at the beginning of her career.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Chilton; New Grove Jazz
 Kirk, Andy. Twenty Years on Wheels. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1989.

Discography: LordKIRKLAND, EDDIE

b. 16 August 1928; Kingston, Jamaica

Singer, songwriter, and guitarist famous for his distinctive riffs and performance style. Kirkland began to play guitar in Dothan, Alabama, and was influenced by local bluesman Blind Murphy. He moved to the Detroit area in the 1940s, and toured and recorded with John Lee Hooker. He also toured briefly with Otis Redding and recorded with King Curtis. Kirkland is currently touring internationally in his own name.

DEBBIE BOND

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
 Underwood, Tut. “Eddie Kirkland: The Energy Man.”
Living Blues no. 111 (September/October 1993): 14–21.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Note: Complete discography available at <http://www.eddiekirkland.com>.

KIRKLAND, LEROY

b. 10 February 1906; SC
 d. 6 April 1988; New York City, NY

Initially a guitarist, in the 1930s he emerged as an arranger and songwriter for Erskine Hawkins. During the 1940s he worked for the Dorsey Brothers, but also began writing arrangements for recording sessions for the Savoy, Okeh, and Mercury labels. Near the end of his life, he turned to gospel music.

EDWARD KOMARA

KIRKLAND, LEROY

Bibliography

Larkin

Hess, Norbert. "Leroy Kirkland." Juke Blues no. 14 (Winter 1988/1989): 21.

KIRKPATRICK, BOB

b. 1 January 1934; Haynesville, LA

Dallas and east Texas electric guitarist and singer. For many years he has chosen to stay at home with family, and so has been active mostly around Dallas. Through a brother he was booked at the Newport Folk Festival several times starting in 1970. His music has been recorded and issued by Folkways, JSP, and Red Lightnin'.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

Hutchinson, Billy. "Bob Kirkpatrick Gets That Home Feeling." Blues & Rhythm no. 127 (March 1998): 11.

KITTRELL, CHRISTINE

b. 11 August 1929; Nashville, TN

d. 16 December 2001; Columbus, OH

Singer who made her signature record "Sittin' Here Drinkin'" for Tennessee label in 1951. For the next fifteen years she worked at length with Dave Bartholomew, Memphis Slim, and Johnny Otis. In 1962 she recorded for Vee-Jay "I'm a Woman," which would be later covered by Peggy Lee and Koko Taylor. In 1966–1968 she performed in Vietnam. She retired to Columbus, Ohio, in 1968, but she made a local return to performing in 1991 until her death.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Barretta, Scott. "Christine Kittrell" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 165 (September/October 2002): 89.

Discography: LSFP

KIZART, LEE

Flourished 1920s–1970

Pianist active in the Mississippi Delta from the 1920s through 1967. He was interviewed and recorded by William Ferris in 1967 for the book Blues from the Delta (London: Studio Vista, 1970, revised 1978) and related articles and LP issues. Afterward he moved from Tutwiler, Mississippi, to Dallas, Texas.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Ferris, William. "Mississippi Country Bluesmen: New Discoveries: Lee Kizart's Tutwiler Blues" [part 1]. Blues Unlimited no. 97 (December 1972): 10–11; [part 2]. Blues Unlimited no. 98 (January 1973): 14–15.

Discography: LSFP

KIZART, WILLIE

b. Willie Lee Kizart, 4 January 1932; Tutwiler, MS

d. 2 September 1998; Dallas, TX

As electric guitarist for Ike Turner's Kings of Rhythm, Kizart is most well known as the guitarist on "Rocket 88," a number one R&B hit in 1951 by Jackie Brentson and His Delta Cats, actually Turner's band. "Rocket 88" was recorded by Sam Phillips at his Memphis Recording Service (later Sun) and leased to Chess. According to legend, Kizart's amp fell off the car on the way to the recording session, breaking its speaker cone, and giving the guitar a buzz tone that would make the record famous. Some scholars consider it to be the first rock 'n' roll recording.

OLIVIA CARTER MATHER

Bibliography

Dawson, Jim, and Steve Propes. What Was the First Rock 'n' Roll Record? Boston: Faber and Faber, 1992.

K.O.B. (KINGS OF THE BLUES)

British record label active in the late 1960s that produced reissue LPs by Memphis Minnie, Leroy Carr, and Big Bill Broonzy.

HOWARD RYE

KODA, MICHAEL "CUB"

b. 1 October 1948; Detroit, MI

d. 1 July 2000; Chelsea, MI

Musician and writer. Koda's early fame was as the leader of the rock group Brownsville Station, and as composer of their 1973 hit "Smokin' in the Boys Room." Later he wrote articles about blues and rock music history and on record collecting for Goldmine and DISCoveries magazines. He also cowrote the All Media Guide to Blues and Blues for Dummies.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Stephen Thomas Erlewine)

Klink, P. "Cub Koda: The Final Interview, on Rockin', Writin', and the Sad State of Country Music." Goldmine 27 (August 10, 2001): 34.

KOERNER, RAY & GLOVER

Minneapolis-based trio composed of "Spider" John Koerner, Dave "Snaker" Ray, and Tony "Little Sun" Glover. Leading figures in the urban folk-blues revival of the early and mid-1960s, they were known for a boisterous ensemble approach to traditional and original blues as well as solo work highlighting the iconoclastic personal styles of guitarist-singers Koerner and Ray. The members parted as a group in the late 1960s to pursue individual projects but reunited periodically for special performances in the 1970s, 1980s, and 1990s.

JOSEPH A. LAROSE

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Larkin

Ray, J. David. "Koerner, Ray & Glover Biography," 2002, <http://www.jdray.com/PRESS/Bio/KRGBIO.html> (accessed January 3, 2005).

Discography: AMG

KOKOMO

British record label, operated from Manchester by Trevor Huyton and devoted to the reissue of prewar blues. At least six anthologies were produced, the first in 1967. All were limited editions of ninety-nine copies.

HOWARD RYE

KOLAX, KING

b. William Little, 6 November 1912; Kansas City, MO

d. 18 December 1991; Chicago, IL

Chicago jazz and blues trumpet player and band-leader. He led a big band from 1935 to 1946, and then joined the famed Billy Eckstine band. In 1947, Kolax re-formed his big band, but by the following year he had reduced his ensemble to a combo. His first recording under his own name was with Opera in 1948. Beginning in 1951, Kolax and his band were used on a variety of blues and vocal group recording sessions, notably with Nature Boy Brown, Joe Williams, Johnny Sellers, Danny Overbea, Flamingos, and Grant Jones. A session for JOB in 1951 included first-rate work by his band with Dick Davis and Prentice McCary and a spectacular solo feature for his trumpet. Other sessions under his own name were recorded for Vee-Jay (1954 and 1955) and Top Rank (1955). By 1957 Kolax was beginning to have trouble finding work for his group. In the early 1960s, he worked as A&R man for a small Chicago label, Marvello Records, and recorded behind such soul artists as Jerry Butler and McKinley Mitchell and bluesman Otis Rush. Some late 1960s session included a Brother Jack McDuff session in 1966, Willie Mabon's last session in 1969, and a Gene Ammons session in July 1970. King Kolax played in his last recording session in August 1970 for Delmark, behind Roosevelt Sykes.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

New Grove Jazz

Campbell, Robert L., Armin Büttner, and Robert Pruter. "The King Kolax Discography." Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/kolax.html> (accessed June 6, 2003).

Discography: Lord; LSFP

KORNER, ALEXIS

b. 19 April 1928; Paris, France

d. 1 or 2 January 1984; London, England

Alexis Korner began his musical career in London's traditional jazz and skiffle scene. Korner joined the Chris Barber Band in 1949 where he met Cecil Davis. Korner and Davis directed their attention toward the American blues scene. Shortly after leaving the Chris Barber Band, Korner and Davis founded and ran the Thursday Night Blues and Barrelhouse Club in London in 1957. The club featured many American blues artists, including Sonny Terry, Big Bill Broonzy, and Brownie McGhee. In 1961, Korner and Davis formed Blues Incorporated, which became the resident band of London's Marquee Club in 1962. In addition to Korner and Davis, the band featured numerous musicians who serve as a who's who of the early British R&B and rock scene, including Charlie Watts, Ron Wood, Ginger Baker, Jack Bruce, Mick Jagger, Long John Baldry, and Paul Jones. After the breakup of Blues Incorporated in 1966, Korner formed the short-lived Free at Last, followed by New Church and later CCS (Collective Consciousness Society), which proved to be the most commercially successful of his bands and gave Korner his first single on the charts.

In addition to his performances and recordings, Korner's television appearances and Sunday-night radio show on BBC Radio One also helped to promote the blues. Korner continued to perform and educate people about the blues until his death in 1984. His advocacy of the blues served as an inspiration for many young blues musicians in the United Kingdom, and his band Blues Incorporated served as a vehicle for the formation of bands such as Cream, the Yardbirds, the Rolling Stones, the Animals, and the Pretty Things.

ROBERT WEBB FRY II

Bibliography

- AMG (Bruce Eder); Larkin; Santelli
Brisenden, M. "Alexis Korner" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 59 (Spring 1984): 39.
Bruning, Bob. Blues: The British Connection. London: Helter Skelter, 1995.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

- Red Hot from Alex* (1964, Transatlantic).
Alexis' Blues Incorporated...Plus (1965, Decca/Ace of clubs).
Alexis' Blues Incorporated...Sky High (1967, Spot/Indigo).
Alexis Korner's All Stars Blues Incorporated (1969, Transatlantic).
New Church...Both Sides (1970, Metronome).
CCS ... First (1970, RAK).

KUBEK, SMOKIN' JOE

b. 30 November 1956; Grove City, PA

Guitarist. The precocious Kubek was playing with Freddie King at age fourteen and ultimately began leading his own band on the Dallas blues bar scene. His career took a major leap forward in the early 1980s when he entered into a musical partnership with singer/guitarist Bnois King of Monroe, Louisiana. The combination of Kubek's raw, hard-edged blues approach, both on guitar and vocals, and King's smooth and jazzy style gave the band an unusually well-rounded and expansive sound that it perfected through an almost nonstop schedule of live shows.

By the late 1980s Kubek had established the band as a steady touring attraction in the Southwest and it began to expand its regional popularity. Steppin' Out Texas Style, its 1991 debut recording, raised the group's profile and Kubek took the act on the road nationally. It rarely left the road for the next decade, touring incessantly and successfully through blues venues of all sizes in all locations.

The band continued recording, releasing well-reviewed albums such as Texas Cadillac, Cryin' for the Moon, and Got My Mind Back. Little Milton and Jimmy Thackery each added some guitar on Take Your Best Shot in 1998 but the group was heard to best advantage without outside involvement, such as on its 2003 Roadhouse Research release and on Show Me Money, with Anson Funderburgh as a guitar guest on only one track, which followed a year later.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli
Tipaldi, Art. "Smokin' Joe Kubek and Bnois King: A Guitar Partnership." Blues Revue no. 33 (December 1997): 22-26.

Discography: AMG

L

L + R

Record label of Horst Lippman and Fritz Rau, concert promoters who organized a series of American Folk Blues (& Gospel) Festivals for European tours during 1962–1972 and 1980–1983. Recordings from the concerts by such artists as Sonny Boy Williamson (Aleck Miller), Sunnyland Slim, Lightnin' Hopkins, Howlin' Wolf, and John Henry Barbee were among the label's most important. The label also notably acquired for general distribution two albums of politically oriented blues by J. B. Lenoir (1965/1966) and recorded similar material by Louisiana Red in 1983. The catalog has been available to Evidence for U.S. release in the twenty-first century.

HOWARD RYE

LACEY, RUBIN “RUBE”

b. 2 January 1901; Pelahatchie, MS
d. 14 November 1969; Bakersfield, CA

Last name sometimes shown as Lacy. Though under-recorded, guitarist and mandolinist Lacey was instrumental in shaping Mississippi prewar blues. After cutting four unissued sides for Columbia in 1927 and two for Paramount the following year, he became a Baptist preacher in 1932.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Evans, David. “Rubin Lacy.” In Nothing But the Blues, edited by Mike Leadbitter, pp. 239–245. London: Hanover, 1971.

Discography: DGR

LACEY, WILLIAM JAMES “BILL”

b. 25 February 1915; Selma, AL
d. 8 April 1977; Chicago, IL

Guitarist known mostly for his sideman work on the 1945–1953 RCA Bluebird recordings of Sonny Boy Williamson I (John Lee Williamson), Jazz Gillum, Roosevelt Sykes, and Tampa Red, among others. He also performed vocals and guitar as a member of the Brown Buddies in popular music and blues to white audiences in 1944–1955.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Wisner, Steve. “William James Lacey.” Living Blues no. 35 (November/December 1977): 39–40.

LAMBERT, LLOYD

b. 4 June 1928; Thibodeaux, LA
d. 31 October 1995; New Orleans, LA

Bassist, composer, bandleader. Lloyd Lambert, brother of pianist Phamous Lambert and grandfather of New Orleans bluesman Kipori Woods, played bass for Roy Brown, Ray Charles, and Wallace Davenport and led the Guitar Slim band in the 1950s.

LAMBERT, LLOYD

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Dahl, Bill. "Lloyd Lambert." Living Blues no. 126 (March/April 1996): 61–62.

Discography: LSFP

LANCE, MAJOR

b. 4 April 1939; Winterville, MS
d. 3 September 1994; Decatur, GA

Chicago soul singer who for a few short years in the mid-1960s was one of the biggest R&B artists in the country. His thin but interestingly piercing vocals were perfectly showcased by producer Carl Davis, and the result was a series of sparkling and brassy dance records on OKeh Records that virtually defined the more energetic side of the Chicago sound in soul, notably "Monkey Time" (1963), "Um Um Um Um Um Um" (1964), and "Rhythm" (1964). Lance subsequently recorded for Carl Davis's Dakar label (scoring with "Follow the Leader" in 1968), for Curtis Mayfield's Curtom label (1970), Volt (1971–1972), Playboy (1973–1975), his own label Osiris (1975), Columbia (1977), and Motown's Soul label (1978). Lance recorded in England during 1972–1974, where his records had particular appeal for "Northern Soul" fans. His last recordings were made for Kat Family in 1982. Lance performed at the 1994 Chicago Blues Festival.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. "Major Lance: A Forgotten Star of Chicago Soul." Goldmine 3 (January 1997): 127ff.

LANDRETH, SONNY

b. 1 February 1951; Canton, MS

Louisiana-based rock and blues guitarist is best known among blues fans for his work backing John Mayall and Allen Touissant. His professional life began with a short stint with Clifton Chenier in the 1970s; his subsequent career has also taken in work with rock acts Jimmy Buffett, John Hiatt, Leslie West, and Mountain.

Most of his reputation in the blues world has come from his work with other artists. He has appeared as a guest guitarist for everyone from Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown to the Muddy Waters Tribute Band, Marcia Ball to Eddie Kirkland. His musical interests extend far beyond the blues, though, and he's also recorded with Cajun superstars Beausoleil, pop star Terence Trent D'Arby, Hawaiian slack-key legend Ledward Kaapana, and country icon Dolly Parton.

While revered among guitar fans as the ultimate session man—in much the same pantheon as Mark Knopfler or Ry Cooder—Landreth's work as a leader has been less successful. Veering between Cajun, country, rock, and blues, his own recordings have been criticized as uneven, and his singing is nowhere near the equal of his guitar playing. His first release was blues oriented, then came several that were more Cajun and rock, and in 2003, he returned to the blues for The Road We're On.

To this point, Landreth's career most resembles that of his late hero, Chet Atkins—a man whose work with others made his guitar prowess legendary, but who never really found his footing as a leader in his own right.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin

Discography: AMG

Blues Attack (1996, AVI 8001).
The Road We're On (2003, Sugar Hill 3964).

LANE, MARY

b. 23 November 1935; Clarendon, AR

Began singing in Arkansas with Robert Nighthawk around 1953. She sang with other blues musicians in an uncle's club in Brinkley, Arkansas. Lane moved to Chicago in 1957, then sang with Morris Pejoe in the 1960s, and with Junior Wells in the early 1980s. She has stayed active in the Chicago West Side clubs.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Sharp, Steven. "Chicago Special: Mary Lane." Living Blues no. 123 (September/October 1995): 38–39.

LANG, EDDIE

b. Eddie Langlois, 15 January 1936; New Orleans, LA
 d. 10 March 1985; Slidell, LA

Guitarist who was nicknamed “Little Eddie” for his short height while he was in Guitar Slim’s (Eddie Jones) band in 1952. Although he recorded for the Savoy and RPM labels in the mid-1950s, he spent most of his career in south Louisiana. Food Stamp Blues (Super Dome label) was a minor hit for him in 1973. He suffered a stroke in 1979, ending his career.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
 O’ Neal, Jim. “Eddie Lang” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 66 (1985): 45.

Discography: LSFP

LANG, JONNY

b. Jon Gordon Langseth, 29 January 1981; Fargo, ND

His powerful guitar playing and his rough singing made Lang the main representative of the 1990s youth generation of blues-rock. He has toured with B. B. King, Buddy Guy, and Aerosmith. His debut Lie to Me (1997, A&M) and the following Wander This World (1998, A&M) both went platinum.

THORSTEN HINDRICHS

Bibliography

AMG (Stephen Thomas Erlewine)
 Carpenter, Bil. “Jonny Be Good! Jonny Lang Decries, Defies the Notion That Youths Can’t Feel the Blues.” Goldmine 25 (18 June 1999): 38.
 Powell, Bryan. “The Kids Are Alright: A New Generation in Search of Respect.” Blues Access no. 35 (Fall 1998): 12–25.

Discography: AMG

See also Rock ’n’ Roll

LANOR RECORDS

Active since 1960, with Bobby and Pat Murry as owners and producers. This label located in Jennings, Louisiana, specializes in blues, Cajun, zydeco, and bluegrass.

EDWARD KOMARA

Lanor Records website, <http://www.lanorrecords.com> (accessed September 27, 2004).

LARKIN, MILTON “TIPPY”

b. 1910; Navasota, TX
 d. 31 August 1996; Houston, TX

Trombonist, bandleader. Larkin’s popular Texas blues-based territorial band served as the launching pad for numerous international jazz careers, including those of saxophonists Illinois Jacquet and Arnett Cobb, as well as a training ground for bluesmen T-Bone Walker, Eddie “Cleanhead” Vinson, and others.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Wood, Roger. “Milt Larkin” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 131 (January/February 1997): 62.

LASALLE, DENISE

b. Denise Allen or Denise Craig, 16 July 1939; LeFlore County, MS

Southern-style soul singer. LaSalle grew up listening to country and western music and the blues, and at the age of thirteen moved to Chicago. Her first recorded success, albeit local, was on Billy “The Kid” Emerson’s Tarpon label, “A Love Reputation” (1967), using the stage name of Denise LaSalle. Subsequently she married Bill Jones and the couple formed their own record company (with the Goldstar, Parka, and Crajon imprints), recording herself, Bill Coday, and the Sequins. During 1970–1976, LaSalle joined Westbound, on which she became a national R&B star, recording the million-selling “Trapped by a Thing Called Love” (1971), “Now Run and Tell That” (1972), “Man Sized Job” (1972), and “Married, But Not to Each Other” (1976). All of her recordings were done in Memphis with Willie Mitchell as producer. She then recorded four LPs for ABC, three for MCA. Her last top ten hit was “Love Me Right” (1977) for ABC.

LaSalle divorced Bill Jones in 1974, and moved to Jackson, Tennessee, in 1977, and there reshaped her career as a blues singer, writing and recording in a genre that became known as soul-blues. She first joined the premier soul-blues label, Malaco, in 1983, and some of her notable albums were Lady in the Streets (1983), Still Trapped (1990), Still Bad (1994), and Smokin’ in Bed (1997). While she only hit once for Malaco on the single charts (the novelty song “My Tu-Tu” in 1985), her albums enjoyed solid success in the South with her combination of ballads sung in a gospel style and risqué blues. During 1999–2001, LaSalle recorded three gospel albums.

LASALLE, DENISE

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly and Al Campbell); Larkin; Santelli Nelson, David. "Denise LaSalle: Talkin' That Stuff." Living Blues no. 101 (January/February 1992): 20–24.

Discography: AMG

LASTIE, DAVID

b. 11 November 1934; New Orleans, LA

d. 5 December 1987; New Orleans, LA

Tenor saxophonist, composer, bandleader. David Lastie, member of a musical family that included Melvin and Walter Lastie and Jessie Hill, was featured soloist on many R&B recordings and led the popular bands The Gladiators and A Taste of New Orleans. Lastie worked with Dr. John, Jessie Hill, Harold Battiste, James Booker, and Snooks Eaglin.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Battiste, Harold. "David Lastie." Blues & Rhythm no. 35 (March 1988): 14.

Hannusch, Jeff. "David Lastie." Juke Blues no. 11 (Winter 1987/1988): 19.

LATIMORE, BENNY

b. Benjamin Lattimore, 7 September 1939; Charleston, TN

Benny Lattimore, usually billed simply as Latimore, came to national prominence on the soul-blues circuit in 1974 with his number one R&B hit, "Let's Straighten It Out," which has become a modern-day standard in many blues singers' repertoires. The song, a plea for understanding and reconciliation between lovers, also set the tone for the sensitive and sensual themes that have made Latimore a favorite among female audiences.

He has a harder blues side as well, which dates back to his early days in Tennessee, where his father played banjo and his mother played guitar. Latimore started singing in church, and sang with a vocal group, the Neptunes, when he attended Tennessee A&I College in Nashville. He landed a job as vocalist with Louis Brooks & His Hi-Toppers and then toured for two years as a pianist with R&B singer Joe Henderson. In Nashville he played on a few country sessions and did an imitation of Henderson's 1962 smash "Snap Your Fingers" for Hit Records, an outfit that specialized in cover versions of current hits. One tour with Henderson took him to Miami, where he decided to stay, and where he has lived ever since.

In the mid-1960s he began recording for a series of labels owned by Henry Stone in Miami, including Blade, Dade, Dash, and finally Glades, scoring his first hit with a jazzy rendition of "Stormy Monday." Latimore cut six albums with Glades and did session work with most of the label's other artists as well. Between 1973 and 1979, thirteen of his Glades 45s made the Billboard charts. In 1982 he began another long and productive association, with Malaco Records in Jackson, Mississippi, where he recorded several albums on the Malaco, J-Town, and 601 Music labels. Although the hits were fewer, he maintained a solid following on the southern chittlin' circuit. Latimore began using the original spelling of his name—Lattimore—again after signing with fellow soul-blues artist Mel Waiters' Brittney label in 2003.

JIM O'NEAL

Bibliography

Larkin
O'Neal, Jim, and Amy O'Neal. "Living Blues Interview: Latimore." Living Blues no. 24 (November/December 1975): 13–30.

Discography: AMG

LAURY, BOOKER T.

b. Lawrence Laury, 2 September 1914; Memphis, TN

d. 23 September 1995; Memphis, TN

Pianist who shared the same barrelhouse piano style with Mose Vinson and Memphis Slim, with whom he was friends since childhood. He stayed in Memphis his entire life, and recorded his first album in 1994 at age eighty, for the Bullseye Blues label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (John Bush); Larkin
Bonner, Brett J. "Booker T. Laury." Living Blues no. 124 (November/December 1995): 57–58.

Discography: AMG

LAWHORN, SAMUEL “SAMMY”

b. 12 July 1935; Little Rock, AR
 d. 29 April 1990; Chicago, IL

Sammy Lawhorn (often misspelled as “Langhorne”) became a solid band guitarist around Chicago from the time he arrived in the mid-1960s. He had stayed in the South until his late twenties, and his style drew heavily from Helena great (and former King Biscuit Boy) Houston Stackhouse. But Lawhorn had a modern sensibility, making him a player capable of bridging the rock-influenced blues with his own country blues roots. In Chicago, he was sought by younger players like Otis Rush and Junior Wells, which brought him to the attention of Roy Brown, Elmore James, and Muddy Waters. Lawhorn recorded with Muddy beginning in the mid-1960s, and is heard on classics like “My Dog Can’t Bark” and “Birdnest on the Ground.” He appears with Waters on the Canadian TV show The Blues. Lawhorn remained with Waters into the early 1970s, appearing on Live (at Mr. Kelly’s) and The London Sessions. The latter features Lawhorn and Waters doing an acoustic duet of “Walkin’ Blues.”

While leading his own band in Chicago, Lawhorn influenced others, including Elvin Bishop and John Primer, teaching them slide guitar in standard tuning. After leaving Muddy, Lawhorn became a regular on the stage at Theresa’s, a nightclub on Chicago’s South Side. The club was visited by many blues players, and Lawhorn handily backed all of them, comfortable in whatever their style. Despite his heavy drinking, he remained welcome there, often astounding fans in the early part of the evening, then passing out by the last set, asleep in a booth.

ROBERT GORDON

Bibliography

AMG (Michael Erlewine); Larkin
 Turner, Twist. “Sammy Lawhorn: A Half-Pint and a Pistol.” Blues Access (Winter 1999): 101.
 Whiteis, David. “Sammy Lawhorn.” Living Blues no. 95 (January/February 1991): 47–49.

Discography

Aces. Kings of Chicago Blues (1971, Vogue 30174).
 Muddy Waters. The London Sessions (1972, Chess 60013).

LAWLARS, ERNEST “LITTLE SON JOE”

b. 18 May 1900; Hughes, AR
 d. 14 November 1961; Memphis, TN

Husband and performing partner of Memphis Minnie from the late 1930s until his death. Also recorded with Reverend Robert Wilkins in 1935.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR; LSFPLAWS, JOHNNY

b. 12 January 1943; Chicago, IL

Chicago South Side singer and guitarist who learned from Jimmy Reed and Buster Benton. Style ranges from soul to postwar blues to the occasional country and western tune. A Chicago favorite, he released his first record through the Wolf label in 1995.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)
 Sharp, Steven. “Chicago Special: Johnny Laws.” Living Blues no. 110 (July/August 1993): 34–35.

Discography: AMGLAY, SAM

b. 20 March 1935; Birmingham, AL

Drummer Sam Lay is best known as the inventor of the “double shuffle” beat, which recreates the propulsive, overlapping hand-claps and tambourine slaps that he heard as a child in Birmingham’s Sanctified churches. A boyhood fan of Gene Krupa, Lay took drum lessons from W. C. Handy, Jr., and moved to Cleveland in 1954, where he played with several groups. In 1960, he relocated to Chicago, where he briefly backed Little Walter. In 1961, Lay joined the band of Howlin’ Wolf and enlivened Wolf’s hits such as “I Ain’t Superstitious,” “Built for Comfort,” “Love Me Darlin’,” and “Hidden Charms” with his pile-driving sticks and innovative brush work. Lay was one of the first blues drummers to use a cowbell, on Wolf’s “Shake for Me” and “Killin’ Floor.”

In 1965, he helped found the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, one of the first integrated blues bands, which recorded several influential albums. Lay played on

LAY, SAM

Bob Dylan's legendary electric folk-rock set at the 1965 Newport Folk Festival and on Dylan's Highway 61 Revisited album. In 1967, he played on the James Cotton Band's debut album, and in 1969 on Muddy Waters's Fathers and Sons album. In 1970, he became a sometime-member of the Siegel-Schwall Band. Since then, Lay has toured constantly and has released five albums as a singer and bandleader, playing drums, guitar, and Hammond B3 organ. He has also played drums on occasion behind John Lee Hooker, Hound Dog Taylor, Lightnin' Hopkins, Otis Rush, and many other blues stars.

MARK HOFFMAN/JAMES SEGREST

Bibliography

AMG (Michael Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli Kell, Jr., Ellis E. "The Double Shuffle: Sam Lay." Living Blues no. 96 (March/April 1991): 30–31.

Discography

Shuffle Master (1992, Appaloosa 085).
Live! (1996, Appaloosa 115).
Stone Blues (1996, Evidence 26081).
Rush Hour Blues (2000, Telarc 83482).

LAZY LESTER

b. Leslie Johnson, 20 June 1933; Torras, LA

Singer/songwriter, harpist, guitarist, and percussionist. The epitome of the laconic, laid-back Louisiana blues style, Lazy Lester kept himself very busy when involved with music. After playing club dates with Guitar Gable and Big John Jackson he met Lightnin' Slim on a bus and accompanied him to a recording session. When the harmonica player didn't show up he made his studio debut. He would spend much of his time in the following years in the studio, doing steady session work with Louisiana legends Slim Harpo, Katie Webster, Tabby Thomas, Carol Fran, and Lightnin' Slim. He also played on zydeco, country, and rock 'n' roll sessions, utilizing his multi-instrumental abilities to the fullest. Eventually he recorded a series of classic hit singles including "Sugar Coated Love" and "I'm a Lover, Not a Fighter" under his own name on the Excello label.

Lazy Lester quit music in 1960 and moved to Chicago in 1968. He returned to Louisiana in 1970 before relocating to Detroit and taking an auto industry job. He came out of retirement in 1987 to record Lazy Lester Rides Again in England with Blues 'N' Trouble, resulting in a W. C. Handy Award for best foreign release. He began an affiliation with Antone's nightclub in Austin, Texas, appearing regularly at the famed blues venue and ultimately recording for its label. He first cut Harp & Soul, with longtime associate Kenny Neal, for Alligator Records in 1988. Several compilations of his early work, including I Hear You Knockin', soon followed but Lazy Lester continued to record new sessions, releasing albums such as All Over You and Blues Stop Knockin'.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli Reif, Fred. "I'm a Lover, Not a Fighter." Juke Blues no. 8 (Spring 1987): 4–8.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

LEADBELLY

b. Huddie William Ledbetter, 20 January 1888; Mooringsport, LA

d. 6 December 1949; New York City, NY

Singer, songster, twelve-string guitar player. Born to Sally and Wesley Ledbetter on a plantation near Mooringsport, Louisiana. Though his family was relatively comfortable, he dropped out of school while he was only twelve. In 1915, he learned to play guitar from Blind Lemon Jefferson. He later covered Jefferson's classic song, "Matchbox Blues."

Even though Huddie Ledbetter wanted to be a musician, he often was in dire circumstances and spent a part of his life in prison. In 1916, Ledbetter was jailed in Texas for assault; he managed to escape and lived for two years under the alias of Walter Boyd. Arrested again in 1918, he was sentenced to thirty years in prison for a murder in Texas. After seven years in jail, Ledbetter performed for the governor of Texas, Pat Neff, in 1925. He played a song he had composed, pleading for a pardon, which Neff granted. But in 1930, troubles found Leadbelly once more, and this time it meant another thirty-year sentence, this time at the Louisiana State Penitentiary at Angola, for an attempted murder.

It was musicologist John Lomax who "discovered" Huddie Ledbetter when he visited the notorious Angola Prison in 1933, while he was looking for field recordings for the Library of Congress. For an ethnomusicologist, prisoners were perfect witnesses of the culture of the past, since they were isolated from newer trends and musical styles. Through many sessions, Lomax and Leadbelly recorded dozens of songs.

John Lomax and his son Alan returned to the prison and helped Leadbelly to obtain his pardon, this time from the Louisiana state governor. On August 1, 1934, Huddie Ledbetter was a free man, again. During the first months, Leadbelly worked as a chauffeur for the Lomaxes. He also recorded and took part in radio shows. The long friendship with John Lomax stopped abruptly in 1940, when Leadbelly threatened him with a knife. Though Leadbelly remained friends with Alan Lomax, he and John never spoke to each other again.

Huddie “Leadbelly” Ledbetter. (Image courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Leadbelly stayed in New York and pursued his career, touring in Europe. In 1949, Leadbelly was diagnosed with amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS, or Lou Gehrig’s disease). He died on December 6, 1949.

Although Leadbelly’s records did not sell well during his lifetime, he became a celebrity from the mid-1930s, and a legend after his death, especially during the 1960s. Among the most famous songs attributed to Leadbelly are “Goodnight Irene,” “Cotton Fields,” and “The Midnight Special.” In 1969, American groups like Creedence Clearwater Revival and the Beach Boys covered some of these songs in rock versions.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Lewman, Harry. Huddie Ledbetter, Leadbelly: No Stranger to the Blues. New York: Hal Leonard Corporation, 2001.
Wolfe, Charles K., and Kip Lornell, The Life and Legend of Leadbelly. New York: HarperCollins, 1992.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

See also Broonzy, Big Bill; Jefferson, Blind Lemon; Johnson, Robert; Lomax, Alan; Lomax, John Avery; Matchbox Blues

LEADBITTER, MICHAEL ANDREW “MIKE”

b. 12 March 1942; Simla, India

d. 16 November 1974; Brook Hospital, London, England

Blues magazine publisher and editor, discographer, and author. Parents Nicholas and Joyce Leadbitter.

Married to Rose Davis, no children. He attended Bexhill County Grammar School for Boys, 1953–1958. Inspired by the R&B music of the rock ’n’ roll era, in 1962 he founded the Blues Appreciation Society and in April 1963 he launched Blues Unlimited magazine, both with Simon Napier, at Bexhill-on-Sea, Sussex, England (see the Napier, Simon entry). With Napier’s pre–World War II blues leanings, he transformed the stenciled fanzine into an internationally recognized magazine. He encouraged writers, experienced and young alike, to contribute and to expand their own research.

In 1967, he made his first trip to the United States, where he met record men, artists, and writers, thereby increasing his knowledge and understanding of the blues, R&B, and Cajun genres. In 1968, his seminal discographical work, Blues Records 1943–1966 (with Neil Slaven), was published and has subsequently been revised and updated. In 1971, Leadbitter edited Nothing But the Blues, a compendium of Blues Unlimited articles. He wrote monographs for Blues Unlimited and trenchant pieces for U.K. journals such as Melody Maker, Jazz & Blues, and Let It Rock. He compiled and annotated many LP releases, notably the three-volume Genesis box set from Chess masters. In 1973 he became sole editor of Blues Unlimited. He had just completed the first draft of his unpublished Delta Blues manuscript in 1974 when he died from meningitis. The blues landscape worldwide is still touched by his extraordinarily visionary and productive research work.

JOHN BROVEN

Bibliography

- Leadbitter, Mike, ed. Blues Unlimited nos. 103–110. Bexhill-on-Sea: 1973–1974.
- , ed. Nothing But the Blues. London: Hanover Books, 1971.
- , and Napier Simon, eds. Blues Unlimited nos. 1–102. Bexhill-on-Sea: 1963–1973.
- , and Neil Slaven. Blues Records 1943–1966. London: Hanover Books, 1968.
- , and Neil Slaven. Blues Records 1943–1970. Vol. 1: A to K. London: Record Information Services, 1987.
- , Leslie Fancourt, and Paul Pelletier. Blues Records 1943–1970. Vol. 2: L to Z. London: Record Information Services, 1994.

LEAKE, LAFAYETTE

- b. Ellis Leake, ca. 1920; Winona, MS
d. 14 August 1990; Chicago, IL

A versatile and highly respected pianist who established his career in the early 1950s in Chicago, Lafayette Leake recorded frequently for Chess and Cobra with most of that city’s famed blues musicians. In 1951 he replaced Leonard “Baby Doo” Caston in Willie Dixon’s Big Three Trio, beginning an association that would continue for well over two decades before coming to an end with Dixon’s Blues All-Stars. Leake was a sought-after session pianist during that time, in part because of his connection with Dixon, but mainly because of his outstanding skill and taste in blues, jazz, and early rock and, according to Charles “Barrelhouse Chuck” Goering, his quickness in adapting to other musicians’ styles.

His uninhibited sweeping glissandi, virtuosic quick repeated figures, and glittering passagework perfectly compliment such exuberant performances as Chuck Berry’s “Johnny B. Good” and “Sweet Sixteen.” In his blues “Slow Leake,” on the other hand, he demonstrates greater reserve, while in “Wrinkles,” with its clarity of right-hand passagework, Leake reveals his compatibility with a jazzier, more up-tempo style. His ability to create seemingly impossible effects on the first try led Dixon to refer to his piano abilities as “miraculous.” A responsive yet very private individual with just a handful of close friends, few details about his life are known. His limited personal engagement with others may have contributed to the tragedy of his lying in a diabetic coma in his home for several days before being discovered and taken to Chicago’s Cook County Hospital, where he then died.

DANIEL M. RAESSLER

Bibliography

- Larkin; Santelli
Dixon, Willie, with Don Snowden. I Am the Blues: The Willie Dixon Story. New York: Da Capo Press, 1989.
Whiteis, David. “Lafayette Leake” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 97 (May/June 1991): 41–42.

Discography: LSFP

LEANER, GEORGE AND ERNEST

George Willis Leaner

- b. 1 June 1917; Jackson, MS
d. 18 September 1983; Chicago, IL

Ernest E. Leaner

- b. 15 August 1921; Jackson, MS
d. 17 April 1990; Kalamazoo, MI

Record distributors and record company executives. George and Ernest Leaner entered the record business during the 1940s when they joined their sister Bernice in operating the Groove Record Shop in Chicago. The brothers were nephews of famed disk jockey Al Benson (whose real name was Arthur Leaner). George began working as an assistant to blues producer Lester Melrose in 1946, and both brothers joined M.S. Distributors in 1947. In 1949, they moved over to Monroe Passis's Chord Distributors. While at Chord, they formed Parkway Records and recorded eight of the greatest post-war bar band blues sides, notably Baby Face Leroy Trio's "Rollin' and Tumblin'," a number that included Little Walter and Muddy Waters. In 1950 the brothers formed United Distributors, the country's first major black-owned distribution firm.

George operated the One-derful/M-Pac/Mar-V-lus label complex from 1962 to 1968, recording such hard soul acts as McKinley Mitchell, Harold Burrage, Otis Clay, Five Dutones, Sharpees, Johnny Sayles, and Dorothy Prince, as well as huge dance record star Alvin Cash. Blues artists recording for the company included Lonnie Brooks, Big Daddy Rogers, and Andrew Tibbs. Following the closing of One-derful, Ernie Leaner teamed with his son Tony to form Toddlin' Town, which experienced moderate success recording such proto-funk acts as Bull and the Matadors and Thomas East before closing in 1971. The brothers shut down United Distributors in 1974, turning the operation into a one-stop, and opened up a chain of retail shops. However, by the end of the decade, both George and Ernie were largely out of the music business.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- "Ernest Leaner, Rhythm and Blues Record Exec." Chicago Sun-Times (April 24, 1990).
Pruter, Robert. "George W. Leaner." Living Blues no. 58 (Winter 1983): 46.

LEARY, S. P.

- b. 6 June 1930; Carthage, TX
d. 26 January 1998; Chicago, IL

Drummer S. P. Leary, raised outside Dallas, was friends with future Ray Charles saxophonist David "Fathead" Newman. Before they could drive, both were playing behind guitar great T-Bone Walker. Around 1955, Leary moved to Chicago. His neighbor, Sonny Boy Williamson II (Rice Miller), heard him practicing and enlisted him. Leary quickly became popular, drumming with guitarist Jimmy Rogers, whose solo career was in its prime. Leary later played with both Muddy Waters and Howlin' Wolf, as well as with Magic Sam, Morris Pejoe, and James Cotton. Leary's style was loose and jazzy; he could drum straight blues and also take chances, a slight jazz inflection. A warm personality with a propensity for drink, Leary would sometimes dance during stop-time songs, occasionally falling from the drum riser. He recorded with several Muddy alumni, including Mojo Buford (Exciting Harmonica Sound of Mojo Buford), Otis Spann (Bottom of the Blues), and James Cotton (Chicago/The Blues/Today) in their early solo years, and later with Paul Oscher (The Deep Blues of Paul Oscher). Leary was continually sought as a sideman by diverse artists, ranging from the 1960s blues-rock version of Fleetwood Mac to, in the 1990s, Yoko Noge. Leary remained active until his final years.

ROBERT GORDON

Bibliography

- Cushing, Steve. "Behind the Beat of Blues." Living Blues no. 96 (March/April 1991) 12–23.
O'Brien, Justin. "S. P. Leary" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 139 (May/June 1998): 52–53.

LEAVY, CALVIN

- b. ca. 1940–1942; Scott, AR

Birth years of 1940, 1941, and 1942 have been cited by researchers. Soulful vocalist Calvin Leavy made a hit with his semi-autobiographical moving blues "Cummins Prison Farm" in 1969 for the Soul Beat label. The song was picked up and heavily promoted by Nashville producer Shelby Singleton. This huge success led to Calvin playing throughout the southern states and recording prolifically with well-crafted modern blues such as "Going to the Dogs" and "Thieves and Robbers." Unfortunately, Leavy's troubles with the law continued, and he is now serving out a long sentence.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

- Herzhaft; Santelli
Brown, Calvin C. "Calvin Leavy." Blues Unlimited no. 82 (June 1971): 13.

Discography: LSFP

- The Best of Calvin Leavy* (2000, Red Clay CD LLC 01).

LEAVY, HOSEA

LEAVY, HOSEA

b. 26 November 1927; Altheimer, AR

The older brother of Calvin Leavy, Hosea led a family band and recorded a single 45 in 1973 before settling in the Fresno area where he played his gutbucket style of blues, loud guitar, and smoky vocals. In the late 1990s, Hosea cut two of the most down-home blues albums of the period for producer Chris Millar.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

Rainsford, Mike. "Hosea Leavy and the Cats from Fresno." Blues & Rhythm no. 84, pp. 4–6.

Discography: LSFP

You Gotta Move (1997, Fedora FCD 5002).
Cold Tacos and Warm Beer (2000, Fedora FCD 5023; with Harmonica Slim).

LED ZEPPELIN

Active 1968–1980. After the British blues-rock group the Yardbirds disbanded in 1968, its guitarist Jimmy Page enlisted bassist John Paul Jones, drummer John Bonham, and vocalist Robert Plant and briefly toured as the New Yardbirds before adopting the name Led Zeppelin. Their self-titled debut album in 1969 was blues based and featured remakes of Willie Dixon's "You Shook Me" and "I Can't Quit You Baby" and of Howlin' Wolf's "How Many More Years" (as "How Many More Times"). Their second album, Led Zeppelin II, rapidly went to number one on the Billboard charts, and the incorporated remake of Willie Dixon's "You Need Love" as "Whole Lotta Love" went to number five on the singles charts. Every album following Led Zeppelin II was a commercial success; the untitled fourth album, nicknamed "Zoso" by rock critics and fans, contained the monumental "Stairway to Heaven," which remains the group's best-known song. Although pioneering in the development of British heavy metal, Led Zeppelin's sound is firmly grounded in earlier blues traditions. The band split up after John Bonham's death in 1980.

ROBERT WEBB FRY II

Bibliography

AMG (Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli Cole, Richard. Stairway to Heaven: Led Zeppelin Uncensored. New York: Harper Entertainment. 2002.

Davis, Stephen. Hammer of the Gods. New York: Boulevard, 1997.

Welch, Chris. Led Zeppelin. London: Orion, 1994.

Selected Recordings

Led Zeppelin (1969, Atlantic).
Led Zeppelin II (1969, Atlantic).
Led Zeppelin III (1970, Atlantic).
Untitled (1971, Atlantic).
Houses of the Holy (1973, Atlantic).
Physical Graffiti (1975, Swan Song).
Presence; The Song Remains the Same (1976, Swan Song).
In Through the Out Door (1979, Swan Song).
Coda (1982, Swan Song).

LEDBETTER, HUDDIE

(See Leadbelly)

LEE, BONNIE

b. Jessie Lee Frealls, 11 June 1931; Bunkie, LA

First recorded for J. Mayo Williams after arriving in Chicago from Beaumont, Texas, in 1958. She made limited local singing appearances until Sunnyland Slim took her on tour and recorded her for Airway. Her career was again revived by Willie Kent who has backed her on CDs for Wolf (I'm Good) and Delmark (Sweetheart of the Blues).

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

Whiteis, David. "I Need Somebody's Hand: The Blues Life of Bonnie Lee." Living Blues no. 119 (January/February 1995): 44.

Discography: AMG

Sweetheart of the Blues (Delmark DE-676).

LEE, FRANKIE

b. Frankie Lee Jones, 29 April 1941; Mart, TX

Singer. A soulful and energetic singer whose gospel and R&B experience often overshadowed his blues sensibilities, Lee made his recording debut in 1963 with three singles for the Duke/Peacock label. Lee moved to Austin with Sonny Rhodes and was heard and hired by a visiting Ike Turner. He was on the road the next day and continued to tour and travel for the rest of the 1960s, ultimately leaving Texas to tour with Albert Collins in 1965. He ended up in California and began working with his cousin Johnny Guitar Watson in 1971. He released a series of albums on different labels, beginning with his 1984 HighTone release The Ladies and the Babies and reunited with Rhodes for a Chicago Blues Festival appearance.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSFP

LEE, JOHN ARTHUR

b. 24 May 1915; Mount Willing, AL

A country blues Alabama guitarist in the penknife slide style, Lee was known for many years for his 1951 Federal session including “Down at the Depot” and “Blind Blues.” Upon rediscovery in Montgomery, Alabama, by Gayle Dean Wardlow in 1973, Lee had an album issued by Rounder.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Wardlow, Gayle Dean. “Down at the Depot: The Story of John Lee.” Blues Unlimited no. 113 (May/June 1975): 12–13.

Discography: Larkin; LSFP

LEE, JULIA

b. 31 October 1902; Kansas City, MO
d. 8 December 1958; Kansas City, MO

Vocalist and pianist. Harris gives birth year of 1903 and birthplace of Booneville, Missouri. Majority of career spent in Kansas City. Began performing with brother, bandleader George Lee, but she went solo in 1935. Lee was known for her risqué songs including “Do You Want It” and “King Size Papa.”

ROBERT WEBB FRY II

Bibliography

Chilton; Harris; New Grove Jazz; Larkin; Southern Miller, Bill. “Julia Lee.” In All Roots Lead to Rock, edited by Colin Escott. New York: Schirmer, 1999.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

“Sit Down and Drink It Over”/ “I Didn’t Like It the First Time (The Spinach Song)” (1924, Vocalion 14795).
“Julia’s Blues”/ “When a Woman Loves a Man” (1946, Capital 320).
“I Was Wrong”/ “Snatch and Grab It” (1947, Capital 40028).
“My Man Stands Out”/ “Don’t Come too Soon” (1949, Capital 1111).

LEE, LOVIE

b. Eddie Lee Watson, 17 March 1909; Chattanooga, TN
d. 23 May 1997; Chicago, IL

Some sources give 1924 as birth year. Lee was nicknamed “Lovie” for hanging on his aunt’s neck. His father played piano and accordion, and his mother the church organ. He learned to play in his parents’ restaurant in Meridian, Mississippi, and was influenced by barrelhouse player “Cap” King.

At the Star Theater he played during intermissions, and later with his Swinging Cats he performed at local social and civic events, and once backed Little Walter on a visit. Lee took in harmonica player Carey Bell Harrington after he ran away from home, and ultimately included him in his band. (Lee and his wife helped nurture the musical Bell-Harrington clan including Carey’s son, Lurie Bell.) When Lee left for Chicago in 1957, Carey Bell accompanied him.

Chicago’s tough music scene forced Lee to work as an upholsterer—a job he held until retirement. On weekends he and his Sensationals played at Cinderella’s, the 1125 Club, Florence’s, and Porter’s. Carey Bell, Byther Smith, and Lee Jackson frequently appeared with him. Beginning in the 1970s he worked with his Hot Flames, which occasionally included Vance Kelly, Zora Young, and Vernon and Joe Harrington. On a recommendation from Mojo Buford in 1981, Muddy Waters offered Lee the keyboard spot in his band, a post he held until Waters’s death in 1983. Lee, given the chance to travel the world’s stages, often spoke with humility and gratitude of his experiences with Waters.

Lovie Lee’s slim recorded output includes four tracks with Carey Bell on Alligator’s Living Chicago Blues, Vol. 3, and one with Muddy Waters on Alligator’s Blues Deluxe, as well as self-produced 1970s and 1990s material, culled by Earwig to produce the well-received Good Candy in 1994.

JUSTIN O’BRIEN

LEE, LOVIE

Bibliography

- Brisbin, John Anthony. "I Can Entertain You." Living Blues no. 110 (August 1993): 23.
O'Brien, Justin. "Lovie Lee" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 135 (September/October 1997): 55–56.

Discography

Good Candy (Earwig 4928).

LEECAN, BOBBY

Flourished 1920s–1930s

A guitarist and banjoist as technically sophisticated as Lonnie Johnson, Leecan worked chiefly in New York and Philadelphia, both in a duet with the harmonica-player Robert Cooksey and in stringband formations such as the South Street Trio and his Need-More Band, playing blues, rags, popular songs, and original material.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne); Larkin

Discography: DGR

LEFT HAND FRANK

- b. Frank Craig, 5 October 1935; Greenville, MS
d. 14 January 1992; Los Angeles, CA

Born Frank Craig and raised in Greenville, Mississippi, the left-handed guitarist learned the instrument as a boy, and often played blues for tips on the streets in nearby Shelby. Craig moved to Chicago while in his teens and worked mainly as a sideman throughout the 1960s and 1970s with many Chicago musicians, including Jimmy Rogers, Little Walter, Junior Wells, and Willie Cobbs. He recorded four songs as a leader for Alligator's Living Chicago Blues series in 1978, which showcased his intricate and highly distinctive guitar playing. Craig later relocated to California for health reasons and remained largely musically inactive until his death from heart failure in 1992.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin
O'Brien, Justin. "Left Hand Frank Craig." Living Blues no. 105 (September/October 1992): 44–45.

Discography

Various artists. Living Chicago Blues—Volume 1 (1991, Alligator ALCD 7701).

LEGENDARY BLUES BAND

A hardworking Chicago-based blues band, the Legendary Blues Band formed in June 1980. The Legendary Blues Band grew out of the mid- to late 1970s Muddy Waters band. When the band first performed, Jerry Portnoy played harmonica, Louis Myers played guitar (and harmonica), Pinetop Perkins played piano, Calvin Jones played bass, and Willie Smith played drums. Smith, Jones, and Perkins had toured regularly with Muddy Waters for about twelve years. The personnel in the Legendary Blues Band have changed over the years, but two of the band's original members, Calvin Jones and Willie Smith, remain.

The Legendary Blues Band signed a contract on the Rounder label in 1981 and recorded Life of Ease in the same year. Red Hot & Blue followed in 1983. Perkins left the band in 1985, and was followed by Portnoy in 1986. The band had trouble getting steady work with its continuously fluctuating line-up. In 1989 the band was signed to Ichiban Records. That year, Jones and Smith recruited guitarists Smokey Smothers and Billy Flynn and harmonica player Mark Koenig. With this new roster, the Legendary Blues Band returned to the studio to record Woke Up with the Blues, which was nominated for a W. C. Handy Award. Since then, the band continues to record and perform regularly at clubs and festivals.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O'Neal); Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG

LEIBER AND STOLLER

Jerry Leiber (b. April 25, 1933; Baltimore, MD) and Mike Stoller (b. March 13, 1933; Queens, NY) formed one of the most successful songwriting teams of the 1950s and 1960s. They met as teenagers in Los Angeles, two Jewish transplants from the East Coast with a shared love of black music. They wrote collaboratively, with Stoller, a pianist, usually supplying the melody and Leiber the words. They also became producers, most famously for Atlantic Records from the mid-1950s to early 1960s, and launched two short-lived labels of their own (Spark in 1954 and Red Bird in 1964). They achieved fame, fortune, and rock 'n' roll immortality through songs recorded by the Coasters ("Yakety Yak," "Charlie Brown," "Searchin"), Elvis Presley ("Jailhouse Rock," "Treat Me Nice"), the Drifters ("There Goes My Baby," "Save the Last Dance for Me"), Ben E. King ("Stand By Me," "Spanish Harlem"), Dion ("Ruby Baby"), the Clovers ("Love Potion No. 9"), and Jay & the Americans ("Only in America"), to name but a few.

As teenagers, the duo primarily wrote blues and blues-inflected R&B. Mentored by Lester Sill, a salesman with the blues-laden Modern label, they placed their first songs with Jimmy Witherspoon ("Real Ugly Woman") and Bobby Nunn & the Robins ("That's What the Good Book Says"), both for Modern in 1951. They scored their first R&B hit in 1952 with Charles Brown's recording of "Hard Times," followed by "Hound Dog," a 1953 R&B hit for Big Mama Thornton. Their "K. C. Lovin," cut by Little Willie Littlefield in 1952, became a smash later in the decade for Wilbert Harrison under the name "Kansas City." Other early 1950s Leiber–Stoller compositions include "Too Much Jelly Roll" (performed by Floyd Dixon), "Gloom and Misery All Around" (Roy Hawkins), "Hollerin' and Screamin'" (Little Esther), "Nosey Joe" (Bullmoose Jackson), and a vocal version of the jazz classic "Flying Home" (Amos Milburn).

After this auspicious start in R&B, Leiber and Stoller crossed over to pop big time in 1955–1956, when the Cheers entered the top ten with their teen-oriented "Black Denim Trousers"; Elvis went to number one with his cover of "Hound Dog"; and the Robins (soon renamed the Coasters) cut "Smokey Joe's Café," one of their many "playlet" songs, which were like three-minute comedy skits set to R&B melodies. The duo relocated to New York, where they wrote and produced for Atlantic Records and added Brill Building touches like strings and Latin rhythms to their songs. Their mid-1960s Red Bird label generated hits by girl groups like the Dixie Cups and the Shangri-Las. "Is That All There Is," their 1969 cabaret-style ballad for Peggy Lee, signaled a complete break from their R&B roots, although in 1973 they returned one last time to the blues, producing Very Rare, an ambitious but flawed double-LP starring an ailing T-Bone Walker backed by bloated arrangements. In 1987 they were inducted into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame, and in 1995 a musical celebrating their work, Smokey Joe's Café, opened on Broadway.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

AMG (John Dougan); Larkin Palmer, Robert. Baby, That Was Rock & Roll: The Legendary Leiber and Stoller. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1978.

Discography

Various artists. The Leiber & Stoller Story, Vol. 1: Hard Times—The Los Angeles Years 1951–56 (2004, Ace [UK] CDH 1010).

LEIGH, KERI

b. 21 April 1969; Birmingham, AL

Singer in the Janis Joplin style, and guitarist in Austin blues-rock. Arrived in Austin in 1990 and soon had bookings from Antone's. Among her journalism credits are her Stevie Ray Vaughan biography Stevie Ray: Soul to Soul (Dallas: Taylor Books, 1993) and a column in Blues Revue magazine in the early 1990s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG

Discography: AMG

LEJEUNE, IRY

b. 28 October 1928; Pointe Noir, LA

d. 8 October 1955; Eunice, LA

Iry Lejeune was born in Point Noire, Louisiana. Almost blind, he devoted himself to the accordion, developing a style based on the singing and playing of Creole musician Amedee Ardoin. Lejeune's recordings remain the standard for all of Cajun music. His emotional, heart-wrenching singing full of blues notes and slurs is emulated by most Cajun singers. He recorded only twenty-five songs, all for Goldband Records.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

Broven, John. South to Louisiana: The Music of the Cajun Bayous. Gretna, LA: Pelican Press, 1983.
Savoy, Ann Allen, compiler and ed. Cajun Music: A Reflection of a People, Volume 1. Eunice, LA: Bluebird Press, 1988.

Discography

Iry Lejeune, Cajun's Greatest (1992, Ace CDCHD 428).

See also Ardoin, Amadie [Amede]; Goldband Records

LEMBO, KIM

b. 1967

Singer long based in Syracuse, New York, performing contemporary soul blues and West Side Chicago-style blues. Often performs with her band Blue Heat. Since 1994 she has recorded for the Blue Wave label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Birchmeier)

Discography: AMG (Jason Birchmeier)

LENOIR, J. B.

b. 5 March 1929; Monticello, MS

d. 29 April 1967; Urbana, IL

Born with a first name consisting of just initials, J. B. Lenoir (pronounced Lenore) grew up in the musical family of parents Dewitt Lenoir and Roberta Ratliff, both accomplished guitarists. Lenoir worked on the southern Mississippi family farm as a child and took guitar lessons from his father at age eight, being influenced initially by Blind Lemon Jefferson records and later by Arthur “Big Boy” Crudup and Lightnin’ Hopkins. He left home while still in his early teens to escape the hard and oppressive life of 1940s Mississippi, and by 1944 was living in New Orleans where he worked with Elmore James and Sonny Boy Williamson II.

In 1949, Lenoir moved to Chicago and worked for a meat-packing plant by day and spent his nights sitting in at various South Side clubs. His first important mentor in Chicago was Big Bill Broonzy, a well-known supporter of newly arrived musicians from the South. Lenoir also befriended and worked with Memphis Minnie, Big Maceo, and Muddy Waters throughout the next few years. His distinctive, high-pitched voice, boogie-styled guitar playing, and outgoing stage presence distinguished him early on from other blues performers. Lenoir’s penchant for brightly colored suits (often tiger-striped) and energetic showmanship made him a popular performer, and his “duck walk” stage moves would predate Chuck Berry’s by several years.

In 1951, after residing in Chicago for just two years, Lenoir had two singles appear on Chess—recordings that were leased from Joe Brown’s JOB imprint in which Lenoir recorded for until early 1953. Among these initial releases was his first of many politically and/or socially conscious songs, the topical “Korea Blues.” Throughout his fifteen-year recording career, Lenoir would record only original compositions—a combination of up-tempo, frequently humorous, dance numbers mixed with thoughtful slow blues, often of social commentary. As on his first recordings, his later JOB sides included pianist Sunnysland Slim and drummer Alfred Wallace, but also featured saxophonist J. T. Brown as a soloist. This combination of a small rhythm ensemble of guitar/piano/drums coupled with lead saxophone evolved into Lenoir’s signature sound.

A 1953 JOB session produced one of Lenoir’s more popular numbers, “The Mojo” (aka “Mojo Boogie”), in which he used his fondness for New Orleans’s culture as a backdrop. From 1954 through 1955, Lenoir recorded for the Parrot label, and from these sessions came his only commercial success, the driving “Mama Talk to Your Daughter,” which peaked at number eleven on Billboard’s R&B charts in the summer of 1955 and became a blues classic. Controversy also marked Lenoir’s tenure at Parrot with the release of “Eisenhower Blues”—a critical look at the depressed economy that subconsciously linked the condition to the U.S. president in both title and refrain. The single was quickly pulled, presumably after fears of offending the wrong people, and reissued as “Tax Paying Blues,” a tamer reworking of the song. (Contrary to rumor, no evidence of a White House involvement in its removal has ever surfaced.)

Lenoir spent the next two years recording for Chess subsidiary Checker, and waxed such songs as the humorous “Don’t Touch My Head,” a satire on the current hair-process craze, and the boastful declaration, “Natural Man.” He left Checker in 1958, and during the next two years recorded for both Shad and Vee-Jay. By the 1960s, he moved to Champaign and began working as a kitchen helper at the University of Illinois to support his wife Ella Louise and their children. In 1963, he recorded several songs for USA, and developed a sound he called “African Hunch,” a polyrhythmic blues style that emphasized a stronger African percussion. Building on this new sound, Lenoir recorded two acoustic albums, Alabama Blues in 1965 and Down in Mississippi in 1966, produced by Willie Dixon for the CBS (Europe) and Polydor labels. Both albums featured a few reprises of earlier compositions, but more importantly they showcased Lenoir’s powerful songwriting of social consciousness, such as “Shot On James Meredith,” “Alabama March,” “Born Dead,” and the title cuts—all of which deal head-on with civil rights. Recorded in Chicago but intended for European release, Lenoir was free to speak out without fear of censorship. In 1965, he toured Europe as part of the American Folk Blues Festival package and remained active on the Chicago club circuit. With his career on resurgence, Lenoir was involved in a serious automobile accident in April 1967, and died several weeks later from heart failure that resulted from his injuries. J. B. Lenoir was thirty-eight years old when he died.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Harris; AMG (Bill Dahl); Herzhaft; Santelli
 Broven, John. "J.B. Lenoir: Yet Another Forgotten Artist."
Blues Unlimited no. 15 (September 1964): 5–6.
 Oliver, Paul. Conversation with the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1997.

Discography: LSFP

J. B. Lenoir: Vietnam Blues: The Complete L+R Recordings
 (1995, Evidence ECD 26068-2).

LEONARD, HARLAN

b. 2 July 1905; Butler, MO
 d. 10 November 1983; Los Angeles, CA

Saxophonist and bandleader. After graduating from a Kansas City high school in 1923, he first joined George E. Lee's group before becoming a member of Benny Moten's Kansas City Orchestra, playing lead alto sax for the next eight years. Moten's band was the best in the city (Count Basie played with the group from 1929 until Moten's death in 1935) and Leonard played on the band's most popular records, 1925's "South" (OKeh 8194), 1927's "Kansas City Shuffle" (Victor 20485), 1928's "Moten Stomp" (Victor 20955), and a new recording of "South" for Victor in 1929 (38021). In 1931, Leonard and several other members of Moten's band left the group and joined trombonist Thamon Hayes to form the Kansas City Rockets; when Hayes resigned from the group, Leonard became its leader.

After the Rockets disbanded in 1937, Leonard started his own group, Harlan Leonard's Rockets, which became one of the leading bands in Kansas City. In 1940, the Rockets played the top ballrooms in Chicago (the Aragon) and New York (the Savoy and Golden Gate) and recorded two dozen songs for Bluebird, the best being "Rock and Ride" (10883) and "A la Bridges" (10899). The Rockets continued to play in the Midwest until 1943, when the group relocated to Los Angeles. The band broke up after the war and Leonard worked in a defense plant, then for the post office, and took a job with the Internal Revenue Service in 1949, where he worked until his retirement and never played the saxophone in public again.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

Chilton; Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: Lord

LET THE GOOD TIMES ROLL

"Let the Good Times Roll" transcends virtually every musical genre, with its distinctive New Orleans blues line and vocal delivery. The racy, yet clean-sounding rhythm and blues standard appears on hundreds of albums and has been recorded by dozens of artists, ranging from Molly Hatchet to Clifton Chenier to Caesar & Cleo (aka Sonny & Cher) to Tanya Tucker.

"Let the Good Times Roll" had humble beginnings, penned by two teenagers, Shirley Pixley Goodman and Leonard Lee—also known as the R&B duo Shirley & Lee.

Shirley & Lee, having had a number of hits such as "I'm Gone," had created a solid fan base that were accustomed to the romantic soap operas that unfolded in their songs, which were a series of linked solos of choruses and verses, not two-part harmonies.

Following that first bit of success, the full-length album version of Let the Good Times Roll was released, and the timing in the R&B music space was perfect by the middle of 1956 for them to achieve great commercial success.

The song had much richer tradition, though, than Shirley & Lee's modest origins. Although the young duo had written and performed the song, the framework for the song was familiar to their hometown of New Orleans.

Shirley & Lee took the basic line and kicked in a feisty New Orleans beat, adding Lee's smooth and Shirley's quirky blues voices. Working with the quintessential local writer, producer, and A&R genius Dave Bartholomew, he provided sound shape and recording verve to Shirley & Lee's core song delivery, backing it up with a legendary house band consisting of Allen Toussaint on piano, Frank Fields on bass, Earl Palmer on drums, and Lee Allen, Red Tyler, and Herb Hardesty on saxophone.

"Let the Good Times Roll" hit #2 on the R&B charts and #20 on the pop charts in 1956, and has sold more than one million copies.

This song, as a staple of both R&B and rock 'n' roll, continues to receive airplay on old rock 'n' roll radio stations. It also appears on motion picture soundtracks such as Stand By Me, Mighty, and Rage in Harlem in its original presentation from Shirley & Lee.

MEG FISHER

Bibliography

- Clarke, Donald. "Shirley and Lee." In MusicWeb Encyclopaedia of Popular Music, <http://www.musicweb.uk.net/encyclopaedia/s/S92.HTM> (accessed October 2001).
- Simon, Tom. "Shirley & Lee Page." <http://www.tsimon.com/shirley.htm> (accessed April 20, 2000).

LEEVE BLUES

Levees are large earth embankments built along the banks of rivers for the intended purpose of flood control. An extensive system of levees exists along the banks of the Mississippi–Missouri River system that drains water from thirty-one states. Black men and women working as slaves and later as convicts constructed the levees of the lower Mississippi Valley. This experience of building levees informed the lyrics of blues music.

Levees first appeared in the early eighteenth century during the initial development of the city of New Orleans. Before the Civil War, levees extended up the Mississippi to secure better navigation of the river by commercial steamboats. In 1879 with the creation of the Mississippi River Commission, the federal government controlled the repair and building of levees. In the great flood of 1882, the Mississippi River ran over its banks and over the existing levees from Cairo, Illinois, to the mouth of the river. Floodwaters stretched seventy miles across at the widest point.

Responsibility for levee construction passed from plantation owners before the Civil War to state control during Reconstruction. Because of the debt load carried by the southern states most vulnerable to the flooding of the Mississippi, the federal government stepped in during post-Reconstruction to direct and build a more extensive levee system.

Involuntary labor built most of the levees in the lower Mississippi Valley in the late nineteenth century. Black men and women worked under the convict leasing system as they hauled dirt, trees, and stones into place along the new embankments. Their lives had little value beyond the labor they provided and many worked until they dropped dead on the construction sites. Their bodies were buried in the levees.

Each successive expansion of the levee system proved inadequate for flood control. The effort of the Mississippi River Commission that directed the work after 1879 saw the devastating failure of the system in 1927. Floodwaters again raged along the river south of Cairo. The death and destruction of this flood affected many black families and their homes built next to the levees and on the low ground of the surrounding countryside.

Numerous blues songs deal with the work experience of building the levees. Big Bill Broonzy recorded "Levee Blues" in 1930; Thomas Dorsey recorded "Levee Bound Blues" in 1930; Son House recorded "Levee Camp Blues" in 1941; Ma Rainey recorded "Levee Camp Moan" in 1925; and the Hall Negro Quartette recorded "Levee Work Song" in 1936. Joe and Minnie McCoy recorded "When the Levee Breaks" in 1929. The song tells of the impending devastation promised by heavy rain and rising floodwater.

Huddie Leadbetter recorded "Go Down, Old Hannah" in 1935, 1938, and 1939. In the song, he takes the listener into his confidence as he relates the terrible and tragic conditions of building the levee. Only Judgment Day can revive a fallen worker like Old Hannah.

In another song by Leadbetter, "Red Cross Store Blues," recorded in 1940, he sings about the aftermath of the levee breaks and the 1927 flood. The singer confesses to his woman that he cannot go down to the Red Cross store until he gets a job. Even though the singer and his woman need beans and rice for a meal, they can only get these items from the Red Cross if they have money. The song calls attention to the corruption of local governing bodies that took relief items from the Red Cross and then sold them rather than distribute them, causing many without money to starve.

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

- Frank, Arthur DeWitt. The Development of the Federal Program of Flood Control on the Mississippi River. New York: Columbia University Press, 1930.
- Harris, Eddy L. Mississippi Solo. New York: Nick Lyons Books, 1988.
- Kemper, J. P. Rebellious River. New York: Arno Press, 1972.
- Mancini, Matthew J. One Dies, Get Another. Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1996.
- Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning. New York: Horizon Press, 1960.
- Oshinsky, David M. Worse Than Slavery. New York: The Free Press, 1996.
- Twain, Mark. Life on the Mississippi. New York: Harper & Brothers Publishers, 1911.
- Wilson, Walter. Forced Labor in the United States. New York: International Publishers, 1933.

LEVY, LOUIS “LOU”

b. 29 November 1910; New York City, NY
 d. 31 October 1995; New York City, NY

Music publisher and founder of Leeds Music in 1939. His early career was as a dancer or “hooper,” even performing in blackface at the Apollo Theater in New York City. After establishing the Leeds Music office on Broadway, he acquired rights to many classic blues songs, including most of the songs of Leroy Carr and of Clarence Williams. Later he published the boogie-woogie masters Albert Ammons, Meade Lux Lewis, and Pete Johnson, along with interwar pianist Sammy Price, Jay McShann, and Mary Lou Williams. In 1964 he sold his 12,000 song properties to MCA for $4.5 million. He remained active in ASCAP, and assisted music publishing negotiations.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Leblanc, Eric. “Lou Levy” [obituary]. Blues & Rhythm no. 105 (December 1995): 23.

LEVY, MORRIS

b. 27 August 1927; New York City, NY
 d. 21 May 1990; Ghent, NY

The founder of rock 'n' roll label Roulette Records in 1956, Morris Levy (no relation to the author of this article) assembled a publishing empire that included the songs of Chuck Berry among others and often forced his name onto the songwriting credits of his acts' releases. He died awaiting appeal of a ten-year prison term for the extortion of a record wholesaler.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

AMG

LEVY, RON

b. Reuvin Zev ben Yehoshua Ha Levi, 29 May 1951; Cambridge, MA

Began playing piano in 1964, the day after attending a Ray Charles concert. Soon was gigging around Boston, backing up blues acts, learning the Hammond B3 organ, and developing a playing style that, while vigorous, muscular, and assertive, always retained a certain jazz groove and rarely veered toward the blues-rock favored by many of his peers.

Albert King took him on the road in 1968 and a year later he joined B. B. King's band, a remarkable feat for a white teenager. He stayed with B. B. for seven years. From 1976 to 1980, he played piano for the Cambridge-based Rhythm Rockers. He was organist and road manager with Luther “Guitar Jr.” Johnson from 1980 to 1983, then joined the dynamic jump-blues group Roomful of Blues in 1983, remaining with them through 1987. During his years with Roomful, he did side projects with Black Top Records of New Orleans, handling arrangements and keyboards for various sessions while also cutting two albums with his own group, Ron Levy's Wild Kingdom.

From 1987 to 1997, Levy was an important figure behind the scenes at Rounder Records, a leading indie label with a strong blues focus. He served as a Rounder producer and session player and in 1990 cofounded its Bullseye Blues & Jazz subsidiary, handling A&R and production duties for many releases. Leaving Rounder, he spent 1997 working with Minneapolis-based Cannonball Records, producing its Blues Around America series and other discs. Returning to the Boston/Cambridge area, he has recently devoted his energies to jazz, acid-jazz, and funk, touring on the Hammond B3 with his Wild Kingdom combo.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin
 Bremer, Karl. “Levy Tating: The Master of the B-3 Fleshes Out His Resume.” Blues Access no. 37 (Spring 99): 46–49.
 Ron Levy website, <http://www.levtron.com>.

Discography: AMGLEWIS, BOBBY

b. 17 February 1933; Indianapolis, IN Birth year also reported as 1927. Rhythm and blues singer who had a rock 'n' roll hit with “Tossin' and Turnin'” in 1961. “One Track Mind” was a follow-up success. He has continued performing, including at rock “oldies” concerts.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: Larkin

LEWIS, FURRY

b. Walter Lewis, 6 March 1893; Greenwood, MS
 d. 14 September 1981; Memphis, TN

Country-blues singer, songster, and bottleneck slide guitar player. Born in Mississippi, Lewis spent almost all his life in Memphis, Tennessee. He was active in the 1920s, retired from the musical profession in 1930, and came back again from 1959 to the late 1970s.

Some sources have stated that bluesman Furry Lewis was born in 1900, but he himself confirmed that he was really born on March 6, 1893. The young Walter Lewis was called "Furry" by his childhood friends at school. He built his first guitar from a cigar box when he was only six years old. According to Pete Welding, Furry Lewis recalled that he was influenced by local bluesmen that he saw in his youth in Greenwood, such as Arthur Petties, Gus "Banjo Joe" Cannon, Funny Willie Polk (or Pope), and Landis Jackson.

Furry Lewis moved to Memphis with his family when he was fifteen or sixteen. He sang and played guitar for both black and white audiences, at picnics, fish fries, dances, medicine shows, or on the street, offering a wide repertoire that included ragtime, folk songs, ballads, serenades, and country blues. Although he mostly played unaccompanied, he sometimes joined other musicians or jug bands. Furry Lewis even played a few times with W. C. Handy, who once gave the young musician a high-quality acoustic guitar, a Martin six-string guitar that he kept for years.

At seventeen, Lewis nearly died while trying to hitch a train; he lost a leg and had to wear a prosthetic for the rest of his life.

When Lewis began recording in 1927, he had been playing as a songster for at least a decade. With the advice of his friend Jim Jackson, Furry Lewis auditioned for Vocalion Records during a short trip to Chicago, and recorded his first two sessions. Back in Memphis, he also recorded the following year for the Victor label and again for Vocalion. Among his twenty-three songs released between 1927 and 1929 are "Rock Island Blues" (1927), "I Will Turn Your Money Green" (1928), the two-part song "Kassie Jones" (1928), and in 1929, his trademark, a two-part song titled "John Henry (The Steel Driving Man)."

In about 1922, Furry Lewis was hired as a street sweeper for the Memphis Sanitation Department. During the Great Depression, Furry Lewis abandoned his musical career; he only sang and played music for his friends, until he was "rediscovered" by blues scholar Samuel Charters in 1959. During that thirty-year break, Lewis's music was not completely forgotten: Some of his Victor recordings from 1928 reappeared on three different ten-inch LPs of vintage blues and folk songs by various artists, released between 1947 and 1953.

Furry Lewis began the second phase of his career at the age of sixty-six, with the help of Charters; he recorded his songs and monologues for a Folkways LP, in 1959. At the moment of his rediscovery, Furry Lewis did not own a guitar anymore, but he still knew how to play and his voice remained strong and full of emotion.

During the folk-blues revival, Furry Lewis recorded two LPs for Prestige in 1961, Back on My Feet Again, followed by Done Changed My Mind, that were rereleased together on one CD by Fantasy Records, under the title Shake 'Em On Down (1992 [1961]). The first of these albums included blues standards like "Shake 'Em On Down" and "St. Louis Blues." He performed again on both albums some songs from his early repertoire (like "John Henry"), with the same open E tuning, bottleneck guitar style, using the lower strings as a rhythm basis, and the high strings for the melody and slide effects. Lewis's guitar remained clearly rooted in the Memphis tradition, with the vocals alternating with the instrumental parts as a kind of dialogue between the instrument and the voice. But Lewis was not the only musician from Memphis to have adopted that musical approach, mixing finger-picking and flat-picking interacting with the singing. Lewis's melodies in songs like "When My Baby Left Me" or his "Judge Boushay Blues" are similar to the chord structure used later by Robert Wilkins in his famous song "Prodigal Son (That's No Way to Get Along)."

Although he recorded more than ever before and played concerts on college campuses and festivals during the 1960s, Furry Lewis could still not live from his art, and had to keep his regular job at Memphis's City Hall. Among the many artists he played with during the 1960s are Sleepy John Estes and Bukka White.

Furry Lewis once opened for the Rolling Stones when the group played in Memphis; he appeared briefly in two films: playing the part of Uncle Furry in John G. Avildsen's comedy W. W. and the Dixie Dance Kings (1975), and in his own role for the biography This Is Elvis (1981), directed by Malcolm Leo and Andrew Solt. Furry Lewis's influence on the young Bob Dylan is clear on songs like "Casey Jones." Canadian singer Joni Mitchell composed a tribute song titled "Furry Plays the Blues" (1976). An artist whose production spanned more than half a century, Furry Lewis had two separate musical careers and lived until age eighty-eight.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

- AMG (Bruce Eder); DGR; Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Doering, Teddy. "Furry Lewis Discography." Blues Forum no. 6 (1982): 20–21.
 ———, et al. "Additions and Corrections to Furry Lewis Discography." Blues Forum no. 10 (1983): 20–21.
 George-Warren, Holly, and Patricia Romanowski, eds. "Furry Lewis." The Rolling Stone Encyclopedia of Rock & Roll, 3rd ed., p. 562. New York: Fireside, 2001.
 Real Bottlenecking Company. "Furry Lewis." <http://www.rbnc.net/furry.html>.
 Welding, Pete. Liner notes for Furry Lewis, Shake 'Em On Down (1992 [1961], Fantasy FCD-24703-2).
 Wirz, Stefan, "Walter 'Furry' Lewis Discography." <http://www.wirz.de/music/lewisfrm.htm>.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

See also Charters, Samuel Barclay; Films; Handy, William Christopher "W. C."; John Henry; Shake 'Em On Down

LEWIS, JOHNNIE (JOHNNY)

b. 8 October 1908; Eufaula, AL

A finger-picking and slide guitar player in the regional Alabama style, Johnnie Lewis has only played music as a sideline, but played enough anyway to be featured in the 1970s film Chicago Blues. He then recorded an excellent album for the Arhoolie label in the company of harp player wizard Charlie Musselwhite.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

- AMG (Richie Unterberger)
 Strachwitz, Chris. Notes accompanying Johnnie Lewis: Alabama Slide Guitar (1971, Arhoolie LP 1055).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Alabama Slide Guitar (1998, Arhoolie CD 9004).

LEWIS, MEADE "LUX"

b. Meade Anderson Lewis, 4 September 1905; Chicago, IL
 d. 7 June 1964; Minneapolis, MN

Meade Anderson "Lux" Lewis was a seminal figure in boogie-woogie. His father was a porter on the Pullman coaches, and the family home was in Chicago on South La Salle near the New York Central line. Lewis was one of five children, four boys and a girl. Lewis senior was a guitarist who had made a couple of recordings, and he arranged for his son to take violin lessons. The violin was apparently learned under suffering and Lewis switched to piano at the age of sixteen, shortly after his father's death.

The family did not possess a piano, but Lewis was able to practice in the home of his boyhood friend Albert Ammons, who was also destined to become famous as a boogie pianist. Both of Ammons's parents were musical and it is reputed that his father was an early boogie-woogie exponent. Another friend called Toy, who lived on 39th and State Street, also had a piano, and it was here in around 1923 that Lewis produced his first version of the train blues "Honky Tonk Train Blues," a composition with which he is forever associated.

The nickname "Lux" appears to have been short for "Duke of Luxembourg" and originated from a comic strip called Gaston and Alphonse that Lewis was fond of imitating. As a teenager, Lewis went to hear King Oliver at the Lincoln Gardens and is said to have modeled his whistling style, later heard on "Whistling Blues," on Oliver's cornet playing.

From around 1924, Lewis and Ammons worked for the Silver Taxicab company by day and played at house parties at night. The taxicab company employed a number of aspiring pianists and it is said that the owner installed a piano in the drivers' rest room so that there would be an incentive for them to return to base promptly. At the house parties Lewis encountered Jimmy Yancey, an older pianist who was to exert a lifelong influence on him. Around this time Lewis first heard "The Fives," a Hersal Thomas composition that was one of the earliest boogie-woogie pieces. According to a 1959 Downbeat interview: "This man played 'The Fives.' It was something new and it got Ammons and me all excited. (Sure wish I could remember his name.)"

Although younger, Ammons was the more confident of the two and was able to arrange jobs for both of them. He found Lewis work with a Chicago band but this did not last due to Lewis's inability to master more than two keys (C and G). However in 1926, through another of Ammons's contacts, Lewis landed a job in Detroit playing for house parties.

In 1927 Lewis and Ammons moved to South Bend, where Ammons was employed in the Paradise Inn and Lewis got a job as a pianist/brothel keeper. Both returned to Chicago the same year and took up residence in an apartment block at 4435 Prairie Avenue on South Parkway. Here they would be joined in the summer of 1928 by Clarence "Pine Top" Smith and his family. However, even before Smith cut his classic "Pine Top Boogie Woogie," Lewis had met a girl called Amelia who worked for a publishing company connected with Paramount Records. She arranged for Paramount to record "Honky Tonk Train Blues," a boogie-woogie composition in all but name. The session took place in a studio on Wabash Avenue in December 1927.

The Paramount recording was not released until 1929 and, perhaps due to the Depression, did not sell well. Lewis had a few more recording sessions, accompanying vocalist George Hannah, whose songs dealt with homosexual themes, and some hokum sides with Bob Robinson. He then endured a frustrating period of inactivity during which he spent some time on relief, working on a WPA shovel gang and also washing cars. He continued to play intermittently at rent parties, but was unable to obtain a permanent job until he moved to Indiana Harbour to play at the South Chicago club in the early 1930s. Here a patron told him of a job with free board and wage available in Muskegon Heights and together they rode freight trains to get there. For a time Lewis played in a local dance hall, eventually landing a better job entertaining at a brothel in Muskegon.

He made his way back to Chicago in 1934 and renewed his acquaintanceship with Ammons, who obtained work for him as a driver for a dress salesman. In 1935 he joined a trio that played at a club run by Doc Huggins on Champlain. This group was probably "Lux and His Chips," and had a line-up of piano, trumpet, and drums. In the same year, his luck finally changed. Columbia record executive John Hammond had been looking for Lewis since acquiring a copy of the Paramount recording in 1931, but it was not until a chance conversation with Ammons that he was directed to a local car wash where Lewis was working. Hammond arranged for him to rerecord "Honky Tonk Train Blues" for English Parlophone since Columbia would not take the commercial risk. Other sides, including "Yancey Special," followed in 1936 for Decca. The latter composition was a tune that Yancey had been playing since around 1915 and had Yancey's distinctive four-to-the-bar boogie bass. Another version of "Honky Tonk Train Blues" was also recorded for Victor in 1936. Around this time Lewis made a trip to New York seeking greater recognition, but despite the critical acclaim for his records, he failed to attract much of an audience. Lewis returned to Chicago and effectively retired from music.

In 1938, "Yancey Special" was a hit for the Bob Crosby Orchestra, and publishers Shapiro-Bernstein hurriedly advertised for Lewis to get in touch to sign a contract. Favorable articles about boogie-woogie now began to appear in the press and Lewis became musically active again. The turning point came when Lewis and Ammons participated in the legendary "From Spirituals to Swing" concerts organized by Hammond at Carnegie Hall and became two of the leading exponents of the burgeoning boogie-woogie craze. These concerts in 1938–1939 featured a host of jazz and blues stars, but the highlight of the night was a spot by Lewis, Ammons, and Kansas City pianist Pete Johnson with vocalist Joe Turner. Lewis, Ammons, and Johnson were subsequently employed as the Boogie Woogie Trio in Café Society Downtown in New York, together with Turner, and achieved great success. Shortly after the first "From Spirituals to Swing" concert, the Trio were interviewed and recorded by Alan Lomax for the Library of Congress and their first commercial recording, "Boogie Woogie Prayer Parts 1 & 2," was released on Columbia.

The reputation of the Boogie Woogie Trio was spread by regular live broadcasts from Café Society on NWB radio, and later from the Sherman Hotel in Chicago. At the height of their popularity, the members of the Boogie Woogie Trio often shared the bill with top-flight jazz musicians and also made guest appearances on the Camel Caravan Radio Show with Benny Goodman. During his time with the Trio, Lewis made some classic recordings for Solo Art and Blue Note, of which "Bass on Top," "Six Wheel Chaser," and "Tell Your Story" are perhaps the best known.

Lewis left the Trio in 1941 and moved to the West Coast for a long engagement at the Swanee Inn. He subsequently made his home in Los Angeles, from whence he continued to tour and perform as a solo artist. After a campaign by Downbeat magazine he was accepted for membership in ASCAP in 1942, an unusual feat for a black artist. In 1945 he moved his base to Randini's Club, on Hollywood Boulevard, and also made a notable series of recordings for the Asch label.

As the years passed, the public appetite for boogie-woogie waned and Lewis devoted an increasing amount of his program to jazz and pop standards. He was always an innovator, however, as his occasional whistling and forays on the celeste and harpsichord prove. He made some short films in 1944 and appeared with Louis Armstrong in the 1947 film New Orleans. He also appeared frequently on television during its early days. In 1952, together with Pete Johnson, Erroll Garner, and Art Tatum, he toured the United States in a series of concerts entitled "Piano Parade." By the late 1950s, however, good-paying jobs had become scarce and he was known to drive thousands of miles between engagements. He was ultimately killed in a car crash in Minneapolis in 1964.

Lewis advanced two explanations for the title of his most famous composition. According to one version, he was playing the piece at a house party when a guest asked him what it was called. “That’s a train blues,” answered Lewis. “Well,” replied the guest, “We’re all here together. You oughta call it the Honky Tonk Train Blues.” In the other, the title was suggested by the recording engineer at the session. To Lewis’s suggestion of “Freight Train” he replied, “Oh no, that sounds like honky tonk music. We’ll call it Honky Tonk Train.”

The eight-to-the-bar chorded bass and familiar melodic riffs of “Honky Tonk Train Blues” make it the most famous of boogie-woogie themes. The bass, revolving around the second inversion of the major triad, is one of a number of unique bass patterns created by Lewis. He was also the composer of some of the most memorable boogie-woogie themes, including “Yancey Special” and “Bearcat Crawl,” with their Yancey-inspired single-note boogie basses. A short, stocky man, with relatively small hands and podgy fingers, much of Lewis’s work shows a distinct chromaticism, resulting in part from his use of “crushed notes”—two adjacent notes played by thumb or fingers simultaneously. This is particularly noticeable at the faster tempos, for example, in the relentless, compelling 1954 version of “Hangover Boogie.”

BOB HALL

Bibliography

AMG (Scott Yanow); Chilton; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern Silvester, Peter J., and Denis Harbinson. A Left Hand Like God: A Study of Boogie Woogie. London: Quartet, 1988.

Discography: DGR; Lord; LSFP

LEWIS, NOAH

b. 3 September 1895; near Henning, TN
 d. 7 February 1961; Ripley, TN

Noah Lewis was an influential blues harmonica player and an important figure in the Memphis jug band scene (see the Jug entry). His first recordings were made with Cannon’s Jug Stompers (see Cannon, Gus entry) in 1928 for Victor, and he recorded with that group on all of their sides from 1928 to 1930. In 1929 and 1930, Lewis also cut a few solo recordings as well as recordings with his own jug band, which included Sleepy John Estes and Yank Rachell. He later moved from Memphis to Ripley, Tennessee, and spent the remainder of his life there.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR

LEWIS, PETE “GUITAR”

Guitarist and harmonica player active in Los Angeles, associated especially with Johnny Otis through 1957. He performed on recording sessions with Otis, Little Esther Phillips, and on Big Mama Thornton’s 1952 Peacock recording of “Hound Dog.” He is believed to have died in Los Angeles in 1970–1972. He is not to be confused with the rock guitarist Pete “Guitar” Lewis of Moby Grape.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Mohr, Kurt. “Pete ‘Guitar’ Lewis” [with discography]. Soul Bag no. 20 (July/August 1972): 23–24.

Discography: LSFP

LEWIS, SMILEY

b. Overton Amos Lemons; 5 July 1913; DeQuincy, LA
 d. 7 October 1966; New Orleans, LA

Singer, guitarist, composer. Smiley Lewis combined his big, soulful voice and lusty delivery with his sly, idiomatic compositions and the production genius of Dave Bartholomew to create an unparalleled body of work that epitomizes the golden age of New Orleans rhythm and blues in the 1950s. A master of jump-blues, the blues ballad, the Latin-tinged New Orleans blues shuffle, and virtually every aspect of the Crescent City R&B tradition, Lewis was a stablemate of Fats Domino at Imperial Records but never managed to match the Fat Man’s success with mass audiences and suffered sales of less than 100,000 copies for each of his excellent Imperial singles.

Three of Smiley’s most promising releases—“I Hear You Knocking,” “Blue Monday,” and “One Night (of Sin)” —instead provided hits for television star Gale Storm, Fats Domino himself, and Elvis Presley, whose bowdlerized version of “One Night (With You)” was a pop success. But Lewis’s artistic achievement remains of the highest order, and the four-CD collection of his complete works, Shame, Shame, Shame, grasps the listener's attention from beginning to end.

Backed by Bartholomew's crack studio band, Lewis particularly excelled in a series of raucous, hard-driving shout-blues classics including "Dirty People," "Ain't Gonna Do It," "Bumpity Bump," "Down the Road," "Real Gone Lover," "She's Got Me Hook, Line and Sinker," and "Rootin' and Tootin'." Heartfelt blues ballads—"Lost Weekend," "Please Listen to Me," "One Night," "Someday"—were another Lewis forte, and his hard-hitting reworkings of folkloric material like "Tee-Nah-Nah" and "Down Yonder" are equally wonderful recordings. He worked with Dave Bartholomew, Tuts Washington, Lee Allen, Herb Hardesty, and Huey "Piano" Smith.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Complete recordings on Shame, Shame, Shame (1993, Bear Family).

LIBRARIES

This article surveys significant blues collections worldwide. The majority of these entries are institutional, and for reasons respective of privacy, only a few private collections are cited. The article also includes a few institutions whose collection strengths are in popular culture and ephemera. Because much of the nature of archival material in the field of blues music tends toward the ephemeral and is often intertwined in the local culture, I have included those collections here as well. Just as blues is an important building block of jazz music, blues collections are often part of the foundation of substantial jazz holdings. A number of these collection listings came from my own work with a similar article for the New Grove Dictionary of Jazz (2nd edition, Macmillan, 2002), and I am grateful to Barry Kernfeld for permission to cite some of those here.

The listing is arranged alphabetically by country, and within each country by city. There are many other smaller or more localized collections throughout the United States that are not listed here but can be found at various Internet sites such as the following devoted to documenting the cultural history of the state of Mississippi: <http://www.arts.state.ms.us/heritage/AppendixA.htm>.

Canada

Etobicoke

Eugene Miller Collection
90 Prince George Drive
Etobicoke, Ontario M9B 2X8, Canada

Miller (b. 1928), a retired education consultant, is a collector of recorded and printed jazz and blues, New Orleans style, Chicago South Side, recorded ragtime, and obscure early white groups and performers.

York

Sound and Moving Image Library
York University
4700 Keele Street
Toronto, Ontario, M3J 1P3, Canada

York houses the largest and most comprehensive collection of jazz, blues, and related sound recordings of any publicly accessible collection in Canada. The collection is fully cataloged and searchable through the web at <http://www.yorku.ca/blick/>. See also the Scott Library Website: <http://www.library.yorku.ca>.

Germany

Bremen

Archiv für Populäre Musik
Ostertorsteinweg 3
D-2800 Bremen 1, Germany

The archive holds forty thousand recordings of jazz, blues, and popular music (mostly LPs) and four thousand books, periodicals, and catalogs of record companies and newspaper clippings. The archive publishes the quarterly journal Anschlaege: Zeitschrift des Archivs für Populäre Musik.

Norway

Notodden

Europas Blues Bibliotek (Europe's Blues Library)
Storgt. 25-3670 Notodden, Norway
Phone: +47 35 01 32 00
Fax: +47 35 01 23 40
E-mail: ragnhild@NotBib.bib.syst.no.

The Europas Blues Senter [sic] Library and Museum was opened in August 1997, as a first step to becoming an important information and documentation center for blues in Europe. The Europas Blues Bibliotek has a significant collection of records, videos, and CDs. The center owns a "Lucille" guitar signed by B. B. King.

Switzerland

Wädenswil

Music of Man Archive
Holzmoosrütistrasse 11
CH-8820 Wädenswil, Switzerland

The archive holds materials on all styles of African American music, including jazz, blues, spirituals, gospel songs, and soul music. Some 1,150 LP recordings of music, thirty LP recordings of spoken material (lectures, interviews, etc.), and two hundred books are relevant to the study of jazz and blues.

United Kingdom

Cheltenham

The European Blues Association/Archive of African American Music
P.O. Box 347
Cheltenham GL52 2YA, United Kingdom
Phone: (+44) 01242 701 765
E-mail: info@euroblues.org
Website: <http://www.euroblues.org>

The European Blues Association, which incorporates the Archive of African American Music, hosts the annual Blues Week workshop at Exeter University. Providing a venue for research and study as well as live music performances. The association also performs educational outreach. According to their website they "have the pledge of the Paul Oliver Collection of African American Music and Culture" obtained from Paul Oliver.

United States

Bloomington

Archives of African American Music and Culture Indiana University

2805 E. 10th Street
Smith Research Center, Suite 181
Bloomington, IN 47408
Phone: (812)855-8545
Fax: (812)855-8547
E-mail: afamarch@indiana.edu
Website: <http://www.indiana.edu/~aaamc>.

The archive contains a collection of general reference books on blues as well as a general collection of blues CDs, including compilations, box sets, and individual artists' recordings as well as a small collection of LPs, cassettes, and videos. Special collections materials cover blues music as well as other genres of African American music. These holdings include photographs, interviews, transcripts, and posters. The archive has oral history materials such as the William Barlow Collection of interviews and performances of blues musicians, and the Susan Oehler Collection of recorded interviews and material relating to her dissertation, "Aesthetics and Meaning in Professional Blues Performances: An Ethnographic Examination of an African American Music in Intercultural Context."

Bowling Green

Music Library and Sound Recordings Archives
Bowling Green State University
Bowling Green, OH 43402-0179

The collection was founded in 1967 in a then-new library building and has become an important worldwide resource for the study of popular recordings. It contains more than 650,000 recordings, with extensive holdings in blues, R&B, and jazz. Recording formats include LPs, 45s, 78s, CDs, cylinders, and cassette, open-reel, and eight-track tapes. There are also more than fifteen thousand items of sheet music, more than one thousand song folios, and an extensive reference book collection (especially discographies), as well as journals, dealers' catalogs, auction lists, pictorial materials, and printed ephemera.

Chicago

Chicago Public Library
Music Information Center
400 South State Street
Chicago, IL 60605

The Chicago Blues Archive (with more than six thousand items) contains documents, photographs, videos, oral histories, realia, and recordings.

LIBRARIES

Center for Black Music Research
Columbia College Library
600 South Michigan Avenue
Chicago, IL 60605

The Center for Black Music Research Library and Archives was founded in 1990 to support the work of the Center for Black Music Research, which is dedicated to the research, performance, and promotion of the music of people of African descent anywhere in the world.

The center's recorded sound holdings comprise more than 4,500 LPs, 200 45s, 300 78s, and 500 CDs. Sheet music comprises seventy-five jazz, sixty-five ragtime, and fifty-four blues titles. Additional blues-specific holdings include taped BBC programs on the blues, an oral history interview with Jack Owens, and an ongoing collection of videos and tapes containing interviews and live performances by the oldest surviving generation of blues musicians. The center's Seab Cary Collection consists of 78- and 45-rpm rhythm and blues, jazz, and important blues recordings.

Manuscript or printed scores of jazz and blues inflected classical compositions by composers such as David Baker, Arthur Cunningham, Andrew White, William Grant Still, Olly Wilson, and many others are also collected by the center. Additional archival materials include scrapbooks, clippings, correspondence, posters, and so forth.

The 2,600-volume Black Music Research Collection includes books and dissertations, of which about 1,100 are devoted to jazz, blues, or ragtime. In addition, the CBMR Library contains a number of blues-related periodicals and newsletters. The library also maintains an extensive vertical file of clippings, ephemera, and other research materials. The books, dissertations, scores, sheet music, recordings, and vertical file materials are all indexed in the CBMR database. Finding aids to archival collections are also available.

Chess Records/Willie Dixon's Blues Heaven Foundation
2120 South Michigan Avenue
Chicago, IL
Phone: (312)808-1286

This is an outreach organization for those seeking information on Chess Records, Willie Dixon, or the Blues Heaven Foundation.

Cincinnati

Art and Music Department
Public Library of Cincinnati and Hamilton County

800 Vine Street
Cincinnati, OH 45202
Phone: (513)369-6955
Fax: (513)369-3123
E-mail: artmusichead@plch.lib.oh.us
Website: <http://www.cincinnati.library.org>

The Art and Music Department's sheet music collection contains more than fifty blues songs (arranged by title), and more than a thousand published books on blues, as well as a collection of approximately three hundred sound recordings (primarily CDs and audio-cassettes). The library also has clipping files on local Cincinnati musicians.

Clarksdale

The New Delta Blues Museum
1 Blues Alley
Clarksdale, MS 38614
Phone: (662)627-6820
Fax: (662)627-7263
Website: <http://www.deltabluesmuseum.org>

The museum's home is the former Yazoo and Mississippi River Valley Railroad Depot, and thus serves to inform the public of the cultural as well as musical heritage of the area. Exhibits from the museum's permanent collections feature photos, correspondence, musical instruments, and local artifacts. The museum houses a large collection of blues recordings, including CDs, LPs, and audiotapes, that are available for research, as well as a collection of blues research materials that includes videos, photographs, books, and international blues periodicals.

Cleveland

Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and Museum
One Key Plaza
Cleveland, OH 44114
Phone: (216)781-ROCK

The Rock and Roll Hall of Fame and Museum's permanent collection includes items from early blues shouters as well as musical instruments, scores, and handwritten lyrics; recordings and equipment; stage clothes and stage props; and related memorabilia. Archival print material includes letters, correspondence, and ephemera.

Frederick

Joe Bussard's Vintage 78s
P.O. Box 3432

Frederick, MD 21705-3432
E-mail: joe@vintage78.com.

Longtime collector of blues 78-rpm recordings, Bussard (b. 1936) has been collecting since childhood. He began by acquiring private collections around his hometown of Frederick, Maryland, and into the surrounding rural areas of Maryland, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. His extensive collection of recordings includes country blues, old time country, gospel, and jazz 78s. In 1959, Bussard began making his collection known via his radio show called "Country Classics" on WELD in Fisher, West Virginia. Highlights of the Bussard Collection include Black Patti #8030, "Original Stack O' Lee Blues" by the Down Home Boys—Long Cleve Reed and "Little" Harvey Hull—the only known copy of the recording. He makes his collection available by selling custom-made tape recordings of material from his collections. These tapes are available via his website (<http://www.vintage78.com>).

Grand Rapids

Arnold's Archives
c/o Arnold Jacobsen
1106 Eastwood Avenue Southeast
Grand Rapids, MI 49506-3580

Arnold Jacobsen's private collection contains more than two hundred thousand recordings on disc and tape of popular songs; they are classified by subject, and catalogs of different groups of recordings (jazz, blues, dance-band music, etc.) are available.

Greenwood

Greenwood Blues Heritage Museum and Gallery
214 Howard Street
Greenwood, MS 38930

The museum holds a significant collection of audio and video materials and memorabilia documenting the life of Robert Johnson.

Helena

Delta Cultural Center
141 Cherry Street
Helena, AK 72342
Phone: (870)338-4350

The cultural center's permanent exhibits include "What Is the Blues," listening stations featuring music of the delta, a video featuring the King Biscuit Blues Festival, and a new home for King Biscuit Time radio show.

Kansas City

BluEsoterica Archives
Jim O'Neal
3516 Holmes Street
Kansas City MO 64109
Phone: (816)931-0383
E-mail: bluesoterica@aol.com

The BluEsoterica Archives consists of extensive subject research files, more than two thousand tapes of interviews and music, negatives from fifteen hundred rolls of film (about forty thousand images), plus thousands of records, a comprehensive library of books and magazines, a poster collection, and other memorabilia. The archive's collection of blues, R&B, jazz, world music, and rockabilly serves as a lending library for various DJs in the Kansas City area. The staff assists in blues outreach and consults on various projects related to the blues.

University of Missouri—Kansas City
Miller Nichols Library/Marr Sound Archive
5100 Rockhill Road
Kansas City, MO 64110

The Marr Sound Archive includes more than 178,000 recordings. While the collection includes popular, blues, rock 'n' roll, folk, country western, spoken word, operatic, and classical recordings, the strength of the collection is in jazz. The original collection of forty-two thousand recordings was donated by Olga and Gaylord Marr in 1987, and the primary jazz collection of eight thousand recordings came from the estate of George Salisbury in 1987.

Memphis

The Blues Foundation
49 Union Avenue
Memphis, TN 38103
Phone: (901)527-2583
Fax: (901)529-4030
E-mail: bluesinfo@blues.org

The foundation holds some business and financial records relating to institutional events and includes signed contracts for performances by blues artists.

LIBRARIES

Most of the foundation's holdings, however, document the annual Handy Awards, which include programs and posters (1980–), photographs, backstage oral history (video) interviews (1997–), and footage of the annual Lifetime Achievement Awards event in Los Angeles. The foundation holds a small research collection as well as memorabilia including autographed guitars and photographs.

Center for Southern Folklore
119 S. Main Street
Pembroke Square at Peabody Place
Memphis, TN 38103
Phone: (901)525-3655
Fax: (901)544-9965

The collections of the Center for Southern Folklore contain field recordings, oral histories, and film and video interviews from the late 1930s through the 1950s. The collection also documents local blues festivals. The center's photograph collection (ca. 1900–) documents local blues musicians. One of the center's major collections is that of the Reverend L. O. Taylor, a Memphis minister who documented the area's religious music. The center has a strong collection of local folk art depicting blues musicians.

Harry Godwin Collection
796 Reddoch Street
Memphis, TN 38117

This private collection includes two hundred 78-rpm records, twelve hundred other records of jazz and blues, and fifty tape recordings (consisting of interviews and privately recorded performances) by many jazz and blues musicians including W. C. Handy. Among other materials are several hundred items of printed sheet music dating from around 1910 to around 1925 (including twenty by Jelly Roll Morton, twenty by Handy, and some by Clarence Williams) and correspondence, scrapbooks, and memorabilia pertaining to Armstrong, Handy, and other jazz and blues musicians.

Minot

Fred Wolhowe Collection
Highway 52 East
Minot, ND 58701

This private collection contains twenty-five thousand 78-rpm recordings of New Orleans jazz, ragtime, and blues, as well as music of other genres. A large number of musical items include some sheet music and dance-band arrangements of some interest to scholars of jazz. There are also about twenty catalogs of record companies from around 1915 to 1940. The collection is eventually to be donated to Luther College in Decorah, Iowa.

Murfreesboro

Center for Popular Music
Box 41
Middle Tennessee State University
Murfreesboro, TN 37132
Phone: (615)898-2449
Fax: (615)898-5829
E-mail: ctrpopmu@mtsu.edu
Main website: <http://popmusic.mtsu.edu>
Databases: <http://popmusic.mtsu.edu/webmenu.htm>

Overall, within a large popular music research collection, materials on the blues figure strongly, and are a collecting priority. The Center for Popular Music also has a great deal of material on related music such as jazz and African American gospel music—particularly the latter.

The center maintains a noncirculating library of approximately nine thousand books on all genres of popular music in its reading room. Since the blues is a genre of primary interest for the center, it has most published books on the subject. Holdings are searchable through the MTSU Public Access Catalog (<http://voyager.mtsu.edu/>). Searches can be limited to only the center's holdings. Within a collection of approximately sixty-four thousand pieces of sheet music, 621 items contain the word "blues" in the title. The entire sheet music collection is searchable (by title, composer, publisher, date, etc.) via the center's website.

The center also subscribes to most blues periodicals, maintaining two separate collections: "General Periodicals" includes primarily those currently received, and for which it has substantial runs, and "Secondary Serials," which includes titles for which the center has only scattered copies. Databases for both of these collections are available for searching on the center's website. Currently there are nineteen titles within the General Periodicals collection and an additional thirty in Secondary Serials that are classed as "blues" by subject term.

The center has approximately 138,000 sound recordings, including 78 rpms (33,000 items), 45 rpms (28,000), 33 rpms (68,000), compact discs (6,000), and audiotapes (3,000). Recordings of blues and related music comprise perhaps twenty-five to thirty percent of the total holdings. This includes reissues on LP and compact disc as well as original recordings in the various formats.

The center holds microfilm copies (originals held by the Library of Congress) of Columbia and Victor label catalogs from the companies' earliest days into the 1950s and 1960s. In addition, the center maintains a separate collection of trade catalogs (including recordings, instruments, and sheet music) for which a searchable database is available via the center's website.

The center has nine archival collections containing blues material (photographs, oral histories, sound recordings, and other items), and these collections are searchable via the center's website. Perhaps the most significant blues-related archival collection is the Gayle Dean Wardlow collection of audiotape field-recorded interviews. Gayle Dean Wardlow is an expert on early blues music and a record collector. He has published articles on the blues and coauthored King of the Delta Blues: The Life and Music of Charlie Patton with Stephen Calt. Wardlow loaned the original interview tapes to the center for copying. The interviews were recorded in Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, Georgia, and North Carolina between 1967 and 1969. Subjects include both blues musicians and early record company talent scouts. See <http://popmusic.mtsu.edu/archives/inventory/wardlow.htm> for a more complete description of the collection.

The center maintains clipping files on many subjects and individuals. There are fifteen "blues" files in the subject field and many more on individual artists. A searchable database for the clipping files is available to researchers only on-site in the center's Reading Room. The Center for Popular Music also maintains a separate collection of "Performance Documents" that includes posters, playbills, and programs. A database catalog of this collection is searchable via the center's website. It includes more than one hundred items with "blues" as a descriptor.

Nashville

Fisk University Library
17th Avenue and Jackson Street
Nashville, TN 37203

The Special Collections department of the library contains the following blues-related collections: the Langston Hughes Jazz and Blues Collection, bequeathed by Hughes and acquired in 1967; the Howard Angel Record Collection, donated by Angel and acquired in 1975; the W. C. Handy Collection, donated by Charles E. Handy in 1979; and the J. C. Johnson Collection, donated by Julie Johnson Ross in 1981. The library's collections include more than four hundred recordings, twenty-eight hundred items of sheet music (jazz, blues, and ragtime), more than fifty photographs, miscellaneous correspondence, scrapbooks, newspaper clippings, posters, publishers' contracts, awards, concert programs, and memorabilia. The Black Oral History Collection contains ten interviews with composers and musicians, and the Special Negro Collection of the library contains printed materials concerning black musicians.

New Orleans

Scott Saltzman, Photographer
134 South Pierce Street
New Orleans, LA 70119
Phone: (504)486-7222
E-mail: scott@barefootphotography.com
Website: <http://www.barefootphotography.com>

Scott Saltzman's photographic catalog contains more than ten thousand prints, nearly half of which are devoted to blues. His collection also contains a substantial jazz component that captures the local musical and social environment of New Orleans. His work also documents festivals and performances around the world. Saltzman makes his images available for sale on <http://www.barefootphotography.com>.

Tulane University
The Howard-Tilton Memorial Library Special Collections Division
304 Joseph Merrick Jones Hall
6801 Freret Street
New Orleans, LA 70118-5682

The William Ransom Hogan Jazz Archive's print holdings include 2,759 book titles and 575 serial titles. Recorded sound materials include phonodiscs, 45,604; phonocylinders, 142; audiotapes (Music), 4,102; audiotapes (oral history), 1,987; compact discs, 498. These recordings cover the areas of New Orleans jazz, big bands, pre-jazz popular song, some modern jazz, Martinique beguines, African field tapes, and commercial recordings, as well as New Orleans blues and rhythm and blues.

The oral history material (1,987 taped reels with transcripts and a cross-index) includes documentation on many New Orleans jazz pioneers, family members, and observers covering the period from 1865 to the present. Additional holdings of the archive comprise piano rolls (1,325) and sheet music/orchestrations (52,146 titles). Sheet music holdings include New Orleans imprints from the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. There are also popular, ragtime, and early jazz titles. The archive contains 10,398 photographs of New Orleans musicians, bands, and places, as well as 119 linear feet of vertical files and manuscripts. There are 383 videos on New Orleans music and related genres such as Cajun and zydeco, and 231 films, including the Michel Bastides Collection. There is an ample selection of films by Les Blank and Stevenson Palfi, Alan Lomax, and others, as well as newsreel footage from the 1920s and 1930s, Cox Communications/Jim Gabour Music City series (1980s), and New Orleans Jazz National Historical Park/National Park Service video interviews. Finally, there are scrapbooks of Nick LaRocca, Lil Hardin Armstrong, New Orleans Gospel (Elliot Beal), and the Boswell Sisters. The archive's reference materials include 2,759 books, including Victor, Columbia, Edison, Decca, and His Master's Voice catalogs and Soards and Polks City Directories.

LIBRARIES

Among the archive's extensive blues holdings are rare early blues 78s, such as Hambone Willie Newbern, "Roll and Tumble Blues" (OKeh 8679), oral history interviews with James Booker, Deacon John Moore, and Professor Longhair, among others, and a substantial amount of blues-related sheet music from the early twentieth century, including Anthony Maggio's "I Got the Blues," published by Cable Piano Company in New Orleans in 1908.

The Hogan Jazz Archive is open to the public and welcomes all researchers with an interest in New Orleans music.

New York

ARChive of Contemporary Music

54 White Street

New York, NY 10013

Phone: (212)226-6967

Fax: (212)226-6540

E-mail: arcmusic@inch.com

Website: <http://www.arcmusic.org>

The ARChive of Contemporary Music collects only commercially released sound recordings and attendant press kits and photos as issued by the recording companies. The ARChive's blues collection is titled the "Keith Richards Blues Collection." This collection is strictly limited to established blues styles. Musics with shared elements, such as nascent jazz, rags, stride, and so on, are not included. The collection consists of approximately three hundred press kits, two hundred photos, and thirty videos. Blues sheet music holdings are minimal. Published books include forty general reference books on the blues, and eighteen titles dedicated to individual artists. Recorded sound holdings include sixty 78-rpm ten-inch discs, 2,160 33-rpm twelve-inch LPs, and 1900 five-inch CD recordings. All blues recordings are cataloged in great detail on an in-house electronic database. Collections of ephemera are minimal.

The New York Public Library for the Performing Arts

Music Division

40 Lincoln Center Plaza

New York, NY 10023-7498

Phone: (212)870-1650

The music division has in its general holdings a comprehensive collection of books, scores, periodicals, and sheet music, as well as dissertations, published songbooks, song folios, and transcriptions relating to blues, rhythm and blues, and jazz. Of particular interest are early blues, spirituals, and slave song collections, as well as songsters. Manuscript collections that have blues content include more than four hundred arrangements used by Benny Goodman, as well as Sy Oliver's arrangements for Ellington, Lunceford Tommy Dorsey, and others. Lists for both of these manuscript collections can be found on the library's website (<http://www.nypl.org>). There is a collection of more than one hundred prepublication lead sheets of rhythm and blues titles from publishers whose offices occupied the Brill Building and other nearby offices in New York City during the late 1950s and early 1960s. The division's Iconography Collection includes photographs of most major blues performers and bands, particularly from the 1960s to the present. The division's clipping files also contain ephemeral material on many blues artists and groups, both local and international.

Rodgers and Hammerstein Archives of Recorded Sound

40 Lincoln Center Plaza

New York, NY 10023-7498

The nucleus of the sound archives is comprised of a considerable body of material donated in 1935 by Columbia Records that contains many jazz and blues recordings; twenty thousand of the archive's items (78- and 45-rpm recordings of jazz and popular music dating from before 1967) were given to the library by radio station WNEW. The division's collection of recordings is supported by discographies and other printed materials documenting the history of sound recording in the United States and Europe. There is a collection of videotaped interviews (with performances) of contemporary blues artists entitled "The Bluestime Power Hour," produced and donated by Cinthea Coleman. The twenty-six videotapes include such artists as Country Pete McGill, Maria Muldaur, King Alex, Steve Gannon, Big John Amaro, Beverly Stovall, and Big Daddy's Blues Band. The sound archives contains a near complete collection of Folkways LPs, which would include a considerable amount of authentic and historical blues material. There are also substantial holdings of the Yazoo and Rounder labels, as well as OKeh 78-rpm recordings.

A small music video collection includes videos by such artists as Alberta Hunter, B. B. King, Sister Rosetta Tharp, Ruth Brown, Ida Cox, Lightnin' Hopkins, Howard "Louie Blueie" Armstrong, Muddy Waters, and others.

Schomburg Center for Research in Black Culture
515 Malcolm X Boulevard
New York, NY 10037-1801

The Schomburg Center holds resources relating to all aspects of black American music. These holdings include a comprehensive collection of books, periodicals, sheet music, photographs, concert programs, posters, and printed ephemera, as well as an index to articles in black periodicals. Important blues-related archival holdings include a collection devoted to the career of W. C. Handy, as well as the papers of Alberta Hunter and Andy Razaf.

Newark

Institute of Jazz Studies
Rutgers, The State University of New Jersey
John Cotton Dana Library
Newark, NJ 07102

The Institute of Jazz Studies was formed as a research center by Marshall W. Stearns, a professor at Hunter College, New York, in 1952. The institute's resources constitute the most valuable collection of jazz and blues-related materials in the world. Its one hundred thousand music recordings include CDs, LPs, EPs, 78- and 45-rpm disks, V-disks, transcription disks made from radio broadcasts, audiotapes, cylinders, and piano rolls; there are four hundred oral history tapes.

Holdings in the printed word include five thousand books, discographies, and catalogs of record companies (as well as original ledgers from some record companies). There is a large collection of periodicals (including the Harold Flakser collection) from the United States, Canada, Europe, Japan, and Australia (some on microfilm). There are several thousand files of newspaper clippings, concert programs, and promotional matter. Musical materials consist of more than seven thousand scores and band arrangements, including transcriptions of recorded performances, printed and manuscript arrangements, and a number of instrumental method books, and a large collection of sheet music. The collection also contains photographs, films, videotapes, various musical instruments.

Oxford

Blues Archive
John Davis Williams Library
University of Mississippi
University, MS 38677

The Blues Archive was established 1983–1984. Special collections include the Kenneth Goldstein collection of folk music and folklore (received in 1980). This collection comprises nine thousand books, five thousand LPs, and one thousand 78s. The Lillian McMurry/Trumpet Records collection (1985) contains the business papers as well as commercial and test pressings. The Ann Rayburn collection (1985) contains six hundred 78s. The B. B. King collection (donated by B. B. King in 1982) contains thirty-five hundred LPs and three thousand 78s. The Living Blues collection (donated by Jim O'Neal and Amy van Singel in 1983) contains more than three thousand LPs and three thousand 78s. The Sheldon Harris collection of commercial recordings, books, magazines, paper documents, and ephemera was received in 2004.

The archive contains more than thirty-three thousand commercial recordings (two thousand CDs, seven thousand 45s, sixteen thousand LPs, seventy-six hundred 78s, and four hundred cassettes): Mississippi blues (Delta, hill country, Gulf Coast), pre-World War I blues (all styles), post-World War II Chicago, Carolina blues (from all eras).

Notable labels include Trumpet (Jackson, Mississippi), Ora-Nelle (Chicago), and complete sets of Yazoo and Document reissues.

LIBRARIES

Oral history material includes the Jas Obrecht collection (electric blues, seventy cassettes); Gayle Dean Wardlow collection (Mississippi acoustic blues, forty-five reels); Jim O'Neal and Amy van Singel collection (Chicago blues, one hundred cassettes). Sheet music holdings include a substantial number of tablature books and songbooks. Reference materials include seven hundred magazine runs, including Blues Unlimited, Blues World, Living Blues, 78 Quarterly, and Soul Bag. In the area of photographic materials, the archive maintains a "Reference likeness file." Finally the blues archive contains approximately three hundred videotapes, club and festival posters (1970–onward), topical and biographical file of clippings, and the Mississippi Collection of correspondence conducted 1966–1975 regarding name and dates authorities for Mississippi blues musicians.

Providence

Rhode Island Black Heritage Society
45 Hamilton Street
Providence, RI 02907

The society holds seven hundred 78-rpm records of jazz and blues from the 1920s.

Seattle

Experience Music Project
2901 Third Avenue, #400
Seattle, WA 98121
Phone: (206)EMP-LIVE (206-367-5483)

The Experience Music Project music museum was founded by Paul G. Allen and Jody Patton. The museum's holdings grew out of Allen's private collection of material and memorabilia devoted to Jimi Hendrix. The current EMP collection includes more than eighty thousand artifacts. The varied collections of this music museum contain a substantial amount of blues material including LP recordings (many of which were formerly owned by guitarist Jimi Hendrix). The collection also contains 78-rpm recordings and CDs, periodicals, clipping files, and other ephemera. There are audio and video oral histories and transcripts of interviews with John Mayall, Buddy Guy, John Lee Hooker, and Hubert Sumlin; also photographs, posters, song folios, and ephemera. Finally, there are electric guitars once owned by Muddy Waters and John Lee Hooker, and a collection of handwritten letters, song lyrics, and music. The Experience Music Project has a substantial presence on the web at <http://www.emplive.com/>.

Southfield

Michael Montgomery Collection
17601 Cornell Road
Southfield, MI 48075

This private archive consists largely of piano rolls and related material. It comprises fourteen thousand piano rolls of jazz, blues, ragtime, and popular music by such musicians as Jelly Roll Morton, James P. Johnson, Fats Waller, Jimmy Blythe, Luckey Roberts, Eubie Blake, and J. Russel Robinson, catalogs and promotional material issued by piano roll companies, and several photographs of pianists and composers. The Montgomery Collection of sheet music is now held at the music library of the University of Michigan.

St. Louis

Western Historical Collection and State Historical Society Manuscripts University of Missouri/Jefferson Library
8001 Natural Bridge Road
St. Louis, MO 63121

The collection is part of the university's Joint Collection, held at its four campuses in Columbia, Rolla, Kansas City, and St. Louis. Of interest to scholars of blues are the oral history materials and musical recordings (mostly on reel-to-reel tape) accumulated in the course of the Jazzmen Project, which was devised and largely conducted by the director of the Joint Collection, Irene Cortinovis, during the 1970s. The oral history part of the project is devoted to the reminiscences of jazz and blues musicians connected with St. Louis, and transcripts of the interviews have been made.

Washington, DC

Library of Congress Music Division
Washington, DC 20540

The Library of Congress Music Division's comprehensive collection of blues-related material consists of published books, music, and periodicals.

Copyright deposits offer the only paper trail of such early jazz and blues composers as “Jelly Roll” Morton, Bessie Smith, Ma Rainey, and Blind Lemon Jefferson.

American Folklife Center
101 Independence Avenue SE
Washington, DC 20540-4610
Phone: (202)707-1739
Fax: (202)707-2076

The American Folklife Center houses extensive collections on blues and blues-related paper-based and recorded material. The center’s holdings of recorded sound extend from recordings made by Robert W. Gordon in the 1920s to recent acquisitions of blues performed at various folk festivals. There are no available finding aids that survey these blues holdings. But the following bibliography contains sources that outline some of the collections at the Library of Congress in this area.

GEORGE BOZIWICK

Bibliography

- Cowley, John. “Library of Congress Archive of Folk Song Recordings.” In Blues & Gospel Records 1890–1943, edited by Robert W. Dixon, John Godrich, and Howard Rye, 4th ed., pp. xl-xliii. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1997 [and also the citations in this discography to LC].
- . “Don’t Leave Me Here: Non-Commercial Blues: The Field Trips, 1924–60.” In Nothing But the Blues: The Music and the Musicians, edited by Lawrence Cohn et al., pp. 265–311. New York: Abbeville Press, 1993.

LIGGINS, JIMMY

- b. 14 October 1922; Newby, OK
d. 18 July 1983; Durham, NC

Younger brother of Joe Liggins, Jimmy was a fine vocalist and raw and exciting guitarist who wrote all of his own material. A stint as his brother’s driver inspired him to emulate Joe’s success and he began writing songs and assembled a band, the Drops of Joy, which included tenor saxophonists Harold Land and Charles Ferguson and pianist Eugene Watson. In 1947 he persuaded Specialty Records to record him and he did regular sessions with them until 1953 (though he took a year out in 1949 as a result of being shot accidentally in the face). He had to recruit a new band after that; indeed he seems to have had great difficulty in holding a regular band.

He recorded a mixture of slow blues, jumping up-tempo numbers, and driving instrumentals and had chart success with “Tear Drop Blues,” “Careful Love,” “Don’t Put Me Down” and “Drunk.” In 1954 he moved to Aladdin Records for whom he made just one session. After that, although he continued in the music business as promoter, record distributor, and nightclub owner, as well as continuing to lead a band on and off, he made very few records. The few that he did make were for his own label Duplex, which he operated intermittently from various towns (Fayetteville, Tennessee; San Diego, California; Los Angeles, California; and Orlando, Florida, among others) from the late 1950s to the mid-1970s with a roster that included Ervin Rucker, Bobby Williams, and Delores Ealy, as well as various gospel artists.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin
McGarvey, Seamus. “Saturday Night Boogie Woogie Man—The Jimmy Liggins Story.” Blues & Rhythm no. 99 (May 1995): 4–9.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Aladdin/Score; Liggins, Joe; Specialty/Fidelity/Juke Box

LIGGINS, JOE

- b. 9 July 1915; Guthrie, OK
d. 31 July 1987; Lynwood, CA

With his band, the Honeydrippers, Liggins had a string of top ten rhythm and blues hits during the decade after World War II. His style was smooth and sophisticated, dominated by Liggins’s piano and relaxed tempos. Moving to San Diego in 1932, he studied music theory and wrote arrangements for bands, joining the Creole Serenaders in 1935. In 1939, he moved to Los Angeles, working for Illinois Jacquet, Cee Pee Johnson, and Sammy Franklin. When Franklin wouldn’t record Liggins’s song “The Honeydripper,” he broke with the band and formed his own combo in 1944. Signing with the Excelsior/Exclusive label, “The Honeydripper” sold two million copies and topped the rhythm and blues charts in

LIGGINS, JOE

1945. By 1949, Liggins charted nine other hits and became a prominent feature of the Central Avenue music scene in Los Angeles. When Excelsior/Exclusive folded, he moved to Specialty Records where his brother Jimmy Liggins was enjoying success. The group continued their good fortune through the early 1950s, with hits such as "Pink Champagne." Other band members included sax players Willie Jackson and James Jackson, and drummer Peppy Prince.

By the middle of the decade, Liggins's style appeared dated, and he was dropped by Specialty, disbanding the group. He moved to Mercury, then to Aladdin Records, and later recorded on his own label, Honeydrinker Records. He remained active in Los Angeles playing clubs into the 1980s. His songs have been recorded by Dr. John, Roosevelt Sykes, Jack McDuff, Big Joe Turner, Charles Brown, and many others.

JEFF WANSER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Dawson, Jim, and Propes, Steve. What Was the First Rock 'n' Roll Record? Boston: Faber and Faber, 1992.

Discography: AMG

See also Excelsior/Exclusive; Liggins, Jimmy; Piano; Specialty/Fidelity/Juke Box

LIGGIONS, DAVE

b. 1913; Temple, TX
d. 22 February 1985; Dallas, TX

Singer, banjoist, and drummer who was active in Dallas jazz and blues from the 1920s into the mid-1980s. He also participated in the black Local 168 in the American Federation of Musicians union, later integrated into Local 137 in the 1960s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Schuller, Tim. "Dave Liggions" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 66 (1985): 45.

LIGHTFOOT, ALEXANDER "PAPA GEORGE"

b. 2 March 1924; Natchez, MS
d. 28 November 1971; Natchez, MS

Born Alexander Lightfoot in Natchez, Mississippi, the highly inventive harmonica player taught himself the instrument as a child growing up in the Mississippi River town. Lightfoot earned a living early on shining shoes on the river docks but soon graduated to the more lucrative work of playing music for tips. His first opportunity to record came in 1949 in Houston for the Peacock label, but the two resulting sides were not issued. The following year he recorded as "Papa George" in Natchez for the tiny Sultan label, and in 1952 he recorded for the Aladdin imprint in New Orleans, which resulted in the rocking "Jumpin' with Jarvis." Lightfoot then worked with Champion Jack Dupree and toured and recorded with him through 1953. Lightfoot returned to New Orleans to record for Imperial in 1954 and produced the searing single "Wine, Women & Whiskey"/"Mean Ol' Train," which exemplified his rough-hewn vocal style and powerfully creative amplified harmonica work.

After an unissued date for Jiffy as "Little Papa Walter," he traveled to Atlanta for a rousing 1955 session for Savoy. It is theorized that two songs cut by "Ole Sonny Boy" for Excello in 1956 were actually by Papa Lightfoot, although no existing label documentation verifies it. He faded from the music scene in the late 1950s and was rediscovered and recorded by blues researcher Stephen LaVere in 1969. Lightfoot appeared at the 1970 Ann Arbor Blues Festival and was on the verge of an anticipated comeback when he died the following year of cardiac arrest at age forty-seven.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin
LaVere, Stephen. "Papa Lightfoot." Living Blues 13 (Summer 1973): 6.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Papa Lightfoot & Sammy Myers: Blues Harmonica Wizards (1999, Official CD 5254).
Papa George Lightfoot: Goin' Back to the Natchez Trace (1994, Ace CD CHD 548).

LIGHTNIN' SLIM

b. Otis Hicks, 13 March 1913; St. Louis, MO
 d. 27 July 1974; Detroit, MI

Otis Hicks, known as Lightnin' Slim, grew up on a farm near St. Louis for thirteen years and then moved to St. Francisville, Louisiana, where he became the popular local musician at schools, picnics, churches, and country gatherings. In 1946, he moved to Baton Rouge, Louisiana, and gained a following at gigs in local bars, playing with Big Poppa's Band. In the 1950s, he teamed with harmonica player Schoolboy Cleve, who accompanied Slim's naturally bluesy vocals over the Baton Rouge radio station. Slim befriended a local disk jockey, Ray "Diggy Do" Meaders, who got him an interview with J. D. Miller of the Feature label. Soon after, Slim's record "Badluck Blues" was cut in 1954. He recorded briefly with Ace Records and in 1955 began recording with the southern-based Excello label.

That same year he and harmonica player Lazy Lester founded a trio with any one of a variety of drummers. In 1959, his song "Rooster Blues" made the R&B charts, while he continued to record for Excello until 1966 when he moved to Detroit and joined Slim Harper's Band. In 1970, he again teamed up with Excello and began touring Europe, especially with American blues legends packages tours. He returned to the United States in 1973 and died shortly thereafter of cancer in 1974. Slim processed a natural, unaffected, unpolished, lazy blues that, along with his grainy voice, married him to the Louisiana blues style. Many of his guitar accompaniments used the same E-natural patterns over and over, with key changes between songs possible with a capo or by tuning down the guitar strings.

HEATHER PINSON

Bibliography

AMG; Harris; Herzhaft; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSPFLINCOLN, CHARLIE

b. Charlie Hicks, 11 March 1900; Lithonia, GA
 d. 28 September 1963; Cairo, GA

Singer and guitarist in prewar rural Georgia style. Brother of Barbecue Bob Hicks. He learned guitar from Savannah Weaver, mother of Curley Weaver. He made various records by himself and accompanying his brother in 1927–1930. He continued performing into the 1950s, but a 1955 murder conviction and subsequent imprisonment effectively ended his musical career.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn); Larkin
 Bastin, Bruce. Red River Blues. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.

Discography: AMG; DGRLINKCHAIN, HIP

b. Willie Richard, 10 November 1936;
 Jackson, MS
 d. 13 February 1989; Chicago, IL

Guitarist from Jackson, Mississippi, who spent the majority of his life in Chicago, after moving there in the early 1950s. Born Willie Richard, he was referred to as "Hipstick," after the nickname of his tall, logger father—"Long Linkchain." His father and brother both played guitar. As a youngster, Linkchain hitchhiked throughout the Delta to hear blues being performed by Elmore James, Sonny Boy Williamson II, Little Milton, and others. He acquired his first electric guitar when he moved to Chicago, and began playing local clubs with a number of musicians, such as Willie Foster and Lester Davenport. In 1959, he formed his own band, the Chicago Twisters, which included Tyrone Davis. As part of the Silver Dollar Lounge house band, Linkchain had the opportunity to perform with artists such as Muddy Waters and Howlin' Wolf. In the 1960s, Hip cut several singles on the Sanns and Lola labels. In the 1970s he recorded for the MCM, JSP, Rumble, and Teardrop labels. He finally recorded his own album, Change My Blues, in 1981. His most well-known album, Airbusters, was recorded for the Black Magic label in 1984. It features solid playing and showcases ten original Linkchain compositions. Cancer claimed Linkchain's life in 1989.

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin
 Nelson, David. "Hip Linkchain." Living Blues no. 87 (July/August 1989): 36.

Discography: AMG

LIPSCOMB, MANCE

b. Bowdie Glenn Lipscomb, 9 April 1895; Navasota, TX

d. 30 January 1976; Navasota, TX

Guitarist and singer. The rural musical storyteller, who did not travel outside Texas until he was in his sixties, was a throwback to nineteenth-century entertainment sensibilities. Lipscomb, who never viewed himself as a bluesman, was the last of the line of genuine Texas “songsters”; entertainers, often itinerant, who, much in the manner of West African griots, served as cultural depositories for the rural communities they frequented. Blues was part of the show but so was any and everything else, including waltzes, ballads, rags, folk tales, political songs, and spirituals.

Lipscomb’s fascinating autobiography I Say Me for a Parable, published posthumously in 1993, recounts his experiences as the son of an Alabama slave growing up in fertile farmland of the Brazos River. The award-winning book is told mostly in deep East Texas dialect transcribed from more than a decade of oral history tapes made by Lipscomb disciple Glen Alyn.

Mance Lipscomb. (Photo by Tom Copi, courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Lipscomb, who dropped his given name early in his life in favor of Mance, a shortened version of Emancipation, the name of an old family friend who died, began playing music when he accompanied his fiddler father at country dances as a child. He learned the traditional tunes by playing them live and picked up guitar licks from observing casual front porch picking sessions. His brothers were guitarists and an uncle played banjo so music was a pervasive part of his upbringing. By the time he first met Lightnin’ Hopkins in 1938 in Galveston he was an experienced musician, highly proficient in finger-picking and slide styles.

Lipscomb, no stranger to hard work and a hard life, brought unquestionable authenticity to his songs. Beginning at age sixteen, he toiled as an East Texas sharecropper, supporting his family for the next four decades with work in the fields. He had moved on to become a truck driver briefly before settling into a job as the foreman of a highway-mowing crew in what were assumed to be his retirement years. To Lipscomb it was, as the title of Les Blanks’s documentary states, A Well Spent Life with which he had few regrets.

On the advice of Hopkins, who promised to help him find musical employment, Lipscomb had given big city life a brief shot in 1956, moving to Houston where he worked in a lumber mill by day and played the blues bars at night. Hopkins, however, jealously guarded his jobs and Lipscomb couldn’t establish himself on the scene. But his stay did have a positive result when he was able to return to Navasota and finally buy his own farm with a cash settlement from an on-the-job injury.

A few years later the blues scene came to him when folklorists Mack McCormick and Chris Strachwitz sought him out in Navasota in 1960, ultimately getting him into the recording studio and on to concert stages far beyond East Texas. Strachwitz would start his Arhoolie label with a Lipscomb recording and release another half dozen of his albums. Lipscomb would play for forty thousand fans at the 1961 Berkeley Folk Festival and enjoy a dozen years of belated recognition before bad health confined him to nursing homes and hospitals until his death.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda and Al Campbell); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Lipscomb, Mance, and Glen Alyn. I Say Me for a Parable.
New York: W. W. Norton, 1993.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

LISTON, VIRGINIA

b. 1890

d. June 1932; St. Louis, MO

Singer in black vaudeville from 1912 through 1929. She recorded mostly for OKeh in 1923–1926. A few sessions were with her first husband, pianist Sam Gray, but her more celebrated recordings were those with pianist Clarence Williams, cornetist Louis Armstrong, and soprano saxophonist Sidney Bechet. Her 1932 death date is unconfirmed.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Uncle Dave Lewis); Harris

Discography: DGR; LordLITERATURE, BLUES IN

In 1925 Alain Locke announced the arrival of a “New Negro” as if in response to W. E. B. DuBois’s plea two decades earlier in The Souls of Black Folk (1903) to educate the “talented tenth.” Men like these intellectuals, along with James W. Johnson, Countee Cullen, Arna Bontemps, and others, the vanguard of the Harlem Renaissance, frowned upon the blues. The New Negro had come out of the masses and this elite class accepted responsibility for defining the black aesthetic. The blues classics being recorded during the same era by women like Gertrude “Ma” Rainey, Bessie Smith, and Ida Cox were considered licentious, tawdry, and unrestrained by the Renaissance writers along with a majority of the new black middle class who decided such music was antithetical to the cause of racial uplift. Black art, it seemed, had to be political.

During this rebirth of African American culture, few authors were courageous enough to risk association with the blues, this music of the common folk. Langston Hughes, Zora Neale Hurston, and Sterling Brown were notable exceptions. Much of Hughes’s work is influenced by the rhythm and cantor of the blues. Not only did the blues influence Hurston’s writing, but Hurston also served as guide for Alan Lomax’s expedition to record rural blues. Sterling Brown’s emphasis on folk literature is likewise credited for bringing black academia shoulder to shoulder with unlettered blues people.

The Great Migration, the largest mass movement of any single group of people in the nation’s history, played a significant role in disseminating the blues. It began in earnest around 1917 and some scholars date the conclusion of the migration well past World War II. Migrants left the rural South and moved northward and to a lesser degree westward in search of liberties that they were denied in the Jim Crow South. The migration was met first with open resistance from white, southern planters who depended on African Americans as a cheap labor force until the mechanization of agriculture gradually reduced their reliance on these workers. Northern laborers came offering free tickets for a train ride north to anyone agreeing to return with them to work. Northern factories paid higher wages than the field hands received in the South. African Americans beheld the gilded specter of the northern city (Harlem and Chicago in particular) painted by the Chicago Defender, DuBois’s Crisis, the literature produced by the Harlem Renaissance authors, and other publications targeted to a black audience and believed they would find opportunity there. They took buses or rode packed together in cars, but most often they took the train. More than anything else, the train symbolized for the migrants the sorrow of that which was left behind and the promise of that which was yet to come. Blues people recorded this sentiment in their songs. The migrants left the South but they brought their music with them.

Musicians were faithful to their craft, however, for a time, authors remained torn between the influence of lyrical blues expressions and the demand that literature be socially uplifting. Often as a result, the sentiment of the blues was buried in literature under the weight of anger. Migrants flooded into the northern city and found themselves crowded into ghettos and living under unsanitary conditions. Claude Brown captures the mood of the time just following the Great Migration in his autobiography, Manchild in the Promised Land:

It seems that Cousin Willie, in his lying haste, had neglected to tell the folks down home about one of the most important aspects of the promised land: it was a slum ghetto. ... There were too many people full of hate and bitterness crowded into a dirty, stinking, uncared-for closet-size section of a great city. ...

The children of these disillusioned colored pioneers inherited the total lot of their parents—the disappointments, the anger. To add to their misery, they had little hope of deliverance. For where does one run to when he’s already in the promised land? (p. viii)

Even Hughes asks, “What happens to a dream deferred?” Despite the fact that the blues was born of similar conditions that produced authors like Claude Brown, many writers refused to mask their frustration with the blues.

The blues seemed too passive an expression for authors like Richard Wright who chose, instead, to write social realism. Wright's most acclaimed novel, Native Son (1940), tells the tragic story of Bigger Thomas, a young man driven to murder due to his hopeless circumstances. After he suffocates the young socialite, Mary Dalton, he briefly seeks refuge with his girlfriend, Bessie. Once Bigger confides in her about the murder, Bessie is distraught and expresses her misery through the sentiment of the blues:

God only knows why I ever let you treat me this way.
I wish to God I never seen you. I wish one of us had died before we was born. (p. 215)

Even without the traditional A A B stanzas, we recognize Bessie as an agent of the blues. She translates the tragic circumstances of her life into a somebody-gone-and-done-me-wrong song typical of the blues. Bigger knows the truth of Bessie's words, but he views the fact that she responds to the situation with the blues as a vulnerability. The blues are no more valuable to Bigger than alcohol, dancing, or religion. After hearing Bessie's "song," Bigger knows that he will kill her too because she is not fit to bring with him on his flight from the police nor is she fit to leave behind.

Despite his claims to the contrary, Ralph Ellison's Invisible Man (1947) bears the influence of Wright. There are, however, significant differences. Unlike Wright, Ellison does not dismiss the blues because it lacks an obvious social agenda. Ellison openly criticized Wright's lack of insight about black music, which was evidenced by the shameful fact that Wright could not dance. From Ellison's perspective, music is the thread that binds African American people together; without it, one is hopelessly disconnected from a vital artery that feeds the very heart of African American people. So while Bigger is without music and the wisdom it engenders, Ellison's invisible man finds his roots in the blues.

Louis Armstrong's recording of "Black and Blue" (1929) is playing in the background as the narrator explains his "invisibility" to the reader in the Prologue of Invisible Man. The song serves as the subtext that introduces us to both the protagonist and the circumstances leading up to this declaration. The Prologue ends with the narrator invoking the music as he introduces the novel proper, "But what did I do to be so blue? Bear with me" (p. 14). Albert Murray describes what follows as "the literary extension of the blues." Murray suggests that in Invisible Man, Ellison arranges an orchestral score from a common twelve-bar blues. Ellison aptly draws on the subtle politics of the blues that so many of the black intelligentsia overlooked.

At the time of its publication, Hurston's Their Eyes Were Watching God (1937) was excoriated by critics including Alain Locke and Richard Wright who saw little value in a work that seemed too happy to be in step with the times. During the early part of the century, the legacy of slavery was still fresh and the black intelligentsia was preoccupied with how African Americans were represented. They were still battling to overcome the stereotypes of the African American as Sambo, Jezebel, Uncle Tom, and Mammy. Nothing in Hurston's novel about a black woman's quest for self-fulfillment seemed innovative. In his critique of Their Eyes, Wright accuses Hurston of performing minstrelsy.

Wright's slur against Hurston suggests that she is an entertainer, working to reinforce racial stereotypes. Wright and other male critics found it easy to claim that Their Eyes was apolitical because they chose to overlook the gender politics. Too often the efforts of the black intelligentsia to manage African American cultural productions turned into a policing of black women's bodies. Both the blues and Hurston's novel resist male dominance in order to gain control of black female sexuality. Vaudeville performers like Gertrude "Ma" Rainey, Bessie Smith, and Ida Cox were the first generation of black female artists who declared through their performances, "It's my thing and I'll shake it if I want to." They flaunted their sexuality shamelessly as part of their acts.

The petit bourgeois had so repressed female sexuality that African American women found few viable outlets for their latent desires. In Quicksand (1928) Nella Larsen depicts Helga Crane's slow descent into death in her marriage to an ignorant, southern preacher as the alternative to rebellion against middle-class values. The tragic mulatta, Helga succumbs to social norms rather than express her sexual longings. On the other hand, in Their Eyes, Hurston chooses to represent a journey that takes her protagonist to the horizon of her own physical and emotional desires. Ultimately, Jane Crawford becomes like a blues performer who is able to achieve a catharsis by sharing her experiences with a friend who, in turn, is able to identify with both Janie's joy and her loss. Even the structure of the novel that takes us through Janie's three marriages, mirrors the A A B structure of the blues.

Once the blues shifts from the musical form to literature it takes on countless permutations: from the literal, as we see in Gayl Jones's Corregidora (1975), the story of blues singer Ursa Corregidora who must find a way to "leave evidence" of her great grandmother and grandmother's tragic past even while she struggles to testify about her own lived experiences, and that way is the blues, which become her record; to the symbolic, as in Jones's Eva's Man (1976), which draws on the structure and the sentiment of the blues to tell the story of Eva, who has been incarcerated for murdering her lover and, subsequently, castrating him with her teeth.

African American women writers emerging in the wake of the civil rights era continue the tradition established by writers like Hughes and Hurston. They claim the blues as a viable means of expression. Ntozake Shange announced "i live in music" (1978) in a poem by that title and declared that she "walk[s] round in a piano like somebody / else / be walkin on the earth." Nearly a decade later, Toni Morrison builds a house in Beloved (1987) on Blues/tone Road. That house of women, of course, is haunted by an angry ghost of the past. The story that unfolds from that address is a blues narrative. In Beloved, Morrison uses blues tones and composes Sethe's tale. The blues becomes a narrative form that is able to honestly represent a system that perverts humanity to the point that infanticide can seem a reasonable alternative to life.

During the 1990s, publishers began to tap into the neglected African American market that was hungry for books by and about black people. As the publishing industry began to cater to this audience, the blues emerged as a common theme in popular fiction. Authors were publishing novels like Bebe Moore Campbell's Your Blues Ain't Like Mine (1992), Arthur Flowers's Another Good Loving Blues (1993), and Walter Mosley's RL's Dream (1995), about an aging bluesman's encounter with the legendary Robert Johnson. However, as Campbell suggests in Your Blues, the blues is ground out of personal tragedies and the peculiarly black origins of the blues are transcended by the truth they speak about the human condition. Rising interest in literature with blues themes reflected by publishing trends in the 1990s mirrored the rise of popular interest in the blues more generally. Just as white musicians crossed over to become blues performers, white authors like Ace Atkins in his series of Nick Travers mysteries, Crossroad Blues (1998), Leavin' Trunk Blues (2000), and Dark End of the Street (2002), have begun claiming the blues as their own.

At Hampton University's 2002 President's Lecture, Walter Mosley declared, "All of existentialism is in the blues" and he named Robert Johnson as one of the world's greatest philosophers. As a philosopher, Johnson's devotion is first to the common people. Following Johnson's lead, scholars like Houston A. Baker, Jr., in his seminal text, Blues, Ideology, and Afro-American Literature: A Vernacular Theory (1984), demonstrate how the blues transcends the limitations of a musical form to function as an ideology that informs literary production and interpretation. Baker locates the blues at the southern, rural railway junction. However, the blues is larger than the junction. Baker, of course, does not intend to simplify the blues. Yet, even with its options, the railway junction is too flat to contain the blues as it appears in literature. Certainly Baker captures the potential and the motion but the junction limits the blues to a plane of two dimensions. Even as the blues resists stability and flat dichotomies, the blues in literature becomes a shelter with not only length, width, and depth, but also height.

VALERIE SWEENEY PRINCE

Bibliography

- Adero, Malaika, ed. Up South: Stories, Studies, and Letters of This Century's African-American Migrations. New York: The New Press, 1993.
- Baker, Houston A. Blues, Ideology, and Afro-American Literature: A Vernacular Theory. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1984.
- Barrett, Lindon. "'In the Dark': Billie Holiday and Some Sights and Sounds of American Value." Callaloo 13, no. 4 (1990): 872-885.
- Bonner, Patricia. "Analyzing the World of Langston Hughes' Living Blues: The Blues Experience Approach." Popular Music and Society 14, no. 2 (Summer 1990).
- Bremer, Sidney H. "Home in Harlem, New York: Lessons from the Harlem Renaissance Writers." PMLA 105, no. 1 (January 1990): 47-56.
- Brown, Claude. Manchild in the Promised Land. New York: Signet, 1965.
- Campbell, Bebe Moore. Your Blues Ain't Like Mine. New York: Ballantine, 1992.
- Carby, Hazel. "It Just Be's Dat Way Sometime: The Sexual Politics of Women's Blues." Radical America 20, no. 4 (June-July 1986).
- . "On the Threshold of the Woman's Era: Lynching, Empire and Sexuality in Black Feminist Theory." Critical Inquiry 12 (Autumn 1985): 266-277.
- Davis, Angela Y. Blues Legacies and Black Feminism: Gertrude "Ma" Rainey, Bessie Smith, and Billie Holiday. New York: Pantheon Books, 1998.
- Dixon, Melvin. Ride Out the Wilderness: Geography and Identity in Afro-American Literature. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1987.
- Ellison, Ralph. Invisible Man. 1947; reprint, New York: Random House, 1990.
- . Shadow and Act. New York: Vintage, 1972.
- Fisher, Rudolph. City of Refuge: The Collected Short Stories of Rudolph Fisher, edited by John McCluskey. Columbia: University of Missouri Press, 1987.
- Gottfried, Amy S. "Angry Arts: Silence, Speech, and Song in Gayl Jones's Corregidora." African American Review 28, no. 4 (1994): 559-570.
- Griffin, Farah Jasmine. "'Who Set you Flowin'?: The African-American Migration Narrative. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Hughes, Langston. Best of Simple. New York: Hill & Wang, 1961.
- . The Big Sea: An Autobiography. New York: Hill & Wang, 1940.

LITERATURE, BLUES IN

- . Montage of a Dream Deferred. New York: Henry Holt, 1951.
- . The Weary Blues. New York: Knopf, 1926.
- Hurston, Zora Neale. Their Eyes Were Watching God. Greenwich, CT: Fawcett, 1937.
- . Mules and Men. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1978.
- Jones, Gayl. Corregidora. New York: Bantam, 1975.
- Jones, LeRoi (Amiri Baraka). Black Music. New York: Morrow, 1968.
- . Blues People. New York: Morrow, 1963.
- Lemann, Nicholas. The Promised Land: The Great Black Migration and How It Changed America. New York: Knopf, 1991.
- Levine, Lawrence. Black Culture, Black Consciousness: Afro-American Folk Thought from Slavery to Freedom. New York: Oxford University Press, 1977.
- Morrison, Toni. Beloved. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1970.
- . Jazz. New York: Knopf, 1992.
- . “Rootedness: The Ancestor in Afro-American Fiction.” In Black Women Writers at Work: A Critical Evaluation, edited by Mari Evans. Garden City, NY: Anchor Press, 1992.
- . Song of Solomon. New York: New American Library, 1978.
- Murray, Albert. Stomping the Blues. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1976.
- Oliver, Paul. Blues Off the Record. New York: Baton, 1984.
- . Conversation with the Blues. New York: Horizon, 1965.
- . The Meaning of the Blues. New York: Collier, 1960.
- Petry, Ann. The Street. 1946; reprint, Boston: Beacon Press, 1985.
- Powell, Richard. The Blues Aesthetic: Black Culture and Modernism. Washington, DC: Washington Project for the Arts, 1989.
- Roberts, John Storm. Black Music of Two Worlds. New York: William Morrow & Company, 1974.
- Walker, Alice. The Color Purple. New York: Washington Square Press, 1982.
- Wright, Richard. 12 Million Black Voices. New York: Thunder’s Mouth Press, 1941.
- . Black Boy: A Record of Childhood and Youth. New York: Harper and Row, 1945.
- . Native Son. New York: Harper and Row, 1940.

LITTLE, BOBBY

b. Ronald Bluster

Drummer active since the late 1950s. Raised in the Bay area of California. Began playing drums after arriving in Chicago in the late 1950s after armed forces service. Received instruction from Fred Below and Odie Payne, and gained experience in West Side clubs. From 1961 through 1967 he toured with Earl Hooker. Became active in radio as a DJ in Mississippi in 1967. As of 1991 he was based in Clarksdale, Mississippi.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Nesmith, Chris, and Ken Woodmansee. “The Drummer Is the Key: Bobby Little.” Living Blues no. 96 (March/April 1991): 36–41.

LITTLE BUSTER

b. Edward Forehand, 28 September 1942; Hereford, NC

Guitarist/vocalist/songwriter Edward “Little Buster” Forehand moved to Long Island, New York, to pursue an R&B career after losing his sight. Buster’s mid-1960s releases on Jubilee/Josie, including the hit “Young Boy Blues,” established him professionally. Buster worked locally until a 1995 CD release, Right on Time, revitalized his touring career.

JERRY ZOLTEN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl and Al Campbell)
Williams, Dave, and John Broven. “Little Buster: Big Voice.” Juke Blues no. 36 (Winter 1996/1997): 30–35.

Discography: AMG

LITTLE CHARLIE

b. Charlie Baty, 10 July 1953; Birmingham, AL

Harmonica player-turned-guitarist Little Charlie (Charles Baty) teamed up with singer-harmonica player Rick Estrin in 1976 in forming the four-piece Little Charlie & the Nightcats. The multifaceted group, their sound a mix of Chicago blues, West Coast jump-blues, and early rock ‘n’ roll, worked for about a decade around Sacramento and San Francisco until a record deal with Alligator Records brought them to national and international notice. Little Charlie’s guitar playing points to jazz guitarist Charlie Christian and bebop horn players as well as to Freddie King and Albert King, these and a myriad of other influences are wrapped up into a strikingly original guitar sound.

FRANK-JOHN HADLEY

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey)

Discography: AMG

All the Way Crazy (1987, Alligator 4753).
Captured Live! (1991, Alligator 4794).

Straight Up! (1995, Alligator 4829).
Shadow of the Blues (1998, Alligator 4862).
That's Big! (2003, Alligator 4883).

LITTLE MIKE

b. Michael Markowitz, 23 November 1955;
 Queens, NY

New York City–based harmonica player and keyboardist in postwar Chicago blues styles. With his backing group The Tornados, he has recorded for Blind Pig, Flying Fish, and Wild Dog labels. He has also been a producer for CDs by Hubert Sumlin and Pinetop Perkins.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

LITTLE MILTON

b. James Milton Campbell, 7 September 1934;
 near Inverness, MS

Born on Duncan Plantation in Sunflower County, Mississippi, to Milton Campbell and Pearl Tardin, Campbell later dropped the “James.” While an infant, Campbell moved to Magenta, between Stoneville and Greenville. Saving money from agricultural labor for over a year, Campbell ordered his first guitar (“a little Gene Autry–type guitar”) from Walter Fields when he was twelve years old. Campbell’s powerful singing owes much to his early experiences in church.

Campbell’s first professional engagements were playing locally with guitarist Eddie Cusic’s combo. Influenced by the Grand Ole Opry, they mixed country and western standards with their typical blues program when playing segregated white venues. In Greenville, in the early 1950s, Campbell apprenticed with a group of older musicians: pianist Willie Love, harmonica player Sonny Boy Williamson II, and especially guitarist Joe Willie Wilkins. Campbell also studied the recordings of T-Bone Walker. Backing Willie Love, Campbell made his recording debut for the Trumpet label in 1951. By this time, Campbell had his own band and was broadcasting over Greenville station WGVM.

Ike Turner introduced Campbell to Sun Records in Memphis where he recorded as leader (and sideman with Houston Boines) in 1953–1954. Campbell cut a session for Meteor in Memphis in 1956. Willie Love’s stepson Oliver Sain accompanied Campbell on the Meteor session and continued to work with him after he moved from Greenville to East St. Louis in 1955 and began recording for Bobbin in 1958. At Bobbin, Campbell also worked in A&R and as a sideman recording behind Sain (including the Earthworms), Leo Peterson, and Fontella Bass.

Campbell began recording for the Chess subsidiary, Checker, in 1961. In early 1962, “So Mean to Me” reached the fourteenth spot on the national R&B chart. It was the first of seventeen Checker singles that charted for Campbell, including his top-ranked 1965 hit “We’re Gonna Make It.” In 1967, Campbell moved to Chicago. In 1970, he participated in a gospel session with the Harold Smith Majestic Singers.

From 1971 until its demise in 1975, Campbell recorded for Memphis’s Stax label, producing seven nationally charting hit records and appearing in the 1972 film/concert Wattstax. Between 1976 and 1983, Campbell recorded for Glades, MCA, Mier, Golden Ear, and Isabel and behind Jackie Ross and Big Voice Odum. Since 1984, Campbell has recorded exclusively for the Jackson, Mississippi, label Malaco, which has released fifteen albums by Campbell, including the critically acclaimed Cheatin’ Habit. Campbell also backed Artie White and Campbell’s nephew Charles Wilson on Ichiban. Campbell and wife Pat own Camil Productions, which books Campbell and other artists, and Trice Publishing.

Winner of numerous awards, Campbell is devoted to his core African American audience, the “chitlin circuit.” Often compared to contemporaries B. B. King and Bobby Bland, Campbell is a unique and versatile vocal and guitar stylist who prefers continued growth as an artist performing for his traditional and demanding audience rather than stagnating, endlessly playing his old hits for better-paying crossover appeal.

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

- Forte, Dan. “Little Milton.” Guitar Player 25, no. 7 (1991): 62–70.
 Little Milton official website, <http://www.littlemilton.com/welcome.html>.
 O’Neal, Jim, and Patty Johnson. “Little Milton: Living Blues Interview,” Living Blues no. 114 (April 1994): 18–39.
 Rowe, Bill. “Little Milton/Jerry McCain.” Career Discographies 1, no. 2 (April 1995): 1–33.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

LITTLE MILTON

Selected Recordings

Friend of Mine (1976, Collectables 5434).
Grits Ain't Groceries (1989, Stax 8529).
Welcome to the Club: The Essential Chess Recordings (1994, MCA Chess 9350).
Cheatin' Habit (1996, Malaco 7482).
Feel It (2001, Malaco 7506).
Anthology 1953–1961 (2002, Varese 66359).

LITTLE MISS CORNSHUCKS

b. Mildred Cummings Jorman, 26 May 1923;
Dayton, OH
d. 11 November 1999; Indianapolis, IN

A nightclub performer of the postwar “after-hours” blues era, Little Miss Cornshucks, born Mildred Cummings, developed a substantial following as a colorful singer of jump-blues, torch ballads, and proto-R&B in nightclubs and theaters from Central Avenue Los Angeles to Harlem. She enjoyed a long residency at Chicago’s Club DeLisa singing with the Red Saunders and Fletcher Henderson orchestras.

Her intimate yet dramatic singing style bridged 1920s vaudeville, 1940s swing blues, and 1960s soul music, influencing such diverse performers as Ruth Brown, LaVern Baker, Johnny Ray, Judy Garland, and Aretha Franklin. Atlantic’s Ahmet Ertegun cites her as sparking his interest in recording.

As the comic Cornshucks character, a forlorn down-home country girl new in town, she had particular impact with urbanized African Americans of the Great Migration. She developed the persona as a teenager while singing as one of the Cummings Sisters, a Dayton gospel act.

Throat polyps occasionally added nasality to ballads and jump-blues she recorded effectively for varied labels between 1946 and 1951, with the Marl Young–arranged “So Long” on Sunbeam, the Maxwell Davis–produced “In the Rain” for Miltone, and the soulful “Try a Little Tenderness,” backed by Benny Carter on Coral, being the most notable. She performed in the 1948 Monogram Pictures film Campus Sleuth. After recording a string-laden attempted “comeback” LP for Chess in 1960, she slipped into obscurity. Married to Cornelius Jorman of Indianapolis as her solo career began, she was mother to two daughters and a son.

BARRY MAZOR

Bibliography

Mazor, Barry. “A Soul Forgotten: Little Miss Cornshucks’ Legacy.” No Depression no. 45 (May 2003): 80–86.

Discography: LSFP

Selected Recordings

Chicago 1946

Little Miss Cornshucks with the Marl Young Orchestra. Sunbeam 104: “So Long”/“Gonna Leave Here Walkin’.” 105: “Have You Ever Loved Somebody”/“For Old Time’s Sake.” 106: “I Don’t Love You Any More”/“When Mommy Sings a Lullaby.”

Los Angeles, 1948

Little Miss Cornshucks with the Blenders. Miltone 242: “Keep Your Hand on Your Heart”/“He’s Funny That Way” (rereleased as DeLuxe 3186). 243: “Cornshuck’s Blues”/“In the Rain” (also DeLuxe 3178). 246: “Why Was I Born”/“True.” Plus “You Don’t Love Me,” one side of DeLuxe 3192.

Los Angeles, 1949

Little Miss Cornshucks & Her All-Stars. Aladdin 3034: “You Turned Your Back on Me” b/w rerelease of Miltone “Keep Your Hand on Your Heart.” 3126: “Time After Time”/“Waiting in Vain.”

Los Angeles 1950–1951

Little Miss Cornshucks with Benny Carter & His Orchestra. Coral 65045: “Papa Tree Top Blues”/“Rock Me to Sleep.” 65077: “So Long”/“Cause I Lost My Helping Hand.” 65090: “Try a Little Tenderness”/“Don’t Marry Too Soon.”

Chicago 1960

“It Do Me So Good”/“No Teasing Around” (Chess 1786).
The Loneliest Gal in Town (Chess LP 1453).

LITTLE RICHARD

b. Richard Wayne Penniman, 5 December 1932;
Macon, GA

Success is sometimes measured in the number of titles, nicknames, and pseudonyms a performer has to his credit. If that is the case here, Little Richard is near the top of the list as the “Originator, Emancipator and Architect of Rock and Roll,” the “Georgia Peach,” the “Wild Man of Rock ‘n’ Roll,” and, literally, dozens of others.

Little Richard helped to craft the transition of R&B to rock ‘n’ roll in the mid-1950s, helped to pave the way for rock music videos with early film performances, and set the stage for a level of flamboyance fans hadn’t dreamed of before. He artfully blended his southern gospel background with the hard-driving rockabilly agenda and laid the foundation for a whole new art form. In addition to its strong, urban beat, feelings of country western, folk, and white pop music can be sensed in Richard's early works. His sense of style might have been influenced by Bill Wright, a flamboyant New Orleans musician known for his elegant coiffure and flashy clothes, whom Richard met in 1952, and Esquerita, who gave Richard some piano style pointers in Atlanta.

Richard, born in Macon, Georgia, in 1932, grew up in the poverty of the black rural South and gained his musical background from church choirs, his neighborhood, and the radio. Richard sang in the Penniman Singers and Tiny Tots Quartet, two area gospel groups. Later, in Macon, he performed with Sugarfoot Sam's Minstrel Show.

In 1951, Richard won a talent contest in Atlanta, signed with RCA, and released four unnoticed singles, including "Taxi Blues." After his contract with RCA expired, Richard recorded two singles for Peacock Records in Houston without success. He returned to Macon to perform at the Tick Tock Club by night and wash dishes at the Greyhound Bus Depot by day.

But Little Richard was undaunted. He continued to write and practice and, in 1955, sent demos to Specialty Records, at the suggestion of Lloyd Price, a Specialty artist. He recorded several tracks at Cosimo Matassa's J&M Studio in New Orleans with producer Robert "Bumps" Blackwell and a group of talented musicians from the New Orleans area and Little Richard had the chance he had long awaited.

Initially, the material did not showcase Richard's talent and the sessions looked gloomy. But, during a break, Richard began an impromptu performance at the Dew Drop Inn and Blackwell saw his wild, uninhibited performance of "Tutti Frutti, Good Booty." Blackwell instantly realized Richard's true potential and called in lyricist Dorothy LeBostrie to revamp Richard's song into something more commercial for 1950s audiences.

"Tutti-Frutti" was the first hit from those sessions. Elvis covered "Tutti Frutti" on national TV twice in 1956; Richard's biggest hit, "Long Tall Sally" topped the R&B chart for eight weeks and was number six on the pop chart that year; "Slippin' and Slidin'" and "Rip It Up" surged onto R&B and pop charts; and at the end of a very memorable year, the last of his original session material was released with "Good Golly Miss Molly," "Jenny Jenny," and "The Girl Can't Help It."

Richard appeared in two films in the 1956–1957 period. The first was Don't Knock the Rock, with Alan Dale and Patricia Hardy. Richard delivered two over-the-top numbers, "Long Tall Sally" and "Reddy Teddy." Other rock 'n' roll performers included Bill Haley & the Comets and the Treniers. "The Girl Can't Help It" was the title song of the other Hollywood film starring Jayne Mansfield and Tom Ewell. Richard performed "The Girl Can't Help it," "She's Got It," and "Rip It Up" in the film. Other rock 'n' roll stars (the Platters, Fats Domino, Gene Vincent & the Blue Caps, and Eddie Cochran) performed as well. Virtually overnight, Little Richard became an icon to thousands of teens who had never heard of him before.

In 1957, Richard toured Australia with Vincent and Cochran but, after an airplane scare, abruptly abandoned his rock 'n' roll career in the middle of this successful, sold-out tour. He enrolled at the Oakwood Theological College in Huntsville, Alabama, to become a minister. For another year, Specialty continued to release singles from his earlier sessions. Richard filed a lawsuit against Specialty, accusing them of underpaying his royalties.

In 1959, Richard signed with a booking agency, entered into a contract with Gone Records, and began a career as a gospel performer. He released several poorly received gospel albums and, in 1962, Richard returned to secular music with tours of England and Europe. During his European tour, his opening act was the Rolling Stones. Later in 1962, Richard returned and signed with Vee-Jay Records. Richard continued touring during this period, but success was mediocre.

In 1967, Specialty released Little Richard's Greatest Hits on the Okeh label. This collection was live tracks of his older material and became the first Little Richard album to make the charts in years. Richard was reborn to a new audience of young R&B fans. During this period, rock 'n' roll revivalism became a major influence in the market. The trend saved Richard's career. He had produced very little new material in the past few years and needed a new audience to discover his unique style. However, by 1968, Little Richard's album sales totaled more than thirty-two million copies.

But success was short lived when Richard again abandoned his career for a higher calling. He was ordained as a minister in 1970 and preached and released a few secular albums for the next few years. He became a Bible salesman, embraced Charismatic Christianity, and released another gospel album during this period.

Finally, in 1986, a character part in the film Down and Out in Beverly Hills brought Richard another round of fame and success. He released an album of children's songs, starred in a Disney benefit album for charity, and performed in numerous videos, television spots, and concerts throughout this period.

In the period from 1980 through 1997, Richard received numerous accolades, including the Lifetime Achievement Award from the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences, induction into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1987, and the Rhythm and Blues Foundation's Pioneer Award.

LITTLE RICHARD

TOM FISHER

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
White, Charles. The Life and Times of Little Richard: The Quasar of Rock. New York: Harmony, 1984.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Little Richard (1956, Camden 371); Here's Little Richard (1957, Specialty 100/2100); Little Richard, Vol. 2 (1957, Specialty 2103); The Fabulous Little Richard (1958, Specialty 2104); Little Richard Sings Gospel (1959, 20th Century 5010); Biggest Hits (1963, Specialty 2111); King of the Gospel Singers (1964, Wing 1222288); Little Richard Is Back (1964, Vee-Jay VJS-1107); Explosive Little Richard (1967, OKeh 14117); The Little Richard Story (1970, Joy 260); The Rill Thing (1970, Reprise 6406); Rock Hard, Rock Heavy (1970, Sonet 5001); Good Golly Miss Molly (1974, Hallmark SMS858); Greatest Hits Recorded Live (1974, Embassy 31065); Dollars (1975, Reprise MS-2051).

LITTLE SONNY

b. Aaron Willis, 6 October 1932; Greensboro, AL

Harmonica, vocals, composer. Little Sonny, named after mentor Sonny Boy Williamson II (Aleck Miller), has been a mainstay of the Detroit blues scene since the early 1950s. He was dubbed "New King of the Blues Harmonica" on his recordings for Stax.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin
Slaven, Neil. "I'm Working to Be a Truly Professional Person." Blues & Rhythm no. 100 (June/July 1995): 4-9.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

LITTLE WALTER

b. Marion Walter Jacobs, 1 May 1930;

Marksville, LA

d. 15 February 1968; Chicago, IL

Seminal blues singer, harmonica player, and guitarist
Marion "Little" Walter Jacobs was born in Marksville,

Louisiana, to Adam (Bruce) Jacobs and Adam's sister-in-law Beatrice Leveige. Shortly after his birth, Walter was sent to live with his uncle Samuel Jacobs and his aunt Dawn in Alexandria. By the time a twelve-year-old Walter was reunited with his mother in Marksville, he had been playing harmonica for four years, influenced by white country harmonica player Lonnie Glosson and the Cajun music he heard around him. He had also established his lifelong personality as a wild and restless loner. Accusations of arson prompted Walter to leave for New Orleans around 1943, where he performed both on the streets and in clubs. Later that year he received advice on harmonica playing from Sonny Boy Williamson II (Aleck Miller) in Helena, Arkansas, perhaps appearing on "Mother's Best Flour Hour" on KFFA in 1945. There he also met future bandmates Jimmy Rogers and Robert Lockwood. The years 1943-1951 found Walter traveling back and forth to various towns in the South and to St. Louis and Chicago, playing in venues with both past and future blues heavyweights.

By 1946 Walter's Chicago base was on Maxwell Street. Walter began playing with the stars of the previous and emerging generation of Chicago blues, including Memphis Slim, Bill Broonzy, and Tampa Red, and met one of his early harmonica influences, John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson. Walter made his earliest recordings for the Ora-Nelle label run by a Maxwell Street radio store owner, Bernard Abrams.

Little Walter. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Where John Lee Williamson had taken the comping and chording of the previous generation of harmonica players and bridged to a style that mixed chords and single note runs, Walter's Ora-Nelle recordings as leader, with Othum Brown and Jimmy Rogers, show him moving even further from the chording and more toward riffing in the vein of saxophonists like Louis Jordan, though with a raucous individual style and phrasing adapted to the harmonica. Subsequent sessions for Tempo Tone in 1948 (with Muddy Waters and Sunnyland Slim), Regal in 1949, and Parkway in 1950 show Walter advancing in technique and power without losing the deep feeling of his southern blues roots, particularly on his ferocious playing on Baby Face Leroy's 1950 recording "Rollin' and Tumblin', Parts 1 and 2." By that time Walter had been playing in Muddy Waters's band for two years, though it wasn't until August 1950 that Walter recorded with Muddy and Jimmy Rogers (and in October with Johnny Shines) for Chess Records.

His next major recorded advance on the harmonica took place at a July 11, 1951, Waters session on which he played in his distinctive amplified style, cupping his harmonica onto a microphone and playing directly through his own amplifier, on "Country Boy." Here Walter reveals one of the styles he established for postwar amplified harmonica, with powerful, drawn-out, swooping lines that emphasized the bedrock beat and then suddenly darted around the beat in rhythmic glee, and using the amplification to play tender notes with a soft yet authoritative touch. This was a style that Walter frequently used on Muddy's slow blues, but on the up-tempo numbers he was playing with Muddy's band as they traveled Chicago blues clubs as the "Head Hunters" taking on all competition, Walter was clearly generating another style. This one was closer to the Louis Jordan jump style, but made unique use of the trilling and tremolo effects, and was finely attuned to the various sustain, distortion, and reverberation possibilities that amplification offered with regard to emotional shading. Although other harmonica players such as Walter Horton and Snooky Pryor had experimented previously with amplification, Little Walter was its first and greatest master. He also played with an unflagging melodic invention, for many listeners unsurpassed before or since by any other blues harmonica player. Most remarkable of all, as one of the earliest amplified harmonica stylists, Walter still presented a fully formed, mature style that not only helped initiate the style, but advanced it further than anyone else has been able to do. A May 12, 1952, session that produced the swinging "Juke" is one of the most significant blues sessions of all time for introducing a new amplified style to the world. When it hit number one on the R&B charts, Walter left Muddy's band (though he continued to record with Muddy) and went on the road with his Night Cats/Jukes band behind the recordings he made for Chess during the next eleven years.

Between 1952 and 1959, Walter had fifteen R&B chart hits, including "You're So Fine" and "My Babe," but even those that weren't hits continued to demonstrate his remarkable genius, admirably supported by band members like guitarists Louis and Dave Myers, jazzy virtuosos Robert Lockwood and Luther Tucker, bassist Willie Dixon, and drummers Fred Below and George Hunter. In addition to his other stylistic innovations on the harmonica, Walter also pioneered the use of third position on the diatonic harmonica, playing it in a "chromatic" harmonica style on songs such as "That's It," "I Got to Go," "You Gonna Be Sorry," and "One of These Mornings," supplementing the "straight" or first position and "crossed" or second position techniques favored by previous blues harmonica players. Walter was also the first blues harmonica player to make extensive use of the chromatic harmonica, once again forging an entirely original style, at times awash in amplification that created a moody atmosphere for his stark, frighteningly evil-sounding solos on tunes like "Lights Out" and "Blue and Lonesome." Additionally, Walter occasionally switched from one harmonica to another on songs such as "Blue Light" and "Thunderbird," where he played both diatonic and chromatic harmonicas, and on John Brim's "Be Careful," where he played both straight and cross harp, to achieve the sounds he desired. Sometimes underappreciated are Walter's exemplary vocals, which were direct and heartfelt, never flashy, as on the moving "Last Night" and the sensitive "Everybody Needs Somebody," garnering the attention of John Lee Hooker, who called Walter his favorite singer.

During the time Walter was making his own groundbreaking recordings, he also worked as a studio musician, providing brilliant accompaniments to artists such as those mentioned earlier and also Floyd Jones, Memphis Minnie, and Bo Diddley (who returned the favor on Walter's breathtaking "Roller Coaster") at Chess, and for Otis Rush at Cobra Records in 1957. He toured extensively, appearing in such major venues as the Apollo in New York City, the Regal Theatre in Chicago, Alan Freed's Diddley Daddy Package Show, and the Hippodrome Ballroom.

After his heyday as a hit "Race record" artist ended in 1959 with "Everything's Gonna Be Alright," Walter began a career with a new audience when he traveled to Britain in September 1964 and played accompanied by Long John Baldry's band, the Groundhogs, and other groups, and in 1967 accompanied by American Folk Blues Festival musicians, including Hound Dog Taylor. In the meantime he recorded a couple of unsuccessful sessions for Chess in 1966 and 1967, one an abortive "Super Blues" session, and even did a live recording with author/cartoonist Shel Silverstein. Volatile until the end, he died in Chicago on February 15, 1968, of coronary thrombosis brought on by injuries sustained in a street fight, and is buried in St. Mary's Cemetery, Evergreen, Illinois. When he died, the blues lost the man Muddy Waters called the best harmonica player in the business, an imaginative and technical genius who transformed the harmonica's role and sound through his endlessly daring performances. Harmonica players in the blues, jazz, country, and rock genres today acknowledge the mastery of Little Walter.

LITTLE WALTER

STEVEN C. TRACY

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Herzhaft; Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Glover, Tony, Scott Dirks, and Ward Gaines. Blues with a Feeling: The Little Walter Story. New York: Taylor and Francis, 2002.
- Hunter, Richard. "An Appreciation of Little Walter." Journal of Jazz Studies 5, no. 1 (Fall/Winter 1978): 108–115.
- Lindemann, Bill. "Living Blues Interview: Little Walter and Louis Myers." Living Blues 2, no. 7 (Winter 1971–1972): 17–25.
- Little Walter Special Issue* (2000, Blues and Soul Records 36).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

- Little Walter: The Chess Years, 1952–1963* (1992, Charly Red Box 5).
- The Blues World of Little Walter* (1993, Delmark 648).
- Chicago Boogie* (1993, P-Vine 1888).
- Blues with a Feeling: Chess Collectables, Vol. 3* (1995, MCA Chess CHD2 9357).

LITTLEFIELD, "LITTLE" WILLIE

b. 16 September 1931; El Campo, TX

Blues singer and pianist. Willie Littlefield's great-great grandmother was an Apache Indian. He was raised by his mother in Houston's Third Ward. He was influenced by his grandparents' C&W music, his mother's gospel music, and his aunt's blues. He taught himself how to play the guitar when he was six, and it was not long before his mother bought her musical son a piano as well. Charles Brown and Amos Milburn became his heroes. At high school he formed his first band and they enjoyed considerable success. The great trio of boogie-woogie pianists, Albert Ammons, Meade "Lux" Lewis, and Pete Johnson, now had a tremendous influence on him.

Willie made his first recordings for Eddie's in Houston in 1948, when he was only seventeen years old. The boogies he recorded at his first session are cherished collectors items now, but Willie prefers his present-day work: "I have more experience now, you can hear that in the changes. You have to take your time. It is like a kid growing up. You learn to control more. At that time I just played boogie-woogie and blues, but now I play everything I want to play." While still a teenager Jules Bihari asked Willie to record for Modern. His big hit with them was "It's Midnight," which reached number three and stayed in the Billboard R&B charts for thirteen weeks. Its piano triplets strongly influenced Fats Domino. For his third Modern session Willie teamed up with Pee Wee Crayton and the photos made of that session clearly show the fine interaction between Pee Wee (age thirty-four) and Willie (just eighteen years old). In 1999 the first CD reissue of Willie's Modern recordings appeared: Kat on the Keys (Ace CDCHD 736).

In 1952 Willie switched to Federal where he recorded with Little Esther Phillips and made recordings under his own name. "K. C. Loving" became one of the biggest hits ever when it was recorded as "Kansas City" by Little Richard, Wilbert Harrison, Fats Domino, the Everly Brothers, the Beatles, and dozens of other artists. Although Willie wrote the song himself, the composer credit of Federal 12110 is to "Stoller–Leiber." In 1957 Willie signed with Rhythm Records and "Ruby-Ruby" became a hit again. During the next few years Willie performed in Kansas City and California. In 1975–1976 Willie recorded for the Blues Connoisseur label, and although the results were rather poor, the records revived interest in him by European collectors. In 1978 Willie came to Europe where he fell in love with a Dutch woman. In 1981 they married and settled in the Netherlands where they are still living. He made many records in Europe, especially for the Dutch Oldie Blues label. Willie played most of the big international festivals, performed in the film Love in Limbo, and was a favorite artist at prestigious international events. After fifty-five years on the road he retired. Willie Littlefield is still a consummate showman and a proficient pianist.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin

Discography: AMG; LSFP

LITTLEJOHN, JOHN

b. John Wesley Funchess, 16 April 1931; Learned, MS
d. 1 February 1994; Chicago, IL

Born John Wesley Funchess on a farm near Jackson, Mississippi, the singer/guitarist who became known as Johnny Littlejohn developed an interest in blues around age twelve upon hearing it played at local fish fries. Littlejohn began playing the guitar a few years later. In the late 1940s, he moved north and worked day jobs around Gary, Indiana. While there, he started playing music professionally and occasionally gigged throughout the Midwest, including Chicago. Littlejohn returned to Jackson in the early 1950s and recorded two unissued sides for Ace Records in 1952. He fronted his own band around Jackson with harmonica player Sam Myers and also played occasionally with Elmore James, absorbing the influential slide guitar player's style.

Littlejohn settled in Chicago in the mid-1950s, but would travel back to Mississippi often during the following years to perform. He cut various singles for small labels throughout the 1960s and recorded what is generally considered his finest work in 1968, the Chicago Blues Stars LP for Arhoolie. The recording featured Littlejohn's exemplary slide and lead guitar playing and haunting vocals in the 1950s Chicago blues tradition. Throughout the 1970s and 1980s, he recorded albums for ABC-BluesWay, Black & Blue, Wolf, and Rooster Blues. Littlejohn continued to lead his own band for much of the rest of his life, toured Europe, and remained a mainstay on the Chicago blues scene until the early 1990s when he was plagued by illness. Johnny Littlejohn died in Chicago at age sixty-two, the result of several recurring heart attacks and a stroke.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Whiteis, David. "John Littlejohn." Living Blues no. 115
(June 1994): 60–61.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

John Littlejohn: Chicago Blues Stars (1991, Arhoolie CD 1043).

LOCKWOOD, ROBERT, JR.

b. 27 March 1915; Turkey Scratch, AR

Robert Lockwood, singer and guitarist of both Delta blues and Chicago blues. His father, Robert Lockwood, Sr., was not a musician; he disappeared while his son was very young. Later, Robert Jr.'s mother began seeing another, younger suitor: Robert Johnson. Robert Lockwood and Robert Johnson did not have a stepson/stepfather relationship—they were only four years apart in age. Robert Johnson did, however, introduce Lockwood to the guitar and his own, unique technique; they played live together on many occasions.

In 1941, Robert Lockwood made his first recordings for Bluebird, Mercury, and JOB; sometimes as a sideman, sometimes under his own name, up into the 1950s and 1960s, especially for Chess Records. Since the 1970s, he has recorded for Delmark and Trix. He also recorded in France a tribute album to Robert Johnson, titled Robert "Jr." Lockwood Plays Robert & Robert (1982). This album showcases Robert alone with his electrified twelve-string guitar: Half of the songs are his, the other half are covers of "Rambling on My Mind," "Sweet Home Chicago," and "Little Queen of Spades." The album ends with a fine version of a blues standard, "C. C. Rider." After that French release, Lockwood did not record again until 1996.

Robert Lockwood was inducted into the Blues Foundation's Hall of Fame (1989) and has received two honorary doctorates in Cleveland, in 2001 and 2002. At age eighty-nine, Robert Jr. Lockwood's CD

Robert Lockwood. (Photo by Tom Copi, courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

LOCKWOOD, ROBERT, JR.

Legend Live (2004) proves that he can still reinvent and revisit some of Robert Johnson's classics, like "Sweet Home Chicago," "Love in Vain," "Ramblin on My Mind."

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Hoffman, Larry. "Robert Lockwood, Jr." Living Blues no. 121 (May/June 1995): 12–29.
Robert Jr. Lockwood website, <http://www.robertlockwood.com/>.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

See also C. C. Rider; Chess/Aristocrat/Checker/Argo/Cadet; Johnson, Robert; Shines, Johnny; Sunnyland Slim; Townsend, Henry; Williamson, Sonny Boy II (Rice Miller)

LOFTON, "CRIPPLE" CLARENCE

b. 28 March 1887; Kingsport, TN
d. 9 January 1957; Chicago, IL

Aka Albert Clemens. An early boogie-woogie originator, along with his fellow contemporaries Cow-Cow Davenport, Meade "Lux" Lewis, Pine Top Smith, and Jimmy Yancey, he helped popularize the style in Chicago in the early 1920s. His nickname stemmed from a congenital lameness in his leg that made him walk with a pronounced limp. This did not inhibit his style, as he was an all-around entertainer who sang, tap-danced, snapped his fingers, and played the piano. He was an eccentric, undisciplined but powerful pianist who would begin playing a new chorus before the last one was finished, showing little regard for the standard twelve-bar pattern.

Born in Tennessee he lived most of his life in Chicago, becoming a fixture on the Chicago nightlife scene. He owned his own nightclub called the Big Apple where he ran his own boogie school teaching youngsters the art form. Between 1935 and 1943 he cut close to forty sides for Vocalion, Swaggie, Solo Art, and Session including exuberant pieces such as "Brown Skin Girls," "Policy Blues," "Streamline Train," and "I Don't Know," the latter a number one R&B hit for Willie Mabon in 1952. The bulk of these were solo sides with guitarist Big Bill Broonzy adding support for two sessions. In addition Lofton provided accompaniment to Red Nelson, Sammy Brown, Al Miller, and Jimmy Yancey.

Lofton remained on the scene cutting sides for the Gennett, Vocalion, Solo Art, Riverside, Session, and Pax labels. He stayed around Chicago until his death in 1957 from a blood clot in the brain.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Chilton; Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Silvester, J. Peter. A Left Hand Like God: A History of Boogie-Woogie Piano. New York: Da Capo, 1988.

Discography: DGR; Lord; LSFP

Selected Recordings in Reissue

Cripple Clarence Lofton, Vol. 1, 1935–1939 (1994, Document BDCD-6006).
Cripple Clarence Lofton, Vol. 2, 1939–1943 (1991, Document BDCD-6007).

See also Chicago; Davenport, Cow-Cow; Lewis, Meade "Lux"; Mabon, Willie; Smith, Clarence "Pine Top"; Yancey, James Edward "Jimmy"

LOGAN, JOHN "JUKE"

b. 1940s; Los Angeles, CA

Southern California-based harmonica player's first fame came playing with Leon Russell and then Dave Alvin. Has a bright, energetic tone on harp, and crosses easily from rock to blues and even country.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Char Ham)
John "Juke" Logan website, <http://www.basssharp.com/juke.htm> (accessed December 19, 2004).

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

The Chill (1995, Razor & Tie 2818).
Juke Rhythm (1999, Mocombo 55001).

LOMAX, ALAN

b. 15 January 1915; Austin, TX
d. 19 July 2002; Safety Harbor, FL

Lomax is the most celebrated folklorist of the twentieth century. Over the course of almost seven decades he combined careers as ethnomusicologist, folk music popularizer, folk song collector, performer, and writer, excelling in each of these areas. His work has had a unique impact on blues culture, as well as on a vast range of other folk music from around the world.

Lomax was the son of the folklorist John A. Lomax and his first wife Bess Brown. A precocious talent, Alan began studies at the University of Texas at the age of fifteen (he would graduate in 1936). Alan's career began in 1933 when he accompanied his father on the first of a series of pioneering field trips recording folk music for the Library of Congress. In 1937, still only twenty-one, he was appointed director of the Archive of American Folk-Song at the Library of Congress. By the end of the decade, he had acquired a reputation nationally as the preeminent figure in his field and his career continued to develop throughout the 1940s. In 1950 he moved to England following blacklisting in the United States for his political views. In England, Lomax further enhanced his status making important field trips and becoming a pivotal force behind major folk music revivals in both Britain and Europe. By the time he returned to America in 1958, he was regarded as probably the most influential living figure in folk music. From the 1960s on, in addition to continuing to make field recordings and promote folk music, he became actively involved in academia, being associated with Columbia University between 1962 and 1989 and Hunter College from 1989 until his death.

Lomax's contribution to folk music is diverse and extensive. It falls into three broad categories: preservation, dissemination, and theorizing.

In terms of preservation, his focus was field recordings. His basic aim was to root out folk music removed as far as possible from the homogenizing effect of mainstream culture. To this end, Lomax focused on isolated communities such as prisons, lumber camps, and cowboy ranches. This approach was remarkably successful and by the end of the 1930s the Lomaxes had already collected more than three thousand recordings. Many thousands more were to follow. Although Lomax's initial focus was North America, his scope became international after a 1936 trip to Haiti and he later collected extensively in the Caribbean, Britain, Spain, and Italy. All the major material from Lomax's field trips, including film footage and photographs as well as audio recordings, is now housed in the American Folklife Center of the Library of Congress.

Much of Lomax's energy was put into disseminating the material he had uncovered. The first commercial issue of his field recordings was the 1939 Leadbelly album, Negro Sinful Songs, and there have been numerous other releases since. The culmination is the Alan Lomax Collection on Rounder Records, begun in 1997, which will eventually comprise more than one hundred CDs of Lomax-related material. As well as records, Lomax also published several seminal printed collections of folk songs beginning with American Ballads and Folksongs in 1934, coauthored with his father. Starting in the 1930s, Lomax extensively popularized folk song through radio and later television. In addition, he used his influence to promote the careers of folk musicians often raising them from complete obscurity to stardom by organizing media appearances, concert tours, and recordings.

Lomax was a leading theorist of folk music. His central interest was the interconnectedness between global folk cultures, resulting in a wide-ranging cross-cultural comparison of folk music (cantometrics) and folk dance (choreometrics). Although this part of Lomax's work is less well known than his other activities, it is no less important.

Throughout his career, Lomax had a close relationship with the blues. He recorded the genre extensively on his field trips in the South in the 1930s, 1940s, and 1960s. In the process, he unearthed two major blues talents: Leadbelly, found in a prison in Angola, Louisiana, in 1933; and Muddy Waters, who Lomax recorded for the Library of Congress in 1941 and 1942. Other notable blues musicians recorded by Lomax include Memphis Slim, Big Bill Broonzy, Son House, Blind Willie McTell, Sonny Boy Williamson, and Jelly Roll Morton. With these artists, as with all the musicians he recorded, Lomax was a consummate interviewer, always able to coax the best from his performers. The result is a series of recordings as musically and historically important as any in the canon of traditional blues. Lomax's early encounters with blues musicians are described in his 1993 book The Land Where the Blues Began.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

- Larkin; Santelli
 Cohen, Ronald D., ed. Alan Lomax: Selected Writings 1934–1997. New York: Routledge, 2003.
 Lomax, Alan. Cantometrics: An Approach to the Anthropology of Music. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976.
 ———. Folk Song Style and Culture. Washington DC: American Association for the Advancement of Science, 1968.
 ———. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Pantheon Books, 1993.
 ———. Mister Jelly Roll: The Fortunes of Jelly Roll Morton, New Orleans Creole and "Inventor of Jazz." New York: Pantheon Books, 1993.
 Lomax, John Avery, and Alan Lomax. American Ballads and Folk Songs. New York, Macmillan, 1934.
 ———. Negro Folk Songs as Sung by Leadbelly. New York: Macmillan, 1936.

Discography

Negro Sinful Songs (1939, Musicraft Album 31); The Midnight Special: Songs of Texas Prisons (1940, Victor); Afro-American Blues and Game Songs (1942, Library of Congress); Blues in the Mississippi Night (1959, United Artists Records); Negro Prison Songs (1959, Tradition); The Blues Roll On (1960, Atlantic Records); Yazoo Delta: Blues and Spirituals (1960, Prestige); Deep South...Sacred and Sinful (1961, Prestige Records); Georgia Sea Islands (1961, Prestige Records); Leadbelly: Includes Legendary Performances Never Before Released (1976, Columbia); Walking Blues (1979, Flyright Records); The Alan Lomax Collection (1997–, Rounder Records; 100+ CDs).

Filmography

The Land Where the Blues Began (1991, PBS).
Music from Newport 1966 (1997, Vestapol; 3 vols.).

LOMAX, JOHN AVERY

b. 23 September 1867; Goodman, MS
d. 26 January 1948; Greenville, MS

Pioneer folklorist. The son of a Confederate army veteran, Lomax was raised in Texas. After teaching in public schools, he attended the University of Texas in 1895, majoring in English literature. In 1903, he was offered a post as English teacher at Texas A&M University. He first gained national attention with Cowboy Songs and Other Ballads in 1910, the first published collection of such material. He remained in academia until 1917, gaining a master's degree from Harvard in 1908. From 1917 to 1931 he worked as a banker, first in Chicago and Dallas, except for the years 1919–1925, when he was an administrator at the University of Texas.

The Depression was a turning point for Lomax: For the rest of his life, he was at the forefront of the dissemination and preservation of American folk music. In 1932, after embarking on a series of lecture tours, he formed a ten-year relationship with the Library of Congress, in which he undertook a series of epic field trips, the first in 1933 with his son Alan. In total, Lomax made some thousands of field recordings, including many of folk blues and related styles. His aim was to preserve traditional music before it disappeared or became irretrievably corrupted by commercial influences. In 1933, in Angola prison, Louisiana, he made perhaps his greatest single discovery, the singer Leadbelly (Huddie Ledbetter). Lomax recorded Leadbelly extensively and was instrumental in the promotion of his career. Along with his recordings, Lomax is noted for his published folk song anthologies, particularly American Ballads and Folksongs (cowritten with Alan Lomax), a seminal collection that includes many traditional blues and blues ballads.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli
Lomax, John. Adventures of a Ballad Hunter. New York: Macmillan, 1947.
Porterfield, Nolan. Last Cavalier: The Life and Times of John A. Lomax. University of Illinois Press, 2001.

LONDON

(See United Kingdom and Ireland)

LONDON-AMERICAN

From 1951 U.K. Decca used this label name on material made by small American companies to which they had acquired the British rights. These included Savoy, Atlantic, Chess, Specialty, and Imperial. Singles from the more popular R&B artists including Ray Charles and Fats Domino appeared alongside issues from Chess by Muddy Waters, Little Walter, and Howlin' Wolf, which ultimately influenced the direction of British popular music. The LP catalog included the Origins of Jazz series of ten-inch LPs drawn in association with Riverside from defunct American labels. The sixty-five issues made up to 1959 were the largest reissue project to that date and included three albums by Blind Lemon Jefferson.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Pelletier, Paul M. British London Label Complete Listing. London: Record Information Services, 1974–1976; Cheshington, England: Record Information Services, 1982; continued in Record Information, nos.1–6 (1983–1986).

See also Decca

LONESOME SUNDOWN

b. Cornelius Green, 12 December 1928;
Donaldsonville, LA
d. 23 April 1995; Gonzales, LA

Lonesome Sundown was an extremely versatile stylist and underrated songwriter whose impact was felt in almost every genre of Louisiana music. Sundown excelled at stomps, laments, sweet ballads, novelty fare, and bristling, energetic pieces. An outstanding contributor to pivotal sessions as a guitarist, he eventually emerged as a prolific bandleader and solo artist. Sundown's introduction to the guitar came from a cousin who taught him during the evenings, following rigorous days spent in the Donaldsonville, Louisiana, fields. Sundown escaped that life in 1953, moving to the oil fields in Beaumont, Texas. An offer to sit in one night from the legendary King of Zydeco Clifton Chenier at the Blue Moon Club forever changed Lonesome Sundown's life.

After working in Chenier's road band as second guitarist alongside Phillip Walker, Sundown relocated with a new bride to Opelousas. Subsequently he scored a regional hit with "Lost Without Love," which Sundown recorded for famed producer J. D. Miller at his studio in Crowley. The staples of his playing and singing approach were honed during his years with Miller. These included crisp, direct leads, stinging guitar riffs, and pointed, humorous asides and storylines. Sundown's late 1950s and early to mid-1960s recordings, many of them issued on Nashville's Excello label, were steady sellers among Southern black listeners despite never appearing on industry charts.

Sundown abandoned secular music for the church in 1966. There were comeback attempts in the late 1970s and early 1980s. He suffered a stroke in 1994.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Bromberg, Bruce. "'I'm a Mojo Man': Two Views of Lonesome Sundown." Blues Unlimited no. 80 (February/March 1971): 5-6.

Discography: AMG; LSF

LONG, JAMES BAXTER "J. B."

b. 25 December 1903; Mint Hill, NC

d. 25 February 1975; Burlington, NC

Talent scout, producer, A&R for Columbia, ARC (American Recording Corporation). James Baxter Long, a store manager for the United Dollar chain first in Kinston, then in Durham, North Carolina, backed into a second career as a scout for the American Record Corporation (ARC). He eventually became manager to Blind Boy Fuller, and under his guidance many prominent Piedmont bluesmen (Blind Boy Fuller, Blind Gary Davis, Bull City Red, Brownie McGhee, Sonny Terry, Buddy Moss, Floyd Council, and others), as well as Mitchell's Christian Singers and Lake Howard, made their first recordings.

ANDREW M. COHEN

Bibliography

Bastin, Bruce. Cryin' for the Carolines. London: November Books, Ltd., 1971.

Lornell, Kip. "Living Blues Interview: J. B. Long." Living Blues no. 29 (September/October 1976): 13-22.

LORNELL, CHRISTOPHER "KIP"

b. 13 February 1953; Denver, CO

Christopher "Kip" Lornell began conducting blues research while still in high school. As an undergraduate in New York and North Carolina he interviewed and recorded local blues artists, resulting in articles in Living Blues and other periodicals and albums on the Flyright, Trix, and Rounder labels. Among his most important discoveries were the cousins Joe and Odell Thompson, practitioners of African American pre-blues styles on the banjo and fiddle. In 1983 Lornell received his Ph.D. in ethnomusicology from Memphis State (now University of Memphis); his dissertation was published as "Happy in the Service of the Lord": Afro-American Gospel Quartets in Memphis (Urbana Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 1988).

Lornell served for four years as the staff folklorist/ethnomusicologist at Ferrum College's Blue Ridge Institute, where his work included compiling/annotating four albums documenting Virginia vernacular traditions. He also edited Virginia's Blues, Country, and Gospel Records: 1902-1943—An Annotated Discography (Lexington: University Press of Kentucky, 1989). Lornell's academic work has addressed a wide variety of vernacular music, and he has published extensively on blues, pre-blues, early country music, jazz, go-go, gospel quartets, singing evangelists, and the early recording and broadcasting industries. He coauthored, with Charles Wolfe, The Life and Legend of Leadbelly (New York, HarperCollins, 1992), which received the ASCAP-Deems Taylor Award. In 1997 Lornell received a Grammy for his work on the boxed set The Anthology of American Folk Music for Smithsonian/Folkways. In recent years Lornell has worked as a lecturer at George Washington University and as a researcher at the Smithsonian Institution.

SCOTT BARRETTA

LOUIE BLUIE

(See Armstrong, Howard "Louie Bluié")

LOUIS, JOE HILL

b. Leslie or Lester Hill, 23 September 1921; Raines, TN
d. 5 August 1957; Memphis, TN

Acquired “Joe Hill Louis” moniker after winning a boxing match. He was a one-man band singing and playing guitar, harmonica, and foot-drum. Recorded for various labels including Sun and Meteor. Louis died of tetanus from a cut on his thumb.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSFP

LOUISIANA

History and Overview

The state of Louisiana occupies one of the most strategic positions in the United States: the mouth of the Mississippi River. The Mississippi served as a major transportation and commercial artery for the country—whoever controlled the river dominated trade in the interior. As a result, many groups have migrated to Louisiana for economic opportunity and nations have struggled to control the region, producing a rich and turbulent history and culture.

Founded by the French in 1699, the Louisiana colony was initially meant to protect the territory claimed by the explorer Robert de LaSalle. The colony sprawled from the Appalachians to the Rockies, but the French never adequately settled the region and the colony struggled to survive. Most of the settlements clung closely to the Gulf Coast or to interior areas favorable to planting sugar cane. The French recruited settlers from Germany and Switzerland, and imported slaves from West Africa and the West Indies. Recent historical research has indicated that the majority of slaves imported during the French period (1699–1763) originated in the Senegambia and came from the Mande culture. During the French period, slaves often outnumbered European immigrants and this has led some historians to view Louisiana as the most African of all North American colonies.

In 1763 France transferred Louisiana to Spain as a result of the Seven Years War. Under the Spanish, the Louisiana colony prospered. Diverse immigration patterns continued with groups of exiled Acadians, Canary Islanders (Islenos), and refugees from the Haitian rebellion constituting the major waves. Anglo-Americans and black slaves from the United States also moved into the northern part of the colony. Spanish laws regarding slavery were remarkably lenient compared to French and American laws. Slaves could purchase their freedom or be granted it if they performed activities beneficial to the government. As a result, the population of free people of color grew during the Spanish regime. For the most part these Free People were of mixed racial ancestry (French, Spanish, and African) and began to forge a new identity as Creoles. Many became skilled artisans, were highly educated, and purchased slaves themselves. At the time of the American acquisition of Louisiana the free population had reached nearly 1,800. In 1800 France forced Spain to cede the colony, but never fully regained control.

In 1803 the United States purchased the Louisiana territory from France. In 1812 Louisiana was formally admitted into the union as the eighteenth state. During the antebellum period, racial divisions sharpened and the free Creoles created a distinctive culture that included a cultivated musical community. Creoles favored European-style classical and light classical music and a large number of highly trained Creole musicians worked in New Orleans. Such light classical and café-style composers as Edmund Dede and the Lambert family rose to prominence in international circles.

A certain cultural latitude was also granted to slaves. During the antebellum period, African cultural traditions such as drumming and dance persisted throughout Louisiana. In New Orleans, Congo Square was set aside for slaves to gather and perform on Sundays. In 1856 the New Orleans council passed an ordinance outlawing slave drumming and dancing.

Louisiana witnessed a great deal of military action during the Civil War due to its strategic location. The war devastated the state, pushing it to the bottom of the American economic structure. African Americans were the hardest hit of Louisiana citizens. In 1890 the Louisiana legislature began passing a series of Jim Crow laws restricting the activities of African Americans. Plessy v. Ferguson, the case that eventually legitimated the “separate but equal” idea, originated as a case challenging these laws. Following the collapse of the interracial Populist movement in 1898, Louisiana entered a period of draconian measures during which white elites held both black and white farmers and laborers down.

During the 1920s, the dynamic politician Huey P. Long broke the power of the Bourbon elite and provided some relief for the lower classes both black and white. Following the Second World War, black Louisianians began to press for civil rights. Though not without incident, the transition in Louisiana was not as volatile as in other parts of the South, perhaps due to the state's long history of ethnic diversity. The 1970s saw an economic boom period with rising oil prices, but the subsequent crash of industry in the next decade cast a pall over the state from which it has yet to recover.

Culturally and geographically, Louisiana can be divided into three regions. New Orleans represents an urban southern city with much ethnic diversity. Acadiana, often referred to as Southwest Louisiana or the "bayou region," stretches from the Atchafalaya Swamp west to Texas, with its northern boundary about one hundred miles below the city of Alexandria. Cajun culture dominates this region. "North Louisiana" is an area extending from the northern limit of Acadiana to Arkansas and includes the area around Baton Rouge and the parishes north of Lake Pontchartrain (usually referred to as the Florida Parishes). North Louisiana was settled primarily by Anglo-Celtic Americans, slaves, and freed people from states such as Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and the Carolinas. The main economic activities in North Louisiana consist of growing cotton, the lumber and oil industries, and subsistence farming. This region of Louisiana is most like other parts of the Deep South.

African American music in North Louisiana generally followed the same patterns established in the Deep South. The string band tradition dominated the musical scene until the late 1890s or early 1900s. Unfortunately, little of the black Louisiana string band tradition survived to be recorded, though recordings made by the folklorist Harry Oster during the 1950s and 1960s give some indication of this vital form. Oster recorded Butch Cage, Willie B. Thomas, and others demonstrating the fiddle-led string band style. Oster also did extensive field recording at Angola State Penitentiary. Angola gained a reputation as one of the hardest prisons in the United States, though it was founded as a way of reforming the older chain gang system. Robert Pete Williams was serving time in Angola when he was discovered by Oster. During the 1930s John Lomax located Leadbelly in the same prison.

The spread of the lumber and oil industries through western Louisiana during the early years of the twentieth century provided opportunity for entertainers because laborers received wages in either cash or script, and companies often built dance halls and bars in their company towns for their workers' entertainment. Most frequently these clubs featured piano players such as Will Ezell and Little Brother Montgomery. These "professors" worked a circuit of clubs often accompanied by female singers or horn players, such as Charlie Love, who played the newly emerging jazz style.

Shreveport emerged as a major center for black music during the early twentieth century. "St. Paul's Bottoms," a good-time district, provided opportunities for black musicians interested in perfecting their craft and earning a living playing music. The Bottoms (and an adjacent area called the "Blue Goose") was a training ground for such Louisiana bluesmen as Leadbelly, Will Ezell, Oscar Woods, the Black Ace, and the Thomas brothers Willard and Jesse. The Bottoms also saw interaction between black and white musicians. The country singer and future Louisiana governor Jimmie Davis often visited the Bottoms and used Woods and Eddie "Dizzy Head" Schafer on some of his early blues recordings.

Baton Rouge grew as a center of blues activity during the post-World War II era. Major clubs such as the Carousel Club and, later, Tabby's Blues Box were venues that featured blues musicians. Buddy Guy, Little Walter, Guitar Gabriel, Slim Harpo, Tabby Thomas, Lazy Lester, and Henry Gray all perfected their styles in the clubs around Baton Rouge. Several of these bluesmen relocated to Chicago and played dramatic roles in the development of that scene. Many of these artists recorded for the famed producer J. D. Miller of Crowley and gained national exposure through releases on major labels such as Excello and Specialty.

The blues community of North Louisiana continues to be vibrant. Much of the activity is linked to families, a powerful tradition in Louisiana. The Neal family, led by patriarch Raful, includes his sons Kenny and Lil Ray, daughter Jackie, and grandson Tyree. Baton Rouge's elder blues statesman Tabby Thomas shares the spotlight with his son Chris Thomas King, who recently gained exposure through the film O Brother Where Art Thou? For many years the Thomas family ran Tabby's Blues Box, the premier blues club in Baton Rouge.

The market for blues in North Louisiana remains primarily within the African American community. Tourists who visit Louisiana tend to focus on the jazz clubs of New Orleans or the Cajun and zydeco dance halls of Acadiana. While this may translate into fewer dollars for the artists, the situation keeps the performers rooted in the culture of Louisiana. Thus this vital form, often overlooked in the state, maintains its richness and earthiness and reflects the rich cultural diversity of Louisiana.

New Orleans

The major city in Louisiana, New Orleans enjoys one of the richest cultures of any urban area in the United States. The city has served as an incubator for a wide array of music, including jazz, blues, rhythm and blues, and zydeco.

New Orleans was founded in 1718 by the French-Canadian explorer Jean Baptiste LeMoyne, Sieur de Bienville. The city is positioned near the mouth of the Mississippi River and has served as a major port since its founding. As a port city, New Orleans attracted a diverse population of citizens throughout its history, all of whom have left a mark on the city's unique culture. French culture dominated the early years of the city and continued as a main influence during the era of the Spanish occupation (1763–1803) and well into the American period. New Orleans also established strong ties to the Caribbean, most notably Haiti and the cities of Havana and Tampico.

In terms of population, early New Orleans was the most ethnically diverse city in the South. Initially the settlement was composed of French and French-Canadian migrants who were soon joined by large numbers of slaves from the Senegambia and the West Indies. During the French colonial period, Swiss and German migrants also moved to the city. After the Spanish established control of the colony in the 1760s, the government in Madrid encouraged the migration of Spanish, Canary Islanders (Islenos), and people from other parts of the broad Spanish empire. A notable influx of refugees from the Haitian rebellion arrived in the 1790s, bringing with them slaves and the folk religion of voodoo. In the nineteenth century, New Orleans saw waves of immigration from Ireland, Germany, China, Italy, and eastern Europe. The twentieth century saw major migrations of Filipinos and Vietnamese. To this ethnic gumbo must be added immigrants from the surrounding rural areas of Louisiana and Mississippi who came seeking employment in New Orleans industry and along the docks. Despite common belief, New Orleans has never had a significant Cajun population. That group resides mainly in the rural areas of southwestern Louisiana.

A significant portion of the New Orleans population is Creoles. The word “Creole” simply means “native,” but it has taken on a variety of meanings. Initially the term applied to the children of French or Spanish parents born in the new world. In this sense Creole came to mean the white cultural elite of the city. A second definition emerged to designate people of mixed French, Spanish, and African heritage who were generally free before the Civil War. These Creoles were also known as gens de couleur libres (free people of color). “Creole” has also been used as an adjective to describe products such as tomatoes and hot sauce, the particular cuisine of New Orleans, and the language spoken by the gens de couleur libres.

Creoles of color constituted a major element of the New Orleans population throughout the city's history. The product of interracial unions between French and Spanish men and freed black women, the Creole population grew in the late eighteenth century as a result of liberal Spanish manumission laws. The Creoles created a complex society based around family, civic associations, and a militia system. They generally practiced skilled trades such as iron working and carpentry. Creoles also reveled in their French heritage. Their children were often sent to be educated in France; they imported French musicians and developed a cultivated music tradition based on French opera and classical music. Creoles used these cultural connections to distance themselves from the slaves during the antebellum period and from the freedmen following the Civil War.

Slaves in New Orleans were granted an unusual amount of freedom, especially on Sundays. Beginning during the French colonial period and lasting until the 1850s, slaves gathered at Congo Square (now Armstrong Park) to dance, sing, and play drums. Benjamin Latrobe left an extensive account of the performances in Congo Square, thus providing a rare glimpse into slave recreation. Latrobe records slaves playing drums and early banjos and dancing the bamboula. In Congo Square, slaves of various African ethnic origins met and exchanged ideas and in the process helped lay the foundations of African American culture in New Orleans. Street performers were also common in New Orleans. The most famous of the antebellum street performers was known only as “Old Corn Meal.” The songster tradition established by Old Corn Meal persisted into the twentieth century, with Richard “Rabbit” Brown being the only New Orleans street songster to record.

Nineteenth-century New Orleans musical culture was extremely diverse. In addition to African American styles, there were Irish and German singing clubs, society dance music for balls, and military music for parades. Art music also flourished. Opera was performed in the city as early as 1796 and continued with great popularity until the twentieth century. Concert music was supported by both the white and Creole communities. The city also welcomed touring entertainers such as Jenny Lind, Ole Bull, and Henri Vieuxtemps. The first serious American classical composer, Louis Moreau Gottschalk, was born in New Orleans and drew heavily on Creole traditions and American popular culture in composing his pieces.

A central element to New Orleans music traditions was the brass band. Military-style bands were used in parades throughout the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Brass bands performed at funerals as early as 1819, and militia companies regularly employed musicians for their drills. The Union Army bandmaster Patrick Gilmore was stationed in the city during the war and furthered interest in brass bands with massive concerts, one of which featured more than five hundred musicians. Black brass band traditions began in earnest following the Civil War. Numerous black fraternal and social aid societies were created and these groups hired brass bands to play for social events, political rallies, and funerals. By the late nineteenth century, brass band musicians started experimenting with ragtime and improvisation. Their repertoire expanded to include religious music, ballads, reels, and the blues. The most famous bands experimenting with these trends were the Excelsior, the Onward, and the Tuxedo. White brass bands, such as that led by "Papa" Jack Laine, also incorporated ragtime and blues into their performances.

The brass band tradition led directly to jazz. Jazz fused the brass band music with blues intonation and appealed largely to working class blacks. The origins of jazz are murky, but most authorities tend to credit Buddy Bolden as the leader of the first mature jazz band, and it is known that he had a particular affinity for the blues. Most Creoles tended to look down on the style, though some, such as Jelly Roll Morton, openly embraced jazz. Country blues styles had little impact on jazz, but the classic blues style represented a merger of jazz and blues song.

New Orleans produced several important blues singers during the 1920s and 1930s. The most important of these were female performers such as Lizzie Miles, Lela Bolden, Ann Cook, Esther Bigeou, and Blue Lu Barker. All performed in the classic blues style of female vocalists backed by a jazz band. They differed little from other classic blues singers, though Miles often sang in Creole French. Papa Charlie Jackson and Willie Jackson worked the black vaudeville circuit and incorporated blues into their stage acts. Guitarist Lonnie Johnson and pianist Champion Jack Dupree, both New Orleanians, left the city and made their careers in the North and Europe. In doing so, they brought with them the fluid, technically stunning blues style of New Orleans.

Blues and jazz remained intertwined until the influx of rural blacks into the city during World War II. These migrants demanded their own style of blues, and clubs catering to this clientele blossomed in the 1940s and 1950s. Artists like Smiley Lewis moved to the city and began performing a country style of blues. The blues bands soon included horns and slowly moved toward the rhythm and blues style. One major figure in this transformation from rural sounds to a more urban identity was the eccentric pianist Henry "Professor Longhair" Byrd. Longhair fused jazz, blues, boogie-woogie, and calypso into a hypnotic mix accentuated by flourishes and trills. Still no distinctive New Orleans blues style coalesced. But an active scene developed along Rampart Street, a region ruled by the pianists Tuts Washington, Robert Bernard, and Sullivan Rock. As music historian Jeff Hannusch noted, individuality, not a definitive style, became the hallmark of New Orleans blues.

Several important New Orleans blues guitarists emerged in the 1950s. Boogie Bill Webb was the strongest of the rural sounding bluesmen in New Orleans. He was heavily influenced by Tommy Johnson who often played for Webb's mother's fish fries. Eddie "Guitar Slim" Jones gained great fame with his "The Things I Used to Do," perhaps the most important blues song to come from New Orleans during the period. Closely associated with Guitar Slim was Earl King, a dynamic guitarist who added much to the New Orleans funk sound. Snooks Eaglin spent many years as a sideman until discovered by Dr. Harry Oster. Eaglin built a strong following playing the blues, but his repertoire is diverse and classes him as a latter-day songster.

Professor Longhair, a major figure in New Orleans blues. (Photo by Tom Copi, courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Smiley Lewis possessed a rich singing voice and became the most popular blues vocalist in the city. Sugar Boy Crawford attracted a wide local following and was poised for stardom when police brutality cut his career short. Despite these artists' success, New Orleans during the 1950s was a rhythm and blues town, and many bluesmen found regular work in the bands of such favorites as Fats Domino, Lee Dorsey, and Ernie-K-Doe.

The years after World War II opened many avenues for New Orleans musicians. The club scene rapidly expanded in the prosperous postwar years and included clubs such as the Dew Drop Inn and the Tiajuana. The city had long been a center for music publishing and one of the earliest black music publishers and A&R men, Clarence Williams, came from New Orleans. Following in Williams's footsteps, bandleader Dave Bartholomew became an A&R man for Imperial Records. Bartholomew was the catalyst for the burgeoning New Orleans rhythm and blues scene, introducing artists such as Fats Domino, Smiley Lewis, and Tommy Ridgely to the wider world. New Orleans also became a major recording center with the founding of Cosimo Matassa's recording studio. Matassa recorded such artists as Little Richard, Fats Domino, Big Joe Turner, and Lloyd Price. But New Orleans failed to mature as a recording center and by the early 1970s had lost its stature in the recording arena.

By the late 1960s the golden years of New Orleans blues were fading. The style persisted in local clubs in neighborhoods such as Shrewsbury, but the city fathers officially adopted jazz as the music of New Orleans and little of the tourist dollars trickled into the pockets of bluesmen. Clubs such as Dorothy's Medallion were off the beaten path and catered to a local clientele. Dorothy's Medallion was a typical New Orleans black club, with a funky atmosphere made all the more surreal by the presence of a 350-pound go-go dancer named Big Linda. Dorothy's provided a breeding ground for blues musicians though. Perhaps the most famous bluesman to emerge from the club was Walter "Wolfman" Washington, who still performs regularly in the city. Many blues artists also spent time performing in funk and rock groups that were popular at the time.

Though the blues retreated to neighborhood clubs in the 1970s and 1980s, the sound reemerged in the 1990s. Clubs such as the Howlin Wolf, Muddy Waters, and the Maple Leaf began scheduling blues acts such as Washington, Katie Webster, Marva Wright, Keb' Mo', Kipori "Baby Wolf" Woods, and Mem Shannon. A wildly popular performer, Wright carved a place for herself as the "queen" of the New Orleans blues scene. Several white artists gained strong reputations during this time, including Anders Osborne and Sonny Landreth. These artists also attract a large tourist following, which helps ensure gigs and a stable income. Many established and younger artists gain valuable exposure at the annual New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festival, a two-week-long musical extravaganza celebrating the varied musical styles of the city and the state of Louisiana.

New Orleans blues artists never firmly created a "sound" that is readily identifiable to the city. Instead they focused on developing individual styles and personas. In essence they are participating in the old New Orleans tradition of improvisation and funkiness.

Bayou Region

Few regions of the American South hold the mystique of Acadiana, the broad region of Louisiana that extends from the Atchafalaya swamp in the east, through the bayous of the Teche country, and then through the prairie land stretching west from Opelousas and Lafayette. Often thought of as a land of bayous, the topography of the region varies and includes swamps, broad river bottoms, pine barrens, and rich prairie land. Like the rest of Louisiana, the southwest is ethnically diverse but dominated by the Cajuns, the descendants of exiled French settlers from Nova Scotia.

Southwest Louisiana is generally known as Acadiana after the major group of migrants to the area. In 1755 the French settlers of Acadia (now Nova Scotia) were expelled from their homeland by the British military who feared that the Acadians would rebel against them during the French and Indian War. The British dispersed the Acadians throughout the Atlantic British colonies and the West Indies. A few moved temporarily to France. The Acadians had developed a strong sense of family and community identity during their years in Acadia, and the desire to reunite resulted in a gathering of the exiles in southern Louisiana. They settled in family groups along the Mississippi River and soon began to move out along the bayous and prairies of the southwest, centering on the towns of Opelousas and Vermillionville (now Lafayette). The Acadians developed a tight-knit culture based on family, Catholicism, the French language, and a fierce defense of their culture. They were also largely tolerant of other cultures and easily assimilated outsiders into their community. Largely subsistence farmers, the Acadians also engaged in extensive livestock raising. Never as isolated as generally believed, the Acadians interacted with the outside world yet managed to preserve their unique culture. Not until World War II did the process of Americanization begin in earnest, and since the 1950s a strong cultural preservation movement has motivated the Cajun community.

Alongside the Cajuns existed communities of free people of color generally called Creoles. The descendants of interracial unions between blacks and French settlers, the Creole community shared much in common with their Cajun neighbors. Both groups stressed the importance of family, Catholicism, the French language, and community solidarity. They also emphasized land ownership and personal independence. During the nineteenth century, rural Creoles tended to live in isolated communities such as Frilot Cove and L'Anse de 'Prien Noir (Black Cyprien's Woods). The latter community became an incubator for rural Creole music because it was the home of the musically prominent Ardoin and Fontenot families.

Cajuns and Creoles experienced fairly good relations for most of their history, though lines were drawn. Although each group shared cultural similarities and some regional pride, they tended not to identify with each other. Creoles also separated themselves from "black Creoles," Francophone blacks who had no French blood and had been enslaved before the Civil War. This distinction was so tightly drawn that when some Creoles left in the Great Migration of the 1930s, they moved in groups and settled the same area. This created pockets of Creoles in such places as California. These "exiled Creoles" retained close ties to Louisiana and often imported musicians from home for celebrations. Creoles and black Creoles also consciously avoid the term "black Cajun" preferring to define themselves apart from the dominant Cajun culture.

Though they may have chosen to separate themselves from each other, Cajuns and Creoles engaged in extensive cultural exchange. In no area is this exchange more pronounced than in music. The standard musical ensemble of Acadiana in the early twentieth century was composed of a fiddle and accordion. German immigrants introduced the accordion to the region in the mid-nineteenth century. Early Cajun and Creole musicians preferred the small diatonic accordion (usually referred to as a 'tite noir). Rhythm was often produced using a metal triangle ('tite fer) or a washboard (frottoir). Early Cajun and Creole music styles are remarkably similar, and white and blacks musicians often played together. Even the names for both styles, "fais do do" for Cajun and "la la" for Creole, referred to house dances where small children were put to bed before the dance started in earnest.

The seminal figure in early Creole music was Amédé Ardoin. A gifted accordionist, Ardoin fused blues into the "la la" sound. He proved remarkably popular and was in great demand for white dances. He was the second Creole artist to record, the first being his relative, Douglas Bellard. Both came from the Ardoin-Fontenot family of Evangeline Parish. Ardoin's influence reached Cajun musicians as well and can be heard in the blues-tinged playing of Nathan Abshire and Iry Lejeune. Ardoin's rural blues style persisted in the Creole community through the music of his relatives Bois-Sec Ardoin, Canray Fontenot, and their extended family, which includes current star Sean Ardoin.

The postwar period saw rapid advances in the music of the prairies. Clifton Chenier fused rhythm and blues into Ardoin's style and produced the driving sound of zydeco. Chenier included saxophones and drums in his band and began playing the piano accordion. He also sang many of his lyrics in English, reflecting not only the bilingual nature of Creole society but also the growing fan base among non-French speakers. Chenier was a remarkable blues performer and the revival of his career in the early 1960s did much to expand the popularity of zydeco.

One of the hot beds of zydeco lay outside Louisiana. The region of southeast Texas from Orange to Houston experienced a heavy Cajun and Creole migration during the war years. South Louisianians often jokingly refer to the area as "Cajun Lapland" because Cajuns "lapped" over into Texas. Houston nightclubs provided a venue for the development of zydeco, particularly the more rhythm and blues style. In Acadiana an older, more rustic sound dominated, perhaps best illustrated by the highly percussive and syncopated work of Boozoo Chavis. Chavis regularly participated in zydeco trail rides in which groups of mounted ranchers and farmers rode through the countryside and then held a party at the end of the ride. Band battles are also common between zydeco musicians. Following the death of Clifton Chenier, Chavis and his archrival Andrus "Beau Jocque" Espre often competed for the title of "King of Zydeco."

Innovation is a basic element of zydeco. Just as Chenier added rhythm and blues elements, Beau Jocque mixed funk into the zydeco gumbo. Younger musicians, such as Keith Frank, experiment with rap and soul elements. Zydeco has also been friendly to female performers. Queen Ida, centered in the expatriate community in California, was an early female star. With Rosie Ledet, zydeco found its first sex symbol. Easily fusing blues, zydeco, and soul, Ledet presented a smoldering image on stage and readily turned old male images on their head.

Both zydeco and Cajun music experienced a revival at the end of the twentieth century. Locals and tourists still fill the dance floors at clubs spread throughout Acadiana, such as Richard's Club (Lawtell), the Y-Ki-Ki (Opelousas), and El Sid O's and Hamilton's Place (both Lafayette). Zydeco can also be heard in New Orleans at the Maple Leaf and the Rock-And-Bowl.

With strong bases in both the local and tourist crowd, zydeco, the blues of the bayou, is vital and growing. That is a testament not only to the power of the music, but to the Creole community that produces it as well.

KEVIN S. FONTENOT

Bibliography

History and Overview

- Glover, Tony, Scott Dirks, and Ward Gaines. Blues with a Feeling: The Little Walter Story. New York: Routledge Press, 2002.
- Hanger, Kimberly. Bounded Lives, Bounded Places: Free Black Society in Colonial New Orleans, 1769–1803. Durham: Duke University Press, 1997.
- Johnson, Jerah. Congo Square in New Orleans. New Orleans: Louisiana Landmarks Society, 1995.
- Koster, Rick. Louisiana Music. Cambridge: Da Capo Press, 2002.
- Leadbitter, Mike. Crowley Louisiana Blues. Bexhill-on-Sea: Blues Unlimited, 1968.
- Wall, Bennett H., editor. Louisiana: A History. 4th ed. Wheeling, WV: Harlan Davidson Press, 2002.
- Wolfe, Charles, and Kip Lornell. The Life and Legend of Leadbelly. New York: Harper Collins, 1992.

New Orleans

- Berry, Jason, Jonathan Fosse, and Tad Jones. Up From the Cradle of Jazz: New Orleans Music Since World War II. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1986.
- Broven, John. Rhythm and Blues in New Orleans. Gretna, LA: Pelican Publishing, 1995.
- Cowan, Walter, et al. New Orleans Yesterday and Today. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1983.
- Hannusch, Jeff. I Hear You Knockin': The Sound of New Orleans Rhythm and Blues. Ville Platte, LA: Swallow Publications, 1985.
- Kmen, Henry A. Music in New Orleans: The Formative Years, 1791–1841. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1966.
- Schuller, Gunther. Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.

Bayou Region

- Bernard, Shane. Swamp Pop: Cajun and Creole Rhythm and Blues. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1996.
- Brasseaux, Carl, et al. Creoles of Color in the Bayou Country. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1994.
- Broven, John. South to Louisiana: The Music of the Cajun Bayous. Gretna, LA: Pelican Publishing, 1983.
- Mattern, Mark. "Let the Good Times Unroll: Music and Race Relations in Southwest Louisiana." Black Music Research Journal XVII, no. 2 (Fall 1997): 159–168.

Olivier, Rick, and Ben Sandmel. Zydeco! Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999.

Tisserand, Michael. The Kingdom of Zydeco. New York: Arcade Publishing, 1998.

LOUISIANA RED

b. Iverson Minter, 23 March 1936; Bessemer, AL

Guitarist and singer Louisiana Red, born Iverson Minter, apparently had a difficult childhood as his mother died shortly after he was born, and his father was lynched by the Ku Klux Klan. Harriet Dorsey, Red's grandmother, took the three-year-old in at her home in Vicksburg, Mississippi. Here, Red learned a little music from his grandparents and from playing the harmonica and guitar. While growing up, he was sent to Philadelphia and California but eventually ended up Pittsburgh in the late 1940s, which proved crucial to his musical development. The radio stations WLAC and KDKA played blues and R&B, which taught Red a great deal about Jimmy Reed, Muddy Waters, and Lightnin' Hopkins.

Although Red was not offered a record deal of his own, the Chess brothers extended an invitation for Red to record with Muddy Waters and his band under the stage name "Rocky Fuller." In 1953 at age seventeen, Red entered the U.S. Air Force and was not discharged until 1958. Upon his release, he moved to Newark and played gigs in New York. Red came back to the blues scene in Chicago and recorded his first album, Lowdown Back Porch Blues, in the early 1960s for the Roulette/Vogue label. In 1971, he recorded the album Louisiana Red Sings the Blues with the Atco record label but was rejected after the record did not sell. Also in the 1970s, Red formed his own blues band called The Bluesettes and played in clubs in Georgia. Despite his considerable rejections in the United States, Red has enjoyed some success in Europe where he often toured. He has learned to combine the musical style of Jimmy Reed and Muddy Waters with his own crying harmonica and wailing guitar to create a down-home, high-grooving blues.

HEATHER PINSON

Bibliography

AMG; Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSFP

- Low Down Back Porch Blues* (1963, Roulette LP 25200).
Midnight Rambler (1975, Tomato CD 269342).
Sweet Blood Call (1975, Blue Labor LP 104).
Always Played the Blues (1994, JSP CD 240).
Millennium Blues (1999, Earwig CD 4943).

LOVE, CLAYTON

b. 15 November 1927; Mattson, MS

Mississippi-born singer/pianist Clayton Love recorded in the early 1950s for Trumpet, Aladdin, and Modern before joining Ike Turner's Kings of Rhythm in 1956 as featured vocalist. Clayton relocated to St. Louis and recorded for Bobbin in 1958, cutting the powerful blues ballad "Limited Love." He continued to be a prominent member of the St. Louis blues scene.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSFPSelected Recording

Various artists. St. Louis Blues Revue—The Classic Bobbin Sessions (1996, Ace CDCHD 633).

LOVE, COY "HOT SHOT"

b. Coy Love Jr., 9 September 1914; Clarkendale, AR
d. 4 June 1980; West Memphis, AR

Sign artist, harmonica player, and well-known Beale Street character. Recorded for Sun (1954) and Mr. Bo Weevil (1973).

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

LaVere, Stephen. "Hot Shot Love." Living Blues no. 50 (Spring 1981): 47.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

From the Vaults: The Complete Sun Singles, Vol. 1 (1994, Bear Family BCD 15801; reissue).

LOVE, PRESTON

b. 26 April 1921; Omaha, NE
d. 12 February 2004; Omaha, NE

After inheriting a saxophone from his older brother "Dude," Preston Love got his first professional gig in 1940. Subsequently, he started taking lessons with Illinois Jacquet's brother, Julius. Love began playing regularly with Lloyd Hunter, Nat Towles, and Snub Mosely. One of Love's earliest influences was saxophonist Earle Warren who played in the Count Basie band, in which Love briefly replaced Warren in 1943. Love gigged with Lucky Millinder in 1944 and rejoined the Basie Band from 1945 to 1947. After his three-year stint with Basie, Love played occasionally with his friend Johnny Otis and led an orchestra in his own name. Preston Love and His Orchestra had a few recording sessions in the 1950s that were released on such labels as Federal, Chicago, and Spin.

Love moved to California in 1962, where he became a sought-after session player and joined Ray Charles's band in 1966. In 1968, Preston Love and His Orchestra returned to the studio to record Preston Love's Omaha Bar-B-Q, which featured Johnny Otis and Shuggie Otis. The album, with such tunes as "Chicken Gumbo" and "Pot Likker," was recorded on the Kent label. During his last years, Love lectured on African American music at universities and wrote for local newspapers, as well as maintained a busy performance schedule including concerts in Europe.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

Larkin
Love, Preston. A Thousand Honey Creeks Later: My Life in Music from Basie to Motown. Middletown, CT: Wesleyan University Press, 1997.

Discography: Lord; LSFPLOVE, WILLIE

b. 4 November 1906; Duncan, MS
d. 19 August 1953; Jackson, MS

Popular singer/pianist who played throughout the Delta from the 1930s through the early 1950s, often with Sonny Boy Williamson II. Love recorded many excellent sides for Trumpet from 1951 to 1953 that epitomized the vibrant Mississippi juke-joint sound of the time, including "Take It Easy, Baby" and "Nelson Street Blues." He died of alcoholism soon after his last recording session.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Ryan, Marc. Trumpet Records: An Illustrated History with Discography. Milford, NH: Big Nickel Publications, 1992.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

LOWE, SAMMY

LOWE, SAMMY

b. 14 May 1918; Birmingham, AL

d. 17 February 1993; Birmingham, AL

Trumpet player, bandleader, and arranger. Lowe's early career through 1955 was with trumpet player Erskine Hawkins. Through 1961 he participated in many rhythm and blues and rock recording sessions, and it is believed he guided the arrangements of doo-wop sessions for Onyx Records. From 1962 through the end of the decade he was arranger for James Brown's King label sessions.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Penny, Dave. "Sammy Lowe." Blues & Rhythm no. 79 (May 1993): 16.

LOWERY, ROBERT "BOB"

b. 1932; Shuler, AR

Guitarist in the style of Lightnin' Hopkins, John Lee Hooker, Robert Johnson, and Muddy Waters. Began playing guitar in Arkansas, but moved to Santa Cruz, California, in 1956. Played some on weekends, including a few performances behind Big Mama Thornton in the early 1960s. Since 1987 he has performed concerts and festivals with harmonica player Virgil Thrasher.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris, Gregory Isola. "Robert Lowery and Virgil Thrasher: Goin' Up the Country." Blues Revue no. 19 (September/October 1995): 52–53.

LOWRY, PETER B. "PETE"

b. 1 April 1941; Montclair, NJ

Record producer and collector, teacher, writer, historian, researcher, and photographer. Lowry is best known in the blues world for his Trix record label (1972–1978) and his field research in South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, and Virginia from 1969 to 1980. After graduating from Princeton with an A.B. in biology, he pursued medical and biological studies at Rutgers, Columbia, and Université Libre de Bruxelles before immersing himself in blues research. He obtained M.A. and Ph.D. degrees in folklore and folklore at the University of Pennsylvania. He has also published as William Bentley.

Since 1964, Lowry has given lectures and seminars at many universities around the world, including Yale; written articles for a multitude of music publications, including Blues Unlimited as contributing editor; produced albums for Atlantic, Savoy, Jazz, and his own Trix label; and wrote liner notes for blues releases on Atlantic, Columbia Records/Sony, Biograph, Muse, Savoy, and Trix.

Lowry received a U.S. National Endowment grant for the Folk Arts Division in 1978. He worked with Alan Lomax on the folk music collection at the Library of Congress in 1979–1980. This work eventually produced a release for the series "Deep River of Song" for PBS and the Rounder CD collection devoted to Lomax. From 1985 to 1987, he taught courses on African American music at the University of Pennsylvania.

Lowry's personal collection consists of more than twelve thousand records in various formats and genres, hundreds of interviews, five thousand still photographs, and hundreds of unreleased field recordings along with hundreds of books with a focus on blues and jazz. He has several pending books, including Keep on Truckin', Blues of the Southeast in Context, Piedmont Views and Portraits—A Photographic Foray, Happy Am I: Elder Lightfoot Michaux, and an historical overview of blues music in Australia.

Lowry resides in Australia where he has been granted Distinguished Artists Residency.

GAILE WELKER

Bibliography

Wilmer, Valerie. "Trix Is Walkin' Some More: An Interview with the Indefatigable Pete Lowry." Blues-Link no. 3 (January/February 1974): 31–34.

LUANDREW, ALBERT

(See Sunnyland Slim)

LUCAS, WILLIAM "LAZY BILL"

b. 29 May 1918; Wynne, AR

d. 12 December 1982; Minneapolis, MN

Pianist. Son of a farmer who bought a piano with the proceeds from the sale of a pig. He began playing blues piano seriously after hearing Big Joe Williams in 1940. He moved to Chicago the next year, where in 1954 he recorded for the Chance label. He moved to Minneapolis in 1964 where he continued performing until his death.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Titon, Jeff Todd. "Lazy Bill Lucas: A Personal Reminiscence." Living Blues no. 56 (Spring 1983): 41.

Discography: LSFP

LUMBER CAMPS

Lumber camps first appeared across the South in the nineteenth century and continued as the principal labor system for the emerging timber industry. Blacks comprised a significant portion of this labor force as the lumber industry clear-cut old growth forests throughout the region and removed the milled trees by rail for use in industry and home building. Blues music developed from the experience of living and working in these lumber camps.

The early lumber industry in the South grew out of the abundance of cypress trees found in the lower Mississippi Valley at the beginning of the nineteenth century. The industry expanded in 1803 when steam-powered saws began milling the first logs. Slave labor cut and hauled the trees out of the forests. Saw mills in New Orleans, Baton Rouge, Natchez, and Vicksburg processed the lumber that slaves rafted down the river from logging areas.

Following the Civil War, railroads replaced the river as the primary source for transporting lumber. Lumbermen bought large tracks of land and constructed their own rail lines into timber areas. Workers and their families lived in towns or camps constructed and controlled by the lumber companies. The workers traveled to and from work on company trains and wagons. Families shopped for their essentials in the company store and the children of white workers went to a company school. Everyone lived in company housing areas known as quarters.

Blacks and whites lived in segregated quarters and often performed different roles in the logging process. In some of the camps, the white workers cut the trees, sharpened the blades, and measured and hauled the logs out of the forest. The black workers laid and repaired the company's railroad track, loaded the logs on the flatcars, cleaned the logging area, and carried the water.

Accounts vary about the quality of life in lumber camps. Some lumber companies leased convict labor, while others resorted to peonage. Although the federal government outlawed peonage in 1867, some lumbermen continued its practice in parts of the South. Workers in some lumber camps found that their pay fell short of covering their living expenses. The cost of goods purchased at the company store as well as the rents charged for housing exceeded the pay for the work performed. Workers could spend their lives in endless debt. Companies controlled the roads and rail lines in and out of the logging areas and prevented the escape of anyone who tried to break out of this involuntary servitude.

In other parts of the South, the company compensated workers at a level above peonage. Some companies attracted black and white families who stayed on in the lumber camps for more than one generation. Even with the dangerous work and harsh living conditions, some blacks found the available work and facilities of the camps to be a better option than sharecropping.

The living conditions in lumber camps, however, were separate and unequal. Companies paid black workers less than white workers and provided black families with inferior housing. Companies also provided a school and teachers for the white children while they ignored black children and their education. Blacks in most cases provided their own teachers. Whites expected blacks to be subservient according to the law of Jim Crow. White men also made uninvited amorous forays into the black quarters. Racial tensions, hostilities, and violence often erupted between the two groups. The company quarter boss made the peace in the camp in most cases rather than local law enforcement.

In the western parts of the lower Mississippi Valley and East Texas, most lumber camps celebrated June 19, Emancipation Day in Texas. Companies gave all workers the day off and provided blacks with food and drinks for lunch. Other forms of entertainment and social events took place in the lumber camps. In many camps, blacks crowded around a piano in their quarters on a Saturday night as the player made music until the small hours. Men and women danced to a blues style of piano playing that later became boogie-woogie.

Lumber camp life inspired a number of blues songs, many of which indicate the ambivalence felt by a black worker in the lumber camp. Lumber camps also inspired Ma Rainey's "Log Camp Blues" recorded in 1928, Robert Hill's "Lumber Yard Blues" recorded in 1936, and Elzadie Robinson's "Sawmill Blues" recorded in 1926.

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

Daniel, Pete. The Shadow of Slavery. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1990.

LUMBER CAMPS

- Maxwell, Robert S., and Robert D. Baker. Sawdust Empire. College Station: Texas A&M University Press, 1983.
- Mayor, Archer H. Southern Timberman. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1988.
- Moore, John Hebron. Andrew Brown and Cypress Lumbering in the Old Southwest. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1967.
- Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning. New York: Horizon Press, 1960.

LUPINE

Detroit label run by Robert L. West (1912–1983) in 1962–1964. Notable artists include Mack Rice, the Falcons/Ohio Untouchables with guitarist Robert Ward, and the Primettes, who would go to Motown and become the Supremes.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Meikle, David, and Lowell Boileau. "The Robert West Story." <http://soulfuldetroit.com/web10-RobertWest/RobertWestText/index.html> (accessed January 18, 2005).

Discography: McGrath

LUSK, "PROFESSOR" EDDIE

- b. 21 September 1948; Chicago, IL
d. 26 August 1992; Chicago, IL

Both of Lusk's parents were ministers in the Pentecostal Church (his mother had been the first woman ever to be ordained as a minister in the Pentecostal faith), and they ran the Lusk Bible Way Center in Chicago. His family moved to Chicago after an unidentified arsonist burned their Arkansas home to the ground. He played piano in his church as a young boy, but he was more attracted to the blues that he heard played in Pepper's Lounge, which at the time was one of Chicago's most well-known blues clubs. At Pepper's, Lusk was exposed to the likes of Buddy Guy, Howlin' Wolf, and Junior Wells.

After earning a bachelor's degree from Northwestern University in business administration, Lusk became the music director at the Shiloh Academy, a private school run by the Seventh Day Adventists, which is where he earned the nickname "Professor" given to him by Professor Longhair. For three years, Lusk performed regularly with Luther Allison. In the 1980s, Lusk recorded with Fenton Robinson, Syl Johnson, Buddy Guy, and Michael Coleman. Also, he toured with Jimmy Dawkins, Phil Guy, and Otis Rush. Lusk recorded one solo album entitled Professor Strut with his group Professor's Blues Revue for the Delmark label. Featuring vocalist Karen Carroll, this album demonstrates the influence of blues, soul, and gospel. Lusk, being diagnosed first with AIDS and subsequently with colon cancer, took his own life in 1992 by jumping into the Chicago River.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

- Larkin
Darwen, Norman. "Professor Eddie Lusk." Blues & Rhythm no. 73 (October 1992): 16.
- Walker, Maureen. "Professor Eddie Lusk." Living Blues no. 108 (March/April 1993): 49–50.

LUTCHER, JOE

- b. Joseph Woodman, 23 December 1919;
Lake Charles, LA

Alto saxophonist and occasional vocalist who moved to Los Angeles in 1942 and later formed his own band, the Society Cats. Recorded in a style straddling jazz and blues for Specialty, Capitol, Modern, and other labels between 1947 and 1952 before abandoning secular music for religion in the mid-1950s.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

- AMG (Richie Unterberger); Larkin

Discography: AMG; Lord; LSFP

See also Capitol; Modern/Flair/Meteor/Kent/RPM; Specialty/Fidelity/Juke Box

LUTCHER, NELLIE

- b. 15 October 1915; Lake Charles, LA

Singer and pianist from musical family. Signed by Capitol in 1947 after performing one song on radio. Lutchler scored big crossover R&B/pop hits with "Hurry on Down" and others in 1947–1948. Lutchler cultivated an individual style and delivery, but performed only intermittently after the mid-1950s.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- Santelli
Milkowski, Bill. Swing It: An Annotated History of Jive. New York: Billboard Books, 2001.

Discography

- “He’s a Real Gone Guy” (1947, Capitol 40017).
 “Hurry on Down” (1947, Capitol 40002).
 “Lake Charles Boogie” (1947, Capitol 10110).
 “Come and Get It, Honey” (1948, Capitol 15064).
 “Fine Brown Frame” (1948, Capitol 15032).
 “My New Papa’s Got to Have Everything” (1948, Capitol 15352).

LYNCHING AND THE BLUES

The cruelest horror of American life in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries was the occasion of mob violence that murdered thousands of people outside any rule of law or moral standard. These acts of vigilante injustice most often involved the public lynching, or illegal hanging, of individuals only suspected of committing crimes. In the South, mobs lynched many blacks for no other reason than their having acted outside the harsh social restrictions of Jim Crow (see the Racial Issues and the Blues entry).

Historic records at the Tuskegee Institute indicate that from 1882 until 1932 more than thirty-three hundred blacks were lynched in the United States with most of these murders taking place in the South. These numbers included men, women, and children. As frightening as these recorded numbers appear, which average more than one lynching a week for a half century, they are incomplete. The actual numbers for mob violence are higher when other forms of murder, including shootings and riots, are considered.

Lynching provided post-bellum society with a way to control free blacks. Lynching predominated in rural areas and occurred most often during periods of economic hardships. The racist belief that white southerners falsely maintained was that lynching protected white womanhood from black rapists. A much more complex motivation existed, however, because many instances of white men raping and sexually harassing black women went unchallenged. Should a black man defend a black woman, he too would face an angry lynch mob.

Lynching was gruesome. Often the victims were first mutilated and castrated while pleading their innocence. Their body parts were exhibited as souvenirs much like the parts of a fox after a hunt. Then they were strung up by a rope. While still alive, these individuals were shot with bullets and then set on fire while hundreds (and sometimes thousands) of local citizens gathered for the spectacle. Local law enforcement documented that these victims died “at the hands of parties unknown.”

Anti-lynching activists worked courageously during this period of American history. Journalist Ida B. Wells grew up in Holly Springs, Mississippi, and published her articles in Free Speech in Memphis until an angry group of whites destroyed her newspaper in 1892. She moved onto New York before eventually settling in Chicago. She challenged the myth that rape was the cause of lynching in the South. She also organized foreign opinion that came to challenge American mob violence.

Jesse Daniel Ames of Texas worked through a group known as the Association of Southern Women for the Prevention of Lynching, a group of white women organized in Atlanta. Walter White of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, or NAACP, worked tirelessly to challenge the injustice and false arguments that supported lynching. In spite of their efforts, Congress failed to pass any anti-lynching legislation.

The New Deal programs of the 1930s helped rescue the impoverished South and lynching began to decline. More importantly, white business leaders in the South came to understand that outside investors were reluctant to bring their capital into such a violent region that tolerated lynching. Even after this decline, however, blacks still suffered incidents of lynching throughout the twentieth century.

Paul Oliver notes that the fear of lynching was very real for early blues artists living in the Jim Crow South. Louisiana-born James “Boodle-It” Wiggins had completed a number of blues recordings in Chicago and Richmond, Indiana, in 1928 and 1929. Upon a return trip back home to Bogalusa in 1929, a white woman took offense when he failed to step aside for her on a public street. A local mob lynched him immediately and also shot him four times. Wiggins was a man of great strength and was actually still alive when his rope was cut down from the tree. While he survived the ordeal, he never sang about the incident.

Adam Gussow maintains that the subject of lynching remained unmentioned by a great many blues artists. The fear of an angry response from white listeners was all too real and vivid for them. They compensated for this dodge by coding lyrical references to “lynching blues” in a number of songs. He notes Bessie Smith’s recording of “Blue Spirit Blues” in 1929 and Little Brother Montgomery’s “The First Time I Met You” recorded in 1936 as two such examples.

A spare number of blues songs were recorded about hanging and lynching. Bertha Hill recorded “Hangman Blues” in 1928 and Blind Lemon Jefferson recorded “Hangman’s Blues” in the same year. Joshua White recorded “Strange Fruit” in 1941. “Strange Fruit” gave a graphic description of the lynching landscape. It was written by a New York schoolteacher, Lewis Allen, and first recorded by

LYNCHING AND THE BLUES

Billie Holiday in 1939. Holiday showed great courage in recording "Strange Fruit" as she deflected questions about its meaning and controversy for the rest of her career.

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

- Gunning, Sandra. Race, Rape, and Lynching. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Gussow, Adam. Seems Like Murder Here. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002.
- Hall, Jacquelyn Dowd. Revolt Against Chivalry. rev. ed. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.
- Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning. New York: Horizon Press, 1960.
- Raper, Arthur F. The Tragedy of Lynching. New York: Negro Universities Press, 1969.
- Thorp, Willard. A Southern Reader. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1955.
- Tolnay, Stewart E., and E. M. Beck. A Festival of Violence. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1992.
- Wells-Barnett, Ida B. On Lynchings. New York: Arno Press and The New York Times, 1969.
- White, Walter. Rope and Faggot. New York: Arno Press and The New York Times, 1969.
- Zangrando, Robert L. The NAACP Crusade Against Lynching, 1909–1950. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1980.

LYNN, BARBARA

b. Barbara Lynn Ozen, 16 January 1942; Beaumont, TX

Although commercial success has come to her primarily as an R&B singer and songwriter, Barbara Lynn's musical roots are deep in the blues. Trained as a pianist in her childhood, the sounds of early rock 'n' roll led her to switch to the guitar in her early teens; early influences on her playing style include Guitar Slim and Jimmy Reed. Shortly thereafter she formed her first group, Bobbie Lynn and the Idols. Though technically too young to be allowed into bars and clubs, she and her groups began playing in such venues regularly anyway and soon attracted the attention of producer Huey P. Meaux, who arranged for her to record at Cosimo's recording studio in New Orleans.

Her breakout hit came in 1962, with an original song entitled "You'll Lose a Good Thing." Hit singles and albums followed throughout the 1960s, and she was picked up by the Atlantic label in 1967. In the early 1970s she quit the music business to focus on raising her children, though she continued to tour occasionally. Lynn returned to active music-making in the early 1980s, embarking on a successful Japanese tour in 1984. Throughout the 1990s she continued recording and playing live shows, making several well-received albums for such prestigious labels as Bullseye Blues and Antone's. A collection of notable recordings from her late 1960s and early 1970s work with Atlantic was released by Ichiban in 1994. Hot Night Tonight, an album recorded for Antone's in 2000, featured two rap performances by her son Bachelor Wise.

RICK ANDERSON

Bibliography

- AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin
- Dahl, Bill. "Barbara Lynn: Still a Good Thing." Living Blues no. 148 (November/December 1999): 32–39.

Discography: AMG

LYNN, TRUDY

b. Lee Audrey Nelms, 8 August 1947; Houston, TX

Vocalist and songwriter. Lynn first performed as a teenager with Albert Collins, followed by stints in several Houston bands. Recorded singles and CDs for various labels, including Sinett, Crazy Cajun, JamStone, Ichiban, Ruf, and Jus' Blues.

ROGER WOOD

Bibliography

- Danchin, Sebastian. "Trudy Lynn: Houston's First Lady of Soul." Living Blues no. 131 (January/February 1997): 24–27.
- Wood, Roger. Down in Houston: Bayou City Blues. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2003.

Discography: AMG

LYONS, LONNIE

b. Unknown
d. Unknown

Pianist, singer. Known for his three 1949 sessions for the Freedom label, and one for Sittin' in With in 1950, all recorded in Houston. Valued for his frenetic piano solos in boogie-woogie style.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Leadbitter, Mike, and Kurt Mohr. "The Unknowns (no. 18): Lonnie Lyons." Blues Unlimited no. 37 (October 1966): 13.

Discography: LSFP

M

M & O BLUES

“M & O Blues” was first recorded on June 12, 1930, by Walter Davis for Victor Records (issued on Victor V38618). A twelve-measure blues with an AAB lyric scheme, its melody makes a distinctive leap from the upper octave tonic to the minor third above it and back, then the same leap in the second measure. “M & O” in the title refers to the railroad. Davis’s song was a hit popular enough that he made a sequel “M & O Blues no. 2 (My Baby’s Come Back)” in 1931 (Victor 23302) and a “no. 3 (My Baby Called the Police)” in 1932 (Victor 23333). He would also record for Victor the same tune to the L&N Railroad in 1933. His “M & O Blues” should not be confused with the 1930 blues of the same title but different melody of Mississippi Delta bluesman Willie Brown.

The Davis tune was adapted to new words by other bluesmen. The piano accompanist on Davis’s original 1930 recording, Roosevelt Sykes, would use it on his “Mr. Sykes Blues” in 1932 (Vocalion 02950). St. Louis guitarist Teddy Darby used it for his “Low Mellow” in 1933 (Bluebird 5412).

The most notable treatment of the melody for guitar was devised by Mississippi Delta bluesman Robert Johnson. “Rambling on My Mind” (1936, Vocalion 03519) employs the alternating or “rocking” boogie bass beat with bottleneck-slide licks picked on the guitar’s treble strings, a remarkable and rare combination of rural-slide and urban-boogie characteristics. His “When You Got a Good Friend” (1936) uses a “walking” piano boogie bass but with plucked piano-style ornaments; this version would not be released until 1961.

Hence, of the two Johnson treatments, “Rambling on My Mind” would be copied by post-1945 bluesmen such as Boyd Gilmore of Arkansas (1952, Modern), Johnson protégé Robert Lockwood with pianist Otis Spann (1960, Candid), Big Joe Williams (1964, Milestone), and Arthur “Big Boy” Crudup (1967, Delmark).

The tune in its Johnson incarnations also entered the rock repertoire. In 1966 Eric Clapton, performing as a member of John Mayall’s Bluesbreakers, performed “Rambling on My Mind” for his first-ever solo vocal recording. The less likely “When You Got a Good Friend” was included on Johnny Winter’s LP Johnny Winter And (1969, Columbia).

EDWARD KOMARA

MABON, WILLIE

b. 24 October 1925; Hollywood, TN

d. 19 April 1985; Paris, France

Chicago blues singer and pianist Willie Mabon was born in the Memphis suburb of Hollywood. His first musical instrument was the harmonica, which he began playing at the age of eight. He developed an interest in playing the guitar, but due to the loss of a finger in an accident at home, he started teaching himself the rudiments of piano on an upright owned by his neighbor. After the death of his mother, his family moved to Chicago in 1941 where he received formal piano lessons.

MABON, WILLIE

Mabon served with the Marines during World War II and returned to Chicago in 1946. He began associating with various jazz and blues pianists, including Cripple Clarence Lofton, Big Maceo Merriweather, Roosevelt Sykes, and Sunnyland Slim, all of whom had an enormous impact on his piano style.

By the late 1940s, he was gigging regularly throughout the city with the Blues Rockers. Through Sunnyland Slim, Mabon made his first recordings in 1949, which were then issued on Apollo under the name Big Willie. Later that year, he recorded a handful of sides with the Blues Rockers for Chicago deejay Al Benson, who then sold the material to Aristocrat. A second recording session for the label followed before Mabon departed to pursue a solo career.

In 1952, he recorded his signature hit, "I Don't Know," for Benson's newly formed Parrot label. Inspired by Lofton's 1939 recording, the song showcased Mabon's sly vocal delivery and jazz-inflected blues piano style. Unable to provide proper distribution, Benson subsequently sold the record to Chess and it became an immediate sensation. The influential song would remain on the R&B charts for nineteen weeks and eventually reach number one. Mabon's sophisticated approach contrasted with much of the rougher-edged Chicago blues being recorded at the time. His music employed piano and saxophone as the main lead instruments, as opposed to the guitar- and harmonica-dominated Chicago blues of the early 1950s.

Mabon used this successful formula a second time to reach number one on the R&B charts in 1953 with the release of "I'm Mad," a song that shared the sarcastic humor and stop-time structure of "I Don't Know." The recording's popularity even inspired a hit answer song, Mitzi Mars's "I'm Glad" on Checker. Mabon continued to record for Chess for several more years, and enjoyed his last major hit in 1954 with the humorous boast "Poison Ivy," which peaked at number seven. He also recorded the original Willie Dixon-penned "The Seventh Son" for Chess in 1955, which went on to become a blues standard.

Throughout the late 1950s and early 1960s, Mabon recorded for Federal, Mad, Formal, and USA, and had a few regional hits, including the insinuating "Got to Have Some." He worked outside of music during much of the late 1960s, except for occasional gigs with Howlin' Wolf in Chicago and a few national package tours.

Shortly after returning from a successful European tour, Mabon decided to relocate to Paris, France, in 1972, a move spurred on by the existing lackluster American blues scene. He continued to perform and record frequently abroad, and remained very popular throughout Europe. Mabon died in Paris at the age of fifty-nine after a lengthy illness.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Brisbin, John Anthony. Liner notes to Willie Mabon: Chicago Blues Session! (Evidence CD 26063).
Campbell, Robert L., Robert Pruter, George R. White, and Tom Kelly. "The Aristocrat Label." Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/aristocrat.html> (accessed 2005).
Whitburn, Joel, Top R&B Singles: 1942-1999. Port Washington, WI: Record Research, 2000.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

MACK, LONNIE

b. Lonnie McIntosh, 18 July 1941; Harrison, IN

Lonnie Mack grew up in rural Indiana where he listened to musicians as diverse as George Jones, Merle Travis, and Bobby Bland. He began playing guitar as a child, citing local bluesman Ralph Trotts as a primary influence. In 1958, Mack purchased a Gibson Flying V guitar, which became a personal trademark. At that time, he was playing the roadhouse circuit around Indiana and Kentucky in groups such as Lonnie and the Twilighters, and by 1961 he was in the Troy Seals Band. Session work followed for the King label with Mack performing with various artists including Freddie King. He began an association with the Fraternity label and in 1963 he released the instrumental single "Memphis," a rendition of the Chuck Berry song. Featuring Mack's fiery intensity, the single went to number five on the Billboard charts. During this period he showed his abilities as a rhythm and blues singer. Despite his success on the Fraternity label, he signed with the Elektra label in 1968 after an appreciative profile by Al Kooper was published in Rolling Stone magazine.

Although he recorded the guitar solo to the Doors' "Roadhouse Blues," his association with Elektra produced some lukewarm recordings, and he broke away from the record industry for several years. He returned to recording in 1977, this time with Capitol Records, but the inattention to his two country music-tinged albums led to another seclusion from recording. Stevie Ray Vaughan, a longtime fan, persuaded Mack to move to Austin, whereupon Mack built a following in the local club scene. His first release on Alligator, Strike Like Lightning released in 1985, was produced by Vaughan, and it featured Mack playing with flashpoint intensity. A follow-up release on Alligator in 1987 was less stimulating. In 1988 Mack moved to Epic Records, which resulted in an undistinguished studio album. His last recording to date is an enervating live recording from 1990, titled Attack of the Killer V.

JOHN OTIS

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin Wyatt, K. "The Ax Museum: Lonnie Mack." Guitar World 21, no. 2 (February 2001): 87–90.

Discography: AMG

MacLEOD, DOUG

b. 21 April 1946; New York City, NY

Singer/guitarist whose lyrics often wax philosophical. Plays acoustic guitar in a distinctly percussive manner, influenced by guitarist Ernest Banks who he met while serving in the Navy in Norfolk, Virginia. MacLeod moved to Los Angeles in 1974, where he did pop and jazz session work. He formed the Doug MacLeod Band (electric) in 1978, recording for HighTone and Volt, and backing numerous blues legends on West Coast gigs. In 1993, MacLeod returned to solo, acoustic guitar, favoring a National Tricone (resonator) for both straight picking and slide. He was signed by AudioQuest in 1994. As of 2004, MacLeod had released eleven albums for various labels. He also writes for Blues Revue and hosts a weekly blues program on KKJZ-FM in Long Beach, California.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly and Al Campbell) DelGrosso, Maureen. "Doug MacLeod: Gold from the Coast." Blues Revue no. 42 (November 1998): 14–18. Tipaldi, Art. "Doug MacLeod." In Children of the Blues, pp. 267–272. San Francisco: Backbeat, 2002.

Discography: AMG

MACON, ALBERT

b. 15 February 1920; Society Hill, AL
d. 12 May 1993; Society Hill, AL

Acoustic guitarist who performed mostly in east Alabama and west Georgia, with an occasional tour of Holland and Europe. From the early 1950s until his death, he teamed up with guitarist Robert Thomas. His day job for forty years was as a school bus driver. His sudden death was from kidney failure following treatment for a bullet wound.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Cauthen, Joyce. "Albert Macon" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 110 (July/August 1993): 53.

MACON, JOHN WESLEY "MR. SHORTSTUFF"

b. 1933; Crawford, MS
d. 28 December 1973; Macon, MS

Harris gives birth year of 1923. Singer/guitarist Macon was introduced to the blues audience by his cousin and fellow Crawford resident Big Joe Williams. His insistent rhythmic figures give him some stylistic kinship with north Mississippi players such as R. L. Burnside. He made several albums in the 1960s, usually partnered by Williams, but returned to obscurity.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

MACON, Q. T.

b. 17 March 1934; Bolivar, TN
d. 12 April 1994; East St. Louis, IL

Singer and guitarist whose early influences were Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, and Lightnin' Hopkins. Macon moved to St. Louis in the early 1950s and formed his own band in the early 1960s. His 1988 Pulsar record "Blow Wind" was a local hit, even becoming a performance standard during his last years.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Greensmith, Bill. "Q.T. Macon" [obituary]. Blues & Rhythm no. 90 (July 1994): 16.

MACY'S

Macy Lela Henry, who, with her husband C. D. Henry, owned Macy's Record Distributing Company in Houston, Texas, created the Macy's label in July 1949, giving it the slogan "Queen of Hits." In its two and a half years of operation, Macy's produced about sixty releases of country music, mostly by honky-tonk, Western swing, and Cajun artists, the most famous being the singer/fiddler Harry Choates and the singer Jim Reeves, then at the start of his career. The label's blues list, though smaller, boasted regional hits like Lester Williams's "Wintertime Blues" and Clarence Garlow's "Bon Ton Roula," as well as releases by Smokey Hogg, jump-blues singer Hubert Robinson, and other artists based in southeast Texas. Most of Macy's sessions were held in Houston's ACA Studios, engineered by Bill Holford, and supervised by Steve Poncio, originally a clerk in the distribution company, who went on to produce blues artists for other Texas labels.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

- Penny, Dave. Booklet accompanying Queen of Hits: The Macy's Recordings Story (2003, Acrobat ACRCO 228, London).
- Tricker, Phillip J. Booklet accompanying Cat'n Around (1992, Crazy Kat KK CD 07, Crawley, West Sussex, England).

Discography: McGrath

See also Garlow, Clarence "Bon Ton"; Williams, Lester

MAD/M&M

Chicago jazz and blues label of the 1950s and 1960s. The label was founded by tenor saxophonist Tommy "Madman" Jones (1922–1993), who started the label in 1957 initially to record himself. Other acts included blues artists Willie Mabon, Honey Brown, Billy (The Kid) Emerson, and Piney Brown; instrumental acts and combos Tony Smith and His Aristocrats, Lefty Bates, and Red Holloway; and doo-wop groups The Equallos and Willie Logan and the Plaids. Jones's company afforded jazz artists Oscar Brown Jr., E. Parker McDougal, and Clarence Wheeler and the Enforcers their first recording opportunities under their own names. During 1959–1962, the Mad label was part of a combine that included the Apex and Dempsey labels. In 1960, Jones opened a subsidiary called M&M, which he reserved for jazz-oriented efforts. By the 1970s, M&M had turned into a label of sporadic LPs featuring Jones himself. Jones's last effort was a retrospective CD that he released in 1991.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- Pruter, Robert, and Campbell, Robert L. "The Mad and M&M Labels." Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/mad.html> (accessed June 12, 2003).

Discography: McGrathMAGHETT, SAMUEL GENE "MAGIC SAM"

- b. 14 February 1937; Grenada, MS
d. 1 December 1969; Chicago, IL

Magic Sam was generally acknowledged as among the most brilliant of the young up-and-coming guitarists on a crowded Chicago blues scene in the 1950s and 1960s. Along with players like Otis Rush and Buddy Guy, Maghett helped introduce a more modern sound on electric guitar to the blues. He also was a gifted, expressive singer who was certainly capable of producing music with crossover appeal, much as B. B. King had done. But a bad heart felled him in 1969 at the age of thirty-two, just as a defining performance at the Ann Arbor Blues Festival earlier that year was starting to earn him a reputation beyond his Chicago base and possibly a lucrative new record deal with Stax.

Growing up in a farming family in the delta, young Sam Maghett made his own primitive instruments from cigar boxes and wire, and taught himself to play the songs he heard on the radio. When he was thirteen, the family moved to Chicago. Within a few years, Maghett was playing gigs around town in Homesick James's band. By the time he was eighteen, Maghett was leading his own band under the stage name of Good Rockin' Sam.

By age twenty, Magic Sam had both his new, permanent stage name and his first recording session, for the Cobra label. That first session produced "All Your Love," which for many years was his signature song (the melody of which was, by most accounts, reworked into quite a few of his other songs as well). Sam recorded several other 45s for Cobra during the next few years, finding local success with "21 Days in Jail" and "Easy Baby."

Cobra, however, folded in 1960. Around the same time, Maghett was drafted into the Army. Several of his biographies report that he went AWOL and returned home to Chicago. Some biographers report he received some time in the brig before a less than honorable discharge from the service. Whatever the details of his time in the military, by the early 1960s Maghett was again active performing around Chicago as Magic Sam. He had recorded a handful of tracks for the Chief label in 1960, but apparently did not record again until 1966, when he recorded for the Crash and Delmark labels.

In 1967, Magic Sam began a period of artistic inspiration and professional success that lasted until his death. The 1967 release of the album West Side Soul on Delmark brought Maghett renewed attention for his modern-sounding blues—a music as accessible as the popular rock of the period. He even traveled to San Francisco to play at the Winterland and Fillmore clubs, which were generally associated with the top rock bands of that era. In 1968, he recorded his second Delmark album, Black Magic, which met with similar success on its release in 1969.

In August 1969, Maghett gave what was reportedly the performance of his life at the Ann Arbor Blues Festival—a performance to rival that of Janis Joplin’s at the 1967 Monterey Pop Festival, a performance that could lift an artist from regional favorite to national star. (His Ann Arbor performance was later released as Magic Sam Live by Delmark.) Stax Records was reportedly negotiating with Maghett at the time of his death of a heart attack on December 1, 1969.

As a record of his impact, he left the two polished Delmark albums, the Cobra and other assorted 45s, and a legend as one of the most potent blues guitarists of his generation. Magic Sam was posthumously inducted into the Blues Hall of Fame in 1982.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Franz, Steve. “Magic Rocker: The Life and Music of Magic Sam.” Living Blues no. 125 (January/February 1996): 32–44.
- Iglauer, Bruce, and Jim O’Neal. “Remembering Magic Sam.” Living Blues no. 1 (Spring 1970): 2–10.

Discography: AMG; LSF

Selected Recordings

- West Side Soul* (1967, Delmark 615).
Black Magic (1968, Delmark 620).

- Live at Ann Arbor & In Chicago* (1976, Delmark 645).
The Essential Magic Sam: The Cobra and Chief Recordings 1957–1961 (2001, Fuel 2000 061104).

MAGIC SLIM

b. Morris Holt, 7 August 1937; Torrance, MS

Veteran Chicago blues singer and guitarist Magic Slim was born Morris Holt and was raised in Torrance, Mississippi, a small rural community outside of Grenada. Holt’s first musical experience was singing in church, where he attended regularly with his family. A fan of country and western music, he also developed an interest in piano and took lessons from the church pianist. After losing a finger in a farming accident, he switched to a homemade guitar, which he made using wire from his mother’s broom. His father later bought him his first store-bought guitar as a reward for working hard at picking cotton.

Holt moved to Chicago in 1955 with the hopes of playing music professionally. While in Chicago, he developed a deep interest in the blues and reunited with childhood friend Magic Sam, who gave him the moniker Magic Slim and began giving him pointers on guitar and bass. Not yet the accomplished musician he would later become, Slim found it difficult to break into Chicago’s competitive blues scene with his limited skills. Although Magic Sam occasionally allowed him to play bass, he was routinely denied the opportunity to sit in with many musicians such as Howlin’ Wolf and Otis Rush.

Frustrated by his failure to make it as a Chicago musician, Slim returned to Mississippi in the late 1950s, where he worked outside music for the next several years. During this time, he taught his brother Nick to play bass and his brother Baby Lee to play drums, and the trio performed on weekends at area juke joints throughout the next five years.

Slim moved back to Chicago in the early 1960s as a much more seasoned musician and began playing with singer and bass player Robert “Dancin” Perkins’s band, Mr. Pitiful and the Ter-Drops. Perkins eventually turned the band over to Slim, who altered the spelling and used the band’s name throughout his career. Brother Nick moved to Chicago to replace Perkins as bass player and remained with the Teardrops for three decades.

The band made a couple of recordings for the small Chicago label Ja-Wes in 1966 and continued to gig relentlessly in the South Side clubs. Their stripped-down, hardcore approach to Chicago blues developed a strong local following and Slim became a favorite guest at Hound Dog Taylor’s popular Sunday afternoon gigs at Florence’s Lounge. When Taylor decided to leave this coveted gig in the early 1970s, he tapped Slim to replace him. His stinging, vibrato-drenched guitar playing, powerful vocals, and seemingly endless repertoire of blues songs combined with the Teardrops driving shuffle sound exemplified the very spirit of modern Chicago blues.

MAGIC SLIM

Slim gained national attention in 1979 when the band recorded for Alligator's Living Chicago Blues series, and the group continued to record numerous solid releases for a variety of labels, including Rooster, Blind Pig, Wolf, and Storyville. The band went through several lineup changes in the 1990s, including the departure of brother Nick and longtime guitarist John Primer, but Magic Slim and his Teardrops continued to be a powerful force on the national and international blues scene.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl and Al Campbell); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Zeldin, Beverly. "Magic Slim: You Can't Play the Blues Cute." Living Blues no. 136 (November/December 1997): 18–27.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

MAIDEN, SIDNEY

b. 1923; Mansfield, LA

A smoky singer and a harp player, strongly rooted in the John Lee Williamson style, Sidney Maiden went to California during the war years, playing and recording with K. C. Douglas, Mercy Dee, and Cool Papa Sadler from the late 1940s to the early 1960s when he drifted into obscurity.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

AMG (Al Campbell); Harris; Larkin
Cohn, Lawrence. Sidney Maiden (1961, Bluesville LP 1035).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Trouble an' Blues (1994, Original Blues Classics CD 574).

MAISON DU SOUL

The founding of the Maison du Soul record label came as a response to the number of requests Floyd Soileau, the owner of Floyd's Music Shop in Ville Platte, Louisiana, received for zydeco recordings in his store. Having already experienced some success with both Cajun and swamp pop records, Soileau was ideally suited to enter the market. Soileau's first major success was to sign Boozoo Chavis. Chavis had had a huge hit with "Paper in My Shoe" in the 1950s, but had grown frustrated with the music business and retired to train horses. Soileau saw Chavis's popularity picking up in the local clubs and hired him. His raw, rural-based zydeco was far from the more blues-oriented style Clifton Chenier was playing, but became immensely popular. Soileau also signed Sidney Simien who was attempting to resurrect his career as a zydeco singer after his long career in R&B and swamp pop. The phenomenal million-selling "My Toot Toot" made the label a zydeco mecca for local groups. Maison du Soul has had moderate success as a blues label, publishing records by Tabby Thomas and Walter Washington, but its forte has been and continues to be zydeco.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

Broven, John. South to Louisiana: The Music of the Cajun Bayous. Gretna, LA: Pelican Press, 1983.
Maison du Soul website, <http://www.flattownmusic.com/> (accessed December 19, 2004).
Tisserand, Michael. The Kingdom of Zydeco. New York: Arcade Publishing, 1998.

Discography: McGrath

See also Chavis, Boozoo; Chenier, Clifton; Simien, "Rockin" Sidney; Soileau, Floyd

MAKE ME A PALLET ON YOUR FLOOR

American folk song of probable black origin. The song most likely dates from the end of the nineteenth century. Its earliest known appearance is in the 1908 piano ragtime composition "Southern Rag Medley No. 1" by black concert pianist Blind Boone. The other early musical source is also a piano rag, "10th Street Rag" by white Texas folk pianist Euday L. Bowman (1914, unpublished). The lyrics first appear in a 1911 article by folklorist Howard Odum who had transcribed them from a performance he had heard in Mississippi a few years before. The first recording to quote the melody was a 1917 Columbia disk by W. C. Handy's band of "Sweet Child," a song by Stovall and Ewing. It was Handy who first published a song version of "Make Me a Pallet" in 1923 with words by Dave Elman and retitled “Atlanta Blues.” This version was recorded by blues singer Sara Martin and others.

In the later 1920s, “Make Me a Pallet” appeared in blues recordings by Ethel Waters, Virginia Liston, Lillian Glinn, and Mississippi John Hurt (under the title “Ain’t No Tellin”). It also occurs as part of a medley in a historically important recording by Henry Thomas titled “Bob McKinney.” Other important pre-war recordings were made by Jelly Roll Morton and Jimmy and Mama Yancey. Postwar recordings include those by Gus Cannon, Little Brother Montgomery, Brownie McGhee, Mississippi John Hurt, and Odetta.

“Make Me a Pallet” has always enjoyed popularity among white as well as black folk musicians. Early recorded versions include those by hillbilly groups such as the Leake County Revelers, the Stripling Brothers, the Dixie Ramblers (“Franklin County Blues”), and performers such as Woody Guthrie (“Bed on the Floor”) and Cisco Houston.

Although often described as a blues, “Make Me a Pallet” is an example of a proto-blues, predating the emergence of the fully integrated blues style by a number of years. In fact, the song has little in common musically with regular blues. It has a sixteen-measure structure, which, in the key of C, typically runs as follows:

F/	F/	C/	C/
F/	F/	C/	C/
C/	E ⁷ /	Am/	Fm ⁶ /
C/	D ⁷ G ⁷ /	C/	C/

Particularly unusual is the F to C (IV–I) movement played twice in the first eight measures which, perhaps more than any other single feature, gives a distinctive character to the music. Most performances of the song just use this sixteen-bar structure repeated as necessary to changing text, although some precede it with a verse (for example, Ethel Waters’s 1926 recording and Handy’s “Atlanta Blues,” which adds both a verse and a patter chorus).

Only one stanza of the lyrics is standard. Typically this runs:

Make me a pallet on the floor [TWICE]
 Make it soft, make it low,
 Make it so my good girl won’t know,
 Just make me a pallet on the floor.

Other stanzas are drawn from a wide pool of floating folk lyrics.

It seems likely that the song has over time undergone a metamorphosis in terms of expression and manner of performance. Originally it was probably performed quite fast and light, as is evidenced by its appearance in early ragtime instrumentals and by the performances of early bluesmen such as Mississippi

John Hurt, Gus Cannon, and Henry Thomas. The slower, bluesier style of performance—exemplified by Mama Yancey—is most likely a later development.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

- Boone, John William “Blind.” Blind Boone’s Southern Rag Medley No. 1: Strains from the Alleys. Columbia, MO: Allen Music Company, 1908.
- Handy, W. C., and Dave Elman. Atlanta Blues (Make Me a Pallet on Your Floor). New York: W. C. Handy, 1923.
- Odum, Howard W. “Folk-Song and Folk-Poetry as Found in the Secular Songs of the Southern Negroes.” Journal of American Folklore 24, no. 93 (July 1911): 255–294; 24, no. 94 (October 1911): 351–396.

Discography

- Cannon, Gus. Walk Right In (1963, Stax 702).
- Daniels, Charlotte, and Pat Webb. Charlotte Daniels and Pat Webb (ca. 1966, Prestige/International INT 103037).
- Dixie Ramblers. “Franklin County Blues” (1937, ARC 7-06-63).
- Glenn, Lillian. “Atlanta Blues” (1929, Columbia 14421-D).
- Guthrie, Woody. Woody Guthrie Sings Folk Songs, Vol. 2 (1964, Folkways FA 2484).
- Handy’s Orchestra of Memphis. “Sweet Child” (1917, Columbia A-2417).
- Houston, Cisco. Cisco Houston Sings American Folk Songs (Folkways FA 2346).
- Hurt, Mississippi John. “Ain’t No Tellin’” (1928, OKeh 8759).
- Kweskin, Jim. Relax Your Mind (1965, Vanguard VSD-79188).
- Leake County Revelers. “Make Me a Bed on the Floor” (1928, Columbia 15264-D).
- Liston, Virginia. “Make Me a Pallet” (1925, OKeh 8247).
- Martin, Sara. “Atlanta Blues” (1923, OKeh 8090).
- McGhee, Brownie. Traditional Blues, Vol. 2 (Folkways 02422).
- Montgomery, Little Brother. Chicago—The Living Legends (1962, Riverside RS-9403).
- Odetta. Odetta Sings the Blues (1962, Riverside RS-3007).
- Stripling Brothers. “Pallet on the Floor” (1936, Decca 5267).
- Thomas, Henry. “Bob McKinney” (1927, Vocalion 1138).
- Waters, Ethel. “Make Me a Pallet on the Floor” (1926, Columbia 14125-D).
- Watson, Doc. Doc Watson’s Favorites (1983, Liberty LN-10201).
- Yancey, Jimmy, and “Mama” Yancey. “Pallet on the Floor” (1943, Session 12-003).

MALACO/WALDOXY

Record label founded in 1969 in Jackson, Mississippi, by Tommy Couch and Gerald “Wolf” Stephenson, initially to record and lease singles of the artists they handled through their booking agency. Its first national success was “Misty Blue” by Dorothy Moore in 1975. Through Dave Clark, who arrived to the label in 1980, Malaco with its subsidiary Waldoxy built a first-rate group of soul-blues artists including Z. Z. Hill, Denise LaSalle, Latimore, and Marvin Sease. Hill's 1982 "Down Home Blues" was a success on single and album, selling 500,000 copies. The label also rejuvenated the career of Bobby "Blue" Bland, whose first Malaco album delivered his hit "For Members Only," and that of Little Milton. In 1985 it bought the Muscle Shoals Studio, incorporating its sound into its releases. It has also had the gospel labels Savoy and Blackberry. It remains one of the largest labels of contemporary black Southern music today, and on its thirtieth anniversary in 1999, it released a box-set retrospective titled The Last Soul Company.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Guralnick, Peter. "I Do Not Play No Rock 'n' Roll: Malaco Records: The Last Soul Company." Living Blues no. 84 (January/February 1989): 36–46.

Discography: McGrath

Malaco/Waldoxy website, <http://www.malaco.com/Catalog/list.php> (accessed February 13, 2005).

MALLARD, SAX

b. Oett Mallard, 2 October 1915; Chicago, IL
d. 29 August 1986; Chicago, IL

Jazz and blues saxophonist and clarinetist. He toured with many swing bands and combos, including Nat King Cole, Andy Kirk, and Duke Ellington during the 1930s and early 1940s. After World War II, he joined the Jump Jackson combo and became an active session man in the Chicago blues recording industry, employing his smooth alto sax blowing behind Big Bill Broonzy, Washboard Sam, Roosevelt Sykes, Eddie Boyd, Tampa Red, Arbee Stidham, Rosetta Howard, and Dinah Washington, among others. Mallard recorded as a leader for Aristocrat (1947) while also backing Andrew Tibbs and the Dozier Boys. He switched to tenor sax around 1950, and recorded as leader for Chess (1951–1952) and Mercury (1952). During the 1950s, he was busy in recording sessions accompanying Mitzi Mars, Coronets, Bobby Prince, Guitar Slim, and the Moonglows. In the 1960s he recorded behind Earl Hooker and Sunnyland Slim, and in 1970 Delmark used Mallard on a Roosevelt Sykes session. His last notable appearance was with the Blind John Davis Jump Band at the Chicago Jazz Festival in 1981.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Campbell, Robert L., Robert Pruter, and Armin Büttner. "The Sax Mallard Discography." Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/mallard.html> (accessed March 21, 2003).

Discography: LSFP

MALO, RON

b. 29 August 1935; IL
d. 15 August 1992; Burbank, IL

Audio engineer best known for his tenure at Chess Records from 1960 through 1975. He is credited with upgrading the sound at the label's 2120 South Michigan Avenue studio, and for engineering most Chess sessions during that time.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

"Ron Malo" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 106 (November/December 1992).

MALONE, DAVID

(See Kimbrough, David, Jr.)

MALONE, JOHN JACOB "J. J."

b. 20 August 1935; Decatur, AL
d. 20 February 2004; Maui, HI

Vocalist, pianist, and guitarist. His group, the Rhythm Rockers, recorded a single in Fresno in 1962; when the band broke up in 1966 he moved to Oakland. He recorded singles for Galaxy/Fantasy and Stephens (1969–1974) and albums for Red Lightnin', Cherrie, Eli Mile High, Fedora, and Blues Express.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Dries, Jan. "I Was in a Band Called the Rhythm Rockers. J. J. Malone Interviewed." Blues & Rhythm no. 144 (November 1999): 12–15.

Selected Recording

J. J. Malone—And The Band Played On (Blues Express 003).

See also Fedora; Oakland; Red Lightnin'

MAMA TALK TO YOUR DAUGHTER

Originally recorded in 1954 by J. B. Lenoir, a blues artist of the 1950s and 1960s, this song has been recorded by quite a few other major blues artists: Magic Sam, Magic Slim, Robert Nighthawk, John Lee Hooker, Johnny Winter, Lonnie Brooks, and John Mayall. Lenoir is also usually given the song-writing credit, though sometimes credit is also attributed to Lenoir's alto saxophone sideman Alex Atkins. As a fast-paced boogie, it is one of the most infectious with a groove that can be augmented by various rhythms and counter-rhythms and by numerous lyrical variations. This song was a tune well known by Chicago bluesmen and audiences: Robert "Mojo" Elem's version of the song occurs on the soundtrack to the documentary And This Is Maxwell Street and Robert Nighthawk's version is on his album Live on Maxwell Street, the latter version purportedly featuring vocals by Lenoir though the liner notes question whether it is in fact Lenoir singing. The guitar lines in Lenoir's own version are basic twelve-bar blues accompanied by a horn section in addition to the usual bass-drums rhythm section. Lenoir wrote a couple of variations on this song: "Mama What About Your Daughter" and "Daddy Talk to Your Son."

On Magic Sam's 1967 West Side Soul version, the combined rhythms of Sam and Mighty Joe Young's rocking guitar riffs along with the bass and drums produce a relatively fast-paced, high-energy boogie. Coupled with Sam's intense vocal delivery and enthusiastic "Yay-hays," the song was transformed into a classic tune of a younger generation of bluesmen. Sam keeps Lenoir's original first verse, but adds a riveting second verse, both of which combine to depict a very intense kind of love but one that the "daughter" better take seriously, or it'll cost her life if she "does [him] wrong"—a curious verse for Sam, who was a very amiable musician by most accounts. Whatever Sam's lyrical intentions, he and his band helped to make this blues number a standard among blues musicians.

Magic Slim and the Teardrops' 1993 version is also an up-tempo boogie but is extended with additional lyrics. Slim, a prodigy of Magic Sam, keeps Lenoir/Sam's first verse intact but then adds his own word play to several verses and an alternate chorus. The last line of the chorus as well as Slim's fourth verse might be a variation of Lenoir's line "she looks good to me," or just a new addition altogether, adding another variation to a classic blues song.

JUSTIN WERT

Bibliography

Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Penguin Books, 1982.

Sonnier, Austin. A Guide to the Blues. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1994.

Discography

- Elem, Robert "Mojo." And This Is Maxwell Street (2000, CD Rooster 2641).
 Lenoir, J. B. Parrot Sessions 1954–55: Vintage Chicago Blues (1994, CD Relic 7020).
 Magic Sam. West Side Soul (1967, LP Delmark 615).
 Magic Slim and the Teardrops. Magic Slim and the Teardrops (1993, LP Wolf 120849).
 Nighthawk, Robert. Live on Maxwell Street (2000, CD Rounder 619624).

MAMLISH RECORDS

1970s reissue label owned by Don Kent, specializing in pre-World War II southern blues. At least fourteen album issues were released, some containing the music of one artist such as Ed Bell (after whose "Mamlish Blues" the label was named), Barbecue Bob, Lonnie Johnson, and the Mississippi Sheiks.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography

- Wirz, Stefan. "Illustrated Mamlish Records Discography." <http://www.wirz.de/music/mamlish.htm> (accessed December 21, 2004).

MANDOLIN

Though it is more commonly perceived as a bluegrass or country music instrument rather than as a blues instrument, the mandolin has in fact played a role in the history of the blues. It evolved from the lute family in Renaissance Italy, and the present form of the instrument—with its short neck, metal frets, and four pairs of metal strings (generally tuned to G–D–A–E and played with a pick)—was developed in Naples in the early eighteenth century. It was brought to the United States primarily by concert musicians and Italian immigrants.

In the 1880s, a foreign group called the Spanish Students (and subsequent groups using the same name) caused a sensation in the United States playing their native mandolin-like bandurrias, contributing to a substantial rise in the mandolin's popularity. Mandolin clubs and mandolin orchestras soon appeared throughout the country, and by the end of the nineteenth century, significant numbers of mandolins were being produced. Later, as new popular music styles emerged after World War I, interest in the instrument began to wane in urban areas, and many people subsequently disposed of their mandolins. Because this made large numbers of the used instruments accessible at much lower prices than ever before, the mandolin began to make its way more and more into the hands of Southern rural musicians. By the 1920s, companies such as Sears, Roebuck and Co. and Montgomery Ward were also contributing to this trend by making inexpensive mandolins available through mail-order catalogs, better enabling those in rural areas to obtain them. Southern rural musicians widely embraced the mandolin because of its capacity as a lead instrument, and it is likely that the instrument's similarities to the fiddle contributed to its broad acceptance as well. In addition to having a common tuning, the mandolin and the fiddle also share some performance characteristics, and since the technique of mandolin picking is similar to that of the guitar, many non-fiddle-playing musicians were able to emulate the sound of the fiddle to a certain extent by the use of double stops and sustained tremolo picking on the mandolin.

Evidence of the mandolin's use by African Americans appears primarily on commercial recordings, chiefly those from the 1920s and 1930s. While this was not strictly limited to the blues idiom (as illustrated by recordings of the black ragtime guitar/mandolin tradition, for example), the instrument was employed on a number of blues recordings. These include several by black string bands, such as the Dallas String Band (featuring the mandolin work of Coley Jones) and the Mississippi Blacksnakes (an offshoot of the Mississippi Sheiks that showcased the playing of mandolin great Charlie McCoy). Jug band recordings (see the Jug entry), such as those of the celebrated Memphis Jug Band (often with Charlie Burse or Vol Stevens on the mandolin), commonly feature the instrument as well. Additionally, the mandolin can be heard as an accompanying instrument on recordings by solo blues artists from the era. McCoy's mandolin, for example, was featured on recordings by seminal blues performers such as Tommy Johnson and Memphis Minnie, and the mandolin accompaniment of the legendary Yank Rachell can be heard on the early recordings of bluesmen Sleepy John Estes and John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson.

As record companies segregated Southern rural music into the "race" (black) and "hillbilly" (white) categories and the solo guitar emerged as the predominant instrument in the country blues, string bands came to be primarily associated with "hillbilly" music. Consequently, the mandolin practically disappeared from "race" recordings during the 1930s. Still, a few African American performers continued to play the instrument, and in the 1960s, an increasing interest in the blues among whites brought about a renewed awareness of the mandolin in the genre. In particular, Yank Rachell and Johnny Young, perhaps the two best-known blues mandolin players, achieved success during the 1960s. Both performers, in fact, regularly utilized the electric mandolin and successfully incorporated the instrument into the more contemporary Chicago blues style. In the early 1970s, Howard Armstrong and Carl Martin (both of whom played the mandolin as well as a number of other instruments) teamed up with guitarist Ted Bogan and enjoyed acclaim as one of the last remaining black string bands. At the time of this writing, Armstrong is the only major blues mandolin player still living and performing, though younger musicians such as Rich DelGrosso and Andra Faye McIntosh continue to keep the blues mandolin tradition alive.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

- DelGrosso, Rich. "Mandolin Blues." Living Blues no. 79 (March/April 1988): 22–24.
- Hambly, Scott. "Mandolins in the United States Since 1880: An Industrial and Sociocultural History of Form." Ph.D. dissertation, University of Pennsylvania, 1977.
- Johnston, Richard. "The American Mandolin: How the Mandolin—And Its Partner, the Guitar—Traveled Through the Heart of American Music." Acoustic Guitar no. 62 (February 1998): 60–70.

MAPLESHADE RECORDS

Label owned and operated by Pierre Sprey in Upper Marlboro, Maryland, with assistance from musical director and pianist Larry Willis. Sprey opened his recording studio in 1986, established the label in 1990, and gained national distribution in 1993. Mapleshade is well known for its jazz roster featuring Willis, baritone saxophonist Hamiet Bluiett, and tenor saxophonist Clifford Jordan. Its blues releases have been eclectic, including Piedmont blues masters Archie Edwards, Drink Small, and John Dee and Fris. Other CDs have featured acts in the Washington, D.C., area such as guitarist/singer Ben Andrews with the Nighthawks' harmonica player Mark Wenner, the J Street Jumpers, Bad Influence, and Midnight Blue. From Maryland are contemporary blues shouter and drummer Big Joe Maher of the Dynafloes, and honky-tonk saxophonist Joe Stanley. An early release was of Sunnyland Slim performing in Washington, D.C. There are also two gospel releases, The Angels recorded at the Morris Brown A.M.E. Church in Charleston, South Carolina, and the Addicts Rehabilitation Center Gospel Choir at the Kelly Temple Church of God in Christ on 130th Street in New York City.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Mapleshade Records website, <http://www.mapleshaderecords.com/index.php> (accessed February 8, 2005).

MARDI GRAS

Mardi Gras is the celebration of Shrove Tuesday, the massive blowout on the Catholic calendar that precedes Ash Wednesday and the commencement of Lenten austerity. In New Orleans Mardi Gras inspires a carnival similar to those of Latin America with masked participants, bands, and large floats. Smaller parades in black neighborhoods are the domain of the Mardi Gras Indians, social clubs that dress in wild, brightly colored costumes inspired by American Indian dress who accompany their call-and-response singing with hand percussion as they march through the streets. Several of the tribes, namely, the Wild Tchoupitoulas and Wild Magnolias, have successfully recorded their chants with contemporary accompaniment. A whole genre within New Orleans music has developed around the music of Mardi Gras from popular songs about Mardi Gras to the tunes brass bands play in the parades.

Although popularly known for the celebration in New Orleans, Louisiana also celebrates Mardi Gras in the rural Cajun towns west of the city. Cajun and Creole groups of masked riders visit outlying homes requesting a donation for a dinner cooked that evening in return for a dance performed by the riders. The riders assemble that evening for a dance where a large gumbo is prepared.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

Ancelet, Barry Jean. The Makers of Cajun Music. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1984.

Jason, Berry, Jonathan Foose, and Tad Jones. Up from the Cradle of Jazz: New Orleans Music Since World War II. Athens: The University of Georgia Press, 1986.

Mitchell, Reid. All on a Mardi Gras Day: Episodes in the History of New Orleans Carnival. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press 1995.

Discography

New Orleans Mardi Gras Music

Mardi Gras Essentials (2000, Hip-O Records 545684).

Mardi Gras in New Orleans, Vol. 1 (Mardi Gras Records MG1001).

Mardi Gras in New Orleans, Vol. 2 (Mardi Gras Records MG1005).

Rural Creole Mardi Gras

Zodico: Louisiana Creole Music (1979, Rounder Records CSROUN6009).

See also Dr. John; King, Earl; Professor Longhair

MARGOLIN, BOB

b. 9 May 1949; Boston, MA

Guitarist, singer. A seven-year stint with Muddy Waters's blues band introduced Margolin to the blues world, where he spent the next twenty-five years with a solid solo career. Originally inspired by Chuck Berry, he began playing guitar at age fifteen and soon was performing with a succession of blues and blues rock bands around Boston. He signed on with Muddy Waters in 1973, subsequently touring internationally as well as playing on the 1975 Grammy Award-winning Muddy Waters Woodstock Album, appearing in the 1976 Martin Scorsese film of The Band's "Last Waltz" concert, and performing at the White House for Jimmy Carter in 1978.

Margolin, now sporting his "Steady Rollin'" nickname, left both the Muddy Waters band and the road in 1980, playing only low-profile East Coast club dates until 1989 when his first solo album, The Old School, was released on the regional Powerhouse label. Chicago Blues, with Jimmy Rogers, Pinetop Perkins, Kim Wilson, and Mark "Kaz" Kazanoff, followed in 1991. Down in the Alley, released on Alligator Records in 1993, reintroduced Margolin to an international audience, and a 1994 Muddy Waters band reunion effort, You're Gonna Miss Me on Telarc, affirmed his status as a creative keeper of the flame. Margolin, who also established his journalistic credentials with music magazine articles and columns, recorded again with Muddy Waters veterans on All-Star Blues Jam (2003), working with pianist Pinetop Perkins and drummer Willie "Big Eyes" Smith, in addition to Howlin' Wolf guitarist Hubert Sumlin.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly and Al Campbell); Larkin Thompson, A. "Steady Rollin' Bob Margolin." Guitar Player 28 no. 4 (April 1994): 20–21.

Discography: AMG

MARKETING

The Business of Blues

The manner in which blues has been conducted as a business over the course of the last century can be described as a process that began with incomprehension and has come around to a position of perplexity at the present time. The music industry has never fully comprehended what blues is or exactly how to market it and, therefore, success with the public has been intermittent outside the core audience that has sought out the genre since its first appearance.

The blues could be considered to be a form of cultural entrepreneurship when musicians first sought to make their living by playing it. On street corners or in juke joints or at rent parties or picnics, blues performers sold their wares on an individual or small group basis. Their repertoire was governed by the audience at hand, both what they wanted to hear and, equally important, what could lead them in dance.

It was one such performer that W. C. Handy heard at the Tutwiler, Mississippi, station in 1903. A "lean, loose-jointed Negro" whose face had "some of the sadness of the ages" was playing a guitar with a knife pressed along its strings. The song came across to the technically trained Handy as "the weirdest music I had ever heard." For a time, he kept it locked up in his memory, for though he could discern its similarity to elements in the commercial mainstream, such as the lamentably titled "coon songs" of the period, it could not readily translate into a viable product. It was in 1912 that Handy formulated a more commercially accessible facsimile of that lone musician with "Memphis Blues," but it was not until 1914 and the publication of "St. Louis Blues" that this new form of expression captured the public imagination.

The recording industry picked up on the genre almost instantaneously. The Victor Military Band cut "Memphis Blues" in 1914. Three years later, David Wondrich asserts, the first black artist recorded a blues: clarinetist Wilbur Sweatman's version of Handy's "Joe Turner Blues." The barrier to mass merchandising of the form, however, did not fall until 1920, when the African American songwriter Perry Bradford convinced Fred Hager of OKeh Records to cut Mamie Smith singing "Crazy Blues." His conviction that "the country was waiting for the sound of the voice of a Negro singing the blues with a Negro jazz combination playing for him or her" proved more than prescient. Quickly, other labels followed in kind, releasing what Ralph Peer of OKeh dubbed "Race records." Their numbers grew exponentially, from fifty in 1921 to more than five thousand in 1927.

At first, the most successful artists in the genre were women, most notably Ma Rainey and Bessie Smith, the latter the most popular race artist of the decade. Solo country blues by male musicians took off in 1926 with Blind Lemon Jefferson's work for the Paramount label. Advertised as a "Real Old-Fashioned Blues Singer," the promotion copy for his releases, and that of other performers, not only played on racial stereotypes but also featured demeaning associations about rural life. The fiscal arrangements between artists and companies were equally onerous. Each received a one-time payment, as little as fifteen dollars, and no rights to the copyright for their work or remuneration for copies sold.

The Depression temporarily eroded the commercial appeal of blues, yet the industry recovered during World War II, as blacks and others migrated to urban centers for work connected to the military. Available income led to a newfound desire for recorded music, and a wealth of independent companies entered the scene. Representative among them is Chicago's Chess Records, run by the brothers Phil and Leonard, who gravitated to the city's South Side and its vibrant musical culture. Artists such as Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, and Little Walter were signed. Their livelihood was further benefited by the formation of Broadcast Music Inc. in 1940, which allowed them to benefit from the performance rights system of compensation for the public use of their material. Greater public dissemination of blues over radio and through the sale of recordings broadened the appeal of the genre outside the African American community of its origin, and sales increased when songs crossed over to the pop charts. This process was, however, temporarily curtailed by the advent of rock 'n' roll, which overwhelmed the nation's emerging youth culture.

Some young people failed to be satisfied by the offerings of the commercial music industry, and they sought in the music of the nation's past something they considered more unique and authentic. The ensuing folk revival encompassed blues, and collectors emerged who sought out 78s from the past and, later, any of the surviving artists who played on them. Notable in this regard was the "rediscovery" of figures like Son House, Skip James, and Mississippi John Hurt, who went on to make new recordings as well as see their early material reissued. These men also become fixtures on the festival and coffee house circuit connected to the folk revival.

The Original Race Records

My, this is a page of Okeh Stars! Lonnie Johnson, Sara Martin, Henryette Davis and Wiley and Wiley. And everyone sings a ravishing Blues.

Sara Martin is leaving for Cuba—there she will moan to glory her famous Blues. You won't see her for some time—so of course you will want to have her latest songs. They are Nos. 8374 and 8394.

Wiley and Wiley gain special mention—they are a vaudeville team—and know how to drip mean woe into music. No 8385 is a deluge of fun, and sentimental harmony.

Lonnie Johnson

A 1926 advertisement for the Okeh “race records” line. (Image courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Simultaneously, when the leading figures of rock 'n' roll, most notably the Rolling Stones, drew attention to their influences in blues, other musicians gained a broader audience and saw their records achieve distribution into the commercial mainstream. Figures such as B. B. King and Albert King played at major rock venues. Younger white musicians, like Paul Butterfield and Mike Bloomfield, studied with these men and went on to found blues ensembles of their own, which drew the attention of major commercial labels. Blues developed greater visibility in the process, although some believed it diluted its substance by accommodating mass tastes. Others also pointed to the fact that, in the wake of the political evolution of young African Americans, blues became associated with racial attitudes of the past incompatible with the advocacy of Black Power.

As the political fever of the 1960s gave way to the complacency of the following decade, blues fell off the public radar and began more and more to take on the role of one among many niche genres. Each of these possesses a limited but avid core audience, yet, except for the occasional charting single, such as B. B. King's “The Thrill Is Gone” in 1972, the music failed to find a mass audience consistent with guaranteed sales. Major labels consequently pulled away from the material, and, once again, independents, like Alligator and Rounder, filled the gap. Younger African Americans took on the mantle of their predecessors, like Robert Cray and Keb' Mo', and paid tribute to their influences while accommodating the genre to the demands of the twenty-first century.

In recent years, the blues seems to possess increased commercial viability. National chains of clubs devoted to the music, such as House of Blues and B. B. King's, draw audiences, though some argue they profess an interest in the music more in theory than practice. Many musicians look to the festival circuit, now numbering several hundred annually, for their livelihood, and find as well that interest in the blues abroad sometimes seems equal if not superior to what they find at home. Many look too to the commercial consequences of the declaration of 2003 as the “Year of the Blues” and the multi-part PBS documentary series to help codify an indelible commitment to that “weird music” W. C. Handy heard in Tutwiler a century ago.

The Reception of Blues

The reception of blues follows a historical arc typical of many vernacular forms of American music: What begins as a form of indigenous expression arising out of and responding to a determined community transforms into one of many niche genres angling for a share of the entertainment dollar.

Long before the blues was codified in the form of sheet music or recordings, the music possessed a communal dimension. It was played person to person, before a defined community of the performer’s peers. Either at juke joints, roadhouses, rent parties, or around the home, blues answered to the needs and pleasures of the African American community. Musicians picked their material based on their knowledge of that body of individuals, and more often than not chose songs that would both take their minds off everyday cares as well as entice them to dance. Some form of remuneration was expected to follow, whether money or food or liquor or all of these, yet musicians thought of themselves as serving a need, not simply creating a product.

Outside the warm support of that community, blues musicians were forced to fare on the basis of their wits, musical and otherwise. Playing out on the streets as they hoboed across country necessitated keeping at arm’s length any representative of authority and playing whatever song the audience at hand wanted to hear. This led blues musicians to think of genres as porous phenomena, necessitating that they know material that came from their community of origin as well as the hit parade of the day. This led many of them to engage in the kind of heterogeneity of repertoire that we affiliate with the “songster”: musicians who could act as virtual human jukeboxes so that the coins continued to fill their hat and feed their hunger.

The impact of the transformation of the blues into a recorded product starting in the 1920s was phenomenal. Performers had to learn to think of their repertoire not as part of a communal pool of expression but, instead, as unique creations. Only if they were able to convince the kind of gatekeepers like H. C. Speir, who “discovered” Charley Patton among others, of their other than ordinary abilities would they be able to reach a record company. Once there, songs had to be tailored not to the dance floor, but recording equipment. The length of songs necessarily was altered and often so were the words so as not to upset or confuse their employers. Recordings allowed audiences to develop a cannon of favorite artists and songs, which playback equipment allowed them to listen to at their leisure and as often as they wished. The “aura” of immediacy was inevitably diluted, although for musicians, the availability of recordings permitted them to charge more for live labor.

Other technologies similarly transformed the reception of blues. Early radio may not have featured many African American individuals playing this music, but occasions sometimes arose that presented a chance to diffuse blues culture. Aleck Miller, aka Sonny Boy Williamson II, elevated his position when he became the featured artist on KFFA’s King Biscuit Time broadcast from Helena, Arkansas. In addition, as disk jockeys proliferated and playlists manifested the diversity of American music, blues reached an even wider audience. Black broadcasters like those on Memphis’s WDIA featured ample amounts of blues on the air, and soon white broadcasters with wide ears, like Dewey Phillips of Memphis and Hunter Hancock of Los Angeles, were bringing the music to a more expanded audience.

Over the course of time, consumers became interested not just in the music of their contemporaries but in the work of the past. The interest in vernacular forms that arose in the wake of the folk revival affected blues as well. Record collectors began to put out bootlegged collections of long unavailable 78s, as in the groundbreaking Anthology of American Folk Music assembled by Harry Smith for Folkways Records in 1952. Soon, the major record companies recognized a financial incentive in promoting their back catalog. The jacket copy and cover illustrations often did not call attention to the communal origins of blues but built up the artists as heroic individuals, poets, and loners who could be made to resemble the creative heroes admired by the emerging rock ’n’ roll generation. Striking evidence of this perspective can be observed in the celebration of Robert Johnson. The sense that blues was a part of an entire lived culture became diminished if not lost altogether in the process.

The desire to market blues performers in the heroic mode was influenced as well by the increasing emphasis on technical expertise, particularly as regards solo skills on the guitar. Following the deification of white guitar heroes like Eric Clapton, Jeff Beck, and Keith Richards, many of whom trained themselves to play through blues recordings, practitioners of the genre were shown on album covers or in promotional photographs with their instrument in hand, engaging in the virtuosic display of their technique. A number of live recordings penetrated the general public by playing up this angle, like B. B. King's 1965 Live at the Regal or Albert King's 1968 Live Wire Blues Power, recorded at Bill Graham's rock venue the Fillmore Ballroom. For some, this process led to a profusion of graceful displays of skill, whereas for others, it amounted to little more than excessive grandstanding in pursuit of crossover demographics.

At the present time, blues struggles simply to retain a degree of the public's widely divided attention in a media-glutted environment. The virtual abandonment of blues on either radio or television illustrates the pervasive homogenization of the airwaves. Furthermore, even if younger audiences were able to gain access to blues, the genre struggles against the pervasive stereotype of its being a litany of complaint. The companies that market and manage blues artists look to the proliferation of festivals to augment their audience and hope as well that isolated tributes like the 2003 PBS Martin Scorsese-produced series on the blues not only keep the music alive, but also permit it to flourish and respond to the circumstances of the twenty-first century.

The Retailing of Blues

The presentation of the blues to the public in a commercial context has historically presented a conundrum to those in the culture industry: How is the blues to be defined and how does one constitute its audience?

With the success of Mamie Smith's recording of "Crazy Blues" in 1920, the music industry recognized two things. First, African Americans desired to hear blues performed by their own people and, second, an appropriate language was needed in order to perpetuate that audience into the future. Although information on purchasing patterns at the time remains anecdotal, consumers were drawn to their favorites or, alternately, enticed to purchase something novel by advertising. Unsurprisingly, the illustrations featured perpetuated what Jeff Tilton has called "plantation stereotypes" that recycle material to be found earlier on sheet music, most notably the "coon songs." More unusual and equally disturbing is the manner in which the black figures are coded as rural, not urban. This permitted the record industry simultaneously to ignore emerging black urban society but also to titillate that audience by mocking their country cousins. Furthermore, in so doing, they implied a degree of naiveté to the artists that their material never possessed.

In the aftermath of World War II, when the black community gained in economic status through employment in the military effort, numerous independent record companies emerged. A number of the owners began as record merchants and devised their catalogs based on audience desires. Representative in this regard was the Cincinnati, Ohio-based King Records, founded by Syd Nathan in 1944. Among his black blues artists were Wynonie Harris, Roy Brown, Lonnie Johnson, and Freddie King. Unique among his peers, Nathan also hired Henry Glover, an African American songwriter-arranger, as an A&R man, writer, and producer. Labels like King aggressively marketed to a black audience by appealing to the mainstream tastes of the community. At the same time, while some blues artists occasionally crossed over to the pop charts, more often their material was successfully recorded by white artists, as in the case of Elvis Presley's "cover" of Harris's "Good Rockin' Tonight." As a publisher, Nathan benefited in all cases, but with the growth of the teenage market and the increasing segmentation of audiences, blues became more and more a minority taste. Blues artists remained stars in their own orbit, and their lives were tethered to the chitlin circuit rather than the national arena.

Circumstances altered in the 1960s when the folk revival elevated the historical significance of American vernacular music for a portion of the public unimpressed by the mainstream appeal of rock 'n' roll. They sought in older artists and recordings some evidence of a more authentic and unmediated form of cultural expression that superseded what to them was ersatz in contemporary culture. In the process, a number of acoustic musicians from the 1920s and 1930s, like Son House, Skip James, and Mississippi John Hurt, were "rediscovered." They made new recordings and toured on the festival and coffee house circuit and gathered in their wake a body of acolytes. A number of new independent labels devoted to vernacular forms, including Arhoolie, Delmark, and Testament, met the needs of this small but militant audience.

Simultaneously, rock 'n' roll musicians pointed to the influence on their material of the electrified blues artists of the postwar generation, who found themselves on national television or at rock-oriented venues playing to a new generation unfamiliar with their material. The record labels who recorded giants in the genre like B. B. King, Muddy Waters, John Lee Hooker, and Howlin' Wolf began to advertise in youth publications and, in some cases, coaxed their artists either to record with white rock musicians or more radically modify their material in order to satisfy a diverse constituency. The later case led notoriously to the 1971 Chess release Electric Mud, on which Muddy Waters collided with period psychedelic sounds.

In addition, blues recordings heretofore only available to collectors began to reenter the market in the form of reissues. Some were sheer bootlegs with no acknowledgment of the present-day owners of the materials, while others, like the 1961 King of Delta Blues Singers featuring Robert Johnson, appeared above ground from the major labels. Audiences in the process were able not simply to read about but hear blues history, and they were equally able to compare the emerging "covers" of classic tunes by rock bands. In some cases—Cream's "I'm So Glad" and Canned Heat's "Goin' to the Country"—acoustic acorns took on new life and climbed the record charts.

While some artists, like B. B. King and John Lee Hooker, become synonymous in the public mind with the blues, many, many more musicians never seemed to elevate themselves out of a musical ghetto. The major labels kept a small number of blues artists on their rosters, and, typically, those individuals achieved the greatest success when they either modified their sound or featured major stars from other genres on their albums. Recent examples in this latter category are Hooker's 1989 The Healer, featuring Keith Richards and Bonnie Raitt, and B. B.'s 2000 Riding with the King, accompanied by Eric Clapton.

Hosts of other individuals found a birth on small labels devoted to blues and other roots genres, yet with the narrowcasting of music on all media, radio and television especially, the mass public were not given an opportunity to hear the music and discover its diversity. In the vacuum left by these circumstances, a label like the Mississippi-based Fat Possum kept the music going by recording some of the most skilled practitioners, like R. L. Burnside and Junior Kimbrough, who had escaped the corporate radar. A concerted effort in the marketing to draw attention to the primitive, raw, and often violent element of these individuals' lives and material was viewed by some as exploitation in the name of an artistic agenda, yet the company cannot be faulted for retaining the spark of the music at a time when virtually all forms of culture seem identical in their appeal to the common denominator.

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

The Business of Blues

- Cohodes, Nadine. Spinning Blues into Gold. The Chess Brothers and the Legendary Chess Records. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2000.
- Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Viking, 1981.
- Titon, Jeff. Early Downhome Blues. A Musical & Cultural Analysis. 2nd ed. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1994.
- Wondrich, David. Stom and Swerve. American Music Gets Hot 1843–1924. Chicago: Chicago Review Press, An A Cappella Book, 2003.

The Reception of Blues

- Dixon, Robert, and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. New York: Stein & Day, 1970.
- Grazian, David. Blue Chicago. The Search for Authenticity in Urban Blues Clubs. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2003.
- Keil, Charles. Urban Blues. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1966, 1991.

Retailing the Blues

- Collins, Tony. Rock Mr. Blues. The Life and Music of Wynonie Harris. New Hampshire: Big Hiickel Productions, 1996.
- Darker Blues*. Oxford, MS: Fat Possum Records, 2003.
- Davis, Francis. A History of the Blues. New York: Hyperion, 1996.

MARS, JOHNNY

b. 7 December 1942; Laurens, SC

Harmonica player living in England since 1972. Early influence was Little Walter Jacobs, but more decisive was Jimi Hendrix, whose guitar style Mars sought to emulate on the harmonica. He performs mostly in Europe, with occasional U.S. appearances such as at the 1992 San Francisco Blues Festival.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Richard Skelly)
- Hodgett, Trevor. "'I Have a Pedal Board, I've Got a Heavy Metal, I've a Digital Pitchshifter, I've a Flanger,' Says the Blues Harp's Answer to Jimi Hendrix. Do The Purists Not Like That!'" Blueprint no. 61 (April 1994): 12.

Discography: AMG

MARTIN, CARL

b. 1 April 1906; Big Stone Gap, VA
d. 10 May 1979; Pontiac, MI

Carl Martin, whose primary instruments were the fiddle, mandolin, and guitar, had a long musical association with Howard Armstrong and Ted Bogan. Their prewar era string band was known under names that included the Four Keys and the Tennessee Chocolate Drops. Credited as the latter, he and Armstrong recorded with Martin's brother Roland in 1930 for Vocalion. Martin also made a few solo recordings from 1934 to 1936. In the 1970s, he reunited with Armstrong and Bogan, and the group achieved fame touring and recording as Martin, Bogan, and Armstrong.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

AMG (Al Campbell); Harris; Larkin
Welding, Pete. "An Interview with Carl Martin." 78 Quarterly 1, no. 2 (1968): 29–33.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

Martin, Bogan, and Armstrong (1974, Flying Fish 003).
That Old Gang of Mine (1978, Flying Fish 056).

MARTIN, "FIDDLIN'" JOE

b. 8 January 1900; Edwards, MS
d. 21 November or 5 December 1975; Walls, MS

Recorded with Son House (1941—mandolin and washboard) and on all Woodrow Adams's recordings (drums). Martin also worked with Charlie Patton and Howlin' Wolf.

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

Harris
Hay, Fred J. "Fiddlin' Joe Martin." Living Blues no. 26 (March/April 1976): 10.

Discography: DGR; LSFPMARTIN, SALLIE

b. 20 November 1895; Pittsfield, GA
d. 18 June 1988; Chicago, IL

Proclaimed as "The Mother of Gospel" by the National Convention of Gospel Choirs and Choruses.

A singer from a Pentecostal religious background, in 1932–1940 Martin assisted Thomas A. Dorsey as performer and entrepreneur. From 1940 she went solo; Dinah Washington (known then as Ruth Jones) was a piano accompanist to her for several years. She continued in business and was a contributor to charitable causes.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Discography: AMG (Jason Ankeny)MARTIN, SARA

b. Sara Dunn, 18 June 1884; Louisville, KY
d. 24 May 1955; Louisville, KY

Singer active in vaudeville from 1915 through 1931, and an Okeh label artist from 1923 through 1928. In addition to the typical piano accompaniment, Martin's records also featured her with guitarist Sylvester Weaver, and on others with Clifford Hayes's jug band. After her musical career ended, she ran a Louisville nursing home and was active in her church.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; New Grove; Santelli
Swinton, Paul. "Sara Martin: 'A Piece of the Copyright.'" Blues & Rhythm no. 116 (February 1997): 10–14.

Discography: DGRMATCHBOX

Blues label of Saydisc Records, founded at Badminton, England, in 1965 by Gef and Genny Lucena. A series of reissues of vintage blues in the late 1960s and early 1970s was followed by a hiatus, after which issues in a new Matchbox Bluesmaster series programmed by Johnny Parth began in 1982. Five related CDs using the Matchbox name were issued by Document in Austria in the early 1990s.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Oliver, Paul. "John Saw a Number: 'In Chronological Order.'" Blues & Rhythm no. 38 (August 1988): 12–14.

MATCHBOX BLUES

This song is usually associated with Blind Lemon Jefferson, who recorded three versions of it in 1927, one in March for OKeh (for which he is credited as the composer) and two in April for Paramount. Jefferson's original lyrics present one of the most popular blues formulas, which was in fact first used on record by Ma Rainey in her "Lost Wandering Blues" (1924). However, Jefferson's slightly altered lyrics would later be reprised by many pre- and postwar blues and non-blues and by black and white artists. Though liable to other interpretations, Jefferson's ironic metaphor within the song has been best explained by Oster and by Titon, who states, "The singer possesses so few clothes that he asks whether a suitcase the size of a matchbox might not hold them; then he announces that he has a long journey ahead." As Jefferson's three versions of "Match Box Blues" contain significant textual and musical differences, Oster's and Titon's analyses provide an interesting insight into his technique of composition, which in his early recordings (1926–1927) is based on the main stanza or stanzas and melody around which a number of floating verses revolve.

The vast popularity of this song and of its formulaic stanza is evident from the many subsequent versions. The other prewar African American recordings bearing this title were cut by Leadbelly (1934 and 1935; two versions), Big Bill Broonzy (1936), a piano version by Black Ivory King (1937), and Jack Meredith (1941). Possibly trying to cash in on Jefferson's acclaimed stanza and commercially successful composition, no less than seven prewar bluesmen in the short space of two and a half years made use of the unsighted musician's formulaic stanza in songs with different titles. The main postwar black recordings were made by Joel Hopkins (1959 and 1965), Otis Webster (1960), Robert Pete Williams (1960, with the title "Highway Blues," 1970), J. T. Adams (1961), John Lee Hooker with the title "Matchbox" (1962), John Jackson (1965, 1967, 1969, 1978), Roosevelt Holts (1969), Tom Shaw (1970s), Yank Rachell (1973), Roy Dunn with the title "Roy's Matchbox Blues" (1974), and others. Whether pre- or postwar, what is particularly relevant about the majority of later versions is that, even when explicitly paying a musical and/or stylistic tribute to Jefferson, the interpreters of this song limited themselves to inserting the "matchbox" stanza into completely different texts, sometimes curiously joining it to verses drawn from other Jefferson recordings.

As described by Evans [2000, pp. 92–93], Jefferson's "Match Box Blues" exemplifies many of the musical innovations in his repertoire: "He plays a variant of a common eight-to-the-bar piano boogie-woogie bass figure . . . , followed by a common three-against-four piano ragtime figure." While this figure did not achieve popularity until Pine Top Smith's "Pine Top's Boogie Woogie" in 1928, the Jefferson recording was done nearly two years previously.

The song's influence on white music is witnessed by Larry Hensley's 1934 cover of Jefferson's blues. More prewar versions, both in 1935 and for Decca, were recorded by the Shelton Brothers and four months later by Joe Shelton, but only the latter was issued. Three years later Roy Newman & His Boys cut a "Match Box Blues" for Vocalion, while in 1939 they recorded this title for Bluebird. Carl Perkins's 1957 recording of "Matchbox" for Sun and the Beatles' 1964 homonymous version for EMI/Capitol contributed to spread its fame in rock 'n' roll circles. Other versions were recorded by Tom Shaka (1992), Tab Benoit (1995), Matchbox Bluesband (2001), and David Evans (2001).

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

- Evans, David. Big Road Blues: Tradition and Creativity in the Folk Blues, pp. 78–79, 130. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.
- . "Musical Innovation in the Blues of Blind Lemon Jefferson." Black Music Research Journal 20, no. 1. Chicago: Center for Black Music Research, Columbia College, 2000.
- Oster, Harry. Living Country Blues. New York: Minerva Press, 1975.
- Titon, Jeff. Early Downhome Blues: A Musical and Cultural Analysis. 2nd ed. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1994.

Discography

- Jefferson, Blind Lemon. Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vol. 2 (1927, Document Records DOCD-5018; reissue 1991).
- Meade, Guthrie T., with Dick Spottswood and Douglas S. Meade. Country Music Sources: A Biblio-Discography of Commercially Recorded Traditional Music. Chapel Hill: Southern Folklife Collection, The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill Libraries in association with the John Edwards Memorial Forum, 2002.

MAXWELL, DAVID

b. 10 March 1950; Waltham, MA

Boston-based pianist much influenced by postwar Chicago masters Otis Spann, Sunnyland Slim, and Pinetop Perkins. Most of his work since the late 1960s has been as sideman to Freddie King, Bonnie Raitt, James Cotton, and Otis Rush. He recorded a CD as leader for Tone Cool label in 1997.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

MAY, ROOSEVELT

b. 26 February 1915; Halifax, NC

d. October 1978; Moonlight, NC

Harmonica player associated with Peg Leg Sam. He recorded a session with Hub Records, a North Carolina label, in 1968.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

“Obituaries.” Living Blues no. 41 (November/December 1978): 41.

Discography: LSPF

MAYALL, JOHN

b. 29 November 1933; Macclesfield, England

Singer, harpist, keyboardist, guitarist. The prime English popularizer of American blues introduced the music to a European audience while also introducing numerous future rock stars, including Peter Green, Eric Clapton, Mick Fleetwood, Jack Bruce, John McVie, and Mick Taylor, to American fans. Although he spent the bulk of his career living in California, his early, almost evangelical, efforts to gain fans for the music definitely qualified him to be regarded as the “Father of the English blues scene.”

Mayall, while possessing solid blues sensibilities, was not an especially strong singer or instrumental soloist, but he recognized and recruited such abilities in others, making him an unusually enlightened and effective bandleader. His group, which served as an advanced training academy for the cream of England’s aspiring blues musicians, was the focal point of British blues activity. The attention it generated through its surprising success on the English record charts spilled over to other British blues acts, as well as to some of its overlooked American influences, such as J. B. Lenoir and Otis Rush.

The thirty-year-old Mayall, originally working in a more R&B mode, moved to London from Manchester in 1963 and assembled an ever-evolving Bluesbreakers band, a group that would go through more than a dozen editions by 1970. The band’s first single came out in early 1964 and its debut album later in the year. Clapton joined in 1965 and in the next few years the band, with and without Clapton, made its most memorable music. Bluesbreakers in 1966, A Hard Road with Green on guitar in 1967, and Crusade, released in the same year, created Mayall’s reputation and remain his most accomplished recordings. He released a steady flow of subsequent albums, including the oddities The Blues Alone where he played all instruments himself and Bare Wires, a rare big band recording, complete with an extended jazz suite.

Mayall immigrated to California in 1969, celebrating the relocation with the release of Blues from Laurel Canyon. After The Turning Point, a live acoustic set from 1969 utilizing the sax and flute work of John Almond, he released Back to the Roots, the first of several alumni albums as Clapton, Taylor, and fellow guitarist Harvey Mandel joined saxist Almond, violinist Sugar cane Harris, and other Mayall exes. The 1980s were essentially a lost decade but the 1990 release of A Sense of Place, featuring Sonny Landreth on slide guitar, changed things when it became a radio favorite that served to reintroduce Mayall to a new generation of blues fans. Wake Up Call in 1993, Spinning Coin in 1995, and Padlock on the Blues, with a guest appearance from John Lee Hooker, kept his name in circulation, and another all-star recording in 2001, Along for the Ride, reinforced the attention as it assembled guitarists Billy Gibbons, Otis Rush, Jonny Lang, Steve Miller, and Jeff Healy in the service of Mayall’s music.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberger); Larkin; Santelli
Thompson, D. “John Mayall: The Legends of the London Years.” Goldmine 24 (July 3, 1998): 16–20.

Discography: AMG

MAYES, PETE

b. 1938; TX

Pete Mayes grew up in the all-black community of Double Bayou, a tiny hamlet of independent sharecroppers on the border between Texas and Louisiana. Though isolated, the town had a dance hall owned by Mayes's uncle, Manuel Rivers, that was the hub of social activity on weekends. Little more than an oversized corral with a tin roof, the dance hall nonetheless attracted some of the biggest names in blues including Big Joe Turner and Gate-mouth Brown. Mayes was allowed to attend the shows in the company of his uncle. Watching the musicians with keen interest, he would later rig up pieces of wire and pretend to play guitar. His uncle encouraged his interest, introducing him to the various musicians who ran the circuit. Another uncle, Earl Rivers, bought Mayes his first guitar when the boy turned fourteen, and took him to a T-Bone Walker performance at Club 90 in Ames, Texas, in 1951. In 1954, Mayes played his first show at Double Bayou Dancehall, and by 1956 he was playing Club 90. In that year, Mayes met and sat in with Walker at a gig in Crosby, Texas. By 1959 Mayes and the Texas Houserockers, a quintet of bass, drums, piano, alto saxophone, and guitar, had a regular spot on Van's nightclub in Houston. A small but groundbreaking tour of South America backing Gate-mouth Brown followed; upon returning to the United States, however, Mayes found that he had been drafted into the army.

After his army service ended in 1963, Mayes re-formed the Texas Houserockers, but dissolved it again in 1966 to tour with Junior Parker; they toured the chitlin circuit until Parker's death in 1970. Mayes played on Parker's 1968 sessions for Mercury/Blue Rock, and cut his first single on Ovide in 1969. After Parker's death, Mayes considered regrouping the Houserockers, but accepted an offer to front Grady Gaines and his Texas Upsetters instead. In 1972, Mayes again re-formed the Houserockers, and in 1974 entered a long and fruitful association with Bill Doggett, who introduced Mayes to an adoring European audience. A tour of Europe in 1978, and the popularity of a documentary film about T-Bone Walker featuring Mayes led to an appearance at Holland's Utrecht Festival in 1984. Mayes recorded two albums while with Doggett in Paris, and released two albums on the Dutch Double Trouble label. In recent years, complications from diabetes have caused Mayes to curtail his performance schedule, though the Houserockers still exist with some of the players having been members for thirty years. Mayes operates the Double Bayou Dancehall where he started more than forty years earlier; he took it over after his uncle passed away in 1983.

JOHN OTIS

Bibliography

- Larkin
Howard, Aaron. "Pete Mayes' Double Bayou Dancehall."
Living Blues no. 116 (July/August 1994): 38–43.

Discography: LSFP

MAYFIELD, CURTIS

- b. 3 June 1942; Chicago, IL
d. 26 December 1999; Roswell, GA

Singer, guitarist, songwriter, and producer. Mayfield began singing in gospel groups. His soulful falsetto vocals launched many hits with the Impressions in 1958–1970. His songwriting reflected his passion for racial and social justice, and opened the way for more socially conscious directions in black music. Superfly (1972) achieved a near-perfect blend of music and message. Mayfield adapted to funk in the 1970s, and continued to make albums that reflected his social concerns. He produced albums for Aretha Franklin, the Staple Singers, and others. Mayfield moved to Atlanta in the early 1980s and re-formed the Impressions in 1983. Although paralyzed in a freak stage accident in 1990, he continued to compose and record.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- Hoskney, Barney. From a Whisper to a Scream. London: Fontana, 1991.
Werner, Craig. A Change Is Gonna Come. New York: Plume, 1998.

Discography

With the Impressions

- Keep on Pushing* (1964, Paramount 493).
People Get Ready (1965, Paramount 505).

Solo

- Curtis* (1970, Curtom 8005).
Curtis Live! (1971, Curtom 8008).
Roots (1971, Curtom 8009).
Superfly (1972, Curtom 8014).
Back to the World (1973, Curtom 8015).
Got to Find a Way (1974, Curtom 8604).
There's No Place Like America Today (1975, Curtom 5001).
Sweet Exorcist (1976, Curtom 8601).
Never Say You Can't Survive (1977, Curtom 56352).
Take It to the Street (1990, Curtom 2008).
New World Order (1996, Warner Brothers 46348).

MAYFIELD, PERCY

b. 12 August 1920; Minden, LA
 d. 11 August 1984; Los Angeles, CA

Singer, songwriter. Mayfield created some of the genre's most emotionally evocative songs. His expressive voice frequently explored the dark side of romance, dwelling on the pain and suffering of lost and/or unrequited love. The sensitivity of his lyrics and the deep emotion he infused into his singing made Mayfield's music unusually popular with both sexes, a fact affirmed by its place at the core of the modern blues ballad repertoire.

Mayfield was based in Houston in his early music business endeavors but the lure of the West Coast recording industry caused him to relocate to Los Angeles in 1942. He was determined to be heard as a vocalist but it was his songwriting abilities that initially attracted record company attention. Upon his arrival in California he was in almost immediate demand as a composer, yet was unable to get into the studio to perform his own material. His recording break finally came when Supreme Records let him do a song, "Two Years of Torture," he had written for Jimmy Witherspoon to sing.

Once Mayfield was heard singing his own material, his true potential as a recording artist was obvious and a minor bidding war broke out for his services. Mayfield ultimately signed with Specialty Records and the potential was rapidly transformed into success. Mayfield's poignant renditions of his original ballads, featuring multilayered horn arrangements, became radio favorites as he released seven top ten hits in three years, including the classic "Please Send Me Somebody to Love" in 1950 and "Lost Love" a year later.

But Mayfield's considerable career momentum was brought to a sudden and tragic halt in 1952 when an auto accident left him with serious injuries and a disfigured face. He eventually continued recording, moving on to the Imperial and Chess labels in the mid- to late 1950s, but the hits were harder to come by. With his live performances severely curtailed, Mayfield devoted much of his time in the 1960s to writing for Ray Charles, composing a series of hit songs, including the crossover pop success "Hit the Road Jack," for the bandleader. He also recorded several sessions for Charles's Tangerine record label.

Mayfield's songs remained in circulation on blues bandstands and recording sessions even as he retreated from public view. As succinctly stated by New Orleans vocalist Johnny Adams, who recorded Walking on a Tightrope, a Mayfield tribute album, "Percy's music will always be on the scene." In his last years Mayfield did perform around the San Francisco area in the early 1980s, making several festival appearances and doing a series of live radio broadcasts for keyboardist/deejay Mark Naftalin that were later released on CD.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
 Shurman, Dick. "Living Blues Interview." Living Blues no. 50 (Spring 1981): 12-25.

Discography: AMG; Lord; LSFPMAYS, CURLEY

b. 26 November 1938; Maxie (Acadia Parish), LA

Popular Texas guitarist (now retired) whose career was spent primarily as a touring performer and club act throughout the soul-blues circuit in America's South. Nephew of Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown, Mays is a self-taught musician whose skills as an electric blues guitarist are augmented by a broad performance repertoire (including blues, soul, rock, country and western, and Spanish selections) and such show-stopping techniques as playing his instrument with his toes. By extension, May's guitar style, while grounded in Texas blues, reflects a number of popular influences. Growing up in Beaumont, Texas, Mays began performing in clubs both locally and in Houston as a teenager. From 1959 to 1963, he toured with the Etta James Revue throughout the United States. Subsequently, Mays continued to work as a touring sideman for other bands and acts throughout the 1960s, including the Tina Turner Show, the James Brown Show, and the Five Royales. In later years, he continued to perform club dates in the Houston and San Antonio areas of Texas.

DAVID BEAUDOUIN

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
 Eagle, Bob. "Curley Mays." Living Blues no. 15 (Winter 1973/1974): 27-28.
 "Tribute to the Legendary Blues Guitarist Curley Mays."
<http://www.sanantonioblues.com/curleymays/>.

MAYWEATHER, "EARRING" GEORGE

b. 27 September 1927; Tilly's Mills, AL
 d. 12 February 1995; Boston, MA

MAYWEATHER, "EARRING" GEORGE

Mayweather learned harmonica as a boy in Montgomery, Alabama. Moving to Chicago in the early 1950s, he began playing with J. B. Hutto and the drummer Porkchop, and made a significant contribution to the six sides that the trio recorded for Chance in 1954. After further years on the Chicago club circuit, during which time he received his "Earring" nickname from the deejay Big Bill Hill, he moved to Boston, where he flew the flag for Chicago-style blues and cut a backward-looking but sturdy album titled Whup It! Whup It! (1992, Tone-Cool).

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Larkin
Brisbin, John Anthony. "Earring George Mayweather" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 121 (May/June 1995): 63–64.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

McCain, Jerry "Boogie"

b. 19 June 1930; Gadsden, AL

A lifelong resident of Gadsden, Alabama, musician and songwriter Jerry McCain began playing the harmonica at age five, inspired by his uncles and the recordings of John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson and Brownie McGhee. He was later influenced by the amplified harmonica style of Little Walter, and sat in with the innovative musician during a Gadsden gig around 1953. McCain caught the attention of Lillian McMurry of Trumpet Records after submitting a demo to the label. Two recording sessions followed in 1953 and 1954 that resulted in two singles under the name Jerry "Boogie" McCain. A brief association with Trumpet label-mate Aleck "Sonny Boy Williamson II" Miller while recording in Jackson, Mississippi, provided him with further inspiration. From 1955 to 1957, McCain recorded for Excello and produced such exciting blues rockers as "That's What They Want" and "My Next Door Neighbor."

He recorded his best-known composition, "She's Tough," in 1960 for the Rex label, which was popularized by the Fabulous Thunderbirds when the group covered it twenty years later. The song was typical of McCain's engaging blues style of combining witty and often humorous lyrics punctuated by his fat-toned, amplified harmonica work. He recorded throughout the next two decades for a number of labels including Okeh, Jewel, Continental, and Gas. From the late 1980s through the turn of the century, McCain continued to perform both in the United States and internationally, and had releases on Ichiban, Jericho/Cello, and his own Boogie Down label, each featuring his prolific songwriting skills on topical themes ranging from drug abuse to the benefits of Viagra.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl and Al Campbell); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Nelson, David. "Jerry McCain: I Got to Sing the Blues." Living Blues no. 113 (February 1994): 8–19.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Jerry McCain: Good Stuff! (1999, Varese Vintage CD VSD-6022).
This Stuff Just Kills Me (2000, Jericho/Cello CD 90005-2).

McCall, Cash

b. Morris or Maurice Dollison, Jr., 28 January 1941; New Madrid, MO

McCall began his music career as a gospel singer performing under his birth name with a variety of different gospel acts, including the Gospel Songbirds with Otis Clay. After relocating to Chicago, he began performing and recording secular R&B material in the early 1960s, and took his stage name in 1966—scoring his only real hit that same year with "When You Wake Up." In the years since, McCall has expanded from R&B to also perform straight-ahead electric blues, and has stayed active as a guitarist/singer and songwriter, performing frequently as a member of the Chicago Rhythm & Blues Kings.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Waterhouse, Jon, and David Nelson. "Cash McCall: A Refugee from the Cotton Field." Living Blues no. 103 (May/June 1992): 18–23.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

No More Doggin' (1983, re-released 1995, Evidence 26065).
Cash Up Front (1987, Stony Plain 1945).

McClain, Mary "Diamond Teeth"

b. Mary Smith, 27 August 1902; Huntington, WV
d. 4 April 2000; St. Petersburg, FL

Classic-era gospel and blues singer; half-sister of Bessie Smith. Played in minstrel shows, nightclubs, and USO tours. Relaunched career with a series of recordings in the 1990s; continued performing until shortly before her death.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

- Bonner, Brett. "Obituaries." Living Blues no. 152 (July/August 2000): 118.
 Tilling, Robert. "Amazing Grace: The Life and Times of Diamond Teeth Mary." Blues & Rhythm no. 97 (1995): 9.

Discography

- If I Can't Sell It, I'm Gonna Sit on It* (1993, Big Boss Records 91003).

McCLAIN, "MIGHTY" SAM

b. 15 April 1943; Monroe, LA

Early on showing an aptitude for singing at Baptist church services and at children's parties, McClain left home as a young teenager to surround himself with music on the Deep South juke-joint circuit, initially as a valet and then as a vocalist with guitarist Little Melvin Underwood's band. After parting ways with Underwood, Good Rockin' Sam (as he called himself) was a favorite of audiences as part of the Dothan Sextet and as a featured performer at Abe's 506 Club in Pensacola, Florida. Unexpectedly, national acclaim greeted him when his soulful recording of country artist Patsy Cline's "Sweet Dreams" sold into six figures in 1966. Two years of R&B stardom followed, with appearances at Harlem's Apollo Theatre highlighting the giddy time. After record sales and his stock plummeted, McClain worked outside the music business for almost two decades. He recharged his career in the mid-1980s when he recorded with New Orleans producer Carlo Ditta, and he journeyed to Japan with former Bobby Bland guitarist Wayne Bennett for well-received concerts. McClain's rise to present-day eminence as a purveyor of soul-blues gained impetus in 1991 upon moving to Boston and hooking up with producer Joe Harley and the AudioQuest label in California. McClain has recorded on a regular basis ever since, mostly for AudioQuest and Telarc, and he has made countless performances around the country and in Europe. Ever the individualist, McClain boasts his own production and management companies, and in 2003 he started up his own record label called Mighty Music.

FRANK-JOHN HADLEY

Bibliography

- AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin
 Danchin, Sebastian. "Mighty Sam McClain: Soul Survivor." Living Blues no. 122 (July/August 1995): 40–49.

Discography: AMG

- "A Soul That's Been Abused" on Hubert Sumlin's Blues Party (1987, Black Top LP 1036).
Live in Japan (1987, Orleans 9888).
Give It Up to Love (1993, AudioQuest 1015).
Sledgehammer Soul & Down Home Blues (1996, AudioQuest 1042).
Papa True Love—The Amy Sessions (2000, Sundazed 11083).
One More Bridge to Cross (2003, Mighty Music 101).

McCLENNAN, TOMMY

b. 8 April 1908; Yazoo City, MS

d. Date unknown; Chicago, IL

Surprisingly little is known of the life of this unique singer and guitarist who recorded forty songs for Bluebird, plus a duet with his partner Robert Petway.

His contemporaries have recorded stories of him wandering and playing for local functions and bars when he occasionally teamed up with David "Honeyboy" Edwards for dances. He seems to have met Petway in the late 1930s and they moved to Chicago around 1939. There he recorded for Bluebird in five long sessions, while his friend Petway, who played in a more restrained style, had two sessions. Their style of collaboration can be heard on "Boogie Woogie Woman" by Petway in which McClennan is obviously the second singer.

Big Bill Broonzy recalled Tommy in his ghosted autobiography, Big Bill Blues, in which McClennan refused to change the lyrics of his "Bottle Up and Go," which recounted:

The nigger and the white man
 Playing Seven-Up
 Nigger beat the white man
 Scared to pick it up.

Broonzy warned Tommy that "nigger" was not acceptable in the north but McClennan insisted on singing it at a party, was nearly lynched, and had to escape through a window.

Yet McClennan remains one of the few instantly identifiable singers on record, with a voice similar to Charley Patton's. He rarely sang—instead he shouted, roared, laughed, and battered the lyrics, offered conversational asides, and accompanied it all with an equally eccentric guitar style that relied on heavy rhythmic patterns and repeated single notes high up the fret. He sang a number called "I'm a Guitar King" that was truly ironic—"The guitar is out of tune both with itself and with his vocals" wrote Mary Katherine Aldin. But such confidence—arrogance perhaps—was a very part of the image of a boastful, wild braggart that McClennan encouraged through his music.

His "Whiskey Head Woman" was such a big success that he created a follow-up entitled "Whiskey Head Man"— just like me and all you other whisky headed men.

He also adapted popular blues of the day such as "Sweet Home Chicago" ("Baby Don't You Want to Go" in his version) or Bukka White's recent "Shake 'Em On Down" in which he virtually copied the guitar break but instilled it with enough of the particular McClennan style to justify its retitling as "New Shake 'Em Down."

The controversial but successful "Bottle Up and Go" shows him leaving the last line of each verse to the guitar alone as Fred McDowell was to do so successfully a generation later.

In the end, McClennan was dropped by his label, Bluebird, because of his drinking. While there is a picture of him in Chicago with Elmore James, Sonny Boy Williamson, and Little Walter in 1953, it is believed he ended his life as a derelict.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O'Neal); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Brisbin, John Anthony. "Honeyboy Edwards Remembers Tommy McClennan." Living Blues no. 104 (July/August 1992): 18–23.

Discography: DGR

McCLINTON, DELBERT

b. 4 November 1940; Lubbock, TX

Exposed to blues and R&B in the 1950s, McClinton was soon working the Texas club scene, backing the likes of Howlin' Wolf and Jimmy Reed. After recording a few local hits, he reached the national charts, providing the harmonica for Bruce Channel's 1962 hit, "Hey Baby." While touring with Channel, McClinton taught the Beatles a few harmonica licks.

In the mid-1960s he had a group called the Ron Dels that produced one minor single, and later in the decade he worked the Texas bar circuit. In the early 1970s he recorded two albums with Glen Clark, and went on to secure a solo contract in 1975. Several critically acclaimed albums followed, and one of his songs, "B Movie Boxcar Blues," was recorded by the Blues Brothers.

Shortly after scoring his first major hit in 1980, "Giving It Up for Your Love," McClinton's record label dissolved, and he was soon devoting his time to touring. The year 1989 brought Live from Austin, an album that earned him his first Grammy nomination for Best Contemporary Blues Album. He won a Grammy in 1991 for his duet with Bonnie Raitt, "Good Man, Good Woman," and his album Nothing Personal won the Grammy in 2001 for Best Contemporary Blues Album. His 2002 album, Room to Breathe, also earned a Grammy nomination.

McClinton's successful combination of roadhouse blues, R&B, and country, which has been developed and refined over several decades of touring, continues to please critics and blues fans alike.

JOHN J. THOMAS

Bibliography

Cartwright, Gary. "Twenty-Five Years of One-Night Stands." Rolling Stone (May 28, 1981): 33–35, 76, 78.
Escott, Colin. Tattooed on Their Tongues: A Journey Through the Backrooms of American Music. New York: Schirmer Books, 1996.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Delbert and Glen (1972, Clean); Subject to Change (1973, Clean); Victim of Life's Circumstances (1975, ABC); Genuine Cowhide (1976, ABC); Love Rustler (1977, ABC); Second Wind (1978, Capricorn); Keeper of the Flame (1979, Capricorn); The Jealous Kind (1980, Capitol); Plain from the Heart (1981, Capitol); Live from Austin (1989, Alligator); I'm with You (1990, Curb); Never Been Rocked Enough (1992, Curb); Delbert McClinton (1993, Curb); Honky Tonkin' Blues (1994, MCA); One of the Fortunate Few (1997, Rising Tide); Nothing Personal (2001, New West Records); Room to Breathe (2002, New West Records).

McCLURE, BOBBY

b. 21 April 1942; Chicago, IL

d. 13 November 1992; Los Angeles, CA

Soul singer who began in gospel quartets and doo-wop groups in the 1950s. Much of his career was in association with Oliver Sain in East St. Louis, whether in his revue or singing for his Vanessa label. His first recording and only hit was his Checker label duet with Fontella Bass in 1965, "Don't Mess Up a Good Thing." For some years he worked outside music, including a job as corrections officer at an Illinois prison. In the late 1980s he moved to Los Angeles to revive his career, but the return was short lived due to a fatal brain aneurysm.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Greg Prato)
Greensmith, Bill. "Bobby McClure." Blues & Rhythm no. 76 (February 1993): 16–17.

Discography: AMG; Larkin

McCOY, CHARLIE

b. 26 May 1909; Jackson, MS
d. 26 July 1950; Chicago, IL

Guitarist/mandolinist Charlie McCoy was a sideman on a number of seminal blues recordings in the 1920s and 1930s, and he was one of the few important mandolin players in blues. Recordings on which McCoy's accompaniment can be heard include some by Tommy Johnson, Ishman Bracey, Memphis Minnie, and the Mississippi Mud Steppers (an offshoot of the Mississippi Sheiks). McCoy also made a few of his own recordings, and he and his brother Joe McCoy played and recorded with the Harlem Hamfats in the late 1930s.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR

McCOY, GEORGE AND ETHEL

McCoy, George

b. 11 December 1921; Booneville, MS
d. 27 April 1988; Belleville, IL

McCoy, Ethel

b. 14 September 1923; Booneville, MS
d. 18 September 1991; St. Clair County, IL

Brother and sister rural blues duo who were raised in Memphis and East St. Louis. Their uncles were Joe McCoy and Charlie McCoy. Their repertory consisted of prewar blues and other African American songs. Recordings of them appeared on the Library of Congress, Adelphi, and Swingmaster labels.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

O'Shaughnessy, Mark. "George McCoy." Living Blues no. 82 (September/October 1988): 38.

Discography: LSFP

McCOY, "KANSAS" JOE

b. 11 May 1905; Raymond or Jackson, MS
d. 28 January 1950; Chicago, IL

Guitarist Joe McCoy is best known for his work as an accompanist on a number of prewar blues recordings. He made numerous recordings with his wife Memphis Minnie from 1929 until 1934, and the duo were instrumental in helping to establish the urban blues style of the 1930s. After the couple divorced, McCoy played and recorded with the Harlem Hamfats (also featuring his brother Charlie McCoy) in the late 1930s. He later worked with his groups, Big Joe and His Washboard Band and Big Joe and His Rhythm, until the mid-1940s. Other pseudonyms under which McCoy recorded include Kansas Joe and Mississippi Mudder.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: DGR; LSFP

McCOY, ROBERT EDWARD

b. 31 March 1910; Aliceville, AL
d. 1978; Birmingham, AL

Pianist who was part of the circle of Birmingham musicians who recorded in the 1930s. He recorded as accompanist in 1937 in ARC label sessions for Charlie Campbell, Guitar Slim, and Peanut the

McCOY, ROBERT EDWARD

Kidnapper. He continued to perform until his death, and he recorded in sessions supervised by Birmingham collector Pat Cather.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Alex Henderson); Harris; Larkin
Eagle, Bob. "Obituaries: Robert McCoy." Living Blues no. 43 (Summer 1979): 49.

Discography: AMG; DGR (as accompanist); LSFP

McCOY, ROSE MARIE

b. 1922

Rose Marie McCoy is one of the most prolific rhythm and blues songwriters and, more importantly, one of the few successful women. With more than seven hundred songs to her credit, she was most successful on the charts in the 1950s, several times in collaboration with the equally successful and prolific Charles Singleton. Together, they penned "Mambo Baby" for Ruth Brown (1955) an "If I May" for Nat King Cole (1955). McCoy also created hits for Nappy Brown, "Don't Be Angry," and one of the signature pieces of material for Big Maybelle, "Gabbin' Blues" (1953). On the latter piece, McCoy interjected sharp-tongued rejoinders to the assertive lyric performed by the vocalist.

She wrote for rock acts as well, particularly Elvis Presley, who performed her "I Beg of You" on his Stereo '57 album.

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

Brown, John. "Almost Every Station Would Be Playing a Singleton-McCoy Tune!": The Story of Rose Marie McCoy." Juke Blues no. 26 (Summer 1992): 8-15.

Discography: LSFP

McCOY, VIOLA

b. ca. 1900; Shelby County, MS

d. ca. 1956; Albany, NY

Singer. McCoy appeared in revues and clubs in the 1920s. Sixty-three issued records (1923-1929), including "I'm Savin' It All for You"/"Papa, If You Can't Do Better" (1926, Cameo 1066), show her among the finest vaudeville-blues singers. She retired in 1938.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Harris
Rye, Howard. Notes to Viola McCoy: Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vols. 1-3 (1995, Document DOCD5416/7/8, Vienna).

Discography: DGR

McCRACKLIN, JIMMY

b. 13 August 1921; St. Louis, MO

Expressive and distinctive vocalist, pianist, and occasionally harmonica player, as well as prolific songwriter, McCracklin showed a remarkable ability throughout his career to adapt his style to prevailing fashions without losing his identity. He was greatly influenced by Walter Davis and also cites Roosevelt Sykes and Memphis Slim as contributors to his style. His earliest recordings (1945-1948) were for small Los Angeles labels like Globe, Excelsior, W & W, and Courtney and by and large he only sang, leaving piano duties to men like J. D. Nicholson. A move to Richmond led to a meeting with Robert Kelton and the formation of his first band, the Blues Blasters. Contact with Bob Geddins led to recordings for Cava-Tone (one of which was picked up by Aladdin), Down Town, and Trilon (1948). Through Geddins McCracklin was signed by the Bihari brothers in Los Angeles and from 1949 to 1950 he appeared on their RPM and Modern labels and gained wider recognition. In 1951 he gained a new guitarist in Lafayette Thomas and moved to the Swing Time label and then (from 1952 to 1954) he was with Peacock Records of Houston. The year 1954 saw him back with Modern and in 1956 he recorded for Hollywood and then for the small Irma label.

His career seemed to be heading downward but he bounced back in the next year, joining Chess/Checker in Chicago, and in 1958 achieved his first chart hit with the novelty dance number "The Walk," which was a hit on both the R&B and pop charts. He continued to record for Chess but no more hits were forthcoming and after a session for Peacock he switched to the Mercury label for whom he recorded from 1958 to 1960 without any great success. Another retreat to the small Oakland labels led to recordings in 1961 for Gedinson's and his own Art-Tone and Premium labels. This yielded two more chart hits with “Just Got to Know” and “Shame, Shame, Shame.” The former was picked up by Imperial and, after a Chess session in 1962, McCracklin became an Imperial and later Minit and Liberty artist, recording prolifically from 1962 to 1970 and having hits with “Think,” “My Answer,” and “Come on Home.”

His career continued thereafter on a lower level, but he still performed and recorded when the opportunity arose. Albums for Stax in 1971, JSP (recorded by Lunar Records), and Leon Haywood’s Evejim label (1988), as well as singles on his own Voice and Oak City labels, kept his name before the public, and then he joined the Bullseye Blues label, which issued two albums (1990 and 1994). Finally in 1997 a Gunsmoke album issued some new tracks along with some reissues. His songwriting talents should not be ignored—he wrote much of his own material, showing perceptive understanding of the human condition as well as great wit, and also provided hits for others, notably “Tramp,” which put Lowell Fulson, Otis Redding and Carla Thomas, and Salt-n-Pepa into the charts.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
DeWitt, H. A. “Jimmy McCracklin.” Rock & Blues News no. 3 (April/May 1999): 15–20; no. 4 (May–June 1999): 29–32; no. 5 (August/September 1999): 23–26; no. 6 (October/November 1999) 27–30.
Feld, David. “Jimmy McCracklin Walks the Walk.” Blues Access no. 20 (Winter 1995): 40–44.
Notini, Per, and Ulf Carlsson. “Living Blues Interview: Jimmy McCracklin.” Living Blues no. 62 (Winter 1984): 2–13.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

See also Aladdin/Score; Big Town; Chess/Aristocrat/Checker/Argo/Cadet; Davis, Walter; Duke/Peacock/Back Beat; Excelsior/Exclusive; Fulson, Lowell; Geddins, Bob; Imperial; Irma; JSP; Memphis Slim; Mercury/Fontana/Keynote/Blue Rock; Modern/Flair/Meteor/Kent/RPM; Nicholson, James David “J. D.”; Oakland; Stax/Volt; Swing Time/Down Beat; Sykes, Roosevelt; Thomas, Lafayette Jerl “Thing”; Trilon

McCRAI, LARRY

b. 5 April 1960; Magnolia or Stephens, AR

Guitar, vocals, composer. Larry McCray learned guitar and the blues from his sister Clara, who brought him to Saginaw, Michigan, in 1972. McCray emerged as a national attraction in 1991 with his powerful, emotive guitar, vocals, and compositions. He worked with John Snyder, Mike Vernon, John Primer, James Cotton, Lucky Peterson, and Derek Trucks.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Barclay, Robert. “Larry McCray.” Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 60–63.

Discography: AMG

McDANIEL, CLARA “BIG”

b. 26 November 1953; Pontiac, MI

Singer. Learned piano as a child, with early exposure to blues and sacred music through her family. Moved to St. Louis in 1966. In the 1970s she performed with Albert King, Big Bad Smitty, and Big George Brock. In 1997 HighTone released her CD Unwanted Child (HighTone 1002).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Gilmore, Lea. “Clara McDaniel.” Blues Access no. 32 (Winter 1998): 20–25.

McDANIEL, FLOYD

b. 21 July 1915; Athens, AL
d. 22 July 1995; Chicago, IL

Jump guitarist and vocalist who appeared at the 1933 Chicago World’s Fair and Harlem’s Cotton Club. With the Four (and Five) Blazes he recorded for Aristocrat and United (reissued on Delmark), which yielded the 1952 hit “Mary Jo.” In the 1990s, he recorded remarkable comeback CDs for Delmark backed by Dave Clark’s Blues Swingers, and Dave Specter.

JUSTIN O’BRIEN

Bibliography

- AMG (Alex Henderson)
Brisbin, John Anthony. “A Tribute to Floyd McDaniel.” Living Blues no. 123 (September/October 1995): 45.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

- Floyd McDaniel and the Blues Swingers. Let Your Hair Down (Delmark DE-671).
The Four Blazes. Mary Jo (Delmark DE-704).

McDANIEL, HATTIE

McDANIEL, HATTIE

b. 10 June 1895; Wichita, KS
d. 26 October 1952; Hollywood, CA

Vocalist. Best known as a film star, especially for Gone with the Wind (1939), she recorded blues for Meritt, OKeh, and Paramount (1926–1929), including “Quittin’ My Man Today”/“Brown-Skin Baby Doll” (1926, Meritt 2202). Occasionally sang with jazz bands in the 1940s.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Harris; Southern

Discography: DGR

McDOWELL, FRED

b. 12 January 1904; Rossville, TN
d. 3 July 1972; Memphis, TN

Country blues singer, guitarist, and songwriter who recorded mostly during the 1960s. Although he was nicknamed Mississippi Fred McDowell, this bluesman was born in Tennessee, and lived in Memphis for more than thirty years before moving to Como, Mississippi. He worked at various factories and farms, and played guitar at weekend dances.

Fred McDowell was discovered by folklorists Alan Lomax and Shirley Collins in May 1959. Fred McDowell learned bottleneck guitar from his uncle; he played slide with a rib steak’s bone, and later with a real piece of glass taken from a bottle. Fred McDowell usually played on an acoustic guitar and covered blues standards like “Baby Please Don’t Go,” “Good Morning Little School Girl,” “Shake ’Em On Down.”

McDowell’s song “You Gotta Move” was covered by the Rolling Stones on their 1971 album Sticky Fingers and appeared in their film Gimme Shelter (1970) as well as on their Love You Live album (1977). Jazz singer Cassandra Wilson also covered “You Gotta Move” on her CD Belly of the Sun (2002). McDowell himself recorded three versions of the song: acoustic (1965), electric (1971), and with the Hunter’s Chapel Singers of Como, Mississippi (1966).

Fred McDowell died of cancer on July 3, 1972.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Welding, Pete. “Fred McDowell Interview.” Blues Unlimited no. 24 (July/August 1965).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Lomax, Alan; Rolling Stones; Shake ’Em On Down

McGEE, CLEO “BIG BO” b. 9 October 1928; Green County, AL

d. 3 March 2002; Eutaw, AL

Raised by his grandmother Emma G. Williams, the ten-year-old Bo McGee made his performance debut playing harmonica at Kid Hall, in Electric Mills, Mississippi. McGee credited his grandmother as being his greatest mentor. His other major early influences included Little Walter, Blind Lemon Jefferson, Eddie Arnold, Tex Ritter, and Jimmy Rogers.

DEBBIE BOND

Discography

Moody Swamp Blues (1995, Alabama Blues Project).
Blues from the Heart of Dixie (2002, Taxim Records).
Live at the Train Station (Vent Records Compilation).
To the Blues (Vent Records Compilation).

McGEE, REVEREND F. W.

b. Ford Washington McGee, 5 October 1890; Winchester, TN
d. 1971

Drummer and preacher. Raised in Hillsboro, Texas. McGee converted to the Church of God in Christ and began preaching in 1920. His activity included establishing congregations in Kansas, Iowa, Oklahoma, and Illinois. He made several energetic sanctified music recordings in 1927–1930, initially with pianist Arizona Dranes, later with his own group, and he also made sermon records. He remained active in the church for the rest of his life.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Discography: DGR

McGHEE, BROWNIE

b. Walter Brown McGhee, 30 November 1915; Knoxville, TN
d. 16 February 1996; Oakland, CA

Brownie McGhee was an East Coast acoustic guitar player and singer, who teamed with harmonica player Sonny Terry during four decades.

McGhee's father, George "Duff" McGhee, was a carpenter during the day and a musician by vocation. There were four other children besides Brownie. McGhee contracted poliomyelitis at the age of four; consequently, his right leg was shorter than the left. He played a five-string banjo, a ukulele, and even studied piano, but he focused on the acoustic guitar. Brownie McGhee left school at age thirteen. From his debut, Brownie had occasionally played with his brother, guitarist Granville "Sticks" McGhee, who is remembered because he composed the famous boogie song "Drinkin' Wine Spo-Dee-O-Dee."

McGhee met harp player Sonny Terry in 1939; a few months later they formed a prolific acoustic blues duo that would last four decades. Under the name Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee (and sometimes the other way round), they recorded and toured extensively. Their light, exuberant, funny songs were a popular alternative to the deep blues. They borrowed from country blues, Piedmont blues, folk, and sometimes R&B. The artists that influenced them include Leadbelly, Woody Guthrie, and Big Bill Broonzy.

In 1941, Brownie McGhee began his recording career as a successor to Blind Boy Fuller (who had just passed away). Fuller's manager, J. B. Long, nicknamed McGhee "Blind Boy Fuller #2" and identified him as such on posters and recordings; he even wanted his "Blind Boy Fuller #2" to play with the former's old guitar in order to keep the same sound.

From the mid-1940s to the late 1950s, McGhee recorded for Folkways, either with or without Sonny Terry, sometimes with other musicians. Since McGhee simultaneously signed exclusive contracts for two or more competitive labels, he sometimes recorded under various pseudonyms, including Spider Sam, Big Tom Collins, Tennessee Gable, Tennessee Gabriel, Brother George, Henry Johnson, and Blind Boy Williams.

In 1973, Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee released an LP featuring many musicians (plus drums and piano) and "polished" arrangements, titled Sonny and Brownie, which had exceptional visibility, due to wide distribution by A&M Records. At that time, it was one of the only blues records that could be found in department stores. Among the guests were Arlo Guthrie (on Randy Newman's "Sail Away"), John Mayall, and John Hammond.

In 1982, the duet broke up, after years of conflicts, sometimes occurring on stage. Both artists went their separate ways, with McGhee recording with other musicians such as harp player Sugar Blue. Brownie McGhee died of cancer on February 16, 1996, in Oakland, ten years after Sonny Terry. Both McGhee's solo efforts as well as the joyful music and fine vocal harmonies in his work with Terry helped bring the Piedmont blues to a wider audience.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 Bastin, Bruce. "Truckin' My Blues Away. East Coast Piedmont Styles." In Nothing But the Blues. The Music and the Musicians, edited by Lawrence Cohn, pp. 205–231. New York, Abbeville Press, 1993.
 Elmes, Barry. "Living Blues Interview: Brownie McGhee." Living Blues no. 13 (Summer 1973): (with Sonny Terry) 14–18; (by himself) 18–23.
 McGhee, Brownie. Blues & Rhythm: The Gospel Truth no. 105 (December 1995).

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

See also Fuller, Blind Boy; Leadbelly; McGhee, Granville "Sticks"; Terry, Sonny

MCGHEE, GRANVILLE "STICKS"

- b. 23 March 1918; Kingsport, TN
 d. 15 August 1961; New York City, NY

Singer of blues and R&B, whose 1949 rendition of "Drinkin' Wine Spo-Dee-O-Dee" was a hit that helped to establish the fledgling Atlantic label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSFP

MCGILL, ROLLEE

- b. 29 December 1934; Kingstree, SC
 d. 11 October 2000; Philadelphia, PA

Tenor saxophonist whose most famous solo was that heard in the Silhouettes' "Get a Job" in 1958. As a singer himself, he had a hit with "There Goes That Train" for Piney Records in 1955. He performed through the 1980s. The Bear Family label collected his solo material for reissue in 1999.

McGILL, ROLLEE

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder)

Broven, John, and Richard Tapp. "The Story of Rollo McGill: Rhythm Rockin' Man." Juke Blues no. 51 (Summer 2002): 14–19.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

McGUIRT, CLARENCE "CANDYMAN"

b. 25 January 1925; Boley, OK

d. 23 July 1979; San Francisco, CA

McGuirt took up the piano after he moved to the Bay Area in 1942 and formed his own band in the early 1950s. He had residencies at various clubs until he retired from music in the 1960s. He made one single for Irma in 1955 with vocals by Geneva Vallier.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Nations, Opal Louis, and Frank McCowan. "The Story of the Candyman McGuirt Band." Blues & Rhythm no. 182 (September 2003): 4–7.

Discography: LSFP

See also Irma; Oakland

McILWAINE, ELLEN

b. 1 October 1945; Nashville, TN

Slide guitarist and singer. Began her professional career in Atlanta in 1966, played in New York City where she encountered Jimi Hendrix and Richie Havens, then in Atlanta and Connecticut. McIlwaine is now active in Toronto. Several of her albums were recorded in collaboration with bassist Jack Bruce.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Ellen McIlwaine website, <http://www.ellenmcilwaine.com/>.

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

McKUNE, JAMES

b. ca. 1910

d. 1971; New York City, NY

White collector who since 1943 pioneered the record collecting of 1920s and 1930s Southern blues and black sacred music. Many of his want lists appeared in the 1940s in Record Changer, a magazine that was mostly devoted to jazz and classic women blues singers. He was a mentor to Pete Whelan and Bernard Klatzko, both of whom would build extensive collections of prewar blues and establish important reissue labels in the 1960s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Renard, Henry. "Letters from McKune." 78 Quarterly no. 3 (1988): 54–62.

Slotnikoff, Joel, with Kip Lornell, "Pete Whelan Interview." <http://www.bluesworld.com/PeteWhelanInterview.html>.

McMAHON, ANDREW "BLUEBLOOD"

b. 12 April 1926; Delhi, LA

d. 17 February 1984; Monroe, LA

Bassist and vocalist McMahon accompanied many Chicago blues artists including Howlin' Wolf (1960–1973). In 1973 "Blueblood" cut an album for Dharma Records to launch a solo career but failed. He also recorded for MCM in 1976.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Harris

Briggs, Keith. Andrew McMahon: Go Get My Baby (1997, Storyville STCD 8038).

O'Neal, Jim. "Andrew 'Blueblood' McMahon." Living Blues no. 59 (Spring 1984): 40.

See also Howlin' Wolf

McMULLEN, FRED

Flourished 1930s

Bottleneck slide guitarist believed to have been from Georgia. His 1933 ARC label recordings by himself and with Buddy Moss and Curley Weaver are cherished by slide guitar listeners.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: DGR

McNEELY, CECIL JAMES "BIG JAY"

b. 29 April 1927; Watts, CA

Tenor saxophone. McNeely's paint-peeling squealing and honking tone made him the torch bearer of the R&B and early rock 'n' roll scene of the 1950s and 1960s. Known for his showmanship—blowing torrid solos while on his knees or on his back, strolling through the audience, or playing a fluorescent painted saxophone that glowed in the dark. McNeely was a fixture on the Los Angeles Central Avenue scene, made his recording debut in 1948 for Savoy Records. He had his first hit in 1949 with "Deacon's Hop." In the 1950s McNeely recorded for the Exclusive, Imperial, and King's Federal subsidiary labels. In 1959 he was back on the charts with "There Is Something on Your Mind." From the 1960s to the 1980s he withdrew from music taking a job with the post office. In the 1980s, Europe's fascination with early R&B heroes brought McNeely back on the music scene. He now splits his time between living in Europe and the United States keeping an active touring and recording schedule.

DENNIS TAYLOR

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli Eckstine, Roger. "Playing for the Audience: Big Jay McNeely." Living Blues no. 93 (September/October 1993): 23–28.

Discography: AMG; Lord

McPHATTER, CLYDE LENSLEY

b. 15 November 1932; Durham, NC

d. 13 June 1972; Teaneck, NJ

Singer, composer. McPhatter's sublime high tenor and sacred music training took R&B to new heights in the 1950s. His gospel background was a given since his father was a Baptist preacher and his mother a church organist. He formed his first gospel group in New Jersey in 1945 before joining the popular Mount Lebanon Singers in New York City.

In late 1950 McPhatter teamed up with Billy Ward in the Dominoes and they scored a major hit with "Sixty Minute Man" in 1951. But after three years with the group McPhatter left the band and was signed to Atlantic Records by the label's president Ahmet Ertegun. The Drifters were built around McPhatter and the hits, such as the 1954 smash "Money Honey," proliferated. McPhatter was drafted but when he was posted in the United States he managed to keep working with the Drifters.

When McPhatter received his military discharge in 1955 he left the Drifters as well. His first solo effort was actually a duet with Ruth Brown and it became an R&B success. He hit the pop charts on his own in 1956 with "Treasure of Love" while also releasing two albums during the year. He scored his biggest hit, "A Lover's Question," in 1958 but his career appeared to peak with its success and things slid downhill afterward. He moved to England in the mid-1960s to capitalize on the popularity of classic American R&B music but returned in the early 1970s when he did his final album, Welcome Home for Decca.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin
Escott, Colin. All Roots Lead to Rock: A Bear Family Reader. New York: Schirmer, 1999.

McPHEE, TONY "T. S."

b. 22 March 1944; Humberstone, UK

Singer and guitarist in British blues-rock music. Inspired by Blues Incorporated's 1962 performance at the Marquee Club, London, he joined the Dollar-bills, which then renamed themselves the Groundhogs, and patterned their music after John Lee Hooker, who they assisted on tour in 1964–1965. The Groundhogs began switching to soul music in 1965 but soon disbanded. McPhee then co-led Herbal Mixture in 1966–1967, then played briefly in the John Dummer Blues Band in 1968. That year, at the invitation of United Artists' British division, McPhee re-formed the Groundhogs and recorded five LPs through 1972. He continues to lead his band today, mostly in the United Kingdom and the European continent.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder)

Discography: AMG (Bruce Eder)

McSHANN, JAMES COLUMBUS "JAY"

b. 12 January 1916; Muskogee, OK

Pianist, singer, and bandleader, known as "Hootie." McShann's powerful and percussive piano playing was deeply rooted in blues and boogie-woogie. Self-taught, he later attended Tuskegee Institute in the early 1930s. He performed in Kansas City from 1936, where he worked with saxophonist Buster Smith and others, then formed his own sextet and big band (the latter included Charlie Parker). McShann's first recordings were made in 1941 and featured blues singer Walter Brown, although he often sang in blues style himself. He made his New York debut with his band in 1942, then served in the Army from 1943 to 1944. He re-formed his big band on his return to New York, and performed at the Savoy and other clubs.

McShann moved to California in the late 1940s, where his small group included Jimmy Witherspoon. Upon his return to Kansas City in the early 1950s, he continued to perform throughout the Midwest, and on jazz and blues festival circuit in the United States and Europe from the late 1960s. He performed as a solo pianist and in small groups and ad hoc settings at festivals. He toured and recorded from 1979 with pianist Ralph Sutton, bassist Milt Hinton, and drummer Gus Johnson as "the last of the whorehouse piano players." He toured in 1989 with a re-creation of the music of his original big band, with arrangements by Ernie Wilkins, and performed at the opening of the Kansas City jazz museum in 1997.

McShann recorded frequently in the 1970s and 1980s on several labels in Europe, Canada, and elsewhere, both in band settings and as a solo pianist. He is featured in several documentary films, including Hootie's Blues (1978), The Last of the Blue Devils (1979), and Confessin' the Blues (1987).

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- Larkin; Santelli
Brisbin, J. A. "Jay McShann: The Intersection of Blues and Jazz." Living Blues no. 93 (1990): 31.
Chilton, John. Who's Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.
Dance, Stanley. "Jay McShann: Blue Flamekeeper." Jazz Times (March 1998): 52.
Russell, Ross. Jazz Style in Kansas City and the Southwest. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1971.

Discography: Lord; LSFP

Selected Recordings

- "Dexter Blues" (1941, Decca 8583); "Hootie Blues"/"Confessin' the Blues" (1941, Decca 8559); "Swingmatism"/"Vine Street Boogie" (1941, Decca 8570); "The Jumpin' Blues" (1942, Decca 4418); "Sepian

- Bounce" (1942, Decca 4387); McShann's Piano (1966, Capitol ST2645); Confessin' the Blues (1969, Black and Blue 33022); The Man from Muskogee (1972, Sackville 3005); The Last of the Blue Devils (1977, Atlantic 8800); Swingmatism (1982, Sackville 3046); Airmail Special (1985, Sackville 3040); Hootie's Jumpin' Blues (1996, Stony Plain 1237); Still Jumpin' the Blues (1999, Stony Plain 1254).

McTELL, BLIND WILLIE

b. William Samuel McTell, 5 May 1901; Happy Valley, Thomson, GA

d. 19 August, 1959; Milledgeville, GA

Willie Samuel McTell was the most important Georgia bluesman to be recorded. He was a songster of wide repertoire and as fine a twelve-string guitarist as ever lived. The dexterity of his playing was extraordinary, and his voice was an unusually smooth tenor. The interplay between voice and guitar also brought into the equation McTell's intelligence and wit, and it was the fusion of all of these elements that led Bob Dylan to write in a 1983 tribute song that no-one can sing the blues like Blind Willie McTell.

McTell explodes every stereotype about blues musicians. He is no roaring primitive, no Robert Johnsonesque devil-dealing womanizer. He didn't lose his sight in a juke-joint brawl or hopping a freight train. He didn't escape into music from behind a mule plow in the Delta. He didn't die violently or young. Instead, blind from birth but never behaving as if handicapped, this resourceful, articulate man became an adept professional musician who traveled widely and talked his way into an array of recording sessions.

He never achieved a hit record, but he became one of the most widely known and well-loved figures in Georgia. Working clubs and car-parks, playing to blacks and whites, tobacco workers, and college kids, Blind Willie McTell, human jukebox and local hero, enjoyed a modest career and an independent life.

He recorded prolifically from the early days of blues recording and laid down a masterpiece on his first day in a studio, in 1927. In the mid-1930s, as the Depression gripped, he dropped from sight. In 1940 John Lomax's wife spotted him playing in Atlanta, and he was recorded singing and talking for the Library of Congress. He was paid a dollar and his taxi fare and dropped from sight once more: just another blind singer, and now turning forty.

He survived, and managed a return to commercial recording in 1949-1950, with sessions for Atlantic Records and Fred Mendelson's small label Regal.

Blind Willie McTell. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

By now there was no market for his prewar acoustic blues style. Muddy Waters had already electrified Chicago. McTell disappeared once again. He was recorded, privately, one more time, in 1956 (by which time rock 'n' roll was shaking up the blues in yet another way) and he died in obscurity in 1959—the very year his “Statesboro Blues” became a “discovery” of the new folk and blues revival movement. It would become a million-selling hit by the Allman Brothers Band (also from Georgia) in the 1970s.

No inferior shellac crackle dooms Blind Willie McTell to the ranks of the almost unlistenable. His prewar recordings, like his diction, are clear as a bell, while the best of his lyrics show him to be an inspired individual composer within a milieu of shared, communal composition. Even where his lyrics are commonstock, the early voice is quietly pained and intimate.

This is evident on “Mama ‘Tain’t Long fo’ Day,” the gem from McTell’s debut day in the studio, October 18, 1927. Early on, McTell tended to make songs more by putting together stock couplets of blues lyric poetry than by conscious composition. Yet here, though the great opening lines of verses 1, 3, and 4

Wake up mama, don’t you sleep so hard,
Blues grabbed me at midnight, didn’t turn me loose till day,

and

The big star falling, mama ‘tain’t long ‘fore day derive from early vaudeville women performers and Blind Lemon Jefferson, he reworks them into a song of real individuality, made unforgettable by his voice and playing. A universe of communication seems held in tension between the exquisite keening of his bottleneck guitar and the vulnerable, edgy hope in his voice.

It’s easy to hear too why “Statesboro Blues” became much loved: This 1928 recording is so rock ‘n’ roll. The lyrics are full of expressions baby boomers will recognize from Jerry Lee Lewis records and the like:

Sister got ‘em . . . brother got ‘em. . .

and

hand me my travelin’ shoes.

In truth these come from old hokum songs and gospel, but McTell propels them forward with fresh exuberance. The record’s abrupt start signals its restlessness. It is as if McTell had begun before the machinery was ready and the first notes of the tumbling opening phrase are missing.

Woody Mann wrote of McTell’s idiosyncratic genius on the twelve-string guitar: “He treats each phrase of his music as a separate entity with its own rhythmical and melodic nuances. . . . As McTell’s musical stream-of-consciousness wanders, so do his bar structures; he may follow a verse of ten bars with another of fourteen.” It’s debatable whether McTell represents a Piedmont “school” of guitarists, but there’s no doubting his distinctive mastery of a difficult instrument. His is always uncannily well tuned, evincing a great sense of pitch, and he can make it do anything—on “Atlanta Strut” he has it imitate mandolin, bass, cornet, and trombone. He also played other instruments: harmonica and accordion. Later he experimented with electric guitar, and still owned one at the time of his death.

McTell mastered a number of styles and he could adopt a different accent for a particular recording. When he cut “Motherless Children Have a Hard Time” for Atlantic Records in 1949, he made it a memorial to his long-dead friend Blind Willie Johnson by a sustained imitation of both Johnson’s voice and the distinctive atmosphere of Johnson’s recordings. On “Hillbilly Willie’s Blues” in 1935 he indulged his penchant for wry impersonations of the hillbilly singers who lived in the Appalachian hills above his native Georgia plains: a talent first glimpsed on his debut session's "Stole Rider Blues," the finest record Jimmie Rodgers never made.

McTell attended to white musicians as well as singers. "Warm It Up to Me" (1933) may have been a rewrite of any one of a number of similar songs, but noticeably it resembles white veteran guitarist Jimmie Tarleton's "Ooze Up to Me," cut in Atlanta eighteen months earlier.

As well as being a friend of Blind Willie Johnson and good friends over a long period with fellow Georgians Curley Weaver and Buddy Moss, with whom he recorded, McTell reportedly knew Leadbelly, Blind Blake, Lemon Jefferson, Georgia Tom, and sometime partner Tampa Red. Their hit "It's Tight Like That" was adapted on record by McTell and Weaver as "It's a Good Little Thing," as was "You Can't Get Stuff No More," while their "Beedle Um Bum" was remembered by McTell nearly thirty years later at his "last session." He also knew and heard many performers who never recorded—among them the guitarist brothers Jonas and Hollis Brown from Atlanta.

For McTell it paid to be able to perform different sorts of material at different sorts of gigs, but he took pride in being a songster, knew all about the history of his material and felt deep affection for many kinds of song. Equally, he felt entitled to reshape them. As he says of "Dyin' Crapshooter's Blues," "I had to steal music from every which way to get it to fit." He also said, of others' songs he performed, like Blind Blake's "That Will Never Happen No More," "I jump 'em from other writers but I arrange 'em my way."

Few documents exist about McTell, and some that do, such as his marriage and death certificates, contain false or misleading information. His very surname dissolves and re-forms as it is scrutinized. His father's name was McTear or McTier, and members of his family swapped between these spellings. His professional pseudonyms included Pig 'n' Whistle Red, Hot Shot Willie, Georgia Bill, Barrelhouse Sammy, and Blind Sammie. Among friends he seems to have been known as Willie in Atlanta but in Thomson and Statesboro as Doog or Doogie.

Early on, he ran away from home: "I run away and went everywhere, everywhere I could go without any money. I followed shows all around till I begin to get grown . . . medicine shows, carnivals, and all different types of funny little shows." His recorded songs mention seven towns in Georgia, Baltimore, Birmingham, Boston, East St. Louis, Florida, Lookout Mountain, Memphis, Newport News, Niagara Falls,

New York, Ohio, Tennessee, and Virginia. He also knew New Orleans. Kate McTell says he once took her to Oakland, California, and in 1935 the two of them recorded in Chicago.

Willie told Kate: "Baby, I was born a Rambler. I'm gonna ramble till I die." However, McTell's romantic rambling spirit has probably been overstressed, and it seems clear now that McTell spent the very great majority of his time within Georgia, and that his traveling was mainly following the tobacco markets—he had grown up in Statesboro, an important tobacco town—and playing to winter tourists in Florida. Late in life his traveling routine centered around church concerts in the patches of Georgia he knew best and where he had relatives with whom he stayed recurrently throughout his life. He was a member of churches in Atlanta, Statesboro, and Happy Valley, and often performed at church concerts, sometimes with gospel quartets. At WGST in Atlanta he sang spirituals on the air in the early 1950s, as he did for WEAS in nearby Decatur.

His country-gospel sides can delight: "Pearly Gates" (Atlantic), "Hide Me in Thy Bosom," and "Sending Up My Timber" (Regal) make a thrilling trio. McTell was alive with conviction for these performances, while his Library of Congress session gives us a fond reminiscence about "those old-fashioned hymns" his parents used to sing around the house before going out to work in the fields. McTell sings material like "I Got to Cross the River Jordan" without melodrama and with great simplicity.

For all his efforts, and the extraordinary quality of his talent, Blind Willie McTell's career was doomed. By the time he was fifty, to the extent that he was known at all, it was as an old Atlanta street musician. McTell does not seem to have become embittered, though he drank, at times heavily, and suffered health problems.

Helen Edwards, with whom McTell had lived for at least fourteen years—far longer than with Kate, who has received all the attention by having survived to be interviewed in the 1970s—died in November 1958. The following spring McTell had a stroke, and moved back to Thomson to live with relatives. For a while his health improved and he played guitar again. But suddenly in summer his health deteriorated again and he was admitted to Milledgeville State Hospital (a mental hospital). He died there one week later, on August 19, 1959, of "cerebral hemorrhages."

He was buried at Jones Grove Baptist Church, in Happy Valley, south of Thomson. Kate McTell learned of the funeral too late to fulfill his request that one of his guitars be buried with him. This was not the only slip-up. The stonemason mixed up the name of the person who'd commissioned it with that of the person it was to commemorate, so Blind Willie's gravestone offered us one last pseudonym. It read EDDIE McTIER 1898–AUG 19 1959 AT REST.

The Jones Grove Baptist church has now been rebuilt in concrete, and David Fulmer, who directed the documentary film Blind Willie's Blues, has paid to replace McTell's gravestone with a new one, with a large picture of a guitar below the inscription BLUES LEGEND 'BLIND WILLIE McTELL' BORN WILLIE SAMUEL McTIER MAY 5, 1901 DIED AUGUST 19, 1959.

Since his death the reemergence of his many recordings has shown that McTell was one of the blues world's consummate artists. Little of his influence shows in contemporary music. Unlike some of the Delta stars, he is not a father of rock 'n' roll, but points backward into an earlier world. Nevertheless, a well-kept secret among blues and folk fans in Britain and America since the 1950s, Blind Willie McTell is the last unrecognized superstar of the blues. His biography, Hand Me My Travelin' Shoes, by Michael Gray, is due out in 2006. It represents the first new research into his life since work by David Evans and his family in the 1970s, and will yield new information about McTell's life.

MICHAEL GRAY

Bibliography

- AMG (Bruce Eder); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Evans, David. "Blind Willie McTell." Essay published as part of the booklet by Evans and Bruce Bastin issued with Atlanta Blues 1933 (LP, JEMF-106), issued by the John Edwards Memorial Foundation, 1979.
Gray, Michael. Hand Me My Travelin' Shoes: In the Footsteps of Blind Willie McTell. London: Bloomsbury Publishing, June 2006.
Mann, Woody. Liner notes by Stephen Calt and John Miller for Blind Willie McTell 1927–1935 (1973, Yazoo L-1037).
Seabrooks, Kate McTell. Series of interviews with Kate McTell Seabrooks. Blues Unlimited nos. 125–127 (1977).

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

- Blind Willie McTell, 1927–1935* (ca. 1991, Yazoo 1037).
Blind Willie McTell: The Classic Years, 1927–1940 (ca. 2003, JSP Records JSP7711).
Blind Willie McTell (Document Records; complete recordings in chronological order).

McVEA, JOHN VIVIAN "JACK"

- b. 5 November 1914; Los Angeles, CA
d. 27 December 2000; Los Angeles, CA

Saxophonist. First performed with his father, banjoist Isaac "Satchel" McVea. Took up saxophone at Jefferson High School in Los Angeles. Active in heyday of Central Avenue in 1930s and 1940s, working with many major names, including T-Bone Walker, Jimmy Witherspoon, and Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown. He was a very accomplished swing tenor player in jazz settings, but favored jump and rhythm and blues styles with his own bands. He had a huge hit with "Open the Door, Richard" in 1947. His band toured into the 1950s. He later led a band in Las Vegas and then led a trio on clarinet at Disneyland (Anaheim) from 1966 to 1992.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- Larkin; New Grove Jazz
Chilton, John. Who's Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.
Rusch, Bob. "Jack McVea: Interview." Cadence 22, no. 4 (1986): 11.

Discography: LSFP

Selected Recordings as Leader

- "New Worried Life Blues" (1944, Rhythm 207).
"O-Kay for Baby" (1945, Apollo 761).
"Ooh Mop" (1945, Black and White 750).
"Bulgin' Eyes" (1946, Black and White 791).
"Open the Door, Richard" (1946, Black and White 792).
"Mumblin' Blues" (1947, Exclusive 270).

MEAN MISTREATER MAMA

"Mean Mistreater Mama" is credited to Leroy Carr and was likely composed sometime in 1933 or early 1934 during the height of the Great Depression and the economic blackout of recording. It is a twelve-measure blues using an AAB lyric scheme. The piano accompaniment is a pulsing bass beat on the fifth scale degree of the prevailing chord. An antecedent may be Carr's "Prison Bound Blues" (Vocalion 1241) recorded on December 20, 1928, and released early the following year. Carr, with guitarist Scrapper Blackwell, first recorded it on February 20, 1934, for Vocalion Records, their first session in nearly two years even though they had been a best-selling recording duo since 1928. In apparent confidence of the new song becoming a hit, the two men recorded a "Mean Mistreater Mama No. 2" during the same session.

The following day, February 21, 1934, Carr used the melody as the primary theme of "Blues Before Sunrise," which also used the AAB lyric scheme. He recorded two takes, the first of which was released as the flip side of "Mean Mistreater Mama" (Vocalion 02657); the second take would not be released until a Document CD issue in the early 1990s. Notable on this performance is the secondary or alternate theme sung in a high register for the second chorus. The lyrics here are of a despondent, brutal nature, conveying the singer's resolve to shoot his girlfriend.

MEAN MISTREATER MAMA

The melody was quickly adopted by other blues recording artists. Josh White with Carr and Blackwell's assistance recorded "Mean Mistreater Mama" for the ARC labels (including Banner 33148) on August 13, 1934.

Additional treatments by Bumble Bee Slim (Amos Easton) were recorded and issued. As early as 1931 he had reworked Carr's "Prison Bound Blues" into "Chain Gang Bound" (Paramount 13109). After Carr's "Mean Mistreater Mama" appeared, he appropriated the melody for "Cruel Hearted Woman Blues" Parts I and II (Decca 7021) on September 6. The following day for Vocalion he did a less disguised version of his model as "New Mean Mistreater Blues" (Vocalion 02829); on this performance he imitates Carr's "Mean Mistreater Mama" practice of opening an internal chorus with an eighth-note phrase in the first four measures, then resuming the previously established melody. Easton would reuse this distinctive device on another "Mistreater" version, "Cold Blooded Murder" (Vocalion 02865), and to a different melody altogether on "Climbing on Top of the Hill" (Decca 7031).

Robert Johnson's "Kindhearted Woman Blues" (Vocalion 03416), recorded in November 1936 but released the following year, seems based on Easton's "Cruel Hearted Woman" with reference to title, lyrics, and melody, with the eighth-note opening at the third chorus. Johnson's falsetto at the words

Oh babe, my life feels all the same in the third chorus is a new distinctive touch. His guitar accompaniment is in the stationary pulsing bass manner of Carr's pianism, and the guitar solo in the first take is the only one Johnson recorded among his surviving recordings. Other Johnson treatments of the melody include "Dead Shrimp Blues," "Phonograph Blues" (take 1 only), and "Honeymoon Blues." In 1941 Robert Lockwood recorded "Black Spider Blues" (RCA Bluebird 8877), using the "Mistreater" melody; in later years Lockwood revealed that he learned the lyrics and music from Johnson before the latter's 1938 death.

Today the melody is associated most with Johnson, due to the availability of his recordings since 1961 and the performances by Lockwood, David "Honeyboy" Edwards, and Johnny Shines. Rock versions of "Kindhearted Woman Blues" have tended to be respectful renditions on acoustic guitar, such as that by George Thorogood on his debut LP (Rounder Records, 1977).

EDWARD KOMARA

MEAUX, HUEY P.

b. 10 March 1929; Kaplan, LA

Producer, promoter. The colorful and controversial "Crazy Cajun" was a shameless self-promoter who was instrumental in recording and gaining exposure for a wide array of Gulf Coast artists. Meaux's family moved to East Texas when he was twelve. He played drums for his father's band but he later stated he had neither aptitude nor enthusiasm for the life of a musician. But Meaux loved the music business and even as he held a day job as a barber he was working as a deejay (with the Big Bopper) in Beaumont, staging dances and ultimately producing records for local acts.

Meaux had his first hit single in 1959 with Jivin' Gene's "Breaking Up Is Hard to Do" but it was the success of Beaumont teenager Barbara Lynn's "You'll Lose a Good Thing" that brought him to national attention. Meaux relocated to Houston and set up shop at Sugar Hill studios, recording a series of low-budget swamp pop hits fueled by innovative production and aggressive promotion techniques. He soon branched out stylistically, working with zydeco founder Clifton Chenier, soulman Chuck Jackson, and Houston blues star Johnny Copeland, among many others. His biggest commercial successes were even more eclectic as they came with his invention of the ersatz British Invasion act the Sir Douglas Quintet, the Tex-Mex combo Sunny and the Sunliners, and bilingual balladeer Freddy Fender. When the hits quit coming, Meaux eventually resumed his deejay career, playing vintage swamp pop favorites on KPFT in Houston.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Larkin
Joe Nick Patoski. "Huey Meaux' Bathtub Sound." Rolling Stone no. 269 (July 13, 1978): 18.

MEDWICK, JOE

b. Joseph Medwick Veasey, 22 June 1933; Houston, TX

d. 12 April 1992; Houston, TX

Singer and songwriter who co-composed many of Bobby Bland's early Duke/Peacock hits including “Farther Up the Road.” Medwick often wrote in collaboration with pianist Teddy Reynolds. His later practice of selling slightly altered or retitled versions of one song to different record labels led to virtual exclusion from the music business. He made a return as featured vocalist with Grady Gaines and the Texas Upsetters in 1988.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Bernard, Emily. “Joe Medwick” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 105 (September/October 1992): 44.
 Burke, Tony. “Joe Medwick” [obituary]. Blues & Rhythm no. 70 (June 1992): 18–19.

MELODEON RECORDS

Label owned by Dick and Louisa Spottswood in the Washington, D.C., area in 1964–1967. Important blues issues were the Blind Willie McTell sessions for the Library of Congress in 1940, and the Skip James sessions recorded by the Spottswoods shortly after his rediscovery in 1964. Other Melodeon albums featured jazz and country music.

EDWARD KOMARA

MELOTONE

Label first issued in November 1930 as a cheap label subsidiary to Brunswick. Initially devoted mainly to commercial popular music, it became from November 1932 one of the five “dime-store” labels of the American Record Corporation (ARC), with which Brunswick had come under common management in December 1931. The same issue numbers were used for the dime-store labels after September 1935 and they shared an important Race catalog, including Lucille Bogan and Walter Roland, Big Bill (Broonzy), Sam Collins, Georgia Tom (Dorsey), Blind Boy Fuller, and Pinewood Tom (Josh White). All of the dime-store labels were withdrawn in April 1938.

HOWARD RYE

Discography: DGR; Sutton

- Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
 Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

MELROSE, LESTER

- b. 14 December 1891; Olney, IL
 d. 12 April 1968; Lake County, FL

As a record producer, music publisher, and talent scout, Lester Melrose was a central figure in shaping the sound of the blues recorded in Chicago from the end of Prohibition through World War II. Born on a farm in southern Illinois, he played semipro baseball and worked as a railroad man before serving in Europe in World War I. He began his career in the music business by opening a music store in 1922 on Chicago’s South Side with his brother, jazz pianist Frank Melrose. He soon expanded into music publishing, specializing in blues, and he also organized recording sessions for jazz artists such as Jelly Roll Morton and King Oliver’s New Orleans Jazz Band with Louis Armstrong. After selling his portion of the music store to his brother, Melrose recorded blues artists including Georgia Tom (later the Reverend Thomas A. Dorsey) and Big Bill Broonzy in the early 1930s for the various “dime-store” labels of the American Recording Company.

In 1934 Melrose identified himself to RCA Victor and Columbia, the dominant forces at the time in blues recording, as the key person to arrange recording sessions in Chicago. Their response was swift and enthusiastic, and Melrose’s claim that until his retirement in 1951 he “recorded at least 90 per cent of all rhythm-and-blues talent” for the two companies is difficult to dispute. The list includes many of the best-known musicians of the prewar era: Broonzy, Tampa Red, Lonnie Johnson, Leroy Carr, Memphis Minnie, John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson, Lil Green, Bumble Bee Slim, Washboard Sam, Jazz Gillum, Johnny Temple, Big Boy Crudup, Roosevelt Sykes, Big Maceo Merriweather, Peter “Doctor” Clayton, Big Joe Williams, Walter Davis, Tommy McClennan, Memphis Slim, and Victoria Spivey.

A hallmark of Melrose’s approach to recording blues was to use a consistent set of studio musicians. He designated Tampa Red’s South Side house as the prerecording session rehearsal center, where the songs could be perfected in advance. Some commentators have been critical of the similarity in the many records Melrose produced for Bluebird (RCA Victor’s discount label); this view was memorably expressed by Samuel B. Charters’ observation that “[t]he Bluebird blues, with few exceptions, was a stereotyped product” [1975, p. 183]. Other observers have noted in response that several significant guitar/piano partnerships, such as Tampa Red and Big Maceo, flourished under the artistic stability that Melrose's system provided; that his sessions produced many enduring and influential songs; and that his philosophy of establishing a distinctive musical identity for a record label proved successful for later companies such as Chess, Motown, and Stax/Volt.

A key indicator of Melrose's business savvy was his decades-long involvement in two publishing companies, Wabash and Duchess Music, which provided him with ongoing sources of revenue. Accounts differ over how fairly he treated the musicians he recorded, because some artists expressed bitterness at being taken advantage of while others recalled him more favorably. What is universally acknowledged is the clout he wielded in the Chicago blues world for nearly twenty years.

ROBERT RIESMAN

Bibliography

- Charters, Samuel B. The Country Blues. New York: Da Capo Press, 1975.
- Cowley, John H. Blues from the Windy City: Chicago in Transition 1946–52 (1976, Flyright LP 4713).
- Koester, Bob. "Lester Melrose: An Appreciation." American Folk Music Occasional 2 (1970): 58.
- Melrose, Lester. "My Life in Recording." American Folk Music Occasional 2 (1970): 59–61

MEMPHIS

When the city of Memphis was founded in 1819, the handful of original investors foresaw a great commercial metropolis springing forth on the eastern bank of the Mississippi River to fuel the growing westward expansion of their young country. However, in spite of its ancient history as a crossroads and trading nexus for earlier civilizations, this site on the Fourth Chickasaw Bluff witnessed sixty years of near-lawlessness, Civil War, and epidemics, before manifesting those early dreams after 1880. By that time, most of the rich farmland and forests surrounding the community in all directions for a hundred miles were settled and producing lumber and cotton for nationwide consumption; railroads were built to transport these commodities to the major industrial markets of the United States; and the city became the commercial and professional center for a region encompassing parts of seven states.

The last Federal Census (1860) prior to the South's secession revealed a population of 22,623, of whom 3,382 or seventeen percent were of African descent. The majority of these black city dwellers were slaves engaged in household service, construction, and hauling, but a few free men of color were already operating businesses on and around the main thoroughfare of South Memphis known as Beale Street. The first of these entrepreneurs established saloons, barbershops, and repair businesses to serve the bustling river traffic.

With the end of the Civil War, thousands of newly freed blacks streamed into Memphis in search of employment and opportunity. Instead, shortages in housing, food, and jobs confronted the postwar influx, estimated at 15,000 to 20,000 people in 1866. Initially, these men and women lacked education and social structures to aid their transition to urban life, but missionary groups, charities, self-help organizations and a fledgling minority middle class soon transformed the landscape, adding schools, churches, social clubs, and a full range of commercial and professional services catering to the African American population.

Memphis developed into a major railroad hub, enhanced, in 1892, by the only bridge over the Mississippi between St. Louis and New Orleans. Most roads serving the region led to the city, and, when combined with river and rail traffic, Memphis became a transportation bottleneck, absorbing thousands of new residents each year, while hosting tens of thousands of migrant laborers and visitors from the surrounding countryside. As levee construction transformed the Mississippi Delta from swamps to fertile soil, hundreds of thousands of farmworkers moved there from the exhausted lands of Georgia and the Carolinas. Memphis provided the goods, services, and entertainment that rounded out their lives, and they came to Memphis by the wagonload.

The growth of the city did not follow a typical pattern for the times, however. A series of yellow fever epidemics, culminating with the deadliest outbreak in 1878, altered permanently the course of its development. Many prominent families moved away, taking with them the demands of a ruling elite. Ethnic enclaves were broken up and dispersed throughout Memphis, leading to a more homogeneous environment, one without a "China Town" or "Little Italy," for example. And, while residential segregation existed between black and white Memphians, it took shape as a multitude of proud little neighborhoods scattered about the growing city. By way of contrast, most towns and cities of the South were divided into distinct halves, with a railroad or thoroughfare creating a fixed line of demarcation between the races.

In spite of urban expansion, commerce remained concentrated "downtown" along the river bluff, and Beale Street became the business and entertainment district for black residents and visitors. By day, Beale Street offered legal and medical help, dry goods, food, drugstores, repair shops, tailors, barbers, funeral homes, and, after 1906, banks owned and operated by black businessmen. But when the workday ended, the so-called sporting crowd took to the street, engaging in the drinking, drug use, gambling, prostitution, and voodoo practices that had long flourished in this river town.

Beale Street drew its cast of characters and their audience from an enormous geographic region, and the unique personality of the street was fixed in the public imagination by the late nineteenth century. While some of the details have likely been embellished over time, the accidental collision of an Italian immigrant with a dice game best illustrates the early history and color of Beale Street and the blues.

According to Beale Street historian and novelist Lt. George W. Lee, Virgilio Maffei arrived in Memphis from New York with ten cents and no prospects. Maffei, known as “Pee Wee” for his small stature, wandered the streets of the city, hungry but reluctant to part with his meager resources for a meal. He stumbled upon a crap game in an alley off Beale and was invited to join the dice shooters. Although Pee Wee scored big and cleaned out the competition, he also won new friends among the group and decided to set up shop in the black community. By the turn of the century, his Beale Street enterprise, known as “P. Wee’s Saloon,” was neighbor to more fashionable and elite black-owned establishments, but Maffei filled a special need within the musical community, and his bar became a landmark and sometimes lifeline among musicians.

When bandleader William Christopher Handy settled in Memphis in 1907, he learned that, in addition to serving drinks and providing gambling and live entertainment, Pee Wee and his staff took messages for patrons on the bar’s pay phone. This complimentary service made P. Wee’s Saloon the central gathering spot for the growing entertainment industry. Street singers, bandleaders, and members of touring minstrel and vaudeville shows made daily stops there, often receiving welcome news about possible gigs or locating replacement personnel to keep the show going. Since the doors never closed, the bar was a virtual home away from home for many touring performers and a prime spot for the exchange of musical styles. By Handy’s own account, he wrote the first score of “The Memphis Blues” on the cigar machine at P. Wee’s from snatches of a melody he heard on the street.

“Home of the Blues”

The twelve-bar refrains with lyrics expressive of the full range of human emotions seemed to drift into town from the surrounding countryside. By popular demand, mainstream orchestras, like those of Handy, Charles Bynum, and Love’s Mail Carriers, began incorporating some of this “blues” music into their sets, alongside the sophisticated strains of Tin Pan Alley and European classical music, which were the standard dance fare of the time. The burgeoning black vaudeville circuit, evidenced by three theaters operating in Memphis at the turn of the century, also pioneered the introduction of the blues to urban audiences and contributed to its growing recognition as a musical genre outside of the South. However, the 1912 publication of Handy’s “The Memphis Blues” remains the defining moment in popular history for recognition of this primarily Southern and African American art form.

Aside from giving written permanence to the blues’ oral tradition through his publishing, W. C. Handy, an educated black man, made this rural art form accessible and acceptable to an enormous urban audience through effective promotion of his sheet music. As evidence of his success in the white world of the 1910s, the most popular stars of Broadway incorporated Handy’s songs into their repertoires, and successive printed editions of “St. Louis Blues” and “Beale Street Blues” bore cover pictures of well-known singers from Schubert’s Gaieties of 1917 and the Ziegfeld Follies of 1919, for example.

In their first business endeavor, Handy and partner Harry Pace established the Pace and Handy Music Company in 1913 on Beale Street. The astute businessmen began employing the phrase “Home of the Blues” in national advertising as early as 1915, and they retained the tagline in their logo after moving first to Chicago and then to New York. This epithet was immediately embraced by the general public, and Memphis has retained the “motherland” distinction since that time.

Although Handy’s lyric description in “Beale Street Blues” remained accurate for nearly half a century, the street itself underwent a series of social and demographic changes. Most of the earlier generation of Beale Street denizens felt that the thoroughfare had lost much of its joy and charm by the First World War. Many reasons contributed to this perception. Just as their white counterparts did, well-to-do black Memphians moved out to the spacious and clean suburbs, distributing professional services and social activities among various neighborhoods from their former concentration on “Black America’s Main Street.” This left the cultural influence of Beale Street in the hands of a steady stream of newcomers, including a number of uneducated men and women drawn to the area by such varied factors as the 1915 Boll Weevil epidemic, war industry employment, and harsher Jim Crow practices in rural areas. The departure of black entrepreneurs, some of whom lost their businesses during the Depression, left a void filled by immigrants, so that in 1934, Lt. George W. Lee would describe the area as “Beale Street, owned largely by Jews, policed by the whites, and enjoyed by the Negroes. . . .” Thus, beginning in the 1920s, Beale Street lost much of its refined element and began to acquire the earthy character that is still attached to its name in the popular imagination.

Just as the sheet music industry was enriched by its Beale Street connections, the recording revolution of the 1920s enjoyed substantial success exploiting performances by Beale Street artists. Initially, record company executives were stunned to learn that a market for black music existed among the black public. Ralph Peer of OKeh Records re-created the epiphany in an interview for Collier's Weekly, April 30, 1938. According to Peer, the first popular blues recording artists were drawn from talent living near New York City, but soon the record companies recognized the need to travel to the source for more material to satisfy both the white hillbilly and black blues record buyers. Thus they began the era of field trips to Southern cities, including Atlanta, New Orleans, Dallas, and Memphis, where advertisements and word of mouth beckoned musicians to the sessions.

The handful of companies that came to dominate the “Race record” field did so because of the far-flung talent they employed. Artists not necessarily associated with Memphis—Mississippi John Hurt, Lonnie Johnson, and Blind Boy Fuller—were recorded during sessions held in the city, alongside well-known Beale Street talent like the Memphis Jug Band, Furry Lewis, and Robert Wilkins. The best-known and best-selling artists from the Memphis scene were often recorded in the better facilities of New York and Chicago, including Memphis Minnie and Jim Jackson, whose “Kansas City Blues” was rumored to have sold more than a million copies.

With widespread Depression, the boom in record sales enjoyed during the 1920s appeared to be over, and most of these field recording trips were canceled during 1932 and 1933, as the companies adjusted to a new financial reality. Only a few musicians demonstrated economic drawing power in the early 1930s, but this select crowd was still dominated by artists with strong ties to Memphis, notably the Mississippi Sheiks with their vast extended family, whose members included Bo Carter, Joe McCoy and wife Memphis Minnie, Charlie McCoy, and, somewhat later, Memphis Slim. After dropping the retail sales price of records to less than half that of 1929, the industry began to recover, and a couple of the leaner, more efficient and consolidated businesses returned to Memphis and the South or sent train fare to Southern artists for formal recording sessions, but not until the 1950s would so many Memphis-honed voices be heard again in such number and variety around the world.

Although pawn shops and second-hand clothing businesses began to dominate the storefronts of Beale, the lively nighttime scene remained the stuff of legend. Occasionally, political candidates would promise to clean up the area, but it was widely acknowledged that the unofficial “sin taxes” paid by club owners and madams financed the local political machine. Although popular singers lamented “Beale Street’s gone dry,” Prohibition only affected the quality of liquor consumed in the area, not the quantity, and a sustained and successful effort to rid Memphis of vice and violence was not made until the late 1930s, drawing attention from the national press. On June 10, 1940, in an article appropriately titled “Memphis Blues,” correspondents for Time magazine noted the crackdown on gambling and prostitution and its subsequent removal across state lines. By the 1940s, as reflected in popular songs, north Mississippi and West Memphis, Arkansas, were the acknowledged spots for people to “barrelhouse all night long.” But Beale Street and Memphis were merely taking a break before letting loose the next revolution in sound.

“Battle of the Bands,” Radio, and Recording in Memphis

From the 1930s through the mid-1960s, the black schools of Memphis attracted a number of highly educated musicians to their teaching staffs. As educational incentive, these men inspired intense rivalries among their marching bands, which, by continually raising the yardstick, produced some of the finest musical talent of the twentieth century. For two generations, these Battle of the Band contests galvanized the black communities of Memphis, generating pride, excitement, and much needed revenue for neighborhood schools, which under segregation were separate but distinctly unequal in city funding. Many of the best-known graduates of this competitive environment (Hank Crawford, George Coleman, Sonny Criss, and Andrew Love) excelled on the saxophone, an instrument first introduced to popular music and the blues by W. C. Handy years before. The wailing and honking of saxophones became a hallmark of Memphis-flavored blues, jazz, and R&B.

The educated young musicians found Beale Street irresistible, sneaking into shows by stars like Duke Ellington, Lionel Hampton, and Count Basie at the Palace and the Hippodrome, and hanging out with touring R&B artists at Sunbeam Mitchell's Club Handy. The kids picked up showmanship techniques from the veteran performers, but the musical exchange was not one sided. For example, teenage virtuosos Phineas Newborn, Jr., and brother Calvin Newborn taught Howlin' Wolf to read sheet music in the late 1940s. Such interactions kept the music alive and intense. All that was lacking was a technological infrastructure to capitalize on this wealth of musical ability.

In the late summer of 1948, a small local radio station decided to create programming by and for black Memphians, in a last ditch effort to achieve financial success. Starting with one well-known and much respected member of the African American community as on-air talent, WDIA gradually expanded during the course of the next two years to full-time content featuring jazz, R&B, and gospel music hosted by black entertainers. That first black voice to greet listeners at 4:00 p.m. on October 25, 1948, belonged to Nat D. Williams, a history teacher, newspaper editorial writer, and long-time emcee of Amateur Night at the Palace Theater on Beale Street. The Professor's extensive connections in the world of black music enabled the white station owners to expand their roster quickly, keeping pace with the highly lucrative market they had stumbled upon. Williams recruited capable and popular musicians like B. B. King and Rufus Thomas to host shows on WDIA, and also added community interest programming and commentary from the black point of view to the lineup. The station soon overran the top-rated white station, WREC, and collected the highest premiums paid in Memphis for local and national radio advertising. In 1954, the owners succeeded in implementing a boost in signal strength from 250 to 50,000 watts and converting from a daytime-only FCC license to unlimited programming. By this time, promotional brochures claimed that WDIA was "first in the hearts" of ten percent of America's black population, an exaggeration perhaps, but one that was taken quite seriously by ad agencies and record companies.

From 1949 through 1954, while WDIA signed off at dusk, another local station began a nighttime program with the intent of capturing many of the black listeners WDIA had "discovered" by offering an off-beat mix of country music, blues, and gospel hosted by one of the most unique on-air personalities in radio history. Fast-talking Dewey Phillips hosted "Red, Hot, and Blue" on WHBQ, from 9 p.m. until midnight, introducing his audience to the latest in non-mainstream recorded music. WHBQ did not succeed in stealing the loyal black audience from WDIA for Phillips's show, but, to their amazement, ratings suggested that one hundred thousand white kids were tuning in each night to hear rhythm and blues.

In January 1949, a white Alabama native and sound engineer for rival station WREC, Sam Phillips, opened the Memphis Recording Service at 706 Union Avenue, a few blocks from Beale Street, and advertised his willingness to record "anything, anywhere, anytime." Among the first takers for this proposition were a number of black blues artists, who recognized the positive financial impact of radio and jukebox play on their public appearance fees. Phillips caught the wave of talent passing through Memphis and sold early recordings by such seminal artists as Howlin' Wolf, Ike Turner, and Rosco Gordon to nationally distributed independent record labels like Chess of Chicago and Modern/RPM of Los Angeles. Within a couple of years, Phillips created the Sun label and jump-started the rock 'n' roll phenomenon.

Equipment at WDIA was put to use in similar fashion to record deejay and entertainer B. B. King's first release for Nashville's Bullet Records. Then, seeing the market for such material, the station's program director, David James Mattis, started the Duke imprint and captured the first performances of young talent streaming into WDIA, artists like Johnny Ace, Bobby Bland, and Earl Forest. Once again, the sounds of Memphis were heard around the world, although this time, because of the inherent freedom of the airwaves, the appreciative audience included people of all colors, especially around the Memphis area.

From hearing black music on the radio, the next step was sneaking into Beale Street clubs and area juke joints to see the performers in person. The most famous of the white blues fans from Memphis was Elvis Presley, whose early career was propelled by his grasp of black phrasing and movement, but other young people from the area were also influenced, including Charlie Musselwhite, Steve Cropper, and Duck Dunn. Musselwhite's understanding of the blues was so genuine that he was adopted by the Chicago blues crowd. Cropper and Dunn were recruited for work at the innovative Stax recording studio, which drew black and white talent together for a decade-long reign at the top of the charts. Featuring the best songwriters, arrangers, and instrumentalists in the South, the Stax roster, including Sam and Dave, Otis Redding, Albert King, Isaac Hayes, and Eddie Floyd, gained international recognition for Memphis once again.

Interest generated by collectors of old 78-rpm recordings stimulated a revival in the roots of the blues during the 1960s, and fans headed to Memphis in search of the men and women who had contributed to that first recording boom of the 1920s. Thus while artists like Little Milton created contemporary blues classics at Stax, the old acoustic players enjoyed a last round of applause. Through efforts such as the Memphis Blues Caravan, organized by music historian Steve LaVere in 1971, Sleepy John Estes and Hammie Nixon, Sam Chatmon, Furry Lewis, and Bukka White were introduced to college and festival audiences around the world.

Desegregation removed the necessity for Beale Street by the late 1950s, and urban renewal destroyed many of its landmarks a short time later, but the spirit of Beale Street retained its powers of attraction, drawing thousands of visitors each year to stare through construction fencing at the shells of old buildings. In the 1980s, repairs began in earnest on the crumbling structures, and by the end of the twentieth century, bars and gift shops lined the blocks from Second to Fourth Streets, recalling an exciting and free-wheeling past.

Meanwhile, Memphians wait for the next big wave in music to hit, as happened when W. C. Handy and his successors expressed the collision of urban and rural cultures in the 1910s and 1920s or when Sun Studios and Stax Records captured the sonic meltdown between black and white musicians in the 1950s and 1960s. Whatever follows will be built on the traditions of the past, and as B. B. King explained with a nod to the jazz and soul musicians surrounding him at the 1977 Beale Street Music Festival, "The blues is the mother tree, and many branches have sprouted from it."

DENISE TAPP

Bibliography

- Abbott, Lynn, and Doug Seroff. "They Cert'ly Sound Good to Me": Sheet Music, Southern Vaudeville, and the Commercial Ascendancy of the Blues." American Music 14, no. 4 (Winter 1996): 402–454.
- Cantor, Louis. Wheelin' on Beale. New York: Pharos Books, 1992.
- Capers, Jr., Gerald M. The Biography of a River Town, Memphis: Its Heroic Age. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1939.
- Chrichton, Kyle. "Thar's GOLD in Them Hillbillies." Collier's Weekly (April 30, 1938): 24–27.
- Church, Roberta, and Ronald Walter. Nineteenth Century Memphis Families of Color, 1850–1900. Memphis, TN: Murdock, 1987.
- Dickerson, James. Goin' Back to Memphis: A Century of Blues, Rock 'n' Roll, and Glorious Soul. New York: Schirmer, 1996.

- Dixon, Robert, and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. New York: Stein and Day, 1970.
- Escott, Colin, with Martin Hawkins. Good Rockin' Tonight: Sun Records and the Birth of Rock 'n' Roll. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1991.
- Gordon, Robert. It Came from Memphis. Boston: Faber and Faber, 1995.
- Groom, Bob. "Memphis and Mississippi: The Blues Today." Juke Blues no. 2 (October 1985): 18–21.
- Hamilton, G. P. The Bright Side of Memphis. Memphis: Burke's Book Store Reprint, 1908.
- Handy, William Christopher. Father of the Blues. New York: Macmillan, 1941.
- King, Edward. The Great South. Hartford, CT: American Publishing Company, 1875.
- Lee, George W. Beale Street: Where the Blues Began. College Park, MD: McGrath Publishing Company, 1969.
- McKee, Margaret, and Fred Chisenhall. Beale Black & Blue: Life and Music on Black America's Main Street. Baton Rouge: Louisiana University Press, 1981.
- Newborn, Calvin. As Quiet As It's Kept. Memphis: Phineas Newborn, Jr., Family Foundation, 1996.
- Olsson, Bengt. Memphis Blues and Jug Bands. London: Studio Vista, 1970.
- Tucker, David M. Lieutenant Lee of Beale Street. Nashville, TN: Vanderbilt University Press, 1971.

MEMPHIS BLUES, THE ("MAMA DON' 'LOW" OR "MISTER CRUMP")

An instrumental composition (1912) by W. C. Handy, later a song. It supposedly originated in a 1909 campaign song for Edward Crump, successful mayoral candidate in that year, later the long-time political boss of Memphis. "Mister Crump," in turn, with its refrain

We don't care what Crump won't allow, we gonna barrelhouse anyhow, Mr. Crump can go and catch hissself some air

seems to derive from a folk song called "Mama Don' 'low," which bears the same refrain minus Crump. Given that there is no early printed or recorded version of "Mama Don' 'low" or of "Mister Crump" it is probably now impossible to untangle the origins of the piece in any of its version. The 1927 Frank Stokes record titled "Mister Crump Don't Like It" may well be the best source we have for the early history of this song family.

As originally published, "The Memphis Blues" was a piano solo in three sections. Handy was persuaded the song had limited commercial potential, and he sold it, for fifty dollars, to music publisher Theron Bennett. Bennett took the song back to New York's Tin Pan Alley where, outfitted with clever words by George Norton (of "Melancholy Baby" fame), it became a runaway hit in 1913. The lyrics mentioned Handy and his band, but this publicity was the only benefit he gained from his composition for the next twenty-eight years. After this misadventure, Handy founded his own music publishing firm, and began fitting his own lyrics to his own compositions. “The Memphis Blues” passed to other publishers, but Handy was able to gain control of the copyright when it came up for renewal in 1940. Because the piece, like “St. Louis Blues,” “Beale Street Blues,” and his other standards, was still ripe for revival in new arrangements, Handy was able to make a good deal of money off of it in the final decades of his life.

“The Memphis Blues” is not actually a blues at all, but a fairly straightforward piece of piano ragtime, although Handy was later able to retrofit traditional blues lyrics to the song, such as

You want to be my man, you got to give me forty dollars down.

This juxtaposition is only partially successful, however. The 1913 Norton lyrics are superior, although they have nothing to do with the blues. “The Memphis Blues” became highly important as an influence on early jazz in two ways. First, it contained one of the earliest free-floating interpolated “riffs” to become popular, pointing toward an important jazz building block. Secondly, it is supposed to have been used in the creation of the first fox-trot, when James Reese Europe played the piece on the piano, at a slow tempo, for his employers, the renowned social dancers Vernon and Irene Castle. However, its primary importance for blues was in helping kick off the fad for compositions with “blues” in the title, and it put Memphis on the map as the music’s home.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

Bibliography

- Handy, W. C. Blues: An Anthology. New York: Boni and Boni, 1926.
 ———. Father of the Blues. New York: Macmillan, 1941.
 Rust, Brian. Jazz Records 1897–1942. 4th ed. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington House, 1978.

Selected Recordings

As “The Memphis Blues”

- Various artists including Esther Bigeou, Monette Moore, and Memphis Slim.
 Brass bands including Victor Military Band, Prince’s Band, Jim Europe’s 369th Infantry “Hell Fighters” Band, and Tim Brymn and His Black Devil Orchestra.
 Jazz and dance bands including Lanin’s Southern Serenaders, The Virginians, Handy’s Orchestra, Ted Lewis, Isham Jones, Original Memphis Five, Original Indiana Five, Ben Pollack and His Orchestra, The Six Hottentots, Al Bernard, Fletcher Henderson, Ambrose and His Orchestra, Benny Carter, Will Bradley, Henry Levine, Harry James, and many, many others.

Also miscellaneous pop and novelty artists, such as Johnny Marvin.

As “Mister Crump”

Last Chance Jug Band.

As “Mister Crump Don’t Like It”

Frank Stokes.

As “Mama Don’t Allow” (or one of several other variants of the title)

Tampa Red, “Cow Cow” Davenport, Fred McDowell, Mance Lipscomb, Alvin Youngblood Hart (blues); Mound City Blue Blowers, Frankie “Half Pint” Jaxon, Boswell Sisters, Nat Gonella, Ted Wallace, Billie and De De Pierce (jazz); Milton Brown and His Brownies, The Stanley Brothers (country music).

MEMPHIS JUG BAND

The Memphis Jug Band was one of the most popular African American musical groups of the late 1920s and early 1930s and arguably the most important jug band (see the Jug entry) in the history of the blues. The founder and central figure of the Memphis Jug Band was Will Shade (also known as Son Brimmer), who primarily played the guitar and harmonica. After performing around Memphis and touring with medicine shows for a few years, Shade formed the group in the mid-1920s after being inspired by the records of the influential Louisville jug band, the Dixieland Jug Blowers. Between 1927 and 1934, the Memphis Jug Band made recordings for Victor, Champion, and OKeh, achieving considerable fame and commercial success.

The lineup of the Memphis Jug Band changed constantly throughout its career, both inside and outside the recording studio. While the core members of the group were Shade and Charlie Burse, several additional musicians from the Memphis blues scene recorded and performed with them, including Tewee Blackman, Robert Burse, Jennie Clayton (Shade’s wife), Laura Dukes, Hattie Hart, Jab Jones, Hambone Lewis, Charlie Nickerson, Charlie Pierce, Charlie Polk, Ben Ramey, Milton Roby, Vol Stevens, and Dewey Thomas. Some better-known Memphis musicians who recorded and performed with the group included Big Walter Horton, Furry Lewis, Memphis Minnie, and Casey Bill Weldon. The personnel were always loose knit, with the combination of musicians often varying from one performance to the next, depending on who was available on a given date.

Like most of the jug bands in Memphis that came after them, the Memphis Jug Band played in a more rural, blues-oriented style than the heavily jazz-influenced approach of the jug bands in Louisville. Nevertheless, the group's repertoire drew from a variety of musical sources in addition to blues, including popular hits, minstrel songs, dance tunes, waltzes, and rags. The Memphis Jug Band's stylistic diversity helped it to gain a great deal of popularity among both black and white audiences. As a result, the group's live appearances took place in various settings, from picnics, fish fries, restaurants, and street corners to country clubs, private parties, and political rallies.

MEMPHIS JUG BAND

The Memphis Jug Band's success sparked a jug band craze that brought about the formation of numerous jug bands in Memphis in the late 1920s and early 1930s, including the legendary Cannon's Jug Stompers (see Cannon, Gus entry) and Jack Kelly's South Memphis Jug Band. By the mid-1930s, however, the popularity of jug band music had begun to wane considerably as the Great Depression drastically diminished record sales and as newer and more urbane musical styles emerged. Consequently, the Memphis Jug Band's live engagements became less frequent, and the group could no longer get recording dates after 1934. Still, the group occasionally performed in and around Memphis for years after that, and in 1956, Will Shade and Charlie Burse made a few recordings for the Folkways label (credited as the Memphis Jug Band). Shade recorded a handful of songs for other labels in the early 1960s before his death in 1966.

Over the years, the influence and appeal of the Memphis Jug Band have proven to be long lasting. During the folk revival of the 1960s, several new jug bands were formed, largely replicating the style of the Memphis Jug Band and the other Memphis groups. Today, several groups still perform in this style.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

- AMG (Cub Koda and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli
Barlow, William. "Chocolate to the Bone: Urban Blues in the South." In Looking Up at Down: The Emergence of Blues Culture. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989.
Olsson, Bengt. Memphis Blues and Jug Bands. London: Studio Vista, 1970.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSF

Selected Recordings in Reissue

- Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Vols. 1–3* (1990–1991, Document DOCD 5021–5023).

Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, 1932–1934 (1990, Document BDCD-6002).

MEMPHIS MINNIE

b. Lizzie Douglas, 3 June 1897; Algiers, LA

d. 6 August 1973; Memphis, TN

One of the foremost country blues singer/guitarists and one of the few women to achieve such status. Performing as Memphis Minnie (McCoy, or later, Lawlars), she became a major personality on the Chicago blues scene of the 1930s and 1940s.

Memphis Minnie was born in Algiers, Louisiana, in 1897, the oldest child of Abe and Gertrude Douglas. When Minnie was seven, the family moved to Walls, Mississippi. Minnie soon abandoned farm life in favor of playing her guitar on Beale Street in nearby Memphis. She also rejected the name Lizzie and began calling herself "Kid" Douglas.

Minnie traveled and played throughout the Delta, landing at the Bedford plantation west of Lake Cormorant and taking up with bluesman Willie Brown, her virtuoso guitar work immediately establishing her as head of the new partnership. Minnie had already played in a few traveling shows, building a diverse repertoire. Female blues singers tended to be associated with the vaudeville and jazz tradition, while the country blues guitar/vocal role was usually filled by males. Minnie's role as a female country blues guitarist (and later as an urban one) helped shatter these stereotypes of gender-based role performance.

In 1929, with a new partner, husband Joe McCoy, Minnie made her first records. Christened Kansas Joe and Memphis Minnie (as their names were to appear on record labels), their first session produced several influential works: "Frisco Town," "When the Levee Breaks" (vocals by Joe McCoy), and the best-selling "Bumble Bee." Minnie was a talented songwriter, and her songs often took up themes of rural life in the 1920s. "When the Levee Breaks" was inspired by the 1927 Mississippi River flood. "Soo Cow Soo" and "If You See My Rooster" are songs with other familiar themes.

By early 1930, Minnie and Joe began to record for Vocalion and the records they made in the next three years contain what many believe to be Minnie's greatest work. Minnie and Joe also recorded with the Memphis Jug Band and Jed Davenport's Jug Band during this period.

As the Depression eased, Minnie and Joe began to record for Decca, but their partnership soon came to an end. Minnie continued to record for Decca throughout 1934, switching to Victor's Bluebird label in 1935 where she was accompanied by Big Bill Broonzy and Casey Bill Weldon. Weldon was once thought to be her first husband, but no evidence for this relationship has ever surfaced.

Memphis Minnie in 1940. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Throughout the 1930s and into the 1940s, Minnie recorded for the Vocalion/OKeh/Columbia group of labels, under the direction of Lester Melrose, usually with some combination of guitars, piano, drums, and occasionally a trumpet. She was an active participant in the Chicago blues world, one to whom many other artists—Big Bill Broonzy, for example—turned for advice and counsel. In the late 1930s, she began to partner with Little Son Joe (Ernest Lawlars), and he became her second husband in 1942. They played the 708 Club and other local spots, often participating in blues contests and usually winning them, sometimes against Big Bill Broonzy and later against Muddy Waters. In 1941, Minnie and Son had their biggest hit, “Me and My Chauffeur Blues.” The reverse side, “Black Rat Swing,” was sung by Son Joe and became a blues standard as well.

Minnie’s last issued record was a powerful postwar issue for JOB called “World of Trouble.” Indeed, hers were just beginning. Son’s health declined and they moved back to Memphis in 1958. Son died in 1961, and Minnie’s health deteriorated so much that she was confined to a wheelchair. Eventually she entered a nursing home. She died August 6, 1973.

Minnie played lead guitar in all of her partnerships and she has been hailed as a skilled guitarist with few equals. In “What’s the Matter with the Mill” Minnie plays in open G or “Spanish” tuning while capoed at the fifth fret, while Joe is capoed at the third fret and plays in standard tuning. The intricate interplay of the two guitars is compelling and inspired Muddy Waters to record the tune decades later. Minnie also played in standard tuning; “Drunken Barrel House Blues” was performed in the key of G and “Soo Cow Soo” is in the key of D.

The new smoother sounds of the 1930s, for which the trends had already been set in the late 1920s by Leroy Carr and Scrapper Blackwell, gave Minnie less opportunity to record her dexterous picking style, although occasionally her earlier style would manifest itself on a song like the 1939 “Call the Fire Wagon.”

Not one to be daunted by such changes in audience demand, Minnie became one of the first performers to adopt the new electric guitar. Her “Me and My Chauffeur Blues” became a blues standard in many Chicago repertoires, just as her “Bumble Bee” had captured the imagination of singers as diverse as Bertha Lee Patton, Johnny Shines, Bo Carter, John Lee Hooker, Muddy Waters, and even the Rolling Stones.

“I’m Talking About You” was recorded by country and western performers like Milton Brown as well as blues artists like Big Joe Williams. Led Zeppelin’s version of “When the Levee Breaks” carried her work to a still wider realm.

Minnie’s musical career spanned a forty-year period, leaving a legacy of more than 180 issued sides. Hailed as one of the greatest blues singers of all time and elected to the Blues Foundation Hall of Fame in the first year of the W. C. Handy Awards, Minnie continues to be held in high esteem. In 1996, a handsome marble monument was installed at her grave in Walls, Mississippi, where she began her musical journey so many years before.

PAUL GARON

Bibliography

AMG (Barry Lee Pearson); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Garon, Paul, and Beth Garon. Woman with Guitar: Memphis Minnie’s Blues. New York: Da Capo, 1992.
“Memphis Minnie.” Blues Magazine 3, no. 3 (June 1977): 18–39.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

“Bumble Bee” (1930, Vocalion 1476).
“I’m Talking About You” (1930, Vocalion 1476).
“Me and My Chauffeur Blues” (1941, OKeh 06288).

MEMPHIS PIANO RED

MEMPHIS PIANO RED

b. John Williams, 16 April 1905; Germantown, TN
d. 5 February 1982; Memphis, TN

Barrelhouse pianist, usually played solo but also with Barber Parker's Silver Kings, Woodrow Adams, and others. First recorded for Blue Thumb (1969).

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

McKee, Margaret, and Fred Chisenhall. Beale Black and Blue: Life and Music on Black America's Main Street. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1981.

O'Neal, Jim. "Memphis Piano Red." Living Blues no. 53 (Summer/Autumn 1982): 48.

Discography: LSPF

Old Time Barrelhouse Blues by Memphis Piano Red and Guitar Slim (1992, Christy Records CM 30002).

Mississippi Delta Blues Jam, Vol. 1 (1993, Arhoolie CD 385).

MEMPHIS SLIM

b. John Chatman, 3 September 1915; Memphis, TN
d. 24 February 1988; Paris, France

Memphis Slim achieved and sustained success as a singer, pianist, bandleader, accompanist, and songwriter over a nearly sixty-year recording and performing career. Born John Chatman (sources give either Len or Peter as middle name) in Memphis, Tennessee, in 1915, his early exposure to blues and boogie-woogie came from his father, Peter Chatman, who sang, played piano and guitar, and operated juke joints. The list of artists who influenced him through their recordings includes Clarence Williams, Leroy Carr, Lonnie Johnson, and Bessie Smith, an education he supplemented by watching Roosevelt Sykes and Speckled Red, as well as other local Memphis pianists. He spent most of the 1930s performing in honky-tonks, dance halls, and gambling joints in Memphis, Arkansas, and southern Missouri.

In the late 1930s he moved to Chicago, where his first recording session for the Okeh label in 1940 was credited to "Peter Chatman." Later that year he recorded two songs for Bluebird that became part of his repertoire for decades, "Beer Drinking Woman" and "Grinder Man Blues," which were released under the name "Memphis Slim," given to him by Bluebird's powerful producer, Lester Melrose. Slim became a regular session musician for Bluebird, and his piano talents supported established stars such as John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson, Washboard

Sam, and Jazz Gillum. In particular, many of Slim's recordings and performances until the mid-1940s were with guitarist and singer Big Bill Broonzy, who had recruited Slim to be his piano player after Josh Altheimer's death in 1940. After encouraging Slim to transform his piano technique from one that imitated Roosevelt Sykes to something that was distinctively his own, Broonzy gave him a memorable graduation speech: "You's good enough now to go on your own. You don't need Big Bill or no other blues singer with you. Just get you some good musicians to play with you and you'll be Memphis Slim just like I'm Big Bill." Slim's assessment two decades later was that "Big Bill was the greatest that I have known."

Starting in the mid-1940s, Slim led a series of bands that, reflecting the popular appeal of jump-blues, generally included saxophones, bass, drums, and piano. As Slim described it for the British magazine Jazz Journal in 1961, "I saw things changing quite a bit, so I grabbed me a band and laid it on, and started to try and keep up with the trend, and I did pretty good." During this fertile and successful period for Slim, he recorded many of the songs with which he was associated, including "Messin' Around" (which reached number one on the R&B charts in 1948), "Harlem Bound," and, most notably, "Nobody

Memphis Slim in Chicago, 1940. (Photo courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Loves Me.” This song—later recorded and performed as “Every Day I Have the Blues” by Lowell Fulson, Joe Williams, and B. B. King—is often credited to Slim, but, because a version of it appeared in 1935, he in all likelihood was not the original author.

In 1947, the day after producing a concert by Slim, Broonzy, and Williamson at New York City’s Town Hall, folklorist Alan Lomax brought the three musicians to the Decca studios and recorded their unrehearsed discussion, along with musical interludes, many featuring Slim’s piano and vocals. Lomax presented sections of this recording on BBC radio in the early 1950s as a documentary titled The Art of the Negro, and later released an expanded version as the LP Blues in the Mississippi Night, although he did not identify the performers by name until 1990. Described by music writer Greil Marcus as “a brutal and poetic prehistory of the civil rights movement,” the session presented compelling stories and images of the experiences of blacks in the South to audiences within and beyond the United States.

Slim’s collaborations in the late 1950s and early 1960s illustrated his ability to adapt to varying musical tastes. His recordings with guitarist Matt “Guitar” Murphy such as Live at the Gate of Horn presented a powerful rhythm section of three saxophones and an assertive lead guitarist in Murphy combining for a sound likely to appeal to black audiences. During the same period, with an eye on the emerging white audience eager for music rooted in folk traditions, he made a series of records that included live performances with folksinger Pete Seeger, as well as sessions featuring older blues standards with musicians such as Jazz Gillum and guitarist Arbee Stidham. In addition, as he recorded solo sessions for Folkways of boogie-woogie piano pieces, he often introduced the songs with a description of their background or composers, adopting the style that Broonzy had used successfully to entertain white American and European audiences.

Slim first appeared outside the United States in 1960, touring with Willie Dixon, with whom he returned to Europe in 1962 as a featured artist in the first of the series of American Folk Blues Festival concerts organized by Dixon and promoter Horst Lippmann that brought many notable blues artists to Europe in the 1960s and 1970s. He moved permanently to Paris in 1962, and his engaging personality and well-honed presentation of playing, singing, and storytelling about the blues secured his position as the most prominent expatriate blues artist for nearly three decades. He appeared on television in numerous European countries, acted in several French films and wrote the score for another, and performed regularly in Paris, throughout Europe, and on return visits to the United States. His status was recognized by France, which awarded him the title of Commander of Arts and Letters, and by the U.S. Senate, which in 1978 named him Ambassador-at-Large of Good Will. By the time of his death in Paris in 1988, he had recorded for nearly forty different blues record labels.

BOB RIESMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Charters, Samuel B. “You Can Leave It: Eddie Boyd and Memphis Slim.” In The Legacy of the Blues, pp. 157–170. London: Calder & Boyars, 1975.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

At the Gate of Horn (Vee-Jay 1012).
The Bluebird Recordings 1940–1941 (RCA 07863 66720-2).
Blues in the Mississippi Night (Rykodisc RCD 90155).
The Folkways Years (Smithsonian Folkways SFW CD 40128).
Memphis Slim: I’ll Just Keep Singin’ the Blues (32 Blues 32193).
Memphis Slim: Life is Like That (King KCD 6006).
Memphis Slim: Rockin’ the Blues (Charly Blues Masterworks Vol. 21 CD BM 21).
Raining the Blues (Fantasy FCD-24705).

MERCURY/FONTANA/KEYNOTE/ BLUE ROCK

Founded in 1945 in Chicago by Berle Adams and Irving Green as a division of the Mercury Radio & Television Corporation, the Mercury label’s first A&R person devoted to black music was noted Chicago pianist and composer Richard M. Jones, who arranged sessions for Albert Ammons, Sippie Wallace, the Cats ’n’ Jammers, and the Four Jumps of Jive. The label quickly expanded to cover jazz, polka, and country music, but blues and R&B, too, remained a large part of Mercury’s schedule, with important recordings by T-Bone Walker, Dinah Washington, Eddie “Cleanhead” Vinson, Big Bill Broonzy, Robert Lockwood, Sunnyland Slim, and Memphis Slim. Once the label had established itself as an important black music record label, other locations yielded rich material: Los Angeles gave the Johnny Otis Orchestra; New York, the Buddy Johnson band; New Orleans provided Roy “Professor Longhair” Byrd; and in Houston, Lightnin’ Hopkins, Smokey Hogg, and Elmo Nixon were recorded.

In 1947, Irving Green incorporated the Mercury Radio & Television Company and all the other peripheral businesses of the company into the Mercury Record Corporation, turning the thriving independent into a major record label. Continuing to expand, in the early and mid-1950s, Mercury inaugurated the Wing label for pop and R&B releases, the Emarcy subsidiary (originally under the management of Bob Shad) for jazz, and also acquired several labels, including Harry Lim's Keynote Records. The company was eventually purchased in 1961 by the Dutch multinational Philips, leading to the creation of US Philips and US Fontana. These labels were brought under the umbrella of the established Mercury label together with other new subsidiaries such as Lime-light (for jazz recordings), Cumberland (folk and country), and Blue Rock (rock and blues).

DAVID PENNY

Bibliography

Ruppli, Michel, and Ed Novitsky. The Mercury Labels. 5 vols. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1993.

Discography: McGrath

Mercury R&B '46-'62 (1989, Mercury CD 838244-2).
The Mercury Blues 'n' Rhythm Story 1945-1955 (1996, Mercury CD 528292-2).

MERITT

Record label founded in 1925 by Winston M. W. Holmes at his music store at 1704 18th Street, Kansas City, Missouri. Six known issues, all by African Americans, including blues by Hattie McDaniel and Lena and Sylvester Kimbrough, were pressed in very small quantities and sold only in Holmes's store. Holmes is also believed to have recorded Julia Lee but the results were not issued. Other companies used his studio to record in Kansas City. The label ceased trading in 1929, in which year Winston Holmes himself recorded blues for Paramount. Meritt was the only black-owned label to record outside the major northern centers before the 1940s.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
Jydstrup, Doug. "Winston Holmes: Kansas City Promoter." 78 Quarterly no. 2 (1968).
Randolph, John. "A Pioneer Race Recorder." Jazz Journal x, no. 2 (1957): 11.
Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

Discography: DGR; Sutton

MGM (55000 R&B SERIES)

Founded in Hollywood in 1946 as a division of the major motion picture corporation, MGM launched a short-lived R&B series in 1954 that lasted less than two years and included mainly New York City-based artists such as "Jimmy Newsome, Baby Dee, and Claude Cloud & His Thunder-Claps" (in reality Leroy Kirkland's band of session musicians). In 1972 the MGM label was sold to Polydor Records, now a part of the Universal group.

DAVE PENNY

Bibliography

Pearlin, Victor. "M-G-M 55000." Whiskey, Women, And ... 16 (Spring 1987): 5.
Ruppli, Michel. The M-G-M Labels. 3 vols. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1998.

Discography: McGrath

MICKLE, ELMON "DRIFTING SLIM"

b. 24 February 1919; Keo, AR
d. 15 September 1977; Los Angeles, CA

Harmonica player who later learned drums and guitar. His early harmonica influence was John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson through records and personal meetings in the 1930s. He performed in Arkansas in the 1940s, including radio shows on KDRK and KGHI. In 1951 he formed a band with guitarists Baby Face Turner, Crippled Red (Junior Brooks), and drummer Bill Russell, with which he recorded for the Bihari brothers' labels Modern and RPM. Later he learned drums and guitar to perform as a one-man band.

In 1957 he moved to Los Angeles, working day jobs but still performing at house parties and other informal occasions. Through 1966 he recorded for small R&B labels, but that year he was discovered by Frank Scott, Henry Vestine, and Pete Welding. He then recorded for the Blue Horizon and Milestone album labels in sessions supervised by Welding. Afterward he performed at college campuses and folk festivals into the early 1970s. His last years were hampered by illness, and he died of cancer. His date of death has been reported variously as September 14, 15, or 17, 1977.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Larkin
 Scott, Frank. "Driftin' Slim (Elmon Mickle)" [obituary].
Living Blues no. 35 (November/December 1977): 39.

Discography: AMG; LSFPMIGHTY CLOUDS OF JOY

Formed in 1959 in Los Angeles, California. The innovative vocal group created by Joe Ligon and Johnny Martin was the primary pioneer of popularizing gospel music as it assimilated mainstream concepts to modernize the genre. The group made its recording debut in 1960 on Peacock with the single "Steal Away to Jesus." Its first album, Family Circle, was released the next year. It enlarged and upgraded the gospel format, using a full band and embellishing the vocals with slick choreography in live performance. As the years progressed, the group, the first gospel unit to appear on the Soul Train television program, incorporated elements of funk and disco into its sound. It remained active for four decades after its founding, headlining its own shows while opening concerts for everyone from Marvin Gaye to the Rolling Stones.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Larkin

Discography: AMG (Jason Ankeny); LarkinMILBURN, AMOS

- b. 1 April 1927; Houston, TX
- d. 3 January 1980; Houston, TX

An R&B singer, piano player, and sometime composer, Amos Milburn began his career in Houston and continued it on the West Coast, after being discharged from his Navy service in the Philippines during World War II. He first played in Houston clubs and specialized in boogie-woogie ("Amos Boogie," "Aladdin Boogie"), barrelhouse, up-tempo, and sometimes very slow blues.

At only age nineteen, Milburn recorded Don Raye's classic boogie "Down the Road Apiece" (1946), later covered by Chuck Berry as well as the Rolling Stones and Manfred Mann. Milburn's "Chicken Shack Boogie" went to number one in R&B charts in 1948 and sold a million copies for Aladdin Records. Influenced by Louis Jordan, the song "Chicken Shack Boogie" remains one of the few hits that Milburn wrote himself, though he had the assistance of talent agent Lola Anne Cullum.

Amos Milburn admired pianists such as Pete Johnson, Albert Ammons, and Meade "Lux" Lewis, but also Ivory Joe Hunter and his lifetime friend Charles Brown (who also recorded for Aladdin). A skilled musician, Amos Milburn could create sensual moods with slow blues, often with a languorous saxophone backing, similar to Charles Brown's early style, such as in "Operation Blues," "Cinch Blues," "Money Hustlin' Women," "Sad and Blue," and "Mean Women." In 1949, Milburn also recorded a version of Brown's classic, "Drifting Blues." After many successful 78s, Milburn released his first ten-inch album, Party After Hours, in 1952.

From 1949 to 1955, Amos Milburn and his Aladdin Chickenshakers performed many memorable songs, with themes often related to alcohol: "Bad, Bad Whisky" (number one in R&B charts in 1950), "Thinking and Drinking" (number eight in 1952), "Let Me Go Home, Whisky" (number three in R&B charts in 1953), "Good, Good Whisky" (which went number five in R&B charts in 1954), "Milk and Water" (1954), and "Vicious, Vicious Vodka" (1954). By the time Amos Milburn issued "Rum & Coca Cola" (1957), his alcoholism had become severe. His career began to fade, at a time when rock 'n' roll could have brought him more successes.

In that same vein, Amos Milburn released in 1953 what remains his best known song: "One Scotch, One Bourbon, One Beer," composed by Rudy Tooms. The song was later covered by John Lee Hooker, Alfred Brown (who did a ska version in the late 1960s), and George Thorogood and the Delaware Destroyers.

From 1963, Amos Milburn worked briefly for Motown Records, King, and United Artists, but health problems confined Milburn to a wheelchair in the early 1970s. He continued recording until 1979, when one of his legs was amputated. Amos Milburn passed away on January 3, 1980. His influence was strong on piano players from Fats Domino to Nat King Cole. He remains a reference for blues and rock 'n' roll pianists.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; LSFP; Santelli

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Aladdin/Score; Brown, Charles; Rolling Stones

MILES, JOSEPHINE “JOSIE”

MILES, JOSEPHINE “JOSIE”

b. ca. 1900; Summerville, SC
d. ca. 1953–1965; Kansas City, MO

Singer who moved to New York City in the early 1920s and was quickly hired in black musical theater and revues. She recorded for various blues labels including Black Swan in 1922–1925. In 1928, she recorded sacred music in two Gennett sessions. Thereafter she turned more to church activity, especially in Kansas City, where she reportedly died in a car accident.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

MILES, LIZZIE

b. Elizabeth Mary Landreaux, 31 March 1895; New Orleans, LA
d. 17 March 1963; New Orleans, LA

Vocalist. Half-sister of Edna Hicks; Miles was her first husband's name. Worked with early jazz bands and in minstrel shows and circuses from 1909 to 1921, when she moved to New York and began recording blues. Her “You're Always Messin' Round with My Man” (1923, Victor 19083) is cited as the first blues record issued in Britain (HMV B1703). Inactive through illness from 1931 to 1933, she worked in Chicago and New York clubs from 1935 to 1938, then retired to New Orleans. She returned to Chicago in 1939, recording with Melrose Stompers, including “Stranger Blues”/“Twenty Grand Blues” (1939, Vocalion 05392). She again retired in 1942, but after 1950 began a second career performing blues and vaudeville songs with New Orleans jazz bands, notably with Sharkey Bonano and George Lewis. In this period she specialized in singing in Creole French as well as English, often in the same song. Moans and Blues (ca. 1954, Cook 1182) showcases the blues side of this repertoire.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli
Chilton, John. Who's Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.
Griffiths, David. Hot Jazz from Harlem to Storyville. Lanham, MD: Scarecrow Press, 1998.

Discography: DGR; Harris; Lord; LSFP

MILES, LUKE “LONG GONE”

b. 8 May 1925; Lachute, LA
d. 22 or 23 November 1987; Los Angeles, CA

A disciple and protégé of Lightnin' Hopkins, country blues vocalist Miles recorded four sides with his mentor for Tradition (1959). A session for Mercury (later issued on Sundown) and a full-length LP for World Pacific followed. After playing Newport in 1966, Miles disappeared into obscurity.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Harris
Aldin, Mary Katherine. “Luke ‘Long Gone’ Miles.” Living Blues no. 78 (January/February 1988): 92–93.

Discography: LSFP

See also Williamson, Sonny Boy II (Aleck Miller)

MILLER, CLARENCE HORATIO “BIG”

b. 18 December 1922; Sioux City, IA
d. 9 June 1992; Edmonton, Alberta, Canada

Jazz and blues singer in the Kansas City styles of Big Joe Turner, Jimmy Rushing, and Walter Brown. Among his tour credits were singing with the bands of Jay McShann (1949–1954), Duke Ellington (1955), Lionel Hampton (1949), and Count Basie (1962). He also had many credits in American and Canadian radio and television.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: Lord

MILLER, JAY D. “J. D.”

b. 5 May 1922; Iota, LA
d. 23 March 1996; Crowley, LA

A prolific producer and recording engineer who captured the full spectrum of South Louisiana music at his Crowley studio, J. D. Miller ran his own modest regional labels, supervised sessions for other local start-ups, and leased some of his most memorable material to larger labels for national distribution.

Miller launched his first label, Fais Do Do, in 1946, followed by Feature in 1947, operating out of an electric repair shop he ran with his father. Initially aiming for the Cajun and hillbilly markets and forging links with Nashville, he became active in blues after the success of his first record in that genre, “Bad Luck” by Lightnin’ Slim, a down-home bluesman from the Baton Rouge, an area that Miller soon mined for other blues talent, including Slim Harpo, Lazy Lester, Lonesome Sundown, and Silas Hogan. He developed a long-standing relationship with Nashville-based Excello, which released many of his productions between 1955 and 1966. Sparse production, stripped-down instrumentation, and natural reverb gave Miller’s guitar and harp-based blues recordings a distinctive, gloomy sound, sometimes called “swamp blues.”

Other Miller recording artists included Guitar Gable, King Karl, Katie Webster, and Warren Storm, who played in the New Orleans R&B-influenced “swamp pop” style, characterized by horn sections and triplet piano. He also cut rock ’n’ roll, R&B, Cajun, zydeco, and comedy for his own Rocko, Zynn, Kajun, and Cajun Classics labels, and devoted his Rebel label, with its Confederate flag logo, to country music with overtly anti-civil rights, anti-Great Society lyrics. In the late 1960s, he largely turned over the music business to his son Mark, who operated his newly opened Master-Trak studio, ran the Blues Unlimited label, and recorded younger artists like Buckwheat Zydeco and Wayne Toups & ZydeCajun.

Miller was also a songwriter of note, penning country hits like “It Wasn’t God Who Made Honky Tonk Angels” and using the pseudonym Jay West when publishing blues tunes.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

- Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
 Bernard, Shane. “J. D. Miller and Floyd Soileau: A Comparison of Two Small Town Recordmen of Acadiana.” Louisiana Folklife Journal XV (December 1991). http://www.louisianafolklife.org/LT/creole_articles.html.
 Broven, John. South to Louisiana: The Music of the Cajun Bayous. Gretna, LA: Pelican, 1983.
 Hannusch, Jeff. “J. D. ‘Jay’ Miller” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 128 (July/August 1996): 55.

Selected Recordings

- Various artists. The Sound of the Swamp: The Best of Excello, Vol. 1 (1990, Rhino CD 70896).

MILLER, POLK

b. 2 August 1844; near Burkeville, Prince Edward County, VA

d. 20 October 1913; Richmond, VA

Miller, a white man, spent much time in the company of slaves on his father’s plantation and was consequently fascinated by black culture and learned to play the banjo during the 1850s in an “old time” pluck-and-strum style. He served in the Confederate Army and established himself as a pharmacist in Richmond after the Civil War was over. He continued to collect Southern folk tales and songs, did some composing, and, in 1892, debuted at a benefit concert. A year later, at age forty-nine, he decided to abandon his drug business and embark on a career as an itinerant “darkey dialectician” and “banjoist.” For the next five years he toured the United States extensively as a solo performer, but from about 1899 he began touring with a black vocal group from the Richmond community, known as the Old South Quartette. This pioneering racially mixed group appeared “in the most exclusive social clubs in New York, Boston, Baltimore, Washington, Pittsburgh and Cleveland.” The personnel changed frequently (about twenty individuals in total). In 1912, due to racial discrimination, Miller had to separate from the quartette, which continued to perform in the New York area.

Miller’s repertoire included Negro spirituals as well as white hymns, folk and popular banjo tunes, and plantation melodies, interwoven with lectures about life in the South in which he defended the institution of slavery, often in racist terms. Late in 1909 the group consisting of Randall Graves (first tenor), James L. Stamper (bass), unidentified (second tenor), (baritone), and Polk Miller (banjo and vocal) recorded a series of seven Edison cylinders—four spirituals and three secular songs. “The Watermelon Party” (written by James Stamper) is a roaring plantation melody, the lyrics are a litany of black country foodstuff. “Jerusalem Morning” is a camp meeting song and probably the catchiest of the seven numbers, the group renders it as a popular, minstrel-bastardized version [Seroff]. In 1928, fifteen years after the death of Miller, the quartette recorded the same songs again for the QRS label in Long Island City, New York, in the very same style. However, the historical importance of Miller and the quartette lies in the fact that their preservationist tendencies also document the underexposed black secular folk music (“The Laughing Song”). The entire output has been reissued on CD (Document DOCD 5061).

RAINER E. LOTZ

MILLER, POLK

Bibliography

- Funk, R. Notes accompanying The Earliest Negro Vocal Quartets 1894–1928 (Document CD DOCD5061).
Obrecht, J. “Polk Miller’s Old South Quartette.” Victrola and 78 Journal no. 6 (1995).
Polk Miller Scrapbooks. Deposited at Valentine Historical Museum, Richmond, VA.
Seroff, D. “Polk Miller and the Old South Quartette.” 78 Quarterly 1, no. 3 (1988): 27–41.

Discography: DGR (under Old South Quartette)

MILLET, McKINLEY “LPL”

- b. 25 October 1935; New Orleans, LA
d. 29 June 1997; New Orleans, LA

Vocalist, composer. Li'l Millet & His Creoles created an R&B classic with “Rich Woman” for Specialty Records in 1955 but left music and faded into obscurity until reappearing on the New Orleans music scene in the mid-1990s.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Discography: LSFP

- “Rich Woman” (1955, Specialty Records).
Creole Kings of New Orleans (Specialty).

MILLINDER, LUCKY

- b. 8 August 1900; Anniston, AL
d. 28 September 1966; New York City, NY

Bandleader. Began performing as dancer and compère in Chicago under name Lucius Venable. A bandleader from 1931, Millinder moved to New York in 1932. He led the Blue Mills Rhythm Band from 1934 to 1938, changing its billing to the Lucky Millinder Orchestra in 1937. He led Bill Doggett’s band in 1938–1939, and made a significant contribution to development of rhythm and blues in a notable big band he led from 1940, which featured many important instrumentalists, and singers Sister Rosetta Tharpe and Wynonie Harris. Millinder never read music, but had an excellent ear and memory for arrangements, as well as a flair for showmanship. He led bands into the 1950s. Later pursuits included being a disc jockey for a time.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern
Chilton, John. Who’s Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.

- Schuller, Gunther. The Swing Era: The Development of Jazz 1930–1945. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
Shaw, Arnold. Honkers and Shouters: The Golden Years of Rhythm and Blues. New York: Macmillan, 1978.

Discography: DGR; Lord; LSFP

Selected Recordings

- “Ride, Red, Ride” (1935, Columbia 3087D); “Algiers Stomp” (1936, Columbia 3158D); “Big John Special” (1936, Columbia 3162D); “Jammin’ for the Jackpot” (1937, Variety 634); “Trouble in Mind” (1941, Decca 4041); “Mason Flyer/Little John Special” (1942, Brunswick 03406); Savoy (1942, Decca 18353); “Shout, Sister Shout” (1942, Decca 18386); “Shipyard Social Function” (1943, Decca 18674); “Let It Roll” (1947, Decca 24182).

MILTON, ROY

- b. 31 July 1907; Wynnewood, OK
d. 18 September 1983; Los Angeles, CA

Drummer/vocalist. He led a band in Tulsa, Oklahoma, about 1929 before joining Ernie Fields in 1931, initially as a singer. He moved to the West Coast in 1933, and formed his own band in Los Angeles in 1938. By 1941, long-stay members Camille Howard and Hosea Sapp had joined and during the war he had his own club, Roy’s Night Spot. By 1946, the name Solid Senders had been adopted. Recording began in 1945 for Hamp-Tone and Juke Box, moving to his own Roy Milton label in 1946 and to Specialty in 1947. The Solid Senders played innovative jump/R&B, featuring the leader’s singing and swinging drumming, Howard’s superb blues piano, and a succession of tenor saxophonists, including Lorenzo “Buddy” Floyd, then William Gaither (1947–1948), Benny Waters (1949–1950), and Eddie Taylor (from 1950). On trumpet, Sapp was replaced by Arthur Walker (1949–1950), then Charles Gillum. “Burma Road Blues” (1945, Hamp-Tone 104); “Milton’s Boogie” (1945, Roy Milton 103); “Roy Milton Blues”/“Groovy Blues” (1946, Roy Milton 105), and “I Have News for You”/“T-Town Twist” (1951, Specialty 407) are good examples of their work. Milton left music in the 1960s, but launched a comeback with an appearance on the Johnny Otis Show in 1970. He toured France as a vocalist in 1977 and recorded for Black & Blue.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

- Harris, Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Bernholm, Jonas. Liner notes for The Grandfather of R&B (1981, Jukebox LII JB600, Stockholm).
Leadbitter, Mike. “Roy Milton, Life and Times.” Blues Unlimited no. 108 (August/September 1974): 6.

Shaw, Arnold. Honkers and Shouters: The Golden Years of Rhythm and Blues. New York: Collier Books, 1978.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

MILTONE

Incorporated in Los Angeles in 1946 under the aegis of jump-blues singer and drummer Roy Milton, the Roy Milton Record Co. and its successor, Miltone, sported distinctive cartoon-styled labels drawn by William Alexander. Specifically issuing records by Milton's band before Milton was signed to an exclusive contract with Specialty Records in 1947, subsequently the label issued 78s by other West Coast-based performers such as Jimmy Grissom, Effie Smith, Peppy Prince, and Jesse Price. In 1948 a distribution deal was signed with DeLuxe Records of Newark, New Jersey, resulting in Miltone recordings appearing on DeLuxe and vice versa. The Miltone masters were bought by Gotham Records of Philadelphia in 1950.

DAVE PENNY

Bibliography

Seroff, Doug. "Roy Milton & Miltone Records" Blues Unlimited no. 115 (September/October 1975): 10.

Discography: McGrath

The Chronological Roy Milton 1945–1946 (2002, Classics 5041).

MINNER, D. C.

b. 28 January 1935; Rentiesville, OK

Guitarist and teacher Minner was raised in his grandmother's whiskey joint. After U.S. Army service, he performed as a sideman with Lowell Fulson, Freddy King, and Eddie Floyd. In the mid-1970s he met and married Selby, a professional bassist. They own and operate the Down Home Blues Club in Rentiesville, Oklahoma, and participate in blues in the schools programs.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Carney, George, and Hugh Foley. "D. C. and Selby Minner: Oklahoma Down Home Blues." Living Blues no. 139 (May/June 1998): 40–45.

D. C. Minner website, <http://www.dcminnerblues.com/> (accessed February 11, 2005).

MIRACLE/PREMIUM

Chicago blues label of the post-World War II years. The company was started by Lee Egalnick and Lew Simpkins in 1946, and quickly became Chicago's most successful independent label. Miracle prospered on a slew of hits by blues singer and pianist Memphis Slim (notably "Messin' Around," 1948, and "Blue and Lonesome," 1949), jazz singer Gladys Palmer ("Fool That I Am," 1947), tenor saxophonist Eddie Chamblee ("Back Street," 1949), and pianist Sonny Thompson (notably "Long Gone" and "Late Freight," 1948). An alliance with New York-based Sunrise during 1948–1949 added hitmaker Al Hibbler ("Trees," 1948). Miracle's roster also included gospel singers Brother John Sellers and Robert Anderson, and blues singers Johnny Temple and Lillie Mae. Inexplicably Miracle failed in 1950. Egalnick and Simpkins quickly launched a successor label, Premium, recording with some success sax blowers such as Lynn Hope ("Tenderly," 1950) and Tab Smith, as well as such Miracle acts as Memphis Slim ("Mother Earth," 1951) and Robert Anderson. Premium was defunct by late 1951, but subsequently Simpkins built a new label, United, with many of the Miracle/Premium artists, notably Tab Smith, Memphis Slim, and Eddie Chamblee.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/miracle.html> (accessed June 27, 2003).

Discography: McGrath

MISS RHAPSODY

b. Viola Gertrude Wells, 14 December 1902; Newark, NJ

d. 22 December 1984; Belleville, NJ

Longtime singer of blues and jazz in the cabaret style. Active since the 1920s, she retired in the late 1940s for family life. In the early 1970s she returned to performing by joining Clyde Bernhardt's Harlem Blues and Jazz Band. Her nickname came from a 1930s writer who noted her singing "Rhapsody in Rhythm" and "Rhapsody in Song."

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Harris, Sheldon. "Viola Wells (Miss Rhapsody)" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 64 (March/April 1985): 69–71.

Discography: Lord; LSPF

MISSISSIPPI

Mississippi was admitted to the United States as the twentieth state on December 10, 1817. From 1861 until 1865 it was one of the Confederate States of America. After the end of the Civil War levees were built along the Mississippi River, and the Mississippi Delta was drained and cleared for farmland.

Mississippi may be said to have five regions: the northern hill country; the central piney woods region with the state capital, Jackson; the Mississippi Delta in the northwest portion of the state, between the Mississippi and Yazoo Rivers; the eastern strip alongside the border with Alabama; and the Gulf Coast.

Much of the history of Mississippi blues has been central to the development of American blues. The specific artists and trends that have been prominent in that development are described in the Blues entry. The Mississippi Delta has been where many of the most distinctive and accomplished blues guitarists and singers came from. The hill country fife-and-drum music is reflected in the guitar rhythms of Fred McDowell and R. L. Burnside. The cotton crossroads of Bentonia are where Henry Stuckey, Skip James, and Jack Owens developed and performed their distinctive minor-scale blues. Jackson and the Gulf Coast have had several excellent pianists in addition to guitarists and singers. Although many black Mississippians have moved for better opportunities of many kinds, others, for whom Mississippi blues in its ever-changing ways continues to be performed, have stayed.

EDWARD KOMARA

BibliographyThe Mississippi Delta

Cobb, James C. The Most Southern Place on Earth: The Mississippi Delta and the Roots of Regional Identity. New York; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992.

Evans, David. Big Road Blues: Tradition and Creativity in the Folk Blues. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1982.

Gordon, Robert. Can't Be Satisfied: The Life and Times of Muddy Waters. Boston: Little, Brown, 1982.

Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Pantheon, 1993.

Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Viking, 1981.

Wardlow, Gayle Dean. Chasin' That Devil Music. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

The Hill Country

Mitchell, George. Blow My Blues Away. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1971.

Bentonia, Mississippi

Olson, Ted. "I Believe in Right at All Times": Bentonia Blues." Living Blues no. 103 (May/June 1992): 38–45

———. "I Feel Like It Is a Part of Me": Bentonia Blues." Living Blues no. 104 (July/August 1992): 35–39.

Jackson

Gert zur Heide, Karl. Deep South Piano: The Story of Little Brother Montgomery. London: Studio Vista, 1970.

Ryan, Marc. Trumpet Records: Diamonds on Farish Street. Jackson, MS: University Press of Mississippi, 2004.

Eastern Strip

Porterfield, Nolan. Jimmie Rodgers: The Life and Times of America's Blue Yodeler. Urbana: University of Illinois, 1979.

1960s Rediscovery Period

Groom, Bob. The Blues Revival. London: Studio Vista, 1971.

Mississippi Today

Imes, Birney. Juke Joint: Photographs. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1990.

Nicholson, Robert. Mississippi: The Blues Today! New York: Da Capo, 1998.

See also Blues; LeveesMISSISSIPPI JOOK BAND

Recording group at the 1936 Hattiesburg, Mississippi, sessions held by the ARC labels and supervised by the talent scout H. C. Speir. Its members consisted of singers/guitarists Roosevelt Graves and his brother Uaroy (or Aaron), and pianist Cooney Vaughan. Their recordings are valuable in part as they are the only recordings of Vaughan, a celebrated pianist of that time. In 1976 critic Robert Palmer cited these recordings as having "fully formed rock and roll guitar and a stomping rock and roll beat."

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Palmer, Robert. "Rock Begins." In Rolling Stone History of Rock and Roll, edited by Jim Miller. New York: Random House/Rolling Stone Press, 1976.

See also Graves, RooseveltMISSISSIPPI MATILDA

b. Matilda Witherspoon, 27 January 1914; Hattiesburg, MS

d. 15 November 1978; Chicago, IL

Born Matilda Witherspoon, the Mississippi blues singer married singer/guitarist Eugene Powell (aka Sonny Boy Nelson) in 1935. The couple recorded for Bluebird the following year, with Matilda cutting four songs as vocalist, including the stirring “Hard Working Woman.” She separated from Powell in 1952 and moved to Chicago, where she spent her remaining years singing in the church.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Harris
Eagle, Bob, and Stephen LaVere. “Hard Working Woman: Mississippi Matilda: Matilda Witherspoon.” Living Blues no. 8 (Spring 1972): 7.

Discography: DGR

Selected Recordings in Reissue

Various artists. Louisiana Blues: Sonny Boy Nelson with Mississippi Matilda & Robert Hill (no date, Wolf Records WSE 109 CD).

MISSISSIPPI SHEIKS

Lonnie Chatmon

b. 8 November 1890 or June 1888; Greenville, MS
d. 1942 or 1943; near Bolton, MS

Walter Vinson

b. 2 February 1901; Bolton, MS
d. 22 April 1975; Chicago, IL

Armenter “Bo” Chatmon (also known as Bo Carter)

b. Listed as 8 November 1890; 21 March 1893; or January 1894
d. 21 September 1964; Memphis, TN

Sam Chatmon

b. Listed as 10 January 1897; 10 January 1899; or 29 August 1900; Mississippi
d. 2 February 1983; Hollandale, MS

The Mississippi Sheiks were the most commercially successful black string band of the prewar era, and their music illustrates a wide range of African American music of the period. The steadiest lineup of the group, which made nearly one hundred recordings between 1930 and 1935, consisted of fiddler (see Fiddle entry) Lonnie Chatmon and singer/guitarist (see Guitar entry) Walter Vinson. The duo was also occasionally joined on their recording dates by Lonnie’s brothers, Armenter “Bo” Chatmon (who also had a successful solo career as Bo Carter) and Sam Chatmon. Along with Charlie McCoy, this group of musicians also recorded in a few different instrumental combinations and under several pseudonyms, including the Mississippi Blacksnakes, the Mississippi Mud Steppers, Chatmon’s Mississippi Hot Footers, the Chatman [sic] Brothers, Walter Jacobs & Lonnie Carter, the Jackson Blue Boys, and the Down South Boys. They also provided accompaniment on recordings by solo blues artists, including some by Bo Chatmon himself.

The Mississippi Sheiks grew out of a string band formed by members of the highly musical Chatmon family, who resided on the Gaddis and McLaurin plantation just outside the small town of Bolton, Mississippi. The father of the family was Henderson Chatmon (1850–1934), a sharecropper of mixed racial origins who had been a fiddler since the days of slavery. With his wife Eliza, he reportedly had thirteen children, eleven of which were sons who all played musical instruments. From around 1910 until 1928, seven of them formed a string band known as the Chatmon Brothers, and they performed at country dances, parties, and picnics.

The central figure of the group was Lonnie, an accomplished fiddler who was equally skilled at country breakdowns, blues, jazz, and popular tunes. By the time of World War I, he had learned to read music and was purchasing sheet music in nearby Jackson and teaching popular tunes to his brothers. Lonnie’s proficient playing and professionalism and the fact that the group drew from a variety of musical sources helped the Chatmon Brothers gain a great deal of popularity among both black and white audiences. Performing for listeners on both sides of the color line enabled the group to develop a wide-ranging repertoire that included square dance music, waltzes, ragtime, country blues, and Tin Pan Alley tunes.

Around 1921, Lonnie recruited the Chatmons’ neighbor, Walter Vinson, to play with the group. By 1928, the seven-piece Chatmon Brothers had basically dissolved (apparently in part because of Lonnie’s regular habit of keeping more than his share of the group’s profits), and Lonnie and Walter began performing regularly as a duo. In 1930, the two men were discovered by Polk Brockman of OKeh Records, and he signed them to the label. At their first recording session on February 17, 1930, in

MISSISSIPPI SHEIKS

Shreveport, Louisiana, when Brockman asked the musicians for the name of their group, Walter suggested the name Mississippi Sheiks (most likely after “The Sheik of Araby,” a hit song of the era).

The group’s two most successful recordings were made at this first session. “Sitting on Top of the World” was their biggest seller, and it spawned a number of cover versions and became a standard among blues, Western swing, and bluegrass artists (see Country Music entry). The group’s other big hit, “Stop and Listen Blues,” was derived from Tommy Johnson’s “Big Road Blues” and illustrates Walter’s outstanding skills as a blues guitarist (a talent he frequently restrained when accompanying Lonnie’s fiddling). Interestingly, two of the songs recorded at the Sheiks’ first session (“The Sheik Waltz” and “The Jazz Fiddler”) were listed in OKeh’s hillbilly catalog and marketed to white listeners.

During the next five years, the Mississippi Sheiks made recordings for OKeh, Paramount, and Bluebird, and they continued to play for audiences, touring extensively throughout the South and beyond. The Sheiks’ personnel for live engagements was apparently more loose knit than on their recording dates, with other Chatmon family members still often joining the group for appearances at dances and parties.

Though the Mississippi Sheiks never quite matched the success of their first recordings, they were able to maintain a significant level of popularity throughout their recording career. By the time of the Sheiks’ last recording session in 1935, however, the harder sounds of urban bluesmen had become more fashionable among blues audiences than the country-based styles associated with the Sheiks. Along with Sam, Lonnie cut his last recording session on October 15, 1936, and the pair were credited as the Chatman [sic] Brothers. Soon after, Lonnie moved near the town of Anguilla and later back to the area around Bolton, where he suffered from heart problems until his death in 1942 or 1943.

Bo continued to make recordings until 1940; a few years later, he moved to Memphis, where he died in 1964. Walter moved to Chicago in 1940, recorded there the following year, and subsequently retired from music for the most part. In 1961, he made some recordings for the Riverside label with a group of musicians who were credited as the Mississippi Sheiks, though he was actually the only original member of the group. A decade later, he teamed up again with Sam (as well as with string band veterans Carl Martin and Ted Bogan) to record an album called The New Mississippi Sheiks that was released on the Rounder label in 1972. Walter passed away in 1975, and Sam, who achieved much fame throughout the 1960s and 1970s performing in clubs and at festivals, died in 1983. Among the albums Sam recorded in the early 1970s was one on the Blue Goose label called The Mississippi Sheik.

ANDREW LEACH

Bibliography

AMG (Jocelyn Lane); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Sallis, James. “Mississippi Sheiks: The Bluesmen.” In The Guitar Players: One Instrument and Its Masters in American Music, pp. 13–27. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1994.

Waterman, Christopher A. “Race Music: Bo Chatmon, ‘Corrine Corinna,’ and the Excluded Middle.” In Music and the Racial Imagination, edited by Ronald Radano and Philip Bohlman, pp. 167–205. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2000.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

MITCHELL, BOBBY

b. 16 August 1935; Algiers, LA

d. 17 March 1989; New Orleans, LA

Vocals, trumpet, composer. Bobby Mitchell & the Toppers were a popular 1950s New Orleans R&B group whose Imperial recordings were produced by Dave Bartholomew. Mitchell left music, worked as an X-ray technician, and hosted a show on WWOZ-FM. He worked with the Toppers (Lloyd Bellaire, tenor; Joseph Butler, tenor; Willie Bridges, baritone; Frank Bocage, bass; Gabriel Fleming, piano), Dave Bartholomew, and Dr. John.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder); Larkin

Discography: AMG; LSFP

“I’m Crying,” “Rack ‘Em Back,” “Try Rock ‘n’ Roll,” “I’m Gonna Be a Wheel Someday” (1953–1957, Imperial). I’m Gonna Be a Wheel Someday (Bear Family/Night Train International; reissue).

MITCHELL, GEORGE

b. 1944; Atlanta, GA

Inspired by Samuel Charters’ book The Country Blues, Atlanta high school student George Mitchell and several friends traveled in 1961 to Memphis, where they recorded Will Shade of the Memphis Jug Band. On subsequent visits to Memphis, Mitchell documented Sleepy John Estes, Furry Lewis, Gus Cannon, and Charley Burse, and back in Atlanta he “rediscovered” prewar recording artists Buddy Moss and Peg Leg Howell. In 1963 Mitchell moved to Chicago, where, together with Mike Bloomfield, he booked and recorded traditional artists at the North Side club the Fickle Pickle. In 1967 and 1968 Mitchell made the debut recordings of North Mississippi artists including R. L. Burnside and the fife-and-drum musicians Napoleon Strickland and Othar Turner; he also recorded Mississippi Joe Callicott, Mississippi Fred McDowell, Johnny Woods, Houston Stackhouse, and Robert Nighthawk.

This fieldwork was documented in Mitchell’s book of photographs and prose Blow My Blues Away (Louisiana State University, 1971) and two similarly titled LPs on Arhoolie Records. Mitchell recorded blues, old-time, and gospel artists in Georgia and Alabama from the late 1960s through the 1980s, and produced in Atlanta the Georgia Grassroots Music Festival (1976–1979) and the National Downhome Blues Festival (1984). Mitchell’s recordings have been issued on the Southland, Rounder, Flyright, Revival, and Swingmaster labels, and through two CDs accompanying his book In Celebration of a Legacy: The Traditional Arts of the Lower Chattahoochee Valley (Columbus Museum, 1981; 1998). In 2002 the Fat Possum label acquired more than sixty hours of Mitchell’s recordings and initiated a reissue series.

SCOTT BARRETTA

MITCHELL, “LITTLE” WALTER

b. 19 March 1919; Pickens, AR
d. 10 January 1990; Toledo, OH

Singer and harmonica player. Served in the U.S. Army during World War II, after which he moved to Detroit. With his cousin, guitarist L. C. Greene, Mitchell recorded for the JVB and Dot labels in 1948 and 1952, respectively, whose issues of his music are invaluable documents of postwar Detroit blues. He continued to perform in the Detroit–Toledo area until illness in his last years.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
Rockwood, John. “Little Walter Mitchell.” Living Blues no. 92 (July/August 1990): 44.

Discography: LSFP

MITCHELL, MCKINLEY

b. 25 December 1934; Jackson, MS
d. 18 January 1986; Chicago Heights, IL

Chicago rhythm and blues artist whose distinctive raspy vocals built his career singing hard soul and blues. Mitchell’s first recording was for the small Boxer label, the explosive “Rock Everybody Rock” (1959), which was supported by the great Willie Johnson on guitar. In 1962, Mitchell recorded the deep soul ballad, “The Town I Live In,” which became a national hit on the One-derful label. His other notable releases on One-derful were “All of a Sudden” (1962), “I’m So Glad” (1962), and “A Bit of Soul” (1963). Mitchell left One-derful in 1964, and recorded in the blues vein for Willie Dixon during the late 1960s and early 1970s.

In 1976, for Bill Collins’s Big 3 label, Mitchell recorded “Trouble Blues.” When it subsequently became a hit in the South, he moved to the South. There he built a considerable career recording for two Jackson, Mississippi, labels, Malaco and Retta. At Malaco, which had picked up “Trouble Blues” for its Chimneyville imprint, Mitchell recorded a fine LP, McKinley Mitchell, and a number of fine blues and hard soul singles, notably “The End of the Rainbow” (1977), a national chart record. At Retta, owned by James Bennett, Mitchell during 1982–1983 recorded some of the hardest blues of his career, notably “Road of Love,” and came out with one album, I Won’t Be Back for More. Mitchell moved back to Chicago in 1985, and made one more record for Bill Collins before his death.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin
Pruter, Robert. “The McKinley Mitchell Story.” Juke Blues no. 12 (Spring 1988): 7–12.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

MITCHELL, WILLIE

b. 23 March 1928; Ashland, MS

Best known as recording producer. His initial work was as a Memphis studio session musician from the late 1950s through the 1960s, especially as the leader of the house band at Hi Records. In 1970 he became president of Hi Records, developed the 1970s Hi Records sound with heavy bass and drums and the Memphis Horns group, and with that sound he produced hit records with singers Al Green, Ann Peebles, and Syl Johnson. He left Hi in 1979. He continues to work in music as a producer.

MITCHELL, WILLIE

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Guralnick, Peter. Sweet Soul Music: Rhythm and Blues and the Southern Dream of Freedom. New York: Harper and Row, 1986.

MODERN BLUES RECORDINGS

Label owned by Daniel Jacobovitch in Pearl River, New York. Well known for its reissues of early recordings by Freddy King and Albert King, it has also produced new releases for singer Tommy Ridgley and harmonica player Little Hatch.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Modern Blues Recordings website, <http://www.bluespower.com/armod.htm> (accessed September 27, 2004).

MODERN/FLAIR/METEOR/KENT/RPM

Founded in Culver City, California, in 1945 by brothers Jules, Joe, and Saul Bihari, originally as Modern Music Records, the label was formed as a showcase for local Los Angeles singer/pianist Hadda Brooks. The initial releases by Brooks and Howard McGhee were well received, and in 1946 the label added Johnny Moore's Three Blazers and Gene Phillips to the roster. By 1947 the label was reborn as, simply, Modern Records and a wider market began to be exploited with pop, country, jazz, and blues releases. In the latter category the label saw success with Lightnin' Hopkins, Smokey Hogg, and, particularly, Pee Wee Crayton and John Lee Hooker who both topped the Billboard R&B charts in the late 1940s with "Blues After Hours" and "Boogie Children," respectively. With the sudden increase in fortunes, the R&B subsidiary RPM was launched in 1950, and almost from the start, the label was dominated by Memphis-based blues artists such as Howlin' Wolf, Rosco Gordon, and, especially, B. B. King.

The success of these issues persuaded the brothers to undertake several field trips in the early 1950s to capture other southern bluesmen, and to dedicate another offshoot label, Meteor, founded in Memphis in 1952 specifically to be managed by younger brother Lester Bihari, to tap into the rich musical heritage of that city and its surrounds. Lester recorded Elmore James, Rufus Thomas, and Little Milton and a host of country and rockabilly acts before Meteor's demise in 1957. Another subsidiary, Flair Records, was inaugurated in 1953 in Joe Bihari's name, and although it was to last just two years, it too issued important sides by Elmore James and Little Johnny Jones, Mercy Dee Walton, and James Reed.

By 1957, the popularity of white rock 'n' roll was beginning to take its toll on the small independent labels that specialized in black blues and R&B, so the Biharis discontinued most of their imprints and made a fresh start with Kent Records to concentrate on the popular vocal groups and the perennial B. B. King. Around the same time, they revived their old pop label, Crown Records, and relaunched it as a budget LP line, thereafter occasionally recording specifically to LP, but mainly reissuing their valuable back catalog.

DAVID PENNY

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

Scott, Frank, and Gary Paulsen. "Joe and Jules Bihari" [part 1]. Blues Unlimited no. 73 (June 1970): 9–12; [part 2]. Blues Unlimited no. 75 (September 1970): 11.

Discography: McGrath

Edwards, Dave, and Mike Callahan. "Modern Records Story." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/modern/modernstory.html> (accessed December 12, 2004).

The Birth of Modern Blues (1998, P-Vine PCD 5406).

The Modern Records Story (2001, Ace CDCHD 784).

The Travelling Record Man (2001, Ace CDCHD 813).

The Modern Down Home Blues Sessions #1 (2003, Ace CDCHD 876).

MOLTON, FLORA

b. 1908; Louisa County, VA

d. 31 May 1990; Washington, DC

Sacred singer who often accompanied herself on slide guitar in open D tuning. Near blind, she began as a preacher in 1925. She learned guitar in 1943, about the time she moved to Washington, D.C., and began performing on the streets. From 1963 on, she appeared on the folk music circuit. In time, she was regarded as one of the last of the Washington street singers.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

Discography: LSFP

MONTGOMERY, EURREAL “LITTLE BROTHER”

b. 18 April 1906; Kentwood, LA
d. 6 September 1985; Chicago, IL

Eurreal “Little Brother” Montgomery was one of the last of a generation of all-round pianists who traveled the Southern states, working for the crowds who frequented the speakeasies, dance halls, and bars of the townships, logging camps, and lumber camps of the region. Little Brother could play jazz, popular songs, and even Irish ballads with great facility, but it is as a bluesman that he has earned a place in history.

He was born in Kentwood, Louisiana, on April 18, 1906, one of ten children. The Montgomery family sang in the nearby Temple Chapel Baptist Church and nearly all of them could play an instrument. Little Brother himself started to play piano around the age of five and early on dropped out of school. His father owned a honky-tonk, and Little Brother derived much inspiration from visiting pianists booked at his father’s club, including Cooney Vaughn, Loomis Gibson, and Jelly Roll Morton. At eleven he began to earn his living from music, first in small towns in Louisiana and later in Vicksburg and New Orleans. By the age of fourteen he had left home and was on the road as a professional musician. He worked sometimes solo, or with guitarists such as Big Joe Williams, and sometimes with bands, including Sam Morgan’s and Buddy Petit’s Rhythm Aces.

In 1928 he toured the Midwest with Clarence Desdune’s Joyland Revellers, finally settling in Chicago the same year. While there he met Bob (Alexander) Robinson who gave him his first formal piano lessons. Robinson and his wife Aletha Dickerson owned a music store, and it was perhaps through them that Little Brother was introduced to Art Laibley of Paramount Records. Little Brother made his first solo recordings for Paramount in 1930, and also accompanied other singers such as Minnie Hicks and Irene Scruggs. In 1931, with the onset of the Depression, he traveled South to New Orleans and thence to Jackson, Mississippi. In Jackson he formed his own band, the Southland Troubadours, with whom he played dances and radio shows for the rest of the decade. This band, whose varied material included both jazz and blues, made extensive tours of Illinois, Wisconsin, and Michigan in 1932. Little Brother, however, never lost contact with his roots, and in 1935–1936 recorded a number of blues for Bluebird both as a soloist and accompanist. He returned to Chicago when the United States entered World War II and continued working both as a solo act, and with jazz bands such as those led by Kid Ory and Franz Jackson through to the 1950s. Continued success led to further recordings for a variety of labels, and 1960 saw his first visit to England. For the next twenty years he appeared in innumerable jazz and blues festivals, and visited Europe several times to great acclaim. After a long and full life he died in Chicago on September 6, 1985.

Little Brother’s blues piano style is firmly rooted in the Louisiana tradition relying on a flexibility and sparseness reminiscent of early gospel music. There are also influences in his playing from ragtime and early jazz. He had a huge repertoire, which included many compositions he had heard performed by other artists, so that his recordings are also an archive of the styles of some influential early pianists who were not fortunate enough to be recorded themselves.

According to Little Brother, he first heard a rudimentary piano blues called “The Forty-Fours” when he was a teenager in Ferriday, Louisiana. Then, together with two barrelhouse pianists, Long Tall Friday and Dehlco Roberts, he developed it into his best-known composition. The 44 Blues theme, though always associated with Little Brother, was first recorded by Roosevelt Sykes in 1929, and indeed it was the blues with which both men chose to make their recording debut. Sykes had apparently learned it from Lee Green, who in turn had been taught the theme by Little Brother in Soudheimer, Louisiana. Though he was not the first to record the 44 Blues theme, there can be no doubt that Little Brother’s 1930 Paramount recording, entitled “Vicksburg Blues,” is one of the definitive versions. A high-pitched searing vocal is featured over a piano accompaniment employing a rumbling bass line and a double-time right-hand pattern, which, as Little Brother says, is “the hardest barrelhouse blues of any blues in history to play because you have to keep two different times going in each hand.” “No Special Rider,” the only other side recorded at this session, is a compelling eight-to-the-bar boogie, again featuring his slightly nasal vocal, demonstrating how an accomplished blues pianist can break up the rhythm of a boogie pattern to add interest and excitement.

A further session in Chicago for Vocalion in 1931 produced the outstanding, rolling slow blues “Louisiana Blues” and the eight-to-the-bar “Frisco Hi-Ball Blues.” In the latter, the lyrics refer to the Santa Fe and Missouri-Pacific lines, and the term “hi-ball” referred to a “proceed” signal on the railroad, in which a hand or lantern was raised or swung above the head as a command to the engineer to start the train. The song features a tough vocal and the scintillating solo passages are quite outstanding, ranking with the very best of recorded blues piano.

MONTGOMERY, EURREAL "LITTLE BROTHER"

Little Brother did not record again for four years, but in the mid-1930s he produced some of his finest work. A first short session for Bluebird in New Orleans in 1935 was followed by a second longer one in 1936, the latter taking place at the St. Charles Hotel, New Orleans. This session, in which Little Brother recorded no less than twenty-three titles in a single day, of which eighteen were solo performances, included remakes of his earlier "Vicksburg Blues" and "Louisiana Blues" together with many new blues and three superb piano solos. Of these, "Farish Street Jive" is based on an older composition entitled "Dudlow Joe," also recorded by Lee Green; "Crescent City Blues" is a number Little Brother learned from Loomis Gibson, who called it "Loomis Gibson Blues"; and "Shreveport Farewell" is a ragtime-influenced piece having a delicately picked stride bass with echoes of Jelly Roll Morton.

The St. Charles Hotel session was perhaps the artistic pinnacle of Little Brother's blues recording career, although he continued to record throughout the postwar years, adapting his style to diverse rhythm and blues groups and Dixieland lineups with equal facility. A consummate artist, Little Brother richly deserves the accolade that he was one of the finest blues soloists and accompanists of all time.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

- Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern
Chilton, John. Who's Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.
Gert zur Heider, Karl. Deep South Piano: The Story of Little Brother Montgomery. London: Studio Vista, 1970.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

MONTGOMERY WARD

Record label started in 1933 by the eponymous mail-order company, drawing its pressings and material from RCA-Victor, except from September to December 1935 when Decca was the source. From June 1937 to mid-1939, both Decca and RCA-Victor were used, after which records were sourced from Varsity until the label returned to RCA from mid-1940 until withdrawal in 1941. Most of the label's blues repertoire comes from Victor and includes issues by Leroy Carr, Walter Davis, Tampa Red, and Washboard Sam.

HOWARD RYE

Discography: DGR; Sutton

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

MONTOYA, COCO

b. Henry Montoya, 2 October 1951;
Santa Monica, CA

Former drummer for Albert Collins, Montoya learned electric guitar from Collins, and added singing to transform himself into a front-line blues festival favorite. It was on an emergency fill-in gig as drummer for Collins in the mid-1970s that Montoya first began playing blues after a few years of playing rock 'n' roll. Five years of touring with Collins led not only to Montoya learning lead guitar, but also to a long-standing job playing guitar in John Mayall's Bluesbreakers band for most of the 1980s and early 1990s. In 1995, he stepped out as a solo act, and has been busy touring and recording under his own name since.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

- AMG (John Bush and Al Campbell)
McSorley, O. "Carrying on the Collins Tradition: Coco Montoya." Blues Revue no. 21 (1996): 42-44.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

- Gotta Mind to Travel* (1995, Blind Pig 5020).
Ya Think I'd Know Better (1996, Blind Pig 5033).
Just Let Go (1997, Blind Pig 5043).
Can't Look Back (2002, Alligator 4885).

MONTRELL, ROY

b. 27 February 1928; New Orleans, LA
d. 16 March 1979; Amsterdam, The Netherlands

Roy Montrell, a dominant guitarist in the New Orleans music scene during the 1950s and 1960s, long anchored the Fats Domino band, contributed to scores of recordings, and created the R&B classic "That Mellow Saxophone." He worked with Fats Domino, Dave Bartholomew, Paul Gayten, Bobby Mitchell, Roy Milton, Lloyd Price, Clarence "Frogman" Henry, Allen Toussaint, Art Neville, and Dr. John.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Broven, John. Walking to New Orleans. Bexhill-on-Sea: Blues Unlimited, 1974; reprinted, Gretna: Pelican, 1978, 1983, 1988.

Discography: LSPF

MOONEY, JOHN

b. 3 April 1955; East Orange, NJ

Mooney grew up in Mendon, near Rochester, New York, and began playing guitar at age ten. Influenced by his grandfather who played mandolin and banjo and made some 78s in the 1920s, Mooney took an early interest in older music, especially prewar blues. At fifteen he was playing with Joe Beard. Beard introduced him to Son House then living in Rochester. House befriended Mooney, showing him Delta slide guitar techniques. Soon Mooney was performing in public, first alone, then later with Brian Williams on upright bass. In 1976 Mooney moved to New Orleans, where he came under the influence of Professor Longhair. Mooney's unique style resulted: New Orleans "second-line" rhythms combined with percussive Delta slide.

Mooney recorded his first album, Comin' Your Way, for Blind Pig in 1979. In 1981 he formed the Bluesiana Band. After Telephone King in 1983, a series of albums followed with small labels. After a live recording, Dealin' with the Devil, issued by Ruf, he returned to Blind Pig in 2000 where he recorded two well-received albums, Gone to Hell and All I Want.

Over the years Mooney has performed with numerous blues notables, among them Professor Longhair, Albert King, Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown, and Bonnie Raitt; he has recorded with Junior Wells, Jimmy McCracklin, and Jimmy Thackery.

DANIEL BEAUMONT

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda and Stephen Thomas Erlewine)
Horwitz, H. "John Mooney: Fear No Evil." Blues Revue no. 67 (May 2001): 9.

Discography: AMG

Comin' Your Way (1979, Blind Pig 779).
Telephone King (1983, Blind Pig).

MOORE, ALEXANDER "WHISTLIN' ALEX"

Late Last Night (1990, Bulls Eye/Rounder).
Testimony (1992, Domino).
Against the Wall (1996, House of Blues/Ruf 1019).
Dealin' with the Devil (1997, Ruf 1057).
Gone to Hell (2000, Blind Pig 5063).
All I Want (2002, Blind Pig 5704).

MOORE, AARON

b. 11 February 1928; Greenwood, MS

Influenced by Roosevelt Sykes and Memphis Slim, Moore played piano with many Chicago blues luminaries, declining gigs and tours to protect his career with the City of Chicago. After retirement, he appeared on Brewer Phillips's Homebrew for Delmark and returned to record two well-received CDs of all-original compositions, Hello World (1996) and Boot 'Em Up! (1999).

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Sharp, Steven. "Boogie-Woogie Will Never Die." Living Blues no. 144 (March/April 1999): 64.

Discography: AMG

MOORE, ALEXANDER "WHISTLIN' ALEX"

b. 11 November 1899; Dallas, TX
d. 20 January 1989; Dallas, TX

Pianist in 1920s and 1930s barrelhouse style, and a colorful public figure. Based in Dallas his whole life, he came to be regarded as a patriarch of local blues. He made his first records in 1929 for Columbia, then again in 1937 for Decca, and in 1951 for RPM. He came to national prominence with the blues revival of the 1960s, including a series of records with the Arhoolie label. He remained an active performer up until his 1989 death.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O'Neal and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Govenar, Alan. "Alex Moore: More Piano Players in North Dallas Than Anywhere: I Could Call Them All." Living Blues no. 83 (November/December 1988): 26–28.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSPF

MOORE, ALICE “LITTLE”

MOORE, ALICE “LITTLE”

b. 1904; Tennessee

d. ca. 1950; St. Louis, MO

Alice Moore was a St. Louis blues singer who recorded from 1929 to 1937 for Paramount and Decca. She was a gutsy vocalist who was accompanied by notable piano players Henry Brown, Peetie Wheatstraw, and Roosevelt Sykes.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

van Rijn, Guido, Hans Vergeer, and Cor van Sliedregt. Notes accompanying Alice Moore: Lonesome Woman Blues (1988, Agram AG 2013 CD).

Discography: DGR

MOORE, DOROTHY

b. 13 October 1946; Jackson, MS

Soul blues singer whose 1975 hit version of “Misty Blue” helped to establish Malaco Records. Early singing was in church, then in the pop group The Poppies in 1965–1967. In addition to blues and soul, she has recorded gospel music.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Carpenter, Bil. “Dorothy Moore: ‘It’s a Hurtin’ and Happy Type of Business.’” Living Blues no. 122 (July/August 1995): 34–39.

Discography: AMG

MOORE, GARY

b. 4 April 1952; Belfast, Northern Ireland

After achieving worldwide popularity as a hard rock guitar virtuoso, Moore made a sudden shift to the blues with the release of Still Got the Blues (1990, Charisma). Guest appearances by Albert Collins and Albert King, and Moore’s still impressive way of guitar playing made the album his biggest success. His following four blues albums were highly esteemed by critics, especially Blues for Greeny (1995, Charisma), a tribute to Peter Green, but none of them could keep up with the success of Moore’s 1990 hit record, nor could his collaboration with Cream’s Ginger Baker and Jack Bruce in 1994.

THORSTEN HINDRICHS

Bibliography

AMG (Greg Prato); Larkin Aagaard, Rene, and Finn K. Jensen, eds. The Gary Moore Bio-Discography 1969–1994. Soeborg (Denmark): Bidstrup, 1996.

Discography: AMG

MOORE, JOHNNY

b. 1 September 1940; West Point, MS

Chicago hard soul singer and songwriter of the 1960s. Moore helped put Chicago on the map as a soul center by both recording deeply sung soul music and by composing a large body of songs for the city’s harder breed of soul singers, notably Tyrone Davis. Much of the audience for his music was the same African American audience that bought blues. Moore was raised in Mississippi, but in 1960 moved to Chicago, where he began his career in music singing in local clubs. He was signed by Willie Barney’s Four Brothers/Bright Star label complex in 1966, and under producer Jack Daniels got a subtle hard soul hit with “Your Love’s Got Power,” on Bright Star. Moore continued to record for a variety of labels until 1972, at which time he entered the liquor business. He had much greater success as a cowriter with Jack Daniels of songs for such singers as Syl Johnson (“We Did It”), Tyrone Davis (“Turn Back the Hands of Time”), and Jackie Wilson (“This Love Is Real”).

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Dahl, Bill. “Johnny Moore: Turning Back the Hands of Time.” Goldmine (October 9, 1987): 24, 88.

MOORE, JOHNNY B.

b. 24 January 1950; Clarksdale, MS

Aka Johnny Belle Moore. Singer/guitarist Johnny B. Moore, the son of a Baptist minister, was raised on a plantation near Clarksdale, Mississippi. Moore’s father began teaching him gospel songs on the guitar at age seven, but soon the aspiring musician was sneaking off to local juke joints to catch performances by John Lee Hooker, Robert Nighthawk, and Aleck Miller "Sonny Boy Williamson II." In 1964, Moore moved to Chicago to join his father, who had relocated there several years earlier. He started playing in a local gospel group but was once again drawn to the blues and began playing in various West Side clubs, inspired greatly by celebrated neighborhood singer/guitarist Magic Sam. Throughout the 1970s, Moore worked with a variety of Chicago musicians, including Mighty Joe Young, Willie Dixon, and Koko Taylor, and appeared on Taylor's 1978 Alligator LP The Earthshaker. In 1977, he made his first trip to Europe as part of the high-profile package tour "The New Generation of Chicago Blues." Moore continued to play overseas occasionally and formed his own band in Chicago, where he worked steadily. His tough, unpolished singing voice, masterful guitar playing, and vast live repertoire of both postwar and prewar blues songs made him one of the most promising young exponents of traditional Chicago blues. Moore's solo recording debut appeared in 1987 on the B.L.U.E.S. R&B label, and was followed by multiple releases on Wolf and Delmark. Moore continued to be a mainstay on the Chicago blues scene until being partially paralyzed by a stroke in 2003, after which he underwent rehabilitation to regain his ability to perform.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli
Clark, Gerry. "All in the Touch: Johnny B. Moore." Living Blues no. 102 (March/April 1992): 29–31.

Discography: AMG

Live at Blue Chicago (1996, Delmark DE 688).
Born in Clarksdale, Mississippi (2001, Wolf 120.804 CD).

MOORE, KEVIN

(See Keb' Mo')

MOORE, MONETTE

b. 19 May 1902; Gainesville, TX
d. 21 October 1962; Garden Grove, CA

Singer who adapted from "classic blues" to later blues and jazz styles during a forty-year career. She spent the early part of her career in black theater and revues, and recording for various Race labels including Paramount. In the early 1940s she moved to California, occasionally recording, but also appearing in films, television, and at the Disneyland theme park.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz
Chilton, John. Who's Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.

Discography: DGR; Lord; LSFP

MOORE, OSCAR

b. 25 December 1916; Austin, TX
d. 8 October 1981; Las Vegas, NV

Guitarist. Birth year given as 1912 or 1916. Moore formed a guitar duo with his brother, Johnny Moore, and was with the Nat "King" Cole Trio from 1937 to 1947. He also recorded with Lionel Hampton, Art Tatum, Lester Young, and others. He was with the Three Blazers from 1947 until the mid-1950s; also recorded as leader. He performed intermittently thereafter. Moore's fluent style incorporated blues elements.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz
Price, Michael H. "Oscar Moore." In The Guitar in Jazz: An Anthology, edited by James Sallis. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1996.

Discography: Lord

Selected Recordings as Leader

The Oscar Moore Quartet (1954, Tampa 10).
Tribute to Nat King Cole (1965, Surrey 1013).

MOORE, REVEREND ARNOLD DWIGHT "GATEMOUTH"

b. 8 November 1913; Topeka, KS
d. 19 May 2004; Yazoo City, MS

Blues shouter and gospel personality Moore started his career in Kansas City in the late 1920s, singing in several jazz and blues bands and itinerant shows, such as Ida Cox's "Darktown Scandals Revue" and the

MOORE, REVEREND ARNOLD DWIGHT “GATEMOUTH”

Rabbit Foot Minstrels throughout 1930s, and also learning from Ma Rainey and Bertha “Chippie” Hill. In the 1930s Moore made his debut as a gospel singer on WIBW, a radio station in his hometown. Later he joined the Walter Barnes band, miraculously escaping death in the 1940 Natchez Rhythm Club fire (see Topical Blues: Disasters entry). Moore cut the first two versions of “I Ain’t Mad at You, Pretty Baby” and “Did You Ever Love a Woman?” for Gilmore’s Chez Paree label. In 1945 “Gatemouth” (so nicknamed by a drunk woman in the audience) remade his two warhorses and other titles for National, and two years later he extensively recorded for King.

After temporarily losing his voice during a show, Moore stopped singing secular songs and devoted himself to sacred music, working as a religious deejay and performer, and recording a few gospel singles for Aristocrat/Chess, Artists, and Coral, as well as two albums for Audio Fidelity (1960) and BluesWay (1973). In 1977 Moore recorded an R&B album for Blues Spectrum, where he tried to reconcile sacred and secular music. Reverend Moore was a featured character in Saturday Night, Sunday Morning (1996), and appeared in the Bertrand Tavernier-directed feature film Mississippi Blues (1986) and in the Richard Pierce-directed The Road to Memphis (2003).

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Lee, Peter, and David Nelson. “Bishop Arnold Dwight ‘Gatemouth’ Moore: From Shoutin’ the Blues to Preachin’ the Word.” Living Blues no. 86 (May/June 1989): 8–19.

Slaven, Neil. Notes accompanying Hey Mr. Gatemouth: Complete King Recordings (2000, Westside WESF 100).

Discography: LSFP

MOORE, SAM

(See Ironing Board Sam)

MOORE, SAMUEL DAVID “SAM”

b. 12 October 1935; Miami, FL

Singer with high, tensile voice who was in the popular Sam and Dave duo for Stax and Atlantic labels in the 1960s. Moore’s early singing was in gospel, singing in his father’s church and later performing with the Melonaires. He met and began singing with Dave Prater in 1961. From 1962 through 1964 they recorded for Roulette Records. But it was for Stax in 1966–1968 in Memphis that they made their most popular and influential records, “Hold On I’m Comin’,” “Soul Man,” and “I Thank You.” In 1970, after strained relations between the two singers, Moore and Prater split. Subsequent efforts at reuniting were short lived; then Prater died in a 1988 car accident. Sam has maintained his solo career since, with an occasional appearance on television and film, prominently in the movie Tapeheads (1989).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin (as Sam and Dave)

Moore, Sam, with Dave Marsh. Sam and Dave: An Oral History (For the Record). New York: HarperCollins/Quill, 1998.

See also Prater, Sam

MOORE, WILLIAM “BILL”

b. 3 March 1893; Georgia

d. 22 November 1951; Fauquier County, VA

William Moore appears as card number one on the Yazoo set “Heroes of the Blues,” illustrated by underground artist Robert Crumb, and this honor reflects his popularity among 78-rpm record collectors and guitar revivalists in the 1960s and 1970s. His ragtime-inspired playing was captured by a Paramount session held in Chicago circa January 1928, from which eight songs were commercially released of sixteen that received a copyright. Some of the issued recordings bear the name “Bill Moore.” Moore was born in Georgia on March 3, 1893, the son of Harriet and Frank Moore. The 1900 census lists the family in Dover, Screven County, Georgia, with Moore’s father farming rented land. It is not known when Moore migrated to Virginia and when he took up the guitar, but his playing fits into the syncopated East Coast style that was common in both states.

Moore’s “Old Country Rock” is a fine example of a country dance tune, with a caller imploring various family members and fellow dancers to “rock,” before telling them to “step back and let me rock.” The song’s narration refers to the Rappahannock River and the town of Tappahannock in Essex County, where Moore worked as a barber and farmer. Moore crossed the river to reach Warsaw in Richmond County where he reportedly also worked as a barber. No doubt he was well known in the rural areas and towns near his home, playing at social occasions and at his shop. “Barbershop Rag” testifies to both his skilled ragtime playing and to his profession.

Virginia audiences would have also appreciated his twelve-bar blues songs, such as "Midnight Blues," and the references to Ford motor cars and banking problems in "Ragtime Millionaire," a variation on Irving Jones's novelty composition.

Moore lived next to the First Baptist Church in Tappahannock and residents of the town recall him performing also on the piano and violin. Moore reportedly moved in with one of his sons in the 1940s in Fauquier County, Virginia. He died in that county on November 22, 1951, and is buried in the Warrenton Cemetery.

GREGG KIMBALL

Bibliography

Bastin, Bruce. Red River Blues: The Blues Tradition in the Southeast, pp. 300–301. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.

Discography

Lornell, Kip. Virginia's Blues, Country & Gospel Records, 1902–1943: An Annotated Discography, pp. 119–120. Lincoln: University Press of Kentucky, 1989.

Deep River of Song: Black Appalachia, String Bands, Songsters and Hoedowns (1999, Rounder Records 1823).

Ragtime Blues Guitar (Document Records DOCD-5062).

Virginia Traditions: Non-Blues Secular Music (Global Village Music, Blue Ridge Institute Series, CD 1001).

MORELLO, JIMMY

Active since the 1970s. Drummer and singer in blues shouter style. In the late 1970s Morello and his band Cold Steel toured the northeastern United States with Louisiana Red. He spent the 1980s with the Blue Flames in Sacramento, California, then 1989–1993 with the Rocket 88s and guitarist Pat Boyack in Phoenix, Arizona. Since then he has performed and recorded as bandleader or with Pat Boyack.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

MORGAN, MIKE

b. 30 November 1959; Dallas, TX

Lead guitarist for Mike Morgan & the Crawl, the Texas-born and -raised Morgan plays an accessible electric blues-rock style that combines the raw Lone Star sensibilities of Johnny Winter and Stevie Ray Vaughan with a more swinging, R&B-imbued approach indebted to Clarence "Gatemouth" Brown and T-Bone Walker. Morgan's working band, the Crawl, has featured vocalists Darrell Nulisch and Lee McBee, although Morgan began singing as well as the new century began. Morgan has released a string of well-received albums for Black Top and Severn beginning in 1990, and became a mainstay of the blues festival circuit throughout the 1990s and beyond.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)

Del Grosso, Maureen, and Rich Del Grosso. "Mike Morgan: Interview with a Rising Texas Star." Blues Revue no. 30 (August/September 1997): 22.

Discography: AMG

Raw & Ready (1990, Black Top 1051).

Mighty Fine Dancin' (1991, Black Top 1064).

Full Moon over Dallas (1992, Black Top 1080).

Texas Man (2002, Severn 14).

MORGAN, TEDDY

b. 8 July 1971; Minneapolis, MN

Singer and electric guitarist in blues and blues-rock. He has played professionally since age seventeen; his early experience includes a stint with James Harman. Through Kim Wilson he met Clifford Antone, who has provided him with performing opportunities in his club and on his label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

MORGANFIELD, "BIG" BILL

b. 19 June 1956; Chicago, IL

Big Bill Morganfield started playing the guitar relatively late in his life. It wasn't until 1983, when his father McKinley Morganfield (Muddy Waters) passed away, that Bill decided to pursue a musical career. During the next few years of his late twenties and early thirties, he learned to play guitar and perform blues standards. After honing his skills, he released his first album, Rising Son, in 1999. The album, which features several former members of his father's band, garnered much acclaim for Morganfield. In 2000, he received a W. C. Handy Award for Best New Blues Artist. Bill is now based out of Atlanta, Georgia, and performs regularly around the world.

MORGANFIELD, "BIG" BILL

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

- AMG (Linda Seida)
Big Bill Morganfield website, <http://www.bigbillmorganfield.net/> (accessed February 13, 2005).
Dries, J. "Big Bill Morganfield." Blues and Rhythm no. 148 (April 2000): 22–23.
Tipaldi, Art. "Big Bill Morganfield: Still Waters." Blues Revue no. 55 (March 2000): 15–17.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

- Rising Son* (1999, Blind Pig).
Ramblin' Mind (2001, Blind Pig).
Blues in the Blood (2003, Blind Pig).

MORGANFIELD, MCKINLEY

(See Waters, Muddy)

MORISETTE, JOHNNY "TWO-VOICE"

- b. 1 July 1935; Brazil
d. 1 August 2000; San Francisco, CA

Morisette sang in gospel groups in Mobile, Alabama, and became known for his ability to switch between his natural voice and an otherworldly falsetto. Morisette signed with Sam Cooke's SAR Records, which released eight singles, including "Meet Me at the Twisting Place" (SAR S126). After Cooke was killed, Morisette moved to Dallas and then San Francisco, making a few recordings and live appearances before his death in 2000.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

- "Obituary." Living Blues no. 154 (December 2000), 97–98.
Schuller, Tim. "The Johnny 'Two-Voice' Story." Living Blues no. 49 (Winter 1980), 20–26.

Discography: LSFP

Sam Cooke's SAR Records Story (1994, ABKCO 2231-2).

MORTON, JELLY ROLL

- b. Ferdinand Joseph Lamothe (or Lemott, La Menthe), 20 October 1890; New Orleans, LA
d. 10 July 1941; Los Angeles, CA

Baptismal certificate gives 1890 as birth year, but cited birth years commonly vary among several years between 1885 and 1895. As pianist, composer, arranger, bandleader, and vocalist, Morton is regarded as a seminal figure in jazz history. Professionally active from before 1905, his surviving work vividly documents the transition from ragtime to jazz. Blues had a major influence on his music from the outset (he heard his first in 1902, performed by Mamie Desdoumes, a New Orleans prostitute). This is most evident in his instrumental blues compositions, many of which have become jazz standards. The earliest of these was "Jelly Roll Blues," which was published in 1915, but which was allegedly written as early as 1905. Like most of Morton's blues, it combines ragtime and blues elements in a highly sophisticated manner, being multisectional, and using the twelve-bar form throughout. The work also makes extensive use of a habanera bass-line pattern (two dotted quarters and a quarter), an example of what he later referred to as the "Spanish tinge." This device is found in many of Morton's other blues and its use shows his remarkable ability to forge an individual style by the synthesis of diverse musical influences. Other important instrumental blues by Morton include "New Orleans Blues," "Dead Man Blues," and "London Blues." All of these were recorded by him either as piano solos and/or with his band the Red Hot Peppers during 1923–1930. Morton also recorded a number of blues solos late in his career, mostly traditional material such as "C. C. Rider," "Hesitation Blues," and "Make Me a Pallet on Your Floor."

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

- Larkin; New Grove Jazz
Dapogny, James. Ferdinand "Jelly Roll" Morton: The Collected Piano Music. Washington, DC: Smithsonian, 1982.
Lomax, Alan. Mister Jelly Lord. Berkeley: University of California Press, 2001.

Discography: Lord

As Unaccompanied Soloist

"New Orleans (Blues) Joys" (1923, Gnt 5486); "Wolverine Blues" (1923, Gnt 5289); "Bucktown Blues/Tom Cat Blues" (1924, Gnt 5515); "Jelly-Roll Blues" (1924, Gnt 5552); "Jelly Roll Blues" (1924, Vocalstyle 50505; piano roll); "London Blues" (1924, Rialto unnumbered); "London Blues" (1924, Vocalstyle 50479; piano roll); "Thirty-Fifth Street Blues" (1924, Puritan 12216); "Tom Cat Blues" (1924, Vocalstyle 12983; piano roll); "Dead Man Blues" (1926, QRS 3674; piano roll); "Alabama Bound" (1938, Cir 67-68); "Buddy Bolden's Blues" (1938, Cir 77-78); "Low-Down Blues" (1938, Cir 57, 87-88); "Mamie Desdoumes' Blues" (1938, Cir 49); "See See Rider" (1938, Cir 12-13); "The Winin' Boy" (1938, Cir 60); "Buddy Bolden's Blues" (1939, Gnl 4003); "Don't You Leave Me Here" (1939, Gnl 4005); "Mamie's Blues" (1939, Gnl 4001); "Michigan Water Blues" (1939, Gnl 4002); "Winin' Boy Blues" (1939, Gnl 4004).

As Leader

"London Blues" (1923, OK 8105); "Muddy Water Blues" (1923, Pm 12050); "Weary Blues" (1924, Auto 607); "Cannon Ball Blues" (1926, Vic 20431); "Original Jelly-Roll Blues" (1926, Vic 20405); "Sidewalk Blues/Dead Man Blues" (1926, Vic 20252); "Smoke-House Blues" (1926, Vic 20296); "Wild Man Blues"/"Jungle Blues" (1927, Vic 21345); "Wolverine Blues" (1927, Vic 21054); "Blue Blood Blues" (1930, Vic 22681); "Harmony Blues" (1930, Vic V-38135); "Don't You Leave Me Here" (1939, BB B-10450).

MOSAIC

Founded 1983; located in Stamford, Connecticut. Mosaic specializes in lavishly produced, audiophile-quality compilation box sets issued in hand-numbered, limited editions. While the label is primarily focused on jazz, it has issued a handful of blues collections, as well as quite a few crossover artists with appeal to both jazz and blues listeners. Because of its licensing agreements with the labels owning the master tapes, Mosaic releases are only available for purchase by mail order or on the Internet, and generally remain in print for only a short time (although out-of-print editions can often be found for sale second-hand on the Internet).

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Mosaic website, <http://www.mosaicrecords.com/> (accessed December 11, 2004).

Discography

The Complete Roulette Live Count Basie (1991, MD8-135).
The Complete Candid Otis Spann/Lightnin' Hopkins Sessions (1992, MD3-139).
The Complete Recordings of T-Bone Walker 1940-1954 (1992, MD6-130).
The Complete Roulette Studio Count Basie (1993, MD10; 149).
The Complete Aladdin Charles Brown (1994, MD5-153).

MOSS, EUGENE "BUDDY"

b. 16 January 1914; Jewel, GA
 d. 1 October 1984; Atlanta, GA

Buddy Moss was an innovator of the Piedmont style of acoustic blues. His talents bridge the gap between Blind Blake and Blind Boy Fuller, and have influenced East Coast folk blues greatly. His family sharecropped in rural Georgia where he worked the fields from age eight. Self-taught on the harmonica, Moss cut his first recorded sides in 1930 with Barbecue Bob Hicks and Curley Weaver, learning the guitar under these two men. His natural ability on the instrument shone through, soon eclipsing those of his mentors. Recording dates in 1933 cemented his reputation as a masterful player, and led to working associations with Josh White and Blind Willie McTell.

Moss continued to record, enjoying a lucrative success that ended abruptly in 1935. A conviction on charges that he murdered his wife landed him with a substantial prison term despite many appeals. Though released on good behavior in 1941, Moss found it difficult to revitalize his career. A chance meeting with Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee at Elon College offered a handful of recording dates, though nothing permanent. Moss shelved his music career to pursue various jobs for the next twenty years. In 1964, he attended a performance by former colleague Josh White, causing a minor sensation among the blues fans attending. With rediscovery came new opportunities; Moss rode the folk blues revival well into the 1970s with appearances at well-known festivals.

JOHN OTIS

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Springer, Robert. "So I Said 'The Hell with It': A Difficult Interview with Eugene 'Buddy' Moss." Blues Unlimited no. 117 (January/February 1976): 18-21.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFPMOTEN, BENJAMIN "BENNIE"

b. 13 November 1894; Kansas City, MO
 d. 2 April 1935; Kansas City, MO

Bandleader and pianist. His band, which recorded prolifically between 1923 and 1931, was taken over by Count Basie on Moten's untimely death during a tonsils operation. Through its emphasis on riffs and blues progressions, it became a major influence on later developments such as rhythm and blues.

MOTEN, BENJAMIN “BENNIE”

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Russell, Ross. Jazz Style in Kansas City and the South West. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1971.

Schuller, Gunther. Early Jazz: Its Roots and Musical Development. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Discography: Lord

“Crawdada Blues” (1923, OK 8100); “Tulsa Blues” (1924, OK 8184); “Harmony Blues” (1926, Vic 20406); “Vine Street Blues” (1924, OK 8194); “Harmony Blues” (1926, Vic 20406); “Muscle Shoals Blues/White Lightning Blues” (1926, Vic 20811); “Yazoo Blues” (1926, Vic 20485); “New Tulsa Blues” (1927, Vic 21584); “Hot Water Blues” (1928, Vic V-38012); “Sad Man Blues” (1928, Vic V-38048); “Every Day Blues” (1929, Vic V-38144); “Jones Law Blues” (1929, Vic 23357); “Moten’s Blues” (1929, Vic V-38072); “New Vine Street Blues” (1929, Vic 23007).

MOTLEY, FRANK JR.

b. 30 December 1923; Cheraw, SC

d. 31 May 1998; Durham, NC

Trumpeter and bandleader. Joined the U.S. Navy after earning a degree in mechanical engineering from South Carolina State College, and entertained troops in the Pacific as part of the Navy Band during World War II. After the war he pursued his musical interests first in New York City jazz circles, then as a bandleader in Washington, D.C. Motley recorded extensively in Washington for Lillian Claiborne’s DC label, beginning in 1951. Most of the material was jump-style blues and rhythm and blues, though some was clearly jazz—notably “JC’s Theme” with Gene Ammons on sax. Recordings from the early 1950s appeared at the time on DC and on labels that had licensed the material, including Big Town, Gem, and Hollywood. Other recordings from the period did not appear until much later—in the 1960s on the Grand Prix and Design labels, and in the 1980s on the Fly-Rite and Collector’s labels.

Motley played in Hamilton, Ontario, in a band that also featured singer-drummer TNT Tribble in 1952. In 1955 he took his longer-lived group, Frank “Dual Trumpeter” Motley and His Motley Crew, to Hamilton, Toronto, and Montreal. The group—which might be considered a “revue” because of the multiple-singer, stage-managed nature of its performances—was so well received that the base of operations was shifted to Toronto almost immediately. Nevertheless, the recording relationship with the DC label in Washington continued well into the 1960s, with DC releasing records in the United States and leasing material (including some recorded years before) to Canadian labels such as Quality, Sparton, ABC Teen Life, Star-lite, Arc, and Star Shot. The group also recorded directly for Sparton and Barry. Motley’s greatest success, “Any Other Way,” was recorded in 1963 in Boston for a small local label, Cookin’, and then licensed to the important Sue label. The record, sung by Jackie Shane, met with some success in the United States, and with huge success in Canada—particularly Toronto, where it climbed to number two on the local pop chart.

Upon the demise of the Motley Crew in 1966, Motley put together a new group in Toronto, the Hitch-Hikers, featuring Jackie Shane and then Earle “The Mighty Pope” Heedram. Following a parting of the ways with the group in 1970, Motley continued to gig with various lineups, most notably as Frank Motley and the Bridge Crossing. In 1985, in declining health and with club work having dried up, Motley returned to the United States to be near his daughters in Durham, North Carolina. However, he maintained his interest in music, and continued to play in local dance bands. Frank Motley passed away in Durham on May 31, 1998.

BILL MUNSON

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Bruder, Jay. “Two Horn Blues: Frank Motley and the ‘DC’ R&B Sound: 1950–1960” [part 1]. Blues & Rhythm no. 83 (October 1993): 4–7; [part 2]. Blues & Rhythm no. 84 (November 1993): 8–11.

Discography: Lord; LSFP

MOTOWN

The Motown slogans “The Sound of Young America” and “Hitsville, USA” were no idle boast in the 1960s and 1970s, when the company was a hit-making factory churning out million-selling, infectious R&B and soul with huge pop crossover appeal. Named after the Motor City, Detroit, its home from 1959 to 1973 (when it moved to Los Angeles), Motown also recorded a small number of blues artists.

The only Motown hit (a minor one at that) in a blues vein was 1960’s “Who’s the Fool” by Singin’ Sammy Ward (on its Tamla subsidiary). Pianist Amos Milburn’s Return of the Blues Boss was released on Motown in 1963 but failed to reestablish the former star's waning popularity. Earl King was part of an entourage of New Orleans artists who cut sides for Motown in 1963 that remained unissued until a 1996 CD compilation. The 1969 LP Switched On Blues on Motown subsidiary Soul has become a collector's item; its ten tracks feature Ward, Milburn, Gino Parks, Mabel John, and Stevie Wonder ("I Call It Pretty Music But the Old People Call It the Blues"). The most promising of Motown's blues signings was Luther Allison, a young, fiery, and ambitious Chicago bluesman. Allison at the time was tearing up stages at colleges and festivals throughout the Midwest, but although popular with blues fans, his three albums on Motown's Gordy label (1972, 1974, 1976) were mere blips on the corporate radar screen, and Motown never again dabbled in blues.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

- Baker, Cary. Notes to Luther Allison's The Motown Years (1996, Motown CD 612).
 Dahl, Bill. Notes to Motown's Blue Evolution (1996, Motown CD 613).
 Koda, Cub. Notes to Amos Milburn's The Motown Sessions (1996, Motown CD 611).

Selected Recordings

- Various artists. Motown's Blue Evolution (1996, Motown CD 613).

MR. BO

(See Collins, Louis "Mr. Bo")

MR. GOOGLE EYES

(See August, Joe "Mr. Google Eyes")

MR. R&B RECORDS

Record company formed in Stockholm, Sweden, in 1976 by record-dealer Jonas Bernholm to reissue "forgotten but essential recordings of Rhythm & Blues" from the 1940s and 1950s. The operation took advantage of the absence of any mechanical copyright protection in Sweden at that time to license material directly from the artists, some of whom received royalties for the first time. The resulting contacts facilitated a very high standard of documentation, frequently extending to inserted booklets that often remain the major reference source on the artists concerned. Among those whose work benefited from this exposure on the main Route 66 label were Floyd Dixon, Roy Brown, Wynonie Harris, Paul Gayten & Annie Laurie, Roy Hawkins, "Little" Willie Littlefield, Ruth Brown, Jimmy Liggins, Amos Milburn, Calvin Bose, and Joseph August.

Much of the material had never previously been reissued. An unusual item was the issue of a 1951 Hunter Hancock Blues & Rhythm Midnight Matinee. Subsidiary labels included Mr. R&B, for distinctively 1950s styled artists such as Nappy Brown, Margie Day, and Varetta Dillard; Jukebox Lil, for artists with jazz roots like Joe Liggins, Roy Milton, Johnny Otis, and Todd Rhodes; Saxophonograph for instrumental R&B; Blues Boy for guitarists, including B. B. King and Pee Wee Crayton; and Crown Prince for "straight blues" artists, including Eddie Boyd, Mercy Dee, and Lowell Fulson. Jukebox Lil also had a "Sepia Series" for artists from the more popular end of R&B including Nellie Lutcher, Martha Davis, and Hadda Brooks. Early recordings by Johnny Copeland appeared on Mr. R&B. The Whiskey, Women and ... label was produced jointly with the eponymous American research magazine to tie in with its articles and included albums by Doc Pomus, Helen Humes, and Sam Price. The Stockholm label, directed by Per "Slim" Notini, recorded Mr. R&B artists who toured Sweden under its auspices, including Charles Brown, Ruth Brown, and Eddie Boyd. Another subsidiary label, Dr. Horse, was intended for doo-wop but included two albums by the Big Three Trio. The enterprise suddenly ceased trading in spring 1989 for personal reasons.

HOWARD RYE

MURPHY, MATT "GUITAR"

b. 29 December 1927; Sunflower, MS

Guitarist, singer. Although best known to the general public for his participation in the movie comedy The Blues Brothers, Murphy had a serious role in the evolution of modern blues, performing and recording with a series of significant figures for more than a half century. His jazz-inflected guitar lines, more inspired by saxists such as Arnett Cobb and Gene Ammons than by fellow guitarists, sparkled behind some of the best-known blues and most successful performers and recording acts in the music's history.

Murphy's birth year is often given as 1929 as well as 1927. His family, which included guitarist brother Floyd, who is heard on Junior Parker's "Mystery

MURPHY, MATT "GUITAR"

Train," moved to Memphis when he was a small child. Murphy was working with the music's biggest names from the start, playing live shows with Parker, Howlin' Wolf, and Ike Turner as a teenager and getting his first major recording session work behind Parker and Bobby "Blue" Bland on Modern Records shortly afterward.

In 1952 he joined Memphis Slim's House Rockers to create one of the most musically satisfying blues partnerships of the era. Murphy's jazzy guitar stylings proved to be the perfect counterpart to Memphis Slim's earthy piano work and their interplay dazzled and delighted audiences until the pianist emigrated to Europe at the beginning of the 1960s. Murphy opted to stay in the United States but a 1963 American Folk Blues Festival tour of Europe allowed him his first taste of solo stardom.

Murphy's stylish guitar work was always in great demand in the studio and his ability to creatively complement and embellish the sound of even the most idiosyncratic star resulted in him getting the call for numerous noteworthy recording sessions. He recorded two albums with Chuck Berry, backed Koko Taylor on her 1969 Chess debut, was involved in a series of Aleck Miller "Sonny Boy Williamson II" albums, played on Buddy Guy's classic "I Left My Blues in San Francisco," and appeared on recordings by Otis Rush, Etta James, and countless others.

Murphy's second major musical partnership came about when he combined forces with hard-blowing Chicago harpist James Cotton in the 1970s, recording more than a half dozen albums and touring steadily. The combination of fire and finesse provided by the frontmen made the band one of the most crowd-pleasing blues acts of its time. Comedians John Belushi and Dan Akroyd were part of such an audience at a New York City show in 1977 and they immediately recruited Murphy to be part of the Blues Brothers touring band, as well as part of the movie, where he played the musician/cook husband of Aretha Franklin's character.

After the 1980s were consumed with making The Blues Brothers movie and the subsequent albums and tours it generated, Murphy also began an affiliation with Austin-based Antone's organization, performing, often with bandmates like Cotton, regularly at its club and in 1990 recording his Way Down South album, with brother Floyd helping out, on its record label. Murphy added to his recording catalog with Blues Don't Bother Me in 1996, reprised his session star past with work on the Joe Louis Walker Great Guitars album in 1997, and recorded Lucky Charm under his own name in 2000.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Huggins, Cilla. "Matt 'Guitar' Murphy: Blues Brother." Juke Blues no. 20 (Summer 1990): 8-12.
Tipaldi, Art. "Matt 'Guitar' Murphy: What the Blues Is All About." Blues Revue no. 23 (June/July 1996): 44-51.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

MURPHY, WILLIE

b. Minneapolis, MN

Pianist active in Minneapolis, Minnesota, bars and clubs. Earlier in his career he worked with Spider John Koerner, Bonnie Raitt, and Isaac Hayes, then led his own band Willie and the Bees.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Dan Heilman)

Discography: AMG; Lord

MURRAY, BOBBY

b. 9 June 1953; Nagoya, Japan

Guitarist. Attended high school in Tacoma, Washington, with Robert Cray, with whom he booked Albert Collins for their school's graduation party. After years of playing in clubs in Oakland and San Francisco, he was hired by Etta James as sideman in 1988. He released his debut CD in 1996.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

MUSSELWHITE, CHARLIE

b. 31 January 1944; Kosciusko, MS

Harmonica player and singer. Born in Mississippi, he grew up in Memphis, one of a few white residents of its African American community. Charlie Musselwhite was introduced to blues in the early 1960s by Will Shade, the founder of the Memphis Jug Band. He spent most of the 1960s in Chicago and went to San Francisco in 1970. Among various LPs in some thirty years, he has published a formative manual for beginners: The Harmonica According to Charlie Musselwhite (1979).

Musselwhite explores the blues as well as other musical genres and trends: electric and acoustic blues, gospel, Cuban, jazz, Tex-Mex, Tejano, and country music (in his album One Night in America, 2002).

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

- AMG (Dan Forte); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Musselwhite, Charlie. The Harmonica According to Charlie Musselwhite: An Easy Guide to Playing Improvised Blues (manual). Fullerton, CA: Centerstream, 1982.
Scott, Frank, ed. The Down Home Guide to the Blues. Chicago: A Cappella Books, 1991.
Townsend, T. "From the Heart: Charlie Musselwhite's Musical Sojourn." Blues Revue no. 46 (April 1999): 8–9.

Discography: AMG

MUSTANG SALLY

Written in 1965 by Detroit songwriter Mack Rice, "Mustang Sally" quickly became one of the most covered songs in R&B history. Among the legion of artists who have recorded the song are bluesmen Buddy Guy (with Jeff Beck), Albert Collins, Snooks Eaglin and Magic Slim; rock/pop group the Young Rascals; bluegrass great John Cowan; reggae legend U-Roy; and soul stars Rice, Wilson Pickett, Rufus Thomas, Sam and Dave, Willie Mitchell, and the Mar-Keys. The song was also featured prominently in the films The Commitments and Road Scholar. The success of the former helped make "Mustang Sally" one of the most popular karaoke songs ever in the United Kingdom.

Born in Clarksdale, Mississippi, in the 1940s, Mack Rice moved with his family north to Detroit as his father pursued a job in the then-burgeoning automotive industry. Already fascinated with music, the teenage Rice first recorded as a member of a doo-wop ensemble known as the Five Scalders. After serving the requisite two-year hitch in the service, in 1957 Rice answered a newspaper ad and became a member of the Falcons. At the time the group included future soul star Eddie Floyd. Wilson Pickett would join the group in 1961.

After the Falcons disbanded in 1963, Rice embarked on a solo career. It was while staying at Della Reese's home in New York that he began working on what became "Mustang Sally." Apparently Reese had a habit of giving her backup musicians Lincoln automobiles on their birthdays. When Rice mentioned to her drummer that, as his birthday was coming up, he would most likely be the proud recipient of a brand new Lincoln, the drummer protested that what he really wanted was a Mustang.

Incredulous that anyone would want "a little old car like a Mustang as opposed to that house-size Lincoln" [Living Blues, May/June 1993, p. 33], Rice started joking and eventually began playing with the words "mustang mama." Back in Detroit, Aretha Franklin's future husband Ted White told Rice that he wanted to make a record with him. Jumping at the opportunity, Rice mentioned his new song called "Mustang Mama." Rice and White stopped by Aretha Franklin's house and asked her to play piano while Rice sang a demo of the song that could be used by the session musicians when it came time to record.

"I was singing, 'Mustang Mama, Ride, Sally, Ride,'" recalled Rice in an interview with Living Blues writer Christine Child. "Aretha said, 'Mack, you should name this song 'Mustang Sally'.' I said, 'Why?' She said, 'Because that's what you're saying: 'Ride, Sally, Ride.' Call it 'Mustang Sally'.' I said, 'That's a good idea.' I don't know if she knows today that she did that. She probably forgot."

Rice's version of the song was recorded shortly thereafter in Chicago and apparently started out in a groove similar to that of Tommy Tucker's "High-Heeled Sneakers." It was producer and R&B artist Andre Williams who suggested that Rice attempt the song with a funkier groove. Released in the spring of 1965 on the Mercury subsidiary Blue Rock, Rice's version made it to #15 on the R&B charts, narrowly missing the pop Hot 100. A year and a half later Wilson Pickett covered the song on Atlantic in what has become the definitive version. Cut at Fame Studio in Muscle Shoals, Pickett's recording sported a more polished but virtually identical arrangement and soared to #6 R&B while having to settle for #23 pop.

Structured as a twenty-four-bar blues, "Mustang Sally" has a number of hooks including breaks at bars 19–20 of each section, a descending horn turnaround (first heard in Pickett's version), and a call-and-response chorus. It is the latter section where lead singer and background vocalists (in concert, lead singer and audience) engage in an extended call and response consisting of

MUSTANG SALLY

All you want to do is ride around Sally answered by Ride, Sally, ride that has made the song a barroom staple for four decades.

ROBERT BOWMAN

Bibliography

Child, Christine. "Sir Mack Rice: Anything I See I Can Write On." Living Blues no. 109 (May/June 1993): 32–37.

MY BLACK MAMA (WALKING BLUES)

"My Black Mama" (alternate title: "Walking Blues") was improvised and recorded by Eddie "Son" House Jr. in summer 1930. The alternate title "Walking Blues" has been used to other melodies recorded by House, so the chosen base version is "My Black Mama" parts I and II released by Paramount in 1931. The musical form is a twelve-measure blues. The lyric scheme is AA (4 + 8), where all of the lyrics are declaimed in the first four measures, the first half of the lyric repeated in the second four measures, and the second half in the remaining four measures. Some lyrics may be discerned from other records of the time, especially Bessie Smith's "Work House Blues," but one characteristic is the "death letter" stanza that occurs in the second chorus of part II. In the 1960s, House acknowledged learning the melody from James McCoy, an unrecorded musician from Lyon, Mississippi, near Clarksdale. House's field-holler style singing of this melody is heard in his beginning each phrase after a silent, presumed axe-fall; in transcription, this first beat of the phrase would be notated as a silent rest, and the second beat is where the vocal melody begins. In addition to these features, House's 1930 "My Black Mama" performance is noted for the ascending bottleneck slide-fretted riff that is played between lyric phrases and choruses. Upon House's return to the Mississippi Delta from the Paramount recording session in Grafton, Wisconsin, and on the record's release, "My Black Mama" or, as we will call it here, "Walking Blues (1)," was quickly adopted and imitated by other Delta bluesmen.

While in Grafton, House with another guitarist, likely Willie Brown, recorded a blues modeled melodically and in part lyrically after Blind Lemon Jefferson's "Lonesome House Blues." This tune, labeled here "Walking Blues (2)," is a twelve-measure AAB lyric blues, its melody closer to Jefferson's "moan" blues than to "Walking Blues (1)." The performance was unreleased until 1988, when Document Records issued it as "Walking Blues" on Document DLP 532 (Delta Blues, Vol. 1, 1929–1930).

In August 1941 in Robinsonville, Mississippi, House recorded a version of "Walking Blues (1)" (matrix LC 4780-B2) during a Library of Congress field recording session under Alan Lomax's supervision. This time House performed with a group consisting of guitarist Willie Brown, mandolinist "Fiddlin'" Joe Martin, and harmonica player Leroy Williams.

The following year (1942) House would record another performance (matrix LC 6607-B3) titled "Walking Blues" numbered here as (3). This one had a melody different from those in (1) and (2), to an AAB lyric scheme and different words. From the interview conducted on the same day, House appears to refer to this piece as "Girl I Love Is Dead."

"Walking Blues (1)" or "My Black Mama" would be the version picked up by younger musicians. Robert Johnson recorded "Walking Blues" in 1936 (Vocalion 03601). He had likely learned it from House's performances in the Mississippi Delta in the early 1930s. He also likely taught the melody to Jackson, Mississippi, bluesman Johnny Temple, who would record "Lead Pencil Blues" in 1935 (Vocalion) to that melody.

Another musician who knew tune (1) from House was Muddy Waters, who recorded it several times in his early career: as "Country Blues" for Lomax and the Library of Congress in 1941; as "Feel Like Going Home" in 1948 toward his first commercial release under his own name (Aristocrat 1305); and as "Walkin' Blues" for Chess Records (1426) in 1950.

Upon being rediscovered after several decades of musical inactivity, House recorded a version of tune (1) for Columbia Records, emphasizing the "death letter" lyrics of "My Black Mama." That track, titled "Death Letter Blues," served as the lead track on side A of House's LP Father of the Folk Blues (1965).

Various versions of "Walking Blues" were made by Paul Butterfield, Taj Mahal, and Johnny Winter, among others. Each may be assessed according to the classic performances of House, Johnson, and Waters.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Cowley, John. "Really the Walking Blues: Son House, Muddy Waters, Robert Johnson and the Development of a Traditional Blues." Popular Music 1 (1981): 57–72.
Komara, Edward. "Son House's 'Clarksdale Moan' Considered." Tri-State Blues 2, no. 1 (September/October 1997): 16–17.

MYERS, BOB

b. 2 May 1925; Byhalia, MS
 d. 1 May 1983; Chicago, IL

Harmonica player, and older brother of Louis and Dave Myers. He was most active in Chicago in the late 1940s and 1950s; later his days were filled with full-time jobs. He is considered an excellent exponent of the John Lee Williamson (Sonny Boy Williamson I) style. Examples of his playing were issued on the Advent LP Chicago Blues at Home.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Wisner, Steve. "Bob Myers" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 57 (Autumn 1983): 14, 46.

MYERS, DAVE "THUMPER"

b. 30 October 1926; Byhalia, MS
 d. 3 September 2001; Chicago, IL

Bassist/guitarist who helped define the electric Chicago blues sound. Dave Myers's parents both played guitar—his mother at home and his father at house parties. As teenagers, Dave and his brother Louis performed some around the region, but moved to Chicago in 1941. It was in Chicago that Myers really learned to play guitar. Guitarist Lee Cooper took the Myers brothers under his wing and taught them some basic blues guitar techniques. They also often had the opportunity to listen to Cooper's neighbor, Lonnie Johnson, play. Myers, along with his brother and Junior Wells, founded the Three Aces, which became one of the first electric blues bands in Chicago and gained quite a following. The group played blues with a sophisticated jazz approach. In 1950, the group added drummer Fred Below and changed their name to the Four Aces. Myers later performed with the Jukes, headed by harpist Little Walter Jacobs and consisting of the former Aces, minus Junior Wells. With the Jukes, Dave recorded "Mean Old World," "Off the Wall," and others. In 1970, Dave and Louis reunited with Fred Below as the Aces for a brief reunion tour. Myers later joined forces with Robert Jr. Lockwood, Kenny Smith, and Kim Wilson to form the New Aces. Myers recorded his first true solo project You Can't Do That, on the Black Top label, in 1998.

Dave Myers was one of the first blues musicians to utilize the electric bass. His percussive technique garnered him the name "Thumper." Myers played bass for numerous recording sessions during the 1950s. He also played guitar, though he played it with a rhythmic bass role in mind.

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Larkin; Santelli
 Greenberg, Susan, "Dave Myers" [part 1]. Blues Access no. 17 (Spring 1994), 16–20; [part 2]. Blues Access no. 18 (Summer 1994), 16–20.
 Moon, D. Thomas. "Dave Myers: Somebody Has to Live It First." Living Blues no. 142 (November/December 1998), 32–41.

Discography: AMGSee also Bass*MYERS, LOUIS

b. 18 September 1929; Byhalia, MS
 d. 4 September 1994; Chicago, IL

Myers is remembered as a hard-swinging, Chicago-based blues guitarist and harmonica player. A frequent performer at house parties and small clubs when he arrived in Chicago in the early 1940s, Myers played in a band with his brother Dave Myers on second guitar and a youthful Junior Wells on harmonica. When Fred Below joined the band on drums, the band, then known as the Four Aces, established an aggressive jump-blues style and quickly gained notoriety. The Aces, with a particularly innovative sound and style, brought Little Walter into the spotlight with such hits as "Juke." Myers and the Aces (known at various times as the Four Aces, Little Walter and the Night Cats, and the Jukes) toured extensively with Little Walter, playing such venues as the Apollo Theatre, which rarely booked Chicago blues performers. In the 1950s, the group was partially disbanded, and Good Rockin' Charles sometimes filled in for Wells on harmonica. Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Louis Myers began gigging steadily under his own name. Myers reformed the Aces in 1970s, and they performed successful reunion dates as "living legends" to a younger generation of blues fans at festivals and concerts around the world. Although primarily remembered as a jazz-influenced guitar player, Myers demonstrated the influence of Little Walter in his refined and skillful harmonica playing.

RYAN OLSEN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli

MYERS, LOUIS

Whiteis, David. "Louis Myers." Living Blues no. 119 (January/February 1995): 64–65.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

MYERS, SAM

b. 19 February 1936; Laurel, MS

Harmonica player, vocalist, drummer, composer. Sam Myers, the eloquent harmonica stylist and gruff, expressive vocalist from the Mississippi Delta, began his long career with King Mose & the Royal Rockers in the early 1950s. Myers's Ace single "Sleeping in the Ground" (1957) is a blues classic, and his harp work with Elmore James on "Look on Yonder Wall" and other 1961 recordings for Fire Records is exemplary. After a period of dormancy, Myers reemerged in the 1980s with the Mississippi Delta Blues Band and in 1985 joined Texas guitarist Anson Funderburgh and His Rockets, who continue to feature his harmonica and vocals before ever-growing audiences.

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli O'Neal, Jim, and Peter Lee. "Sam Myers: Blowing It Off the Top." Living Blues no. 85 (March/April 1989): 10–21.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Solo

"Sleeping in the Ground" (1957, Ace).
"Sad, Sad Lonesome Day" (1960, Fury).
"Look on Yonder Wall" (1961, Fire; with Elmore James).

As Sideman

Anson Funderburgh & the Rockets. My Love Is Here to Stay (1985, Black Top); Sins (1987, Black Top); Rack 'Em Up (1989, Black Top); Tell Me What I Want to Hear (1991, Black Top); Live at the Grand Emporium (1995, Black Top); That's What They Want (1997, Black Top); Change in My Pocket (1999, Black Top).
Mississippi Delta Blues Band. Down Home in Mississippi (TJ).

N

NAFTALIN, MARK

b. 2 August 1944; Minneapolis, MN

A keyboard player and producer, Naftalin was instrumental in the blues revival of the late 1960s and remains a respected, influential, and active musician to this day. As a student at the University of Chicago in the early 1960s, he met, and occasionally played with, singer and harmonica player Paul Butterfield and guitarist Elvin Bishop, core members of what would become the Paul Butterfield Blues Band. Moving to New York in the mid-1960s to attend the Mannes College of Music, Naftalin reunited with Butterfield; a one-off recording session that included guitarist Mike Bloomfield led to Naftalin's joining the Butterfield Band for a two-and-a-half year stint that culminated in four albums, including the critically acclaimed recording East-West.

In the late 1960s Naftalin relocated to San Francisco, doing sessions and live work (with figures such as James Cotton, John Lee Hooker, and Otis Rush), concert promotion, and production while touring with Bloomfield in both duo and band situations. In 1979 he launched Mark Naftalin's Blue Monday Party, an award-winning weekly radio show featuring both local and national blues talent; its follow-up, Mark Naftalin's Blues Power Hour, fared equally well. In the early 1980s Naftalin produced a number of events, including the Marin County Blues Festival and the Monterey Jazz Festival's Blues Afternoon, as well as Poet of the Blues, a video documentary of the pianist Percy Mayfield. In 1988, Naftalin founded Winner Records, an independent label whose releases include two live albums by the Paul Butterfield Blues Band as well as selected live performances from the Blue Monday Party radio broadcasts.

DEAN A. MASULLO

Bibliography

AMG (Michael Erlewine)

Selected Recordings

With Big Brother and the Holding Company: Be a Brother (Columbia 3022).

With Canned Heat: Hallelujah (Liberty 7618).

With Duane Allman: Anthology, Volume II (Capricorn 0998).

With James Cotton: The Best of the Verve Years (Verve 314527371-2); Cotton in Your Ears (Verve 3060); From Cotton with Verve (Black Magic 9001).

With John Lee Hooker: The Best of John Lee Hooker, 1965–1974 [from ABC 768] (MCA 10539); Born in Mississippi, Raised Up in Tennessee (ABC 768); Endless Boogie (ABC 720); Never Get Out of These Blues Alive (ABC 736).

With Michael Bloomfield: Analine (Takoma 1059); The Best of Michael Bloomfield (Takoma TAKCD-8905-2); Between the Hard Place and the Ground (Takoma 7070); Bloomfield, a Retrospective (Columbia CZ-37578); Count Talent and the Originals (Clouds 8805); Essential Blues 1964–1969 (Columbia/Legacy CK 57631); I'm with You Always (Demon Fiend 92); It's Not Killing Me (Columbia 9883); Live at the Old Waldorf (Legacy CK 65688); Living in the Fast Lane (Waterhouse 11).

With Otis Rush: Mourning in the Morning (Cotillion 9006); Right Place, Wrong Time (Bullfrog 301, HighTone 8007).

With the Paul Butterfield Blues Band: An Anthology: The Elektra Years (Elektra 62124-2); East-West (Elektra 315); East-West Live (Winner 447); Golden Butter

NAFTALIN, MARK

(Elektra 2005); In My Own Dream (Elektra 74025); The Original Lost Elektra Sessions (Rhino R2 73505); The Paul Butterfield Blues Band (Elektra 294); The Resurrection of Pigboy Crabshaw (Elektra 74015); Strawberry Jam (Winner 446).

With Percy Mayfield: Percy Mayfield Live (Winner 445).

With Ron Thompson: Just Like a Devil (Winner 444).

NAPIER, SIMON

b. 31 October 1939; Manchester, England

d. 1 December 1990; Little Common, Sussex, England

Blues magazine publisher and editor, record label owner, and distributor. In 1962 he formed the Blues Appreciation Society and in April 1963 he launched Blues Unlimited magazine, both with Mike Leadbitter, at Bexhill-on-Sea, Sussex, England (see Leadbitter, Michael Andrew "Mike" entry). Napier's own preferences were pre-World War II blues, old-time, and hillbilly music. Combined with his natural business instincts, plus Leadbitter's research zeal for the postwar blues, he transformed the blues fanzine (with an initial run of two hundred copies), into an internationally recognized magazine. Following Leadbitter's death in 1974, Napier built up Swift Distributors, including Flyright Records, with Bruce Bastin and Robin Gosden. With Leadbitter, he was a founder of modern blues journalism.

JOHN BROVEN

Bibliography

Broven, John. "Simon Napier: 1939–1990." Juke Blues no. 22 (Winter/Spring 1991): 21–22.

Cowley, John. "Simon Napier." Blues & Rhythm no. 58 (February 1991): 14.

Leadbitter, Mike, and Napier, Simon, eds. Blues Unlimited nos. 1–102 (1963–1973).

NAPPY CHIN

b. Clarence Richard Evans, 8 February 1935

d. 8 March 1972; Dallas, TX

Electric guitarist active in Dallas, most often associated with singer/dancer/comedian Finney Mo (Leslie Finney, October 23, 1929–1984). His career was interrupted around 1958 to 1963 as a result of an arrest for drug possession. Reputedly an excellent guitarist, it appears he recorded only as sideman to Finney Mo for Duchess Records.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Nevitt, Chuck. "From New Orleans to Dallas: The Story of Finney Mo and Nappy Chin." Blues & Rhythm no. 50 (March 1980): 4–7.

NARDELLA, STEVE

b. 26 June 1948; Providence, RI

An Ann Arbor, Michigan–based blues and rockabilly musician, originally from Providence, Rhode Island. He first recorded with Detroit bluesman Bobo Jenkins, playing the harmonica. Steve is also a guitarist and vocalist. In the 1970s he was in the Boogie Brothers band with Sarah Brown, Fran Christina, and John Nicholas. They backed Johnny Shines at the 1972 Ann Arbor Jazz & Blues Festival (which later came out on Atlantic). Next, he started the Silvertones with George Bedard, recording one album for Blind Pig. In the 1980s he founded the Steve Nardella Band (then featuring Mr. B. on piano). In 1995 the Steve Nardella Band did a tour of Scandinavia backing Eddie Burns. Today, in addition to leading his own band, Steve is also a member of Jack Scott's band.

R. J. SPANGLER

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda)

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Solo

It's All Rock & Roll (1979, Blind Pig).

Daddy Rollin' Stone (1993, Schoolkids Records).

In Bands

The Vipers (1974?, Blind Pig; 45 rpm; the first recording ever released by Blind Pig!).

The Silvertones. One Chance with You (1977, Blind Pig).

As Sideman

Ann Arbor Blues and Jazz Festival (1973, Atlantic).

Bobo Jenkins. Here I Am a Fool in Love Again (The Green Album) (1975, Big Star).

John Mooney. Comin' Your Way (1979, Blind Pig).

Little Tino & The Hawaiians. "Crazy 'Bout Those Tigers/Bleacher Boogie" (198?, Teenage Records; 45 rpm).

Prime Chops, Vol. 2 (1993, Blind Pig; compilation).

Please Mr. Foreman: Motor City Blues (1994?, Schoolkids Records).

Motor City Blues. Total Energy (1998).

NASHVILLE

Nashville's blues days centered around three or four nightclubs on or near Jefferson Street, three large mail-order record firms that all had late night programs on WLAC (a fifty-thousand-watt clear channel station), and a ballpark that housed major blues and R&B shows in the off season and when the hometown team was on the road. One major blues label, Excello, was owned by one of the record firms, Ernie's Record Mart. Randy Wood, famous for Randy's Record Shop, forty miles out of Nashville in Gallatin, owned another label, Dot Records, which became a major contributor to pop music. WLAC had two disc jockeys, John Richbourg (known as "John R") and Bill "Hoss" Allen, who popularized many Nashville blues artists. Another important record firm in town was Buckley's.

The clubs most noted for blues entertainment were the Club Baron, the Stealaway, the Elks Club, the Del Morocco, and the House on the Hill, all in the Jefferson Street area. On Charlotte Avenue Etta James recorded a live album (Etta James Rocks the House, 1963, Chess label) at the New Era, and nearly every blues or R&B star would do an after-hours show there, once their performance was over at the ballpark, which was known as Sulphur Dell, because it was built on top of an old sulphur spring in Nashville.

Some of the blues artists that lived in and around Nashville at one time or another were Jimi Hendrix and his world renowned bass player Billy Cox, Bobby Hebb, Gene Allison, Edwin Starr, Roscoe Shelton, Earl Gaines, and Johnny Jones. Songwriters include Ted Jarrett and Bob Holmes. Additionally, legendary figures such as James Brown, Ray Charles, Little Richard, and Sam Cooke have worked with numerous horn players from Tennessee State University.

The building of Interstate 40 in the late 1950s and early 1960s cut right through the center of Jefferson Street and had a devastating effect on the local blues scene. However, signs are good that the blues scene in Nashville is on a return path. Recent blues festivals have been very popular, and new blues clubs have sprung up with great success.

PHIL EARHART

Bibliography

Cooper, Daniel. "'Scuffling': The Lost History of Nashville Rhythm & Blues." Blues & Rhythm no. 139 (1999): 12–16.

NEAL, KENNY

b. 14 October 1957; New Orleans, LA

With his engaging songs, charismatic presence, and energetic live shows, Kenny Neal was tagged early on as "the next big thing" by the blues press almost as soon as his first album was released in 1987. Neal seems to have accepted this designation with good humor and grace—and although the early predictions of crossover appeal and pop music stardom have yet to prove true, Neal has created a memorable body of blues recordings that places him among the most influential blues musicians of his generation.

He emerged as an important blues artist in his own right during the late 1980s after stints backing his father, Raful Neal, and Buddy Guy. Born into a musical family, son of a blues harmonica player, Kenny Neal was immersed in the blues from birth. At age thirteen, he was playing bass in his father's band in gigs around Baton Rouge. At seventeen, he joined Guy's band as bassist.

In his twenties, he switched to guitar and set off on his own, settling in Toronto in a band with several of his brothers. He returned stateside in the late 1980s, and in 1987 recorded his first album as leader for Bob Greenlee's King Snake label. That album, Bio on the Bayou, generated glowing reviews and positive feedback from radio stations. The much larger Alligator label quickly bought the album from King Snake, reissuing a slightly modified version (a couple of songs from the same session were swapped) as Big News from Baton Rouge.

With his soulful, baritone singing voice and fluid, melodic guitar and harmonica playing, Neal arrived on the international stage in full artistic blossom. By the time he began recording as a leader he was already thirty and had had the time to develop a distinctive style and unique musical voice. In addition to playing guitar and harmonica and singing, Neal can also play keyboards and drums, as well as bass. On guitar, he is as comfortable on acoustic as electric, and is a highly expressive slide player. Furthermore, he is a prolific composer, writing nearly all of his own songs.

A string of albums on Alligator in the late 1980s through mid-1990s combined with a busy touring schedule established Neal as a mainstay of the festival circuit and blues radio playlists. In 1991, he made his mark on stage as well, starring in the New York musical Mule Bone (which was composed by Taj Mahal), winning a Theater World Award for his efforts.

In the late 1990s, he left Alligator for Cleveland's Telarc label, and released a string of albums that were more polished affairs than the rough-hewn, swamp blues of his Alligator releases. These new albums continue to be among the most popular recordings in the blues world.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Trageser, Jim. "Blues Don't Have to Be Down and Out: Kenny Neal." Living Blues no. 91 (May/June 1990): 18–20.

NEAL, KENNY

Discography: AMG

Bio on the Bayou (1987, King Snake 005; reissued 1988 as Big News from Baton Rouge!, Alligator 4764).
Walking on Fire (1991, Alligator 4795).
Hoodoo Moon (1994, Alligator 4825).
Homesick for the Road (1999, Telarc 1123; with Debbie Davies and Tab Benoit).
One Step Closer (2001, Telarc 83523).

NEAL, RAFUL

b. 6 June 1936; Baton Rouge, LA

In many ways, the career of harpist Raful Neal is a mirror of that of jazz pianist Ellis Marsalis: Both men are gifted instrumentalists who spent most of their careers in the role of sidemen until the rising fame of their offspring allowed them the opportunity to record and tour as leaders.

In Neal's case, he flirted with fame in the 1950s, playing in a band with Lazy Lester and, later, Buddy Guy. In 1957, musical hero Little Walter played in Baton Rouge and after hearing Neal's band play, invited them to move to Chicago. Guy followed up on that advice, but with him and his new wife about to start a family, Neal decided to stay in Louisiana. The next year, he did issue a 45, "Sunny Side of Love," on Don Robey's Peacock label. He continued playing local gigs while also holding down a day job, and issued intermittent 45s through the years. As his young family began growing up, many of his children—including Kenny, Noel, and Raful Jr.—took seats in his band. Today, nine of his children play the blues professionally.

It was only when son Kenny began to make waves in the late 1980s, though, that Raful really got the chance to step forward on a national stage. A 1987 release on King Snake Records, Louisiana Legend, was warmly received by the media and was picked up by Alligator Records. A follow-up on Ichiban also did well, and Raful Neal has been a regular fixture on the blues festivals circuit in the years since, although he has not been as active in the studio.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Coleridge, Steve. "Raful Neal and Some of His Blues Family." Living Blues no. 91 (May/June 1990): 21–24.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Louisiana Legend (1987, King Snake; reissued 1990, Alligator 478).

I Been Mistreated (1991, Ichiban 9004).
Old Friends (1998, Club Louisianne 1111).

NEELY, "LITTLE" BOBBY

b. 20 November 1931; Jackson, TN

d. 15 January 2002; Chicago, IL

Saxophonist/vocalist. As a youth, Neely admired jazzmen like Illinois Jacquet, and he took up the saxophone in his teens. He worked locally in Chicago, and occasionally toured with blues and jump-blues bands during the 1950s to 1980s. Neely led his own band, Spice, around the 1970s to 1990s.

DAVID WHITEIS

Bibliography

Danchin, Sebastian. "Little Bobby Neely: Spice Is What I Do." Living Blues no. 130 (1996): 34–46.

Discography: LSFP

NEGRO ART

French record label active in the late 1960s that pioneered the reissue of down-home blues and R&B recordings from the 1940s and 1950s. Fourteen LPs were issued, all anthologies produced in very limited editions in plain white sleeves.

HOWARD RYE

NELSON, CHICAGO BOB

b. Robert Lee Nelson 4 July 1944; Bogalusa, LA

Harmonica player and singer. Initially began performing in Louisiana, learning from regional "swamp blues" musicians Lazy Lester and Slim Harpo. From the early 1960s through 1976, Nelson lived in Chicago, where Muddy Waters conferred his nickname. From 1965 until 1976 he performed with Luther "Snake Boy" Johnson. Since 1977 he has lived in Atlanta, and he has recorded for the High Water and Ichiban labels.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Santelli

NELSON, JIMMY “T-99”

b. 7 April 1919; Philadelphia, PA

Singer. Jimmy Nelson was born in Philadelphia; 1919 and 1928 have been cited as his birth years. He hopped a freight to California, landing in Oakland in 1941. An encounter with blues shouter Big Joe Turner inspired him to become a singer. He began entering talent contests and playing local clubs and eventually joined Johnny Ingram’s band. With the band he began gigging at San Francisco’s Long Bar Showboat meeting artists like Louis Armstrong, Billie Holiday, and T-Bone Walker.

He made his recording debut in 1948 with a single for Olliet and in 1951 signed with Modern/RPM cutting his first sides at Oakland’s Clef Club, backed by the Peter Rabbit Trio. The song “T-99 Blues,” named after a Texas highway, became a hit, landing at number six on the R&B charts. Nelson toured the country before heading back to the studio. Despite worthy follow-ups, including the oft covered “Meet Me with Your Black Dress On,” he failed to repeat his prior success. Nelson settled in Houston in 1955. After his stint with RPM he cut singles for Music City, Kent, and Chess during the 1950s and later for All Boy, Paradise, and Home Cooking before taking a lengthy hiatus from music. In 1999 he released his first full-length record, Rockin’ and Shoutin’ the Blues on Bullseye Blues, which won a W. C. Handy Comeback of the Year award. His follow-up, Take Your Pick, was released in 2002.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin
Baumgartner, Brian. “A Trip Down T99 with Jimmy Nelson.” Juke Blues no. 13 (Autumn 1988): 8–11.
Brisbin, Anthony John, and Bock, M. Scott. “Jimmy T-99 Nelson: The Word Is Class.” Living Blues no. 143 (January/February 1999): 42–47.

Discography: AMGReissues

- Rockin’ and Shoutin’ the Blues* (1999, Bullseye Blues 9593).
Cry Hard Luck: The RPM and Kent Recordings 1951–61 (2003, CDCHD 976)

See also Modern/Flair/Meteor/Kent/RPM; Oakland; San Francisco; Texas; Turner, Joseph Vernon “Big Joe”

NELSON, ROMEO

b. Iromeio Nelson, 12 March 1902; Springfield, TN
d. 17 May 1974; Chicago, IL

Pianist whose 1929–1930 Vocalion recordings show him influenced by Pine Top Smith and Clarence Williams. At age six he moved with his family to Chicago, then at thirteen to East St. Louis, where he learned to play the piano. From the 1920s into the 1940s, he performed at house rent parties, but seldom in clubs and taverns. He supplemented his performing income through gambling. His Vocalion sessions came about through an association with guitarist Tampa Red. His “Head Rag Hop” is based on Pine Top Smith’s “Pinetop’s Boogie Woogie,” and it has been frequently included on LP and CD anthologies of blues piano. From the late 1940s he worked days as a construction worker, custodian, or elevator operator, and he performed occasionally and privately. In 1972 he suffered a heart attack, then became blind and bedridden. He was interviewed by Jim O’Neal and Eric Kriss in 1974. Shortly afterward he died from kidney failure.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Eugene Chadbourne); Harris; Larkin
Kriss, Eric. “Early Barrelhouse Piano” (including a notated transcription of Nelson’s “Dyin’ Rider”), Living Blues no. 16 (Spring 1974): 14–15.
O’Neal, Jim. “Romeo Nelson” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 36 (January/February 1978): 10–11.

Discography: DGRNELSON, SONNY BOY

(See Powell, Eugene)

NELSON, TRACY

b. 27 December 1944; French Camp, CA

Singer and pianist. With a big voice and a dramatic singing style, Nelson successfully melded soul, country, blues, and even a little psychedelia into her recorded work and live performances. She began performing around Madison, Wisconsin, as a teenager and made her recording debut in 1965 with the acoustic folk blues Deep Are the Roots. She relocated to California and formed the self-described “flower power blues band” Mother Earth in 1968 and a year later moved the band to Nashville, where it lasted three more years.

Nelson’s subsequent solo career found her recording regularly in the 1970s, but only occasionally after that. Her eponymous post–Mother Earth debut in 1974 was followed by Sweet Soul Music in 1975 and

NELSON, TRACY

Time Is on My Side the year after, solidly establishing her as one of the strongest voices on the female rock-ing roots scene. Her albums became less frequent and even more eclectic as time went by as she delved deeper into country and gospel.

She joined Irma Thomas and Marcia Ball for the collaborative Sing Out sessions in 1998 and in 2002 Nelson went behind bars to record the first live album of her career, Live from Cell Block D, for Memphis International Records.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG

NETTLES, ISAIAH

Flourished 1930s–1960s, Mississippi

Known as “The Mississippi Moaner,” Nettles was an archaic barefoot tap dancer and intense singer who recorded four songs in 1935 and was reported to still be performing in the 1960s.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

Wardlow, Gayle Dean. “Six Who Made Recorded History.” 78 Quarterly no. 5 (Autumn 1990): 93–96; reprinted in Chasin’ That Devil Music. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

Discography: DGR

NEVILLE BROTHERS

Formed in 1977 in New Orleans, Louisiana, the multitalented first family of New Orleans music dominated the Crescent City scene for a half century, beginning with keyboardist/vocalist Art’s 1954 anthem “Mardi Gras Mambo.” The angelic-voiced Aaron had his biggest solo hit in 1966 with the classic “Tell It Like It Is,” while saxist Charles worked on the jazz scene. Singer/percussionist Cyril brought a worldbeat flavor to the group when it finally began working as the Neville Brothers in 1977. The release of Fiyo on the Bayou in 1981 and the live set Neville-Ization three years later established the band internationally as the most popular and authentic purveyor of the modern New Orleans sound.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Larkin
The Neville Brothers with David Ritz. The Brothers (Boston: Little, Brown, 2000).

Discography: AMG

NEW ORLEANS

(See Louisiana)

NEWBERN, WILLIE “HAMBONE WILLIE”

Active 1920s–1940s

Singer and guitarist. From what little is known about him today (mostly from Sleepy John Estes), he performed in medicine shows around the Mississippi–Arkansas–Tennessee area. He is most regarded today for recording (for OKeh in 1929) the earliest known rendition of the blues standard “Roll and Tumble Blues.”

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Larkin
Lornell, Kip, and Jim O’Neal. “Living Blues Interview: Hammie Nixon and Sleepy John Estes.” Living Blues no. 19 (January/February 1975): 13–19.
Welding, Pete. “Sleepy John Estes on Hambone Willie Newbern.” Blues Unlimited no. 43 (May 1967): 7.

Discography: DGR

See also Estes, John Adam “Sleepy John”

NEWBORN, CALVIN

b. Edwin Calvin Newborn, 27 April 1933; Memphis, TN

Guitarist based in Memphis, brother of pianist Phineas Newborn, Jr. T-Bone Walker, Oscar Moore, and Wes Montgomery were formative influences. In the early 1950s he recorded with B. B. King, and in clubs he was engaged in guitar “battles” with Pee Wee Crayton and Gatemouth Brown. His jazz work included terms with his brother, Earl Hines, and Lionel Hampton. He is as capable of producing solos in gutbucket blues style as in modern jazz.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

New Grove Jazz

Discography: Lord; LSPF

NEWBORN, PHINEAS, JR.

b. 14 December 1931; Whiteville, TN

d. 26 May 1989; Memphis, TN

Phineas, brother of Calvin Newborn, grew up in a musical family and studied piano (his principal instrument), music theory, and several brass instruments in high school. Starting in 1945, he played rhythm and blues in local Memphis bands including those of his father, the drummer Phineas Newborn, Sr., during the years 1948–1950. He also appeared on early B. B. King recordings in 1949. Newborn entered college in 1950 as a music major at the Tennessee Agricultural and Industrial State University, Nashville. He dropped out in 1952 after his father refused, for unknown reasons, to let his talented son transfer to the Julliard School in New York City. He then studied at Lemoyne College in Memphis where he added vibraphone and three types of saxophone to his array of instruments, though piano was still his principal instrument.

Newborn rejoined his father's group after getting experience playing with Willis "Gator" Jackson in 1953 and in a military band from 1953 to May 1955. By late 1955, however, he was able to establish his own band in Philadelphia. In 1956 Newborn moved to New York and began performing at Basin Street with his brother Calvin, George Joyner (who later became known as Jamil Nasser), and Kenny Clarke. He soon made his first album as a leader (with Oscar Pettiford replacing Joyner) and would continue recording and performing as a leader during the next few years. He formed a duo with Charles Mingus and the two would accompany the poet Langston Hughes at the Village Vanguard in February 1958. Also in 1958 Newborn would join Roy Haines at Birdland and the Five Spot, and would tour Europe in the show "Jazz from Carnegie Hall." In 1959 his collaboration with Mingus would continue on the soundtrack for the film Shadows.

Afterward Newborn's career would decline severely due to mental illness and alcoholism. He moved to Los Angeles in 1960 where his personal problems would destroy two marriages and lead to long periods of hospitalization. He was still able to record in 1961 with Teddy Edwards and Howard McGhee and release two albums as a leader in 1961–1962. Also, in October 1962, he got a performance spot in an episode of the television series Jazz Scene USA and made further recordings as a leader in 1964 and 1969.

While Newborn enjoyed moderate success as a touring artist throughout the 1970s, his career would never reach the height it had previously enjoyed. Further illness prevented him from working during most of the 1980s and in 1988 doctors discovered a lung tumor. He died the following year.

ROBERT SORICELLI

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Newborn, Calvin. As Quiet as It's Kept: The Genius of Phineas Newborn, Jr. Memphis, TN: Phineas Newborn, Jr., Family Foundation, 1996.

Discography: Lord

NEWELL, "LITTLE" EDDIE

b. 29 August 1930

d. 24 April 1981; St. Louis, MO

Chicago-based blues harmonica player and vocalist. Newell, performing as Little Eddie in a Jimmy Reed drawling style, primarily made his impact as a club performer, recording only two sessions. His first session, for Tommy Jones's Mad label, yielded one single—"Teddy Bear Blues," a routine twelve-bar blues, where Newell's vocals are undermixed. At a later session for the Big Beat label, he recorded four more sides, which had the virtue of being done more professionally. Commercially, the recordings remained obscure.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

"Little Eddie Newell" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 50 (Spring 1981): 46.

NICHOLSON, JAMES DAVID "J. D."

b. 12 April 1917; Monroe, LA

d. 27 July 1991; Los Angeles, CA

A pianist from Louisiana heavily influenced by Walter Davis, J. D. Nicholson made his way to the West Coast where he has recorded since the late 1950s behind numerous artists (Jimmy McCracklin, Ray Agee, George Smith, Pee Wee Crayton, Big Mama Thornton, Rod Piazza). He recorded only a handful of sides under his own name where one can appreciate his nasal voice and laid-back delivery.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Robinson, Chris, and Leadbitter, Mike. “J. D. Nicholson Talking.” Blues Unlimited no. 82 (June 1971): 11–12.

Discography: LSFP

Mr. Fullbright's Blues (1988, Pea Vine CD 2008).

NIGHTHAWK RECORDS

Began as a blues reissue label in 1976, but St. Louis-based Nighthawk Records decided in 1980 to concentrate its efforts on Jamaican music, most notably reggae as well as ska and rocksteady. The company has released classic and contemporary reggae material by such performers as the Itals, Winston Jarrett, and Leonard Dillon, aka The Ethiopian.

RON WYNN

NIGHTHAWK, ROBERT

b. Robert McCollum, 30 November 1909; Helena, AR
d. 5 November 1967; Helena, AR

Robert Nighthawk was one of three children of the musically inclined Ned and Mattie McCollum. Joe Willie Wilkins's one-time wife Margaret was said to be Nighthawk's sister but, according to Nighthawk biographer Jeff Harris, neither was biological kin. Nighthawk learned the harmonica from Louisiana musician Johnny (or Eddie) Jones in 1924. As a youth, Nighthawk began his rambling; he never stopped.

Performing various agricultural jobs by day and playing music at night, Nighthawk was working the Hollandale, Mississippi, area in 1931 when he learned guitar from Houston Stackhouse. Stackhouse, who claimed to be Nighthawk's cousin, was a multi-instrumentalist who had learned to play guitar from fellow Crystal Springs natives Tommy Johnson and his brothers. It is their style, featuring rhythmically sophisticated Delta guitar with the incorporation of falsetto yodels, that Stackhouse conveyed to Nighthawk. Nighthawk's recorded repertoire includes several Tommy Johnson songs.

Nighthawk's travels took him throughout the Delta and beyond where he performed with Sonny Boy (John Lee) Williamson, Sleepy John Estes, Yank Rachel, Hammie Nixon, Big Joe Williams, Will Shade, John Lee Hooker, and others. He was playing guitar in the orchestra of the Dan Hildrege Show in East St. Louis, in the early thirties, when he met one-time girlfriend, singer, and dancer Little Laura Dukes from Memphis, teaching her to play the ukulele.

Nighthawk was well known in the lower South so that, in 1935, after becoming involved in a shooting, he fled north to St. Louis to escape prosecution. There he adopted his mother's maiden name and became Robert Lee McCoy.

Nighthawk first recorded (never released) accompanying pianist Jack Newman in October 1936. In St. Louis, he worked regularly with John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson and Big Joe Williams and they accompanied him on his first recording session as a leader, in Chicago on May 5, 1937 (Bluebird). Included in the six records he cut was his composition “Prowling Night-Hawk”; years later he adopted it as his surname. Twenty-one songs were released, under the name Robert Lee McCoy or Rambling Bob, by Bluebird between May 1937 and December 1938. In June 1940, in Chicago, Nighthawk recorded four songs for Decca. On these records, released as being by “Peetie's Boy”—a reference to St. Louis musician Peetie Wheatstraw—Nighthawk was joined by vocalist Ann Sortier.

During the late thirties and early forties, Nighthawk frequently recorded as accompanist, playing guitar and/or harmonica, behind Sonny Boy Williamson, Big Joe Williams, Sleepy John Estes, Walter Davis, Speckled Red, Henry Townsend, Peetie Wheatstraw, and others.

Although still a rambler, Nighthawk moved his base of operations to Chicago in 1940. It was apparently during this time that Nighthawk came under the influence of slide guitar master Tampa Red, adding some of his songs to his repertoire and blending Red's smoother, more delicate slide style with that of the Crystal Springs sound and creating the distinctive single-string slide playing for which Nighthawk became famous.

In 1942, Nighthawk was back home in Helena where he landed a spot on radio station KFFA advertising Bright Star Flour. Sometimes he was accompanied by guitarist Joe Willie Wilkins and pianist Pinetop Perkins and, by 1946, by his teacher (and later student) Houston Stackhouse. During the forties, Nighthawk and Stackhouse tutored the young Earl Hooker on guitar.

The year 1948 found Nighthawk, now playing electric guitar, in Chicago, where his old friend Muddy Waters—himself influenced by Nighthawk’s slide innovations—helped arrange a recording session for the Chess brothers. This session resulted in one release and another one, in 1949, produced an Aristocrat single featuring two Nighthawk standards: “Black Angel Blues” and “Annie Lee Blues” (thirteen on the national R&B chart), both songs previously recorded by Tampa Red. Following a third Chess session and second Aristocrat single in 1950, Nighthawk recorded (1951–1952) eleven numbers for the United and States labels. His postwar popularity was based on these late 1940s and early 1950s recordings; Nighthawk did not record again until 1964.

Nighthawk returned to the Helena/Friar’s Point area and continued rambling, following the crops south to Florida, or working his way north to St. Louis or Chicago. Reports from his contemporaries indicate that he played regularly throughout the Delta region, often performing with his son Sam Carr on drums and Frank Frost on harmonica.

In 1964, Nighthawk made one of his infrequent trips to Chicago. That year he recorded for Decca, Chess, and Testament, and participated in a documentary for Swedish radio. He was also recorded live, with a small combo on Maxwell Street—partially released on LP in 1979 and in the 1965 documentary And This Is Free (1995).

Nighthawk, by 1965, was back in the Helena area, broadcasting over KFFA and playing local gigs. His last recordings in the company of Houston Stackhouse, James “Peck” Curtis, and Carey Mason were made in the field, in 1967 in Dundee, Mississippi, by George Mitchell. In poor health at the time, he died several months later on November 5. Nighthawk told friends that his illness was the result of having been either poisoned or conjured. The official cause of death was congestive heart failure. He was buried in Helena’s Magnolia Cemetery.

Nighthawk entered many relationships with women and reportedly had several children. By his first wife Mary Griffen he had two children, Ludie and musician Sam Carr. With another wife, drummer Hazel Momon, he had three children: Geni, Robert, and Marianne.

The late Pete Welding described Nighthawk’s “slide work” as “simply masterful—delicate, smooth, perfectly controlled, full of sustained invention.” His singing, whether mournful or jubilant, was the perfect accompaniment to his playing and together they created a unique feel and tone that only the greatest artists achieve. Pinetop Perkins said: “Nobody else could play a slide like him. They think they can but they can’t . . . It’s wailin’ man.” Nighthawk’s influence is evident in the playing of nearly every postwar slide guitarist as well as many, including B. B. King, who do not play in the slide style.

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

- AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 Hay, Fred J. Goin’ Back to Sweet Memphis: Conversations with the Blues. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2001.
 O’Neal, Jim. “Robert Nighthawk.” Crazy Music 11 (December 1977): 16–23.
 Perkins, Pinetop. Born in the Delta (1997, Telarc CD 83418).
 Welding, Pete. Liner notes to Masters of the Modern Blues: Robert Nighthawk and Houston Stackhouse (1969, Testament LP 2215).

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

- Black Angel Blues* (1991, Charly CD 29).
Masters of Modern Blues: Robert Nighthawk and Houston Stackhouse (1994, Testament CD 5010).
Mississippi Delta Blues: “Blow My Blues Away” (1994, Arhoolie CD 401/401).
All This Is Free: The Legendary Slice-of-Life Film from the Streets of Chicago (1995, Shanachie video).
Bricks in My Pillow (1998, Delmark CD 711).
And This Is Maxwell Street (1999, P-Vine CD 5527/28).
Prowling Nighthawk (2000, Catfish CD).

NIGHTHAWKS

Self-described “white boy blues band,” formed in 1972 by harpist Mark Wenner (b. 1948) and guitarist Jimmy Thackery (b. 1953), with bassist Jan Zukowski (b. 1950) and drummer Pete Ragusa (b. 1949) joining two years later. All four hailed from the Washington, D.C., area, and the group was a big part of the vibrant 1970s DC roots-rock scene. Wenner had heard recordings by bluesman Robert Nighthawk, listened to soul deejay Bob “Nighthawk” Terry on DC radio, and knew a friend who called his truck “the nighthawk.” All three were sources of the band’s name. Edward Hopper’s painting Nighthawks graced the cover of the band’s second album, Open All Night (1976).

Starting with a Chicago blues repertoire, the Nighthawks incorporated R&B, soul, rock, and rockabilly while forging ties with blues veterans such as Muddy Waters (sharing the stage with him more than one hundred times). After expanding their fan base north and south along the East Coast, they began touring nationally around 1978. During their years of peak popularity, they played more than three hundred gigs a year, often as headliners (future stars Stevie Ray Vaughan and Robert Cray opened for them). Artistic differences with their record label in the mid-1980s and Thackery's departure for a solo career in 1987 were setbacks, but the band persevered, with guitar duties handled in succession by Jimmy Nalls (1988–1990), Danny Morris (1990–1994), Pete Kanaras (1994–2004), and Paul Bell (2004 to present). Johnny Castle replaced long-time bassist Zukowski in 2004. The heart and soul of the group has always been front man Wenner, whose in-your-face style of harp recalls James Cotton, whose vocals convey blue-eyed soul, and whose tattoo-covered body and biker attire exemplify the group's blue-collar attitude. The Nighthawks discography includes more than twenty albums for a variety of labels. Most of their best-received recordings are of live performances, the format in which this well-greased, hard-working band excels.

NIGHTHAWKS

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin (listed under Thackery, Jimmy); Santelli
"The History of the Nighthawks." The Nighthawks website, <http://www.thenighthawks.com/nhHistory01.htm>.

Discography: AMG

See also Thackery, Jimmy

NIX, WILLIE

b. 6 August 1922; Memphis, TN
d. 9 July 1991; Leland, MS

Southern Delta-style blues singer of the post-World War II era. Nix's recorded work includes only a handful of titles, but it is all first rate, in which his insinuating vocals are put to excellent use on cleverly written lyrics. He began his career as a tap dancer at age twelve, joining the Rabbit Foot Minstrels at the age of sixteen, in 1938. He toured with the group for five years, in an act that combined dancing and cracking jokes, and then performed for the Royal America Show for another three years. During World War II he served in the Army. After the war, Nix joined Sonny Boy Williamson's band, where he was taught to play drums for the group. After Williamson left the group, Nix and the other members, singer Willie Love and guitarist Joe Willie Wilkins, formed a group that was featured on a radio show on KWEM in West Memphis, Arkansas. Nix took over the lead spot in 1950 after Willie Love left. His show lasted more than a year. In 1951 Sam Phillips heard Nix and recorded him, with sides going to RPM (1951), Checker (1952), and Phillips's own Sun label (1953), the latter released under the name of Memphis Blues Boy.

In 1953, after Nix committed a murder in Arkansas under unclear circumstances, he moved up to Chicago, where he stayed five years, drumming behind such blues greats as Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, Elmore James, Aleck Miller "Sonny Boy Williamson," and Sunnyland Slim. On rare occasions he fronted his own group in the clubs, notably at Smitty's Corner. Nix recorded two singles for Art Sheridan for his Chance and Sabre labels. His best side was on Sabre called "Just Can't Stay," based on a classic Mississippi country blues, "Catfish." In 1958, Nix returned to Arkansas to settle his legal problems from the murder (he ended up serving more than four years, according to Floyd Jones). After leaving prison he never returned to the music business.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

AMG (Bruce Eder); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
LaVere, Steve. "Willie Nix." Living Blues no. 11 (Winter 1972–73): 17–19.
O'Neal, Jim. "Willie Nix: The Memphis Blues Boy of Mississippi." Living Blues no. 43 (Summer 1979): 9–13.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

NIXON, ELMORE

b. 17 November 1933; Crowley, LA
d. 11 December 1973; Houston, TX

Houston pianist who participated as sideman for Gold Star, Peacock, Mercury, Savoy, and Imperial sessions in 1949–1955. His own recordings are in the 1940s jump band style. In the 1960s he assisted Clifton Chenier and Lightnin' Hopkins in recording sessions. He was inactive in music after surgery in 1970.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

NIXON, HAMMIE

b. Hammie Nickerson, 22 January 1908; Brownsville, TN

d. 17 August 1984; en route from Brownsville to Jackson, TN

Harmonica, kazoo, jug, and guitar player Hammie Nixon's importance in blues goes far beyond his recordings as accompanist of guitarist Sleepy John Estes. He was a fully developed and very entertaining artist in his own right as well as a major influence on John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson. Nixon was orphaned at a very young age and raised by a white family, who bought him harmonicas and kazoos. At about age eleven his life would change when at a picnic he met Estes, with whom Nixon would off and on form one of the longest musical partnerships in the history of the blues. Hammie's last wife was Estes's daughter. Nixon also played with guitarist Hambone Willie Newbern, a cousin of Estes, and learned some tricks on harmonica from Noah Lewis. Alongside playing with Estes in the Brownsville area, Hammie often plied between the South and Chicago from the 1930s to the early 1960s. He claimed to have recorded for Victor with Estes in Memphis in 1929, but this was not confirmed by Estes. In any case, Nixon did record on harmonica and jug with Son Bonds from Brownsville for Decca in 1934 and with Estes for Champion in 1935, both times in Chicago. Two years later, Nixon cut more sides with the latter partner in New York City, again for Decca. At the same session he accompanied Charlie Pickett (from Brownsville) on harmonica and Lee Green on jug. Sometime in the 1930s he also toured with Dr. Graham's Medicine Show.

Apart from working outside music in Memphis and in Chicago until 1962, Nixon accompanied Estes in his Ora Nelle and Ebony recordings in Chicago in the 1940s. Following Estes's rediscovery in the 1960s, Nixon's musical career received a new boost. Whether as a duo or with other musicians, Nixon and Estes recorded a series of albums for Bob Koester's Delmark Records and did a session for Bea&Baby. They toured extensively in the United States and Canada, playing at the Newport Folk Festival in 1964. In Europe, they performed as part of the package known as the American Folk Blues Festival, also recording albums for Fontana and Storyville. Not until 1972, however, did Nixon record his first album, for the Italian label Albatros. Many concerts with Estes ensued, among the most important of which were tours with the Memphis Blues Caravan and appearances at the Newport Jazz Festival and the Festival of American Folklife. The seventies also saw Estes and Nixon tour Japan (Hammie's favorite country) twice, where they recorded LPs for Trio-Delmark. After Estes's death in 1977, Hammie thought about retiring from music but was convinced by David Evans to join a jug band featuring his harmonica playing and till then under-rated singing. In this formation and just with David Evans on guitar, Nixon played gigs and festivals in his local area, and made several national and two overseas tours. Before dying in 1984, Nixon cut a 45-rpm record and his second album under his own name for High Water Recording Company.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

- AMG (Michael Erlewine); Santelli; Southern Evans, David. Notes accompanying Hammie Nixon: Tappin' That Thing (1998, High Water/HMG 6509).
- Lornell, Kip, and Jim O'Neal. "Sleepy John Estes and Hammie Nixon." Living Blues no. 19 (January/February 1975): 13–19; reprinted in The Voice of the Blues: Classic Interviews from Living Blues Magazine, edited by Jim O'Neal and Amy Van Singel. New York: Routledge, 2002.
- Maniscalchi, Lucio, and Gianni Marcucci. Notes accompanying Tennessee Blues, Vol. 3: Hammie Nixon (1976, Albatros VPA 8277).
- McKee, Margaret, and Fred Chisenhall. "Sleepy John and Hammie." In Beale Black & Blue. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1993.

Discography: AMG; DGR (as accompanist); LSPFNOLAN, LLOYD

b. Nolan Lloyd, 15 February 1939; Chicago, IL

d. 21 May 1997; Chicago, IL

A Chicago R&B singer from the early 1960s. Nolan, whose name was turned around at the behest of his first record company, recorded his inaugural record in 1962, "What's Happenin' in Here," which had a Fats Domino flavor. The record was picked up by King, which gave the record Midwest distribution, and Nolan toured off its success. Nolan recorded twice more, releasing another single on King, "I Don't Know About You," which had a Little Willie John flavor. His last single on Daran (1936) was unsuccessful, at which point he retired from the recording business.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. "Lloyd Nolan." Juke Blues no. 6 (Autumn 1986): 15.

NOLEN, JIMMY

b. 3 April 1934; Oklahoma City, OK
 d. 17 December 1983; Atlanta, GA

Although relatively unrecognized for his innovative contributions to modern guitar stylings, guitarist Jimmy "Chank" Nolen is considered by many to be, in the words of his former bandleader Johnny Otis, "the founder of the funk guitar." Nolen's rhythmic, staccato guitar break, resembling a chopping action, was his signature invention, and has since been widely imitated by rock and funk musicians, including Jimi Hendrix and George Clinton.

Growing up on an Oklahoma farm, Nolen was first inspired to play after hearing T-Bone Walker and Lowell Fulson on the radio. In 1952, he joined and recorded with his first band, J. D. Nicholson & His Jivin' Five. Following the band to California in 1955, Nolen soon became involved in the thriving West Coast blues scene. By 1957, he had joined the Johnny Otis Band and begun actively working as a studio session guitarist, contributing to Otis's major hit, "Willie and the Hand Jive." During this same period, he recorded under his own name for the first time, through a contract with Federal Records, a subsidiary of the King label. In 1960, Nolen formed his own band, which was much in demand as a backup group for major blues artists such as B. B. King when they performed in Los Angeles. Joining James Brown's band, the J.B.'s, in 1965, Nolen had the opportunity to perfect his rhythm guitar style, which was first widely heard on the 1965 Brown hit, "Poppa's Got a Brand New Bag." Although Nolen's sound was immediately popular, he himself remained largely anonymous as a member of Brown's band. Except for a two-year hiatus in 1970–1972, Nolen remained in the J.B.'s until his sudden death from a heart attack at age forty-nine in 1983.

DAVID BEAUDOUIN

Bibliography

Larkin
 Hildebrand, Lee, and Kaiser, Henry. Guitar. "Jimmy Nolen—Short Biography." <http://www.funky-stuff.com/Nolen/bio.htm>.
 O'Neal, Jim. "Jimmy Nolen." Living Blues no. 59 (Spring 1984): 35.

Discography: LSFP

Selected Recordings

Dig These Blues: The Legendary Dig Masters, Vol. 2 ("Come on Home"—Jimmy Nolen) (1992, ACE CD CHCHD-334).

NORTH MISSISSIPPI ALLSTARS

Some groups perpetuate a family tradition, but few achieve the goal with the degree of panache balanced with a reverence for tradition embodied by the North Mississippi Allstars. Formed in 1996, this group brought together bassist Chris Chew with guitarist/lead vocalist Luther Dickinson and his percussionist sibling Cody. The brothers inhaled a broad range of vernacular and progressive musical influences from their father Jim Dickinson, the celebrated songwriter/keyboard player/producer whose credits range from the Rolling Stones to the Replacements. He raised his sons in the hill country of Northern Mississippi, where they apprenticed themselves to such local musical legends as the guitarists R. L. Burnside and Junior Kimbrough as well as the fife player Othar Turner. The trio launched their first release, Shake Hands with Shorty (2000), with the blues-affiliated independent label Tone Cool. The group's live extended improvisations attracted the rock-oriented jam band constituency and expanded their audience beyond its initial blues base. Subsequently, the Dickinson brothers established a temporary affiliation, the Word, with the popular jazz organist John Modeski and the sacred steel virtuoso Robert Randolph. The trio then regrouped with the addition of R. L. Burnside's grandson Dwayne and released Polaris (2003) and Hill Country Revue: Live at Bonnaroo (2004), the latter a family affair with their father, Jim, three generations of Burnside's, and Othar Turner's grandson.

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey)
 Bays, K. "North Mississippi All Stars: Boogie Men." Blues Revue no. 62 (November 2000): 17.

Discography: AMG

NORWOOD, SAM

Flourished 1920s–1940s

"Peg Leg Sam" Norwood, aka R. D. Norwood, was a familiar figure in the 1940s on Chicago's Maxwell Street, where he was held in some regard as a guitarist by men like Moody Jones and Johnny Williams. His only recordings, made in Mississippi in 1930, were four gospel duets with singer/guitarist Lucien "Slim" Duckett.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

NULISCH, DARRELL

b. 14 September 1952; Dallas, TX

Singer and harmonica player. His singing is based on soul singers Otis Redding, Al Green, and Bobby Bland. He was a founding member of Anson Funderburgh and the Rockets through the 1980s, then he began his solo career in 1991. His harmonica work is regarded as highly as his singing, and he enjoyed stints with Ronnie Earl and James Cotton. His recent CDs have been for the Severn label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bradley Torreano)

Discography: AMG (Bradley Torreano)

O

OAKLAND

Although there were night clubs in Oakland before World War II—Slim Jenkins’s Place on Seventh Street opened its doors in 1933—they mainly presented jazz and nothing is known of any local blues talent before the forties. The employment needs of local defense factories, especially the shipyards, led to a huge influx of blacks into the Bay Area (mainly from Texas, Arkansas, and Louisiana). The black population of Oakland rose from 8,462 in 1940 to 37,327 in 1945 and it has continued to grow—by 1980 almost half the residents of Oakland were black.

The presence of a large number of relatively well-paid workers looking for entertainment and with musical tastes formed in the South led to the growth of clubs and the appearance of musicians to cater to them. Artists like Saunders King and Ivory Joe Hunter appealed to those with more sophisticated tastes, but there was a demand too for music of a more down-home style. One of the earliest bands of this type of which we know was Count Otis Matthews’s West Oakland Houserockers, which included Vallejo-born Johnny Otis on drums. But such artists were not being recorded until Bob Geddins came onto the scene. Saunders King and Ivory Joe Hunter had already appeared on record but it was Geddins who during the ten years after the end of the war almost single-handedly (though we should not overlook the efforts of the Trilon and Olliet labels) revealed the amount of local blues talent. Artists like Lowell Fulson, Jimmy McCracklin, Roy Hawkins, Jimmy Wilson, and Johnny Fuller were able to build on the beginnings laid by Geddins and obtain wider reputations; others benefited only by securing their local popularity. But with a broad network of clubs (such as Esther’s Orbit Room and the Clef Club) regularly featuring both local and visiting artists; large venues like the Oakland Auditorium bringing in package shows with the latest stars; and radio stations like KWBR (later KDIA), with deejays Jumping George Oxford, Bouncin’ Bill Doubleday, and Don Barksdale spreading the word, the fifties were a boom time for blues in Oakland.

The sixties were less successful. Changes in musical taste, seen first in the popularity of vocal groups and then in the rise of soul music, combined with the devastation of Seventh Street by “urban renewal” led to a decline in the blues market and also to a redefinition of the blues—the “Oakland sound,” as created by Geddins, gave way to a more eclectic kind of blues, influenced both by the blues of other regions, especially Chicago, and by soul music. Nonetheless, there was still a local blues scene, even though many of the artists had day jobs and only played during weekends. Bob Geddins was still recording and giving visibility to artists like Al King, Sugar Pie DeSanto, and Tiny Powell; Galaxy Records in nearby Berkeley issued many singles by Little Johnny Taylor and Rodger Collins, and also gave Sonny Rhodes, J. J. Malone, The Right Kind, and others the chance to present themselves to a wider audience. Other labels such as Music City, Bay-Tone, and Loadstone, although primarily concerned with the more popular forms, gave occasional opportunities to blues artists, especially those who were able to update their styles by incorporating aspects of soul music. And a host of tiny labels at least gave the artists something to show to potential employers or to sell to club audiences. But, although there were still blues artists in Oakland, they were essentially local performers working for a neighborhood audience—the names of Eugene Blacknell, Johnny Talbot, Jesse James, and Eddie Foster will serve to represent this period.

The blues “revival,” which began in the sixties, had little immediate effect, focused as it was on acoustic country blues on the one hand (which did boost the career of Oakland resident Jesse Fuller) and electric Chicago blues on the other, but by the end of the decade attention began to be paid to other forms and regions of blues. A significant moment came in 1979 when J. J. Malone and Troyce Key took over Eli’s Mile High Club on the death of Eli Thornton who had founded the club in 1974. With a regular parade of both local and visiting musicians, the club began to attract an audience both from within Oakland and from outside and to serve as a focus for a renewed interest in Oakland blues. But with the death of Key in 1992 the momentum flagged and once again the blues in Oakland largely became music by locals for locals. Nonetheless there is a surprisingly large number of active musicians in the Oakland area, still playing, albeit sporadically, and still recording, either for small labels or producing their own CDs. The work of Ronnie Stewart and the Bay Area Blues Society has been significant too. Acoustic blues is represented by Elmer Lee Thomas and Alvin “Youngblood” Hart; more modern styles by artists like harmonica player Birdlegg, pianist Beverly Stovall, female singers like Lady Bianca, Brenda Boykin, Ella Pennewell, E. C. Scott and Sista Monica, as well as Fillmore Slim, Freddie Hughes, Bobby Reed & Surprise, Alvon Johnson, Jackie Payne, Craig Horton, and many others. Those who wish to seek it out can still find and hear blues in Oakland—at clubs like Jimmie’s, Yoshi’s, Dotha’s Juke Joint, and the Continental Club.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

- Bay Area Blues Society website, <http://www.bayareablues-society.net>.
- Hildebrand, Lee. “Oakland Blues Part 1. Essay.” In California Soul: Music of African Americans in the West, edited by Jacqueline Cogdell DjeDje and Eddie S. Meadows, pp. 104–112. Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1998.
- Williams, Dave. “Stroll Out West.” Juke Blues no. 40 (Spring 1998): 42–43.

See also Big Town; Boykin, Brenda; Douglas, K. C.; Fantasy/Prestige/Bluesville/Galaxy/Milestone/Riverside; Fuller, Johnny; Fulson, Lowell; Garrett, Vernon; Geddins, Bob; Heartsman, Johnny; Hunter, Ivory Joe; Irma; James, Jesse; Kelton, Robert “Bob”; King, Al; King, Saunders; Malone, “John Jacob” J. J.; McCracklin, Jimmy; McGuirt, Clarence “Candyman”; Otis, Johnny; Rhodes, Sonny; Rhythm; Robinson, L. C. “Good Rockin”; Sadler, Haskell Robert “Cool Papa”; San Francisco; Scott, E. C.; Sista Monica; Talbot, Johnny; Taylor, Johnny Lamar “Little”; Thomas, Elmer Lee; Thomas, Lafayette Jerl “Thing”; Trilon; Valentine, Cal; Waters, Mississippi Johnny; Willis, Robert Lee “Chick”; Wilson, Jimmy

ODEN, “ST. LOUIS” JIMMY

b. James Burke Oden, 26 June 1903; Nashville, TN
d. 30 December 1977; Chicago, IL

James Burke Oden, better known as St. Louis Jimmy, was born in Nashville, Tennessee, in 1903 and was orphaned at an early age. He left home for St. Louis around 1917 and taught himself piano in the mid-1920s. He worked with Big Joe Williams and Roosevelt Sykes, singing at house parties, local bars, and clubs until 1933, when trouble with the authorities occasioned a move to Chicago. From 1932 he was a regular visitor to the recording studios and was the composer of many blues standards including “Going Down Slow,” “Sitting Down Thinking Blues,” and “Soon Forgotten.” His easy, half-sung, half-spoken delivery and original lyrics made him a popular recording artist for many years.

Although a capable pianist in the St. Louis tradition, on most of his recordings he was accompanied by Sykes, with whom he also toured widely, and later by Sunnyland Slim. While in Chicago he recorded for Decca, Bluebird, Victor, Black & White, Columbia, Bullet, Miracle, Aristocrat, JOB (of which he was a cofounder), Mercury, Apollo, Savoy, Herald, Opera, Parrot, Bluesville, and Delmark. He also cut a few tracks for the Bullet and Duke labels. In the forties he co-owned a blues club in Indianapolis together with Memphis Minnie and worked as manager for the Eddie Boyd Band in the fifties. A serious car accident in 1957 curtailed his musical career, although he continued as a songwriter until his death in 1977. From the late 1950s he roomed in Muddy Waters’s house and was closely associated with the modern Chicago blues sound. He died in 1977.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
O'Neal, Jim. "St. Louis Jimmy." Living Blues no. 36 (January/February 1978): 30.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

ODETTA

b. Odetta Felious Gordon, 31 December 1930; Birmingham, AL

Odetta received classical vocal training and sang in the 1947 Broadway production of Finian's Rainbow before deciding on a career in folk music. Her blues singing was initially in the Bessie Smith tradition, but it evolved as her guitar skills and folk music repertoire broadened. Odetta recorded folk music and blues for the Tradition and Riverside labels in the 1950s, recording such standards as "House of the Rising Sun," and "Make Me a Pallet on Your Floor." By 1960 she moved to the Vanguard label where she enjoyed critical and commercial success, especially with her live albums taped at New York Town Hall and Carnegie Hall. She remains today a powerful performer of traditional African American music.

ROBERT SORICELLI

Bibliography

Larkin
Greenburg, M. "Power and Beauty: The Legend of Odetta." Sing Out! 36, no. 2 (1991): 2-8.

ODOM, ANDREW "BIG VOICE"
"LITTLE B. B."

b. 15 December 1936; Denham Springs, LA
d. 23 December 1991; Chicago, IL

Vocalist from southern Louisiana, well versed in the soul and Chicago blues sounds. His voice has often been compared favorably to that of Bobby "Blue" Bland and/or B. B. King; some felt his voice was even more powerful. Out of admiration for B. B. King, Odom took the nickname "B. B." Others called him "B. B. Junior" or "Little B. B." Later on, he acquired the nicknames "Big Voice" or simply "Voice."

As a boy and young man, Odom sang in his small Louisiana church. In the mid-1950s, he moved near St. Louis, where he worked with a number of blues performers, including Albert King. Here, using the name Little Aaron, Odom cut a single for the Marlo label. In 1960, he moved to Chicago and sang with Earl Hooker's band until Hooker's passing ten years later. Odom often performed with Buddy Guy and Magic Slim, and sang on a number of recording sessions with Jimmy Dawkins and others. He recorded several of his own albums, including Farther on the Road for the BluesWay label in 1969 and Goin' to California with the Gold Tops in 1976 for the Flying Fish label, but not released until 1992. Like a number of other blues musicians, he often felt pulled to stop performing in clubs and go sing for the church, though he never did give up singing the blues.

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Dawkins, Jimmy. "'I was Born in the Swamps': Andrew Voice Odom." Blues Unlimited no. 88 (January 1972), 14-16.
Whiteis, David. "Andrew 'Voice' Odom." The Chicago Reader (10 January 1992); reprinted in Living Blues no. 103 (May/June 1992), 50-52.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Singing; Soul

OFFITT, LILLIAN

b. 4 November 1938; Nashville, TN

Singer in blues shouting style. Birth year also given as 1933. The success of her first Excello single, "Miss You So" (1957), was successful enough for her to begin a full-time career. In 1958 she was featured singer with Earl Hooker in Chicago and recorded for the Chief label through 1961. Activity since 1974 unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

OH PRETTY WOMAN (CAN'T MAKE YOU LOVE ME)

"Oh Pretty Woman (Can't Make You Love Me)" was composed by A. C. Williams, and it was recorded by Albert King for Stax on August 3, 1966, appearing on the Stax single 197 (backed with "Funk-Shun" recorded the same day), and on the Stax/Atlantic LP 8213 Born Under a Bad Sign. The song is a sixteen-measure blues, really an (8 + 8) measure verse-and-refrain blues. The eight-measure verse is split into two four-measure verses, each of which is further split into two more two-measure rhyming pairs ("sun"—"none," "bone"—"alone" as heard in the first chorus). The eight-measure refrain lyrics stay constant to the title words "pretty woman" and "can't make you love me." An odd, perhaps coincident trait are two similarities to the lyrics of Son House's "My Black Mama" parts one and two (1930), which had been reissued in 1962 on the Origin Jazz Library LP Really the Country Blues. The opening chorus words "oh," "sun," "and powder," and "help [her] none" may also be heard in part one, chorus four, of the House recording in the corresponding points in lyric chorus, the refrain lyric "what's the matter with you" and "what I do" may be heard in part one, chorus one, of the House performance. Furthermore, King sings the song in the same axe-fall phrasing, that is, with the same eighth-rest delay as House sings in 1930.

King's guitar solo is in twelve measures, based in the key of G with its upper solo pitches hovering over D above high C. A broad antecedent to this solo may be heard in King's 1962 recording "I Get Evil" (released on Bobbin 135), in turn a treatment of Tampa Red's "Don't You Lie to Me" for Victor Bluebird in 1940. King's 1962 solo occurs in the opening chorus, while the band is playing a rhumba beat pattern. The 1966 version of "Oh Pretty Woman" would be copied note-for-note by Eric Clapton on Cream's song "Strange Brew," which appeared on the 1967 LP Disraeli Gears (Atco SC 33-232) and which was played on mainstream radio beginning that year.

EDWARD KOMARA

OJL (ORIGIN JAZZ LIBRARY)

Bill Givens and Pete Whelan founded this premier reissue label in 1960 as a repository for classic blues sessions from the 1920s and 1930s. The company's releases initially focused on Delta and other prewar styles. Their first title spotlighted Charlie Patton, while others later featured included Henry Thomas, Lonnie Johnson, and Crying Sam Collins. Eventually, there were several various artists' anthologies, plus other lines delving into piano blues and even traditional jazz. Origin Jazz Library established meticulous standards that were subsequently duplicated by other companies in terms of quality sound reproduction and extensive, exhaustive liner notes about previously overlooked and/or obscure performers and musicians. After Whelan's departure in 1966, the company began cutting back on titles. Givens died in 1999, but the company continued thanks to the efforts of radio broadcaster and author Cary Ginell and engineer/remastering guru Michael Kieffer. An ongoing series devoted to legendary jazz trumpeter Bix Biederbecke issued its fourth volume in 2003.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Slotnikoff, Joel. "Pete Whelan Interview." <http://www.bluesworld.com/PeteWhelanInterview.html> (accessed December 19, 2004).

OKEH

Record label started in September 1918 by the General Phonograph Corporation, directed by Otto Heinemann, an affiliate of Carl Lindstrom's German company Odeon. In February 1920, Perry Bradford persuaded Okeh A&R man Fred Hagar to record Mamie Smith, launching the first blues boom and ensuring Okeh's initial lead in the field. In summer 1921 the 8000 Race series was established, though it was called the Colored Catalog until 1923. Daisy Martin and Gertrude Saunders were among the earliest blues artists featured. Mamie Smith herself remained in the general series. With A&R in New York supervised by Clarence Williams, in Chicago by Richard M. Jones, and on some trips to St. Louis by Lonnie Johnson, it became one of the most significant catalogs of African American music, ending at 8966 in 1934, the longest surviving Race series.

Okeh's blues stars included "Texas" Alexander, Butterbeans & Susie, Bo Carter, Lonnie Johnson, Sara Martin, Sippie Wallace, and the Mississippi Sheiks. Okeh also made the first recordings of Lucille Bogan (1923) and Roosevelt Sykes (1929) and the final sessions by the Memphis Jug Band (1934). Other important Okeh artists included Esther Bigeou, Chippie Hill, Hattie McDaniel, and Sylvester Weaver. Regular southern field trips were made from 1923 to 1931. The haul in Atlanta included extra-contractual recordings by Blind Lemon Jefferson in 1927 and Blind Willie McTell in 1931.

These activities were little affected by a takeover by Columbia in 1926 because Heinemann continued to run the reorganized Okeh Phonograph Corporation as an independent subsidiary. Only in 1929–1931 did OKeh and Columbia run joint field trips. In August 1934 control passed to ARC-BRC, which dropped the OKeh name at the end of the year. After CBS took over in 1938, it was revived, continuing ARC-BRC's Vocalion numerical series as an outlet for blues artists including Big Bill (Broonzy), Champion Jack Dupree, Blind Boy Fuller, Bill Gaither, Merline Johnson (the Yas Yas Girl), Brownie McGhee, and Memphis Minnie. Better-selling earlier items from the Vocalion catalog were repressed with OKeh labels. The label was discontinued in 1942.

After 1949, the label was revived as CBS's rhythm and blues label and enjoyed some success under the A&R direction of Danny Kessler (from 1951). The most prominent featured artists were Larry Darnell, Big Maybelle, Chuck Willis, and "Jumpin" Joe Williams. Screamin' Jay Hawkins was on OKeh in 1956–1957. More recently the name has occasionally been used by CBS's successors for reissues of earlier material.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

DGR

Shaw, Arnold. Honkers and Shouters: The Golden Years of Rhythm and Blues. New York: Collier Books, 1978.

Wright, Laurie. OKeh Race Records: The 8000 "Race" Series. Chigwell, England: Wright Publications, 2001.

Discography: McGrath; Sutton

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "OKeh Album Discography." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/okeh.html> (accessed December 12, 2004).

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

OLD SWING-MASTER/MASTER

Chicago post-World War II blues label. The label was opened in early 1949 by Egmont Sonderling (1906–1997), who owned a pressing plant and a recording studio. Serving as frontman and A&R chief was Chicago deejay Al Benson (1908–1978), whose broadcast handle gave the label its name. Benson did no new productions for Old Swing-Master, whose modus operandi was to issue masters obtained from other independents. Most of its releases were acquired from small Chicago operations such as Planet (Snooky & Moody, Man Young) and Marvel (Floyd Jones), or extinct operations such as Sunbeam (Little Miss Cornshucks), Rhumboogie (T-Bone Walker), and Vitacoustic (Kitty Stevenson, Howard McGhee). Under a truncated Master name, the label released Miracle sides by Memphis Slim and Sonny Thompson. When Sonderling moved into radio in 1950, he closed his label.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Campbell, Robert L., and Robert Pruter. "The Old Swing-Master Label." Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/oldswing.html> (accessed June 1, 2003).

Discography: McGrath

OLD TOWN

New York City label owned by Hy Weiss from 1953 to 1966. Many releases were by vocal groups, but important blues artists were Arthur Prysock, Bob Gaddy, Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry, and Riff Ruffin. Subsidiaries included Barry, Munich, Paradise, Rome, Whiz, and Weiss.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "Old Town Album Discography." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/oldtown.html> (accessed December 19, 2004).

OLDIE BLUES

Dutch record label started in 1974 by Martin van Olderen and issued through Munich Records of Bennekom, later Utrecht. Mainly a reissue label, emphasizing pianists, but OL2804 by Big Joe Williams included unique material and a book on the artist. Trading continued until ill health forced the label's closure in 2000.

HOWARD RYE

OLIVER, PAUL

b. 25 May 1927; Nottingham, England

Paul Hereford Oliver is widely regarded as the foremost scholar of the blues, the author of numerous essential works that helped establish the current interpretive framework for the music.

Born on May 25, 1927, in Nottingham, England, Oliver first heard blues in 1942 at a U.S. airbase site in Suffolk, and became a devoted fan, collector, and researcher. Oliver's first article on black music was published in 1952, and he soon became a prolific author, over the next decades writing for publications including Blues Unlimited, Blues & Rhythm, Music Mirror, Jazz Monthly, Melody Maker, and The Jazz Review, and contributing liner notes for labels including Arhoolie, CBS, Decca, Document, Fontana, Heritage, Magpie, Matchbox, Phillips, Polydor, Riverside, Seventy-Seven, and Storyville. Many of these writings are reprinted in the book Blues Off the Record: Thirty Years of Blues Commentary (Tunbridge Wells: Baton, 1984).

As a graphic artist, Oliver contributed artwork to many jazz and blues issues as well as the line drawings to Big Bill Broonzy's autobiography Big Bill's Blues (London: Cassell, 1955).

Oliver's first book was the monograph Bessie Smith (London: Cassell, 1959), followed by Blues Fell This Morning: Meaning in the Blues (London: Cassell, 1960), a thorough analysis of the relation of blues lyrics to African American culture. Oliver's 1960 trip through the southern United States together with his wife and collaborator Valerie and Arhoolie Records' Chris Strachwitz yielded many recordings and interviews, many of which were broadcast in a BBC series and appeared in Conversation with the Blues (London: Cassell, 1965).

The topically oriented Screening the Blues: Aspects of the Blues Tradition (London: Cassell, 1968) can be seen as complementing Blues Fell This Morning. Notably, the loosening of censorship laws in the interim allowed a more candid analysis of sexual issues. The sweeping and unparalleled Story of the Blues (London: Barrie and Rockliff, The Cresset Press, 1969) was the first major history of the genre, and grew out of an exhibition Oliver created for the American Embassy in London.

Savannah Syncopators (1970) assesses the roots of the blues in Africa, and was one of eleven blues monographs Oliver edited for Studio Vista (United Kingdom). The book, together with two others in the series, was reprinted in Yonder Come the Blues (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001).

During the 1970s Oliver dedicated more of his time to his professional career as a professor of vernacular architecture, another field in which he is a leading expert. Songsters and Saints: Vocal Traditions on Race Records (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984) examines religious and secular music parallels to blues, including the repertoires of "songsters," blackface minstrel routines, and sermons. Oliver coauthored the reference works The Blackwell Guide to Recorded Blues (Oxford: Blackwell, 1989; a "new" version with John Cowley in 1996) and The New Grove Gospel, Blues and Jazz: With Spirituals and Ragtime (London: Macmillan, 1986, 1997), and compiled The Early Blues Songbook (London, New York: Wise Publications, 1982).

At the time of writing, Oliver is working on a book tentatively titled Blues the World Forgot, which addresses neglected aspects of blues and related traditions. His collection, currently housed at Exeter University, will occupy its own building in central Gloucester as The Archive of African American Music (<http://www.euroblues.org>). The site also contains an essay by Oliver on his career and collection (<http://www.euroblues.org/poaindex.htm>).

SCOTT BARRETTA

OMAR AND THE HOWLERS

Formed 1970

Kent Dykes was born on January 24, 1950, and raised in McComb, Mississippi. He picked up the guitar at an early age, and by his early teens was a fixture in local blues clubs. After adopting the stage name Omar, Dykes formed the Howlers with bassist Bruce Jones and drummer Gene Brandon in 1970 and moved the band to Austin in 1976; there the group honed its blues-rock fusion sound and released its first album, Big Leg Beat, in 1980. Although they spent a brief period on a major American label, Omar and the Howlers have had significantly more commercial success in Europe.

RICK ANDERSON

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly and Al Campbell); Larkin Forte, Dan. "Omar and the Howlers." Guitar Player 22, no. 1 (January 1988): 56–57.

Discography: AMG

ONE TIME BLUES/KOKOMO BLUES (SWEET HOME CHICAGO)

"One Time Blues" was recorded in March 1927 by Blind Blake for Paramount Records (Paramount 12479). A twelve-measure blues with an AAB lyric scheme, its melody has unknown, perhaps folk, antecedents; Freddie Spruell had sung it as an alternate theme to end his record "Milk Cow Blues" on June 25, 1926 (OKeh 8422). A direct reworking of Blake's record was "Two Time Blues" by Arthur Petties of Mississippi, later of Chicago, in February 1928 for Victor (Victor 21282).

Several groups of blues were to use this melody. The most prominent was "Kokomo Blues," first recorded by Madlyn Davis in November 1927 (mistitled "Kokola Blues," Paramount 12615), with a second treatment by guitarist Scrapper Blackwell in June 1928 (Vocalion 1192). "Ko Ko Mo Blues" (sic) parts 1 and 2 by Jabo Williams for Paramount (released on issue number 13127) in 1932 features outstanding piano boogie playing, a 4 + 8 verse-and-refrain lyric scheme, and the introduction of the numerical lyrics "one and one is two ..." to the melody. Other "Kokomo" treatments may be found on blues recorded through 1935, by Lucille Bogan (1933, ARC labels, unissued), Charlie McCoy (as "Baltimore Blues," 1934, Decca 7009), Kokomo Arnold (1934, Decca 7026), who retains the "one and one is two" game lyrics from the Williams version, Freddie Spruell (1935, Bluebird 5995), and Big Boy Knox (as "Eleven Light City," 1937, Bluebird).

Meanwhile, a separate lyric concept about "The Honey Dripper" was being applied to the same melody. Edith North Johnson sang two renditions for Paramount in September and October 1929. Her piano accompanist on the first recording, Roosevelt Sykes, later used the melody to new lyrics, "In Here with Your Heavy Stuff" (sung by his wife Isabel Sykes, 1933, Bluebird 5170), and "Big Legs Ida Blues" (1933, Bluebird 5323), then sang his own version of the "Honey Dripper" in 1936 on Decca release numbered 7164. Additional recordings of the Honey Dripper concept were made by Georgia White (1935) and Son Montgomery (1936, unreleased).

A third lyric inspiration for the melody was the Red Cross stores that dispensed surplus food during the Great Depression. Five such "Red Cross" blues to the "One Time/Kokomo/Honey Dripper" tune were recorded by Lucille Bogan, pianist Walter Roland, and guitarist Sonny Scott for the ARC label in July 1933. It should be noted that lyrics about the Red Cross were sung to other melodies on records, such as Walter Davis's "Red Cross Blues" for Bluebird in 1933.

Other records using this melody include Sleepy John Estes's "Lost John" (1930), Willie McTell's "Savannah Mama" (1934), and Blind Boy Fuller's "Painful Hearted Man" and "Meat Shakin' Woman" (both 1938).

The set of lyrics with which the tune has long flourished is "Sweet Home Chicago," first recorded by Robert Johnson in November 1936. The lyrics are from the "Kokomo" group of antecedents, including the opening

Baby don't you want to go?

AAB lyric chorus, and the subsequent 4+8 measure verse and refrain choruses of the numerical game from the Williams and Arnold records. Johnson's guitar-played boogie bass has since been taken up by later guitarists, blues groups, and rock bands. In 1976, Bob Groom listed twenty-four versions of "Sweet Home Chicago" from 1939 through 1976. Among them were two versions of "Sweet Home Chicago" by Roosevelt Sykes (1954, Imperial 5347; 1961, Folkways FS-3827). Among the younger West Side Chicago electric guitarists who took up the song was "Magic" Sam Maghett, who included it on his 1967 West Side Soul LP for Delmark. Also, at the 1969 Ann Arbor Blues Festival, Maghett acknowledged during his stage performance that he learned the song from Sykes (as may be heard on Magic Sam Live, Delmark DE-645). "Sweet Home Chicago" has remained a blues repertoire staple, as may be heard on the extended twenty-minute performance by Alligator label musicians to close the label's 20th anniversary concert in 1992.

EDWARD KOMARA

O'NEAL, WINSTON JAMES "JIM"

b. 25 November 1948; Fort Wayne, IN

M.S. in Journalism, Northwestern University, 1974. Editor, writer, publisher, record producer, and one of the United States' most active and knowledgeable blues authorities. With his wife Amy van Singel, he was a founding editor of Living Blues in 1970 and coauthor of Voice of the Blues (New York: Routledge, 2001).

O'Neal and van Singel published Living Blues from 1970 until 1983 when it was acquired by the University of Mississippi. O'Neal moved to Oxford to assist in 1986, and relocated to Clarksdale in 1988, where he could locate and interview blues performers. He continued to write many liner notes and articles for magazines as diverse as Rolling Stone, Down Beat, and the Chicago Tribune, but he now devotes more time to recording for his Rooster Blues label many of the blues artists who lived throughout Mississippi.

O'Neal has been very active as a lecturer, consultant, and freelance producer. He was a key participant in the Liege, Belgium, conference on Charley Patton in 1984, a speaker at the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in Cleveland, Ohio, in 1998, and has appeared on television throughout the United States and in Japan. All of the major TV networks, as well as the BBC, have used O'Neal as a consultant, as have stations in Holland and France. He has also been active as a consultant for film production and blues festivals throughout the world.

The Blues Foundation honored O'Neal with W. C. Handy Awards for publishing Living Blues and for producing four award-winning albums.

PAUL GARON

Bibliography

O'Neal, Jim, and Amy van Singel, eds. The Voice of the Blues: Classic Interviews from Living Blues Magazine. New York: Routledge, 2002.

ONE-DERFUL/M-PAC/MAR-V-LUS/ TODDLIN' TOWN

Chicago soul and blues label of the 1960s. The company was founded by George Leaner (1917–1983) in 1962 specifically to record the hard soul sounds of the city. With his brother Ernie Leaner (1921–1990), he had been operating a distribution firm, United Distributors, since 1950. Leaner recorded his acts in One-derful's house studio at 1825 South Michigan, using such producer talents as Monk Higgins (Milton Bland) and Andre Williams, and such songwriting talent as Otis Hayes, Eddie Silvers, and Larry Nestor. The One-derful label, and its associated M-Pac, Mar-V-Lus, and Midas imprints, achieved notable national hits with McKinley Mitchell's "The Town I Live In" (1962), the Five Dutones' "Shake a Tail Feather" (1963), Harold Burrage's "Got to Find a Way" (1965), and Otis Clay's "That's How It Is" (1967). The company's most successful artist, however, was a dance act that could not sing, Alvin Cash and the Crawlers, which hit with "Twine Time" (1965) and "The Barracuda" (1965). Blues acts recorded by the company included Lonnie Brooks, Big Daddy Rogers, and Andrew Tibbs. Gospel acts were recorded on the Halo subsidiary. The One-derful complex folded in 1968, but brother Ernie Leaner and nephew Tony Leaner continued the family's involvement in the record business by founding the Toddlin' Town label, signing some of the artists who had previously been on One-derful. It lasted until 1971.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. Chicago Soul. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

Discography: McGrath

OPERA

Chicago boutique blues and jazz label of the late 1940s. The label was opened in the fall of 1947 by entrepreneur Joe Brown (1897–1976) and blues pianist and singer James Oden (aka St. Louis Jimmy, 1903–1977). Just five releases are known on Opera—by nightclub pianist and singer Byllye Williams, jazz and blues trumpeter King Kolax, and blues artists St. Louis Jimmy and Sunnyland Slim (the latter appearing under the pseudonym Delta Joe). Joe Brown rather quickly shut down the Opera label, unloading six Byllye Williams masters to Savoy before closing down the operation in October 1948. In August 1949 he and Oden were back in the business with JOB, which was most active in the early 1950s, but continued to function until 1974. In 1952, Brown sold the "Delta Joe" sides to Chance, which reissued them.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert, Robert L. Campbell, and Tom Kelly. "The Opera Label." Blues & Rhythm: The Gospel Truth no. 169 (May 2002): 16–17.

Discography: McGrath

ORA NELLE

Label founded in 1947 by Bernard Abrams (1919–1997), operated out of Maxwell Radio shop on West Maxwell Street in Chicago. Two 78-rpm records were released, including Little Walter Jacobs's debut recording, "I Just Keep Lovin' Her" (Ora Nelle 711); the label name supposedly came from Jacobs's girlfriend. Additional recordings of Jimmy Rogers, Johnny Temple, and John Estes were made but not released during the label's brief lifetime.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

"Other Deaths" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 139 (May/June 1998): 54.

Discography: McGrath

ORIOLE

The record label of McCrory's stores introduced in the early 1920s and drawing its repertoire mainly from the Plaza group. There were few blues releases in the 1920s, but after Plaza's labels were merged into the new American Record Corporation (ARC) in August 1929, it became one of the five "dime-store" labels that shared an important Race catalog, including Lucille Bogan and Walter Roland, Big Bill (Broonzy), Sam Collins, Georgia Tom (Dorsey), Blind Boy Fuller, and Pinewood Tom (Josh White). A common catalog series was used after September 1935. All of the "dime-store" labels were withdrawn in April 1938.

HOWARD RYE

Discography: DGR; Sutton

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

ORIOLES

One of the pioneers of rhythm and blues vocal harmony, establishing themselves as one of the original "bird" groups along with the Ravens. The original group consisted of lead Sonny Til (Earlington Carl Tilghman), tenor Alexander Sharp, baritone George Nelson, bass Johnny Reed, and guitarist Tommy Gaither. Formed in Baltimore, Maryland, in 1947, the group launched its career with the quiet ballad, "It's Too Soon to Know" (1948). The formula of Til's impassioned tenor lead with sleepy vocal support and almost invisible instrumental accompaniment was followed on subsequent hits, notably "Tell Me So" (1949), "Forgive and Forget" (1949), "Crying in the Chapel" (1953), and their last chart record, "In the Mission of St. Augustine" (1953). In 1955 the Orioles broke up. Til formed a new Orioles group from members of another group, the Regals, but could not revive the fortunes of the Orioles.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Larkin

Goldberg, Marv. "Odds and Ends on the Orioles." Discographies no. 84 (May 1995): 44-47.

ORLEANS

Early 1980s 45-rpm single label known for Mighty Sam McClain ("Pray"/"Dancin' to the Music of Love," Orleans 4278).

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

OSCHER, PAUL

b. 5 April 1950; Brooklyn, NY

Paul Oscher was a teenager with a full tone on the harp when he became the first white member of Muddy Waters's band in 1968. He toured and recorded with Waters for three years, returning occasionally thereafter. He began releasing solo albums in the 1990s, proving himself a songwriter of note, and as accomplished and passionate on guitar as harp.

ROBERT GORDON

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG

As Leader

The Deep Blues of Paul Oscher (1996, Blues Planet 1427).

OTIS, JOHNNY

b. John Alexander Veliotis, 28 December 1921; Vallejo, CA

Vocalist, drummer, vibraphonist, pianist, bandleader. The son of Alexander Veliotis, a grocer in an African American district of Berkeley, California. Otis, of Greek heritage, adopted an African American identity as a teenager. He married Phyllis Walker in 1941.

Otis began his career as a drummer in 1940 with Count Otis Matthews and his West Oakland House Rockers. He worked in the territory jazz bands of George Morrison (1941), then Lloyd Hunter (1942). He began a lifelong association with Preston Love at the Barrel House in Omaha, Nebraska (late 1943), and then joined Harlan Leonard at Club Alabam, Los Angeles, where he led his own big band in 1945. Their first recording session included "Harlem Nocturne," backed with "Jimmy's Round-the-Clock Blues," on which Jimmy Rushing sang (1945, Excelsior 142). This achieved some commercial success, leading to touring.

In 1947 Otis reduced his band to a small jump/R&B group. In 1948, he opened the Barrel House Club, and in 1949 discovered "Little Esther" Phillips, who became the star singer of what became the Johnny Otis Rhythm and Blues Caravan, backed by recordings on Savoy (1949-1951) including "Double Crossing Blues" (1949, Savoy 731). An accident to his hand in 1949 led him to concentrate on piano and vibes. Otis recorded for Mercury (1951–1952), then Peacock (1953–1955), before starting his own label, first named Ultra, later Dig (1956–1957). Records for Capitol (1957–1959) were aimed at the new rock 'n' roll market. "Willie and the Hand-Jive" (1958, Capitol 3966) had some success and provided a continuing crowd-pleaser for live shows.

After records for King (1961–1962), his career wound down until in 1968 he recorded an acclaimed blues album, Cold Shot (Kent 534), featuring his son Shuggie Otis. Thereafter, he formed a new band aimed in part at preserving the sound of 1940s jump/R&B. An appearance at the 1970 Monterey Jazz Festival can be seen in the film Play Misty for Me (1971) and worldwide touring followed. This career pattern has continued into the twenty-first century. His Blues Spectrum label (1974–1977) gave renewed recording opportunities to Louis Jordan, Joe Turner, and Jimmy Liggins among others. His J & T record label (from 1996) has featured a mix of R&B stars, including Barbara Morrison, with jump instrumentalists and performers from the "retro-swing" movement. His commitment to a blues-based African American sound has never wavered. In the 1970s and 1980s he was pastor of his own Landmark Community Church. He has also been active as a painter and sculptor and has taught courses on black music.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli "Johnny Otis Biography." <http://www.johnnyotisworld.com/biography/index.html>.
 Otis, Johnny. Listen to the Lambs. New York: Norton, 1968.
 ———. Upside Your Head! Rhythm and Blues on Central Avenue. Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 1993.
 Stolder, Steve. "Nobody Said I Was a White Man—I Was Just There." Blues & Rhythm no. 101 (August 1995): 4.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

- "New Orleans Shuffle"/"Blues Nocturne" (1949, Savoy 743).
 "Dreamin' Blues" (1950, Savoy 748).
Snatch & The Poontangs (1968, Kent KST557X).
Cuttin' Up (1969, Epic BN26524).
The Johnny Otis Show Live at Monterey! (1969, Epic 30473).
Great Rhythm and Blues (1974, Blues Spectrum BS103).

OTIS, SHUGGIE

b. John Alexander Veliotis, Jr., 30 November 1953; Los Angeles, CA

Guitarist and son of Johnny Otis who appeared on his father's album Cold Shot at age fifteen. His performance led to his debut album and recordings with Al Kooper and Frank Zappa. Brother Johnson's cover of Otis's "Strawberry Letter 23" reached the top of the R&B Billboard chart in 1997.

STEPHANIE POXON

Bibliography

- Larkin
 Bas-Raberin, Philippe. "Otis Dynasty." Jazz Magazine no. 518 (September 2001): 24–27.

Discography

- Here Comes Shuggie Otis* (1970, Epic BN 26511).
The New Johnny Otis Show with Shuggie Otis (1981, Alligator 4762).

See also Otis, Johnny

OVERBEA, DANNY

b. 3 January 1926; Philadelphia, PA
 d. 11 May 1994; Chicago, IL

Chicago rhythm and blues guitarist and singer influential in the rise of rock 'n' roll. After first recording in 1950 as a vocalist on an Eddie Chamblee side, Overbea first recorded under his own name for deejay Al Benson in 1953. The session produced his two best known songs, the blues hit "Train Train Train" and the jump "40 Cups of Coffee," both of which were released on Chess Records' Checker subsidiary. "Train Train Train" was covered by Buddy Morrow, and "40 Cups of Coffee" was covered by Ella Mae Morse and Bill Haley and His Comets. Rock 'n' roll deejay Alan Freed featured Overbea many times in his early rock 'n' roll revues in Cleveland and in Brooklyn; his acrobatic back bend to the floor while playing the guitar behind his head was always a highlight of the shows. Overbea was also a talented ballad singer (in the mode of Billy Eckstine), having the most success with "You're Mine" (also recorded by the Flamingos). Overbea made his last records in 1959 and retired from the music business in 1976.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- Pruter, Robert. "The Danny Overbea Story Part 1." Juke Blues 28 (Spring 1993): 8–11; "Part 2." Juke Blues 29 (Summer 1993): 16–19.

Discography: LSFP

OVERSTREET, NATHANIEL “POPS”

b. 27 July 1928; DeKalb, MS

Singer and acoustic guitarist active in Houston, Texas, since 1963. Began playing guitar while living in Michigan in the 1950s. In the mid-1960s in Houston he received some informal tips from Lightnin’ Hopkins on how to play a few Hopkins songs.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Ainsworth, Alan. “Nathaniel ‘Pops’ Overstreet.” Living Blues no. 131 (January/February 1997): 47.

OWENS, CALVIN

b. 23 April 1929; Houston, TX

Trumpeter, bandleader, composer, and record producer—best known for his earlier association with guitarist B. B. King and for his more recent work directing the Calvin Owens Blues Orchestra.

As a teenaged trumpeter Owens first traveled professionally with the minstrel show called Leonard Duncan and His Harlem Revue, followed later by a tour with the Brown Skin Models. During this era, he also performed in several prominent Houston bands, including those led by Ed Golden and Amos Milburn. Following a three-year stint (1950–1953) in the house band of the Eldorado Ballroom, Owens affiliated with Bill Harvey, who was then forming the first major touring ensemble backing guitarist and singer B. B. King.

From 1953 through 1957, Owens played trumpet on tour with King. Twenty-one years later Owens returned to King to perform not only as lead trumpeter but also as bandleader and music director, a position he maintained from 1978 through 1984.

Between those two terms of high-profile employment with King, Owens worked back in Houston as a session musician and producer for Duke and Peacock Records and other labels. He also recorded for Memphis-based Klondike Records.

Following his 1984 retirement from employment with King, Owens settled in Belgium. There he founded Sawdust Alley Records and produced the first two albums featuring his own big band with various guest artists. In 1996 Owens moved back to Houston, where he has subsequently produced numerous additional Sawdust Alley CDs highlighting his trumpet playing, arranging, songwriting, and collaborations with other featured performers.

ROGER WOOD

Bibliography: Larkin

Huggins, Cilla. “The Calvin Owens Story.” Juke Blues no. 33 (Summer 1995): 10–19.
Wood, Roger. Down in Houston: Bayou City Blues. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2003.

OWENS, JACK

b. L. F. Nelson, 17 November 1904; Bentonina, MS
d. 9 February 1997; Yazoo City, MS

Guitarist Jack Owens (his mother’s family name) was one of the last original performers of the style of Mississippi blues known as Bentonina Blues. Unlike “Skip” James from the same town, Owens did not record in the prewar period, thus remaining unknown to the public outside his area. In the 1940s Owens played with Elmore James and Aleck Miller “Sonny Boy Williamson II,” but made ends meet working as a farmer, running a juke joint, and making corn whiskey.

Owens was traced by scholar David Evans, who recorded him in 1966 and 1970–1971. A portion of the latter session, with the accompaniment of harmonica player Benjamin “Bud” Spires, was originally released on Testament. Italian researcher Gianni Marcucci’s 1978 field recordings of Owens were released on Albatros. The following year Alan Lomax featured him in the documentary film The Land Where the Blues Began. Further 1980s cuts appeared on Wolf. It was not until 1988, however, that Owens toured the United States thanks to blues writer and promoter Jim O’Neal.

In 1993 the Mississippi musician received the National Heritage Award from President Bill Clinton. Well into his nineties, Owens made his first trips to Europe accompanied by his discoverer Evans. Compared to James’s, Owens’s approach to blues presents typical features such as falsetto and “high melismatic singing ..., minor-keyed, intricately picked guitar parts, and haunting, brooding lyrics dealing with such themes as loneliness, death and the supernatural” (Evans, 1971), but is also more musically than lyrically oriented and contains seemingly unrelated repeated stanzas as in “It Must Have Been the Devil.”

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli
Evans, David. Notes accompanying It Must Have Been the Devil: Mississippi Country Blues by Jack Owens & Bud Spires (1995, Testament TCD 5016; originally released in 1971).
O’Neal, Jim. “Jack Owens: A Remembrance.” Living Blues no. 137 (January/February 1998): 30–37.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

OWENS, JAY

OWENS, JAY

b. Isaac Jerome Owens, 6 September 1947; Lake City, FL

Began singing in church where his mother was minister, and began playing guitar in high school. During the 1970s and 1980s he played in many Tampa Bay and St. Petersburg area bands of blues and soul. In 1975–1976 he was lead guitarist for singer Zemula on two RCA Victor LPs. On his solo CDs, he performs a large number of his own compositions.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Lazar, Helen Doob. “Jerome ‘Jay’ Owens.” Living Blues no. 82 (September/October 1988): 64.

Discography: AMG

OWENS, MARSHALL

b. 2 December 1890; Talbotton, GA

d. 1 May 1974; Bessemer, GA

Singer and guitarist. Birth date from Social Security Death Index; birth years cited elsewhere include 1880, 1892, and 1895. Learned guitar during World War I, and at the same time moved to the Birmingham, Alabama, area. He recorded for Paramount in 1931, showing influences of recordings by Charley Patton, William Harris, and Clifford Gibson. In the early 1930s he developed a blues on Red Cross stores, which may or may not be the same as the “Red Cross Man” tune within the “One Time Blues” song group. He continued performing until illness overtook him in the late 1950s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

van der Tuuk, Alex. “Try Me One More Time (Marshall Owens Spiced with a Bit of Curry).” 78 Quarterly no. 12 (2004): 47–58.

Discography: DGR

P

PAGE, ORAN THADDEUS “HOT LIPS”

b. 27 January 1908; Dallas, TX
d. 5 November 1954; New York, NY

Trumpeter, singer. Billed as the “Trumpet King of the West,” Page backed vocalists Bessie Smith and Ma Rainey; played on “Baby, It’s Cold Outside,” the breakout hit for a young Pearl Bailey; and was a key component of several seminal blues-based big bands, including those of Bennie Moten, Walter Page, and Count Basie. Page formed his own orchestra in New York City in 1937, but was only able to keep the band going for a couple of years. He moved on to a series of showcase roles in other bands, including that of a featured sideman with Artie Shaw’s Orchestra in 1941–1942.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern Chilton, John. Who’s Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.

Discography: Lord; LSFP

PALM, HORACE M.

Vocalist and pianist active in Chicago in the 1940s and 1950s. Participated in Aristocrat and Vee-Jay sessions as piano sideman, as well as those for small independent labels led by Al Smith. Recorded examples of Palm’s singing are comparatively rare, but include Duke Groner’s “Dragging My Heart Around” (released 1948, Aristocrat 1801) and a 1959 single under his own name for the Apex label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)

Discography: LSFP

PALMER, EARL

b. 25 October 1924; New Orleans, LA

Earl Palmer’s ambiguous relationship with the blues can be summed up by an anecdote told in the biography Backbeat. Part of Guitar Slim’s act involved running a long cord out to the sidewalk and entertaining passers-by while the band kept playing back inside the club. Palmer told his biographer Tony Sherman that once Slim went outside the band would unplug him and start playing bebop. Regardless of his personal taste in music, it is Palmer’s inspirational drumming that drives almost every important R&B and rock ‘n’ roll record made in New Orleans in the 1950s. Assessing Palmer’s effect on the blues comes from his ubiquitous presence on some of the most influential and popular records of the 1950s and not from direct participation on blues recordings.

PALMER, EARL

Born into a vaudeville family, Palmer performed as a tap dancer as a child. His career as a drummer began in 1947 with his association with musician/producer Dave Bartholomew. Palmer appeared on the early hits for Smiley Lewis, Fats Domino, and Lloyd Price produced by Bartholomew. The success of these records guaranteed Palmer's role on everything Bartholomew produced, including the hits of Little Richard. By the late 1950s Palmer's drumming began appearing on R&B hits not associated with New Orleans like Johnny Otis's "Willie and the Hand Jive" and Percy Mayfield's "Please Believe Me." His fame brought him to Los Angeles for sessions like "Come On, Let's Go" and "Donna" by Ritchie Valens. In Los Angeles, Palmer became a very successful session drummer and also headed the musicians union.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

New Grove Jazz

Jason, Berry, Foose Jonathan, and Jones, Tad. Up from the Cradle of Jazz: New Orleans Music Since World War II. Athens: The University of Georgia Press, 1986.

Sherman, Tony. Backbeat: Earl Palmer's Story. New York: Da Capo, 2000.

Discography: AMG; Lord

See also Allen, Lee; Bartholomew, Dave; Little Richard

PALMER, ROBERT

b. 19 June 1945; Little Rock, AR

d. 20 November 1997; Valhalla, NY

Writer, record producer, musician. As early as age fourteen, he played clarinet in southern roadhouses. In the late 1960s he was a member of the Memphis band Insect Trust. He assisted in the founding of the 1969-1970 Memphis Country Blues Festivals, and in Rolling Stones' Brian Jones's trip to Tangier to record the master musicians of Jajouka. Since the early 1970s he was a contributing editor for Rolling Stone magazine, and from 1976 he wrote on popular music for the New York Times, serving as chief popular music critic from 1981 to 1988. His chief contribution to blues literature was Deep Blues (New York: Viking, 1981), an influential if somewhat romanticized narrative of Mississippi and Chicago blues history.

His other books covered Memphis and New Orleans, Jerry Lee Lewis, Leiber and Stoller, and the Rolling Stones. From 1991 through 1995 he produced several highly regarded CDs for Fat Possum Records, including Jr. Kimbrough's All Night Long (1992), R. L. Burnside's Too Bad Jim (1993), and Dave Thompson's Little Dave and Big Love (1995). He consulted and narrated the documentary film Deep Blues (directed by Robert Mugge, 1992), and oversaw the book and PBS series Rock and Roll: An Unruly History (1995).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Aldin, Mary Katherine. "Robert Palmer: A Personal Reminiscence." Blues Access no. 33 (Spring 1998): 40-43.

Gordon, Robert, et al., "Robert Palmer" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 138 (March/April 1998): 77-78.

PALMER, SYLVESTER

b. Unknown

d. Unknown

Sylvester Palmer, from St. Louis, made four sides for Columbia in 1929. According to Henry Townsend, who was at the session, Palmer accompanied himself on piano. The sprightly, barrelhouse Do It Sloppy is probably Palmer, but aurally, the moody, idiosyncratic boogie piano accompaniment on Mean Blues and Broke Man Blues resembles Wesley Wallace. It is believed Palmer died shortly after making these recordings.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

Hall, Robert, and Richard Noblett. "A Handful of Keys." Blues Unlimited no. 112 (March/April 1975): 18, 23.

———. "A Handful of Keys: Boodle It One Time?" Blues Unlimited no. 114 (July/August 1975): 14-15.

PARAMOUNT

The principal record label of the New York Recording Laboratories of Port Washington, Wisconsin, dating from 1917. Lateral-cut discs were first issued in 1919. Paramount's first "blues" artist, vaudeville blues singer Flo Bert (which might be a pseudonym for the concert singer Florence Cole Talbert), was recorded in late 1920 and issued in the general series. Two releases by Lucille Hegamin were leased from Arto during 1921 and Paramount recorded her themselves in 1922.

The 12000 Race series was initiated in August 1922 and is among the most important bodies of African American music of the era. It had reached 13156 by the time it ended in 1932 after more than eleven hundred releases. The series was supervised until 1927 by J. Mayo Williams, who also managed the associated Chicago Music, which published many compositions used by Paramount's artists. Art Satherley, who later worked with the American Record Corporation, took over the A&R work when Williams left to form Black Patti, but he in turn left to join QRS in January 1928.

Alberta Hunter and Trixie Smith are the dominant blues artists among the earliest issues. Paramount's most important female singer, Ma Rainey, made her debut on Paramount 12080. The number block from 12100 was allocated to reissues from Black Swan when that company leased its masters to Paramount, including important work by Josie Miles, Trixie Smith, and Ethel Waters. It seems these reissues did not sell well and numbers 12190 to 12199 were never used. Among female blues artists appearing later in the series, Elzadie Robinson, Monette Moore, and Edmonia Henderson may be singled out. Male blues artists began to be important from 1924 when the vaudevillian Papa Charlie Jackson was recorded. Blind Blake and Blind Lemon Jefferson joined him in 1926 and all three logged substantial sales.

Because it did a large part of its business by mail order, Paramount was well placed to service rural customers and with Jefferson was the first company substantially to exploit country blues. Walter "Buddy Boy" Hawkins, Bo Weavil Jackson, Frank Stokes, and Ramblin' Thomas are among the major artists recorded. Pianists Will Ezell and Charlie Spand had several issues each, and in late 1927 Paramount recorded Meade "Lux" Lewis's first version of "Honky Tonk Train Blues" (12896) but issued nothing more by him.

At the end of the decade and especially after recording activities were moved from Chicago to Grafton, Wisconsin, in 1929, Paramount began to rely on artists brought in by talent scouts. Henry C. Speir of Jackson, Mississippi, brought in Skip James and Charley Patton (who in turn brought Son House), ensuring for the label an enduring fame not reflected in contemporary sales. The company ceased operations in 1932. In the mid-1930s a few Race issues, including one by Huddie Ledbetter, appeared in a Paramount 9000 series produced by ARC. John Steiner, a record collector, issued a Paramount 14000 series in 1949–1950 that included reissues of Ma Rainey and others.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

- Calt, Stephen. "Paramount, the Anatomy of a 'Race' Label." 78 Quarterly no. 3 (1988): 9; 78 Quarterly no. 4 (1989): 9; continued as Calt, Stephen, and Gayle Dean Wardlow. "The Buying and Selling of Paramounts." 78 Quarterly no. 5 (1990): 7; "Paramount Part 4 (The Advent of Arthur Laibley)." 78 Quarterly no. 6 (1991): 9; "Paramount's Decline and Fall (Part 5)." 78 Quarterly no. 7 (1992): 7.
- Van der Tuuk, Alex. Paramount's Rise and Fall: A History of the Wisconsin Chair Factory and Its Recording Activities. Denver, CO: Mainspring Press, 2003.
- van Rijn, Guido, and Max Vreede. "The Paramount L Master Series." 78 Quarterly no. 9 (n.d.): 67.
- Wardlow, Gayle Dean. Chasin' That Devil Music: Searching for the Blues. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

Discography: DGR; Sutton

- Bakker, Dick M. "The Paramount 14000 Re-issue Series." Names & Numbers no. 3 (January 1986): 10.
- Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.
- Vreede, Max E. Paramount 12/13000 Series. London: Storyville, 1971.

PARKER, CHARLIE

- b. 29 August 1920; Kansas City, KS
d. 12 March 1955; New York City, NY

Alto saxophonist, known as "Yardbird" or more commonly "Bird." One of the seminal figures in jazz history, and the subject of much myth-making by fans and writers. Parker had deep roots in blues and swing in Kansas City; he made early recordings with Jay McShann, Tiny Grimes, Slim Gaillard, and others. Parker emerged along with Dizzy Gillespie as a figurehead of the new bebop genre in mid-1940s New York. His genius as an improviser proved inspirational to players on all instruments, although his addictions to drugs and alcohol exerted a negative influence on many. Parker was in his artistic prime in the late 1940s. Collected recordings for the Dial, Savoy, and Verve labels are cornerstones of modern jazz, with many classic improvisations on blues material.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- New Grove Jazz; Larkin
Russell, Ross. Bird Lives!: The High Life and Hard Times of Charlie "Yardbird" Parker. New York: Charterhouse, 1972.

PARKER, CHARLIE

Woideck, Carl. Charlie Parker: His Music and Life. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1996.

Discography: Lord

Selected Recordings

“Billie’s Bounce”/“Now’s the Time” (1945, Savoy 573).
“Koko” 1945, Savoy 597).
“Ornithology” (1946, Dial 1002).
“Yardbird Suite” (1946, Dial 1003).
“Cool Blues” (1947, Dial 1015).
“Donna Lee” (1947, Savoy 652).
“Parker’s Mood” (1948, Savoy 936).
“Au Privave” (1951, Clef 11087).

PARKER, HERMAN, JR. “LITTLE JUNIOR” “JUNIOR”

b. 27 March 1932; West Memphis, AR

d. 18 November 1971; Blue Island, IL

Some researchers have ascribed a Mississippi birthplace, either Clarksdale or Bobo. Influenced by Sonny Boy “Rice Miller” Williamson, this blues performer also performed with Howlin’ Wolf and was a member of the famous Memphis-based B. B. King and the Beale Street Boys including Bobby Bland and Roscoe Gordon. In addition to his skilled harmonica playing, Parker was also a vocalist, bandleader, and composer. He led two famous groups during that period: the Blue Flames and Blues Consolidated, a touring band in the late fifties and early sixties.

Parker formed the Blue Flames in 1951. Other performers included Auburn “Pat” Hare, a local guitarist of some regard. During this period, Parker recorded for Modern Records label’s Joe Bihari and Ike Turner. It was those recordings that led to his discovery by Sam Phillips of Sun Records. Parker’s song “Mystery Train” was covered by Elvis Presley in 1954’s famous Sun sessions. He recorded and toured with much success during the fifties and sixties and recorded many blues standards during that period. In 1952, his song, “Feeling Good,” made it to number five on national R&B charts.

In 1954, Parker moved to the Duke label and released hits such as “Driving Wheel,” “Barefoot Rock,” “Annie Get Your Yo-Yo,” and “Next Time You See Me.” After his stint with Duke, Parker also recorded for Mercury, Minit, United Artists, and Capitol. Parker continued to record and perform throughout the sixties, but succumbed to a brain tumor during surgery in 1971. He made invaluable contributions as a founding voice of American R&B.

TOM FISHER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Spann, Pervis, and Jim O’Neal. “Junior Parker.” Living Blues no. 7 (Winter 1971/1972): 6–7.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Driving Wheel (1960, Duke DLP-76).
Barefoot Rock and I Got You (1961, Duke DLP-72; with Bobby Bland).
Like It Is (1967, Mercury 61101).
Honey Drippin’ Blues (1969, Blue Rock 64004).
I Tell Stories, Sad and True (1971, United Artists 6823).
Sometime Tomorrow My Heart Will Die (1973, BluesWay 6066).
Best of... (1974, Duke DLPS-83).

PARKER, MONICA

(See Sista Monica)

PARKER, SONNY

b. 5 May 1925; Youngstown, OH

d. 7 February 1957; New York City, NY

Vocalist, dancer, drummer. Raised by Butterbeans & Susie. Parker led a band in Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1948 with King Kolax. From 1949, he was a blues-shouter in Lionel Hampton’s band until his career was ended by a cerebral hemorrhage on stage at Valenciennes, France, in May 1955.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Larkin
Burke, Tony, and Dave Penny. “Sonny Parker.” Blues & Rhythm no. 19 (May 1986): 4.

Discography: Lord; LSFP

“Money Ain’t Everything”/“Worried Life Blues” (1952, Peacock 1595).

PARKWAY

Chicago blues label of the post–World War II years. The label operated in 1950 and was owned by brothers George and Ernie Leaner and Monroe Passis, who ran the Chord record distributorship. Parkway produced only ten known sides—four by the Baby Face Leroy Trio, four by Little Walter Trio, and two by Robert Jenkins—but what extraordinary sides they were. The Baby Face Leroy (featuring singer Leroy Foster) and Little Walter sides were recorded in one session. Most outstanding was the Baby Face Leroy release, the two-part “Rollin’ and Tumblin’,” which ranks as one of the most exhilarating products of the Chicago postwar bar-band blues explosion (Muddy Waters and Little Walter were both in the band). The notable Little Walter Trio release featured blues harpist Little Walter on “I Just Keep Lovin’ You” and “Moonshine Blues.” Two of the Little Walter sides were leased to Regal and not released on Parkway.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Rowe, Mike. Chicago Breakdown. London: Eddison Press, 1973.

Discography: McGrath

PARR, ELVEN “L. V.”

b. 1925; Osceola, AR
d. 15 May 1997; Seattle, WA

Began professional career as a guitarist as a member of the “In the Groove Boys” on KOSE radio in Osceola, Arkansas. He recorded with Eddie Snow for the Sun label in 1952–1956, with additional studio sessions for Duke in Memphis. He moved to Seattle in 1959 and continued performing in local clubs through the 1980s.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Lynch, Mike, and Mark Dalton. “The Elven Parr Story.” Blues & Rhythm no. 119 (May 1997): 12–13.

Discography

Lynch, Mike, and Mark Dalton. “The Elven Parr Story.” Blues & Rhythm no. 119 (May 1997): 12–13.

PATHÉ

Record label originally established in France by brothers Charles and Emile Pathé in 1894. An American branch, managed by Russell Hunting, followed in 1914 and issued lateral-cut disks, first labeled Actuelle, later Pathé Actuelle, from September 1920. Their 7500 Race series, launched in 1926, notably featured Rosa Henderson, and was entirely duplicated by the cheaper Perfect 100 series. American Pathé merged with Cameo in 1928, then with Plaza in 1929 to form ARC, which dropped the Pathé label in the United States in March 1930. It remained in use elsewhere, French EMI using it for significant blues reissues in the 1980s.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

Discography: DGR; Sutton

PATT, FRANK “HONEYBOY”

b. 1 September 1928; Fostoria, AL
d. 10 December 1985; Los Angeles, CA

The writer of the powerful “Bloodstains on the Wall,” a minor West Coast blues classic, singer and sometimes bassist Honeyboy Patt unfortunately only recorded a handful of brilliant sides, earning his living outside of the music business.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Stolper, Darryl J. “Bloodstains on the Wall. Honeyboy Frank Patt.” Blues Unlimited no. 80 (February/March 1971): 11.

Discography: LSFP

Bloodstains on the Wall (1994, Ace CD 576).

PATTERSON, BOBBY

b. 13 March 1944; Dallas, TX

Soul singer, songwriter, and producer. Early record performing, writing, and producing experience was gained at labels Abnak (1964–1969) and Jewel/Paula (1970–1973). Turned to promotion in the 1970s, first as an independent and then on contract with Malaco Records. He returned to recording as an artist in 1996.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Larkin
Schuller, Tim. "The Second Coming of Bobby Patterson." Living Blues no. 139 (May/June 1998): 36–39.

PATTMAN, NEAL

b. 10 January 1926; Madison County, GA

Harmonica player. Early taste in style formed by listening to Sonny Terry and Blind Boy Fuller. From the 1950s through the 1970s, Pattman worked various day jobs but performed occasionally at clubs and folk music festivals. In the early 1990s, after about ten years' hiatus, he resumed performing blues in public, including "Mama's Whoopin' Blues," an audience favorite.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Silverman, Ed. "Neal Pattman: Whoopin' the Blues." Living Blues no. 113 (January/February 1994): 30–31.

PATTON, CHARLEY

b. April 1891; Edwards, MS

d. 28 April 1934; Heathman Plantation near Indianola, MS

Charley (or Charlie) Patton was the first Mississippi blues performer to commit a significant body of music to recordings. His music has become emblematic of the genre called Delta Blues, representing the black American experience during the Jim Crow era in one of the country's most racially divided places. It is a voice from an underclass that struggled to survive systematic exploitation, droughts, floods, discrimination, and economic depression. On a personal level, it is the voice of one man translating experience into song, making it meaningful to others living alongside him. Charley's voice—raw, urgent, and uncompromising—summed up the blues of his life and times, setting the pace for other Delta voices that emerged in his wake.

During the final five years of his life, Charley recorded fifty-two titles for Paramount (1929–1930) and Vocalion (1934). In addition, there are a handful of surviving outtakes and tracks on which he accompanied others. His basic performance mode was in the simple voice and guitar format. He recorded several older pieces like "Frankie and Albert," "I'm Alabama Bound" (as "Elder Greene Blues"), a singular "Mississippi Bo Weevil Blues," and some traditional hymns. However, most of Charley's output consisted of original blues, assembled on the spot by weaving traditional lines and stanzas together with elements of his own to produce finished songs for phonograph records. Creative, complex guitar accompaniments supplied the final touches, revealing him as an accomplished musician, notwithstanding a superficially primitive veneer.

Though his records received only limited national distribution, they were in continuous demand back home in the Mississippi Delta and in a few other areas of the Deep South, where they inspired contemporary and succeeding generations of musicians. Bukka White, Tommy Johnson, Willie Brown, Po Joe Williams, Roebuck Staples, Eugene "Son" House, Reverend Booker Miller, David "Honeyboy" Edwards, Robert Johnson, Johnny Shines, and Howlin' Wolf were all indebted to Charley Patton in varying degrees. Most of them knew him at least casually. They and other musicians either admired him or viewed themselves as his competitors and none was indifferent to his art.

Legal documents and other sources have offered various years for Patton's birth date, though 1891 seems most likely. He was listed in the 1900 census report as the nine-year-old son of Bill and Annie Patton, residents of Will Dockery's cotton plantation where Charley would live, off and on, for most of his life. His family made the most of its economic and social situation and became relatively prosperous over the years. Charley learned music in his teens from older hands like Henry Sloan and Earl Harris. He became a sought-after performer as an adult, working at juke joints, plantation frolics, and other places where workers gathered for social diversion. Demand for his services was such that he traveled widely, went through a succession of girlfriends and wives, and performed manual labor as infrequently as possible. He was afflicted with a congenital heart disease that eventually took his life, and was probably rejected because of it when he registered for the draft in 1917.

Though he made music with casual guitar-playing partners like Booker Miller and Willie Brown, Patton preferred to work alone, both to avoid splitting an evening's take and because he enjoyed more improvisational freedom as a soloist. As his records reveal, Charley could happily expand or contract a typical four-bar blues phrase as inspiration of the moment dictated, and would rarely sing anything the same way twice. He constructed intriguing and sophisticated guitar accompaniments, building on and varying musical patterns as one verse succeeded another. Often his voice and guitar created their own counterpoint as Charley's singing emphasized certain beats in a phrase while his guitar stressed others. He frequently snapped his bass strings and thumped on the guitar to create additional percussive effects. Curiously, he played few solo passages on his records, preferring to present his voice and guitar in steady synchronicity.

His signature tune was recorded several times with various sets of lyrics. It has been called both “The Jinx” and “Maggie.” The guitar melody featured a distinctive descending bass run, and his verses were typically enhanced with spoken asides. Charley played it in several keys, and it formed the basis for “Screamin’ and Hollerin’ the Blues” (1929), “Moon Going Down” (1930), “Love My Stuff” (1934), and his epic “High Water Everywhere” (1929).

“High Water” was Patton’s best-selling record. It documented an April 1927 Mississippi River flood that inundated vast portions of Arkansas, Louisiana, and Mississippi, destroying fields, homes, and local infrastructures. Charley’s impassioned first-person account dealt with his efforts to survive, and the flood’s tragic effects in several small towns. The song made a deep impact on traumatized Delta listeners and flood victims, even though the record wasn’t released until nearly three years after the event.

Other Patton blues also dwelt on personal events and local circumstances. “Dry Well Blues” (1930) centered on residents of Lula, Mississippi, and their immediate reaction to a severe drought that occurred after they invested in a community well. “Mean Black Moan” (1929) described hard times experienced by affected families during a 1922 railroad shopworkers strike. “Tom Rushen [i.e., Rushing] Blues” (1929) dealt with an arrest for bootlegging. Charley’s “High Sheriff Blues” (1934) resurrected both the tune and theme, applying it to a more recent arrest.

Charley tended to allude to events rather than documenting them in journalistic fashion, as white ballads normally did. As a result, the specifics of his songs were rarely clear to outsiders. If you heard him sing:

Big Jim Lee up the river, backin up an down,
And the side wheel knocking, Lord, I’m water boun you’d need to learn on your own that he was singing about the Mississippi riverboat James Lee when it got stuck on a sandbar.

When he asked:

Where were you now, baby, Clarksdale mill burned down?

and received the answer:

I were way down Sunflower wi’ my face all full of frown

Charley tacitly assumed that his listeners would be familiar with the locales and events he cited, and would have no trouble understanding details missing from his sketchy account. His informally constructed songs had no perceived intrinsic commercial value and were never copyrighted. They simply appeared on record without being stripped of local references or otherwise retooled for potentially larger audiences. Listeners encountering Charley’s records decades later appreciated their authentic qualities, but stumbled over local references, and would often wonder what, when, and whom he was singing about. Because Patton’s dialect was heavily regional and personally idiosyncratic, he can be hard to understand. Consequently, his words are often unclear and ambiguous to the casual listener, and even dedicated Patton scholars can disagree on what they hear.

Because the Patton records were produced as ephemera, no one thought of them as historically valuable documents. They weren’t collected or placed in libraries and archives, since no one expected them to become an important part of American music history. The records were played and enjoyed by Charley’s contemporaries, who casually handled and broke them, throwing them away when they no longer provided pleasure. Not until blues collectors “rediscovered” Charley, a generation after his death, did anyone assign value to them. Today, even worn and damaged copies of his 78-rpm disks consistently fetch four-figure prices when they are sold.

Charley also sang gospel songs and his discography includes several sacred releases. His last wife, Bertha Lee, was a member of the choir at the First Baptist Church in Lula, and she may well have brought him closer to his faith in his final years. Charley could and did preach, as he did on his recording, “You’re Gonna Need Somebody When You Die.” His preference was for older camp-meeting pieces with repetitive elements that were memorized easily and could be sung without hymn books. He usually played slide guitar for sacred pieces, making his instrument imitate a second human voice. Charley Patton was nearly killed in a knife attack a few months before making his first records in 1929. His voice and energy level seem strong enough on those records but, over succeeding years, his health went into decline. A congenital heart condition was a major factor, but Depression economics, Charley’s erratic income and lifestyle, liquor, and poor food contributed to his increasing weakness. He died of heart failure on April 28, 1934, only three months after he sang:

It may bring sorrow, Lord, and it may bring tear
Oh, Lord, oh, Lord, spare me to see a bran’ new year
“34 Blues,” recorded January 31, 1934

Today Charley Patton’s place in history seems secure. His recordings have been collected and extensively discussed in a record and book set, Screamin’ and

PATTON, CHARLEY

Hollerin' the Blues (Revenant 212). Bob Dylan has composed a popular tribute “High Water (for Charley Patton).” Other contemporary performers such as Alvin Youngblood Hart, Rory Block, Paul Geremia, Jo Ann Kelly, and Carlos del Junco have kept Charley’s repertoire and elements of his style alive.

RICHARD SPOTTSWOOD

Bibliography

- AMG (Cub Koda); Herzhaft; Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Calt, Stephen, and Gayle Wardlow. King of the Delta Blues: The Life and Music of Charlie Patton. Newton, NJ: Rock Chapel Press, 1988.
Fahey, John. Charley Patton. London: Studio Vista, 1970.
Patton, Charley. Screamin' and Hollerin' the Blues: The Worlds of Charley Patton (2001, Revenant 212; 7 CD set). (Book and CD set with essays by David Evans, John Fahey, Edward Komara, and Dick Spottswood.)
Wardlow, Gayle Dean. Chasin' That Devil Music. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

Discography: DGR

PAYNE, JOHN W. “SONNY”

b. 29 November 1925; Helena, AR

Radio announcer, host of the “King Biscuit Time” program on KFFA, Helena, Arkansas. Payne began working at KFFA when the station went on the air in 1941 but did not assume regular “King Biscuit Time” duties until the 1950s. In recent years he has hosted the broadcast from the Delta Cultural Center in Helena. Though a big fan of Helena’s Sonny Boy Williamson, Payne favored big band music during his own performing career away from Helena, playing upright bass for short stints with the bands of Charlie Spivak and others, as well as with cowboy singer Tex Ritter. Payne estimates that he has hosted more than 13,000 “King Biscuit Time” broadcasts.

JIM O’NEAL

Bibliography

- Khatchadourian, Sonia. “A Ray of Sunshine in the Blues.” Living Blues no. 97 (May/June 1991): 36–39.
O’Neal, Amy. “King Biscuit Time 1971.” Living Blues no. 5 (Summer 1971): 4–5.

PAYNE, ODIE JR.

b. 27 August 1926; Chicago, IL
d. 1 March 1989; Chicago, IL

One of the founders of modern blues drumming, Payne spanned the Bluebird-to-Chess-to-Cobra generations of Chicago blues and was known for his blazing foot work, whip cracking shuffles, precision tattoos and rolls, double shuffles, and also his cowbell (see Drums entry).

Payne studied drums under Captain Walter Dyett at DuSable High, and later at the Roy C. Knapp School. To see drummers firsthand, he attended live theater shows and snuck into burlesque houses. Payne’s first professional gig was in 1949 with Tampa Red with whom he also recorded thirty-nine sides from 1949 to 1954. In addition, of the older generation, Payne backed Memphis Slim, Eurreal “Little Brother” Montgomery, Big Maceo Merriweather, Sunnyland Slim, and Blind John Davis, and appeared with Memphis Minnie and Son Joe. Through the 1950s and 1960s he frequently worked local night spots with Henry Gray, the Aces, Willie Dixon, Earl Hooker, Robert Jr. Lockwood, Buddy Guy, Junior Wells, Magic Sam, Otis Rush, and Little Walter, with whom he also traveled in the South.

During two and a half years with Elmore James and his rocking Broomdusters, Payne recorded on at least thirty-one tracks—some of James’s greatest numbers—between 1952 and 1959, adding woodblock and tom-tom rumbas, unobtrusive fills, and spit-and-polish sign-offs.

Payne recorded eight titles under his own name for Chess in 1954, and Willie Dixon recommended him for further Chess work including a 1956 session that yielded Muddy Waters’s “Don’t Go No Further,” and 1963–1964 sessions behind Chuck Berry that produced nineteen issued tracks including the crossover rock ’n’ roll teen hits “Nadine,” “Lonely Schooldays,” and “No Particular Place to Go.”

Other session work produced classic 45s by young turks Magic Sam, Otis Rush, and Harold Burrage for the Cobra label, Buddy Guy’s first Chicago recordings for Artistic, and Junior Wells’s first for States. In the 1960s Payne appeared on landmark Delmark LPs by Junior Wells and Magic Sam.

JUSTIN O’BRIEN

Bibliography

- AMG (Michael Erlewine); Santelli
Cushing, Steve. “An Inward Feeling of an Expression.” Living Blues no. 96 (March/April 1991): 52.
———. “Behind the Beat of the Blues.” Living Blues no. 96 (March/April 1991): 12.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

PAYTON, ASIE

b. 12 April 1937; Washington County, MS
 d. 19 May 1997; Holly Ridge, MS

Singer/guitarist. A lifelong farmer, Payton died of a heart attack while driving his tractor. In 1999, Fat Possum released Worried, a disk culled from demo tapes, including some recorded at Junior Kimbrough's juke in Chulahoma, Mississippi, in 1994. Just Do Me Right, also assembled from various demo tapes and informal recordings (some enhanced with contemporary electronica), appeared on Fat Possum in 2002.

DAVID WHITEIS

Discography: AMG (Heather Phares)Selected Recordings

Worried (1994, Fat Possum).
Just Do Me Right (2002, Fat Possum).

PEEBLES, ANN

b. 27 April 1947; Kinloch, MO

Southern-style soul singer popular in the 1970s. Under the production aegis of Willie Mitchell, Peebles consistently hit the charts from 1969 to 1979 singing deep soul songs and blues with a pumping beat. With her husband, songwriter Don Bryant, she wrote many of her biggest hits, including her only top forty crossover hit, "I Can't Stand the Rain" (1973). Two of her more notable hits were soul-style remakes of blues classics, Little Johnny Taylor's "Part Time Love" (1970) and Bobby Bland's "I Pity the Fool" (1971). Other outstanding hits were "Breaking Up Somebody's Home" (1972), "I'm Gonna Tear Your Playhouse Down" (1973), and "I Didn't Take Your Man" (1978). She recorded seven LPs for Hi, her Part Time Love (1971) and Straight from the Heart (1972) being the most outstanding. Following the end of Hi, in 1981 Peebles took a long hiatus from the music business, but returned in 1989 to record a disappointing album for Willie Mitchell's Waylo label. She recorded three albums under producer Ron Levy for the Bullseye label—Full Time Love (1992), Fill This World with Love (1996), and How Strong Is a Woman (1998). Peebles, like many classic soul singers, during the 1990s developed new audiences on the soul-blues circuit and on the roots music scene.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Larkin
 Cohodas, Nadine. "Ann Peebles, Bouncing Back." Living Blues no. 135 (September/October 1997): 28–33.

PEEPLER, ROBERT

Flourished 1920s

Obscure singer (and possibly guitarist) with a pleasant, relaxed tenor voice, recorded in 1929 in the company of Henry Brown, Ike Rogers, Mary Johnson, and Wesley Wallace. A St. Louis background for him may therefore be assumed. He made two sides backed by Brown and three with Wallace (one unissued). "Fat Greasy Baby," with Brown accompanying, is typical of his unhurried delivery.

BOB HALL

Discography: DGRPEG LEG SAM

b. Arthur Jackson, 28 December 1911; Jonesville, SC
 d. 27 October 1977; Jonesville, SC

Harmonica player, dancer, comedian, storyteller Arthur Jackson, aka Peg Pete or Peg Leg Sam after losing the lower part of his right leg as a result of a train accident, was one of the last original medicine show entertainers. At about age nine he started to teach himself harmonica in the "accordion" style and soon ran away from home, doing an incredible number of jobs, including being an itinerant musician at picnics, fairs, and so forth.

From Elmon "Shorty" Bell, Peg Pete learned how to play the "modern" style of harp and two harmonicas at the same time and toured the United States with different medicine shows for thirty-five years. At one of these he met Pink Anderson and under his tutelage he soon qualified for the position of "drag man." In the 1960s and 1970s, Jackson often played at local parties and festivals with Henry Johnson. Only late in his career was Peg Leg Sam's art waxed and filmed. In 1972 in Pittsboro, North Carolina, Jackson was immortalized in what was likely one of the last medicine shows in the United States, featuring Anderson and Jackson working for the legendary Potawatomi Indian Chief Thundercloud. This event was later issued on a Flyright double LP. Further recordings by Peg Pete include one session for Trix in 1972—where his eclecticism can be appreciated in songs as diverse as "Skinny Woman Blues,"

PEG LEG SAM

“Reuben,” and “Fast Freight Train”—and one for Blue Labor three years later. A clip of Jackson dancing can briefly be seen in the successful feature film Amélie (2001, directed by Jean-Pierre Jeunet).

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

- AMG (Jim O’Neal); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Bastin, Bruce. “Up on the Road.” In Red River Blues: The Blues Tradition in the Southeast, pp. 180–202. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
Lowry, Pete. Notes accompanying Peg Leg Sam: Kickin’ It! (2000, 32 Blues 32211).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

PEJOE, MORRIS

b. Morris Pejas, 11 April 1924; Palmetto, LA
d. 27 July 1982; Detroit, MI

Chicago-based blues singer and guitarist of the 1950s. Pejoe sang down-home blues with a bit of New Orleans bounce, reflecting his heritage, but never recorded a hit and never achieved more than a bit of recognition in Chicago blues clubs. He began his career on the violin, but after moving to Beaumont, Texas, in 1949, he switched to guitar. In 1951 Pejoe moved to Chicago, and began performing with pianist Henry Gray. During 1952–1953 he recorded three sessions for Checker, followed by a session for United (1954), which the company kept in the can. He recorded one session with Vee-Jay (1955), which released “You Gonna Need Me Baby.” His next session, for Abco (1956), was one of his best, producing the driving “Screaming and Crying.” Four years later a session for Atomic-H (1960) produced an excellent homage to “She Walks Right In.” An obscure session with Kaytown in 1969 ended his recording career. He provided guitar accompaniment for his wife, Mary Lane (“Little Mary”), on one session around 1966. Pejoe performed regularly in the clubs during the 1950s, but club dates grew increasingly infrequent during the 1960s. Pejoe left Chicago in the early 1970s and moved to Detroit, Michigan, where he played occasional dates until his death.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- Santelli
O’Neal, Jim. “Morris Pejoe” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 55 (Winter 1982/83): 40.

Discography: LSFP

PERFECT

Record label established in June 1922 by the American branch of Pathé as a lower-priced product operated by the nominally independent Perfect Record Company. The Race series, the Perfect 100s, began in July 1926 with issues by Rosa Henderson and Mary Stafford. All issues were duplicated in Pathé’s own 7500 Race series. Vaudeville singers continued to predominate in the blues output. The series had reached 140 when Pathé’s labels were merged in to the American Record Corporation (ARC) in August 1929, and was continued after a brief interval, resuming at 147, with a 0 prefix from 200 onward. Perfect became one of ARC’s “dime-store” labels, sharing its repertoire with Banner, Oriole, Romeo, and after late 1932 also with Melotone. The Famous Hokum Boys and similar artists figure largely in the Depression Era output with noteworthy issues by Big Bill Broonzy as Sammy Sampson. This parallel issue arrangement was formalized in September 1935 with the adoption of a common numerical series for the dime-store labels, which shared a major Race catalog. All the “dime-store” labels were discontinued in April 1938 following the acquisition of ARC by the Columbia Broadcasting System.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

- Godrich, John. “The Perfect 100 Race Series.” 78 Quarterly no. 1 (1967): 56–58; 78 Quarterly no. 2 (1968): 44–46.
Kendziora, Carl, Jr., and Perry Armagnac. “Perfect Dance-Series and Race-Series Catalog, 1922–1930.” Record Research nos. 51/52 (1963): 13.

Discography: DGR; Sutton

- Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

PERIODICALS

Introduction

Before assessing the coverage of blues in periodicals, its relation to black sacred music and jazz as an American musician trinity should be reviewed:

- Vocal black sacred music (Spirituals rooted in psalms, hymns, and Old Testament/Bible, underground until 1865, followed later by new songs inspired by the New Testament and cross-influenced by blues from the mid-1890s and by blues jazz afterward), with gospel music formulated by Thomas A. Dorsey and Sallie Martin in the 1920s and 1930s.

- The blues as the vocal and secular counterpart of the religious music, rooted in word games and work songs, sung/played from a time thought to be around the 1890s, with direct antecedents in the 1870s and 1880s.
- Jazz as an instrumental style, eager to imitate human voice with wind instruments, a melting pot of rags, spirituals, gospel songs, blues, marches, ballads, and so on, appearing at the turn of the twentieth century (voice was added to the band later), but bound to become the most well known of the three styles, even overshadowing the other two in the view of mainstream American culture and of the rest of the world.

Focusing on the blues only, it must be said that musicologists, collectors, and historians of both the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries paid scant regard to a black popular music seen as too primitive and inferior to the spirituals that symbolized the best value in black culture. Blues was also tied to obscenity, lost love, poverty, violence, drugs, and vulgarity; before publishing them, early white collectors and field researchers carefully edited obscenity from blues lyrics that have remained largely invisible to white America until World War II. Moreover, many scholars and collectors thought that blues was just a very primitive precursor of jazz, interesting but unfinished and of the most minor interest. Unhappily, this conception grew, and is still a misjudgment today among many people.

Blues in Print: The “Long March” from Books to Magazines

Books: Fiction

In the Historiography entry, Paul Garon surveys the story of the blues in books. He listed the academic works that paid interest to the blues and its lyrics, but it should be remembered that disregard was the rule in fiction until the Harlem Renaissance (1920s–1940s) when the eloquence of the blues and its persistence as the voice of the black community inspired a couple of white writers and plenty of black writers (see the Literature, Blues in entry). Later, the trend continued to grow with black writers such as Richard Wright, James Baldwin, Gayl Jones, Ralph Ellison, LeRoi Jones, Margaret Walker, Chester Himes, Maya Angelou, and, more recently, Ishmael Reed, Toni Cade Bambara, Alice Walker, Toni Morrison, August Wilson, Ernest J. Gaines, Charlotte Carter, Walter Mosley, and countless others, including white fiction writers such as Ace Atkins—all of them writing blues-inspired novels, poems, thrillers, plays, and short stories.

Periodicals Pre-1950

As far as newspapers, magazines, and academic journals or periodicals are concerned, the pre-1950 period is barren for the blues with the exception of music trade papers and some daily black newspapers like the Chicago Defender that ran advertisements in doubtful taste for blues records (Race records) throughout the 1920s. Early articles of the 1920s and 1930s tried to transcribe chosen lyrics and to answer questions concerning the social aspects of a music that the white intelligentsia was just beginning to discover, but the biographies and day-to-day life of the blues performers was not a priority at all. This is emphasized in periodicals such as The Journal of Negro History, Crisis, Black Scholar, Black World, which were indexed by Frederick W. Faxon, Mary E. Bates, and Anne C. Sutherland, editors, in Cumulative Magazine Subject Index 1907–1949: A Cumulation of the F. W. Faxon Company’s Annual Magazine Subject Index (Boston: G. K. Hall & Co, 1964; xvi, 951; x; 935 pages). This book indexes articles that appeared in 175 periodicals during the first half of the twentieth century with entries such as “Negro Music,” “Folk Songs,” “Jazz,” and so forth. There are other cumulative indexes of interest, including Indexed Periodicals: A Guide to 170 Years of Coverage in 33 Indexing Services by Joseph V. Marconi (Ann Arbor, MI: Pierian Press, 1976; xxvi, 416 pages). This publication covers approximately eleven thousand periodicals, serial titles, and cross references. Of great interest too are Music Periodicals Literature: An Annotated Bibliography of Indexes and Bibliographies, by Joan M. Meggett (Metuchen, NJ: Scarecrow Books, 1978) and Reader’s Guide to Periodical Literature: An Author and Subjects Index (40 vols. New York: H. W. Wilson Co., 1944), with each volume counting approximately 1750 pages.

1950–Today

The amount of information on blues gathered before 1950 represents only a small fraction of what was collected after 1950 and is available today either in books, records, sleeve notes, and on the Internet or in magazines and more elusive printed sources (such as flyers, programs, newsletters, and so on). A little before but mostly after World War II, interest in the blues and R&B as musical genres found its way into music trade papers and jazz magazines, as well as publications devoted to folk music, rock 'n' roll, rockabilly, soul music, and pop or entertainment, even if it was pushed in the background and/or in short columns.

Blues bibliographies give evidence of this, for instance, the ones mentioned by Paul Garon in the Historiography entry and also Bibliography of Black Music, 4 volumes, by Dominique-René De Lerma (Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1981). Black Music in the United States—An Annotated Bibliography of Selected Reference and Research Materials, by Samuel A. Floyd Jr. and Marsha J. Reisser (White Plains, NY: Kraus International Publications, 1983, 234 pages), and Jazz-Bibliography: International Literature on Jazz, Blues, Spirituals, Gospel and Ragtime Music with a Selected List of Works on the Social and Cultural Background from the Beginning to the Present, by Bernard Hefe (Muenchen, Germany: Saur, 1981, 368 pages).

Commercial papers and newspapers were good vehicles for information related to African American music in general and, marginally, to blues and R&B in particular, especially from 1950 onward. This was displayed prominently in the work of researcher Galen Gart (Big Nickel Publications) who started in the late 1980s and early 1990s to compile and edit news, stories, editorials, advertisements, lists of releases, and gossip that he found in music trade and daily papers. He organized the information chronologically in a series called First Pressings that today counts ten volumes under the title The History of Rhythm & Blues, with a special 1950 volume and nine others, each covering one year (1951–1959). An eleventh volume deals with R&B in Cleveland—1955 Edition, from the same sources. The whole series is highly valuable with just one drawback: The sources are never given and although some information can be traced (Billboard is a leading example), most of it cannot.

Many newspapers, such as the Chicago Tribune, the Chicago Sun Times, the Los Angeles Times, the New York Times, and the Washington Post in the United States and Le Monde in France, occasionally reported on the blues and have continued doing so (see the Black Newspaper Press entry).

Black-oriented publications, such as American Visions—The Magazine of Afro-American Culture, and those coming from the Johnson Publishing Company in Chicago enter into the scope of this entry even if the blues content of Ebony, Jet, Sepia, Black World, Black Stars, and so on is rather low. Ebony magazine began publication in November 1945 and continues today. Kimberly R. Vann and colleagues wrote an interesting guide in a series published by the CBMR (Center for Black Music Research, Columbia College, Chicago) and titled CBMR Monographs No. 2: Black Music in Ebony: An Annotated Guide to the Articles on Music in Ebony Magazine, 1945–1985. This author has since updated the guide to 1995, but it remains unpublished.

On an academic level and since the early 1980s, the CBMR is also publishing a Black Music Research Journal, a CBMR Newsletter and, since the late 1990s, Lenox Avenue – A Journal of Interarts Inquiry. From 1973 to 1990, Eileen Southern (Harvard University) and her husband produced The Black Perspective in Music: Foundation for Research in the Afro-American Creative Arts. There are many more academic periodicals in the USA like Ethnomusicology; Journal of the Society for Ethnomusicology; MAWA Review: Middle Atlantic Writers Association Press; Melus: The Journal of the Society for the Study of the Multi-Ethnic Literature of the United States; American Music – A Quarterly Journal devoted to all Aspects of American Music and Music in America, etc. . . and abroad; Jazz Forschung-Jazz Research (Graz-Austria); Les Cahiers du Jazz-Presses Universitaires de France; and others. Every one of them is open to blues history, biographies of performers, and analysis of blues genres and lyrics.

Other musical and nonmusical magazines such as Entertainment Weekly, Vibe Magazine, Rolling Stone, Time, and Newsweek in the United States, Melody Maker and others in the United Kingdom, Rock et Folk and others in France have or had regular or occasional blues columns that are worth a search, but no guides or indexes are generally available.

After World War II, folk music magazines such as Sing Out (The Folk Song Magazine), Broadside (1962–1992; founded by Agnes “Sis” Cunningham and Gordon Friesen), and others in the United States, Old Time Music, Keskidee, Musical Traditions, and Old Time Country in the United Kingdom are also reliable sources for occasional blues information.

The first in-depth information and analysis of the blues came out in jazz magazines. As early as 1936 an English publication, Rhythm on Record, listed Gus Cannon’s Jug Stompers recordings (with a photograph of Gus Cannon); in the 1940s and 1950s, pioneers in the United Kingdom, such as Albert McCarthy (later editor of Jazz Monthly) and Max Jones (later writer of a blues column in the weekly Melody Maker), were active in the research of blues in Jazz Music (with A Tribute to Huddie Ledbetter in 1946), Jazz Tempo, Just Jazz, and so on. In the United States, tentative blues criticism appeared in Jazz Information, a short-lived magazine, while The Record Changer, well distributed in the United Kingdom, provided classified advertisements for records wanted and/or to trade while maintaining a strong feature of jazz criticism and, occasionally, blues criticism. Also in the United Kingdom, critic Yannick Bruynoghe described the Chicago blues scene in Just Jazz in 1956, and in 1958, Derrick Stewart-Baxter started his blues page in Jazz Journal.

Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Jazz Journal and Jazz Monthly had blues columns thanks to many people, including Paul Oliver, who also wrote features for Music Mirror in the mid-1950s and later for Jazz News, Jazzbeat, and Jazz Reviews. Blues records were also reviewed by James Asman (coeditor of blues booklets for the Jazz Appreciation Society) in the pop weekly Record Mirror. In the mid-1960s, Rhythm & Blues, an American publication under the editorship of Jim Delehant, laid great emphasis on genuine blues as did other American jazz magazines such as Jazz Report (published in St. Louis by Bob Koester), which later gave birth to Blues News (from Chicago), and in 1964 Jazz Report was combined for a short time with Music Memories (Birmingham, Alabama). Throughout the 1960s the biweekly jazz magazine Down Beat carried a blues column by Pete Welding, and Record Research published in New York by Len Kunstadt and Bob Colton had, from 1959 onward, a companion magazine Blues Research managed by Anthony Rotante and Paul Sheatsley. From then until today, many jazz magazines in the world had a blues column (Jazz Hot, Jazz Magazine, Jazzman, etc., in France; Le Point du Jazz, Jazz in Time, Swingtime, Jazz Around, Jazz Halo, etc., in Belgium, and so forth).

Blues Magazines

Ironically, when blacks were rejecting the genre in the 1960s for understandable reasons (old-time music, reminiscences of slavery and bad times, poverty, poor education, bad housing, promiscuity, Uncle Tomism, and so on), blues met a growing interest in the United States and in Europe—and some time later in the rest of the world. Pioneers such as Yannick Bruynoghe and Georges Adins (Belgium), Jacques Demêtre and Marcel Chauvard (France), and Samuel Charters, Mack McCormick, and Chris Strachwitz in the United States documented blues and wrote about it in books and periodicals.

The time came, at last, for an era of blues magazines dealing strictly with that musical style. The era started in the late 1950s/early 1960s, on the wave of the blues revival, in Belgium with R&B Panorama (Serge Tonneau, Brussels, 1960–1965), in the United Kingdom with Blues Unlimited (Mike Leadbitter, London, 1963–1987) and Blues World (Bob Groom, 1965–1974), followed later in the United States by Living Blues (Jim and Amy O’Neal, Chicago, 1970–) and then by many others in Europe, still in print (Soul Bag, Blues & Rhythm, Jefferson, Block, Rollin’ & Tumblin’, Juke Blues, etc.), or out of print (Talking Blues, Pickin’ the Blues Blues Link) in the United States (Whiskey, Women And. . ., 78 Quarterly, Blues Revue, Blues Access, Offbeat.), in Japan (Blues), in Australia (Crazy Music, etc.) and many more, everywhere.

A detailed list of periodicals can be found in the Bibliography.

A last word: While many publications are scattered in archives and libraries around the world—and among dozens of individual collectors—unfortunately, they are too often unavailable to the average researcher and/or collector. It is also difficult to obtain complete runs of the most ephemeral publications, especially the bluesletters and flyers. However, a thorough search will usually turn something up, and specialized websites such as <http://www.bluesworld.com> may also help.

ROBERT SACRÉ

Bibliography

Note: This list was begun in 2002 by Edward Komara and Ace Atkins, with thanks to the staff of the Blues Archive, J. D. Williams Library, at the University of Mississippi. Robert Sacré added the European titles, and organized the list into three categories: (1) periodicals, (2) newsletters and fanzines, and (3) additional serial publications.

Category 1 is cited with title, publisher and/or location, and years of publication; notes on title changes, frequency of publication, and number of issues of a ceased title may be added when available. The publications in Categories 2 and 3 may have incomplete citations, but are included in the list for the sake of documentation and inclusion in some form.

Periodicals

- A.B.S. Magazine* (Arvern’ Blues Society, Chateaugay, France) (2003–); quarterly.
- Acoustic Blues* (Lancaster, UK) (1993–1997).
- Acoustic Guitar* (San Anselmo, California) (1993–); monthly.
- Alley Music—Australia’s Blues Magazine* (Chadstone Centre, Victoria, Australia) (1967–1971).
- American Folk Music Occasional* (Berkeley, California) (1964–1970); 2 nos.
- American Music* (Sonneck Society & The University of Illinois Press) (1983–); quarterly.
- American Visions: The Magazine of Afro American Culture* (Washington, D.C.) (1986–).

PERIODICALS

- Les Amitiés Louisianaises* (Liège-Vottem, Belgium) (1987–1996); quarterly; 38 issues.
- Arhoolie Occasional* (Arhoolie Records, Berkeley, California) 1971–1973; 2 nos.; later The Lightning Express (incorporating the Arhoolie Occasional) (1973–1976); 3 nos.
- Arkansas Review: A Journal of Delta Studies* (formerly the Kansas Quarterly) (Arkansas State University) (1970–). Audience (West Peterborough, New Hampshire) (1991–1992); later the Blues Audience (1992–).
- Austin Blues Monthly* (Austin, Texas) (1994–).
- Australian Blues Society* (Canberra City, ACT, Australia) (1973–1974).
- Back Beat* (Oklahoma Blues Society, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma) (June 1990–October 1999); unnumbered.
- Back to the Roots Blueskrant*; later Back to the Roots—Magazine voor Blues en Aanverwanten (Zedelgem, Belgium) (1995–); bimonthly.
- Bay Blues Monthly* (San Francisco, California) (1988?–).
- B. B. Review—British Blues Review, The Official Journal of the British Blues Network* (London, UK) (1988–); bimonthly.
- BBR Boogie* (London, UK) (1990–); monthly.
- Big City Blues* (Detroit Blues Society, Royal Oak, Michigan) (1994–); continues as Detroit Blues Magazine; bimonthly.
- Billboard* (New York City, New York; Los Angeles, California) (1896–); weekly (originally Billboard Advertising, Cincinnati, Ohio); website: <http://www.billboard.com>.
- Black Echoes* (London, UK) (April 21, 1979–April 11, 1981); weekly; unnumbered issues.
- Black Music Research Journal* (Center for Black Music Research, Columbia College, Chicago, Illinois) (1980–); semiannual.
- Black Perspective in Music—Foundation for Research in the Afro-American Creative Arts* (Cambria Heights, New York) (1973–1990); 18 volumes.
- Black Stars* (incorporating Tan Magazine)—A Johnson Publication (Chicago, Illinois) (1971–).
- Bleu Banane—Jazz, Blues, etc.* (Stavelot, Belgium) (November 1997–Spring 2000); 4 issues.
- Block—Tijdschrift voor Blues* (Almelo, Holland) (1975–); quarterly.
- Blue Flame* (Wilmette, Illinois) (1969–1972); 17 nos.
- Blue Notes—A Supplement to Jazz in Time* (Liege, Belgium) (April 1990–April 1993); 10 issues.
- Blue Sky Review* (San Francisco, California) (1974–1977).
- Blues (International Jazz & Blues)* (Brussels, Belgium) (1970–1971); 5 issues.
- The Blues* (Japanese Blues Society, Tokyo, Japan) (1970–1980s).
- Blues Access* (Boulder, Colorado) (1990–2002); quarterly.
- Bluesboarder* (Tourcoing, France) (1995–); monthly.
- Blues Feeling* (Pont du Château, France) (1997–2003); quarterly, 22 nos.
- Blues Forum* (Berlin, Germany) (1980–1987); 20 nos.
- Blues Gazette* (Sinai, Belgium) (1995–1996); 4 nos.
- Blues Life* (Vienna Blues Fanclub) (Vienna, Austria) (1974–1988), 44 nos.; later Blues Life Journal—Österreichische Fachzeitschrift für Bluesmusik (1989–1995); 25 nos.
- Blues Link* (Barnet/Hitchin, UK) (1973–1975); 6 nos.
- Blues Magazine* (Toronto Canada) (1975–1979).
- Blues News: Das Deutsche Bluesmagazin* (Altena, Germany, 1995–).
- BN—Blues News—Afro-Amerikkalaisen Musiikin Aanenkannettaja* (Helsinki, Finland) (1975–1980s); monthly.
- Blues Power Magazine* (Dirmstein, Germany) (1992–1994).
- Blues Research* (Record Research, New York City, New York) (1959–1967); 16 nos.
- Blues & Rhythm—The Gospel Truth* (Morley, UK) (1984–); monthly.
- Blues Revue Quarterly* (West Union, West Virginia); later Blues Revue (1991–); quarterly.
- Blues & Soul Records* (Blues Interactions, Ltd., Tokyo, Japan) (early 1980s–).
- Blues To-Do's* (Seattle, Washington) (1992–); monthly.
- Blues Unlimited* (London, UK) (1963–1987); 149 nos.
- Blues Unlimited Collectors Classics* (Bexhill-on-Sea, UK) (1964–1966), 14 nos.
- Blues Wire—All the Blues in New England* (Bedford, Massachusetts) (1993–); monthly.
- Blues World and Blues World Booklets* (Knutsford, UK) (1965–1974).
- Blues World Digest* (Chicago, Illinois) (1994).
- Bone Music Magazine* (Nashville Tennessee) (1986–).
- Boogie Woogie en Blues Collector* (Amsterdam, Holland) (1970–1973).
- Broadside* (New York City, New York) (1962–early 1990s).
- Bulletin du Cercle du Jazz Hot* (Verviers, Belgium) (1949–).
- Bulletin du Hot Club de France* (Montauban, France) (October 1950–).
- Cadence: The American Review of Jazz and Blues* (Redwood, New York) (1976–); monthly.
- Les Cahiers du Jazz (Jazz Magazine, Paris, France)* (1959–1961); quarterly; 4 issues; later Les Cahiers du Jazz—Presses Universitaires de France (1994–1996); quarterly; 12 issues.
- Cashbox: The International Music-Record Weekly* (New York City, New York) (1942–); weekly.
- Chicago Blues Magazine* (Chicago, Illinois) (1992–).
- Come for to Sing: Folk Music in Chicago and the Midwest* (Chicago, Illinois) (January 1975–Autumn 1985); 11 volumes.
- Crawdaddy* (New York City, New York) (1966–1978); 91 issues.
- Crazy Music—The Journal of the Australian Blues Society* (Canberra City, Australia) (June 1974–December 1977); 11 issues.
- Creole Magazine* (Lafayette, Louisiana) (December 1990–); monthly.
- Detour: Country Folk and Blues Music Magazine* (North Humberstone, UK) (1990–).
- Detroit Blues* (Detroit Blues Society) (1995–1997); continues as Big City Blues (1997–).
- Downbeat* (Chicago, Illinois) (1934–); monthly.
- The Downtowner* (Memphis, Tennessee); (1991–).
- Ebony, Jet* (Johnson Publishing Co., Inc., Chicago, Illinois) (1945–).
- Ethnomusicology: Journal of the Society for Ethnomusicology* (Middletown, Connecticut; since 1973 in Ann Arbor, Michigan) (1953–); currently 3 issues per year.
- Feelin' Good* (Milan, Italy) (October 1985–December 1990); 31/32 nos.
- Frets* (Saratoga, California; later Cupertino, California) (1979–1989); 126 issues in 11 volumes.
- Folk Roots* (Farnham, UK) (1979–); monthly; originally Southern Rag (1979–1985).
- German Blues Circle* (Frankfurt, Germany) (1976–).

- Goldmine* (Iola, Wisconsin) (1974–); bimonthly until 1977, monthly since 1977.
- Guitar Player* (Los Gatos, California) (1967–); monthly; originally published in Saratoga, California, 1967–1971.
- Guitare et Claviers* (Paris, France) (1982–); monthly.
- Guitarist* (Boulogne-Billancourt, France) (1989–), monthly.
- Hot Buttered Soul* (Minster, UK) (1971–1975).
- Il Blues* (Milano, Italy) (1983–); quarterly.
- International Jazz Archives Journal* (University of Pittsburgh, International Academy of Jazz, Hall of Fame, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania) (1993–).
- Jazz and Blues* (London UK) (1971–1973); monthly; 3 volumes; merged with Jazz Journal.
- Jazz Around* (Liège, Belgium) (1995–); quarterly.
- Jazz Beat* (George H. Buck [GHB] Jazz Foundation, New Orleans, Louisiana) (1989–).
- Jazz Blues & Co.* (Paris, France) (1976–1986); 81 nos.
- Jazz Forum—The Magazine of the International Jazz Federation* (Vienna, Austria) (1966–); bimonthly.
- Jazz Halo* (Torhout, Belgium) (1997–); quarterly.
- Jazz Hot* (Paris, France) (1937–); monthly.
- Jazz in Time* (Neupré, Belgium) (1989–1995); 61 nos.
- Jazz Journal* (London, UK) (1948–); monthly; later Jazz Journal International (London, UK) (since 1977).
- Jazz Magazine* (Paris, France) (1950–); monthly.
- Jazz Monthly* (London, UK) (1950–1960s); monthly.
- Jazz One More Time* (Geneva, Switzerland) (1978–); monthly.
- Jazz Podium* (Stuttgart, Germany) (1951–); monthly.
- Jazz Report* (Ventura, California) (1955–1980); 15 volumes.
- Jazz South* (Atlanta, Georgia) (1990–1996).
- Jazz Times* (Washington, D.C.) (1961–); monthly since 1973.
- Jazz: Unterhaltungs- und Informationszeitschrift für Jazz, Blues, Gospel and Spirituals, Rhythm & Blues, Soul, Country & Western* (Zürich, Switzerland) (1974–1978).
- Jazz Zeitung* (Germany) (1998–).
- Jazzforschung—Jazz Research* (Graz, Austria) (1968–); annual.
- Jazzman* (Paris, France) (1995–); monthly.
- Le Jazzophone* (Paris, France) (1978–1984); 17 nos.
- Jefferson* (Stockholm, Sweden) (1968–).
- Jet* (A Johnson Publication; Chicago, Illinois).
- Jet City Blues Review* (Bellevue, Washington) (1994–1996).
- Juke Blues* (London, UK) (1985–); quarterly.
- Juil's Halo* (Heist-op-den-Berg, Belgium) (1999–).
- Keskidee: A Journal of Black Musical Traditions* (Rochford, UK) (1986–1993); 3 nos.
- King Biscuit Time* (Flower Mound, Texas) (2004); monthly.
- The King Biscuit Times* (Helena, Arkansas) (1992–1999).
- Lenox Avenue: A Journal of Interarts Inquiry* (CBMR, Chicago, Illinois) (1999–2002); 5 nos.
- Living Blues: A Journal of the African-American Blues Traditions* (Chicago, Illinois; later Oxford, Mississippi) (1970–).
- Magic Blues Magazine* (Chicago, Illinois) (1991–); quarterly.
- Maple Blues* (Toronto Blues Society, Toronto, Canada) (1984–).
- MAWA Review: Middle Atlantic Writers Association Press* (Morgan State University, Baltimore, Maryland) (1986–); semiannual.
- Melody Maker* (London, UK) (January 1926–May 1933); monthly (initially Melody Maker and British Metronome; renamed Melody Maker in October 1931); weekly from May 1933 until cease in 2000. No significant jazz or blues content since circa 1970.
- Melus: The Journal of the Society for the Study of the Multi-Ethnic Literature of the United States* (University of Southern California, Los Angeles) (1974–); quarterly.
- Micrography* (Deventer, Alphen aan der Rijn, Amsterdam, The Netherlands) (1968–1989); 78 issues.
- Musica Jazz* (Milano, Italy) (1945–); monthly.
- Muziekkrant* (Grimbergen, Belgium) (1979–1980).
- Naird* (National Association of Independent Record Distributors and Manufacturers) Notes (1988–); Naird Newsletter (1983–1989).
- New Komotion* (Wembley, UK).
- New Musical Express* (1952–); weekly; continued from Accordion Times and Musical Express (1946–1948) and Musical Express (1948–1952). Has had no significant jazz or blues content since circa 1970.
- Offbeat: New Orleans & Louisiana's Music & Entertainment; later Offbeat: America's Roots Music Magazine* (New Orleans, Louisiana) (1987–); monthly.
- The Original Chicago Blues Annual* (Chicago, Illinois) (1989–1994); annual; 6 issues.
- Pickin' the Blues* (West Lothian, UK) (January 1982–June 1984); 25 nos.
- Le Point du Jazz* (Brussels, Belgium) (1969–1986); 20 nos.
- Prologue: Opera* (Liège, Belgium) (1969–1992); monthly; 249 nos.
- R & B Monthly* (Kenley, Surrey, UK) (1964–1966); 24 issues.
- R & B Scene* (Manchester, UK) (1964–? [ending 1965 or later]).
- Real Blues* (Victoria, Canada) (1996–1999).
- Record Changer* (Fairfax, Virginia; Washington, D.C.; New York City, New York) (1942–1957); 15 volumes.
- Record Exchanger* (Anaheim, California) (1969–1982).
- Record Research* (Brooklyn, New York) (1967–); bimonthly.
- Record Research* (Harlow Essex, UK) (1960–1986).
- Rhythm & Blues Panorama* (Brussels, Belgium) (1960–1965); 43 nos.
- Rollin' and Tumblin'* (Luxembourg, G.D. Luxembourg) (1997–); quarterly.
- Sabam* (Brussels, Belgium) (1995–); quarterly.
- Sailor's Delight* (London, UK) (1978–1984); 16 nos.
- 78 Quarterly* (Key West, Florida) (1967–1968 vol. 1, nos. 1 & 2; reprint 1992; 1992–).
- Solo Blues* (Madrid, Spain) (1980s–1990s).
- Soul Music* (1967–1968); later Shout (Chiselhurst, UK) (1968–1977); 112 issues.
- Signal to Noise—The Journal of Improvised & Experimental Music* (Burlington, Vermont).
- Sing Out: The Folk Song Magazine* (New York City, New York) (1951–); bimonthly.
- Soul Bag—Comité de Liason des Amateurs de Rhythm & Blues* (CLARB; Paris, France) (1968–), quarterly.
- Southland Blues* (Showfest Productions, Long Beach, California) (1980–1996).
- Southwest Blues* (Dallas, Texas) (1998–).
- Storyville* (Chigwell, UK) (1972–); bimonthly.
- Swingtime* (Verviers & Antwerpen, Belgium) (1950–1958).
- Swingtime, Magazine voor Jazz en Blues* (Ruisselede, Belgium) (1975–1980s); monthly.
- Talking Blues* (London, UK) (1976–1979); 9 nos.

PERIODICALS

Texas Music History, The Journal of (San Marcos, Texas) (2000–); quarterly.
Travel in Blues (Ivry Seine, France) (1996–2001); monthly; 42 nos.
Tri-State Blues (New York City, New York) (September/October 1996–1998); 6 issues.
Trois Rivières Blues (Mont-de-Marsan, France) (2000–).
Une Autre Chanson (Amay, Belgium) (1980–).
Victory Review (originally Victory Music Review, through 1989?) (Bonney Lake, Washington) (1976–).
Vintage Jazz Mart (London, later Nottingham, UK) (1953–); since 1994, VJM's Jazz and Blues Mart; irregular, later quarterly.
Wavelength—New Orleans Music Magazine (New Orleans, Louisiana) (early 1980s–1990s); monthly.
Whiskey, Women, and... (Haverhill, Massachusetts) (1971–1989); 19 nos.

Newsletters and Fanzines

Ace Records Newsletter—Network News (1989–1994); later Right Track (1995); later Get on the Right Track (1995–1998) (London, UK).
Aficionado Fanzine (Information Access, Waterloo, Ontario, Canada) (1991); 2 nos.
AFRAM Newsletter (Centre d'Etudes Afro-américaines de la Sorbonne Nouvelle et du Cercle d'Etudes Afro-Américaines, Paris, France) (1975–1998); 45 nos.
All Right! (WWOZ Radio 90.7 FM, New Orleans, Louisiana) (1981–).
American Harmonica Associates Newsletter (Battle Creek, Michigan) (early 1990s).
ARChive of Contemporary Music Newsletter (New York City, New York) (1987–).
Atlanta Blues Preservation Society (Atlanta, Georgia) (1987–).
Baltimore Blues Society (1986–); unnumbered issues.
Banana Peel (Banana Peel Jazzclub Ruiselede newsletter, Ruiselede, Belgium) (1966–); monthly.
BASEQ (Blues Association of the South-East Queensland newsletter, Ashgrove, Queensland) (1989–); 43 nos.
Bay Area Blues Letter (Mill Valley, California) (1983–1987), 4 volumes.
Belly Up (Belly Up Tavern, Solana Beach, California) (1985–).
Black Radio Exclusive (Studio City, California) (1976–).
Blue Print (Upper Mississippi Blues Society) (Minneapolis, Minnesota) (1988–).
Blues (New Zealand) (March/April 1969–[1970 or later?]), 4 issues.
Blues (Sonoma County Blues Society Newsletter) (Santa Rosa, California) (1988–1989); later continued by Blues Beat (1989–1994).
The Blues Ambassador (Capital Area Blues Society) (Okemos, Michigan) (1990s).
Blues Beat (Blues Society of Western New York, Buffalo, New York) (1990s).
Blues Bread (newsletter, Peer, Belgium) (1988–).
Blues Connection (Blues Foundation, Memphis, Tennessee) (1982–1992); formerly Blues Foundation (January 1982); later Blues at the Foundation (1993–).
Blues Flash (Mid Mississippi Muddy Water Blues Society, Quincy, Illinois) (1995–1998).
B.L.U.E.S. Letter (Reno, Nevada, Blues Society) (1990s).
Blues Mentor (Milwaukee Blues Unlimited Inc., Milwaukee, Wisconsin) (1990s).
Blues News (Alabama Blues Society, Tuscaloosa, Alabama) (1992–1993).
Blues News (Bay Area Blues Society, Oakland, California) (1990–1994).
The B.L.U.E.S. News (B.L.U.E.S. Etc., Chicago, Illinois) (1986–1988).
Blues News (Blues Society of Hamilton, Ontario, Canada) (1984–1986).
Blues News (Fox Valley Blues Society, Oswego, Illinois) (1997–1999).
Blues News (Humboldt Blues Society, McKinleyville, California) (1988–1989).
Blues News (Las Vegas Blues Society, Las Vegas, Nevada) (1988–1994).
Blues News (Lehigh Valley Blues Network, Allentown, Pennsylvania) (1990s).
Blues News (Mississippi Valley Blues Society, Davenport, Iowa) (1984–).
Blues News (Kansas City Blues Society, Kansas City, Missouri) (1991–1996).
Blues News (KYANA Blues Society, Louisville, Kentucky) (1993–).
Blues News (Phoenix Blues Society) (1991–1999).
The Blues News (Riverside, California) (1995–1996).
Blues News (San Diego Blues Organization, San Diego California) (1980s).
Blues News (Shasta Blues Society, Redding, California) (1994–1995).
Blues News (Triangle Blues Society, Durham, North Carolina) (1993–1998).
Blues News (New Zealand) (December 1988 first issue).
Blues News: The Natchel Blues Network (Norfolk, Virginia) (1984–1999).
Blues Notes (Detroit Blues Society, Detroit, Michigan) (1986–1998).
Blues Notes (Johnson County Blues Society, Iowa City, Iowa) (1994–1997).
Blues Notes (Sacramento, California, Blues Society) (1981–).
Blues Notes (Tucson Blues Society, Tucson, Arizona) (1980s).
Blues Notes (Tulsa, Oklahoma) (1987–1998).
Blues on Air (The Gap Q 4061) (1994–1996).
Blues Power Blues Society (East Orange, New Jersey) (1994–1998).
Blues Print (Northeast Blues Society Newsletter, Scotia New York) (1995–).
Blues Rag (Detroit Blues Society, Detroit, Michigan) (1990s).
Blues Record (Greater Cincinnati Blues Society, Cincinnati, Ohio) (1993–1998).
Blues Report (International Blues Record club) (Summer 1961–).
Blues Riffs (Beale St. Blues Society, Memphis, Tennessee) (1991–).
Blues Society of Lower Cape Fear (1988–1997).
Blues Time: The Voice of the South Bend Blues Society (South Bend, Indiana) (1990s).
Blues Update (Greater Cincinnati Blues Society) (1991–1998).
The Bluescene: Foundation for the Advancement of the Blues (Chicago, Illinois) (1990s).

- Blueseye* (Crossroads Blues Society, Lanaru, Illinois) (1995–1999).
- Bluesletter* (Charlotte Blues Society, Charlotte, North Carolina) (1994–1999).
- Bluesletter* (Hawaiian Blues Society, Kailua-kona, Hawaii; organization later called Maui Blues Association) (1990s).
- Bluesletter* (James River Blues Society, Lynchburg, Virginia) (1995–).
- Bluesletter* (Midlands Blues Society, West Columbia, South Carolina) (1990s).
- Bluesletter* (Nashville, Tennessee) (1990–1997).
- The Bluesletter* (New Zealand Blues Society) (1993–2000).
- Bluesletter* (Orlando Blues Society) (1994–1998).
- Bluesletter* (Shenandoah Valley Blues Society, Fishersville, Virginia) (1997–1998).
- Bluesletter* (St. Louis Blues Society, St. Louis, Missouri) (1988–1993).
- Bluesletter* (Washington Blues Society, Seattle, Washington) (1992–1994).
- Bluespaper* (Lake Oswego, Oregon) (1980s).
- The Bluz* (Galesburg, Illinois) (1990s).
- Boise Blues Society* (Boise, Idaho) (1994–1998).
- Boogie News* (Freising, Germany) (1990s).
- Boston Blues News* (Boston Blues Society, Boston, Massachusetts) (1980s–1990s).
- Bucks County Blues Society Newsletter* (Levittown, Pennsylvania) (1980s–1990s).
- Buddy Guy's Legends Blues Letter* (Chicago, Illinois) (July/August 1992–).
- Capital Area Blues Society* (Okemos, Michigan) (1995–1997).
- Cariso!—The Newsletter of the Alton Augustus Adams Music Research Institute* (St. Thomas, Virgin Islands) (2003–); annual.
- CBMR Digest—Center for Black Music Research* (Chicago, Illinois) (1987–).
- Center for Southern Folklore Newsletter* (Memphis, Tennessee) (1978–1982); 4 volumes.
- Central New York Blues Society* (Nedrow, New York) (1991–January 1992); later Blues News (February 1992, vol. 1, no. 5–June 1995, vol. 2, no. 8); later Blues Connection (July 1995, vol. 2, no. 9–).
- Cercle du Jazz Hot, Bulletin du* (Verviers, Belgium) (1980s–1990s).
- The Charly Informer* (Charly Records, London, UK) (1990s).
- Chicago Jazz and Blues News* (Chicago, Illinois) (March 1988, no. 1–June 1988, no. 4).
- Chicago Ain't Nothin' But...* (Delmark Records, Chicago, Illinois) (1970s–).
- Chico Blues Society* (Chico, California) (1984–1986?).
- Club Calendar* (Chicago, Illinois) (September 1973–).
- Columbus Blues Alliance* (Columbus, Ohio) (1990s).
- Concentrics: The Rounder Records Newsletter* (Somerville, Massachusetts) (1982–1990s).
- Continental News* (Wageningen, Holland) (1990s).
- Cross Harp News* (Los Angeles, California) (undated; circa 1991/1992).
- Crossroads Blues Society* (Lanark, Illinois) (1990s).
- Deep Blues Groove Review: The Official Organ of the Muddy Waters Blues Club* (Windsor Canada) (1990s).
- Delta Snake Blues News* (Oakland, California) (1982–1987).
- Estafette Blues Krant* (Utrecht, Holland) (1979–); annual.
- Great River Notes* (Burlington's Great River Blues Society, Burlington, Iowa) (late 1990s).
- The Green Mountain Blues Society* (South Burlington, Vermont) (1990).
- The Groove* (Norman Park, Australia) (1990s).
- Holler* (Colorado Blues Society, Lyons, Colorado) (1995–1999).
- Hot House* (Liege, Belgium) (1998–); monthly.
- Hot Jazz Info* (Gesellschaft zur Förderung des New Orleans Jazz E.V.) (1970s–).
- ICBC (Illinois Central Blues Club) News* (Springfield, Illinois) (1980s–1990s).
- In the Basement* (East Sussex, UK) (1990s).
- Inland Empire Blues Society Newsletter* (Patton, California) (1980s).
- International Black Blues Society* (Los Angeles, California) (1990s).
- It's All the Blues* (Melbourne, Florida) (1980s–1990s).
- Jazz and Blues News* (Champaign-Urbana Jazz and Blues Association, Urbana, Illinois) (1992–).
- Jazz and Bluesletter* (Oklahoma Jazz and Blues Society, Oklahoma City, Oklahoma) (1984–).
- Jazz Newsletter* (Darmstadt, Germany) (1993–2000); later Der Jazzbrief... (Darmstadt, Germany) (2000–).
- Juke Joint Notes* (Stone Harbor, New Jersey) (1992–1993).
- Lead Belly Letter* (Lead Belly Society, Ithaca, New York) (1991–1996), 6 vols.
- Long Distance Call* (Lowcountry Blues Society, Mt. Pleasant, South Carolina) (1986–1996).
- Looking Ahead: Coastal Jazz and Blues Society* (Vancouver, Canada) (1994–2002).
- Lucille's Bluesletter* (Williamsbury, Massachusetts) (1992–1995).
- Magic City Blues News* (Magic City Blues Society, Birmingham, Alabama) (March 1993–).
- Mary Katherine Aldin Disorganized Newsletter*. (1970–1975).
- The MBA News* (New York City, New York) (1988–1989).
- Milwaukee Blues* (Blues Society of Milwaukee, Illinois) (1991–).
- Mississippi Saxophone* (Brunswick, Maine) (April 1992–).
- Monterey Bay Blues Society* (Santa Cruz, California) (undated; circa 1982).
- The Music Maker Rag* (Pinnacle, North Carolina) (1990s).
- Northwest Blues News* (Seattle WA) (1980s).
- Philadelphia Blues Machine Newsletter* (Philadelphia, Pennsylvania) (1989–1997).
- Piedmont Bluesletter* (Greensboro, North Carolina) (December 1985, vol. 1, no. 1–).
- Record Roundup* (Mt. Vernon, New York) (1973–1988).
- Record Special (J and F)* (Altadena, California; then Pasadena, California) (April/May 1976–Fall 1976); 3 nos.; later The Record Special (La Habra, California) (January/February 1977, no. 1–May/June/July 1977, no. 3); 3 nos.; later The Phono-Flyer (Westminster, California) (Fall/Winter 1978); 1 no.; later Down Home Music Inc. Newsletter (late 1970s–1990s); later Roots & Rhythm Newsletter (1990s–).
- Rhythm and Blues Foundation News* (Washington, D.C.) (1992–2000); Newsletter (2000–).
- Rhythm and News* (Chicago, Illinois); published by the Jazz Record Mart (1990s–); unnumbered.
- Richmond Blues Society* (Richmond, Virginia) (1989–1992).
- River and Blues News* (Tuscaloosa, Alabama) (1992); later Alabama Society Newsletter (1993–).
- River City Blues Society* (Peoria, Illinois) (1990s).
- Rock and Blues News* (Sacramento, California) (1999–2000).

PERIODICALS

- Roundup* (Rounder Records, Cambridge, Massachusetts) (1990s).
- San Luis Obispo Blues Society* (San Luis Obispo, California) (1990s).
- Skylands Blues News* (Hackettstown, New Jersey) (1990s).
- So.Me.B.S. (Southern Maine Blues Society Newsletter)* (Westbrook, Maine) (1989–1997?).
- Soulsville Record* (Memphis, Tennessee) (2002–); quarterly.
- South Skunk Blues News* (South Skunk Blues Society, Newton, California) (1980s).
- Southern California Blues Society Newsletter* (San Gabriel, California) (1984–1986); 3 vols.; later Bluesletter (1987–1992?).
- The Southern Register—The Newsletter of the Center for the Study of Southern Culture* (1977–); quarterly.
- Tell It Like It Is* (Wisconsin Blues Society) (Spring 1990–Summer 1996).
- Texas Blues* (Austin, Texas) (1990s).
- Texas Jazz* (Dallas, Texas) (late 1970s–1980s).
- Toronto Blues Society* (Toronto, Canada) (1985–1997).
- Travers Emotion Presse* (Brussels, Belgium) (2002–); monthly.
- True Blues* (New York City, New York) (July 1996–).
- True Vine Monthly* (Campbell, California) (1987–).
- 20th Century Guitar* (Hauppauge, New York) (1990–).
- Twin Cities Blues News* (St. Paul, Minnesota) (1997–).
- Vienna Blues Fan Club Info* (Vienna, Austria) (1978–).
- Vintage Vinyl's Listen UP* (University City, Missouri) (1980s–).
- Westcoast Blues Review—A Fan's Guide to Live and Recorded Music* (Victoria, B.C., Canada) (1994–); bimonthly.
- West Michigan Blues Society Newsletter* (Grand Rapids, Michigan) (1990s).
- The What's Up with Roy Rogers Journal* (1990s).
- Wichita Blues Society* (Wichita, Kansas) (1984–1999).
- Wise Fools Pub Newsletter*; later Wise Fools Pub Mojo (Chicago, Illinois) (1980s).
- Additional Serial Publications
- Acoustic Musician* (New Market, Virginia) (1994–).
- AFIM (Association for Independent Music, Music Mix: News from the Association for Independent Music)* (Whitesburg, Kentucky), vol. 1, no. 1 (July 1985).
- After 5* (Chicago, Illinois) (1973–).
- Alabama Heritage* (University of Alabama) (1986–).
- All Blues to Do's* (Seattle, Washington) (1993); later Marlee Walker's Blues to Do's (1993–); later Blues to Do.
- Blue Suede News* (Duvall, Washington) (1989–).
- Blues* (Arkansas Blues Connection, Little Rock, Arkansas) (1994–).
- Blues Beat* (Tucson Blues Society, Tucson, Arizona).
- Blues Express* (Madrid, Spain) (1997–).
- Blues Farm: La Fattoria Del Blues* (Trieste, Italy) (1990s).
- Blues Farm Report* (RNB Enterprises, Placentia, California) (1990s).
- Blues Groove* (Knoxville, Tennessee) (1996–).
- Blues Indy*
- Blues Ink* (Atlanta, Georgia) (1990s).
- Blues Is...* (Toronto, Canada) (1975–).
- Blues 'N' Jazz* (Sao Paulo, Rio de Janeiro, Brazil) (1990s).
- Blues News* (Walla Walla Blues Society, Walla Walla, Washington) (1995–).
- Blues Power* (Varese, Italy) (1970s).
- Blues Print* (Siskiyou Blues Society, Mt. Shasta, California) (1993–).
- Blues Review* (Detroit, Michigan).
- Blues Special* (Argentina) (1990s).
- Blues Time!—The Voice of the South Bend Blues Society* (South Bend, Indiana) (1994–).
- The Blueshound* (Albany, New York) (1990s).
- Bluesman* (Dlugosza, Poland) (1970s–).
- Bluespeak* (Memphis, Tennessee) (1990s).
- Chicago Blues Breakdown* (Richton Park, Illinois) (1988–1989).
- City Pages* (Chicago, Illinois); weekly.
- Collector's Record Club* (Decatur, Georgia) (1970s–1980s).
- DC Blues Calendar* (Silver Spring, Maryland) (1990s).
- Delta Snake* (Sunnyvale, California) (1980s).
- Diddy Wah Diddy* (Jackson, Mississippi) (1985–1990s).
- Discophile* (Barking, later London, UK) (1948–1958); 61 issues.
- Disc and That* (New York City, New York) (1978–).
- Disk in the World: Jazz and Blues Magazine* (Tokyo, Japan) (1980–).
- Easy Reeding* (Hohner, Richmond, Virginia) (1985–).
- Echo!* (Doo Wop Society of Southern California, Santa Monica, California) (1989–).
- The Entertainer* (Miami, Florida) (1978–).
- Good Noise: The Monthly Blues Magazine* (Wellington, New Zealand) (1968–).
- Guitar One* (New York) (1997–); monthly; formerly Wolf Marshall's Guitar One (1994–1996?).
- Guitar: The Magazine* (UK) (1991–); monthly.
- Guitar World* (Harris Publications, New York City, New York) (1980); monthly since 2002.
- Hawaiian Boogie Disease: Blues CD News and Reviews* (Memphis, Tennessee) (1990s).
- Houston Blues Review* (Houston Blues Society, Houston, Texas) (1993–).
- Jazz Digest* (McLean, Virginia) (1972–); previously HIP—The Jazz Record Project.
- Jazz News: Ireland's Jazz and Blues Magazine* (Ampersand Publications, Dublin, Ireland) (1980s).
- The Jazz Sheet* (Jazz Institute of Chicago, Chicago, Illinois) (March/April 1969–).
- Joslin's Jazz Journal* (Parsons, Kansas) (1982–2003); 22 vols.
- Jug Band Rag* (New York City, New York) (1991–1998).
- Juke: Modern Blues Magazine* (Tokyo, Japan) (1982–1986).
- Lookin' for the Blues* (Greensboro, North Carolina) (1990s).
- Magnolia Revue* (St. Louis, Missouri) (1981–).
- Maine Blues Society* (Portland, Maine) (1990–).
- Manhattan Blues Alliance* (New York City, New York) (1990s).
- Mean Mountain Music* (Milwaukee, Wisconsin) (1976–).
- MusicCan News* (Etobicoke, Ontario, Canada) (1990s); unnumbered issues.
- Musician's News* (San Francisco, California) (1975–).
- Messin' with the Blues* (Tokyo, Japan) (1970s).
- National Capital Blues Quarterly* (DC Blues Society, Washington, D.C.) (1990s).
- New Music Magazine* (Tokyo, Japan) (1974–).
- New Orleans Music* (Wheatley, UK) (1989/1990–).
- News of the Blues* (River City Blues Society, Peoria, Illinois) (1990s).

Old Sailor's Almanac (San Francisco, California) (1987–).
Ozark Blues (Little Boy Blues Society, Eureka Springs, Arkansas) (1989–).
OBScene (Ottawa Blues Society, Canada) (1997–).
Ohio Blues News (Ohio Blues News, Cleveland, Ohio) (1980s).
Rap Sheet (Los Angeles, California) (1992–).
R&B Magazine (Northridge, California) (1970s).
Record Digest (Prescott, Arizona) (September 1977–April 1979).
Resound: A Quarterly of the Archives of Traditional Music (1982–1996).
Red Hot and Blue (National Blues Foundation, Northwest Arkansas Chapter, Fayetteville, Arkansas) (1989–).
Rhythm and News (Old Saybrook, Connecticut) (1980–).
River City News (River City Blues Society Peoria, Illinois) (1988–).
Sacramento (California) Blues Society.
Say What? (Blues Bank Collective, Portsmouth, New Hampshire) (1988–1989).
Shake Rattle and Roll (Memphis, Tennessee) (1990s).
SOBA Bluespaper (Southern Ontario Blues Association) (1980s–).
Sonny Boy Blues Society (Helena, Arkansas) (1990s).
Soul (Hollywood, California) (1966–).
Soul (Toronto, Canada) (1965–1967).
Soul Survivor (Toronto, Canada) (1984–).
State of the Blues (Connecticut Blues Society) (1993–).
Strictly Nothing But the Blues (San Diego, California) (1989–1990s).
Yesterday's Memories (New York City, New York) (1975–).

EDWARD KOMARA
 ACE ATKINS
 ROBERT SACRÉ

PERKINS, AL

b. 8 January 1932; Brookhaven, MS
 d. 13 February 1983; Detroit, MI

Singer, promoter/manager, and radio personality. Raised in Leland MS, and moved to Chicago. In the 1960s he sang blues and soul music for various Chicago labels. Later he worked with Little Milton and Lillian Offitt as producer or promoter. He was a radio personality on WJLB-FM in Detroit from 1968–1978. He was found dead in his Detroit office and presumed murdered.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Loveland, Jan, and Jim O'Neal. "Al Perkins" [obituary].
Living Blues no. 57 (Autumn 1983): 16.

Discography: LSPF

PERKINS, JOE WILLIE “PINETOP”

b. 7 July 1913; Belzoni, MS

Pianist, singer. Perkins, who began his career as a guitarist, became the most honored blues pianist of the late twentieth century, winning the W. C. Handy Award as the genre's top keyboardist for ten consecutive years from 1992 to 2001. Perkins, whose first American album was released when he was seventy-five years old, initially came to international attention when he replaced Otis Spann in the Muddy Waters Band in 1969 but by then he had been deeply involved in the blues for more than a quarter century.

Perkins's guitar-playing days were curtailed in the wake of a mid-1940s incident in Helena, Arkansas, where an irate chorus girl attacked him with a knife, severing tendons in his left arm. Perkins was in Helena as an accompanist to slide guitar ace Robert Nighthawk, with whom he would record in 1950. Nighthawk and Perkins performed on a popular blues radio program but in time the pianist changed allegiances and began working with Sonny Boy Williamson on the legendary “King Biscuit Time” program.

The Nighthawk affiliation made it possible for Perkins to tour widely when guitarist Earl Hooker, a protégé, if not outright disciple, of the seminal slide star, hired him for his active touring band. While on tour with Hooker, Perkins made a stop in Memphis in 1953 and recorded his signature song “Pinetop's Boogie Woogie” for the first of many times. The song, despite its title and Perkins's affinity for its rambunctious rhythms, wasn't his composition nor was his recording the first time it had been heard. But it didn't matter because Perkins made it his own, eventually totally eclipsing the version and memory of its originator, Clarence Smith.

Perkins tired of the road and settled down in southern Illinois before returning to Chicago. He was fifty-five and it appeared his career had concluded when Hooker came calling again, this time to involve Perkins in an Arhoolie recording session. Perkins's return to action coincided with the piano slot in the Muddy Waters Band being vacated by Spann and in a matter of weeks he had been hired, effectively going from semi-retirement to working with the best-known name in blues.

Perkins became a core component of the Muddy Waters Band for the next decade, a period during which the Chicago legend was discovered by a young, white rock audience. He also developed a close relationship, both musical and personal, with his bandmates and he went along in 1980 when they staged the biggest defection in blues history, leaving the employ of Waters to form their own group, the Legendary Blues Band.

PERKINS, JOE WILLIE "PINETOP"

Stepping out of Muddy Waters's considerable shadow allowed Perkins to exhibit his vocal talents on a couple of early 1980s releases by the Legendary Blues Band, Life of Ease and Red Hot 'n' Blue. Perkins apparently enjoyed it and he very belatedly, but quite energetically, embarked on a solo career, releasing After Hours, his American debut as a leader, in 1988. He probably hit his recording peak in 1992 with, of course, Pinetop's Boogie Woogie, an album where he received seasoned and sympathetic support from Jimmy Rogers, James Cotton, Kim Wilson, Duke Robillard, and other accomplished veterans. Perkins, who won the W. C. Handy acoustic album award for Portrait of a Delta Bluesman in 1994 and the 1995 Handy for best traditional male artist, continued to regularly tour and record into his nineties.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Santelli
Perkins, Pinetop. "Pinetop's Boogie." Living Blues no. 97
(May/June 1991): 10–16.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

PERRY, BILL (MISSISSIPPI)

b. Mississippi

Guitarist of soul/blues and gospel, active since the early 1960s. In the early 1990s he established in Oxford, Mississippi, his family band The Perrys, performing blues with funk and rap touches. In 2003 the Perrys participated in a session for Buddy Guy's Blues Singer CD for the Jive label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Bonner, Brett, et al., "40 Under 40." Living Blues no. 120
(March/April 1995): 77–90.

PERRY, BILL (NEW YORK)

b. Chester, NY

Singer, guitarist, and songwriter active since the 1980s. Raised in upstate New York, he began playing guitar at age six, and in high school he led his own bands. During the 1980s he was guitarist in Richie Havens' band. He formed his own group in the early 1990s, and in 1995 he signed with Pointblank/Virgin label. His recent work, combining jazz, folk, rock, and blues, has been for Blind Pig Records.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

PERRY, OSCAR LEE

b. 12 May 1943; Lake Jackson, TX

d. 4 August 2004; Houston, TX

Songwriter, singer. Moved to Houston, Texas, in 1956. Through the 1960s he recorded for various labels including a regional hit "Treat Me Like Your Only Child" for Duke/Peacock in 1968. He wrote new songs for Duke/Peacock label and later for producer Huey Meaux. His own labels were Perrytone and TSOT.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Ainsworth, Alan. "Oscar Perry." Living Blues no. 140 (July/August 1998): 49–50.

Lomax, John Nova. "Midtown Getdown: Bad Day for the Blues." Houston Press (August 12, 2004). <http://www.houstonpress.com/issues/2004-08-12/music/racket.html> (accessed December 19, 2004).

PERRYMAN, RUFUS

(See Speckled Red)

PERRYMAN, WILLIE

(See Piano Red)

PETERSON, JAMES

b. 4 November 1937; Russell County, AL

Guitarist, singer, and songwriter James Peterson was exposed to the blues through his father and grew up singing gospel music in his church. James taught himself guitar and eventually landed in Buffalo,

New York, in 1955, to find success in the blues society. Upon arrival, James played in several bands, and ten years later he opened his own blues club, the Governor's Inn. Doing so allowed other blues musicians the opportunity to play the blues in the New York scene, including his son, Lucky Peterson. In 1970, James recorded his first album The Father, Son, and the Blues, but it is James's latest release, Don't Let the Devil Ride, that demonstrates his ability as a songwriter and experienced gospel singer to capture the essence of the blues.

HEATHER PINSON

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Bonner, Brett J. "James Peterson: 'I Ain't Backin' Off Nobody.'" Living Blues no. 125 (January/February 1996): 26–31.

Discography: AMG

PETERSON, LUCKY

b. Judge Kenneth Peterson, 13 December 1964; Buffalo, NY

Lucky, born Judge Kenneth Peterson, learned the blues at an early age from his father James Peterson, who was a blues singer in his own right. His father owned a blues club and often invited surrounding musicians to perform. Lucky learned the drums and organ at age three, and at age five he drew instant fame from his hit single, "1, 2, 3, 4" produced by Willie Dixon. Lucky soon appeared on the Ed Sullivan Show, The Tonight Show with Johnny Carson, and What's My Line. With the encouragement of his father, Lucky had the privilege of playing in clubs at an early age. He eventually learned the guitar and began to sing.

At age seventeen, Lucky was already playing the organ with Little Milton Campbell and later joined Bobby "Blue" Bland. By this time Peterson had also become an accomplished guitarist and had relocated in Florida, where he met Alligator record producer Bob Greenlee and recorded his first two solo albums, Lucky Strikes! in 1989 and Triple Play in 1990. He also became a top studio musician for Kingsnake and played on albums by Kenny Neal with Big News from Baton Rouge and Rufus Thomas on That Woman Is Poison.

Lucky's skills are primarily in demand as a keyboard player, but Lucky is equally skilled as a guitarist and vocalist. He plays with a mixture of blues, rock, R&B, and soul and continues to perform and record.

HEATHER PINSON

Bibliography

AMG (Dahl); Santelli

Huggins, Cilla. "Born Lucky: Lucky Peterson Interview." Juke Blues no. 30 (Spring 1994): 28–29.

Discography: AMG

Ridin' (1984, Evidence ECD 26033-2); Lucky Strikes (1989, Alligator Records ALCD 4770); Triple Play (1990, Alligator Records AL 4789); I'm Ready (1993, Verve CD 314-517513-2); Beyond Cool (1994, Verve 314521147); Lifetime (1996, Verve CD 531202); Move (1998, Polygram CD 537897); Lucky Peterson (1999, Polygram 547433); Double Dealin' (2001, Blue Thumb Records CD 549475); Black Midnight Sun (2003, Birdology 36643).

PETWAY, ROBERT

b. Perhaps 1908; J. F. Sligh Farm near Yazoo City, MS

Activity unknown since 1940, Chicago, Illinois. Little biographical information is available on Robert Petway. He was the first to record "Catfish Blues," which became a blues standard, and may even have composed the song. Big Bill Broonzy reported to researcher Paul Oliver that Petway played with Tommy McClennan and that the two grew up together as kids. McClennan was born and raised on the J. F. Sligh farm about ten miles north of Yazoo City in 1908 and it seems likely from Broonzy's recollection that Petway was about the same age and raised on the same farm.

McClennan was an influence on David "Honeyboy" Edwards, who learned songs like "Catfish Blues" and "Bullfrog" from him. In another account Edwards states that he learned "Catfish Blues" in person from Petway. McClennan was stylistically similar to Petway because the two played together often. McClennan and Petway would play at house parties, and in the juke joint at Three Forks crossroads, famous now as the place where Robert Johnson was reportedly poisoned. In 1939 McClennan moved to Chicago and had three successful recording sessions by the time Petway had his first. It seems likely that McClennan sent for Petway to come to Chicago and record.

Petway recorded eight sides for Bluebird Records in 1941 and followed those up with eight more in 1942 both with Alfred Elkins on string bass. Like McClennan, Petway possessed a deep, gravelly voice, a hard attack on the guitar, and a tendency to talk between lines, either to himself or his audience. “Catfish Blues,” from the first session, was a big hit and became a standard that was recorded by everyone from John Lee Hooker to Jimi Hendrix. Muddy Waters later borrowed some of the lyrics, transforming it into “Rollin’ Stone.” Petway’s second session was held immediately after a session by Tommy McClennan (McClennan’s last) with two numbers not released. A highlight of this session was “Boogie Woogie Woman” with McClennan joining in on vocals.

PETWAY, ROBERT

According to Honeyboy Edwards, Petway may have moved to Arkansas then come back to Chicago. It is unknown what became of him.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

- AMG (Stacia Proefrock); Santelli Oliver, Paul. Catfish Blues. In Blues Off the Record—30 Years of Blues Commentary. New York: Da Capo Press, 1984.
- Smith, Chris. Notes accompanying Mississippi Blues, Vol. 3 (1936–1942) (2002, Document DOCD-5671).

Discography: DGR

Mississippi Blues, Vol. 3 (1936–1942) (2002, Document DOCD-5671; reissue).

See also Bluebird; Chicago; Edwards, David “Honeyboy”; McClennan, Tommy; Catfish Blues

PHELPS, KELLY JOE

b. 5 October 1959; Sumner, WA

Contemporary fingerstyle and lap-style slide guitarist and vocalist heavily influenced by Delta blues masters Robert Pete Williams and Fred McDowell. His first three albums were based in the country blues, while Skyy Like a Broken Clock (Rykodisc, 2001) and Slingshot Professionals (Rykodisc, 2003) featured all-original ensemble compositions.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

- AMG (Richard Skelly); Santelli Rodgers, Jeffrey Pepper. “Kelly Joe Phelps, Guitar Improviser Extraordinaire, Finds a New World of Song.” Acoustic Guitar 12, no. 7 (January 2002): 52–62.

Discography: AMG

See also McDowell, Fred; Williams, Robert Pete

PHELPS, WALTER

b. 5 June 1896; Laurens, SC

d. 4 February 1983; Asheville, NC

Living Blues obituary lists 1899 as birth year. Phelps had a jug band in Asheville in the 1930s; in the 1970s he played at the Asheville Junction Coffeehouse with his wife Ethel. He was born in the same locale as Gary Davis and knew him in childhood and later in Asheville. Phelps made a few attempts at recording, but nothing was issued.

ANDREW M. COHEN

Bibliography

- “Walter Phelps” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 56 (Spring 1983): 39–40.

PHILLIPS INTERNATIONAL

(See Sun/Phillips International/Flip)

PHILLIPS, BREWER

b. 16 November 1924; Youngsburg, MS

d. 30 August 1999; Chicago, IL

A guitarist of razor-sharp intensity, Brewer Phillips made his name as a member of Hound Dog Taylor’s Houserockers. Raised in Coila, Mississippi, he grew up playing guitar alongside friends such as Goldie Taylor. Phillips cherished his mother, Estelle, who taught him to read and to sing. He moved to Tunica where he pumped gas and worked the juke joints, earning stints with Roosevelt Sykes and Joe Willie Wilkins. After moving to Memphis, Phillips met Memphis Minnie in a pawnshop, and he was for a time her student, until he moved to Chicago. During his first encounter with Hound Dog Taylor, Phillips had suspected Taylor of stealing Phillips’s guitar. This odd first meeting signaled the beginning of a sometimes stormy working relationship until Taylor’s death in 1975. In between they recorded four Houserockers albums for the fledgling Alligator label, and in later years they enjoyed many college gigs in addition to their regular stand at Florence’s Lounge in Chicago. Phillips’s involvement in music dwindled after 1975, but it included short tours with J. B. Hutto, a little work with Cub Koda, and an occasional album or CD for the JSP, Prestige, and Delmark labels.

JOHN OTIS

Bibliography

- Larkin
 Brisbin, John Anthony. "Brewer Phillips Remembers Hound Dog Taylor: Let's Have Some Fun!" Living Blues no. 117 (September/October 1994): 24–37.
 ———. "Brewer Phillips, Part 2: The Early Years." Living Blues no. 119 (January/February 1995): 20–43.

Discography: AMG

See also Taylor, Hound Dog

PHILLIPS, EARL

- b. 25 April 1920; New York City, NY
 d. 20 November 1990; Chicago, IL

Phillips took up drums in school before moving from Nashville to Chicago in 1940. He accompanied Little Walter, J. T. Brown, Jody Williams, and others, and in 1954 Muddy Waters asked him to help out Howlin' Wolf who'd just arrived from Memphis. Phillips backed Wolf on thirty-eight issued titles including such classics as "No Place to Go," "Smokestack Lightning," "Moanin' for My Baby," "Tell Me," "Who's Been Talking," "Forty-Four," and "Evil." He also played on more than sixty issued Vee-Jay sides, most notably the recordings of Jimmy Reed and Billy Boy Arnold. A specialist in bludgeoning backbeats and rumbas as well as deft brush work, Phillips was one of a core group of drummers who brought a modern beat to blues, and ultimately to rock 'n' roll.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

- Santelli
 Cushing, Steve. "Behind the Beat of the Blues." Living Blues no. 96 (March/April 1991): 12.

Discography: LSFPPHILLIPS, GENE

- b. Eugene Floyd Phillips, 25 July 1915; St. Louis, MO
 d. 10 January 1990; Lakewood, CA

Jump-blues singer and guitarist who recorded for Modern and other West Coast labels from 1947 to 1954 as session leader and sideman.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin

Discography: AMG; LSFPPHILLIPS, LITTLE ESTHER

- b. Esther Mae Jones, 23 December 1935; Galveston, TX
 d. 7 August 1984; Carson, CA

Discovered by Johnny Otis, "Little" Esther Phillips was a fourteen-year-old sensational addition to the Johnny Otis Revue in 1947. Her unique voice and mature style delighted her audiences, especially on Down Memory Lane with Little Esther. She had the phrasing of a much older performer, the vitality of youth, and a sultry sophistication like that of Dinah Washington or Sarah Vaughn. She had an intriguing, almost falsetto, voice combined with an obvious youthful delivery of mature material. Little Esther could be sentimental and soft, but she could also rock the house.

Drug and health problems limited her career and, for a while, she retired to Houston in the late 1950s. She returned to her career in 1962. Her switch to Atlantic Records produced a wonderful selection of tracks from the mature Esther Phillips, and her work took on a much broader appeal with jazz and country western appeal. As her career and voice matured, she produced some excellent tracks for Atlantic; they are featured on And I Love Him and Esther.

Phillips had a hit in 1966 with "When a Woman Loves a Man," an answer to the Percy Sledge classic. During this period, Phillips produced some collaborative efforts with the Dixie Flyers. In her later years, Phillips's production was limited, but the quality was not. Her two albums on Kudu reflect a seasoned, extraordinary performer with full control of her performance. Sadly, health problems cut short her career and she died in 1984.

TOM FISHER

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 O'Neal, Jim, and Amy O'Neal [van Singel]. "Baby I'm for Real." Living Blues no. 17 (Summer 1974): 13–17.

Discography: LSFP

- Aged and Mellow* (1952, Federal 12078); Cherry Wine (1953, Federal 12142); Down Memory Lane with Little Esther (1959, King 622); Release Me!—Reflections of... (1963, Lenox 227); And I Love Him (1966, Atlantic SD-1565); Burnin' Live at Freddie Jett's Pied... (1970, Atlantic SD-1565); Alone Again Naturally (1972, Kudu KU-09); Capricorn Princess (1974, Kudu KU-31); Performance (1974, Kudu KU-18); Bad Baad Girl (Charly CRB-1100).

PHILLIPS, LITTLE ESTHER

PHILLIPS, WASHINGTON

b. George Washington Phillips, 11 January 1880; Teague, TX

d. 20 September 1954; Teague, TX

Black preacher active in Teague, Texas, and sacred music singer who recorded eighteen titles for Columbia from 1927 through 1929. He accompanied himself on an instrument that produced high, soft, tinkly tones. Some believe that the instrument he used was a dulcicola, a rare type of keyboard-zither; others believe he simply used an autoharp type of zither. His "Denomination Blues" was an antecedent to Sister Rosetta Tharpe's "That All" (1938).

GUIDO VAN RIJN/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Corcoran, Michael. "Exhuming the Legend of Washington Phillips." Austin Statesman (29 December 2002).

Discography: DGR

PIANO

History and Technical Description

Heavy, unwieldy, expensive, requiring expert tuning and maintenance, the piano is an unlikely blues instrument. Nevertheless, throughout blues history, the piano has been second only to the guitar in popularity. Despite having a keyboard lacking quarter tones and the capability for tone bending, its unique quality of being both percussive and melodic has enabled generations of blues pianists to coax a blues feeling from the piano by dint of an inspired combination of slurred notes and crushed chords.

The reason for the widespread availability of the piano can probably be found in the popularity of ragtime in the late nineteenth century, which encouraged many households, public venues, and nightspots to acquire an instrument. Early statistics for piano ownership are not available, but at a starting price of around one hundred dollars it was not beyond the reach of an average middle-class household. Although the cost may have deterred low-income black families from having a piano at home, it is likely that there was relatively easy access to an instrument in the neighborhood church or bars.

African Antecedents

Some authorities have sought to establish a direct link between piano blues and African music, citing the rhythmic similarities of the music with African drums and the xylophone. However, the relationship is not as clear-cut as sometimes assumed. If there were surviving memories of African traditions through dance, and in the playing styles of instruments such as the banjo, the later emergence of a piano blues style seems more to have been an evolution from ragtime, itself a hybrid music, and early jazz, followed by heavy record company promotion.

The European Tradition

Throughout most of the nineteenth century, American music predominantly followed the prevailing European traditions. Two black classical pianists whose names have survived from the period are Blind Tom (Bethune) from Columbus, Georgia, who was said to be semi-idiotic but could reproduce any piano composition after only one hearing, and the conservatory-trained Blind Boone from Missouri. The latter had a successful concert career, but was not above occasionally disappearing into the St. Louis sporting district to soak up the local atmosphere. In the 1890s Boone published Boone's Rag Medleys Nos. 1 and 2, which included Make Me a Pallet on the Floor and I'm Alabama Bound, surely a pair of proto-blues.

In New Orleans, up until the 1880s, the black community was permitted to dance in La Place Congo every Sunday, to the accompaniment of drums, horns, and other instruments. The rhythm of the dance was captured by the composer Louis Gottschalk in his piano opus La Bamboula—Danse des Negres, written in 1847. However, while Gottschalk had a serious interest in African music as performed in New Orleans, Americans everywhere experienced parodies in the form of the popular coon songs and minstrel shows. The minstrel shows presented a caricature of the black person, which was on the one hand sympathetic, but on the other highly demeaning. Nevertheless, the syncopated banjo music that they featured heavily would eventually metamorphose into ragtime, the first truly all-American music.

Ragtime

Ragtime combined the syncopation of African American banjo styles with the stride bass of European music. Its revolutionary feature was the way the pianist opposed right-hand syncopations (or accents on the weak and normally unaccented second and fourth beats of the bar) against a precise and regularly accented left-hand bass. The name “ragtime” first appeared in print in a Chicago paper of 1897, but the music had already been around for a few years by then and was formerly known as “jig” piano. Its emergence coincided with the rise in popularity of the cakewalk, a dance that was eminently suited to be performed to a ragtime accompaniment. Ragtime, and the cakewalk, swept the nation in the late 1890s.

Ben Harney always claimed to be the originator of ragtime, and his The Rag Time Instructor was published in 1897. He was, however, beaten into print by William Krell, a Chicago bandleader, whose Mississippi Rag was published a few months earlier. The first rag by a Negro composer was Tom Turpin’s Harlem Rag, published in December of the same year.

Although there were many ragtime “professors,” its preeminent composer was Scott Joplin, born circa 1868 and raised in Texarana, Texas. As a boy, Joplin studied the piano with a German piano teacher, but left home in his early teens to begin a career as an itinerant musician. He arrived in St. Louis in 1895 and found work in the clubs and bars of the Chestnut Valley district. He stayed in the area for eight years and it is probable that the elements of ragtime were conceived during this time, in clubs such as the Silver Dollar. In 1894, after a sojourn in Chicago for the World’s Columbian Exposition, Joplin moved to Sedalia and there, in 1899, he met John Stark. They met at the Maple Leaf Club, and there, Stark, a local music store owner, heard Joplin play the Maple Leaf Rag. The next day Stark bought the publishing rights and within six months the tune was a hit. Stark moved to St. Louis and other Joplin standards such as Elite Syncopations and The Entertainer followed in 1902. St. Louis remained a center for ragtime, and pianists used to congregate at the Rosebud, Tom Turpin’s place on Market Street.

In addition to those mentioned above, other outstanding ragtime pianists included James Scott, Joseph Lamb, Eubie Blake, Louis Chauvin, and Tony Jackson.

The First “Blues” Popular Songs

Long before the blues settled into the twelve-bar form in which it is usually played, there were “blues” songs published that were simply the popular songs of the day. Several eyewitness accounts mention hearing blues lyrics around the turn of the twentieth century, but the first published blues titles were “Dallas Blues,” “Baby Seals Blues,” and “Memphis Blues,” all in 1912. Bandleader W. C. Handy claimed to have written the latter in 1909, under the title “Mr. Crump,” as a campaign song for Jesse Crump in the mayoralty race of that year. Of the three, only “Dallas Blues” was successful at the time, but two years later Handy published “St. Louis Blues,” which was a hit and made his fortune in sheet music sales. Although few of his compositions were what would now be considered blues, Handy did much to publicize the name and his biography, published in 1941, was entitled Father of the Blues.

New Orleans Jazz

Perhaps because of its reputation as the birthplace of jazz, New Orleans is hardly recognized as a center of blues activity. Two fine pianists, Jelly Roll Morton and Tony Jackson, graduated from playing in joints in the tenderloin district to achieve fame elsewhere, but the only information available about their New Orleans contemporaries and the music they played is in Morton’s Library of Congress recordings made some thirty years later. Both Morton and Jackson played with a regularly accented left hand, although Morton’s style had more flexibility and jazz influence than the ragtime pianists of his generation. Morton, who left New Orleans in 1909, was a trained musician and played mostly in white establishments. Notwithstanding, he was also popular among the prostitutes, according to Bunk Johnson, for his ability to play the blues. Morton remembered two other blues pianists from the Garden District red light area, Game Kid and Buddy Carter, but neither made records.

Boogie-Woogie

A particular form of blues piano, in which an ostinato rolling bass figure features strongly, is called “boogie-woogie.” The origins of boogie-woogie are unknown. One theory is that it originated in the turpentine and lumber camps of East Texas and Louisiana around the turn of the twentieth century and, according to pianist Sammy Price, was originally known as “fast western.” To keep the loggers in camp at weekends, musical entertainment, in the form of itinerant pianists, was provided by the camp bosses. The shacks in which they played had walls lined with barrels of beer and moonshine whiskey, which gave these joints (and the piano style that grew up there) the name “barrelhouse.” However, not all barrelhouse piano is boogie-woogie, and it must be presumed that the pianists would also be required to play the popular tunes of the day.

It also seems likely that boogie-woogie sprang up in more than one area. Eubie Blake remembered pianist Will Turk playing a boogie-woogie bass in Baltimore in the 1890s, and Jelly Roll Morton claimed to have heard it in New Orleans in 1900. Leadbelly (Huddie Ledbetter) learned to imitate on the guitar a boogie-woogie bass he picked up from a pianist called Pine Top in Shreveport, Louisiana, around the same time. Also in Louisiana, Stavin’ Chain was beating out boogie-woogie in dance halls in Donaldsville, and Charlie Mills was playing it on the Mississippi riverboats. In 1909, W. C. Handy heard a pianist playing boogie-woogie in the Monarch Saloon on Beale Street.

Transition

Probably the earliest boogie bass, the walking octave bass, in which the left hand proceeds to run up and down the notes of the chord in broken octaves, appears in early ragtime compositions such as New Orleans Hop Scop Blues by George Thomas, published in 1916 but written in 1911. The first recorded piano solo in which a boogie-woogie bass appears is “The Rocks” by Clay Custer and dates from 1923. “Clay Custer” is widely believed to be a pseudonym for George Thomas. Thomas himself was a theater pit pianist and music publisher, born around 1885, in Houston, Texas. By 1923 he had moved to Chicago, bringing with him his younger brother Hersal, a child prodigy who recorded two fine piano solos, “Suitcase Blues” and “Hersal Blues,” and also played with Louis Armstrong, before his untimely death at the age of sixteen.

Among the first notable pianists to record blues and boogie were Charles Cow-Cow Davenport, from Anniston, Alabama, and Jimmy Blythe, from Lexington, Kentucky. Davenport was born into a religious family in 1894. He initially attended Alabama Theological Seminary, but was expelled and soon gravitated to working as a pianist in honky-tonks in Birmingham, Alabama, and Atlanta, Georgia. In his teens he worked in various traveling minstrel shows and carnivals, and also had a spell as a brothel pianist in the Storyville district of New Orleans. He had his greatest success in vaudeville, accompanying such singers as Dora Carr and Ivy Smith on the TOBA circuit, and reputedly touring Europe in the mid-1920s. He had a particularly strong left hand, which is evident in his best known composition “Cow Cow Blues.” When performing boogie-woogie, Davenport used a characteristic version of the walking octaves bass, with the accent on the first note of each couplet. A true transition figure, Davenport also included classic ragtime in his repertoire, for example, “Atlanta Rag,” which is a version of Scott Joplin’s “Pineapple Rag,” published in 1908.

Jimmy Blythe was born in Keene, Kentucky, in 1901 and probably moved to Chicago around 1918. He studied under Clarence Jones, a well-known pianist and orchestra leader, and by the early twenties was making piano rolls, of which he ultimately made more than two hundred. Blythe recorded all kinds of music, including waltzes and popular songs, but it is for his hot jazz, blues, and boogie that he will be remembered. “Chicago Stomps,” from 1924, is widely regarded as the first full boogie-woogie piano solo on record. His 1928 sides with the Dixie Four, including pianist W. E. Burton, have a good claim to be the first R&B records issued. Both “Five O’Clock Stomp” and “Kentucky Stomp” feature drummer Clifford “Snags” Jones playing the 2/4 backbeat that was not to become commonplace until the 1950s. In his short life Blythe influenced many other pianists including, conspicuously, Albert Ammons.

Blues Recording

Mamie Smith’s rendition of “Crazy Blues” in 1920 set the pattern of blues recording for much of the decade. The classic blues singers were popular vaudeville and cabaret performers, almost exclusively female, whose material was usually written by professional songwriters. In most cases their repertoire was a mixture of twelve-bar blues and popular songs. Sometimes their accompaniment was just a pianist; on other occasions a small jazz group was used. The pianists were essentially trained studio musicians, and included in their ranks Clarence Williams, James P. Johnson, Fletcher Henderson, and Porter Grainger. Sometimes the accompanist was also the composer of the song. These pianists played predominantly stride piano, an East Coast style that developed from ragtime and retained the regular beat of the left hand with a greater freedom of right-hand improvisation. Foremost among the classic blues singers were Bessie Smith, Gertrude “Ma” Rainey, Clara Smith, Alberta Hunter, and Sara Martin.

Impact of Records

Until the advent of the record industry, the primary means of dissemination of piano styles was by sheet music sales. Although individual self-taught pianists could exchange ideas in person, for the mass market it was essential to get those ideas down in print. This required that both composer and purchaser be musically literate and put a premium on sight reading. All this was changed at a stroke by the gramophone record. Compositions could be learned by ear by repeated playing and new styles could easily be assimilated by pianists across the country. Fueled by the record industry’s desire for novelty, and its concentration on blues music for the African American market, a new generation of self-taught blues pianists came to prominence whose styles were highly individual and owed little to the previous legitimate training. The trend started in Chicago, one of the first major recording centers.

Boogie—The First Wave

The first piano record title to mention boogie-woogie was Clarence “Pine Top” Smith’s 1928 recording of “Pine Top’s Boogie Woogie.” Smith was born in Troy, Alabama, in June 1904 and in his teens moved to Birmingham, which at that time had a strong blues piano tradition. As a pianist, he was soon proficient enough to appear on the TOBA circuit, accompanying such artists as Butterbeans & Susie, Ma and Pa Rainey, and Coot Grant and Sox Wilson. Around 1924 he moved to Chicago where, with his wife and two children, he shared a house on South Parkway with fellow pianists Meade “Lux” Lewis and Albert Ammons. In 1928 he was contacted by record executive Mayo Williams, who arranged for him to record the songs and piano solos for which he is justifiably famous. Two months later he was dead, shot in a disturbance at a dance hall. The origin of the term “boogie” (“woogie” is a reduplication) is obscure, but at this period it certainly had sexual connotations. Although he was far from the first to play in this style, Smith’s record firmly associated the word in the public’s mind with the insistent eight-to-the-bar bass. It is alleged that the melody itself first appeared in sheet music form in Axel Christensen’s “Symphonic No. 4” published in 1925, and its double-handed trill introduction closely resembles the Hersal Thomas intro to “Special Delivery Blues” by Sippie Wallace (1926). Easily his best-known work, “Pine Top’s Boogie Woogie” is played with a light, deft touch. The single-note eight-to-the-bar bass has a terrific swing and the commentary shows that this was music for dancing as well as listening.

Another seminal boogie-woogie record was the 1927 “Honky Tonk Train Blues” by Meade “Lux” Lewis. His father was a porter on the Pullman coaches, and the family home was on South La Salle near the New York Central line. His first instrument was the violin, but at the age of sixteen he met the great blues and boogie pianist Jimmy Yancey and switched to piano, by practicing in the home of his boyhood friend Albert Ammons, who was also destined to become famous as a boogie pianist. From around 1924, Lewis and Ammons worked at house parties at night and for the Silver Taxicab company during the day. Around 1927 Lewis also worked in South Bend as a pianist/brothel keeper. In the same year he returned to Chicago and was invited to record “Honky Tonk Train Blues,” his most famous composition. The eight-to-the-bar chorded bass and familiar melodic riffs of “Honky Tonk Train Blues” make it the most famous of boogie-woogie themes, and this first recording ranks among the best of his many versions. The bass is practically unique in the blues in revolving around the second inversion of the major triad.

Other classic boogie-woogie recordings from 1929 include Romeo Nelson’s “Head Rag Hop” and Arthur “Montana” Taylor’s “Indiana Avenue Stomp.”

Blues in Other Major Cities

In the early days of recording, the record companies simply signed well-known artists who were appearing in theaters and cabaret in New York and Chicago. It soon became apparent that demand was exceeding supply, however, and the companies turned to talent scouts in other major cities to fill the gap. These men were often record dealers or distributors, whose own tastes, and those of their customers, no doubt influenced their selection. In this way certain cities acquired a recognizable style. Of these perhaps the best known is St. Louis, where the major talent scout was Jesse Johnson, owner of the De Luxe Record Shop.

The St. Louis area was home to Roosevelt Sykes, Walter Davis, Henry Brown, Peetie Wheatstraw,

PIANO

Wesley Wallace, and Aaron “Pinetop” Sparks, all very individual blues pianists, but whose collective work is characterized by a hollow-sounding, vibrant quality and a consistent 4/4 chorded bass. Sykes, Davis, and Wheatstraw composed and sung their own blues songs, and were prolific recording artists throughout the thirties.

Other cities that produced notable early blues pianists include Birmingham, Alabama (Jabo Williams, Walter Roland), Detroit (Charlie Spand, Speckled Red), Indianapolis (Leroy Carr, Montana Taylor), and the seaports of Houston and Galveston, Texas (Rob Cooper, Andy Boy).

Rural Blues Piano

In the twenties and thirties accessibility dictated which artists were recorded and doubtless many fine musicians working in remote places were never discovered. An exception was Eurreal “Little Brother” Montgomery, from Kentwood, Louisiana, whose father ran a local barrelhouse. At an early age he dropped out of school to earn his living as a musician, first in small towns in Louisiana, and later in Vicksburg and New Orleans. He settled in Chicago in 1928, but then in 1931 he moved to Jackson, Mississippi, where he formed his own band, the Southland Troubadours, with whom he played dances and radio shows for the rest of the decade. An accomplished, versatile pianist, Little Brother’s blues piano style was firmly rooted in the Louisiana tradition, relying on a flexibility and sparseness reminiscent of early gospel music. Other rural pianists who achieved some reputation were Will Ezell, who played the same Louisiana dance halls and logging camps as Little Brother, eventually becoming virtually the house pianist for Paramount; Louis Johnson, who lived on Joe Kirby’s plantation near Claxton, Mississippi, and recorded some fine sides in 1930; and Lee Green, a fine pianist and singer, also from Mississippi.

Prewar Recordings

The Urban Sound

The thirties saw the rise of blues recording stars, artists whose records sold consistently enough for them to be regular visitors to the studios. Of the blues pianists, the best known were the talented songwriter Leroy Carr (who died in 1935), the technically brilliant Roosevelt Sykes, the idiosyncratic Walter Davis, and the ebullient Peetie Wheatstraw. A later addition to this stellar galaxy was Big Maceo, a pianist/singer from Georgia, whose outstanding piano work would influence many later artists including Johnny Jones and Otis Spann. In addition to the singers, there were many fine blues piano accompanists of this period including Joshua Altheimer, Blind John Davis, Black Bob, and Myrtle Jenkins.

Boogie, the Classic Period

The popularity of boogie-woogie owes much to the work of John Hammond, a New Yorker who worked for Columbia Records. Hammond rediscovered Meade “Lux” Lewis in 1936 and persuaded English Parlophone to release a new version of “Honky Tonk Train Blues.” Later, in 1938–1939, Hammond organized the celebrated “From Spirituals to Swing” concerts at Carnegie Hall, which brought together Lewis, Ammons, and the Kansas City duo of Pete Johnson and Joe Turner. Lewis, Ammons, and Johnson were billed as the Boogie Woogie Trio. Playing boogie-woogie with up to six hands on two pianos, they were an overnight sensation. Recordings, radio work, and a long residency at Café Society in New York followed. Soon the popular big bands entered the field and the inevitable commercialization followed. Throughout the boom years Ammons and Lewis remained primarily solo performers, but Pete Johnson was also an accomplished blues accompanist and his duets with Joe Turner such as “Roll ‘Em Pete” were highly influential in the R&B movement that followed.

The boogie-woogie craze also led to the welcome discovery and recording of two talented older Chicago pianists, Jimmy Yancey and “Cripple” Clarence Lofton.

Postwar Recordings

R&B Piano

By the end of World War II, the age of the solo blues pianist was practically over, although it was given a brief fillip by the success of Cecil Gant’s “I Wonder” in 1945. As the big bands gave way to small saxophone-led jump and R&B outfits, the piano was increasingly subsumed into the rhythm section. The transition was led by Louis Jordan’s Tympani Five, whose one-time pianist Bill Doggett was later to switch to Hammond organ and create one of the greatest R&B instrumentals of all time, “Honky Tonk.” Some pianist/vocalists, such as Houston-based Amos Milburn and Charles Brown on the West Coast, remained popular and Johnson and Turner were still active, as was Camille Howard with Roy Milton’s Orchestra, but there was a wind of change in the air.

Amplification

In the late forties, increasingly the electric guitar was becoming the instrument of choice for many younger artists. As the volume rose, so the technical problems of the piano increased. Its broad sounding board made it difficult to amplify effectively and soon only the treble could be heard above the electric instruments. Other changes also took place. Previously, bands played in piano keys such as C, F, and G, or in brass keys such as B \flat and E \flat . Now, on the principle that the loudest instrument calls the tune, guitar players began to dictate the keys in which the bands played. In the guitar keys of E, A, and D it is not possible to slide between the minor and major third on the piano to create a “blue” note. Blues pianists therefore turned to the slide between the minor and major fifth to get the “blue” effect, thereby curiously echoing a similar change brought about in jazz by the rise of bebop, though for a completely different reason.

In Chicago, the rise of the independent record labels, and particularly Chess, saw an explosion of recordings by Southern migrants such as Muddy Waters and Chester “Howlin’ Wolf” Burnett. The pianists whose sparkling treble phrases helped to create the Chicago blues sound included Sunnyland Slim, Henry Gray, Johnny Johnson, and, above all, Otis Spann. Spann, from Jackson, Mississippi, is considered by many to be the outstanding postwar blues pianist, and his percussive, elegant accompaniments to Muddy Waters’s recordings are some of his best work.

New Orleans R&B

New Orleans was one outpost that did not succumb to the dominance of the electric guitar. Here pianists such as Roy Byrd (Professor Longhair), Allen Toussaint, Antoine “Fats” Domino, and Huey “Piano” Smith continued to make delightful hit records in Cosimo Matassa’s primitive studio at the corner of Rampart and Dumaine. The New Orleans sound is very distinctive. As established by Professor Longhair, for example, in “Mardi Gras in New Orleans” (1949), it involves complex two-handed polyrhythmic patterns and a beat that may evoke the drum rhythms of La Place Congo fifty years earlier.

Soul

For most of the first fifty years of blues music, a sharp distinction was maintained between the styles of blues and gospel piano. This barrier was abruptly broken by the emergence of Ray Charles in the mid-1950s. Charles, who began as a lounge pianist in Florida, created his own style of gospel-tinged blues piano and singing, and ultimately went on to become an international superstar. The amalgam of jump-blues with tight horn sections and gospel-styled vocals became known as soul. In another development, small groups such as Booker T and the MGs in Memphis and the Bill Doggett Combo in New York established the Hammond organ as a blues instrument and created many soul and R&B hits.

Conclusion

Blues piano faces an uncertain future. Although the arrival of the electric piano has solved the amplification problem, there are very few new young blues pianists on the scene, and, outside of Germany and Austria, not much interest in classic boogie-woogie. It is to be hoped that the renaissance of interest in acoustic blues guitar among younger players will spark a similar revival in the fortunes of the piano.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

- Blesh, Rudi, and Harriet Grossman Janis. They All Played Ragtime: The True Story of an American Music. New York: Knopf, 1950.
- Gert zur Heide, Karl. Deep South Piano: The Story of Little Brother Montgomery. London: Studio Vista, 1970.
- Dr. John. Dr. John Teaches New Orleans Piano: In Depth Sessions with a Master Musician. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 1997.
- Kriss, Eric. Six Blues-Roots Pianists. New York: Oak, 1973.
- Newberger, Eli H. “Archetypes and Antecedents of Piano Blues and Boogie-Woogie Style.” Journal of Jazz Studies 4, no. 1 (Fall 1976): 84–109.

PIANO C. RED

PIANO C. RED

b. James Wheeler, 14 September 1933; Montevallo, AL

Learned piano in Montevallo, Alabama, from local performer Fat Lilly. Red moved to Chicago in 1956. His notable day job has been as a cab driver, but he has worked steadily as a blues pianist and composer. Recorded “Slow Down and Cool It” for Checker in 1963, and the CD Cab Drivin’ Man for the Big Boy label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Sharp, Steven. “Piano C. Red: Cab Drivin’ Man.” Living Blues no. 127 (May/June 1996): 42–47.

Discography: LSFP

PIANO RED

b. William Lee Perryman, 19 October 1911; Hampton, GA

d. 25 July 1985; Decatur, GA

Popular pianist and brother of Speckled Red (Rufus Perryman). He was also known as Doctor Feelgood. He enjoyed record hits in 1950–1951 with “Rockin’ with Red” and “Red’s Boogie.” The Beatles recorded his “Mr. Moonlight” in 1964.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

PIAZZA, ROD

b. 18 December 1947; Riverside, CA

Harmonica player Rod Piazza melds the post–World War II West Coast R&B swing sound defined by Joe Turner and Johnny Otis with the driving electric harmonica blues of Chicago’s Little Walter into a unique, powerful, and personal style. His up-tempo work (particularly on the chromatic) is fresh, brassy, and bold, while his slow numbers create a feeling of tension and suspense that is both rich and soulful.

Piazza made his first recordings at age eighteen with his Los Angeles–based group the Dirty Blues Band on ABC/BluesWay. In 1968 he teamed with harmonica player and mentor George “Harmonica” Smith to form the group Bacon Fat. Piazza played and recorded with Smith until 1973 when he formed the Chicago Flying Saucer Band with pianist Honey Alexander. (Piazza and Alexander married in 1989.) In 1977 the couple formed their current band, the Mighty Flyers, and by 1980, the band began to tour regularly. The first recordings featuring the Mighty Flyers, Blues in the Dark and Alphabet Blues, were released in 1991 and 1992, respectively, on the Black Top label.

Rod Piazza and the Mighty Flyers have been a consistent draw at major clubs and festivals around the world. Their 1999 release Here and Now on the Tone-Cool label recombines the group’s unique ingredients of blues, swing, jump, and R&B into a fresh approach to the genre. In 1998 Piazza won a W. C. Handy award for “best instrumentalist, harmonica,” and the Mighty Flyers have been three-time winners of the W. C. Handy Award for Band of the Year, most recently in 2002.

GEORGE BOZIWICK

Bibliography

AMG (Cub Koda and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli

Robble, Andrew M. “Rod Piazza: Flyin’ High with the Master of the Chromatic.” Blues Revue no. 14 (1994): 39–45.

Discography: AMG

PICCOLO, GREG

b. 10 May 1951; Westerly, RI

Rhode Island–based bandleader, vocalist, and tenor saxophonist. Member of the Roomful of Blues from 1970 to 1994. Piccolo performed session work for numerous artists, including Colin James, Big Joe Turner, and the Fabulous Thunderbirds. He released several solo albums that cover multiple genres, including jazz, R&B, acid-jazz, and rock ’n’ roll.

JOE C. CLARK

Bibliography

AMG (Michael Erlewine)

Discography: AMG

See also Fabulous Thunderbirds; Roomful of Blues; Turner, Joseph Vernon "Big Joe"

PICHON, WALTER G. "FATS"

b. 3 April 1906; New Orleans, LA
d. 26 February 1967; Chicago, IL

Pianist and vocalist who recorded mostly jazz with King Oliver, Henry Red Allen, and Luis Russell. Pichon made a 1929 blues recording with Teddy Bunn and worked riverboats in the early forties. His band was eventually taken over by Dave Bartholomew in 1941 when Pichon left for a regular gig at the Absinthe House in New Orleans.

TOM MORGAN

Bibliography

Harris, Larkin
Chilton, John. Who's Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.

Discography: DGR; LSFPPICKENS, BUSTER

b. Edwin Goodwin Pickens, 3 June 1916; Hempstead, TX
d. 24 November 1964; Houston, TX

Pickens was one of the clique of itinerant singer/pianists who played for workers in the sawmills, turpentine camps, and oil towns of Texas in the 1920s and 1930s, but, unlike contemporaries such as Black Boy Shine and Son Becky, he did not have the opportunity to make records at that time. Fortunately he outlived most of the musicians in that high-risk profession and was able to document pieces from their common repertoire like "The Ma Grinder" and "Hattie Green" on an album, and record a few accompaniments to Lightnin' Hopkins, before he was murdered.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Harris, Larkin
Oliver, Paul. Notes to Buster Pickens (1977, Flyright FLY LP 536).

Discography: LSFP

See also Shaw, Robert

PICKETT, DAN

b. James Founty, 31 August 1907; Pike County, AL
d. 16 August 1967; Boaz, AL

For years James Founty, known professionally as Dan Pickett, was a mystery man. Field trips in the early 1990s have solved most mysteries although most of the research remains unpublished. He recorded five singles for Gotham plus four that were unreleased in 1949. Pickett's repertoire was derived almost exclusively from 1930s recordings synthesizing those styles into a unique sound of his own.

JEFF HARRIS

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O'Neal); Larkin
Küstner, Axel. "Goin' Down South." Juke Blues no. 32 (Winter/Spring 1995): 13.
Smith, Chris. "The Dan Pickett Story." Blues & Rhythm no. 30 (July 1987): 4-5.
———. Notes accompanying Dan Pickett, 1949 Country Blues (1990, Collectables VCL 5311).

Discography: AMG; LSFPSelected Recordings

Dan Pickett, 1949 Country Blues (1990, Collectables VCL 5311).

See also Alabama; Gotham/20th Century

PIEDMONT (LABEL)

Label operated by Dick and Louisa Spottswood in 1963-1964, with occasional issues through 1966. Best known for issuing rediscovery recordings of Mississippi John Hurt and of Reverend Robert Wilkins, including the latter's "Prodigal Son" on his eponymous album on Piedmont 13162.

EDWARD KOMARA

PIEDMONT (REGION)

Piedmont Blues, sometimes called "East Coast Blues," takes its name from the Appalachian foothills and plateau of the southeastern United States, a narrow strip of alluvium stretching from New

PIEDMONT (REGION)

Jersey to Alabama, spreading from the base of the Appalachian chain toward the Atlantic coast until the fall-line of the region's rivers mark the beginning of the coastal plain. Actually, the style can be found from the northeastern urban corridor through eastern Pennsylvania to northern Florida; from the Tidewater area of Maryland through Virginia and the Carolinas into Georgia, falling off through eastern Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama.

On record, it became a relatively homogeneous guitaristic tradition that swept over this vast geographical area during the late 1920s and early 1930s, sublimating older or more local styles. Musically, it is similar to what is known on the white side of the color line as "Travis picking" (which has its roots in black Kentucky guitar playing), a style that uses the index finger of the picking hand to play melody on the higher strings while the thumb sets a complementary rhythmic bass pattern on the lower ones. The fretting hand deals with both melody and rhythm, following the chord changes in a sprightly fashion. This thumb and forefinger picking approach has some of its roots in an earlier picked banjo style; most Piedmont artists played thusly, but not all—some used more than one finger to pick the melody.

Complex patterns emerge in this blues guitar style and it is often compared to Harlem "stride" piano playing with a regular alternating bass and a relatively complex repeated chord structure against which melodic figures fairly bounce in syncopation. This is logical, since both forms of music have firm roots in earlier ragtime; Reverend Gary Davis pointed out many times that he and other such guitarists were playing the guitar like a piano. Encompassing and distilling elements of many different vernacular musics (ragtime, minstrel and medicine show music, old-time white country singing and dancing, string bands, and so on) in the southeast led to a highly danceable black music, something lively for the Saturday night function!

Where the vast plantations of the Delta and central South had been tightly supervised places of both work and residence, blacks in the southeast could maintain family and friendship connections slightly more readily, and even travel, though there was little hope of elevating one's life chances. In the Piedmont, cultural boundaries began to blur within music rather faster than through any fight for civil rights. Blacks and whites in the region, having lived in some intimacy for some three hundred years, borrowed tunes and instruments from each other with such frequency that it is often difficult to decide who's borrowing from whom! And a good picker was acknowledged as a good picker, regardless of race!

Furthermore, wages in the tobacco towns (and in the mines), plus a certain distance from one's employer, gave blacks the opportunity to seek other than local avenues for entertainment and to reach a spending power vaguely approaching that of their almost equally poor white neighbors. A certain amount of that money was spent on records, on traveling shows or local black theaters, or on musical instruments. Communities in the 1920s were still generating much of their own musical entertainment—that was to change with the emergence in the 1920s of the "Race" record business, oriented exclusively toward black pocketbooks. In one example, on paydays at the tobacco barns in Durham, North Carolina, workers streamed out of the factories past the barbecue stands and street musicians who had set up expressly to attract their custom; for some musicians, it was enough to survive until the next payday.

Weekend house parties or juke joints also helped shape the blues legacy throughout the Piedmont region. Some residences were equipped with pianos, or even jukeboxes (known locally as "piccolos"). Most parties boasted local musicians, along with free-flowing alcohol, food, and dancing. Community musicians, whether busking or "house," were rarely paid outright for their performances and took their "wages" in tips, food, and liquor. In both the rural and urban settings, Piedmont musicians later maximized their potential income by learning the latest recorded ragtime-influenced popular numbers. Its popularity had one root cause. As a dance music, the Piedmont blues is second to none, and can accompany either running set or couple dancing—very versatile, indeed.

The tobacco cities and towns of North Carolina and Virginia, plus the textile-based ones of South Carolina and Georgia, loom importantly in the history of Piedmont blues. Musicians followed the money during the tobacco harvest and auctions. The Durham market, for example, lasted three to four months, ending in December. It was a rowdy scene replete with medicine shows and buskers in the auction warehouses, all amplified by flowing dollars and bootleg whisky. Generally an all-male bailiwick, the markets were no place for women unless they had their own wares for sale. A medicine show's "route" would often follow the sales as they moved slowly north through the region—music was always a part of this maelstrom of commercial activity!

The earliest commercially successful exponent of the Piedmont guitar style, and a major influence on all who followed, was a "Geechie" man from Florida possibly named Arthur Phelps, but professionally known as Blind Blake. With music being one of the few occupations available to a poor, blind black man, Blake seemingly based his playing style on ragtime piano players. Possibly from St. Petersburg or Jacksonville, Florida, little is yet known of Blake's history, but his legacy of about fifty recordings made between 1926 and 1932 amply justifies his reputation as a sportin' guitar player. He was the first performer in this style to sell a lot of recordings to a black audience, including "Police Dog Blues," "West Coast Blues," and "Diddie Wa Diddie," all on the Paramount label.

Atlanta-based Blind Willie McTell may be best known as the author of "Statesboro Blues," covered by the Allman Brothers Band, or as an inspiration for Bob Dylan, but he was an important black musician as well. He made commercial recordings during four decades, beginning in 1927, played a stunning twelve-string guitar, and was a well-regarded figure in and around Atlanta, Georgia. He was often accompanied by Curley Weaver, from Newton County, east of Atlanta. Weaver shows well on his records how the thumb-and-forefinger ragtime-based style of guitar playing took hold. His records before 1932 echo the style taught him by his mother (Savannah Weaver—she also taught Barbecue Bob [Robert Hicks] and Laughing Charley Lincoln [Charley Hicks], two brothers from Newton County who also recorded; this was a frailed style in open-chord tuning, often with a slide, that owed much to clawhammer banjo playing). By his next session in 1933, he had taken on the "new" ragtime-based approach, possibly from exposure to McTell, Blake's records, or in response to the requests of his new urban audience in Atlanta. Peg Leg Howell was another recorded Atlanta area musician who played in an older style, often in a string band context—Howell and the Hicks brothers ceased recording after 1930, due to many factors.

The one Atlanta musician to "take hold" of the public was Buddy Moss, a "running buddy" to Weaver, McTell, and Hicks. Moss made some seventy sides between 1933 and 1941, and his musical star was on the ascendant until a murder conviction in 1935 stopped it in its tracks. He was a big seller and had great influence in that short time (and later), especially considering that it was in the teeth of the Depression and records were expensive. One of his best-known numbers was the prophetic "Ride to Your Funeral in a V-8 Ford": Buddy made a short-lived comeback session in 1941 after a decade in prison, and his folk circuit career in the 1960s was at best sporadic, due to his orneriness.

The region around Spartanburg and Greenville, South Carolina, gave rise to many important musicians in the Piedmont style. The most influential was probably Blind Willie Walker, about whom little is known. He and Blind Gary Davis (later Reverend) were the region's best remembered guitarists; both were technically stunning and each had his own way of using his technique, and each played alone or with a string band at one time or another. Pink Anderson (the source of half of the name of rock group Pink Floyd!) was another guitarist from Gary's hometown of Laurens; he recorded with Blind Simmie Dooley in 1928 in the Piedmont style, and played medicine shows for most of his life. Davis moved north to North Carolina; Walker taught the most successful South Carolina blues performer, Josh White (who described Walker as the Art Tatum of blues guitar—Spartanburg's Baby Tate said that Walker played in all the keys with all his fingers!). White's career as a black performer selling records to a black audience began in 1932 and overlapped with that of Buddy Moss (in fact, they recorded together in 1935) until a hand injury kept him out of the studio for five years. His influential records such as "Blood Red River" and "Low Cotton" were usually issued under the name "Pinewood Tom"; "Joshua White, the Singing Christian" was reserved for his sacred records. White later found a useful career on the "folk music" circuit in New York City beginning in the 1940s, and lasting until his death in 1969.

The imprisonment of Moss and the injury to White left the field wide open, and it was quickly filled by Blind Boy Fuller, an extremely popular artist from the standpoint of record sales and his influence on other guitarists. He truly set the standard for the later Piedmont guitar style and was massively influential throughout the region because of his records. Born Fulton Allen in Anson County, North Carolina, he became blind as a teen, learning to play and sing as a consequence. James Baxter Long "discovered" him playing on the streets of Durham in the early 1930s. As a department store manager, Long sold records and made small fees scouting talent for the American Record Corporation; with no Moss or White records to sell to blacks, he knew that there was an empty niche and he filled it with Fuller. In 1935, he took Fuller, Blind Gary Davis (somewhat of a mentor to Fuller), and Bull City Red (washboard player George Washington) to New York for their first sessions in July. The renamed Blind Boy Fuller ultimately recorded 130 sides by 1940, many being big hits: According to Long, Fuller's record of "Step It Up & Go" sold more than half a million copies—not bad for a black artist in 1940! Other of Fuller's hits were "Truckin' My Blues Away," "Mamie," "Little Woman You're So Sweet," and "Lost Lover Blues." Recording in the latter days of the Depression, he was in the recording studio on a regular basis until just before his death in 1941. A stylistic synthesizer rather than an originator, Fuller's influence was felt across the color line, and as far away as Oklahoma and Texas, his tunes even being covered by Western swing bands.

Fuller also had a band consisting of himself on guitar, Bull City Red on washboard, and "Sonny Terry" on harmonica, and it set the norm for similar southeastern combos. Born Saunders Terrell in Greensboro, Georgia, Sonny met Fuller on the streets of Wadesboro, North Carolina, and they hooked up in Durham as a result of that meeting. He could punctuate for the guitarist, or solo wildly on his own, and was one of the masters of the French harp from the southeast. Like Josh White, he later had a second career as an actor and a "folk" artist, hooking up with guitarist/singer Brownie McGhee in New York during the 1940s. They were joined there by Reverend Gary Davis who was now a New York City street and storefront preacher—the folk revival was good to them all and provided a secondary market after they all fell out of favor with black record buyers.

The final link in the "Piedmont Chain," from the standpoint of black commercial recording, was Brownie McGhee. Walter Brown McGhee was born in Knoxville, Tennessee, in 1915 into a musical family. As a young polio victim, he was not very mobile and music was his only outlet. He was later one of the first beneficiaries of the March of Dimes, and an operation allowed him to walk. Eventually he lived in Winston-Salem, North Carolina, where he formed a band with harmonicist Jordan Webb and washboard player Robert Young (aka Washboard Slim). With the death of Fuller, Long needed another Piedmont player to send to ARC; hedging his bets, he got Buddy Moss out of jail, and took on Brownie and his band, taking them all to New York City to record in 1941, along with the remnants of Fuller's band. By that time, the war was on and the shellac for records was rationed so that production diminished, and musical tastes changed within the black marketplace. The hits were few and far between and "Fuller-esque" success was not to be. Fortunately, folklorist Alan Lomax offered an option, and Brownie and Sonny headed north for good to enter into the "folk" realm, while still attempting to make records there to sell to blacks. The former market eventually took over and they became world-renowned figures playing for a white audience.

Durham had been particularly rich with talented musicians—Arthur Lyons, Floyd Council (the other half of the Pink Floyd name), brothers Willie and Richard Trice—but it, like other southern cities, changed as blacks moved to the urban north and the music scene changed forever; jazz, R&B, and so on had taken over as the music that blacks generally wanted to dance to. As mentioned, the folk revival, beginning in the 1940s, brought a new outlet for some players from the Piedmont; besides McGhee & Terry, White, and Davis, Gabriel Brown, Alec Seward, and later John Jackson, Archie Edwards, and John Cephas & Phil Wiggins did well in that niche. Lesser-knowns such as Pernelle Charity, Guitar Gabriel, Henry "Rufe" Johnson, Etta Baker, Peg Leg Sam, Moses Rascoe, Baby Tate, Tarheel Slim, Doug Quattlebaum, and Blind Connie Williams made a few recordings and had varying degrees of recognition among folk/blues patrons.

Today the Piedmont blues tradition is carried on by a diminishing list of black practitioners (John Dee Holman, Cootie Stark, Neal Pattman, Algia Mae Hinton, George Higgs, Richard "Big Boy" Henry, Drink Small, Warner Williams, and others), but it is no longer an African American-oriented music. The Piedmont guitar style has permeated folk music both here and abroad, as well as being a "root" influence on early rockabilly, then rock 'n' roll, and later rock music. Once a major and long-lived factor in the Race record business (mid-1920s to mid-1940s), the music remains active mainly as a diminishing memory tradition, practiced by few blacks. The relatively younger practitioners today who learned from the older black musicians are mostly white (for instance, Roy Book Binder, Paul Geremia, and "Lightnin'" Wells).

Historians including Paul Oliver, Sam Charters, Kip Lornell, Peter B. Lowry, George Mitchell, Bruce Bastin, Gayle Dean Wardlow, Larry Cohn, and Glenn Hinson have devoted considerable time and effort to preserving and publishing the details of the Piedmont blues history. Recent markers erected in Durham and in Wadesboro, Fuller's birth city, celebrate the contribution of Piedmont-style blues players in general, Fuller especially. Also, thanks to organizations like the Music Maker Relief Foundation and numerous blues societies, we can still hear this wonderful and lively music—and it still "lives" on the many recordings that are available to us on CD.

GAILE WELKER WITH PETER B. LOWRY

Bibliography

- Bastin, Bruce. Red River Blues: The Blues Tradition in the Southeast. Urbana, IL: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
- Cohn, Lawrence, ed. Nothing But the Blues. New York: Abbeville Press, 1993.
- Duffy, Tim, ed. Music Makers: Portraits and Songs from the Roots of America. Hillsborough, NC: Pinnacle/Music Maker Press, 2004.
- Mitchell, George. In Celebration of a Legacy: The Traditional Arts of the Lower Chattahoochie Valley. Columbus, GA: Historic Chattahoochie Commission, Eufaula, AL, 1998.

- Pearson, Barry Lee. Virginia Piedmont Blues. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990.
- Tilling, Robert. Oh, What a Beautiful City: A Tribute to Rev. Gary Davis. Jersey (UK): Paul Mill Press, 1992.
- Wald, Elijah. Josh White—Society Blues. Amherst: University of Massachusetts Press, 2000.

Selected Recordings in Reissue

- Blake, Blind Arthur: All the Published Sides (JSP Box 7714; 4 CDs), Ragtime Guitar's Foremost Picker (Yazoo 1068).
- Davis, Reverend Gary: Complete Early Recordings (Yazoo 2011).
- Davis, Reverend Gary, and Pink Anderson: Gospel, Blues & Street Songs (Original Blues Classics OBC 524).
- Fuller, Blind Boy: 1935–1938 (JSP Box 7735; 4 CDs); Blind Boy Fuller, The Essential (Classic Blues CBL 200012; 2 CDs); Trucking My Blues Away (Yazoo 1060).
- McGhee, Brownie: Complete Okeh Recordings, 1940 (Sony/Legacy 52933; 2 CDs).
- McTell, Blind Willie: Blind Willie McTell, The Essential (Classic Blues CBL 200007; 2 CDs); The Classic Years, 1927–1940 (JSP Box 7711; 4 CDs).
- Moss, Buddy: Buddy Moss, The Essential (Classic Blues CBL 200005; 2 CDs).
- Various artists. Blues, Sweet Carolina Blues: The Bluesville Years, Vol. 6 (Original Blues Classics OBC 9914).
- . The Georgia Blues (Yazoo 1012).
- . Guitar Wizards, 1926–1935 (Yazoo 1016).
- . No Jive: Authentic Southern Country Blues (Ace CHD 652).
- White, Josh: Josh White, The Essential (Classic Blues CBL 200005; 2 CDs).

Video

- Born for Hard Luck: Arthur "Peg Leg Sam" Jackson* (VHS). Delaplane, VA: Davenport Films.
- Brownie McGhee: Born With the Blues* (DVD). Vestapol Video.
- Legends of Traditional Fingerstyle Guitar* (DVD). Vestapol Video.
- Piedmont Blues, North Carolina Style*. Chapel Hill, NC: UNC-TV, 2002.
- Reverend Gary Davis/Sonny Terry: Masters of the Country Blues* (DVD). Yazoo Video.

PIERCE, BILLIE

- b. Wilhelmina Goodson, 8 June 1907; Marianna, FL
d. 29 September 1974; New Orleans, LA

New Orleans pianist and singer. Pierce played jazz and blues with her cornetist husband Dede, with whom she recorded and toured extensively in the 1950s and 1960s. Her style is a potent mixture of barrelhouse, boogie-woogie, and ragtime.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

- Harris, Larkin
De Donder, J. "Billie and De De." Mississippi Rag 8 (July 1981): 1; (August 1981): 7.

Discography

- Billie and De De at Luthjen's* (1953, Center CLP-15).
Billie and De De Pierce: New Orleans Music (1959, Folk Lyric FL 110).
Billie and De De Pierce (1960, Jazzology JCE 25).
Blues in the Classic Tradition (1961, Riverside RLP 370).
Jazz at Preservation Hall II (1962, Atlantic SD 1409).
Billie and De De and their Preservation Hall Jazz Band (1966, VPH/VPS-3).

PIERSON, EUGENE

- b. 6 December 1934; near Forrest City, AR
d. 24 August 1977; Chicago, IL

Guitarist active in Chicago from 1953 until his death. He had long working relationships with Sunnyland Slim and Robert Lockwood, and in 1958–1964 he was in a group with drummer Eddie Payne and trumpet player Lester Davenport. While he didn't record as leader, his solos may be prominently heard on records made by Eddie Boyd and Lee Jackson.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Wisner, Steve. "Eugene Pierson." Living Blues no. 34 (September/October 1977): 40.

PIERSON, LEROY

- b. 22 October 1947; St. Louis, MO

Guitarist, vocalist, record producer. Owner of Nighthawk Records, noted Reggae discographer, loyal friend to Henry Townsend. Pierson produced several blues festivals while at Beloit College in the sixties. Played with many older bluesmen in those years, all on tape. Lives in St. Louis, MO.

ANDREW M. COHEN

Bibliography

- "On the Road with Leroy Jodie Pierson." Blues Revue Quarterly no. 3 (1992): 18–19.

PING

Chicago rhythm and blues label of the 1950s. The label was founded in late 1956 by record storeowner Frank Evans, whose operation was run out of the back of his record store (4648 South Cottage

PING

Grove). Its tiny catalog of eight releases included gospel preaching and congregational singing (Deacon Leroy Shinault), doo-wop (the De'bonairs), and jazz (the Porter Kilbert ensemble and the Andrew Hill trio and quintet). One bluesman, Shakey Jake, was recorded but the sides remained unreleased. Ping had only one mildly successful record, the De'bonairs' "Mother's Son" (1956), before going out of business in mid-1957.

ROBERT PRUTER

Discography: McGrath

Campbell, Robert L., and Leonard J. Bukowski. "The Ping Records Discography." Blues & Rhythm no. 129 (May 1998): 4-5.

PINSON, REVEREND LEON

b. 1919; near New Albany, MS
d. 10 October 1998; New Albany, MS

Reverend Leon Pinson combined his position as a minister and his talents as a musician to form a unique blend of blues-based gospel music. He was often found playing his slide guitar with friend Elder Roma Wilson on the harmonica.

HEATHER PINSON

Bibliography

Cheseborough, Steve. "Rev. Leon Pinson" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 144 (March/April 1999): 74-75.
Young, Alan. Woke Me Up This Morning: Black Gospel Singers and the Gospel Life. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

PITCHFORD, LONNIE

b. 8 October 1955; Lexington, MS
d. 8 November 1998; Lexington, MS

Traditional blues multi-instrumentalist Lonnie Pitchford was born on the eastern rim of the Mississippi Delta near Lexington, Mississippi. His guitarist father, W. D. Pitchford, played in area juke joints but didn't allow son Lonnie to play his instrument. Undeterred, six-year-old Pitchford made his own one-string diddley bows with bailing wire and snuff cans on the side of his house. By his early teens, he was practicing on his brother Charles's guitar and within a few years played in various blues and gospel groups. A chance meeting in 1971 with ethnomusicologist Worth Long, who was amazed by Pitchford's talent of making and playing the one-string guitar, led to many prestigious festival appearances across the country. Through Long he met mentors Robert Lockwood and Eugene Powell, two veteran guitarists who greatly shaped Pitchford's music. Lockwood taught him the intricacies of Robert Johnson's style, and Pitchford soon established himself as one of the greatest practitioners of Johnson's music. Throughout the 1970s and early 1980s, he lived in Kansas City and Chicago and often worked as a carpenter to support himself. German blues enthusiasts for L+R Records recorded him in Lexington in 1980, and the success of these recordings led to several European tours. Pitchford appeared in the 1992 film Deep Blues and he released his only domestic album in 1994 for "Rooster Blues," the aptly titled All Around Man, on which he excelled on many instruments and blues styles. Lonnie Pitchford died of AIDS at the age of forty-three and is buried at Newport Community Cemetery near Ebenezer, MS, near one of his biggest influences, Elmore James.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin; Santelli
Nelson, David. "Lonnie Pitchford." Living Blues no. 145 (May/June 1999): 50.
Pitchford, Lonnie. Liner notes to All Around Man (1994, Rooster CD R2629).

Discography: AMG

Pitchford, Lonnie. All Around Man (1994, Rooster CD R2629).

PITTMAN, SAMPSON

Flourished 1930s

Acoustic guitarist believed to have come from Blytheville, Arkansas, who moved to Detroit, Michigan. In 1938 he and Calvin Frazier recorded for Alan Lomax and the Library of Congress, making perhaps the earliest recordings of migrated southern blues in Detroit.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Pittman, Sampson. The Devil Is Busy: The Library of Congress Recordings (1993, Laurie Records 7002).

Discography: DGR

PITTSBURGH

Pittsburgh has long had a reputation as a rough-and-tumble town with a large population of blue-collar workers. In the early 1970s the steel mills began to close, drastically depressing the city’s economy. Blues was an easy fit considering the financial situation of the region. Most rock acts were blues based, and this became the prevailing music of choice for most of the club scene.

During this period many local musicians began to enjoy national attention. Bands like the Snake Stretchers toured and recorded with Roy Buchanan, including the critically acclaimed album That’s What I’m Here For. They recorded five LPs with Polydor, and two with Atlantic records during their six-year stint. Red, Hot and Blue played many nights at the legendary Gene’s Blues Bar on Route 51 with Warren King and Gil Snyder who went on to form the Mystic Knights. The Brick Alley Band played the Decade in Oakland and Fat City in Swissvale, and eventually went on to become the Iron City Houserockers. It is not unusual to see local bands share musicians within their line-ups. Building on momentum from East Coast tours, the Silencers, the Iron City Houserockers, the Mystic Knights, and Norm Nardini all garnered national attention, as well as recording contracts with CBS and MCA.

Mike Sallows and the Rockin’ Reptiles were holding regular blues jams at a small club called the Penn Cafe. One night in 1985, several of the musicians in attendance decided to form the Pittsburgh Blues Society, with the intention of educating and entertaining, while keeping the tradition of blues alive. Those present that night included Mike Sallows, Fred McIntosh, Randall Troy, Lucy Van Sickle, The Gabig Brothers, Kevin Kelly, Duane Stackhouse, D. C. Fitzgerald, and Emory Early. Over the years, the Pittsburgh Blues Society has worked with a vast array of talented musicians such as Gil “Duke” Snyder, “Memphis” Mike Metzger, and Chuck Owston. As the Pittsburgh Blues Society All-Stars, Mike Sallows led the band through most of its finest moments, including headlining at the McKean County Blues Festival, and the All-Stars final performance at the very first Pittsburgh Blues Festival at Sandcastle amusement park in Homestead.

Pittsburgh has always been a blues friendly town. However, events such as those of September 11, 2001, and the fear of other terrorism caused a drop in attendance at shows. However, with two new sports arenas and a new convention center, the area is attempting to become a technology center. It is hoped that the entertainment industry—and blues scene—will benefit as well.

FRED R. MCINTOSH II

PLUNKETT, ROBERT

b. 19 October 1931; Benton, MS

d. 1 or 3 May 2004; Chicago, IL

Drummer. Arrived in Chicago in 1946. Plunkett began playing drums behind harpist Little Arthur Duncan, around the early 1950s and eventually worked with Freddie King, Aron Burton, Howlin’ Wolf, Eddie Shaw, and others. He also appeared on the 1998 anthology Blues Across America (Cannonball).

DAVID WHITEIS

Bibliography

Brisbin, John Anthony. “Robert Plunkett: I Think I Had a Little Magic.” Living Blues no. 114 (1994): 40–51.

POMUS, JEROME “DOC”

b. Jerome Solon Felder, 27 June 1925; Brooklyn, NY

d. 14 March 1991; New York City, NY

Jerome “Doc” Pomus’s career was a testament to music’s universal appeal, the resiliency of the human spirit, and his own remarkable testimony. Pomus was crippled by polio as a child and he was a white vocalist/songwriter/instrumentalist who loved and preferred blues and R&B to pop. Pomus’s tunes were sometimes sentimental, sometimes funny, but always elegant and immediately appealing. Pomus was also savvy enough to realize that he was only a marginal vocalist but an exceptional composer. He abandoned performing in the 1950s, and began a historic collaboration with pianist Mort Shuman. Their joint efforts resulted in such classics as “Save the Last Dance for Me,” “This Magic Moment,” “Sweets for My Sweet,” and a host of tunes that Elvis Presley made rock standards. The list of Presley successes includes “Little Sister,” “Viva Las Vegas,” and “Suspicion,” and he would record more than twenty Pomus/Shuman tunes.

But Pomus later found a second partner in Mac Rebennack (Dr. John), and this new team would craft hits for several blues and rock acts, among them B. B. King, Roomful of Blues, and Mink Deville. The R&B and blues world treasured Pomus, and he was the first white artist awarded the Rhythm and

POMUS, JEROME “DOC”

Blues Foundation Pioneer Award. Sadly, he later died that year of cancer at age sixty-five. He was subsequently inducted into the Rock and Roll and Songwriting Halls of Fame, as well as the blues and New York equivalent institutions. His works remain among the most played and enjoyed in modern popular music history.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Larkin

Songbook: Doc Pomus and Mort Shuman Songs (Winona, MN: Chappell, 1965).

Waterman, Dick. “Obituary.” Living Blues no. 101 (January/February 1992): 37.

POONANNY

b. Joe P. Burns, 6 January 1940; Birmingham, AL

Singer, comedian. “Poonanny” was a childhood nickname. Inspired as a youth to become a drummer after seeing the movie The Gene Krupa Story; also influenced by comedian Pigmeat Markham. In the 1960s and 1970s, Poonanny led bands in which he played drums, emceed, and did comedy from behind his drum set. In the early 1980s he re-created himself as a lead singer, focusing increasingly on comedy. Specializes in risqué routines set to soul/blues melodies and rhythms.

DAVID WHITEIS

Bibliography

AMG (Andrew Hamilton)

Discography: AMG

POPA CHUBBY

b. Theodore Joseph Horowitz, 1960; Bronx, NY

Came to national prominence upon winning the 1992 Long Beach Blues Festival talent competition. Had a national radio hit “Sweet Goddess of Love and Beer” in 1995. His subsequent work has revealed strengths in songwriting, guitar soloing, and topical lyrics.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Bays, Kenneth. “Popa Chubby: Blues-Rocker at Large.” Blues Revue no. 78 (October/November 2002): 9–16.

Discography: AMG

PORTER, DAVID

b. 21 November 1941; Memphis, TN

Singer-songwriter and producer. With his partner Isaac Hayes, Porter wrote songs for and produced several acts for Stax Records, most notably Sam & Dave (“Hold On! I’m Coming” [Stax 189] and “Soul Man” [231]). He made several attempts to start a career as a soul singer, including recording for Stax, but achieved little success.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

Guralnick, Peter. Sweet Soul Music. New York: Harper & Row, 1986.

PORTER, JAKE

b. Vernon Porter, 3 August 1916; Oakland, CA

d. 1 April 1993; Los Angeles, CA

Learned trumpet in school, and through the 1930s he performed in various big bands. Served in the U.S. Army in 1942–1943, and was discharged after a leg injury. He spent the remainder of the 1940s assisting in jazz and rhythm and blues package shows and in Los Angeles area recording sessions. He owned and operated Combo Records in the 1950s and early 1960s. Became active in the 1960s with the Los Angeles chapter of the American Federation of Musicians union. A revival of his performing career came with the 1989 Broadway production of Black and Blue.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Topping, Ray. “Jake Porter” [obituary]. Blues & Rhythm no. 79 (May 1993): 15.

Discography: LSFP

PORTER, KING

b. James A. Pope, 23 November 1916; Bessemer, AL
d. 24 September 1983; Lynn, MA

Trumpet and vocals. Moved to Detroit in 1943, led swing-style combos, switched to R&B in 1947, and had a long residency at the Royal Blue Bar. Bands featured saxophonist Paul Williams, also jazz tenor sax giant Billy Mitchell. Porter played solid, hard-hitting jump-blues. He recorded for Paradise, King, and Savoy, including “Russel Street Hussel” and “Bar Fly.”

JIM GALLERT

Bibliography

Penny, Dave. Notes accompanying King Porter and His Orchestra: Special Request (1989, Official Records [Denmark] 6056).

Discography: Lord; LSFPPORTNOY, JERRY

b. 25 November 1943; Evanston, IL

Harmonica player who was in the Muddy Waters band from 1974 through 1980, then helped to form the Legendary Blues Band.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli
Manual: Jerry Portnoy's Blues Harmonica Masterclass.
E. Dennis, MA: Portnoy, 1997.

Discography: AMGPOWELL, EUGENE

b. 23 December 1908; Utica, MS
d. 4 November 1998; Greenville, MS

Raised on a Delta plantation in Lombardy, Mississippi, Eugene Powell began playing guitar at age seven. A naturally gifted musician, Powell's prowess on the instrument developed rapidly and soon the young guitarist was playing country suppers with half-brother Ben Wilson. His family relocated to Murphy, Mississippi, near Hollandale, and Powell associated with area musicians Sam and Lonnie Chatmon and Bo Carter. Powell developed a sophisticated finger-picking technique and learned songs of many styles quickly, which enabled him to perform both popular and country music for whites and blues for black audiences. Powell ran his own juke joint and played with many musicians traveling through the area in the early 1930s, including Robert McCollum (Robert Nighthawk), Houston Stackhouse, and Richard “Hacksaw” Harney. Through arrangements made by Carter, Powell made six recordings for the Bluebird label in 1936 under the pseudonym Sonny Boy Nelson, and accompanied wife Mississippi Matilda and harmonica player Robert Hill on numerous others.

Powell moved to Greenville in the 1940s and played with several bands until the early 1950s, when he separated from Matilda. He remained largely musically inactive until 1972 when he performed at the Smithsonian Folklife Festival in Washington, D.C. Powell made few recordings during the following twenty years, with only the Italian LP Police in Mississippi Blues on Albatros being subsequently issued. He rarely performed in public during the remaining years of his life, but often welcomed blues fans and musicians from around the world into his home. Eugene Powell died of a brain hemorrhage caused by a fall at age eighty-nine.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Larkin
Bronner, Simon J. “Sonny Boy Nelson.” Living Blues no. 43 (Summer 1979): 14–23.

Discography: DGRPOWELL, VANCE “TINY”

b. 17 May 1922; Warren, AR
d. 2 February 1994; Oakland, CA

Soulful vocalist who worked in the gospel field in St. Louis before World War II and in the Bay Area after it. In 1964 he turned to secular music but never achieved the success his voice deserved. He recorded for Wax (1964), Ocampo (1965), Early Bird (1968), and TBC (1973).

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Harris
Nations, Opal Louis. “Heaven in My View—The Tiny Powell Story.” Blues & Rhythm no. 148 (April 2000): 4–7.

Discography: LSFP

PRATER, DAVE

PRATER, DAVE

b. 9 May 1937; Ocilla, GA

d. 9 April 1988; Sycamore, GA

Singing partner with Sam Moore (b. October 12, 1935; Miami, FL) in the soul duo Sam & Dave. They met in Florida in 1961 and sang for several years together before signing with Atlantic Records in 1965. Rather than record for Atlantic, however, Sam & Dave were sent to Stax Studios in Memphis, Tennessee, where they were assigned to songwriters Isaac Hayes and David Porter, who became the group's mentors and models. In the latter half of the 1960s, their records practically defined southern soul, with hits like "Hold On! I'm Comin'" (1966, Stax 189), "Soul Man" (1967, Stax 231), and "I Thank You" (1968, Stax 242), combining gospel call-and-response vocals with percussive rhythms in the instruments. The two also had one of the most dynamic stage shows of the southern soul performers. In 1968, Atlantic Records' arrangement with Stax ended and Sam & Dave were one of the casualties. Technically signed to Atlantic, they lost their access to Hayes, Porter, and Stax's premier studio musicians, Booker T and the MGs. In 1970, due in part to Moore and Prater's constant off-stage fighting, the duo broke up. After the Blues Brothers revived Sam & Dave's songs in the late 1970s, the duo made several attempts to reunite but they played their last show together on New Year's 1980. Prater joined singer Sam Daniels in the 1980s to form a new Sam & Dave, but after an arrest for selling crack to a police officer in 1987, his career was over, and he died in a car accident in 1988.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

AMG; Larkin

Goodman, F. "Dave Prater Killed in Car Crash." Rolling Stone no. 526 (19 May 1988): 16.

Selected Recordings

The Very Best of Sam and Dave (1995, Rhino 71871).

See also Moore, Sam

PRESLEY, ELVIS ARON

b. 8 January 1935; Tupelo, MS

d. 16 August 1977; Memphis TN

A cultural icon of the twentieth century, singer Elvis Presley was the first and possibly the most influential rock 'n' roll idol. The early repertoire of Presley included among various genres some blues, rockabilly, and rhythm and blues songs, although he was accompanied by country western musicians such as guitarist Scotty Moore and bassist Bill Black. That synthesis contributed to the birth of rock 'n' roll.

Between 1954 and 1956, Elvis recorded renditions of Arthur Crudup's "That's All Right Mama," "Milk Cow Blues," Ray Charles's "I Got a Woman," Jerry Leiber and Mike Stoller's "Hound Dog," which was first recorded by Big Mama Thornton, and Little Richard's "Tutti Frutti" and "Ready Teddy." Through his career, Elvis also covered Roy Brown's "Good Rockin' Tonight," Big Joe Turner's hit "Shake, Rattle and Roll," Lowell Fulson's "Reconsider Baby," John Davenport and Eddie Cooley's "Fever," plus many gospel standards and spirituals like "Peace in the Valley" (written by Thomas A. Dorsey), and the Orioles' "Crying in the Chapel."

In a jam set for his 1968 television special, Elvis revisited blues standards such as Jimmy Reed's "Baby What You Want Me to Do." In 1967, Elvis had also covered Reed's hit from 1960, "Big Boss Man" (composed by Al Smith and Luther Dixon), and opened his 1970s shows with a rock version of the song "C. C. Rider."

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

AMG (Richie Unterberge); Larkin

Guralnick, Peter. Careless Love: The Unmaking of Elvis Presley. Boston: Little, Brown, 1999.

———. Last Train to Memphis: The Rise of Elvis Presley. Boston: Little, Brown, 1994.

Sauers, Wendy. Elvis Presley: A Complete Reference-Biography, Chronology, Concert List, Filmography, Discography, Vital Documents, Bibliography, Index. New York: McFarland & Company, 1984.

See also Big Boss Man (Hi-Heel Sneakers); C. C. Rider; Charles, Ray; Crudup, Arthur William "Big Boy"; Reed, Jimmy

PRESTON, JIMMY

b. 18 August 1913; Chester, PA

Alto saxophonist and singer active from 1948 to 1950. His 1949 Gotham label single "Rock This Joint" with tenor saxophonist Danny Turner would be covered by early white rock performer Bill Haley in 1952.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)

Discography: AMG (Bill Dahl)PREZ KENNETH

b. Kenneth Kidd, 29 December 1933; Newton, MS
d. 27 June 1995; Chicago, IL

Guitarist and bassist. Moved to Chicago in 1956, learned guitar in the early 1960s, played locally with the Sheppards, then with O. C. Perkins. He recorded on the labels Biscayne and his own Kenneth.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris, Larkin
Dirks, Scott. "Prez Kenneth." Blues & Rhythm no. 102 (September 1995): 10.

Discography: LSFPPRICE, "BIG" WALTER "THE THUNDERBIRD"

b. 2 August 1914; Gonzales, TX

Houston, Texas-based singer, songwriter, and pianist—known mainly as Big Walter "The Thunderbird."

Born Walter Travis Price on a cotton farm in rural Gonzales County, as a child he moved with his family to San Antonio. There he started his career as a vocalist, first performing spirituals with the gospel group the Northern Wonders. Later, while working for the Texas-Pacific and Katy railway companies, he began to sing blues and play barrelhouse-style piano in regional clubs.

In 1955 Price made his first recordings, including "Calling Margie," on San Antonio's TNT label. Shortly after that, he moved to Houston, where he adopted his ornithological nickname. With his band The Thunderbirds he recorded several singles for the Peacock label in 1956–1957, including regionals such as "Shirley Jean," "Gambling Woman," and "Pack Fair and Square." From then through the 1960s, Price subsequently recorded for various other independent labels in Texas, Louisiana, and Mississippi—including Goldband, Myrl, Jet Stream, and Tear Drop. Some of these recordings (including two tracks featuring guitarist Albert Collins) have resurfaced on LP records or CDs released on the Ace, Collectables, Edsel, Flyright, MCA, P-Vine, and Rhino labels.

While remaining based in Houston, Price also has worked as a record store proprietor and disk jockey. As an actor he has appeared in feature films (including 1974's Sugar Hill) and on local theater stages. In 1995 Price contributed the performance of a new original song, "The Preacher Talks and Sings the Blues," to the CD Burning Desire (Connor Ray) by guitarist Jerry Lightfoot, his former protégé.

ROGER WOOD

Bibliography

Harris, Larkin
Wood, Roger. "Big Walter: The Thunderbird Still Flies." Living Blues no. 131 (January/February 1997): 14–23.
———. Down in Houston: Bayou City Blues. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2003.

Discography: LSFPPRICE, LLOYD

b. 9 March 1933; Kenner, LA

An old-fashioned blues shouter in his youth, "Mr. Personality" transformed himself into a stylish and successful pop music crossover, appearing regularly on television programs like The Ed Sullivan Show and Dick Clark's American Bandstand while receiving pervasive radio airplay. Price, who supported ten siblings, started early, forming a teenage band with younger brother Leo, a drummer who wrote a couple of songs for Little Richard. He was spotted by band-leader Dave Bartholomew and signed as a seventeen-year old by Specialty Records at an audition. His 1952 first session, with Fats Domino on piano, produced an enormous hit as "Lawdy Miss Clawdy" topped the R&B charts. Price followed it with four more top ten hits before the Korean war interrupted his career when he was drafted into the Army and sent overseas.

Price didn't record for two years. He returned home and formed his own record label, KRC Records, and "Stagger Lee" made it an immediate success. He soon tired of being an executive, however, and signed with ABC/Paramount, where his singing was embellished with brassy horn sections and backup vocalists. More hits resulted but Price moved on again, forming another label, Double L Records, which was responsible for the debut of Wilson Pickett as a solo artist. When his partner was murdered, Price, who moved to Lagos, Nigeria, disappeared from the music scene in the 1970s. He returned to the United States in the early 1980s. After joining a 1993 European tour package with Little Richard, Jerry Lee Lewis, and others, he reentered the music business and his return generated Lawdy, a compilation of his early Specialty sides.

PRICE, LLOYD

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli
Dahl, Bill. "Lloyd Price: Mr. Personality." Living Blues no. 147 (September/October 1999): 17–19.
McGarvey, Seamus. "Lloyd Price: Mr Personality." Juke Blues no. 24 (Autumn/Winter 1991): 6–10.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

PRICE, SAMMY

- b. 6 October 1908; Honey Grove, TX
d. 14 or 15 April 1992; New York City, NY

Although jazz, blues, and boogie pianist Price gained neither riches nor stardom, his career was hugely successful if measured by longevity, proficiency, steady work, and the respect of his community.

Growing up in Waco and Dallas, Texas, he often saw guitarist Blind Lemon Jefferson (his first exposure to the walking bass rhythms of boogie-woogie). A budding pianist, he joined Alphonso Trent's southwest territorial band as a Charleston dancer in 1925 and danced as well as played piano on the southern TOBA circuit from 1927 to 1929. A quick learner, Price gained show-business savvy and adeptness at various styles during those formative years. He spent most of the 1930s in Kansas City and Detroit before heading to Harlem, his home for the rest of his life except for an early 1950s stretch back in Dallas.

Soon after his 1937 arrival in New York, Price was recruited by J. Mayo Williams to be a house pianist for Decca, where he backed Cow-Cow Davenport, Georgia White, Peetie Wheatstraw, Trixie Smith, Joe Turner, Rosetta Tharpe, and Blue Lu Baker, among others. He also recorded his own sides for Decca with his Texas Bluesicians and with Mezz Mezzrow for the King Jazz label, both during the 1940s. For Savoy Records, he led R&B sessions with King Curtis and Mickey Baker in the mid- to late 1950s. Price also worked steadily in New York as a live performer, playing Harlem and 52nd Street in their heydays, the Metropole from the late 1950s to mid-1960s (backing Henry "Red" Allen), and swing revival spots like the West End and Cookery in the 1970s. In his later years, he became a respected civic leader, active in Democratic Party politics and youth education projects.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

- AMG (Scott Yanow); Chilton; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern Price, Sammy. What Do They Want? A Jazz Autobiography. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1990.
Schuller, Tim. "The Dallas Recollection: Sam Price (1908–1992)." Blues Access no. 12 (1992).

Discography: DGR; Lord; LSFP

Note: The appendix to What Do They Want? (cited above) contains a complete discography, compiled by Bob Weir.

PRIMER, JOHN

- b. 3 March 1945; Camden, MS

Popular guitarist and singer, known for his sideman work with Willie Dixon, Muddy Waters, and Magic Slim, as well as his own performances and recordings.

Primer's early influences included Jimmy Reed, Slim Harpo, and Muddy Waters, as well as a guitar-playing cousin named Percy Flax. He did not play professionally in Mississippi, but a few years after he moved to Chicago in 1963 he began to gig around the West Side and on Maxwell Street, where he played in the band of guitarist Little Pat Rushing. In about 1974 he joined the house band at Theresa's Tavern, 4801 South Indiana, one of Chicago's most fabled neighborhood blues clubs. There he played alongside guitarist Sammy Lawhorn, whom he credits as an important mentor. The band at Theresa's accompanied myriad blues artists both famous and obscure, including Junior Wells, Buddy Guy, James Cotton, vocalist Andrew "Big Voice" Odom, and many others. Primer first recorded as a frontman for the Wolf label in 1991, while still a member of Magic Slim's Teardrops. (A late 1980s performance, taped while Primer and the Teardrops were warming up the stage for Slim at a club in Lincoln, Nebraska, has also been released.) He has since cut for Telarc and Atlantic, as well.

One of Primer's most distinctive characteristics, both onstage and on record, is his knack for mixing well-known standards with more obscure, yet interesting, material in his sets. He is also an effective songwriter on his own.

DAVID WHITEIS

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin Hoffman, Larry. "Catchin' Up—John Primer." Living Blues no. 137 (1998): 9.
Ulry, Lois. "John Primer." Magic Blues no. 2 (1991): 22–29.

Discography: AMGPRIMICH, GARY

b. 20 April 1958; Chicago, IL

The hard-working harpist and singer, one of the most active touring performers of the 1990s, was raised in Gary, Indiana, but his blues schooling came elsewhere. Primich learned his lessons well, developing a blues harmonica prowess that is unusually expansive in style and technique. Although quite capable of bedrock blues, especially classic Chicago stylings, Primich created a customized sound that also incorporated country and jazz phrasings and sensibilities. He was able to further personalize it by writing most of his material and handling the majority of the production on his recordings.

Primich played in Chicago clubs and on Maxwell Street corners at night while attending the University of Indiana. He visited Austin, heard the legendary house band at Antone's backing Otis Rush, and relocated his base of operations. Primich formed the Mannish Boys with former Mothers of Invention drummer Jimmy Carl Black and the band soon attracted an Austin following for its unpredictable live shows. Primich, however, moved on to a solo career with an eponymous debut album in 1991 on Amazing Records. He followed it in 1992 with My Pleasure, produced by West Coast harp hero James Harman. Company Man, on Black Top Records, was his most well-rounded effort as it included everything from jazz-inflected numbers to acoustic roots material featuring Steve James on mandolin. Mr. Freeze, released in 1995 on Flying Fish, was another success. Primich recorded Dog House Music in 2002 and also did a guest spot on Long John Hunter's 2003 comeback One Foot in Texas on Doc Blues Records.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMGPROFESSOR LONGHAIR

b. Henry Roeland Byrd, 19 December 1918; Bogalusa, LA

d. 30 January 1980; New Orleans, LA

Pianist, vocalist, composer. An idiosyncratic piano genius who incorporated Caribbean rhythms into his music while singing and whistling in a cracked voice self-described as "freak unique" could only become a legend in New Orleans. And "Fess," with his rambunctious left hand digging deep into "rhumba-boogie" island rhythms while his right added rolling R&B flourishes, not only achieved legendary status during his lifetime but also became the international personification of the sound and sensibility of his hometown music scene.

One of the Crescent City's most beloved musicians, Professor Longhair was, and remains, a core component of New Orleans music. His keyboard creations still resonate from bandstands on a nightly basis while his musical approach and attitude permeate the work of every New Orleans musician, pianist or otherwise. The intensely eccentric Professor Longhair was unlike any other musician the city produced, yet he was somehow representative of them all.

Swamp blues pianist Marcia Ball flatly stated "Fess is what New Orleans piano is all about. It's not just those wonderful runs and rhythms; it's all that life experience and personality of his that comes through so clearly. You can hear the entire city in his playing. Fess was New Orleans." He was also a boxer, a cook, a card shark, and, ultimately, a member of the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame.

The Professor was out of school after the third grade. He ultimately became a street entertainer, tap dancing for tips on the sidewalks in front of Bourbon Street nightspots. He learned to play piano, guitar, and drums as a teenager but was bored with the drums and decided the guitar required too much upkeep. He later said Depression Era work with the Civilian Conservation Corps, where he spent more time entertaining fellow CCC workers on the piano than doing hard labor, probably put him on the road to a professional music career.

There were a lot of detours and distractions on his path to professional success, beginning with an Army stint during World War II that put him out of action until his discharge in 1943. It wasn't until the late 1940s, when he sat in on piano at the Caldonia Club while Dave Bartholomew's band was taking a break, that he would make a name for himself. Due to the long hair sported by his band that band's name became Professor Longhair and the Four Hairs, the first in a long line of curious and/or inscrutable performing names he employed. His signature song, “Mardi Gras in New Orleans,” was first recorded in 1949 under the band name of Professor Longhair and the Shuffling Hungarians. In a later incarnation, recorded in 1959, it served as the theme song of the Mardi Gras festivities for the next half century.

In the early 1950s, “Fess” was a pervasive presence on the New Orleans scene, although since he often was playing and recording under a variety of names he wasn’t always easy to keep track of. Under the name of Roy Byrd & His Blues Jumpers he recorded his first and only national R&B hit, the hilarious “Bald Head,” a year after the release of the original “Mardi Gras in New Orleans.” He suffered a minor stroke in mid-decade but kept pumping out the hits, releasing quintessential Crescent City classics like “Tipitina,” “Ball the Wall,” and “In the Night” on an assortment of record labels.

Professor Longhair’s popularity in New Orleans at this point was unprecedented as his brilliant pianistic synthesis of styles produced a personalized musical gumbo that blended everything from street parade music to calypso to blues boogies. His songs could seemingly be heard on every block of New Orleans but their unusual nature and regional emphasis meant they were rarely heard outside the city.

With the exception of “Big Chief” in 1964, his musical career as Professor Longhair finally stalled and then almost disappeared in the 1960s. So he returned to his previous occupation, playing cards for a living. By the end of the decade his only connection to the music business was a job as a janitor in a record store. After being rediscovered by Rounder Records and making the first of a series of triumphant appearances at the fledgling New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival in 1971, the last decade of his life was one of belated commercial recognition and increased artistic achievement.

A series of Professor Longhair recordings was issued in the 1970s, some the result of new sessions and others the product of compilations of his early work. They received wide exposure and rave reviews and Fess suddenly found himself in demand far beyond the New Orleans city limits. He toured overseas, headlining the Montreux Jazz Festival in 1973 and in 1975, and appeared on a PBS television special, performing with New Orleans admirers Dr. John and Earl King, and in the documentary Piano Players Rarely Ever Play Together. It was a Crescent City tribute, however, that meant the most to him as a group of fervent fans opened a nightclub in his honor, naming it Tipitina’s after his classic early 1950s single. His final album, Crawfish Fiesta, released the day after he died in his sleep of a heart attack, was the first winner of the W. C. Handy Awards’ best traditional album category.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Jones, Tad. “Living Blues Interview: Professor Longhair.” Living Blues no. 26 (March/April 1976): 16–29.
White, Timothy. “The Professor Longhair Story: Lessons of a Rock & Roll Legend.” Rolling Stone no. 313 (March 20, 1980).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Rum and Coke (ca. 2002, Tomato TOM-2041).

PRYOR, JAMES EDWARD “SNOOKY”

b. 15 September 1921; Lambert, MS

James Edward “Snooky” Pryor, the son of minister James Edward Pryor, Sr., and mother Willie Terry, was born in the small Delta town of Lambert, Mississippi, fifteen miles east of Clarksdale. Pryor, along with childhood friend Jimmy Rogers, was playing harmonica by age fourteen, inspired initially by local street musician John Blissett and the recordings of John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson I. Nicknamed “Bubba,” he was also influenced by watching Aleck Miller “Sonny Boy Williamson II” perform in the streets of nearby Vance, Mississippi, and by listening to his KFFA “King Biscuit Time” radio broadcast from Helena, Arkansas.

Forbidden to play blues by his Baptist father, he secretly joined guitarist James Scott to play house parties in the area. At age sixteen, he left home and during the next three years lived and played in various parts of the South, including Memphis, Arkansas, and Missouri. Pryor arrived in Chicago in 1940 and stayed for almost a year before returning briefly to Mississippi. Back in Chicago in 1941 with his new bride Luella, Pryor was soon drafted into the Army during World War II and was stationed in the South Pacific. On the island of New Caledonia, he was assigned to play bugle over the PA system, but soon replaced reveille with Woody Herman’s “Flyin’ Home” on his harmonica over the loudspeaker. Later he entertained troops at USO shows throughout the region. He was transferred to Fort Sheridan near Chicago in May 1945 and frequently sat in at various South Side clubs, often in uniform, with musicians such as Sonny Boy Williamson I and Homesick James. Discharged the following November and inspired by his experiments with amplification in the Army, Pryor bought a small amplifier, microphone, and two-speaker system and began performing with it on Maxwell Street. This significant innovation established him as an early pioneer of amplified harmonica and postwar Chicago blues.

Pryor formed his first band in Chicago in 1946 with cousins Floyd (who named him "Snooky") and Moody Jones and the following year made several groundbreaking recordings for the small Planet label. The single "Snooky and Moody's Boogie," backed with "Telephone Blues" and issued in 1948, was a landmark release in Chicago blues and helped shape the new postwar sound. Pryor went on to record for a variety of independent Chicago labels throughout the next fifteen years including JOB, Parrot, and Vee-Jay. Frustrated with the rough, low-paying life of a bluesman, he dropped out of the music scene in the mid-1960s to become a carpenter and by 1967 relocated to Ullin, Illinois, to raise his large family. A chance encounter with the editors of Living Blues magazine in 1971 prompted a brief comeback that included a European tour and recordings for Today, Big Bear, and BluesWay in 1973. Remaining fairly inactive for the next fifteen years, Pryor was coaxed out of retirement in 1987 and recorded for Blind Pig. Throughout the 1990s, he recorded albums for Antone's, Electro-Fi, and Blind Pig, and played sporadically at clubs and festivals, often with musician sons Earl and Richard "Rip Lee."

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
O'Neal, Amy. "Snooky Pryor." Living Blues no. 6 (Autumn 1971): 4-6.
O'Neal, Jim, Steve Wisner, and David Nelson. "I Started the Big Noise Around Chicago." Living Blues no. 123 (September/October 1995): 9-21.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

- Mind Your Own Business* (1996, Antone's/Discovery CD 74708).
Can't Stop Blowin' (1999, Electro-Fi CD 3359).

PRYSOCK, ARTHUR

- b. 2 January 1923; Spartanburg, SC
d. 21 June 1997; Hamilton, Bermuda

Like Billy Eckstine, Johnny Hartman, and many other African American crooners, Arthur Prysock's best singing came in an era when opportunities for black balladeers were limited while their white counterparts enjoyed major success doing identical romantic material. But Prysock could also handle lyrically demanding and musically complex jazz material, and be just as effective doing blues and R&B. The brother of saxophonist Red Prysock, Arthur became a star in the mid-1940s thanks to being featured on several Decca hits backed by Buddy Johnson's band. He went solo in 1952, and soon had a hit with "I Didn't Sleep a Wink Last Night," a tune a bit more to the double-entendre side than customary for Prysock. During the 1950s and 1960s, he became known for his powerful, yet smooth leads on such tunes as "I Worry 'Bout You," "The Very Thought of You," and "It's Too Late Baby, It's Too Late." He also ranked among the most popular live entertainers on the chitlin circuit, particularly for late-night engagements.

Prysock's two main labels during his peak period were Old Town and Verve, and he also became one of the first black entertainers to have a television show in the 1960s, though it didn't last very long. After a long dry spell in terms of national hits, Prysock became a disco sensation in 1976 with "When Love Is New." Almost a decade later came another career revival with a cover of the R&B hit "A Rockin' Good Way" and a Milestone LP of the same name. A Lowenbrau jingle also helped keep Prysock on the national radar screen, and he had two more fine albums for Milestone in the late 1980s.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

- Larkin
Dahl, Bill. "Arthur Prysock" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 135 (September/October 1997): 56-57.

Discography: Lord

PRYSOCK, WILBERT "RED"

- b. 2 February 1926; Greensboro, NC
d. 19 July 1993; Chicago, IL

Tenor saxophonist, jump-blues performer. Prysock, brother of vocalist Arthur Prysock, was king of the one-note riffing style solos. He took up the saxophone at age seventeen, and learned to play while in the service. In 1947 he joined Tiny Grimes's band. In the early 1950s, after arriving in New York, Red joined Tiny Bradshaw's band, and got his first big break when he was featured on the band's recording of "Soft," an R&B smash hit. In 1953, Red briefly joined Cootie Williams's band. In 1954, he recorded his first two singles as a leader for Mercury, "Jump, Red, Jump" and "Blow Your Horn." Prysock gained tremendous exposure after landing the gig on Alan Freed's Rock 'n' Roll Jubilee Ball in New York City in 1955. That same year he enjoyed his biggest hit, "Hand Clappin'." In the 1960s, he played on numerous sessions for the King and Chess labels. In 1971, he teamed up with his older brother and they worked together for the next twenty years.

PRYSOCK, WILBERT "RED"

DENNIS TAYLOR

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: Lord

PUGH, JOE BENNIE "FORREST CITY JOE"

b. 10 July 1926; Hughes, AR
d. 3 April 1960; Horseshoe Lake, AR

Harmonica player in the style of John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson. Based in Crittenden County, Arkansas, for nearly his whole life, Pugh recorded a studio session for Aristocrat in 1948, then a field recording session for Alan Lomax in 1959. He died unexpectedly in a truck accident.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

PULLUM, JOE

b. 25 December 1905; unknown place, AL
d. 6 January 1964; Los Angeles, CA

Blues singer and pianist. Joe Pullum was a suave vocalist in the Texas Barrelhouse style with an extremely high vocal range. His 1934 "Black Gal What Makes Your Head So Hard?" was such a big hit that Pullum recorded at least six versions of it. In 1936, after his final Bluebird session, Pullum moved to Los Angeles, California, where he worked as a presser for the clothing manufacturer Woolen Mills for twenty-five years. While in Los Angeles Joe Pullum recorded for Swing Time in 1951. Pullum made his last (unissued) recordings for Specialty Records in 1953. On January 6, 1964, Joe Pullum suffered cardiac failure and died.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Discography

DGR; LSFP

PURITAN

There are three different Puritan labels, produced in the early 1920s by United Phonographs Corporation, New York Recording Laboratories (both subsidiaries of the Wisconsin Chair Co.), and the Bridgeport Die & Machine Co. The UPC and NYRL versions were distributed in the midwest, the BD&M version in the northeast, drawing on a common pool of masters. Its significant African American catalog was mainly from Paramount including their first blues singer, Flo Bert, and Alberta Hunter. Catalog numbers in each series were synchronized until 1923, but then began to diverge until eventually BD&M established a separate Puretone label. NYRL's Puritan survived until 1927.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Vreede, Max E. "Puritanism in Discography." Storyville no. 89 (1980): 178.

Discography: DGR; Sutton

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

P-VINE SPECIAL

Record label of Blues Interactions of Tokyo, Japan. Started in October 1976 by Yasufumi Higurashi and Akira Kochi, it has specialized in leasing limited edition runs of American material for high-quality reissues and by this means has brought back to the market much important and obscure blues not otherwise available. The first release was by Calvin Leavy. In the 1970s and 1980s, reissues from Chess figured largely alongside material derived from smaller labels such as Chance, United/States, and Elko. In the CD era, Gus Cannon's Stax album, private recordings of Magic Sam (later released by Delmark), a four-CD set of recordings from Detroit, reissues from Bobo Jenkins's Big Star label, Texas anthologies drawn from Macy's and Freedom, and much else, have kept the label in the forefront of blues reissuing. The label also releases for the Japanese market blues albums that are freely available in the West.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

P-Vine Special website, <http://www.bls-act.co.jp/newrelease/index.html> (accessed December 12, 2004).

PYE/NIXA

A significant British jazz label, founded in 1950 by Hilton Nixon, Nixa recorded Big Bill Broonzy, Brownie McGhee & Sonny Terry, and Josh White on visits to London. After control passed to Pye, the label became Pye-Nixa. In the 1960s, Pye held the British license for Chess, issuing first on Pye International before establishing a British Chess label.

HOWARD RYE

Q

QRS

A manufacturer of piano rolls founded in Chicago about 1916 by Melville Clark, the inventor of the “marking piano.” The acronym’s original meaning, if any, is unknown but supposedly it became known as “Quality Reigns Supreme.” Records, derived from Gennett, were first issued in 1919–1923. The label’s blues significance came with the 7000 Race series of 1928–1929, directed by Arthur E. Satherley and notably featuring Sara Martin, Clifford Gibson, and Sluefoot Joe. Original material was recorded at Gennett’s Long Island studios. The company has continued to produce piano rolls under various managements.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

- Marschall, Fritz. “Country Blues on QRS.” Storyville no. 15 (February/March 1968): 10–11.
- Wyler, Michael, and B. Kumm. “QRS Past and Present.” Storyville 7 (October 1966): 1.

Discography: DGR; Sutton

- Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

QUALLS, HENRY

- b. 8 July 1934; Cedar Grove, Elmo, TX
d. 7 December 2003; Dallas, Texas

A lifelong resident of Elmo, Texas, singer/guitarist Henry Qualls developed a raw electric and bottleneck guitar style, inspired by local performances from Frankie Lee Sims and Li’l Son Jackson. A true exponent of the rural Texas blues tradition, Qualls made his first recordings in 1994.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography

- Qualls, Henry. Blues from Elmo, Texas (1994, Dallas Blues Society Records DBS8901).

QUATTLEBAUM, DOUG

- b. 22 January 1927; Florence, SC
d. ca. 1990; Philadelphia, PA

Related to Arthur Crudup and influenced by Blind Boy Fuller, Douglas Elijah Quattlebaum moved to Philadelphia circa 1941 and took up the guitar seriously; a fine, powerful, and impassioned singer, he was a street musician (selling ice cream) and worked occasionally as a preacher. Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, he toured with a number of gospel groups, making recordings with some of them.

QUATTLEBAUM, DOUG

He recorded three blues songs for Gotham (1953) then, with a repertoire of country and urban blues, R&B hits, and gospel songs, for Prestige/Bluesville (1961) but, surprisingly, could not benefit from the blues revival of the 1960s. He entered the ministry in 1971.

ROBERT SACRÉ

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

If You've Ever Been Mistreated (1997, Testament TCD 6003; reissue).

R

R AND B (1)

Operated in Hollywood, California, in 1954–1955 by Larry Goldberg and Al Schlesinger, with artists Chuck Higgins and Ray Agee.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

R AND B (2)

Operated in New York City in 1958 by Fred Huckman and Doc Pomus, with artists The Crowns, Laurel Aitken, and Wilfred Edwards.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

RACHELL, YANK

b. James Rachell, 16 March 1906; Brownsville, TN
d. 9 April 1997; Indianapolis, IN

Singer and mandolinist/guitarist, known for his imaginative playing and his work with Sleepy John Estes and John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson.

Yank Rachell was born to George Rachell and Lula Taylor. Birth years cited by researchers have been 1906, 1908, and 1910. He got his first mandolin by trading away a pig, but he also learned guitar, violin, and harmonica. His earliest musical inspiration was his uncle Daniel Taylor, but he was soon traveling with Hambone Willie Newbern as well as working local house parties, fish fries, and country suppers in the area around Brownsville.

He met Sleepy John Estes in the early 1920s and by the late 1920s, when they began recording for Victor, they had formed the Three J’s Jug Band with pianist Jab Jones. Most of the vocals from the 1929–1930 Victor sessions were by Estes, backed by Yank’s piercing mandolin lines and Jones’s pounding piano. Yank’s three vocals were strong performances, and his “Expressman Blues” was an arresting blues record by any standard.

Yank returned to farming in Brownsville during the early 1930s, but he returned to the studio in 1934, this time playing both guitar and mandolin for Vocalion and the American Record Corporation label group. He was accompanied by guitarist Dan Smith and of the twenty-one sides they cut, only six were released, and those cuts on which he played mandolin remain unissued.

In 1938, he participated in the legendary Aurora, Illinois, Bluebird sessions of 1938. Some of his best mandolin work can be heard on “Haven’t Seen No Whiskey,” with vocals by Joe Williams (a different singer than Big Joe Williams), and it is these sessions that mark the beginning of his association with John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson. Rachell recorded two more sessions for Victor’s Bluebird label, both accompanied by Sonny Boy Williamson, Washboard Sam, and various washtub bass players.

While no mandolin appeared at these sessions, Yank's approach to guitar was unusual and distinctive. His backing lines often sound like lead guitar played on the bass strings. Listen to the musical break in ".38 Pistol Blues" for a good example of this. Other instances can be sampled on the last bars of "Insurance Man Blues" or on the second musical break in "Tappin' That Thing." Yank was also an imaginative composer, and "Insurance Man Blues" is an intriguing tale of the "industrial insurance man," the agent who would call at the homes of poor African Americans to collect the few-cents-a-week premiums.

Yank moved to Indianapolis in 1958 and began recording again for Delmark in the early 1960s, reunited with Sleepy John Estes and harp player Hammie Nixon. He also toured the country and performed overseas during these blues revival years. He was an active performer for seven decades and played right up until his death in 1997.

PAUL GARON

Bibliography

Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Congress, Richard. Blues Mandolin Man: The Life and Music of Yank Rachell. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 2001.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

".38 Pistol Blues" (1941, Bluebird 8732).
Mandolin Blues (1986, Delmark DD-606).

RACIAL ISSUES AND THE BLUES

Racism directed toward individuals of African descent in America dates from the early colonial era with the advent of a patriarchal ideology that supported the institution of slavery. Supporters of slavery used racist arguments in their attempt to justify their economic system. After the abolition of slavery, these racist arguments continued long after the Civil War. Politicians used a racist agenda to end Reconstruction in the South and establish Jim Crow, or "separate but equal," laws. Blues music eventually reflected the ordeal of Jim Crow racism for American blacks.

Racist arguments supporting slavery can be traced to the seventeenth-century British colonies in America. The first proclamation establishing slavery in the colonies came from the governor of Connecticut in 1638. Massachusetts sanctioned slavery in 1641, Virginia in 1661, and Maryland in 1663.

The early laws of New England specified that individuals of African descent could be denied freedom, whereas white indentured servants were allowed to buy their way out of servitude. The arguments for slavery were based both on economics and on religious thinking. The return on the investment in slave labor was profitable, and, in the minds of many Christians of that time, God predetermined the sanction of slavery.

While slavery in New England ended in 1790, it proliferated across the South during the eighteenth century and expanded with the development of the frontier as it moved west toward the Mississippi Valley during the early nineteenth century. The ideal of this white patriarchal system in the South was based on the premise that the male planter treated his dependents responsibly and humanely. The grim reality of this system was very much the opposite.

The ideal of the planter's wife also contributed to the moral definition of slave society. The white wife was ideally virtuous and sexually pure while the slave woman was considered more sexually passionate. This difference in perception became another racial issue in slave society, as the planter's wife was elevated to a higher moral position. The planter, however, often had his way with his female slaves and fathered children with them while his wife was forced to ignore this moral transgression.

Laws that forbade black men from having sexual relations with white women further complicated the racial tensions of slave society. Even if a black man were only suspected of having attracted the attention of a white woman, whites punished him brutally. Slave society dictated hypocritically that white southern womanhood had to be protected and the mixing of races prevented.

White planters advanced the racist argument that blacks were inferior and not able to live a free existence. For their own well-being, planters needed an orderly social system to control their slave chattel. Slave owners presented this argument to the rest of the country as a justification for slavery. Even while reform movements advocating the abolition of slavery took hold in other parts of the country, the South was too isolated and its educational effort too restricted to allow this kind of public discourse.

During the period of Reconstruction in the South, post-bellum state governments made an effort to include blacks in society. The federal government in the form of the Freedman's Bureau mandated that ex-slaves should be able to sign contractual work agreements, to vote, and even to seek elected office. Schools and colleges, whose purpose was to educate its newly freed citizens, appeared in the South. Blacks began the arduous task of building their lives as free people. In this process, they also began to prove wrong all of the racial arguments that had been used against them during the slave years. Consequently, a prospering black middle class began to emerge in many of the cities of the South by the end of the nineteenth century.

The mind-set of the white planter class persisted, however, and white politicians began the effort of ending Reconstruction and promoting the concept of “separate but equal” in society. The same arguments that were used to establish and maintain a slave system in the South were again used, this time to promote the separation of the races. Not even the Populist movement of the late nineteenth century or the Progressive movement of the early twentieth century could stop the unjust and tireless mind-set of racism.

The repudiation of racial equality gained growing support in the states across the South and culminated in the 1896 Supreme Court case of Plessy v. Ferguson. In this case, the court ruled that segregation was not in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution that assured blacks of their civil rights as long as blacks had the same accommodations as whites. The resulting reality was a country divided into two separate and unequal societies.

Before Plessy v. Ferguson, blacks had worked hard to establish themselves as successful, participating members of society in the South. That would change tragically in the decades to follow. By 1908, seven states in the South had made changes in their constitutions that took away black voting rights. Poll taxes, violence, and intimidation served the same purpose of disfranchisement of black voting rights in four other states in the region.

Blacks came to find more and more exclusions in their lives throughout the first half of the twentieth century. If they did not accept these lines of exclusion, they often paid the highest price for striving for equality. To confront these racist exclusions, black intellectuals, business leaders, professionals, attorneys, and others came together to form the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People or the NAACP in 1909. They worked hard to turn the tide of racism, but they did so against a landscape of terror and violence.

White supremacists were ruthless in their terror. They lynched, shot, drowned, bombed, set on fire, beat, and buried anyone who threatened their view of a racially divided society. No one was safe from this threat—they violently killed men, women, and children from all walks of life. They killed because blacks dared to vote, attend church, preach against injustice, wear the uniform of the United States military, walk down a street, or use a public restroom.

The rise of Jim Crow was not confined to the South. Segregation came to be a part of American life all across the country. Even when blacks looked for a new place to live outside of the South, they encountered racial tension and violence. During the summer following the end of the First World War, many blacks thought that they had earned the right of inclusion by fighting for democracy in Europe. They instead found themselves victims of riots in cities across the United States. The worst riot of that summer occurred in Chicago where a young black man was hit by a brick for swimming in a section of Lake Michigan designated for “whites only.” More than thirty people were killed in the four days of rioting that followed, hundreds were injured, and hundreds of homes were destroyed.

The events of the Chicago riot inspired the blues song, “East Chicago Blues,” recorded by Pinetop and Lindberg Sparks in 1932. Also in this song is a reference to the East Saint Louis, Illinois, riot of 1917 that marked another incident of northern urban racial intolerance.

East Chicago is on fire, East Saint Louis is burnin' down. . . .

The perils of Jim Crow were the subject of a number of blues songs. Charles Davenport recorded “Jim Crow Blues” in 1927; Joshua White recorded “Jim Crow Train” in 1941; and Huddie Leadbetter recorded “Jim Crow” in 1943.

Even in the recording industry, blacks found themselves labeled by race. When Mamie Smith made “Crazy Blues” in 1920, the first vocal recording using the blues form, it was called a “race record” and not a blues record. Throughout the twenties and the thirties, race records would designate all forms of black music whether it was blues, jazz, or ragtime.

Social progress was slow for blacks in their quest for freedom and inclusion during the first half of the twentieth century. In 1954, attorney Thurgood Marshall, chief counsel for the NAACP, successfully argued the case of Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka before the Supreme Court. This landmark case overturned the decision of Plessy v. Ferguson. It went on to state that separate facilities were inherently unequal and thus rejected by the court.

The nonviolent protest movement of Reverend Martin Luther King, Jr., followed Brown v. Board of Education. King showed to the world the injustices of racial violence used against blacks, and his effort changed public opinion in the United States. After a decade of activism by King and others, President Lyndon Johnson signed into law the Civil Rights Act in 1964 and the Voting Rights Act in 1965.

As the U.S. government followed a more inclusive course during this postwar period, black culture began to emerge as well. Blues was no longer music exclusively for blacks. Rock 'n' roll was a musical form rooted in the blues. As rock music grew in popularity, so did interest in the blues. Elvis Presley and Eric Clapton acknowledged their debt to the blues. The decade of the sixties not only saw progress in many issues regarding race, but it also saw the rediscovery of blues music by a wider audience outside the black community.

RACIAL ISSUES AND THE BLUES

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

DGR

- Crew, Spencer R. Field to Factory: Afro-American Migration 1915–1940. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution, 1987.
- Crow, Jeffrey J., Paul D. Escott, and Charles L. Flynn, Jr. Race, Class, and Politics in Southern History. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1989.
- Dittmer, John. Black Georgia in the Progressive Era: 1900–1920. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1977.
- Griffin, Paul R. Seeds of Racism in the Soul of America. Cleveland, OH: The Pilgrim Press, 1999.
- Hacker, Andrew. Two Nations. New York: Ballantine Books, 1995.
- Harris, Eddy L. South of Haunted Dreams. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1993.
- Henretta, James A., W. Elliott Brownlee, David Brody, and Susan Ware. America's History. 2nd ed. New York: Worth Publishers, 1993.
- Hobson, Fred. But Now I See. Baton Rouge: Louisiana University State Press, 1999.
- Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning. New York: Horizon Press, 1960.
- . The Story of the Blues. London: Chilton Books, 1969.

RADCLIFF, BOBBY

b. 22 September 1951; Bethesda, MD

Guitarist who was raised in Maryland/Washington, DC, area. In 1967 he traveled to Chicago and sought Magic Sam, who then introduced him to other Chicago musicians. He moved to New York City in 1977, and has been a Black Top label artist since 1989.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Santelli

Discography: AMG

RADIO

The blues radio format is defined most eloquently by blues music itself. Blues songwriters often explore subjects that deal with real-life situations, and it is not uncommon for listeners to contact a blues host between selections to share their testimony after hearing a certain blues selection. Says renowned King Biscuit Time disk jockey Sonny Payne, it is the “history of the African American people” surviving enslavement, post-reconstruction, and legal segregation, songs of human beings just dealing with life. The unsugarcoated “facts of life” themes often found in the lyrics can be beneficial, nonetheless. The music helps people forget their problems, and it imbues the human spirit with strength. Like other musical genres, the blues format can serve as a cathartic experience. “The blues is the truth,” according to the late legendary record promoter Dave Clark.

Radio Blues and Disk Jockeys

Bessie Smith sang the blues live on WMC, a Memphis, Tennessee, radio station, as early as 1924. The regular remote broadcasts from The Palace on Beale Street appear to have continued until sometime in the 1930s. The legacy of a blues presence on Memphis radio programming eventually influenced the owners of WDIA radio, the shape of black radio, and lives of WDIA personalities B. B. King and Rufus Thomas, and local listener Elvis Presley, whose first commercial success was the recording of Arthur Crudup’s “That’s Alright Mama.”

In the early 2000s, WMPR-FM in Jackson, Mississippi, devoted eleven hours per day to blues. Most blues programs are limited to certain time blocks during a radio station’s weekly air schedule. One exception is WAVN-AM in Memphis, which in 2003 devoted its entire program schedule to blues. Many noncommercial radio stations (public, community, and college) have increasingly programmed blues for the past thirty years. At least one radio station in many major markets and college communities can be found devoting selected block schedules to blues. National Public Radio downlinks via satellite a blues program, Portraits in Blue, to its affiliates each week. The Handy Foundation in Memphis circles the globe to record live blues concerts and syndicates the performances in a magazine format called Beale St. Caravan. Blues programming can be heard on the Internet, and the trend is growing rapidly. Emerging satellite services such as Sirius and XM had begun to provide continuous blues programming by the early twenty-first century.

Disk jockeys who work in the radio blues format often travel to blues festivals around the country to keep up with current trends and developments. They exchange ideas, conduct interviews with historical and leading artists, and then broadcast them on their local blues programs back home. Such periodicals as Living Blues and Big City Blues can provide invaluable cultural information for the program producer. It is fair to say that most men and women who join the still-loose network of blues programmers take that step seriously. In essence, they become part of a respected culture that was pioneered by men and women who struggled valiantly to regain their human dignity and make life better for everyone. A serious blues disk jockey will know—and play—the music of Aleck Miller “Sonny Boy Williamson II,” Robert Lockwood, Muddy Waters, and B. B. King. And the blues enthusiast—whether disk jockey or listener—might consider revisiting or discovering the rich origin of the blues radio format, which began in the Mississippi Delta “On the Arkansas Side.”

Chicago: Al Benson

During the early 1940s in Chicago, Al Benson (following the precedent of Jack L. Cooper, another Chicago entrepreneur) began purchasing blocks of time on several different radio stations to program black music, much of which was blues. An important key to Benson’s success was the format he designed, which permitted him and his hired announcers to speak the language of many transplanted southerners and to promote the products of sponsors. His use of recorded blues music and his training of young broadcasters such as Vivian Carter and Sid McCoy appears to have accompanied the rise in popularity of black disk jockeys and blues programming. Carter later cofounded Vee-Jay Records and helped develop the legendary Jimmy Reed. She launched the Beatles’ first recordings in the United States. Benson’s block programs, broadcast on various stations, remain a major contribution to the blues radio format. By 1947 there were at least seventeen blues-oriented radio programs being broadcast in the United States. Several programs aired on various stations in Los Angeles, and Leroy White and others were very popular in Detroit.

Helena, Arkansas: King Biscuit Time

Helena, Arkansas, located on the west bank of the Mississippi River, is a small city that became home to the longest-running blues program on radio, King Biscuit Time. Shortly after KFFA Radio was established in 1941, bluesmen Aleck Miller “Sonny Boy Williamson II” and Robert Lockwood met with their white childhood friend, Sonny Payne, who worked at the station and helped get them on the air. Sam Anderson, the station manager and part owner, agreed to sell Williamson and Lockwood a block of airtime, but the blues duo had no money. Anderson referred them to a potential sponsor, Max Moore, a wholesale grocer who needed to sell a huge backlog of flour from his warehouse. A financial deal was struck, and a tight program structure was agreed upon.

Williamson and Lockwood opened their fifteen-minute show Monday through Friday with a theme song that was followed by an Anderson voiceover announcement: “Pass the biscuits boys, it’s King Biscuit Time.” Mixing performances of blues songs with casual conversation about where the duo would be performing in the area, Williamson and Lockwood were a success. Listeners in a hundred-mile radius of KFFA’s transmitter embraced the blues program and quickly purchased all of Moore’s existing supply of King Biscuit Flour.

KFFA Radio has continued broadcasting King Biscuit Time, uninterrupted, for six decades and had logged nearly 14,000 blues shows by the turn of the century. Robert Lockwood and the late Sonny Boy Williamson have grown into legends in both the blues and radio programming history. The show made Max Moore wealthy and the late Sam Anderson’s KFFA world famous. Sonny Payne now hosts King Biscuit Time in a half-hour disk jockey format. Visitors from around the world frequently stop in at the Delta Cultural Center in Helena to catch the program, 12:00 to 12:30 P.M. Some guests even get a chance to be interviewed live by Payne. Each year up to 90,000 blues lovers from around the world flock to Helena, Arkansas, to attend a blues festival in honor of King Biscuit Time and the return of Robert Lockwood to center stage.

Nashville: WLAC Radio

Francis Hill, a white woman, sang the blues live on WLAC in the late 1930s. Then, sometime in the mid-1940s two black record promoters were welcomed into the WLAC studios by Gene Nobles. One of the promoters is believed to have been Dave Clark. Nobles, white and handicapped, held down the night shift for WLAC’s 50,000-watt clear channel signal, which blanketed the South, Midwest, parts of Canada, and the Caribbean. After Nobles began playing a few of the promoters’ black records several nights a week, listeners began writing from as far away as Detroit, Michigan, and the Bahamas for more blues and boogie. Nobles came to the attention of Randy Wood, a white businessman in Gallatin, Tennessee, about forty miles away. Wood bought some advertising spots to promote the sale of several thousand records by black artists that he discovered after purchasing an appliance store. Again, the audience responded and bought out Wood’s phonograph stock.

Aleck Miller “Sonny Boy Williamson II” on the set of King Biscuit Time on KFFA, Helena, Arkansas. King Biscuit Time, which debuted in 1941, is still on the air today, now hosted by Sonny Payne. (Photo by Ivey S. Gladin, courtesy of Frank Driggs Collection)

Gene Nobles was soon hosting a blues-oriented program on a radio station that many African Americans referred to simply as “Randy’s” (WLAC). The disk jockey–run show focused on promoting a COD mail-order system operated by Randy’s Record Shop in Gallatin, Tennessee. The primary pitch involved promoting sets of phonograph records made up of five or six unrelated 78-rpm singles. To promote sales, one or two records were played each night from various sets called “specials” (e.g., “The Treasure of Love Special” or “The Old Time Gospel Special”).

Ernie’s Record Mart and Buckley’s Record Shop, both in Nashville, soon imitated the successful Randy Wood format. Each store bought time blocks, which were spread among WLAC’s additional blues-oriented programming with traditional spots and per-inquiry advertisements. By the early 1950s WLAC Radio’s entire nighttime schedule was bought out. John Richburg, Bill Allen, and Herman Grizzard joined Nobles to formulate a powerful programming block from 9:00 p.m. to early morning, Monday through Sunday. All of the disk jockeys were white, but they addressed the audience fairly, respected the culture, and won acceptance and trust from a largely, though not exclusively, black audience. Don Whitehead, an African American, joined the news staff in the 1960s.

Memphis: WDIA Radio

John Pepper and Bert Ferguson, two white businessmen, found themselves unable to attract white listeners or money to their newly built WDIA Radio just as Randy Wood was gaining success. While on a trip to New Orleans, Ferguson encountered a copy of Negro Digest and read a success story about Al Benson. The magazine caused him to recall the 1930s live radio broadcasts from Beale Street featuring the skillful Nat D. Williams. When he returned to Memphis, he sought the assistance of Williams, a black educator, journalist, and Beale Street impresario. In an afternoon block of time, Monday through Friday, Williams developed and hosted a blues-oriented show, and the radio audience bonded with his style, laughter, and cultural knowledge. Williams's success led to the hiring of other black announcers until WDIA's entire programming schedule consisted of blues, rhythm and blues, and gospel. It was the birth of full-time radio devoted to these genres.

WDIA Radio intermingled its music with several public service announcements, called "Goodwill Announcements" by the station, to help educate and inform African Americans living in the mid-South's tristate region: Tennessee, Arkansas, and Mississippi. A. C. Williams, another educator turned WDIA radio announcer, maintains that the foundation of black political achievement in Memphis, which is now very organized, began with public-affairs programming on WDIA Radio. The station's 1950s programming model remains at the pinnacle of blues radio formats. WDIA's programming philosophy served as a model for other radio legends who continued to promote or program the blues wherever their career paths led them: Maurice "Hot Rod" Hulbert in Baltimore; Martha Jean Steinberg in Detroit; and Rufus Thomas and B. B. King as performers around the world.

Blues Radio Format Diffused

The blues format was still strong in 1953 when more than five hundred black disk jockeys were reported to be working in radio, mostly in block formats or part-time situations. A few years later, black military veterans returning home from service brought reports that Europeans loved the "real blues." They cited John Lee Hooker, Howlin' Wolf, Muddy Waters, Sonny Boy Williamson, and others as being revered. Indeed, the Animals, the Rolling Stones, and Canned Heat advanced blues programming on white commercial radio stations in the 1960s after they included blues songs by the great African American masters on their early albums. Curious fans who studied the origins of English rock performers became more aware of the blues. In addition, 1960s FM radio, in need of program material and open to experimentation, also began playing blues. Many young white soul radio station listeners who became attracted to rhythm and blues made additional cultural explorations and discovered the blues. The blues format increasingly made its way onto the programming schedules of noncommercial radio as the number of FM public, college, and community radio stations expanded.

LAWRENCE N. REDD

Bibliography

- Redd, Lawrence N., Rock Is Rhythm and Blues: The Impact of Mass Media. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1974.
- Routt, Edd, James McGrath, and Frederic Weiss. The Radio Format Conundrum. New York: Hastings House, 1978.
- Williams, Gilbert A. Legendary Pioneers of Black Radio. Westport, CT: Praeger Publishers, 1998.

RAILROADS

The growth of railroads in the nineteenth century helped transform America from an agricultural society into an industrial society. From this historic transformation came a migratory shift of rural black people from southern states to northern cities. The experience of this migration found its way into the body of blues music written and recorded in the twentieth century.

The first steam-driven railroad service in America took place in Charleston, South Carolina, in 1830. In the following two decades, railroads expanded westward, and by 1852, lines reached as far as Chicago. The expansion of railroad lines occurred mostly in the North, where the need to move industrial goods was felt year round.

The initial railroad expansion in parts of the South was a slower process, as planters across the region saw only a seasonal need to move their agricultural goods to market. According to Scott Reynolds Nelson, planters feared that the new transportation system would disrupt existing trading arrangements, strengthen commercial centers in states other than their own, and give their slaves a way to escape to the North. Merl Reed maintains that planters in the lower Mississippi Valley were reluctant to contract the labor needed to build railroads. Consequently, free labor from outside the South worked alongside slave labor in the earliest years of southern railroad expansion.

RAILROADS

By 1860, Chicago had established itself as the railroad center of the country. Eleven different lines converged there. The Illinois Central emerged as the biggest company in the country with more than seven hundred miles of track. In the spring of 1861, it joined the Mobile & Ohio system, which ran as far south as Alabama and Mississippi. By the beginning of the Civil War, passenger and freight service also connected Boston to New Orleans and New York to Saint Louis.

After the Civil War, railroad companies expanded across the continent connecting east to west. They also began to rebuild lines destroyed during the war east of the Mississippi River. Blacks in the South experienced increased suffering during post-bellum railroad expansion. No longer working as slaves, free black men were hired and paid to construct railroads. Ku Klux Klan violence, however, confronted this labor arrangement from the beginning. The period of Reconstruction in the South saw railroads in some cases broker agreements with the Klan by hiring their members and former Confederate officers to manage the business of building, running, and repairing the railroads.

When the Freedmen's Bureau disbanded in the 1870s, free black men found themselves let go from jobs they had recently gained. Many of these free black men were arrested for vagrancy when they could not find other work. Once jailed, these men not only found themselves working in involuntary servitude for the railroads but wearing convict uniforms and chains as well.

The combined force of government subsidies, land grants, unionization, strikes, corruption, and discrimination moved the expansion forward during the 1870s and 1880s. During that period, railroads also began to consolidate; fewer railroads were operating more and more miles of track across the southeastern and midwestern part of the country. The Illinois Central acquired the railroad line that connected Cairo, Illinois, to New Orleans, Louisiana, in 1877 and thus became a trunk line between the Gulf of Mexico and the Great Lakes. The Illinois Central was joined by the Louisville & Nashville, the Rock Island, the Texas & Pacific, the Southern Pacific, the Atlantic Coast, the Southern, and the Seaboard as dominant railroad companies and routes.

Between 1865 and 1914, the population of the country tripled and the number of miles of railroad track grew seven times over. By 1920, almost the entire population of the country lived within twenty-five miles of a railroad line. As railroads connected more towns and cities across a larger network of service, southern blacks saw an ever-increasing expansion of commerce, while white hegemony marginalized their participation in the economy.

The increased mobility that came with the growth of the railroads at the close of the nineteenth century and beginning of the twentieth century brought about social change. In 1890, eight out of every ten blacks lived in a rural area of the South. By 1920, one out of four would live in a town or city and by 1930, only half of the blacks in the South remained in a rural environment. In the period between the First and Second World War, more than two million blacks from the South would participate in the Great Migration to the cities of the North.

In 1890, social mobility was indeed a new experience for blacks in the South. In the years immediately after the Civil War, free blacks found their movement from one area to another restricted by a series of newly enacted black codes in most southern states. The reality of poverty also controlled black mobility. The labor system of tenant farming and sharecropping replaced the black codes. The wages for this labor system were a small portion of the crops, and landlords forced many black families to accept harsh terms of credit. These families fell into debt from this system, and at best could only expect a bare subsistence from their effort.

The railroad had long symbolized the power of escape to freedom for blacks in the South. Before the Civil War, the Underground Railroad had been an escape route to freedom in the North. The escaping slaves often traveled on foot at night in order to avoid detection. They followed in the direction of the Big Dipper, or Drinking Gourd as they called it, keeping the North Star in front of them. They stopped along the way in barns and basements of sympathetic whites and free blacks.

At the end of the nineteenth century, the movement of southern blacks began on a local level. They left the isolation of their small farms and moved into nearby towns or cities. They followed the parallel lines of track, often on foot, until they came to a populated area. Upon arrival in these town and cities, many found the only available housing to be dilapidated shacks next to the railroad lines at the edge of the community.

The migration became much larger in scale by the time of the First World War. Northern companies looked to bolster their diminished labor pools by recruiting southern black workers. Not only were there better jobs in the northern cities, but there were better schools as well. The railroad was a clearly marked route to escape the impoverished conditions and Jim Crow laws of the South. Among the railroads used in the migration, families from Louisiana and Mississippi traveled to Chicago on the Illinois Central. Those living in Alabama and Tennessee rode on the Louisville & Nashville to Cleveland.

Those who could save the money purchased a ticket for themselves and family members on segregated train cars. These cars located near the front of the train exposed their passengers to smoke and burning ash from the locomotive. People traveling in the segregated cars could not buy food on the train nor were they allowed into the sleeping cars. Many blacks left under threats of violence. Some were stopped at train stations and were forced to go back to their farms and work off their debts.

Those who could not afford a ticket walked the rails. Many acted in grim desperation and risked their lives by hopping an open boxcar on a freight train. Some blues artists saw that damaging their guitars in this kind of effort was enough of a risk and gave it up as a bad option. If caught by the sheriff in some states, train hoppers faced imprisonment for trespassing on railroad property. The prospect of hopping a train often meant running alongside a moving car to gain a grip near the wheels. Others chose to swing down underneath the car and ride on the brake rods, axle beams, or coupling links. On board, they faced the prospect of fumes, bad weather, the fireman's hose, or the brakeman's club, any of which could kill.

If the door of the boxcar was open, a person could hop in and hope to find it unoccupied. If occupied, whites were ready to throw off any blacks that wanted to share the space. Many blacks consequently traveled in small groups for protection. Their hope was to move on to a place where they could find work.

Young black men traveling in these small groups also found other risks in hopping a freight car. The Scottsboro case in Alabama became a national news story in 1931. Two white prostitutes falsely accused nine young black men of rape after they had occupied the same boxcar. Eight of the young men received the death sentence, but later these sentences were overturned. Four of the accused men subsequently received prison terms for a crime they did not commit.

The social conditions of hopping trains affected homeless children as well as adults. Many of the children came from homes broken apart by the stress of joblessness, racism, substance abuse, and desertion. Living in transient camps along the railroads, they often were used to beg and steal and work as prostitutes.

Norm Cohen noted one of the earliest references to the railroad in a minstrel song dating from the 1840s:

Railroad trabel's getting' all the go,
'Kase de hoss boat an steamboat goes so might slow.

This stanza of the song was quick to realize that the railroads were a faster way to travel than the established modes of canal boats and riverboats.

Black men who performed the hardest part of constructing the railroads in the nineteenth century did so to the rhythm of the call-and-response work song. By the end of that century, the railroad work experience found its way into such songs as "John Henry." Other early twentieth-century songs like "Nine Pound Hammer" and "Spike Driver Blues" told of the work experience that was associated with the building of the railroad.

"Railroad Bill," which told the story of a desperate train robber, was a blues precursor and ballad that first appeared in 1909. Morris Slater, or Railroad Bill as legend remembers him, robbed trains in the South during the 1890s. He died in a shootout, but the written accounts of his demise are as varied as the songs that remember him.

In John Lomax's 1934 recordings of Huddie "Leadbelly" Ledbetter, the blues singer talks about the blues song "Rock Island Line." He explained that men sang while they swung their heavy picks to the rhythm of the song. "The Midnight Special" is a blues song about the train that shines a light on the prison and inmates in Sugerland, Texas, every time it passes. Although Leadbelly made recordings of the song on five different occasions, his was not the first recording by a black blues singer. Sam Collins was the first black singer to record the blues classic in 1927.

The rhythms and sounds of trains became an undeniable influence on the blues artist. In "The Panama Limited," recorded by Bukka White in 1930, the playing of the bottleneck guitar imitates the sound of a train. Robert Johnson achieves a similar effect in his 1936 recording of the song "Rambling on My Mind."

According to Paul Oliver, black workers, or field hollers, marked their workday by the schedule of the trains passing through the Mississippi Delta. Each train sounded a distinctive whistle. As each fireman approached in his engine, he played a simple tune heard across the fields. Blacks hired to work on the railroads communicated with the men and women working in the fields by this form of quilling. Musical rifts floated on the air from the whistles when an Illinois Central train coursed its way between Chicago and New Orleans.

Blacks in the South developed their own names for the railroads, and these names found their way into blues music. The Illinois Central became the I.C.; the Louisville & Nashville became the L & N; the Missouri, Kansas and Texas became the Katy; and the Kansas City Southern became the Kaycee.

RAILROADS

Perhaps the most widely known verbal invention for the railroads that appeared in blues music was the Yellow Dog. Its apocryphal origin remains a mystery. Some speculate that the Yellow Dog is the Yazoo-Delta line. Some think that it was a mongrel dog or a derisive term for workers on another railroad. Still others maintain that it was another way of referring to a short line railroad.

In 1903 W. C. Handy waited one night in Tutwiler, Mississippi, for a train that was nine hours late. He woke in the early hours to find a man dressed in rags and worn out shoes sitting next to him with a guitar. The man played with a knife against the strings for a slide effect and sang about “Goin where the Southern cross the Dog.” Handy notes in his autobiography that the singer was going to the town of Moorehead on the Sunflower River where the Yazoo-Delta line crossed the Southern railroad. The encounter would later inspire Handy’s own song, “Yellow Dog Blues.”

As blacks in the South became more mobile and looked for new opportunities at the turn of the century, the blues music form was also taking shape. The Spanish in the Southwest introduced the guitar to American culture. By the late nineteenth century, black fiddlers and guitar-playing songsters played for white audiences in Texas. The arrival of railroads helped the crossover of varied musical styles and instruments in Texas and states farther east. Not only were railroad yards popular places for the exchange of musical ideas, but the railroads were a network that carried the musical influence from one area into another.

BILL GRAVES

Bibliography

DGR

- Cohen, Norm. Long Steel Rail. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1981.
- Cohen, William. At Freedom’s Edge. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1991.
- Crew, Spencer R. Field to Factory: Afro-American Migration 1915–1940. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution, 1987.
- Govenar, Alan. Blues Masters, Volume 3, Texas Blues. Los Angeles: Rhino Records, 1992.
- Handy, W. C. Father of the Blues. New York: Da Capo, 1985.
- Hurley, F. Jack, and David Evans. “Bukka White.” In Tom Ashley, Sam McGee, Bukka White, edited by Thomas G. Burton, pp. 143–203. Knoxville: The University of Tennessee Press, 1981.
- Lester, Julius. “‘Mister White, Take a Break’: An Interview with Bukka White.” Sing Out 18, no. 4 (October/November 1968): 4–5, 39, 45, 61–63.
- Nelson, Scott Reynolds. Iron Confederacies. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1999.

- Oliver, Paul. Blues Fell This Morning. New York: Horizon Press, 1960.
- . The Story of the Blues. London: Chilton Books, 1969.
- , Max Harrison, and William Bolcom. The New Grove Gospel, Blues and Jazz. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1986.
- Reed, Merl E. New Orleans and the Railroads. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1966.
- Stover, John. American Railroads. 2nd ed. Chicago: The University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- . The Railroads of the South 1865–1900. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1955.
- Summers, Mark. Railroads, Reconstruction, and the Gospel of Prosperity. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1984.

RAINEY, GERTRUDE “MA”

b. Gertrude Pridgett, 26 April 1886; Columbus, GA
d. 22 December 1939; Columbus, GA

Ma Rainey was one of the most important blues singers of the 1920s. Because of her perceived authenticity as a true southern blues artist, and her great influence on other female blues artists of the time, she has often been referred to as the “Mother of the Blues.”

Life

Gertrude Pridgett began her performing career at the age of fourteen as a contestant in a talent show known as A Bunch of Blackberries. After this event she began performing in tent shows. It is reputed that she was including blues selections in her repertoire by 1902. In 1904 she married William “Pa” Rainey, a traveling singer, dancer, and comedian. Together they formed an act with the Rabbit Foot Minstrels known as the Assassins of the Blues, often billed as “Ma” and “Pa” Rainey. The Rainey family toured with many of the finest black minstrel companies of the time, and eventually “Madame Gertrude Rainey” became a headliner throughout the South.

By the time she signed a recording contract with Paramount in 1923, Rainey had been touring for more than twenty years, and had established a large and loyal following in the South. Aiding her live performances was the success of her early recordings such as “Moonshine Blues” and “Bo-Weevil Blues.” In 1924, Rainey had a couple of breakthrough sessions in New York resulting in the production of several well-known hits, including “Jelly Bean Blues” and “See See Rider Blues.”

Ma Rainey. (Photo courtesy Frank Driggs Collection)

Rainey’s overwhelming success led Paramount to book her with the TOBA (Theater Owners Booking Association) circuit, which expanded her following further, eventually leading to numerous performances throughout the Midwest, and even into the North. She spent almost all of 1925 and 1926 touring and recording, rapidly amassing a small fortune.

In 1927, audience taste began to shift away from the vaudeville-style productions that had been Rainey’s medium of choice. However, her immense popularity allowed Rainey to continue beyond the time of many of her contemporaries. In fact, 1928 proved to be one of Rainey’s most successful years of touring and recording. Despite this, Paramount terminated her contract. The time of the classic blues singer was coming to an end, and Rainey’s productions, steeped in the traditions of southern vaudeville and blues, were losing favor with contemporary audiences.

The Great Depression finished what the shift in popular taste had begun, and by the early 1930s the era of classic blues had ended. Rainey continued touring, but eventually poor working conditions and the death of her sister led Rainey to retire in 1935. She returned home to Columbus, and due to her sound fiscal management, became the owner-operator of two theaters in Rome, Georgia. In 1939, following the death of her mother, Gertrude “Ma” Rainey died of heart disease, and was buried at the Porterdale Cemetery in Columbus.

Music

Rainey had a distinctive contralto voice with a limited range of approximately one octave. She seldom used vibrato, and her vocal quality often sounded strained. When compared to many of her classic blues contemporaries, Rainey’s style may at first seem unrefined, but the true essence of her appeal was in her ability to captivate an audience and intimate both pathos and mirth (particularly in the South).

Her extraordinary showmanship would have likely been honed from many years of touring throughout the South with the black minstrel circuit. Rainey was a singer, but also a comedian and a dancer. Audiences were reported to enjoy her performances of all three, and these aspects of her background informed her stage presentation throughout her career.

Though she came out of a vaudeville tradition that included a variety of popular and folk songs, Rainey’s recorded output and general musical style detail the substantial influence of the blues on her sound. It could be suggested that Rainey’s seeming affinity for the blues had more to do with the nature of her recording deal with Paramount than with her own tastes (a commercial recording label catering to the taste of the black record-buying public), but Rainey had been singing the blues on the minstrel circuit for twenty years before she signed a record deal. Her actual recording career spanned five years, from 1923 to 1928. In that time she recorded ninety-two selections; more than half were twelve-bar blues, and many of the others demonstrated some type of hybrid blues form.

“Moonshine Blues” and “Bo-Weevil Blues” were both recorded in Rainey’s earliest sessions, and were ultimately two of her greatest hits (also covered by Bessie Smith in 1924). Rainey’s distinctive southern blues stylings brought a new sound to the classic blues, and both “Moonshine Blues” and “Bo-Weevil Blues” became Rainey anthems. Though she wrote many of her own selections (a rare trait for the classic blues singers of the 1920s), Rainey was also a successful collaborator. Her 1924 sessions in New York with Fletcher Henderson and Louis Armstrong were particularly noteworthy, producing both “See See Rider Blues” and “Countin’ the Blues.”

Perhaps the most successful collaboration in Rainey’s career was with Thomas Dorsey. Rainey met Dorsey in Chicago where he was working part time and playing piano in saloons. After a short period of auditioning, Rainey hired Dorsey to be her bandleader. He then formed her touring group, the Wildcats Jazz Band. This early ensemble featured Dorsey as the pianist, saxophonist Eddie Pollack, Gabriel Washington on drums, trombonist Albert Wynn, and trumpeter David Nelson. Dorsey stayed with Rainey as a pianist, director, and arranger until 1926 when he suffered a nervous breakdown. By 1928 he had recovered, and was working as an arranger for the Chicago Music Publishing Company. Dorsey and Rainey again collaborated on her recordings, but he never returned as the director of her touring group.

Interestingly, the two periods of Dorsey’s involvement with Rainey highlight a shift in her performance style. Without exception the musicians in Rainey’s early Wildcats Jazz Band were either professional jazz musicians or experienced performers from the minstrel circuit (if not both). The sound of this backing group was quite polished and in keeping with a larger trend established by the vaudeville inspired classic blues. Upon Dorsey’s return, the accompanying musicians were increasingly idiomatic with rural blues performances. It is entirely likely that Rainey was attempting to maintain her link with the southern audience while at the same time capitalizing on the success recording of the male rural blues singers of the late 1920s.

Influence

Legend suggests that Rainey may have kidnapped a young Bessie Smith and taught her how to sing the blues. Though historically it is known that these reports are exaggerated, the younger Smith may have been influenced by the successful and more experienced Rainey. Many artists of the time were said to have benefited by Rainey’s guidance, either directly (as Butterbeans and Susie did) or by her influence (like Clara Smith). Rainey’s kindness was celebrated even in her own time. From mentoring younger acts to having a reputation for paying her band well and punctually (a rarity on the 1920s black minstrel circuit), Rainey was known for taking care of people. The nickname “Ma” may have come from her days with the Rabbit Foot Minstrels, but her nurturing disposition may have been what sustained it.

In a time when black female entertainers were light skinned and otherwise conformed to white notions of beauty, Rainey was a heavy-set, dark-skinned woman. However, she celebrated her body image through lavish costuming during performances and a mythic sex life filled with numerous men and possibly women too. Moreover, she was an accomplished businesswoman. When the Great Depression left many in financial ruin, Rainey was able to retire from the touring circuit and return to Columbus where she lived comfortably. These attributes, magnified by the publicity that comes with being a successful entertainer, helped redefine social parity, opening new possibilities for black women of that period.

Though anecdotes about Rainey’s connection with her southern audiences are plentiful and should be carefully considered, it is a historical fact that she was a popular and highly successful figure in the South. Many have suggested that Rainey was a woman of the people and truly understood the lives of black southerners, therefore she could express joy and sorrow through the blues in an authentic way that many of her classic blues colleagues could not.

However, Rainey’s brand of southern-inspired blues was ultimately prosperous in the North and Midwest as well (once she began touring there). This would seem to indicate that perhaps more than understanding one specific ethnic and sociocultural viewpoint (that of the black southerner in most of her songs), Rainey understood the human condition. This combined with her powerful stage presence and extraordinary showmanship secured her status as a Queen of the Blues, and made a significant contribution to the archetypal persona of the blues diva.

JEFFREY A. JONES

Bibliography

- AMG (Jim O’Neal and Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern Chilton, John. Who’s Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.
- Dall, Christine, director. Wild Women Don’t Have the Blues. San Francisco: California Newsreel, 1989.
- Harrison, Daphne D. Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s. London: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
- Lieb, Sandra R. Mother of the Blues: A Study of Ma Rainey. Amherst: The University of Massachusetts Press, 1981.
- Obrecht, Jas. “Ma Rainey: Mother of the Blues.” Blues Revue no. 17 (May/June 1995): 26–31.
- Stewart-Baxter, Derrick. Ma Rainey and the Classic Blues Singers. New York: Stein and Day, 1970.

Discography: AMG; DGR

RAINEY, WILLIE GUY

b. 17 April 1901; Calhoun County, AL
 d. 23 August 1983; College Park, GA

Georgia blues singer and guitarist Willie Guy Rainey became a professional performer only in his seventies, appearing at blues festivals in the United States and Holland and recording a solo LP for Southland Records of Atlanta.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

- O'Neal, Jim. "Willie Guy Rainey." Living Blues no. 58 (Winter 1983/1984): 44.
 Wilmer, Valerie. "Still Got the Blues: Georgia Bluesmen Talking to Val Wilmer." Blues Unlimited no. 133 (January/February 1979): 16–20.

See also Fuller, Blind Boy; McGhee, Brownie

RAITT, BONNIE

b. 8 November 1949; Burbank, CA

Blues guitarist Bonnie Raitt is the daughter of Broadway star John Raitt who is best known for his roles in Oklahoma! and Carousel. She began learning guitar at age twelve. She began a college education at Radcliffe in 1967 but dropped out after two years to play the Boston folk and blues club circuit. Through Dick Waterman, she met and performed with such blues greats as Howlin' Wolf, Sippie Wallace, and Mississippi Fred McDowell. In time she earned a strong enough reputation to be signed to the Warner Brothers label.

Her self-titled debut album, released in 1971, is noted for a mixture of blues with elements of folk music and R&B and was praised by critics not only for Raitt's skills as a musician but also for her song selection. Her 1972 album Give It Up picks up where the first album left off, stylistically. It also includes songs by contemporary musicians such as Jackson Brown and Eric Kaz and includes three Raitt originals. The 1973 album Takin' My Time further explored Raitt's eclectic taste in music including jazz and calypso influences and as well as the standard blues and folk. Though enjoying the favor of the critics and a faithful cult following, Raitt had yet to enjoy success on the charts. Under pressure from Warner Brothers to release a popular hit, Raitt teamed with producer Jerry Ragovoy to record the album Streetsights. This attempt to cross over failed to produce hits, and it was felt by critics that Raitt strayed too far from her accustomed style. Home Plate continued Raitt's path toward a more popular sound, but was somewhat more successful due to the work of producer Paul A. Rothchild. Raitt enjoyed her first significant taste of popular radio airplay with a cover of Del Shannon's "Runaway" on her 1977 album Sweet Forgiveness (this album was also produced by Rothchild).

The year 1979 saw the release of The Glow. Throughout the 1980s Raitt toured regularly and played hundreds of benefit concerts. She was never able to establish herself on the charts however, releasing two albums (Green Light, 1982, and Nine Lives, 1986) that were received like her previous albums had been. Warner Brothers then released her. In 1989, however, she teamed up with producer Don Was and released the album Nick of Time under the Capitol label, which turned out to be a smash hit. The album won a number of Grammy Awards including album of the year.

The 1990s saw Raitt's success continue with the release of the albums Luck of the Draw (1991), Longing in Their Hearts (1994), Road Tested (1995), and Fundamental (1998). Also, after bouts of alcoholism and drug use in the 1980s, her personal life stabilized following her marriage to the actor and poet Michael O'Keefe in 1991, though they divorced eight years later. She continued to tour and play benefit concerts throughout the 1990s, retaining and exercising her enviable slide guitar touch. Silver Lining was released in 2002.

ROBERT SORICELLI

Bibliography

- AMG (Jason Ankeny); Larkin; Santelli
 Wild, D. "The Blues Today: Bonnie Raitt." Rolling Stone no. 787 (May 28, 1998): 62–63.

Discography: AMGRANKIN, R. S.

b. 22 February 1933; Roysce City, TX

Guitarist whose style and career was shaped by his uncle T-Bone Walker. His initials are his given name. He initially assisted Walker as valet in 1949, then as sideman guitarist in appearances and recordings through the 1950s. He formed his own band in 1956, performing at the 5-4 Ballroom in Los Angeles, then toured the West Coast for some years afterward. On many recordings he was billed as T-Bone Walker, Jr. From 1964 through the 1970s he worked less in music, but he gave a notable performance at the T-Bone Walker memorial concert in Los Angeles in May 1975.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Stolper, Darryl. "R. S. Rankin: T-Bone Walker Junior." Blues Unlimited no. 115 (September/October 1975): 19.

Discography

LSFP (as T-Bone Walker Jr.)

RAP

Rap has evolved during the past three decades into the dominant musical expression of young adults, simultaneously reflecting the identical sensibilities of rebellion, stylistic flamboyance, and free expression as rock 'n' roll in the 1950s. What began as essentially a New York City and East Coast phenomenon is now an international force, with rappers in Africa, Asia, Latin America, and throughout Europe constructing rhymes over intricately produced song samples and fragments as well as layers of beats and rhythms. The music is part of a culture that also includes graffiti, styles of dance, and styles of dress, but most importantly reflects an attitude and philosophy that defines "hip-hop culture." Many within this universe object to the separation of the music from these other components. Still, rap has made its own journey, attaining a place within the nation's consciousness that many would have deemed impossible during the 1970s and 1980s.

The music has connections with African storytelling (griots) and Jamaican reggae (toastmasters, DJs, producers, and sound systems) as well as links to blues troubadours and poets who orally presented their stories over music rather than singing lyrics. The notion that rap is not a wholly original art form disturbs some in the rap world, who dispute its ties to anything other than their neighborhoods in the South Bronx or history in America, but there are clear similarities in tone, cadence, method, and approach between rappers and Jamaican toastmasters like Big Youth, Yellowman, or U Roy. Ironically, one of the key figures in early rap music was Jamaican immigrant Clive Campbell, known as Kool Herc. He began as a DJ in 1973, and despite his enormous sound system, wanted to ensure that the crowds who assembled at dances could fully hear the music. Herc closely studied crowd reactions, discovering which parts of a song stimulated the biggest response. From there, he developed the technique that would revolutionize music presentation and also be a key element in rap production. He purchased copies of the same record and would repeatedly play them, placing major emphasis on the breaks in the tunes. While isolating and replaying these breaks, DJ Herc also developed a string of phrases designed to encourage the dancers. The dancers featured at the clubs he worked became known as break dancers.

Eventually other important components emerged. These included the techniques of scratching (spinning a record backward and forward rapidly with the needle in the groove) and punch phasing (hitting a break on one turntable while a record is still playing on another one), plus a device called a beat box, a machine that produced electronic beats. Along with DJ Herc, some other major early figures were Afrika Bambaataa, who operated a sound system at the Bronx River Community Center and became the leader of the "Zulu Nation" and one of the earliest hip-hop culture champions; The Sugar Hill Gang; producer/rapper Kurtis Blow; rapper Spoonie Gee; producer Todd Terry; and the trio Run-D.M.C. All of these acts, as well as the Fat Boys, helped popularize what was now emerging as an actual art form. The Sugar Hill Gang's "Rapper's Delight" and "The Message" were key anthems, while the Fat Boys' primarily novelty cuts and silly tunes proved quite popular, and Run-D.M.C. became the first rap act to attract a large white audience. Another band whose role during rap's formative period often gets overlooked is the Fatback Band, whose single "King Tim III" many insist is the first true rap number.

Interestingly, the members of both Run-D.M.C. and Public Enemy came from middle-class backgrounds, yet they, as well as Russell Simmons and Rick Rubin, cofounders of the influential label Def Jam, helped move rap from underground status into the mainstream. Add to that list the Beastie Boys, still the most creative and important white rap artists, whose status helped disprove the notion that rap was solely a black art form. Later would come other white performers like House of Pain, 3rd Bass, the excruciating Vanilla Ice, and the controversial Eminem. Some regard them as the rap equivalent of R&B cover acts, but Eminem in particular has demonstrated a flair and proficiency that transcend questions of color.

Rap subsequently started moving beyond simple songs about clothes and neighborhoods. The lyrics became more involved, and performers were now delivering frenetic verbal displays about the harshness of street life and disparity of the American system. The productions became increasingly more sophisticated, and the tone of rap songs tougher and harsher. The music's influence began spreading beyond New York's borders. West Coast rappers such as N.W.A. started devising lyrics to reflect their communities, as did the Geto Boys from Houston, 2 Live Crew from Miami, and so on. Even the feuds, which at one time were mostly good-natured combative exchanges confined to record labels, such as the battles between L.L. Cool J and Kool Moe Dee, became more deadly and “beefs” were no longer just musical. The escalation of these fights into societal violence has led to several tragic and unsolved murders over the years and has also been part of the intensely negative attitude many older adults have toward rap. Yet the popularity of such shows as Yo MTV Raps! and the decision of Black Entertainment Television to fully embrace the music and hip-hop culture helped expand the audience and sales base both nationally and globally. Likewise, video became a more important element within the rap world, and singles became increasingly accompanied by videos, frequently featuring gyrating, scantily clad females, with rappers presenting their songs within tightly produced mini-movies.

The issue of women in rap has been problematic since its inception. A handful of female rappers have emerged, among them Salt 'n Pepa, Monie Love, M. C. Lyte, Queen Latifah, Eve, Missy Elliott, and L'il Kim, but the issue remains a thorny one. Essence magazine began a campaign in early 2005 called “taking back the music,” featuring harsh denunciations of several rap videos and urging its audience to insist that rap acts stop degrading black women. This campaign ties in with problems many adults have with the music’s most controversial form, “gangsta” rap. This is a style known as much for its vulgarity and celebration of violence as the stark descriptions of life on the street. Of course, such rappers as the late Tupac Shakur and Biggie Smalls also included themes of recognizing black cultural achievement, fighting economic disparity, and encouraging black unity, but these messages often get overlooked due to the coarseness of the backgrounds. The battle over these songs mirrors the growing generational divide within the black community, with many blues, R&B, soul, gospel, and jazz fans disgusted by what they consider a perversion of values being espoused by these artists, and rap lovers equally angry at what they view as a wholesale dismissal of their music and viewpoints.

The music has also spawned a host of publications, the most influential being The Source and Vibe. Just as rock’s steady growth and importance created its own corps of journalists, today there are numerous rap writers, authors, commentators, scholars, and critics. There are also awards shows for rap acts, among them the Soul Train and Source ceremonies. Many rappers now land parts in major films, and such former musical mainstays as L.L. Cool J, Ice Cube, and Ice-T are now more known for their movie and television works than for their music, though each maintains some connections to the music world.

Today, rap is undeniably a major social force, with music by groups such as Outkast and the Black-Eyed Peas used by major sports organizations or appearing in commercials. However, the debate still rages regarding the genre’s ultimate positive or negative impact.

RON WYNN

RAPONE, AL

b. Al Lewis, 1936; Lake Charles, LA

Zydeco vocalist, accordionist, and guitarist. After seven years playing guitar with his sister, Queen Ida, he reverted to the accordion and went out on his own. He has recorded a series of albums since 1982, including one with the Butanes and a reunion with his sister on GNP Crescendo.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Discography: AMG

RASCOE, MOSES

b. 27 July 1917; Windsor, NC

d. 6 March 1994; Lebanon, PA

Guitarist, mostly acoustic, in 1950s styles from Brownie McGhee to Jimmy Reed. From the 1940s through the early 1980s, he drove trucks for Allied Van Lines. Upon retirement, he pursued music full time, eventually performing at the Newport Folk Festival and the Chicago Blues Festival.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O’Neal)

Bonner, Brett J. “Moses Rascoe” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 117 (September/October 1994): 61.

Discography: AMG

RAWLS, JOHNNY

b. 10 September 1951; Columbia, MS

Born in the small southern Mississippi community of Columbia, Johnny Rawls took an early interest in blues, especially the music of B. B. King, Bobby Bland, and R&B vocalist Jackie Wilson. By his teens, Rawls was playing guitar and impressed his high school band director enough to be asked to join his professional show band in which he backed many touring musicians such as soul artists Z. Z. Hill and Little Johnny Taylor.

RAWLS, JOHNNY

Rawls moved to Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in 1970, but continued to perform throughout the South with various groups. In 1975, he worked with soul legend O. V. Wright and became the singer's guitarist and bandleader until Wright's death in 1980. Throughout the next decade, Rawls continued on with the O.V. Wright Band, and formed a thirteen-year partnership with guitarist and former Wright session musician L. C. Lockett.

In the early 1990s, Rawls was introduced to Jim O'Neal's Clarksdale, Mississippi-based Rooster Blues label through musician Willie Cobbs. He recorded as a session guitar and bass player on a number of releases for the imprint, and in 1994 collaborated with Lockett on their Can't Sleep at Night release. In late 1995, Rawls signed with JSP Records and recorded and produced Here We Go, a debut that showcased his successful fusion of soul and blues. Besides several more releases of his own, Rawls's abilities as producer, songwriter, and talent scout were utilized on numerous other JSP titles. In 2002, Rawls founded his own recording label, Deep South Sound, and continued to be active on both the club and festival circuit.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

My Turn to Win (1999, JSP CD2116).

Lucky Man (2002, Deep South Sound CD01).

RAWLS, LOUIS ALLEN "LOU"

b. 1 December 1935; Chicago, IL

Popular singer and crooner in the soul/jazz style, influenced by the smoothness of Nat King Cole and the strength of Frank Sinatra.

At seven, Lou Rawls was singing gospel in a Chicago Baptist church choir, and in the mid-1950s recorded as a member of various formations, including the Chosen Gospel Singers, in Los Angeles.

As a solo artist, Lou Rawls had his debut album in 1962, titled I'd Rather Drink Muddy Water, on Capitol. His first R&B hit was "Love Is a Hurtin' Thing" (1966).

Although not a blues artist in any sense, Lou Rawls included in his early repertoire light and jazzy versions of some blues standards such as "St. James Infirmary," T-Bone Walker's "Stormy Monday," Leroy Carr's "In the Evening When the Sun Goes Down," and Count Basie's "Goin' to Chicago Blues." From the 1970s, he added more popular songs like "Hello Dolly" and Stevie Wonder's "Sir Duke." Lou Rawls referred to Dinah Washington as the "Queen of the Blues."

In the late 1960s, Lou Rawls began framing his songs, such as "Tobacco Road" and "World of Trouble," with long spoken introductions on an instrumental background that are sometimes seen as an early form of rap. In the late 1970s, Lou Rawls gave concerts with a big band, strings and brass, backing vocalists, and an orchestra director. During one 1978 tour, he even performed on stage a thirty-second jingle for a beer company.

Lou Rawls's biggest hit was "You'll Never Find (Another Love Like Mine)" (1976), composed by producers Kenny Gamble and Leon Huff, mixing a smooth soul sound with a disco tempo, similar to some of Barry White's most commercial productions. In some forty years, Lou Rawls has released more than fifty albums and CDs.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Lou Rawls website, <http://www.lourawls.com>.

RAY, FLOYD

b. 19 July 1909

d. 15 November 1985; Northridge, CA

Bandleader active from 1934 through 1941 in big band swing music. His 1939 Decca session with the vocal group Ivy, Vern, and Von may be heard as a prototype of post-World War II jump band rhythm and blues and female vocal groups. After World War II, he took several musical jobs, then settled in Northridge, California.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Burke, Tony, and Dave Penny. "Big Band Blues: 'Comin' On with the Blues.'" Blues & Rhythm no. 5 (December 1984): 20-30.

Discography: LSFP

RAY, HARMON

b. 1914; Indianapolis, IN
d. ca. 1980; Chicago, IL

First name sometimes spelled “Harman.” Though often billed as a Peetie Wheatstraw impersonator (he even recorded as “Peetie Wheatstraw’s buddy”), Harmon Ray was a fine, relaxed vocalist in his own right. The handful of sides, such as “President’s Blues,” an original tribute to Harry Truman, that he recorded in Chicago in the 1940s in the company of Joe McCoy or Sammy Price are all first rate.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Russell, Tony. “The Deputy from Hell: Harman Ray.”
Living Blues no. 26 (March/April 1976): 14–15.

Discography: DGR; LSFPRAY, KENNY “BLUE”

b. 11 January 1950; Lodi, CA

Guitarist. After completing service in the Air Force in 1972, he apprenticed under Paul Hermann (1972–1975), Little Charlie and the Nightcats (1975–1976), and Smokey Wilson (1976–1980). He left the West Coast for Austin, Texas, where he began a four-year stint with Marcia Ball, in addition to being a recording session musician. Since 1990 he has led and recorded with his own band.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Kenny Ray website, <http://home.earthlink.net/~blueray/> (accessed December 19, 2004).

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)RCA/VICTOR/BLUEBIRD/CAMDEN/GROOVE/X/VIK

Originally founded in 1901 by Eldridge Reeves Johnson, the Victor Talking Machine Company allied with Emile Berliner’s Gramophone Co. and was responsible for the first authentic jazz recordings, but the company was slow to develop further jazz and blues repertoire until Nat Shilkret was appointed A&R director in late 1926. In the late 1920s, Victor began an extensive campaign of field recordings, sending teams of talent scouts/A&R staff to record musicians unwilling or unable to make the trip to the main recording centers of New York City, Chicago, and Los Angeles. Portable recording equipment was set up in radio stations and hotel rooms in rich musical locations like Memphis, Atlanta, and Dallas to record the area’s local jazz, blues, and country singers.

The Victor label was taken over by the Radio Corporation of America (RCA) in 1929, and for a few years during the Depression, the recording activities were seriously curtailed until, in 1933, the budget Bluebird subsidiary was launched. Selling each disk at 35 cents, it soon became the main label for the company’s blues, jazz, and country releases (with certain well-received issues being rereleased on Victor proper at 75 cents, once their sales had merited the accolade). New A&R man Lester Melrose became the main source for the blues recordings, and he was the first to employ a “houseband” style, with a group that would often include Big Bill Broonzy, Roosevelt Sykes, Sonny Boy Williamson, Jazz Gillum, Washboard Sam, and several others as session musicians as well as featured artists.

The Bluebird subsidiary was dropped in the United States in 1945, although it limped on for almost a decade more as a subsidiary of RCA Victor of Canada. In the 1950s, RCA inaugurated specific R&B and pop subsidiary labels with Groove (1954–1957), “X” (1954–1956), Vik (1956–1958), and Camden (1954–present). The latter continues at the time of writing as the imprint for budget reissue compilations, while the Bluebird label continues to be resurrected for compilations of blues, jazz, and country reissues.

DAVID PENNY

Bibliography

Templeton, Ray. “Bluebird Records Blues and Gospel 1931–42.” Blues & Rhythm nos. 28–31 (April–September 1987).

Discography

The Groove Story: R&B from the Radio Corporation #2 (1998, Westside CD 831).
Honkin’ n’ Hollerin’: R&B from the Radio Corporation #1 (1998, Westside CD 828).
When the Sun Goes Down: The Secret History of Rock & Roll (2002, Bluebird CD 64006).

RECORD PRODUCERS

(See Recording)

RECORDED IN HOLLYWOOD/ HOLLYWOOD/CASH/LUCKY/MONEY

Founded on Los Angeles's Central Avenue (miles from Hollywood!) in 1950 by John Dolphin, who had previously dabbled with an eponymous gospel and jazz label in 1948, Recorded in Hollywood began issuing gospel music along with blues and R&B by Percy Mayfield, Smokey Hogg, Pee Wee Crayton, Little Caesar, and Jesse Belvin. Despite relative success with its small catalog of blues recordings, Recorded in Hollywood's main trade was in issues by black vocal groups. In 1953, Dolphin ceased business as "Recorded in Hollywood" and formed a business partnership with Don Pierce, the latter heading the newly launched Tennessee-based Hollywood Records—a label that would last until 1959—while Dolphin formed a string of new labels; Lucky (1954; King Perry, Joe Houston, and Chuck Higgins), Money (1954; Johnny Moore's Three Blazers, Memphis Slim, and Peppermint Harris), and Cash (1955; Ernie Freeman, Ray Agee, Riff Ruffin, and Bo Rhambo). In 1958 Dolphin was murdered by an irate songwriter, Percy Ivy, but Dolphin's wife persevered with the Money label into the late 1960s.

DAVID PENNY

Bibliography

Dawson, Jim. "Recorded on Central—The Rise & Fall of John Dolphin." Juke Blues no. 13 (Autumn 1988): 12.
 ———, Michael Sweeney, et al. "John Dolphin's Record Labels." Juke Blues no. 14 (Winter 1988/1989): 14.

Discography: McGrath

Blues from Dolphin's of Hollywood (1991, Ace CDCHD 357).

RECORDING

Technology and Manufacture

Sound recording technology and manufacturing originated in the late nineteenth century and evolved over the course of the twentieth century. The development of recorded sound during this period changed the way music was heard and created. The growth of the sound recording business brought music to larger audiences. The opportunity to record and distribute the music of black Americans grew concurrently with the development of this new sound recording industry.

Acoustic Era, 1877–1925

Thomas Edison recorded the first known sound of a human voice on a tinfoil strip wrapped around a cylinder in 1877. He quickly sought patents to cover his invention and set out to improve on and exploit it. Neither of these efforts bore fruit immediately, and it was not until 1889 that the Columbia firm first produced music recordings for public consumption. In 1885, Chichester Bell and Charles Taintie improved the recording process by using wax-coated cylinders. In 1887, Emile Berliner developed flat disks with lateral cut grooves to record the sound.

The first commercial cylinders initially appeared in 1890. They appeared in coin-operated machines where patrons could listen to recordings at drugstores, hotels, bars, and county and state fairs. Duplication of recorded music for these machines was very limited.

A giant acoustic recording horn attached to a stylus could only make one cylinder at a time. To produce more than one cylinder required multiple recording machines to be crowded in the studio area with a small band performing the same song thirty times over the course of a three-hour session. In this way 300 cylinders of a song could be produced. A singer's voice was not as strong as a small band and could only be recorded by a few horns at a time.

The first gramophone records went on sale to the American public in 1894. Emile Berliner had developed a way to create a metal master recording from a lampblack-coated lead disk, which was dipped in an acid bath after recording. He then was able to manufacture records by pressing hard rubber disks with the metal master. In 1896, he began using shellac as the recording surface of the manufactured disk.

This increased efficiency in manufacturing a disk allowed it to succeed in the commercial marketplace over the cylinder. The disk was also played back in louder volume, it was more durable, and it was easier to store. In spite of the advantage of the recorded sound disk, the Edison Company continued to produce cylinders until 1929. In either case, the quality of music that was recorded was very limited in these early sound recordings.

The first disks that played at approximately 78 revolutions per minute were introduced in 1901 and were manufactured in a variety of nonstandard diameters. The Victrola, which was the first sound player designed as a piece of furniture, went on sale in 1906. The Victrola had the turntable, spring-driven motor, and audio horn built and concealed in a cabinet. Other makes through 1925 were based on this model, including those manufactured by the Wisconsin Chair Company.

Electric and 78-rpm Era, 1925–1948

The KDKA radio station in Pittsburgh went on the air with the first live commercial broadcast in 1920. The advent of live radio in the early part of the 1920s introduced the new technology of microphones, amplifiers, and sound being transformed into electric impulses. Acoustic recording technology suffered from the limitations of its sound. Recorded acoustic songs sounded tinny, muffled, and scratchy in contrast to the clarity of an early live radio broadcast. Record sales declined as more radio stations went on the air, including WSM in Nashville and WSB in Atlanta.

In 1925, Bell Telephone Laboratories introduced a system of amplifying sound electronically. The first electronically recorded disks went on sale to the public that year. Also, Victor released its Orthophonic Victrola model, which was an acoustic phonograph for electrically recorded disks, and record sales began to climb again.

Electric recording captured a broader sound frequency range. Lower bass range sounds could be heard on record as well as the higher treble range sounds. The electronic microphone also could pick up sound from a greater distance so that singers and musicians no longer had to crowd around the acoustic recording horn in a studio. Later in the early 1930s, radio shows could be prerecorded on longer playing disks that played at 33 1/3 revolutions per minute.

Blues and black sacred music were also recorded and sold directly to radio stations during the 1930s and 1940s on 33 1/3-rpm discs. These labels included Associated, Lang-Worth, Planned Program Services, Thesaurus, and World Transcriptions.

The first Library of Congress recordings began with Robert W. Gordon in the late 1920s. The first electric disk recording machine used in the field for the Archive of Folk Song recordings occurred when John Lomax and his son Alan recorded Huddie Ledbetter (Leadbelly) at the Angola Penitentiary in Louisiana in 1933. (See the separate Alan Lomax and John Avery Lomax entries.)

Another development that occurred during the advent of electrical recording was the growing popularity of jukeboxes. By the mid-1930s, jukeboxes had helped rescue the recording industry when record sales dropped in the earlier Depression years of that decade. These coin-operated machines offered a variety of 78s for customers to listen to in a variety of public settings. Record producers had found yet another way to expand the commercial success of Race records. Popular songs could be selected and heard at restaurants, cafes, drug stores, ice cream soda counters, bars, and dance halls.

The rebound of the record business ended, however, with the United States entering the Second World War in December 1941. Shellac, a significant ingredient in the material for the 78-rpm disks, became scarce during the war as the government restricted its commercial use. The manufacture of records declined sharply as a result. Another problem in the record business during the war years was the competition between live musical performers and the expanding use of the jukebox. James C. Petrillo, head of the American Federation of Musicians union, demanded compensation for being undercut by the playing of music on jukeboxes. The union and its member musicians went on strike in July 1942, refusing to record for the next two years.

LP and 45-rpm Era, 1948–1982

The technical and manufacturing capabilities of sound recording expanded significantly after the Second World War ended in 1945. Decca first produced records with an extended sound range of 14,000 Hz. In 1948, shellac began to be replaced by vinyl whose principal material was polyvinyl chloride or PVC.

The new twelve-inch vinyl records first produced in the United States by Columbia also played at the slower speed of 33 1/3 rpms. They would be called “Long-Play,” or LP, because their sides could contain twenty minutes or more of music. Their playback grooves were narrower, and tone arms on the players were lighter than those on the 78-rpm gramophones. Diamond and sapphire styluses picked up a higher quality of sound from the surface of vinyl records. A year later in 1949, RCA released the first seven-inch vinyl record that played at a speed of 45 rpm. The 45-rpm record generally played one song on each side and came to be known as a “single.” And while 78s would remain available, the newer LPs and 45-rpm singles would increase in sales each year and come to dominate the market.

Magnetic tape had been used since the 1930s but the quality of sound prior to the Second World War was about the same as that of 78s. The German radio broadcasts during World War II used improved recorders and tape. This technology was discovered by the Allied Armed Forces in 1945. By 1947, radio broadcasters and record producers used this technology to make master tapes in the United States.

The results of these technical and manufacturing advances in the recording business allowed longer and better sound fidelity recordings on master tapes. Also, for the first time, the tape could be cut and spliced, which allowed sound engineers to edit the record performances.

RECORDING

RCA was recording music in stereo under studio conditions in late 1953, but the stereo LP did not come into wide commercial distribution until 1958. Previous LPs had been monaural recordings, whereas the stereo LP produced a panorama of sound between two separate speakers. Stereo recording created the sensation of hearing musical sound in a three-dimensional setting.

In 1963, music recorded on cassette tapes was sold for the first time. Their small size and the convenience of handling made cassettes a popular format that rivaled LPs in sales. Home cassette players also could record, which put the easy ability to transfer music from one source to another in the hands of consumers for the first time.

Digital Era, 1982–Present

The digitization of sound began in the late 1960s for the purpose of improving telecommunications and broadcasting. Unlike electrical recording that reproduced the sound wave with electrical impulses, the digital recording process sampled sound at intervals ranging up to 50,000 times a second. Each reading of sound was programmed by a computer. When played back, each digital interval was read and the sound recorded was recreated.

By the late 1970s, digital masters were used to produce some LPs. The digital masters exceeded the LPs in their dynamic range. A digital master captured 96 dB of dynamic range, whereas the LP could only play back a range of 70 dB. Unlike the electrical recording, the digital recording had the potential to provide an exact copy of sound with no loss of quality, although it would not be until the 1990s that such copies could begin to satisfy the most critical listeners.

The first commercial compact disc or CD was introduced in 1982 and the manufactured recording that consumers bought matched the sound quality of the digital master. Other advantages over the LP existed for the CD. Its small size of less than five inches in diameter made for more convenient handling and easier storage. The CD also could carry up to eighty minutes of sound, nearly double the duration of a vinyl LP disc.

Other technical developments in the late twentieth century for sound recording included the introduction in 1990 of the Moving Pictures Experts Group 1, Layer 3, or MP3. This allowed digital music files to be compressed by a factor of more than ten. Recorded music could then be easily transferred from one computer to another, albeit with a substantial reduction in sound quality.

In 1995, RealAudio became the first major service provider for audio streaming on the Internet. In 1999, the musical file sharing network Napster was established, which allowed peer-to-peer exchange of copyrighted music. These technical and manufacturing changes in the late twentieth century brought a host of copyright challenges to the music industry.

The evolution of recording technology and manufacturing has produced continued improvements in the quality of sound for recorded blues music in live and studio settings. This improved sound capability coincided with a greater access to a once-local folk music genre. This access has created an ongoing discourse about the origins and contexts for blues music.

Examples of this kind of discourse note that early recording sessions may not have recorded all of the significant blues artists of the twentieth century. The early recorded history may be incomplete. The influences on later blues recording artists may not have been local or even blues music.

Paul Oliver contends that the positive side of the discussion is that an important musical form that originated with black Americans was recorded, sold, and broadcast to larger audiences. Second to this point, he states that the improvisational qualities of this musical form that were based on the instance of the performance could be recorded and preserved.

Recording technology has allowed past recorded blues sessions to reemerge during both the LP era and the digital era. The digital recording era has allowed music labels to remaster many older recording sessions dating back to the acoustic era of the early twentieth century. These older recordings have been rereleased on CDs with a quality of sound far superior to the original. These rereleased recordings have also allowed the public an opportunity to hear alternate takes of songs in many sessions.

BILL GRAVES

History of Blues Recording Through 1960

Recordings from the 1890s, whether on cylinders or disks, included a few African American artists, most notably George W. Johnson (1846–1914), a street entertainer whose “Whistling Coon” and “Laughing Song” were best sellers of the era, recorded over and over again for phonograph companies large and small. Louis Vassier (1858–?) recorded voice and banjo pieces along with comic sermons for the Louisiana Phonograph Company of New Orleans in the early 1890s, and became the company’s most popular artist. The Unique Quartette recorded for the New York Phonograph Company as early as 1890, appearing on numerous cylinder releases through 1896. The same company made records of the Standard Quartette from 1891 through 1893. Afterward, the group made cylinders that appeared in Columbia and several other catalogs until 1897. A Standard member, Ed DeMoss, sang on at least two Berliner disks around 1897, with Sam Cousins and a banjo or two. With the exception of George Johnson, none of these performers recorded after 1900. That year saw disk producer Emile Berliner cede his record-producing business to Eldridge Johnson, who formed the Victor Talking Machine Company in 1901. Among the company's early accomplishments was the signing of black vaudeville stars Bert Williams (1874–1922) and his partner George Walker (ca. 1873–1911) to make a handful of records. The Dinwiddie (Colored) Quartet made a series of Victor disks in 1902.

The following eighteen years saw only a handful of black performers in the studios. The most popular were Bert Williams and the Fisk University Jubilee Singers, whose records sold steadily in the 1910s. A white pharmacist, Polk Miller (1844–1913), made several published Edison cylinders with the (African American) Old South Quartette at his home in Richmond, Virginia, in 1909. Bandleader James Reese Europe (1880–1919), music director for the popular dance team Vernon and Irene Castle, made a few spirited Victor records in 1913–1914. But, for the most part, record companies depended on salaried, white house musicians and a handful of trained singers to perform virtually all popular material, including music from African American composers.

The situation began to change with a Victor record by the Original Dixieland Jazz Band in 1917, who demonstrated that a distinctive black-derived performance style could make an artistic and commercial impact on records. Columbia signed W. C. Handy's (1873–1958) Orchestra of Memphis to make records, with an emphasis on the blues that had made him famous. Clarinetist Wilbur Sweatman (1882–1961) recorded for small labels in 1916–1917, and for Columbia in 1918–1920. Bandleader Ford Dabney (1883–1958) made a series of records for Aeolian Vocalion from 1917 through early 1920. Both groups focused on pop tunes of the day. Two noted entertainers, singer Noble Sissle (1889–1975) and pianist Eubie Blake (1883–1983), made a few Pathé disks in 1917. When Jim Europe was commissioned to take a band to France during World War I, Sissle enlisted as well. Pathé recorded them both and the band—in 1919 after they returned from the front.

Meanwhile, blues and blues-related songs had been selling on records since 1914, when two versions of Handy's "Memphis Blues" made an appearance. His "Beale Street Blues," "St. Louis Blues," "Hesitating Blues," and "Joe Turner Blues" all appeared on records before 1920, though rarely by black performers. That situation changed with the recording debut (for OKeh) of the Ohio-born black vaudevillian Mamie Smith (1883–1946), whose "Crazy Blues" became a hit in 1920, revealing to record makers that an untapped audience existed for recordings of black music by black performers, or "Race records." The music of Smith and those who followed her was influenced by the urbane cabaret style exemplified by Sophie Tucker and Marion Harris, though it was still recognizably black, and different from anything else on record.

With the exception of the older Handy, most black record makers before 1920 were born in the early 1880s, and represented the generation before the spread of jazz and blues. Lucille Hegamin (1897–1970) was significantly younger, and the first black entertainer after Mamie Smith to record the blues. Hegamin's "Jazz Me Blues" was recorded in the fall of 1920 for the small Arto label, which began circulating copies throughout the South early in 1921.

Any remaining doubts about the viability of recorded blues soon disappeared, and most labels hastened to sign their own blues singers and cash in on the trend. In order of recording debuts, the 1921 blues talent roster included Mary Stafford (Columbia, January), Lillyn Brown (Emerson, March), Ethel Waters (Cardinal, March), Daisy Martin (Gennett and OKeh, April), Alberta Hunter (Black Swan, May), Alice Leslie Carter (Arto, August), Edith Wilson (Columbia, September), Josephine Carter (OKeh, September), and Esther Bigeou (OKeh, October). All were New York-based women backed by small jazz bands, and few had any staying power. Those who did (Waters, Hunter, and Wilson) distanced themselves from the blues craze and returned to popular music as soon as it became convenient. It was not until 1923 and the advent of Bessie Smith, Ida Cox and "Ma" Rainey that significant career blues singers connected with record makers. Each of those singers had amassed years of southern performing credentials with the TOBA circuit and other regional venues, bringing a feeling for southern life and emotions to their records, which became the first blues documents of lasting worth. Record making immediately became a significant component of their profession, complementing and enhancing their live performances. Male blues singers were conspicuously absent from most early blues records, mostly because the great self-accompanied singer/guitarists were unknown to New York talent brokers.

The Okeh company took portable recording equipment to Atlanta in 1923, primarily to record local talent featured on WSB, the city's popular new radio station. Almost inadvertently a record by Fiddlin' John Carson was made that began the country music industry, and a couple of female blues singers recorded almost as an afterthought. One of them, Lucille Bogan, would create some memorable records after 1930. Atlanta had some notable minstrel guitarists, though no one saw their potential at the time. In 1924, Okeh returned to Atlanta and recorded one Ed Andrews, who sang two pieces with his own accompaniment, becoming the first to make a "country blues" disk. However, the record was unremarkable and it started no trends. More influential was a pair of guitar solos made for Okeh in 1923 by Sylvester Weaver from Louisville. "Guitar Rag" was poorly recorded but it was influential, and among its several covers was Bob Wills's "Steel Guitar Rag" in 1936. Weaver returned to record a number of vocal blues.

Paramount Records, a subsidiary of the Wisconsin Chair Company, decided to become a major player in 1923, signing both Ida Cox and "Ma" Rainey to extended contracts, and recording a number of lesser lights in their Chicago and New York facilities. In 1924 the company recruited "Papa" Charlie Jackson, a gifted and glib vocalist who accompanied himself on a six-string banjo-guitar. Two of his first records, "Salty Dog Blues" and "Shake That Thing," became hits, and were all the more profitable because only one musician was paid to make them. Though neither was a blues in the classic mold, they were early examples of successful recordings by a self-accompanied singer performing in a southern style.

In 1925, a Dallas music retailer persuaded Paramount to record a local street busker, Blind Lemon Jefferson, whose accomplished and emotional music became a matrix for generations of blues singers and guitarists. In 1926, the company scored again with a transplanted Floridian, Blind Blake, whose music matched Jefferson's sophistication. Paramount would have a continuing profitable relationship with both.

With the introduction of electrical recording methods in 1925–1926, the resulting improved sound revolutionized the industry. By this time, other record companies were slowly beginning to emulate the example of Okeh in 1923, and scour the South for local musicians with national potential. Okeh was still the most ambitious operation, traveling to Atlanta, Kansas City, New Orleans, and Dallas to record both black and white regional talent. On a trip to St. Louis in November 1925, Okeh made its first recordings of multi-instrumentalist Lonnie Johnson, whose blues records would dominate the company's catalog through 1932.

Columbia was less adventurous, and managed visits only to Atlanta and New Orleans before 1927. But the company had a license (shared with Victor) to the state-of-the-art Western Electric recording process. Its products clearly trumped those of Okeh, whose "Truetone" electrical recording system was not competitive. Columbia purchased Okeh in 1926, giving Okeh access to its superior technology. Okeh continued its activities independently, but, by 1927, it found its competition actively recording in the South.

Victor, though traveling to Houston, New Orleans, and St. Louis in 1924–1925, recorded almost no black music. Nor would they before the summer of 1926, when the company hired producer Ralph Peer away from Okeh. By then, it was clear that the prestigious company was missing the boat in both the blues and white country music areas and Peer, with his extensive knowledge and contacts, was clearly in a position to bring Victor quickly up to speed. After some initial New York recordings, Peer and a Victor crew set out for Memphis, Atlanta, and New Orleans, securing the first recordings by Blind Willie McTell, the Memphis Jug Band, and other groundbreaking musicians before 1927 ended. (The extended list included country giants Jimmie Rodgers and the Carter Family, whom Peer encountered that summer in Bristol, Tennessee.) By then Victor had made up for lost time, developing both "Race" and "hillbilly" catalogs that soon rivaled even Okeh.

Brunswick Records evolved from a modest start in Canada in 1917 to become a major U.S. label by the early 1920s. A few blues singers appeared on Brunswick in 1923, but the company lost interest until it purchased the Vocalion label late in 1924. Vocalion had also released blues records, and it continued to do so under Brunswick stewardship. The operation shifted into high gear in 1926, when Vocalion introduced a 1000 series devoted to "Race" records. Brunswick followed with a 7000 series in 1927, with specially designed labels employing a lightning motif. Both series lasted through 1932.

Paramount and Gennett continued to be prolific producers of black music, but their low-budget operations precluded field trips to southern locales. Instead, each label depended on recommendations from southern jobbers and retailers to recruit artists, who then traveled to company studios in Richmond, Indiana (Gennett), Chicago (Paramount, 1923–1929), and Grafton, Wisconsin (Paramount, 1929–1932). It was an inefficient procedure, and both companies gradually lost ground to major labels (Brunswick, Columbia, OKeh, Victor, and Vocalion) who accelerated their southern travel schedules during 1927.

Economies of scale and low artist payments meant that gathering and publishing a broad variety of regional blues and gospel (and country) music quickly became profitable. In 1927–1928, trips to Texas were added, primarily to record Spanish-language performers. Fortunately, black performers were recorded on these occasions as well.

In New York, the QRS (Quality Reigns Supreme) piano roll manufacturer decided to produce phonograph records in 1928. They had no field recording schedule and concentrated on local performers, plus talent recruited from areas of the southeast. Despite the motto, the records were poorly and cheaply made, and production lasted only through 1929.

Depression economics hit the recording business hard, leaving only the Victor operation intact after 1932. Neither Paramount nor Gennett retained a significant market share after 1929 and blues records from their final years are extremely rare today. Larger labels continued blues production through 1930–1931, though on a steadily diminishing basis. Southern field trips were severely curtailed by the end of 1930, and were employed only sporadically through 1934. By then, three companies comprised an oligarchy that would control the recorded music business through World War II.

The American Record Corporation (ARC), formed in 1929, was a holding company that acquired numerous labels through the Depression, including Brunswick, Columbia, OKeh, Vocalion, and several low-priced brands. One was Conqueror, marketed exclusively through the Sears, Roebuck department store chain. Most of the labels atrophied as the 1930s progressed, and were discontinued after the Columbia Broadcasting System (CBS) radio network purchased ARC in 1938. Vocalion became CBS's sole blues label through 1940, though selected issues still appeared on Conqueror. In 1940, a revived OKeh label replaced Vocalion.

Victor experimented with several low-priced labels before settling on Bluebird, and a 35-cent retail charge, in 1933. A special series was created for Montgomery Ward department stores that included reissues of Victor country material from the 1920s and new music (including blues) derived from Bluebird. Decca Records, formed in 1934, unsettled the industry by marketing all of its popular records at 35 cents, when 75 cents was the prevailing price elsewhere. By then, all blues and country records were available for 35 cents or less.

With the demise of Prohibition in 1933, jukeboxes provided entertainment in bars and taverns everywhere, and the demand for records expanded rapidly. Jukeboxes excelled at playing music loud, making it audible for dancers over noisy bar room environments. Blues records made after 1935 usually featured heavier rhythms, provided by bass, piano, guitar, and/or drums. Performers such as Memphis Minnie, Big Bill Broonzy, and Bumble Bee Slim (Vocalion), Peetie Wheatstraw, the Harlem Hamfats, and Johnnie Temple (Decca), and Sonny Boy Williamson, Washboard Sam, and Tampa Red (Bluebird) dominated the era. Most were in the employ of the Chicago music publisher Lester Melrose, who brokered sessions in that city for Bluebird and Vocalion. Melrose's session recordings had what may be termed "the Bluebird sound," resulting from using repeatedly in the studio a relatively small group of musicians associated with Big Bill Broonzy and Tampa Red.

As the economy improved during the mid- to late 1930s, commercial labels resumed some of their field recording activity, although not at the same level they had during the late 1920s. But it was during this later time that the Mississippi Sheiks and Sonny Boy Nelson (pseudonym for Eugene Powell) recorded in New Orleans for Bluebird in 1936, the Graves Brothers recorded in Hattiesburg, Mississippi, for ARC in 1936, and Robert Johnson recorded in Texas in 1936–1937.

Most of these performers continued to enjoy popularity through the war years, even when record production was curtailed by a lack of raw materials. Most recording activities were halted after July 31, 1942, when an AFM (American Federation of Musicians) strike kept musicians out of the studios until the fall of 1943, when Decca became the first of the majors to come to terms with the union. Victor and Columbia held out for another year.

During the war years, small independent record operations sprang up around the country to fill the void left by major label inactivity. There had been early stirrings in Los Angeles, where independent studios had formed in the 1930s to serve the film industry. The Bronze and Ammor labels published records by local black artists between 1939 and 1941. Songwriter Leon René fathered Ammor, and would beget the Exclusive label in 1944. His brother Otis founded Excelsior the same year. Black and white southwesterners migrated in large numbers to California during the war, creating a bottomless pool of talent for new labels to draw on. Startup outfits Aladdin, 4-Star, Gilt Edge, Globe, and Modern Hollywood were all in business by the war's end.

Elsewhere, King/Queen debuted in Cincinnati, and there were Mercury in Chicago, and Apollo and Commodore in New York. Even after major labels resumed recording, the independents continued to sprout like weeds. Many failed because of inadequate capital, poor management, and competitive pressure, but a few, like King, Atlantic, Mercury, Savoy, Chess, and Imperial, would be major players by 1950, and remain profitable for years. They built impressive catalogs of varying combinations of blues, rhythm and blues, gospel, and country. Stars such as Wynonie Harris (King), Ruth Brown (Atlantic), Nappy Brown (Savoy), Muddy Waters (Chess), and Fats Domino (Imperial) were their creations and, with many colleagues, would place African American popular music at the forefront of the industry by 1955. “Down-home” blues artists such as Brownie McGhee, Lightnin’ Hopkins, and John Lee Hooker flourished in this environment too, making records that appeared on a variety of labels. Muddy Waters, Howlin’ Wolf, and Little Walter had permanent contracts with Chess Records, as did Li’l Son Jackson with Imperial. Others of their ilk only recorded sporadically, and usually for marginal labels.

By the end of the 1950s, the black audience for down-home or “country” blues had waned, and the slack was taken up by young white fans who were enthusiastic about a broad range of “folk” music, including the blues. In New York, producer Moe Asch had been selling blues to cosmopolitan purchasers since 1949 on his Folkways label. In 1957, Chess began to produce LP disks of earlier singles by Muddy Waters, Howlin’ Wolf, Little Walter, and Sonny Boy Williamson, with several in a series dubbed “The Real Folk Blues.” Riverside, Prestige, and other jazz-oriented labels began adding blues to their catalogs, and small collector-operated outfits began to produce reissues of Charley Patton, Henry Thomas, Son House, Bukka White, and others like them from early 78-rpm pressings.

Soon, the young white fans were playing the blues on their own. Some, like Paul Butterfield and Charlie Musselwhite, created “blues bands” with rock elements. Others, like Dave van Ronk and John Hammond, performed as soloists, emulating more traditional models.

RICHARD SPOTISWOOD

Recording Since 1960

1960–1990

With its capacity to hold up to twenty-five minutes of music per twelve-inch side, or fifty minutes total, the vinyl LP offered new, extended means of presenting blues performances past and present. Historical reissues of prewar blues could now offer more comprehensive overviews of a career or regional style than previously possible on a two-sided 78-rpm disk (such as those by the SD [Steiner Davis] label in 1944–1945). An important early compilation was the six-LP Anthology of American Folk Music assembled by Harry Smith and issued in 1952 on Folkways. It presented various styles of secular and sacred music by black and white musicians recorded before 1932. Among the bluesmen included were Henry Thomas, Furry Lewis, and Charley Patton (as the Masked Marvel, a pseudonym given to him by Paramount Records during a 1929 promotion). Other labels like Riverside and Columbia reissued recordings by “classic” blues singers, and Columbia’s 1961 reissues of Leroy Carr and of Robert Johnson were significant forays outside “classic” blues of the 1920s. Through the mid-1950s, jazz and blues LPs were as likely to be ten inches in diameter as twelve, and were certain to be collections of an artist’s “greatest hits”; hence, Bullmoose Jackson’s 1952 King label double-entendre hit record, “Big Ten Inch Record.” As it was, King Records offered many LPs of jump-blues and urban piano boogie, some of which are collector’s items today. On the other hand, rural “down-home” artists, including those who migrated to the big cities in the north, would not be represented on a 12-inch LP until 1957 with The Best of Muddy Waters (Chess LP 1427), a packaging of his hit singles. Similar collections of Chess hits would be issued for Howlin’ Wolf and Sonny Boy Williamson II.

In 1959, with the popular music success of the Kingston Trio’s “Tom Dooley” on Capitol Records, and the success of the 1959 Newport Folk Festival, the folk revival on stage and on records was under way. Elektra and Folkways presented Jesse Fuller, Sonny Terry, and Josh White on LP. K. C. Douglas’s LP A Dead Beat Guitar and the Mississippi Blues appeared in 1952 on the Cook label, and in 1957 Sam Charters issued a newly recorded collection American Skiffle Bands with Gus Cannon, and the Memphis Jug Band. Several of the Chess LP anthologies mentioned above were titled The Real Folk Blues, although most of the tracks included were very much urban in sound and commercial in sensibility. In 1959 Waters recorded for Chess an album of Bill Broonzy songs, although the repertoire was not regular in Waters’s live performances, and even if it was, it would have been performed with his full band, not with Waters alone accompanying himself with guitar.

Little by little the sound of live blues as heard in a cultural context came to be recorded. Important efforts were presented by producer/folklorist Kenneth Goldstein in the Prestige Bluesville series, including albums devoted to Lightnin' Hopkins (many of those produced by Mack McCormick), Wade Walton, Lonnie Johnson, and Big Joe Williams. The documentary field recordings made in 1933–1942 by John and Alan Lomax for the Library of Congress were compiled and released on a series of LPs issued by the Library on its own label. Additional and later Alan Lomax recordings of southern field chanters and musicians were released on the Atlantic and Prestige labels in the late 1950s. Another important set of tapes were those recorded by Harry Oster of Angola (Louisiana) prisoners; their release on Folk-Lyric to critical acclaim led to the post-prison career of the most striking of the Angola musicians, Robert Pete Williams.

The improvement of portable recording equipment in the 1950s made possible high-fidelity on-location recordings of musicians performing “live” before audiences. The possibilities were shown in RCA Victor’s best-selling two-LP set of Harry Belafonte’s 1959 Carnegie Hall concert, which included African American songs during the first portion. Vanguard released several live performances from 1959 to 1960 of Odetta from the Newport Folk Festival, New York’s Town Hall, and Carnegie Hall. Muddy Waters’s appearance with his regular band with pianist Otis Spann at the 1960 Newport Folk Festival was released on Chess; the riots the night before lent the recording a documentary value in addition to its musical content. Recordings made in black venues in the early 1960s are some of the most thrilling to exist, especially Ray Charles with Marjorie Hendricks in Atlanta in 1959, James Brown’s 1962 Apollo Theater show, B. B. King’s Live at the Regal from his fall 1964 shows at Chicago’s Regal Theater, Gene Chandler’s “Rainbow ’65 parts one and two” also recorded at the Regal, and Etta James Rocks the House taped in Nashville in 1965.

Eventually in 1965 electric blues came to be captured in the studio within reasonable sonic stereo fidelity and without worry about duration of performance, that is, not having to fit—or expand—a song to a three-minute 45-rpm single side. One three-LP series, Chicago/The Blues/Today! produced by Samuel Charters for Vanguard, recorded nine different blues acts, with songs lasting from two to six minutes. A contrasting approach was taken by Bob Koester of Delmark Records, who through 1965 had twelve years of jazz and “classic” blues LP production experience. He applied the Delmark session methods to Junior Wells’s band with Buddy Guy to produce Hoodoo Man Blues (Delmark DS 612) to replicate the club manner of improvising and performing in a listener’s living room, mirroring the fact that for many laborers who were hearing Wells in Chicago clubs like Theresa’s, the clubs were quite like their living rooms. A follow-up success for Delmark was Magic Sam’s West Side Soul (Delmark DS 615), which captured his informality, inventiveness, and expressivity.

Koester also ran the Jazz Record Mart, which was and remains today the leading jazz and blues record store in Chicago and arguably in the country. Several labels were founded by Koester’s former employees at his label or at his store, including Bruce Kaplan (Flying Fish), Michael Frank (Earwig), and most notably Bruce Iglauer (Alligator). Iglauer began Alligator with the intent of recording guitarist Hound Dog Taylor after failing to interest Koester in recording for Delmark. Hound Dog Taylor and the Houserockers was duly released on Alligator LP 4701 in 1971, its success leading to two additional Alligator studio LPs with Taylor, as well as an international touring career for the Chicago musician. Not to be overlooked in Alligator’s early history was its second LP artist, Son Seals, a bluesman whose vocals and guitar were equal in expressive power to Taylor’s.

Rural southern blues recorded before 1942 were getting reissued on LP. Much of this activity was due to the folk music revival, to the success of Samuel Charters’ The Country Blues (New York: Rinehart, 1959) and Paul Oliver’s Blues Fell This Morning (London: Cassell, 1960) in calling new attention to the blues. Charters released several reissues on RBF, a label created for him by Moe Asch. There were also the efforts of a handful of collectors, especially Pete Whelan and Bernard Klatzko, in recovering rare 78s from oblivion. In 1961, Whelan and Bill Givens began the Origin Jazz Library (OJL) label with an issue of Charlie Patton, the Mississippi prewar great whose performances had been out of print since his 1934 death. The second OJL LP, Really! The Country Blues (1962) answered Charters’ LP The Country Blues by presenting Son House and Willie Brown, among other southern artists, in prewar recordings. A considerable achievement was OJL 12 and 13, In the Spirit (1996), which presented prewar sanctified sacred recordings. Meanwhile, a new reissue label was appearing, begun by Nick Perls, who had built an impressive collection of pre-1942 blues 78s. His label, initially called Belzona but renamed Yazoo, would release prior to his death in 1986 seventy-three LPs of blues from Mississippi, the Carolinas, St. Louis, and Atlanta, with new collections of Patton, Skip James, Peetie Wheatstraw, and Willie McTell. Other notable labels from the 1970s into the early 1980s were Klatzko's revival of the Herwin label, with its landmark reissues of Henry Thomas and of Gus Cannon; Don Kent's Mamlish label; and Rosetta Reitz's Rosetta, which specialized in various styles of women's blues performances.

One result of this renewed interest in old 78s was the rediscovery of the men and women who made them. Columbia's 1965 sessions with Son House were a rare instance of a major label working with a rediscovery. Otherwise, new recordings of old legends were being done by independent labels such as Dick and Louisa Spottswood's Piedmont and Melodeon labels (for the first rediscovery recordings of John Hurt and of Skip James), and John Fahey's Takoma (for Bukka White). Later, small labels handled both reissues and new sessions. One of the most enduring and eclectic is Arhoolie, which was established in 1960 by Chris Strachwitz, and its subsidiary Blues Classics. In addition to reissues of Sonny Boy Williamson II's Trumpet material and Lightnin' Hopkins's Gold Star sessions, and of Harry Oster's Folk-Lyric field and prison recordings, Strachwitz recorded new material with Hopkins, Mance Lipscomb, Earl Hooker, Fred McDowell, and he released the field recordings of George Mitchell. Working seemingly in parallel with Strachwitz, Frank Scott recorded West Coast acoustic blues talent like Thomas Shaw for his Advent label; over the years Scott has operated the Roots and Rhythm mail-order record business. There was also Pete Welding's Testament label, which presented a variety of LPs, including recent recordings by Dr. Isaiah Ross and Robert Night-hawk, and an album devoted to topical songs on John F. Kennedy's assassination. Another notable label has been Arnold Caplin's Biograph founded in 1967, which reissued prewar music, but also issued Bukka White's Big Daddy LP in 1973.

It should be remembered that from the 1950s through the 1970s, contemporary blues and soul blues records to the black market sold very well, often selling better than the blues records aimed at white collectors. Ruth Brown helped to establish Atlantic in rhythm and blues. Ray Charles developed his soul style during his years recording for Atlantic in the 1950s, then crossed over into mainstream popular music success when he recorded for ABC-Paramount the song "Georgia on My Mind" and the album Modern Sounds in Country and Western. B. B. King was a high seller for the Bihari brothers' Modern label with songs like "Three O'Clock in the Morning," "Sweet Sixteen," and "Please Love Me," and later he would be a mainstay on the ABC label and its BluesWay subsidiary, then coming to MCA where in 1969 he released his landmark "The Thrill Is Gone."

Bobby Bland was perhaps the biggest star for Duke Records, staying with the label for about twenty years, and several of the album covers (such as that for Call on Me, 1963) were designed to appeal to the women who bought his records. James Brown was the innovative blues, soul, and funk artist for King in the 1960s and early 1970s, and his anthems like "Say It Loud (I'm Black and I'm Proud)" were played heavily on black radio, jukeboxes, in cars, and around neighborhoods. These and other stars—Dinah Washington, Koko Taylor, Albert King, Isaac Hayes, Johnnie Taylor, the Staples Singers, among many others—enjoyed stellar success through recordings, and younger artists would enjoy initial success through singles hits through the early 1970s, including Aaron Neville, and Peggy Scott-Adams with Jo Jo Benson.

Alligator continued to develop after its early success with Hound Dog Taylor and Son Seals. It brought to greater prominence Albert Collins including his LP Ice Pickin' and it sustained Koko Taylor's post-Chess recording career. It had a notable series with Living Chicago Blues, presenting many local acts deserving good recordings yet not having enough commercial interest for a whole album. One of the most memorable Alligator releases of the 1980s was Showdown! (1986) featuring Albert Collins, Johnny Clyde Copeland, and Robert Cray, a newcomer enjoying mainstream success with his Strong Persuader LP for Mercury.

European labels carried the torch for American blues, even as interest for the music was ebbing in the United States. In the 1960s and early 1970s, labels like Saydisc and Xtra were issuing new and old performances of American musicians, and Paul Oliver arranged through British CBS to issue several illustrative albums to his book Story of the Blues (London, Barrie and Rockcliff: The Cresset Press, 1969) and the first four volumes of his Blues Series editions for Studio Vista/Stein and Day. Through the 1980s, Americans performing abroad took opportunities to record whole albums for labels like Black & Blue and Swingmaster, or to appear on anthologies such as those on Southland Records. L+R Records released the Living Country Blues USA series from the tapes of Axel Kuestner in the early 1980s, and it issued several albums of material from the American Folk Blues Festival tours. Ace Records in England began reissuing classic jump-blues and rhythm and blues of the 1940s and 1950s. In the early 1970s, Johnny Parth with Evelyn Parth was issuing classic southern blues, including the 1930 complete surviving recordings of Son House, Willie Brown, Louise Johnson, and Bukka White, and alternate takes of Robert Johnson. Mr. R&B, a Swedish label run by Jonas Bernholm, issued many important collections of jump-blues.

The 45-rpm disk continued to be used, especially for jukebox and radio play, and many soul labels were issuing new music in that format for home enjoyment. Stax and Volt, Malaco, and Hi Records enjoyed many radio and sales hits, sustaining the recording of soul music and helping to push the boundaries of the blues. Through the 1980s and into the 1990s, several labels were issuing traditional and acoustic blues on 45s, including High Water, Rooster Blues, and Jewel, although more for jukebox or local sales in the recording artist's vicinity.

The activity recounted here, however various, was at a low production and fiscal level; it was not unusual for a blues issue to be pressed in a run of hundreds, not thousands of copies. This is in contrast to the high production and sales of the 1960s and 1970s records of the Rolling Stones, Led Zeppelin, and other blues-based rock bands. These acts were inspired in part by Chess artists Muddy Waters and Howlin' Wolf, and the 1961 Columbia LP of Robert Johnson. The reissues of their music in the late 1980s and 1990s were to pave the way for the blues boom to come.

1990 to the Present

The compact disc and its playback equipment were introduced in American stores in Spring 1983; they came to Europe and Japan in late 1982. CD technology was significantly improved in 1986 and again in 1988. For some years through 1992, an initial release of a new recording was on both LP and CD, as was the case for Sam Cooke's Live at the Harlem Square Club 1963. One advantage that the CD had over the LP was its longer playing time, up to seventy-five minutes (later eighty minutes). In blues it had the potential for adding alternate takes and other special features for fans and collectors. Among the first to realize this was Bob Koester at Delmark Records, who added alternate takes to the CD releases of Junior Wells's Hoodoo Man Blues and Magic Sam's West Side Soul.

The package that showed that there was a huge potential for blues on CD was Robert Johnson: The Complete Recordings (Sony/Columbia/Legacy C2K 46222) released in 1990, produced by Lawrence Cohn with research and copyrights from Stephen LaVere. Initial sales were expected to be 20,000 or 30,000, but they were instead ten times that many. The success was due in part to familiarity with Johnson's songs through rock groups, and also in part to the fact that a blues musician's entire recorded legacy fit on two CDs and hence on a customer's palm, and it was affordable at twenty dollars. Its high sales made possible several excellent follow-up Legacy reissues including Cohn's Roots and Blues box, the complete Blind Willie Johnson set with notes by Samuel Charters, a five-box reissue of Bessie Smith with notes by Chris Albertson, and single CDs devoted to Bukka White, Willie McTell, Leadbelly, John Hurt, and Lucille Bogan. Although there was a three-LP issue of the Johnson recordings simultaneously, it was the two-CD set that sold in remarkable numbers. The wide success encouraged other labels—some of new music, others of reissues—to develop their CD catalogs.

In the wake of Sony/Columbia's success in launching the Legacy series, a number of labels devoted to reissuing prewar blues began on CD. One was Shanachie's continuation of Yazoo, under the direction of Richard Nevins with assistance of Don Kent. They converted the LP issues to CD and offered new compilations, including its Times Ain't Like What They Used to Be, Before the Blues, as well as its eclectic world music series The Secret Museum of Mankind. Johnny Parth had established Document as an LP label, reissuing rare and/or otherwise unavailable performances of well-known artists. With the appearance of CD technology, Parth planned the Document series of "Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order," with the goal of reissuing every blues and gospel prewar performance on CD, save for those handled on Sony/Columbia and other major labels. Although during the 1980s LP and early CD reissue labels had largely complemented one another's work, the Document CD reissue series eventually took over the "complete recordings in chronological order" market. By the time he sold the label in 1999, he had largely succeeded in returning to print not only the Mississippi and Memphis blues masters, but also reviving the recordings of Leroy Carr and Scrapper Blackwell, Lonnie Johnson, Roosevelt Sykes, Peetie Wheatstraw, Ida Cox, Sara Martin, Clara Smith, Lucille Bogan, and hundreds of other artists celebrated or obscure.

Meanwhile, MCA embarked on a successful series of reissues of the Chess catalog that it acquired in the early 1980s. During the last years of the LP, MCA reissued many classic blues LPs with the original cover artwork; many of those albums had CD equivalents, too. But around 1990 MCA embarked on its Chess Box series, giving career overviews of five LPs or three CDs of key figures Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, Willie Dixon, Chuck Berry, and Bo Diddley. Andy McKaie directed the series with assistance from Mary Katherine Aldin, especially for Muddy Waters: The Complete Plantation Recordings, and the women blues anthology Men Are Like Streetcars.

Delmark and Alligator continued in the 1990s with their rosters of artists and back catalogs. Among Alligator's leading artists on CDs were Luther Allison and Corey Harris, and excellent releases by Saffire—The Uppity Blues Women. Other labels enjoyed good business too, such as Michael Frank's Earwig releases of David "Honey Boy" Edwards and of Big Jack Johnson. Johnson later went over to M. C. Records as a leading artist for that label. Testament's activity was halted by its owner Pete Welding's untimely death in 1995, but it was sustained by Bruce Bromberg at HighTone Records. Other labels came to the fore including Ruf Records and Burnside Records.

Mississippi in the 1990s became a focal point for recording by labels within the state and others outside. One of the notable releases was the 1991 soundtrack album to Robert Mugge's film Deep Blues with live performances of R. L. Burnside, Junior Kimbrough, Jessie Mae Hemphill, Jack Owens, Frank Frost, and Big Jack Johnson. In Oxford, Mississippi, Fat Possum Records was established by Peter Lee in 1991 with Matthew Johnson, having Burnside and Kimbrough on the initial roster, with T-Model Ford and Paul "Wine" Jones added after Johnson took over the label in 1994–1995. Burnside's A Ass Pocket of Whiskey (1994) with Jon Spencer combined blues with punk rock; however mixed the results may seem to some listeners, the album sold enough to young rock record buyers for the label to survive and experiment. More traditional was Rooster Blues, a Chicago label that founder Jim O'Neal brought to Clarksdale, Mississippi. O'Neal retained Eddie Shaw and Eddy Clearwater for some while after his move, but he soon produced CDs with modern Delta musicians Lonnie Shields, Booba Barnes, and Lonnie Pitchford, as well as the last studio recordings of James "Son" Thomas.

Also located in Mississippi in Jackson is Malaco Records, which, after the demise of Stax Records, emerged as the leading soul label of the 1980s onward. A key talent was Bobby Bland in 1986, who resumed his string of classic records with For Members Only. By 1990 Malaco had taken up the Savoy gospel catalog and released the Jackson Southernaires, and it was maintaining the Waldoxy subsidiary. Other significant southern soul artists for Malaco were Johnnie Taylor, Little Milton, Denise LaSalle, and Z. Z. Hill, with occasional releases by Bobby Rush and Latimore.

Rounder distributed many labels, including Bullseye, Black Top, Tone-Cool, and Smithsonian Folkways, in addition to its own imprint. Rounder had begun in 1971 with releases in blues, old-time music, and Louisiana music. Bullseye cast a wide stylistic net, from Ronnie Earl and Pat Boyack, to Roomful of Blues, Smokey Wilson, and Lowell Fulson. Tone-Cool has Paul Rishell and Annie Raines, Rod Piazza, Susan Tedeschi (whose Just Won't Burn release was hugely popular), and the North Mississippi All-Stars.

Overview boxes and series helped newcomers to the blues. The Smithsonian Institution, having made its name in the 1970s with its Smithsonian Collection of Classic Jazz set, released blues sets The Blues (1994), which concentrated on acoustic blues, and the follow-up Mean Old World (1996) on postwar to contemporary electric blues. In 1992–1998 Rhino Records released eighteen volumes of its Blues Masters anthologies. Other sets deepened examination, including Revenant's Charley Patton box (2001), Dust-to-Digital's Goodbye Babylon (2003), and Mosaic's T-Bone Walker set (1995). B. B. King (1992, MCA) was an important retrospective that was imitated by other blues boxes on single careers.

European labels maintained their releases. JSP produced new artists like Chris Beard, UP Wilson, and the Butler Twins who were unlikely to be signed in the United States; it has also issued a number of three- to five-disc sets. Wolf Records in Vienna issued much country blues, but it made available many performances of contemporary Chicago blues artists such as Magic Slim, Deitra Farr, Zora Young, and Boston Blackie. Ace Records has produced many excellent packages of postwar blues, including jump-blues, and of those affiliated with the Bihari brothers' Modern Records. Pea-Vine of Japan produced some of the most interesting reissues, including a Charley Patton set with notes and transcriptions by Jim O'Neal in 1992.

Some audiovisual presentations of blues were available on film through the 1980s, but the VHS videotape format made it possible for many older performances to be issued for home enjoyment. Shanachie, through the Yazoo Home Video subsidiary, issued the films shot in the early 1970s by the Seattle Folklore Society of Son House, Fred McDowell, Bukka White, Big Joe Williams, Sonny Terry, and others. Vestapol issued the 1966 The Beat! performances of Freddy King, Alan Lomax footage from Newport in 1966, and guitar lessons from Stefan Grossman. Other important films were Out of the Blacks and into the Blues, And This Is Free, and Wild Women Don't Have the Blues. For overall context, California Newsreel has made available the notable trilogy of documentaries by Marlon Riggs that depicted racial matters, Black Is—Black Ain't, Color Adjustment, and Ethnic Notions.

DVDs have eased manufacturers' duplication of film and videos, and more treasures have been unearthed. To date, three volumes of the American Folk Blues Festival performances of the 1960s have been released. The seven films of the series Martin Scorsese Presents the Blues were issued on Sony in longer edits than when they were originally broadcast on PBS television in September 2003.

Recordings will always remain secondary sources; the ideal primary source would be witnessing the musicians as part of an audience. Obviously as time passes, and musicians become older, retired, or deceased, that ideal primary source will not last. But the future of blues performance recording through sight and sound presentations offers the chances of becoming ever closer to that ideal primary source.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Technology and Manufacture

- Brooks, Tim. Lost Sounds: Blacks and the Birth of the Recording Industry, 1890–1919. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2004.
- Cowley, John, and Paul Oliver, eds. The New Blackwell Guide to Recorded Blues. Oxford: Blackwell Publishers, 1996.
- Day, Timothy. A Century of Recorded Music: Listening to Musical History. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2000.
- Dixon, Robert M. W., John Godrich, and Howard Rye. Blues & Gospel Records 1890–1943. 4th ed. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Fabrizio, Timothy C., and George F. Paul. The Talking Machine: An Illustrated Compendium, 1877–1929. Atglen, PA: Schiffer, 1997.
- Ord-Hume, Arthur W. J. G., Jerome F. Weber, John Borwick, and D. E. E. L. "Recorded Sound." In The New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, edited by Stanley Sadie, Vol. 21, pp. 7–37. London: Macmillan, 2001.
- Schoenherr, Steve. "Recording Technology History: Notes Revised Feb. 16, 2004." <http://history.sandiego.edu/gen/recording/notes.html> (accessed September 20, 2004).
- Taintor, Callie. "Chronology: Technology and the Music Industry." May 27, 2004, <http://www.pbs.org/wgbh/pages/frontline/shows/music/inside/cron.html> (accessed September 20, 2004).
- Welch, Walter L., and Leah Brodbeck Stenzel Burt. From Tinfoil to Stereo. Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 1994.
- Wile, Raymond R. "The Gramophone Becomes a Success in America, 1896–1898." Association of Recorded Sound Collections Journal 27, no. 2 (Fall 1996): 139–170.

History of Blues Recording

- Brooks, Tim. Lost Sounds: Blacks and the Birth of the Recording Industry, 1890–1919. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2004.
- Dixon, Robert M. W., John Godrich, and Howard Rye. Blues & Gospel Records. 4th ed. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Gronow, Pekka, and Ilpo Saunio. An International History of the Recording Industry. London and New York: Cassell, 1998.
- McGrath, Bob. The R&B Indies. 2 vols. West Vancouver, Canada: Author, 2000.

RECTOR, MILTON

d. 4 April 1994; Chicago, IL

Chicago bassist active in jazz and blues. In the late 1940s he led a jazz band with Johnnie Johnson as pianist. In the 1950s and 1960s he contributed signature bass runs for records by Jimmy Reed and Aleck Miller "Sonny Boy Williamson II," as well as for J. B. Lenoir and Homesick James. Writer Eugene Chadbourne mentions an interesting point of comparison, Rector's bass line on Sonny Boy Williamson's "Help Me" recorded in January 1963, with Lewie Steinberg's similar line recorded some months before on Booker T and the MGs recording of "Green Onions."

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne)

RED LIGHTNIN'

Label devoted to postwar blues operated by Peter Shertser and Ian Sippen, founded in Ilford, England, in 1968, moving to Diss, Norfolk, in the early 1970s. The catalog mixed new recordings with reissues from American sources. Notable also were the soundtracks of the film Chicago Blues and the Devil's Music television series. Trading ceased in the late 1990s.

HOWARD RYE

RED ROOSTER, THE

"The Red Rooster" was written by Willie Dixon and was first recorded by Howlin' Wolf in 1961 for Chess Records. The song, which is often titled "Little Red Rooster," became a classic of postwar Chicago blues and was subsequently recorded by many diverse musicians including Sam Cooke (whose version reached number eleven on the pop charts in 1963), Z. Z. Hill, and Luther Allison, as well as the rock groups the Rolling Stones, the Grateful Dead, and the Doors. The original song's popularity is credited to Howlin' Wolf's powerful singing and ethereal slide guitar playing, as well as Dixon's captivating poetic imagery.

Though a Dixon composition, much of the lyrical ideas of "The Red Rooster" can be traced to earlier blues traditions. The song's underlying theme dates back to the first generation of recorded blues and the folk beliefs of southern African Americans of the early twentieth century. At that time, it was a widely held superstition that the crowing of a rooster was a warning of the presence of a stranger. In turn, a rooster could be used to watch one's house, just as a dog might be used today. Mississippi Delta blues pioneer and Howlin' Wolf mentor Charley Patton recorded "Banty Rooster Blues" for Paramount Records in 1929 and sang

I'm gonna buy me a banty, put him at my back door.
So he see a stranger comin' he'll flop his wings and crow.

The stranger mentioned by Patton is the infamous "back door man," or secret lover. In "The Red Rooster," the singer complains that his rooster is too lazy to crow before daybreak, therefore allowing the stranger's clandestine predawn visits to his spouse to go unnoticed. His life is clearly in disarray because of the situation as he completes the first verse, and he uses the metaphor of the upset barnyard to represent his current agonizing circumstances.

The second verse is a cautionary boast of just what the rooster is capable of doing. The singer warns the unwelcome stranger of the telltale signs of barking and howling dogs when the little red rooster is doing his job. The use of the color red is also significant as being the color associated with an alarm or danger.

Another influential prewar blues singer and guitarist, Memphis Minnie, used a similar theme in her 1936 recording for Vocalion Records, "If You See My Rooster (Please Run Him Home)." Although Minnie's symbolism of the rooster is used figuratively to represent her missing lover, the song's lyrical structure most likely inspired "The Red Rooster's" final verse. Dixon borrows a plea similar to Minnie's, but alters the meaning. The singer is now desperate to get his missing rooster back. He once again states how his life is in disorder since his rooster has been gone and is no longer keeping strangers away.

Beginning with Howlin' Wolf, "The Red Rooster" has been traditionally recorded by male singers. One notable exception is female blues singer Willie Mae "Big Mama" Thornton, who recorded the song several times throughout her career and featured it in many of her live shows.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- Calt, Stephen, and Gayle Wardlow. King of the Delta Blues: The Life and Music of Charlie Patton. Newton, NY: Rock Chapel Press, 1988.
- Dixon, Willie, and Don Snowden. I Am the Blues: The Willie Dixon Story. New York: Da Capo, 1989.
- Whitburn, Joel. Top R&B Singles: 1942-1999. Port Washington, WI: Record Research, 2000.

REED, A. C.

b. Aaron Corthen, 9 May 1926; Wardell, MO
d. 25 February 2004; Chicago, IL

Tenor saxophone player, vocalist, who played modern electric Chicago blues—tough, gritty sax tone combined with tongue-in-cheek lyrics. Reed moved to Chicago in the early 1940s and bought his first sax. He studied music at the Chicago Music Conservatory so he could play big band swing (which he never pursued) and got his start playing around Chicago with blues guitarist Earl Hooker. In 1948, Reed joined pianist Willie Mabon's band. Elmore James's sax player J. T. Brown coached Reed in the ins and outs of playing blues. In 1956, Reed joined ex-Ike Turner bassist Dennis "Long Man" Binder's group and toured the Southwest. In the early 1960s, Reed reunited with Hooker with whom he played numerous sessions for producer Mel London's Chief and Age labels. During the 1960s, Reed recorded as a vocalist for small Chicago labels including Nike, Cool, and USA. In 1967, Reed joined Buddy Guy's band. In 1970, the band toured as the opening act for the Rolling Stones. Reed briefly joined Son Seals' band in 1977, then was recruited by Albert Collins in 1978, with whom he toured and recorded for the next five years, playing on Collins's first five Alligator Records recordings. With Collins, Reed developed an international following. That, coupled with the 1980 Living Chicago Blues Vol. 3 album (which featured Reed on four cuts), helped launch his solo career. Reed's 1982 solo debut album on the Ice Cube label (cofounded by Collins's drummer Casey Jones) Take These Blues and Shove 'Em was later reissued by Rooster Blues. His follow-up release, 1987's I'm in the Wrong Business!, on Alligator Records, featured guest stars Bonnie Raitt and Stevie Ray Vaughan. Reed, with his band the Spark Plugs, remained active through the early 2000s.

DENNIS TAYLOR

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Danchin, Sebastian. "A. C. Reed." Living Blues no. 124
(November/December 1995): 12–25.

Discography: AMG

REED, DALTON

b. 23 August 1952; Cade or Lafayette, LA
d. 23 or 24 September 1994; Minneapolis, MN

Singer active in the 1980s through the mid-1990s, mostly near his hometown of Lafayette, LA. Reed had a strong tenor voice, and sang a gospel-influenced southern soul style associated with 1960s Memphis. He died of heart failure at age forty-two.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Santelli
Bonner, Brett J. "Dalton Reed" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 118 (November/December 1994): 62.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Louisiana Soul Man (1991, Bullseye Blues 9517).
Willing & Able (1994, Bullseye Blues 9547).

REED, FRANCINE

b. 11 July 1947; Kankakee, IL

Soul-blues singer first came to prominence as backing vocalist for alt-country and pop singer Lyle Lovett. In the mid-1990s, she began issuing recordings under her own name. Her voice is deep and rich and crosses comfortably from southern soul to straight-ahead blues to R&B.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Horowitz, H. "Blues from the Field." Blues Revue no. 62
(November 2000): 46–47.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

I Want You to Love Me (1995, Ichiban 24851).
I Got a Right!...To Some of My Best (2001, CMO 1010).

REED, JIMMY

b. Mathis James Reed, 6 September 1925; near Dunleith, MS
d. 29 August 1976; Oakland, CA

Jimmy Reed is a legendary blues singer, songwriter, guitar and harmonica player. He has had more Billboard hits than any other blues artist, with nineteen entries on the R&B charts and twelve songs that "crossed over" on the Billboard Hot 100 pop charts.

Life

Jimmy Reed was born on a plantation near Dunleith, Mississippi. His parents, Joseph Reed and Virginia Ross, were sharecroppers. Reed had nine siblings. As a child, he worked in the cotton fields and sometimes sang with his family at the Baptist Church. From 1932, he learned guitar from his friend Eddie Taylor, who will also become an accomplished musician. Reed went to school until 1939. He found various jobs in farms around Duncan and Meltonia, Mississippi.

In 1943, Jimmy Reed went to Chicago where one of his older brothers lived; there, he served in the U.S. Navy from 1944 until 1945. After his discharge from the Army at age twenty, Reed's brother gave him an electric guitar and an amplifier. Reed returned to Mississippi where married his longtime girlfriend Mary Lee Davis, who would be known as "Mama Reed" or the "Boss-Lady." She would be his adviser, inspiration, backing vocalist, and sometimes coauthor on songs. From 1945, Jimmy Reed worked in an iron foundry in Gary, Indiana, as a junk man, and later in a meat packing plant and even in the coal delivery business. From 1950, he began working as a professional musician. After playing part time with John Brim's group, the Gary Kings, in 1949 (with Albert King as a drummer—by then), Jimmy Reed decided to team up with his old friend Eddie Taylor, who would play guitar regularly on many Reed classics until 1967.

Jimmy Reed. (Photo courtesy Frank Driggs Collection)

Jimmy Reed's debut and his successes are inseparable from the history of Vee-Jay. After a refusal from Chess Records, Reed moved to Chicago and joined the newly born Vee-Jay label in summer 1953. His first record was "High and Lonesome," backed with an instrumental, "Roll and Rhumba"; it appeared under the name Jimmy Reed and His Trio simultaneously on the Vee-Jay and Chance labels in July 1953. It sold well, and Vee-Jay decided to carry on with that new artist. From that moment on and through the upcoming decade, Jimmy Reed would have a hit every year.

The list of blues classics by Jimmy Reed is extensive: "You Don't Have to Go" (1954), "Ain't That Lovin' You Baby" (1955), "You've Got Me Dizzy" (1956), "Honest I Do" (1957), "Goin' to New York" (1958), and "Baby, What You Want Me to Do" (1959). A major hit, "Big Boss Man" (1960), was composed by producer Al Smith and Luther Dixon; Willie Dixon played bass on the original March 1960 recording. Jimmy Reed sold four hundred thousand copies of "Honest I Do" (1957) the year it was released. His first LP, titled I'm Jimmy Reed, was released in 1958 on Vee-Jay.

The 1960s brought similar successes with "Bright Lights Big City" (1961), "Aw Shucks Hush Your Mouth" (1962), "Shame, Shame, Shame" (1963), "I'm Going Upside Your Head" (1964), and "Knocking at Your Door" (1966), which marked Reed's last presence on the charts. In the studio, Mama Reed used to sit behind her famous husband to speak the words of the songs while recording.

Starting in the 1960s, Jimmy Reed's problems with alcohol began to interfere with his musical creativity. He often appeared on stage or at recording sessions drunk. Reed's alcoholism also caused conflicts between himself and his lifelong friend Eddie Taylor. When Vee-Jay closed its doors, Reed went to different labels such as ABC-BluesWay Records from 1965, but he did not meet with the same success he had found in his Vee-Jay years. From the mid-1960s, Jimmy Reed's European tours were eagerly anticipated by audiences, especially in England, but the alcoholic and epileptic bluesman did not always show up in good shape.

In 1967, Jimmy Reed misguidedly signed a contract in which he abandoned all his future royalties for a net cash amount of ten thousand dollars. But twelve years after the bluesman's death, his widow went to court against Arc Music to contest the agreement, and settled for an undisclosed amount.

Mama Reed left Jimmy in 1970, but they did not officially divorce. After going through detox, Jimmy Reed began a new tour in 1976, but he died of respiratory failure on August 29, 1976, and was buried at Lincoln Cemetery in Blue Island, Illinois. He was only fifty.

Among posthumous recognitions, Jimmy Reed was inducted into the Blues Foundation's Hall of Fame (1980) and into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame (1991).

Music

Jimmy Reed's almost off-hand style with slurred vocals and urban blues borrowed from shuffle, boogie, and jump-blues. His enjoyable, danceable music created a sharp contrast with the raw, intense style of the urban, Chicago blues of Muddy Waters and Howlin' Wolf. Jimmy Reed would play electric guitar and a rack-mounted harmonica on most of his songs, with a second guitar often played by Eddie Taylor and drums usually played by Earl Philips (from 1955). There was frequently no bass player on many of Jimmy Reed's recordings until 1957, but the efficient walking bass lines were usually played on the guitar by Eddie Taylor.

Some of Jimmy Reed's most famous songs prove that his meters and chord changes were sometimes irregular, as in "You Don't Have to Go," "Big Boss Man," and "Trouble in Mind." It is difficult as well to guess when vocals would get in after the intro in "Shame, Shame, Shame." Other great bluesmen such as Lightnin' Hopkins and John Lee Hooker were also unpredictable in their phrasing, and sometimes they "forced" or tried to extend the twelve-bar blues song structure.

In 1963, Jimmy Reed revisited various blues standards, such as "St. Louis Blues," "Trouble in Mind," "Wee Wee Baby," "How Long How Long Blues," "See See Rider" ("C. C. Rider"), and "Roll 'Em Pete," in a superb album titled Jimmy Reed Sings the Best of the Blues. Jimmy Reed makes each of these songs his own, with his catchy rhythms, lazy singing, and high harmonica solos.

During the folk blues rediscovery of 1963, Jimmy Reed also recorded instrumental versions of some of his own classics, on a fine album titled Jimmy Reed Plays 12 String Guitar Blues, which combined solos on twelve-string acoustic guitar and harmonica on the usual rhythm background, with twelve instrumental versions including "Bright Lights Big City," "St. Louis Blues," "Blue Carnegie," "Big Boss Man," "Baby What You Want Me to Do," and "Boogie in the Dark."

In a recorded interview made on December 7, 1964, by Calvin Carter, heard on Jimmy Reed's LP, Jimmy Reed, The Legend—The Man, Jimmy Reed acknowledged that his wife, Mary Lee Davis (or Mama Reed), wrote the song "Baby, What You Want Me to Do." This rare album remains the best introduction to Jimmy Reed's works, and feature the original recordings of twelve of his best songs, with presentations made by Jimmy Reed himself, who briefly explains with his gentle, generous voice the origins of every song, with anecdotes and jokes. It was reissued in 2000 under the title The Legend—The Man, on a CD by Collectables, but no other CD or box set includes these presentations before each song.

From the mid-1960s, some interesting recordings from 1966, 1967, and 1971, emerged on a CD titled Jimmy Reed, released on Paula Records in 1991. It featured twenty lesser-known songs, plus a new version of "Shame, Shame, Shame" from 1967. Some titles included Eddie Taylor and Lefty Bates, both on guitar; some extra tracks even featured young Jimmy Reed Jr. on bass.

Influence

Jimmy Reed's influence is considerable in every aspect: either his songwriting, chuckling singing, or harmonica playing. Bluesmen such as Slim Harpo and Frank Frost have borrowed from his musical style. In the 1960s, many British groups imitated Reed's music (including Them and the Spencer Davis Group). The Rolling Stones copied his song "Shame, Shame, Shame" with their "Little by Little" (1964), although it was always credited to "Phelge-Spector," which means the "official" composers were the whole group, plus Phil Spector, who played maracas. Hencemore, the introduction from "Big Boss Man" is reproduced in the opening guitar riff of The Rolling Stones' "All Down the Line," from Exile on Main Street (1972).

Jimmy Reed's singing style has influenced Arkansas-born Levon Helm (lead vocalist of the Canadian group The Band). On the harmonica, Jimmy Reed invented the high and long one-note harmonica solo style in a perfect timing, as in "Blue Carnegie" and "Big Boss Man."

Elvis Presley did a tribute to Jimmy Reed when he released a rock 'n' roll version of "Big Boss Man" as a single in 1967, and played "Baby, What You Want Me to Do" on his TV special in 1968. Jimmy Reed gave to the Chicago blues its light, joyful side.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

- AMG (Cub Koda); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Arnaudon, Jean-Claude. Dictionnaire du Blues. Paris: Filipacchi, 1977.
 Booklet notes from the special reedition CD of Jimmy Reed at Carnegie Hall (1992 [1961], Mobile Fidelity Sound Lab, "Original Master Recording," UDCD 566).
 Carter, Calvin. Recorded interview with Jimmy Reed, December 7, 1964, as heard on Jimmy Reed, The Legend—The Man (1965, Vee-Jay, VJS 8501; 2000, reissue on Collectables CD).
 "Jimmy Reed." In The Rolling Stone Encyclopedia of Rock & Roll, edited by Holly George-Warren and Patricia

REED, JIMMY

Romanowski, 3rd ed., p. 813. New York: Fireside, 2001 [1983].

O'Neal, Jim, and Amy O'Neal. "Living Blues Interview: Jimmy Reed." Living Blues no. 21 (May/June 1975): 16–41.

Pruter, Robert, Robert L. Campbell, Robert Stallworth, Bob Marovich, and Tom Kelly. Vee-Jay: The Early Years [complete discography for all Vee-Jay artists]. Red Saunders Research Foundation, 2005, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/veejay.html>.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

Selected Recordings in Reissue

The Legend—The Man (1965, Vee-Jay VIS-8501; 2000, Collectables CD).

Jimmy Reed at Carnegie Hall (1992 [1961], Mobile Fidelity Sound Lab, "Original Master Recording," UDCD 566).

The Best of the Blues (2000 [1963], Collectables CD).

The 12-String Guitar Blues (2000 [1963], Collectables CD).

His later, lesser-known recordings made after the Vee-Jay period can be found on Jimmy Reed (1991, Paula Records CD, PCD-8; recordings from 1966, 1967, 1971).

Transcriptions

Sokolow, Fred. Jimmy Reed—Master Bluesman. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 1996.

See also Big Boss Man (Hi-Heel Sneakers); Presley, Elvis Aron; Reed, Mama; Rolling Stones; Taylor, Eddie; Vee-Jay/Abner/Falcon

REED, LULA

Active 1950s–1960s

Lula Reed recorded with the Cincinnati-based King label from 1951 to 1955 and received sympathetic accompaniment from her husband Sonny Thompson's ensemble and solid material and supervision from the prolific house producer Henry Glover. Her voice possessed a high-pitched and distinctly pinched tone that imbued her with an evocative nasality. Her most enduring influential track was Glover's heartfelt ballad "I'll Drown in My Tears," a top rhythm and blues hit for Reed in 1952 and an even greater success for Ray Charles in 1956 as "Drown in My Own Tears." She briefly transferred to the Chess Records subsidiary Argo from 1958 to 1959, but returned to King in 1961 and collaborated with guitarist Freddy King in some spirited duets. Following a brief association with Ray Charles's Tangerine label (1962–1963), she vanished from the commercial scene.

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)

Discography: AMG; LSPF

REED, MAMA

b. Mary Lee Davis

Lyricist, muse, and sometimes backing vocalist, Mary Lee Davis was dubbed "Mama Reed" and later the "Boss-Lady" by her famous husband Jimmy Reed (1925–1976). The Reeds married after World War II; they met while teenagers. She is credited as coauthor on Reed's "Bright Lights, Big City" and "Baby, What's Wrong." Lenny Goldberg (from Stormy Weather magazine) contends that Mama Reed brought uncredited help in cowriting much of Jimmy Reed's songs from the late Vee-Jay period. Others say she just reminded him of the appropriate timing and exact verses.

Although she did not record on her own, Mary (Mama) Reed can sometimes be heard on some Jimmy Reed's songs, occasionally on "You Got Me Dizzy," "Shame, Shame, Shame," "Baby, What You Want Me to Do," and "Big Boss Man."

In 1988, Mama Reed and her eight children settled a multi-million-dollar lawsuit against Arc Music, related to royalties and a misguided contract signed by Jimmy Reed in 1967.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

Booklet notes from the special reissue CD of Jimmy Reed at Carnegie Hall (1992 [1961], Mobile Fidelity Sound Lab, "Original Master Recording," UDCD 566).

Carter, Calvin. Recorded interview with Jimmy Reed, December 7, 1964, as heard on Jimmy Reed, The Legend—The Man (1965, Vee-Jay, VJS 8501; 2000, reissue on Collectables CD).

Goldberg, Lenny. Notes for Jimmy Reed's "Soul Greats" (Springboard Records [Linden, NJ] UPF-101).

"Jimmy Reed." In The Rolling Stone Encyclopedia of Rock & Roll edited by Holly George-Warren and Patricia Romanowski, 3rd ed., p. 813. New York: Fireside, 2001 [1983].

See also Reed, Jimmy; Big Boss Man (Hi-Heel Sneakers); Vee-Jay/Abner/Falcon

REYNOLDS, BIG JACK

b. 1921; Dayton OH
d. 29 December 1993; Toledo, OH

Harmonica player and guitarist who was raised in Georgia. He served in the U.S. Army during World War II (1941–1943), stationed in Indiana. Upon discharge, he moved to Detroit and began participating in the Hastings Street blues activity. He moved to Toledo, Ohio, in the mid-1970s and became a musical fixture there.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Donahue, Matthew H. "Big Jack Reynolds." Living Blues no. 114 (March/April 1994): 74–75.

Discography: LSFPREYNOLDS, BLIND JOE

b. Joe Sheppard, 1900; Arkansas
d. 10 March 1968; Monroe, LA

Aka Blind Willie. Reynolds was a rough, blind traveling musician noted for violence and theft who recorded while on the run from the authorities. He was noted as a fine guitarist, a reputation backed by his handful of records, his strong, coarse voice, and the intelligence of his lyrics about short dresses, mistresses, and street girls. He was one of the outstanding recording artists of his time. His song "Outside Woman Blues" was recorded by Cream in 1967.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

AMG (David Lewis); Larkin
Calt, Stephen, and Gayle Dean Wardlow. "He's a Devil of a Joe." Blues Unlimited no. 146 (Autumn/Winter 1984): 16–20; reprinted in Wardlow, Chasin' That Devil Music. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

Discography: DGRREYNOLDS, THEODORE "TEDDY"

b. 12 July 1931; Houston, TX
d. 1 October 1998; Houston, TX

Pianist, songwriter, and singer. Recorded singles on Sittin' In With, Mercury, and Crown labels. Backing musician on numerous recordings on Duke (Bobby Bland, Junior Parker), ABC-Dunhill (Bland, B. B. King), Black Top, and other labels.

ROGER WOOD

Bibliography

Brisbin, John Anthony. "Teddy Reynolds." Living Blues no. 138 (March/April 1998): 62–72.
Govenar, Alan. Meeting the Blues: The Rise of the Texas Sound. Dallas, TX: Taylor, 1988.
Wood, Roger. Down in Houston: Bayou City Blues. Austin: University of Texas Press, 2003.

Discography: LSFPRHINO

While its formal origins date back to 1978, Rhino essentially began as a California retail operation five years earlier. Cofounder Richard Foos was a rabid record collector who discovered that there was enough of a market for historic recordings, particularly blues and jazz, to make a company based solely on reissuing those lines successful. Foos started a store called Rhino, and one of his first hires was a fellow enthusiast and collector named Harold Bronson. This team subsequently created Rhino Entertainment in 1978, starting off by reissuing novelty records. They soon expanded into blues, jazz, soul, R&B, and rock reissues, gradually establishing their outlet as a premier source for both comprehensive anthologies and also tasty various artists collections. In addition, one of their first company projects became a minor hit overseas, when the late British DJ John Peel began playing a sonically limp but vocally exciting Wild Man Fischer song "Go to Rhino Records." His previous release was An Evening with Wild Man Fischer, a session that was produced by Frank Zappa, but attracted virtually no attention when first released. But Foos, Bronson, and the others at Rhino loved the record, and Fischer became a frequent Rhino client. Eventually Bronson got a staffer to cut a cassette version of the Fischer single, and it subsequently turned into the company's first nonreissue success.

Today, Rhino is one of the nation's premier reissue and archival operations, and it has recently begun its own specialty label Rhino Handmade. Rhino Handmade issues titles with special interest to collectors that are available only online. Rhino has also expanded heavily into videos, classic TV, and DVDs through the Rhino Home Video departments, as well as children's items with Kid Rhino. Perhaps their finest achievement was partnering with Atlantic for a series of excellent anthologies devoted to specific musicians like John Coltrane, Charles Mingus, Rahsaan Roland Kirk, and Ornette Coleman, as well as huge boxed sets featuring the complete label output of Coleman and Coltrane. They currently issue a monthly newsletter, periodic fanzine, and mail-order service, although almost every Rhino title except for the Handmade series is available in retail stores.

RHINO

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Rhino website, <http://www.rhino.com/> (accessed February 7, 2005).

RHODES, SONNY

b. Clarence Edward Smith, 3 November 1940; Smithville, TX

Guitarist, singer, and songwriter. With a turban on his head and a lap steel guitar in front of him, Rhodes is one of the most distinctive figures on the modern blues scene. The son of sharecroppers, Rhodes took to the guitar at an early age and was performing in the rural areas around Austin, Texas, while in his teens. He worked with singer Frankie Lee in Austin and formed his own band but had a career detour for a stint in the Navy. After backing Albert Collins and Freddie King as a bassist, he relocated to California in 1963. Rhodes recorded regularly but met with little commercial success, mostly due to poor promotion and distribution from a succession of small labels.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Skelly, Richard. "Sonny Rhodes: The Disciple of the Blues." Living Blues no. 102 (March/April 1992): 12–21.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

RHODES, TODD

b. Todd Washington Rhodes, Jr., 31 August 1900; Hopkinsville, KY
d. 4 June 1965; Wayne County, MI

Pianist. Founding member of McKinney's Synco's (later McKinney's Cotton Pickers) based in Springfield, Ohio. Rhodes moved to Detroit 1927 and worked with local bands. He formed his own band in 1945, turned fully to R&B in 1947, and toured the Midwest regularly. He made many recordings for Sensation (1947–1949) and King (1949–1954), including "Dance of the Redskins" and "Bell Boy Boogie"; he also backed Wynonie Harris and Dave Bartholomew. Rhodes is a good musician, a solid blues/boogie player.

JIM GALLERT

Bibliography

Southern
Chilton, John. Who's Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.

Discography: Lord; LSFP

RHODES, WALTER "LIGHTNIN' BUG"

b. 4 September 1939; Beaufort, NC
d. 4 July 1990; Rockingham, NC

Aka "Little Red Walter." Heavily influenced by Lightnin' Hopkins and Blind Boy Fuller, singer-guitarist Walter Rhodes settled in New York in the 1950s and recorded rhythm and blues and rock 'n' roll under various aliases (the Blonde Bomber, Little Red Walter) as well as a down-home blues album The Blues Goes On. Rediscovered by Gary Erwin, Rhodes went again into the studio, waxing several sessions, playing Carolina-styled solo guitar, and singing in an effective down-home manner.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

Bruin, Leo. "Down in the Bottom Picking Cotton." Juke Blues no. 18 (Winter 1989): 6–10.
Erwin, Gary. "Walter 'Lightning Bug' Rhodes" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 94 (1990): 55–56.

Discography

Giving You the Blues (1988, Swingmaster LP 2116).
Now Hear This! (2000, Swingmaster CD 2207).

RHUMBOOGIE

Chicago blues label of the 1940s. Rhumboogie was an outgrowth of a major black and tan nightclub, the Rhumboogie. Proprietors Charlie Glenn and boxing champion Joe Louis scored their greatest coup when they booked blues guitarist and singer T-Bone Walker, who was creating a sensation with his sustained electric guitar picking and elegant vocals. He played the Rhumboogie on and off from August 1942 to September 1945, and in October 1944 Glenn recorded Walker with the house band led by pianist Marl Young. The first Rhumboogie record was a good-sized hit after its release in August 1945. Two more T-Bone singles appeared, and a second session took place on December 19, 1945. One last Rhumboogie single by Charles Gray (a trumpet player fronting for Buster Bennett while Buster was under contract to Columbia) appeared early in 1946. The label seems to have closed by mid-1946. The sides from the December 1945 T-Bone session never came out on Rhumboogie but eventually saw release on Mercury, Old Swing-Master, and Constellation. The Rhumboogie club closed in mid-1947.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert, and Campbell, Robert L. "The Rhumboogie Label." Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/rhumboogie.html> (accessed December 18, 2002).

Discography: McGrath

RHYTHM

Founded by Dave Rosenbaum in San Francisco in 1942, Rhythm Records issued singles by Saunders King and Jack McVea up to 1947. The label was revived in 1954–1955, with Bob Geddins supplying the recordings, and issued less than twenty singles by most of the Bay Area's blues artists, including Mercy Dee, K. C. Douglas, and Johnny Fuller. In 1957 a new Rhythm label emerged in Oakland run by Don Barksdale who up to 1959 issued material in a variety of styles; blues was represented by Sugar Pie DeSanto, Roy Hawkins, and Little Willie Littlefield.

RAY ASTBURY

Discography: McGrath

See also Douglas, K. C.; Fuller, Johnny; Geddins, Bob; King, Saunders; Littlefield, "Little" Willie; McVea, John Vivian "Jack"; Robinson, L. C. "Good Rockin"; Walton, Mercy Dee; Wilson, Jimmy

RHYTHM AND BLUES

The phrase "rhythm and blues" was first used on June 25, 1949, in Billboard magazine on page 30 as the sales chart title "Best Selling Retail Rhythm & Blues Records." Rhythm and blues music by this point in the late 1940s had evolved from folk blues and other "black-music" forms to become a unique hybrid music that was characterized by elements of various styles. Blues and gospel-influenced vocal effects including melodic, rhythmic, and textual improvisation, call-and-response sections, and earthy, realistic vocals were found within the twelve-bar blues forms of some rhythm and blues tunes, while other selections used thirty-two-bar ballad structures, honking saxophone solos, and pared-down big band instrumentation to indicate a jazz influence. Some rhythm and blues compositions also contained elements of various ethnic musics such as Caribbean and Cuban; country music's electric guitar and the vocal quartet "doo-wop" harmonies found their way into the repertoire, making the style a true fusion of various musical genres.

The crossover of style and the varied influences that characterized rhythm and blues music at this time were captured on various independent record labels that recorded and distributed the music and therefore allowed it to reach a wider audience. Most of the more commercially successful independent labels were located around two prominent musical centers, New York and Los Angeles, with other labels found in Chicago, Cincinnati, Ohio, and Houston, Texas. Such prominent names as Dinah Washington, the Drifters, and Ray Charles were all recorded on these independent labels, and in later years companies such as Motown Records in Detroit and Stax/Volt in Memphis became hugely successful by recording rhythm and blues and R&B-influenced performers.

The impact of rhythm and blues music continues to be widespread, and its influence may still be heard in—and its name still applied to—various genres from current rock 'n' roll and folk styles to hip-hop, soul, and other types of urban music.

DONNA LOWE

Bibliography

Barlow, William. Looking Up at Down: The Emergence of Blues Culture. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989.

George, Nelson. The Death of Rhythm and Blues. New York: Pantheon Books, 1988.

Southern, Eileen. The Music of Black Americans: A History. 3rd ed. New York: W. W. Norton & Co., 1997.

RHYTHM WILLIE

b. Willie Hood, ca. 1905
d. May 1954; Chicago, IL

RHYTHM WILLIE

Certainly not a strictly blues artist, Rhythm Willie played a very personal style of diatonic harmonica (in the first position) in uptown Chicago lounges and Broadway theaters. He recorded infrequently, harp instrumentals with a dazzling technique that makes one regret that he didn't do more sessions.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

Dirks, Scott. "I've Got Rhythm. The Rhythm Willie Story," Blues & Rhythm no. 127 (March 1988): 4-9.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings in Reissue

Harps, Jugs, Washboards, Kazoos (1994, RST CD 1505).
Harmonica Blues 1946-52 (Frémeaux & Associés FA CD 5059).

RIC

Acronym for Recording Industries Corporation, active 1965, in Nashville, Tennessee, and New York City. Artists included Freddie North and Jerry McCain.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

RICE, "SIR MACK" BONNY

b. 10 November 1933; Clarksdale, MS

R&B and soul vocalist active in the Detroit music scene, primarily during the 1950s and 1960s. Rice spent his formative years in and around the Clarksdale area, where he heard Charles Brown, Amos Milburn, Ike Turner, and others. When he was around twelve years of age, Rice's family moved to Detroit for work in the auto business. It was here, while in high school, that Rice started singing with a vocal group called the Five Scalders and later, after returning from army service, the Falcons. Though he has written hundreds of songs, he is best known for penning "Mustang Sally," made famous by Wilson Pickett. His own recorded version was the fifteenth ranked song in 1965's R&B charts. In the late 1960s Rice went to Memphis, where he wrote many songs for various Stax artists. He also worked as a writer for the Hi and Motown labels. Rice's song "Respect Yourself" achieved much success when recorded by the Staples Singers. Other songs he penned include "Cadillac Assembly Line" and "Santa Claus Wants Some Lovin'" performed by Albert King, "Cheaper to Keep Her" by Johnnie Taylor, and more. Sir Mack came out of retirement in the early 1990s to tour with the Dynatones from San Francisco.

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

Child, Christine. "Sir Mack Rice: Anything I See I Can Write On." Living Blues no. 109 (May/June 1993): 32-37.

See also Detroit; Mustang Sally; Rhythm and Blues; Soul; Stax/Volt

RICHARD, RUDOLPH "RUDY"

b. Church Point, LA

Guitarist in Slim Harpo's band The King Bees from the mid-1950s until Harpo's death in 1970; often had to provide the "sting" note during renditions of "I'm a King Bee." Previously received instruction in guitar from Lonesome Sundown. Other musical associations include those with Raful Neal and Clifton Chenier.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Coleridge, Steve. "Sting It Awhile." Blues & Rhythm no. 84 (November 1993): 19.

RICHARDSON, C. C.

b. Clarence Clifford Richardson, 18 December 1918; Sumter, SC

d. 30 January 1984; Charleston, WV

Singer and guitarist. Learned guitar from a grandfather, and sang in a sacred quartet in church with three uncles. After losing one foot and injuring the other in a 1927 accident, he recovered to the extent of becoming a tap dancer in the manner of Peg Leg Bates. For some years he succeeded in earning a living as a dancer. In 1962 he moved to Charleston, West Virginia, and played blues guitar. He self-produced and sold albums and singles of his playing.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris
Darwen, Norman. "C. C. Richardson" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 59 (Spring 1984): 35.

Discography: LSPFRICHARDSON, MONA

b. 5 February 1947; Los Angeles, CA
d. 5 August 1985; Melbourne, Australia

Singer of blues, jazz, and gospel. Performed with Johnny Otis, Ike Turner, and Ray Charles in 1970–1972. She recorded as a solo artist for Epic, RCA Victor (UK), and Philips. During a theatrical tour of Australia in 1980, she elected to stay in Melbourne. It is believed her death by fall from her apartment building was a suicide.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Eagle, Bob. "Mona Richardson." Living Blues no. 69 (1986): 41.

RICHBOURG, JOHN

b. 20 August 1910; Davis Station, SC
d. 15 February 1986; Nashville, TN

John Richbourg was a pioneering rhythm and blues disk jockey, known as John R., whose nightly broadcasts out of Nashville on 50,000-watt WLAC introduced an ever-growing audience of white teenagers throughout the eastern half of the nation to the music of black artists ranging from Muddy Waters and Wynonie Harris to Chuck Berry and Little Richard, from the Five Royales and the Moonglows to Ray Charles and James Brown. His exquisite taste in music and enthusiastic delivery won him a loyal audience of unprecedented size and made him one of the most influential forces in the golden age of R&B and the rise of rock 'n' roll.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

John Richbourg Collection, Blues Archive, Archives and Special Collections, John D. Williams Library, University of Mississippi.
O'Neal, Jim. "John R." Living Blues no. 70 (1986): 14.

RICKS, "PHILADELPHIA" JERRY

b. 22 May 1940; Philadelphia, PA

Born and raised in the city of his namesake, "Philadelphia" Jerry Ricks's awareness of the blues came as a child upon hearing local street musicians such as Doug Quattlebaum and Washboard Slim as well as then-Philadelphia resident and blues pioneer Lonnie Johnson. He became active in the folk music scene in the late 1950s and learned guitar from both recordings and by studying the performances of Lightnin' Hopkins and Brownie McGhee. Ricks became involved with the Philadelphia coffee house The Second Fret in the early 1960s, where he was mentored by and accompanied many of the great prewar bluesmen. Throughout most of the 1960s, he performed across the country at folk festivals, clubs, and coffee houses with musicians such as Mississippi John Hurt, Skip James, Son House, Buddy Moss, Mississippi Fred McDowell, and Reverend Gary Davis. In 1969, Ricks toured East Africa with Buddy Guy for the U.S. State Department and later that year was enlisted by the Smithsonian Institute to aid in research for its Folklife Festival. Ricks moved to Germany in 1970 and spent most of the next eighteen years living in various European countries where he performed, lectured, and recorded extensively. He returned to the United States in 1988 and by the mid-1990s had relocated to Clarksdale, Mississippi, where he recorded his first domestic release, Deep in the Well, for Rooster Blues Records in 1997. Ricks continued to perform throughout the United States and Europe continuously and remains a vital link to the first generation of prewar bluesmen.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Santelli
Hoffman, Lawrence. "The Blues Passage of Jerry Ricks." Living Blues no. 106 (November/December 1992): 16–25.

Discography

Many Miles of Blues (2000, Rooster CD R2639).

RIDGLEY, THOMAS "TOMMY"

b. 30 October 1925; Shrewsbury section of Jefferson Parish, LA

d. 11 August 1999; New Orleans, LA

If Tommy Ridgley never gained much of a commercial foothold outside of his native New Orleans, he participated energetically in that city's musical culture for a half a century. A self-taught keyboard player, Ridgley joined Dave Bartholomew's landmark band as a vocalist in 1949. Together with Jewel King on "Shrewsbury Blues (sic)," he was the first New Orleans vocalist to record for Lew Chudd's Imperial Records. Ridgley stayed with Bartholomew until 1951 and went on to lead his own ensemble, the Untouchables, as the house band at the celebrated Dew Drop Inn. In 1960, he joined Joe Ruffino's Ric label and acquired the sobriquet "The King of the Stroll." During the next two years, he scored local hits, including "In the Same Old Way" (1961). While commercial interest in rhythm and blues waned, Ridgley remained in the game, releasing numerous singles on local small labels and backing regional headliners. His final release, Since the Blues Began, appeared in 1995, and in 1999, Ridgley received local publication OffBeat's Lifetime Achievement Award.

RIDGLEY, THOMAS "TOMMY"

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli Richardson, Clive. "Tommy Ridgley." Blues Unlimited no. 137/138 (Spring 1980): 34–35.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

RIEDY, BOB

Pianist active on Chicago's North Side during the 1970s. Also assisted in booking acts in various local clubs. He recorded one LP each for the Flying Fish and Rounder labels. Activity since the early 1980s is unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)

Discography: AMG (Bill Dahl)

RIGGINS, RICHARD "HARMONICA SLIM"

b. 1 July 1921; Tupelo, MS

Singer and harmonica player. Early influences were Muddy Waters and Little Walter Jacobs. Moved to Fresno, California, in 1949, then to Oakland, California, in 1962. From 1966 through 1975 he performed and recorded with guitarist K. C. Douglas. Around 1976 he returned to Fresno, performing as leader or in duet with guitarist Hosea Levy, including for the Fedora label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Rainsford, Mike. "I Just Wanna Play My Harmonica, Sing My Songs and Walk Them Back Bottom Blues." Blues & Rhythm no. 87 (March 1994): 10–12.

RILEY, JUDGE LAWRENCE

b. 1 January 1909; New Orleans, LA

d. 22 August 1977; Chicago, IL

Bassist and drummer. Lived in New Orleans only until 1941, but he retained his musical contacts there until the end of his life, even receiving an invitation to join the Preservation Hall Jazz Band. After arriving in Chicago, he drummed in many Lester Melrose sessions for Bluebird and Columbia. In live appearances he would perform blues, jazz, and popular songs. Later in his career he switched to playing bass.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

O'Neal, Jim. "Judge Riley" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 34 (September/October 1977): 40.

RISHELL, PAUL

b. 17 January 1950; Brooklyn, NY

Acoustic guitarist who specializes in pre-1943 southern blues. He often performs with harmonica player Annie Raines.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Santelli Wasserzieher, B. "Paul Rishell and Annie Raines: Goin' Up the Country." Blues Revue no. 81 (April/May 2003): 8–9.

Discography: AMG

RIVERS, BOYD

b. 25 December 1934; Pickens, MS

d. 22 November 1993; Jackson, MS

Singer and guitar evangelist; nephew of gospel artist Reverend Cleophus Robinson. Performed blues through 1963, then he turned exclusively to sacred music. Active mostly in Mississippi, with an exceptional appearance at the 1986 Musica dei Populi Festival in Florence, Italy.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Evans, David. "Ramblin..." Blues Revue no. 14 (Fall 1994): 18–20.

ROBERTS, ROY

b. 22 October 1942; Livingston, TN

Roberts, influenced by Chuck Berry and Jimmy Reed, played in bands with Solomon Burke and Otis Redding. The guitarist/vocalist charted with "The Legend of Otis Redding" in 1967. President of Rock House Records, Roberts continues to record.

GAILE WELKER

Bibliography

Duffy, Timothy. "Roy Roberts." Living Blues no. 107 (January/February 1993): 38–39.

Selected Recordings

Burnin' Love (Rock House CD RH 00052).
Deeper Shade of Blue (Rock House CD RH 0001).
Every Shade of Blue (King Snake CD KS 42).
Introducing Roy Roberts (Rock House CD RH 0007).

ROBICHEAUX, COCO

b. Curtis John Arceneaux, 25 October 1947; Ascension Parish, LA

Vocalist, guitarist, trombone player, composer. Coco Robicheaux traveled the South from Texas to Key West, playing and singing his striking compositions in bars and roadhouses for years until his Spiritland album introduced the "Louisiana Medicine Man" to an international audiences in 1994. He has worked with Carlo Ditta, Smokey Greenwell, Irene Sage, Earl Stanley, Nancy Buchan, and Dave Easley.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Selected Recordings

Spiritland (1994, Orleans Records).
Louisiana Medicine Man (1998, Orleans Records).
Get You a Healin' (1999, New Orleans Musicians Clinic).
Hoo Doo Party (2000, Orleans Records).

ROBILLARD, DUKE

b. Michael Robillard, 4 October 1948; Woonsocket, RI

Duke Robillard formed Roomful of Blues in Westerly, Rhode Island, in 1967. He led the band through numerous line-up changes until leaving in 1979 to play guitar briefly for rockabilly singer Robert Gordon. Afterward he joined the Legendary Blues Band, but left soon after, forming the Duke Robillard Band (later known as Duke Robillard & the Pleasure Kings) in 1981. Throughout the rest of the 1980s Duke toured the United States with the Kings and recorded a number of albums for the Rounder label. In 1990 Duke joined the Fabulous Thunderbirds, and continued to record as a solo artist for the Point Blank/Virgin label.

ROBERT SORICELLI

Bibliography

AMG (Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin
 Ellis, A. "Beyond the I–IV–V: How Duke Robillard Makes Twelve-Bar Blues Jump and Swing." Guitar Player 34, no. 1 (January 2000): 78–81.
 Tipaldi, Art. "Duke Robillard: In a Class All His Own." Blues Revue no. 31 (October 1997): 18–19.

Discography: AMG

ROBINSON, ALVIN "SHINE"

b. 22 December 1937; New Orleans, LA
 d. 25 January 1989; New Orleans, LA

Vocals, guitar. Alvin "Shine" Robinson grew up in the fertile New Orleans music scene of the 1950s and became one of the city's favorite guitarists and leading sidemen. His recording of "Down Home Girl" is an R&B classic. He worked with Professor Longhair, Big Joe Turner, Dr. John, Allen Toussaint, David Lastie, James Booker, and Harold Battiste.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Larkin
 Burke, Tony. "Alvin Robinson." Blues & Rhythm no. 44 (May 1989): 16.

Discography: LSFP

Dr. John. Gumbo (1972).
 Maria Muldaur. Waitress in a Donut Shop (1974).
 Dr. John. Hollywood Be Thy Name (1975).
 Dr. John. Tango Palace (1979).
 James Booker. The Lost Paramount Tapes (1997).
Down Home Girl (Red Bird).

ROBINSON, ARTHUR CLAY "A. C."

ROBINSON, ARTHUR CLAY "A. C."

b. 12 April 1915; Brenham, TX

d. 24 February 1980; San Francisco, CA

Vocalist and harmonica and bass player, whose career in music began in Texas with his brother L. C. Moved to San Francisco in the early 1940s and played with his brother (recording for Black & White [1945] and Rhythm [1954]) until the late 1950s when he gave up the blues for religion.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Mazzolini, Tom. "A. C. Robinson." Living Blues no. 45/46 (Spring 1980): 95.

Discography: LSFP

Mojo in My Hand (Arhoolie CD 453).

See also Black & White; Rhythm; Robinson, L. C. "Good Rockin'"

ROBINSON, BOBBY

b. 16 April 1917; Union, SC

Record label owner and producer, best known for his labels Fire, Fury, and Enjoy. Moved to New York in the late 1930s. In 1946 he opened a record store in Harlem on 125th Street, one block away from the Apollo Theater. His first label, Robin, later renamed Red Robin, lasted from 1951 through 1956. His other labels were Whirlin' Disc (established 1956), Fury and Everlast (established 1957), Fire (established 1959), and Enjoy (established 1962).

Among the biggest hits Robinson produced was Wilbert Harrison's "Kansas City," released on Fury in March 1959, but a lawsuit filed by Savoy Records for contract infractions prevented any follow-up Harrison release at least through that September. Other best-sellers for Robinson were Buster Brown's "Fannie Mae" (Fire) and Lee Dorsey's "Ya Ya" (Fire); both were included in the landmark soundtrack album for the film American Graffiti in 1973.

Among the Fire, Fury, Enjoy, and Everlast albums were excellent southern blues releases such as Lightnin' Hopkins's Mojo Hand (1962, Fire FLP 104) and Arthur Crudup's Mean Old Frisco (1960, Fire FLP 103). Elmore James had a Fire hit single in 1959 with "The Sky Is Crying," his most significant record since the Trumpet recording of "Dust My Broom" in 1951. James's last session ever, recorded by Robinson in 1963, was taped in stereo, and often reissued in that form. Fury issued some of the earliest releases by Gladys Knight and the Pips, fresh from their initial success at the Apollo theater. In 1965 Robinson leased many of his studio recordings for LP release on Sphere Sound Records, a subsidiary of Bell Records in New York.

Although renowned for his blues recordings of the 1950s and 1960s, Robinson continued to scout and record new talent in black music, including some of the 1970s recordings of early rap artists Grandmaster Flash and Kool Moe Dee.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Broven, John. "Bobby's Happy House of Hits: The Story of Bobby Robinson and His Famous Labels" [part 1]. Juke Blues no. 15 (Spring 1989): 6-11; [part 2]. Juke Blues no. 16 (Summer 1989): 10-15.

Warner, Alan. "Bobby Robinson Productions." http://www.emimusicpub.com/worldwide/music/catalog_jtf_bobby-robinson-productions.html (accessed October 5, 2004).

Discography: McGrath

Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "Bobby Robinson's Labels: Album Discographies." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/fire.html> (accessed October 5, 2004).

ROBINSON, ELZADIE

Flourished 1920s

Singer from Shreveport, Louisiana, who recorded for the Paramount label in 1926-1929. It is believed she lived in Chicago after her first recording session there in 1926. On most sides she was accompanied by noted Shreveport pianist Will Ezell. Activity after 1929 is unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Joslyn Layne)

Discography: DGR

ROBINSON, FENTON

b. 23 September 1935; Minter City, MS

d. 25 November 1997; Rockford, IL

Singer/guitarist Fenton Robinson was raised on a Mississippi plantation and was first introduced to blues on local jukeboxes. Inspired by Lightnin' Hopkins and the refined guitar style of T-Bone Walker, Robinson practiced on a homemade one-string instrument as a child. A move to Memphis at age seventeen exposed him to the city's rich blues tradition. He bought himself a guitar, began taking lessons, and played local amateur shows. In 1954, Robinson moved to Little Rock, Arkansas, and, after a few years playing throughout the area, recorded the regional hit "Tennessee Woman" on Memphis's Meteor label. Due to its success, he signed with Duke Records in 1958 and cut a few sides for the Texas-based label, including "As the Years Go Passing By" in 1959.

Robinson moved to Chicago in 1961 and recorded sporadically throughout the decade on small labels such as USA, Giant, and Palos. It was for Palos in 1967 that he wrote and recorded his signature song, "Somebody Loan Me a Dime," which featured his trademark sophisticated jazz-inflected guitar style and smooth vocals. Rock singer Boz Scaggs's cover of this song became a hit in 1969, but Robinson received no initial credit. Robinson would later recut the song for his 1974 critically acclaimed debut on Alligator. He went on to release two more albums for the label, including the 1977 Grammy-nominated I Hear Some Blues Downstairs. Robinson recorded for several European labels throughout the 1980s, and eventually settled in Rockford, Illinois. In the 1990s, he was plagued by health problems and died of cancer at age sixty-two.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Sakolsky, Ron, and Jim O'Neal. "Fenton Robinson." Living Blues no. 70 (1986): 16-23.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

Selected Recording

Somebody Loan Me a Dime (1990, Alligator CD 4705).

ROBINSON, FREDDY

b. 24 February 1939; Memphis, TN

Raised on a plantation near West Memphis, Arkansas, Freddy Robinson began playing guitar at age nine, encouraged by his father who took him to see area performances by Howlin' Wolf, Elmore James, and B. B. King. Robinson moved to Chicago in 1956 and soon began playing regularly with Little Walter. He recorded behind Little Walter, Howlin' Wolf, and Jimmy Rogers for Chess in the late 1950s and early 1960s. Robinson recorded as a leader and sideman throughout the next three decades, occasionally experimenting with jazz and R&B. Relocating to Los Angeles in the 1970s, Robinson converted to Islam, renamed himself Abu Talib, and continued to perform and record.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin
Dahl, Bill. "The Real Thing at Last." Living Blues no. 144 (March/April 1999): 48-57.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

Abu Talib. The Real Thing at Last (1994, Son Pat CD SPR-001).

ROBINSON, JAMES "BAT THE HUMMINGBIRD"

b. 25 December 1903; Algiers, LA

d. 2 March 1957; St. Louis, MO

Raised in Memphis, Robinson was taught to play piano and drums by his father. He played on Beale Street and at age nineteen moved to Chicago, where he recorded "Humming Blues" from which his nickname was derived. He later settled in St. Louis, working the levee joints. Rediscovered in 1957, he recorded once more, but died the same year. Robinson played simple, rhythmic piano, using a four-to-the-bar chorded bass to accompany his powerful, declamatory vocals.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

ROBINSON, JESSIE MAE

b. 1919; Call, TX

d. October 1966; Los Angeles, CA

A commercially successful composer in the late 1940s and early to mid-1950s, Robinson composed a dozen blues hits and then crossed over to the pop field, becoming perhaps the first African American female songwriter to break the color barrier. Born Jessie Mae Booker (named after her father Jesse) just outside Beaumont, Texas, her family moved to Watts when she was three. Drawn to show business, Robinson started writing songs at age fourteen, and a few years later began pitching them to publishers and singers. Throughout her career, Robinson composed her songs while sitting at her kitchen table with paper and pen, humming the melodies to herself.

ROBINSON, JESSIE MAE

The first artist to record one of her compositions was Dinah Washington (“Mellow Man Blues,” 1945). She then wrote “Cleanhead Blues” for Eddie Vinson (1946; authorship of the song is disputed and is sometimes credited to Vinson). Among her top blues hits were “Rooming House Boogie” (recorded by Amos Milburn, 1949), “Blue Light Boogie” (Louis Jordan, 1950), and “Black Night” (Charles Brown, 1951). Other notable compositions included “Cold Cold Feeling” (T-Bone Walker, 1952), “Sneakin’ Around” (B. B. King, 1955), and “Let’s Have a Party” (Elvis Presley, 1957; Wanda Jackson, 1960). She also wrote an earlier version of the song Johnny Otis recorded as “Double Crossing Blues.” Her affiliations with major New York publishers opened doors for her pop-oriented compositions to be recorded by Hit Parade stars like Patti Page, Bing Crosby, and Dinah Shore. By the early 1960s her hits had dried up, but she still received a modest income from royalties. She died suddenly in October 1966 after complaining of a sore throat.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

Dawson, Jim. “Jessie Mae Robinson.” Juke Blues no. 22 (Winter/Spring 1991): 8–12.

ROBINSON, JIMMIE LEE

b. 30 April 1931; Chicago, IL
d. 6 July 2002; Chicago, IL

Chicago-born Jimmie Lee Robinson learned guitar as a boy from neighbor Blind Percy, who accompanied him in various storefront church performances. In 1942, Robinson began playing blues for tips on Chicago’s Maxwell Street and quickly became a regular there, performing with local musicians Muddy Waters, Eddie Taylor, and Little Walter. He continued to play on Maxwell for almost sixty years and became a tireless activist against the neighborhood’s demolition in the 1990s. Throughout the 1950s and 1960s, Robinson performed regularly with Howlin’ Wolf, Elmore James, Magic Sam, Freddy King, Little Walter, and Jimmy Reed. He also remained an in-demand studio musician, and appeared on many recordings for Checker, Parrot, Atomic H, and Vee-Jay. Robinson recorded as a leader for Bandera in the late 1950s and early 1960s, waxing one of his signature tunes, “All My Life,” in 1960. In 1965, he toured Europe as part of the American Folk Blues Festival and returned in 1975 with the American Blues Legends package.

Robinson continued to work in and outside of music throughout the 1960s and 1970s, and appeared on recordings by Shakey Jake, St. Louis Jimmy Oden, and Willie Mabon. In the early 1990s, Robinson took on the western-styled persona of “the Lonely Traveler,” and developed an acoustic-based blues sound with country and folk influences. Songs of social awareness and protest dominated these later works, which were released on Delmark, APO, and his own Amina label. Shortly after being diagnosed with cancer, Jimmie Lee Robinson committed suicide at the age of seventy-one.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Larkin
Harris, Sheldon. Blues Who’s Who. New York: Arlington House, 1979.
O’Brien, Justin. “Jimmie Lee Robinson.” Living Blues no. 165 (September/October 2002): 86–87.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Jimmie Lee Robinson. The Lonely Traveler (1994, Delmark CD DE 665).
Various artists. Blues and Gospel from the Bandera, Laredo and Jerico Road Labels of Chicago (2001, Ace CDCHD 808).

ROBINSON, L. C. “GOOD ROCKIN’”

b. Louis Charles Robinson, 13 May 1913; Brenham, TX
d. 26 September 1976; Berkeley, CA

As a teenager, Robinson played guitar and fiddle on traveling shows, partnered by his brother A. C. In the 1930s he took up steel guitar, learning from Leon McAuliffe of Bob Wills’s Texas Playboys. After World War II he moved to the Bay Area, where he was active in Oakland clubs. In the 1970s, he played the Berkeley Blues Festival and toured Scandinavia. Albums for Arhoolie and ABC-BluesWay testified to his versatility, but it is as an exponent of electric steel guitar, an instrument not much played by African American blues musicians, that he was most influential, with his legatees including Sonny Rhodes.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Mazzolini, Tom. "Living Blues Interview: L. C. 'Good Rockin' Robinson." Living Blues no. 22 (July/August 1975): 16–21.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Rhodes, Sonny

ROBINSON, TAD

b. 24 June 1956; New York City, NY

Singer and harmonica player in blues and soul-blues. Attended the School of Music at Indiana University, after which he moved to Chicago. He recorded with Dave Specter for the Delmark and Rounder labels in 1988 and 1994, then on his own for Delmark and Severn.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)

Discography: AMG (Bill Dahl)

ROCHESTER, NEW YORK

The blues in Rochester is dominated by two Mississippi-born musicians: Eddie "Son" House and Joe Beard. House arrived in 1943 and Beard in 1957, and their migration to Rochester reflects the growth of the African American population that had been miniscule prior to 1940. But it was the mid-1960s before events connected with House and Beard spawned a blues scene in Rochester.

The first event was the "rediscovery" of Son House in 1964. Son House's impact on the blues in Rochester was huge; he was an inspiration to his neighbor on Grieg Street, Joe Beard, who sometimes accompanied House at local gigs, and he was a direct musical influence on John Mooney and many others. Not long after House resurfaced, Armand Schaubroeck and his two younger brothers, Blaine and Bruce, opened the Black Candle coffee house in Charlotte next to their music store the House of Guitars, and during the next few years House performed there a number of times.

Joe Beard's decision, also in the mid-1960s, to form a blues band was the second critical event. After a year of playing in Chicago, Beard returned to Rochester and formed "The Friends of the Blues," which included a number of musicians who remain active performers to this day, most notably, John Mooney. In the early 1970s Mooney went out on his own. Like Mooney, over the coming decades many if not most of the notable musicians in the area played with Beard: to mention only a few, singer-guitar players John Cole, Dan Schmitt, and Steve Grills, and the harp players Fred Palmer ("Rockin' Red") and John Dubuc. Finally there is Beard's own son Chris who has been performing nationally since 1997.

With a growing black population and a community of local blues musicians, a number of clubs opened that featured both local and national blues acts. In 1968 Ruther Sheppard opened Shep's Paradise at 293 Clarissa Street. Clarissa was the "Broadway" of the black community, and Shep's was a venue for many local blues bands until 2002.

The K&T Tavern, House of the Blues, on Genesee Avenue, owned by Bill Wooten, was an important venue where Beard was often joined by friends such as Buddy Guy and Junior Wells. On Jefferson Avenue, the People's Club, owned by Casey Lee, Palm Gardens, and Black Orchid featured blues.

Downtown, the BK Lounge owned by Ben Keaton featured artists such as Albert King, Bobby Bland, Buddy Ace, Jimmy Rodgers, as well as Joe Beard. Ruth 'n' Irv's was another downtown venue for blues acts.

In April 1970, Jeff Springut opened the Red Creek club in Henrietta, just outside the city limits. For the next twenty-six years the Red Creek featured most of the national blues acts touring at that point including Muddy Waters, James Cotton, John Lee Hooker, Buddy Guy, and Junior Wells. Often people like Guy and Wells and Matt Murphy would layover a night in order to play with Joe Beard at the K&T Tavern. Club Obia, on Lyell Avenue, featured acts such as Little Milton, while Duffy's on Marshall was another venue for national acts.

In the 1990s, Smokin Joe's, Milestones, and the Beale Street Cafe featured local blues acts while the Dinosaur BBQ and in 2001 the Montage, both downtown, became venues for national acts such as Jimmy Johnson, Ike Turner, and Shemeka Copeland.

DANIEL BEAUMONT

Bibliography

- Curry, Doug. CD liner notes for Blues Union.
 McGrath, Jim. "The Rochester Blues Scene." Living Blues
 no. 169 (September/October 2003): 31.

ROCK 'N' ROLL

Rock 'n' roll originated from a number of other traditions and genres. From jazz came swing rhythm, walking bass lines, the use of drums and horns, and the idea of improvising soloists. The electric guitar was first used in jazz and Western swing (a jazz-influenced form of country). The nonsense syllables used by rock 'n' roll vocal groups—the dom-bi-doo-bi's and diddley-bop-bop's—find a precedent in jazz scat singing. And in their approach to arrangements, some of the earliest rock 'n' roll groups, such as Bill Haley and the Comets, were like scaled-down big bands. From gospel, rock borrowed call-and-response singing and passionate, emotional, grainy vocal delivery. Southern rock 'n' rollers borrowed some of their stage movements and dramatic personas from flamboyant preachers, but the singers' Christian upbringing also caused one of rock's chief underlying tensions. The conflict between the lure of Saturday night's dancing and romancing (the pleasures of the flesh), and the call of Sunday morning's churchly devotion (repentance and the promise of heavenly reward) created internal discord for Jerry Lee Lewis and Little Richard in particular.

Other genres also contributed to rock 'n' roll. From folk came a stock of venerable songs, a tradition of storytelling, and, though it did not appear in rock until later, a concern for social justice. From country, rock 'n' roll adapted the string band instrumentation and continued with brother duet harmony singing and playing on guitar the left-hand piano figures of boogie-woogie. From pop music came concepts of orchestration, cliché chord progressions like the "Blue Moon" changes, professional songwriters and their lyrics about romantic longing, and a whole mechanism for distribution, publicity, hype, and exploitation.

But rock 'n' roll borrowed mostly from the blues and from R&B, a mix of blues and jazz. From blues came boogie-woogie piano, gruff singing, and gritty lyrics about day-to-day living, distorted guitars, slide guitar technique, and other down-home blues styles that got updated, plus African American rhythms. The major school of rock guitar playing is a creative extrapolation of the blues tonality, and the most fundamental common knowledge among rock players is blues song form. Since its inception, musicians in rock have drawn inspiration from and paid tribute to the blues by covering traditional songs, developing new songs and styles that are indebted to the blues, and honoring and sometimes recording with blues musicians.

After World War II, the era of big swing bands gave way to smaller R&B combos with two or three horn players—inspired by Louis Jordan's Tympany Five—who mixed jazz with boogie-woogie rhythms and humorous, often risqué lyrics. The style became known as jump-blues and it typically featured a male blues singer shouting about booze, women, or "rockin'" over a hot band with a honking sax and a swinging drummer. On the lucrative "one-nighter" circuit, jump bands polished their stage shows and their ability to thrill audiences with solid grooves and wild solos. Though it quickly faded with the arrival of rock's vocal groups and electric guitarists, jump-blues was a direct forerunner of rock 'n' roll. Louis Jordan's influence in particular is discernible in the work of Bill Haley (who at his peak had the same producer in Milt Gabler), and Chuck Berry. One jump-blues song that became a rock 'n' roll standard was "Train Kept-A Rollin'" by Tiny Bradshaw (1951). It was covered by Johnny Burnette and the Rock and Roll Trio as rockabilly (1956), by the Yardbirds as British Invasion rock (1966), by both Aerosmith and Motorhead as hard rock (late 1970s), and by Lenny Kravitz as psychedelic funk (1991).

When rock 'n' roll arrived in the 1950s, it created excitement, confusion, and controversy. As with the beginning phase of any new sound, many of its aspects were unsettled: What were its origins and musical parameters, what should be its function in society, and who could or should represent it? One thing was undisputed: Its audience was young people. Once the music industry identified this new market, it made music specifically for teens, and, increasingly, preteens, starting with the first wave of the baby boom.

Before rock 'n' roll there was little that could be considered as music for teenagers. Until the postwar period, they were barely recognized as a distinct group. There was no concept of an intermediary period between childhood and adulthood, and teens had no collective identity, no particular resources, and no real voice of their own. Infants heard nursery songs, school students had playground songs and perhaps folk songs at summer camp. Music accompanied community functions and assemblies: dances, religious services, and marriages and other ritualized events. In the home, there was parlor music, often maudlin songs sung around the piano, and the radio. Radio programs like Your Hit Parade (later on television), which presented the top songs of the day, provided some figures onto which adolescent fantasies could be projected, but the lyrics focused on little aside from romantic love and the music was smooth and conventional.

One alternative to bland pop music was R&B. It spread through two developments: the rise of independent record labels (known as indies), and new opportunities for radio airplay. Independent labels proliferated in the late 1940s and 1950s by taking advantage of the recent availability of the tape recorder and the shift from the 78-rpm record to the smaller, more durable 45-rpm disk. Indies were also community oriented and thus able to find and record local stars and promising newcomers. Starting in 1948 with WDIA in Memphis (which later had B. B. King and Rufus Thomas as disk jockeys), radio stations began programming black music full time. In the next few years, black music—blues, R&B, gospel, pop, and jazz—found a regular slot in the schedule of stations across North America. As evidenced by the repertoire of rock 'n' roll's pioneers and comments made during interviews, radio music was a major influence.

The disk jockeys were eccentric characters. Alan Freed, first in Cleveland and then in New York, who popularized the term rock and roll for the music he played; "Daddio" Dewey Phillips in Memphis was the first to play a record by Elvis Presley; and Wolfman Jack broadcast on Mexican border radio with a signal five times that of the top U.S. stations. Their delivery was fun and infectious, loose but earnest, at times theatrically goofy. They were energized by their records (and so were their loyal listeners), singing along in snippets and pounding out beats while the records played, talking and joking overtop of them, and making snide remarks, a drastic change from the formality that had previously dominated broadcast media. Both the music and its presentation felt conspiratorial and subversive, a facet that attracted fans who liked its offer of a break from regimented thinking and suburban aspirations. At the same time, its subversiveness appalled critics who disliked rock 'n' roll for what they saw as moral degradation and racial contamination. Not only were songs like "Sixty Minute Man" by Billy Ward and the Dominoes (1951) and "Work with Me Annie" by Hank Ballard and the Midnighters (1954) lewd, they were hits. They crossed over from the R&B charts (where, because the main audience was the black minority, they had been disapproved of but tolerated) to the pop charts (where they could corrupt everybody).

The detractors were right: There was racial mixing in rock 'n' roll in private and in public, on stage and in theater audiences. Having been created from elements of blues, jazz, pop, country, and gospel, it was inevitable that rock 'n' roll was an integrated music. Elvis Presley, Jerry Lee Lewis, Carl Perkins, Buddy Holly,

Ricky Nelson, and others created rockabilly by blending country traditions with R&B. Black artists did something similar; Chuck Berry's "Maybellene" (1955), for example, was based on the country song "Ida Red."

Blacks wrote songs for whites; whites wrote songs for blacks. Otis Blackwell, an R&B singer turned professional songwriter, provided Elvis Presley with "All Shook Up" and "Don't Be Cruel," and wrote "Great Balls of Fire" for Jerry Lee Lewis. Dion, a white doo-wop singer, got "Ruby Baby" from the Drifters, a black vocal group. They got it from the same place Presley got "Jailhouse Rock" (as well as "Treat Me Nice," "Don't," and "Hound Dog"); the Jewish songwriting team of Jerry Leiber and Mike Stoller.

"Hound Dog" had first been a hit for Big Mama Thornton, a blues singer from Texas. At her recording session in Los Angeles, the band was comprised of Louisiana blues guitarist Pete Lewis, Puerto Rican bassist Mario Delgarde, and Greek R&B drummer and bandleader Johnny Otis, who considered himself "black by persuasion" (and who later had a rock 'n' roll hit of his own in "Willie and the Hand Jive" (1958). Another of Leiber and Stoller's early blues songs was "Kansas City" (recorded often but not successfully until Wilbert Harrison's 1959 version). The two writers went on to compose, and produce in most cases, a host of black acts, including Ruth Brown ("Lucky Lips"), Ben E. King ("Spanish Harlem," "Stand By Me"), La Vern Baker ("Saved"), the Robins ("Riot in Cell Block #9," "Smokey Joe's Café"), the Clovers ("Love Potion #9), the Drifters ("Drip Drop," "Fools Fall in Love"), and particularly the Coasters ("Yakety Yak," "Poison Ivy," and "Charlie Brown").

"Hound Dog," "Kansas City," "Sixty Minute Man," "Work with Me Annie," and many other songs of the period used the twelve-bar blues form. So did Bill Haley's "Rock Around the Clock" (1955), perhaps rock 'n' roll's biggest seller. The twelve-bar progression and its variations are ubiquitous in rock. The pioneering country bands, jump-blues acts, and R&B vocal groups who moved toward rock 'n' roll based their sound on the blues. They updated it, taking greater freedom in the way lyrics fit the chord progressions, and exploring different rhythmic feels in order to heat up the dance floor. The form was enlivened by faster tempos, rhythmic stops, and call-and-response vocals and by overlaying instrumental solo choruses. Some songs, like Chuck Berry's "Johnny B. Goode" (1958), have a twelve-bar verse and a twelve-bar chorus. Others, like Buddy Holly's "That'll Be the Day" (1957), use the progression only during the guitar solo. Some, like Hank Ballard's "The Twist"

(1959, covered by Chubby Checker in 1960), give it an infectious beat. Leiber and Stoller's "Jailhouse Rock" (by Elvis Presley, 1957) and "Ruby Baby" (the Drifters, 1955; Dion, 1963) stretched the form by adding an extra four measures before the first chord change. Larry Williams's "Boney Maronie" (1957) expands the basic twelve-bar blues progression to twenty-four bars by doubling each measure's length. It also features a catchy riff played in unison by sax and guitar; they later play chords in a punchy rhythmic figure behind a soloist.

Many musicians enlivened the blues form by playing it in a minor key. Several rock songs were minor-key blues with interesting variations in chords, such as the Doors' "Riders on the Storm" (1971, with a keyboard bass part whose left-hand patterns derive from boogie-woogie), and the Doobie Brothers' "Long Train Runnin'" (1973). With blues structures comprising an essential part of rock 'n' roll it is no surprise that several older blues and R&B performers had success in the field. Willie Lee "Piano Red" Perryman, a pianist and singer born in Georgia in 1913, had been a rhythm and blues star in the early 1950s. Operating under the name Dr. Feelgood and the Interns, in 1962 Perryman's "Doctor Feel-Good" spent more than two months on the Billboard pop charts. Big Joe Turner, a Kansas City blues singer who took part in John Hammond's From Spirituals to Swing concert at Carnegie Hall in 1938, became a rock 'n' roll star in the 1950s even though his songs were more successful when done by others. "Shake Rattle and Roll" was covered by Bill Haley and the Comets (1954), and "Chains of Love" by Pat Boone (1956). Ivory Joe Hunter, a Texas pianist steeped in barrelhouse traditions who had known Blind Lemon Jefferson and was first recorded in 1934 by John Lomax for the Library of Congress, scored with "Since I Met You Baby" (1956). It features a (European) major scale melody over the (African American) blues progression.

Although many rock 'n' roll hits for white artists were covers of R&B songs, black artists also covered white pop hits. Fats Domino's "Blueberry Hill" (1956), was done first by Glenn Miller in 1940, the Platters' "Smoke Gets in Your Eyes" (1958) was a hit for Paul Whiteman in 1934, and James Brown's "Prisoner of Love" (1963) was not only a hit for Perry Como in 1946, but was the signature song of crooner Russ Columbo, who wrote it in 1931.

Some old blues songs were redone in rock 'n' roll style. Big Joe Turner's biggest pop hit was a rock and roll version of "Corinna, Corinna" (1956), a blues song that dates back to the 1920s, credited to Bo Carter. In Turner's version, the use of unison walking bass doubled in octaves by bass and guitar predates late 1960s rock blues, where the device was deployed in much heavier fashion. Chuck Willis's "C. C. Rider" (1957), whose beat inspired the dance called the Stroll, was first recorded by Ma Rainey in 1924. Though no one had a top forty hit with W. C. Handy's "St. Louis Blues" (1914), it was recorded and performed live by rock 'n' rollers from Jackie Wilson to Roy Orbison.

Instrumental blues, whether by ensembles or solo pianists and guitarists, had long been popular. "Guitar Boogie" (1948) by Arthur Smith and his Crackerjacks was picked up by budding guitarists and remained as a source for variations for decades, as did Bill Doggett's "Honky Tonk" (1956), part of the live repertoire of thousands of bands, including that of Muddy Waters. Saxophonist Junior Walker, recording for Motown, a label that more habitually presented its unique form of pop R&B, stayed close to the blues. Walker's "Cleo's Mood," a minor-key blues instrumental, made the top fifty in 1966. His "Pucker Up Buttercup" a twelve-bar blues song that starts on the IV chord like the Mississippi down-home blues standard "Rollin' and Tumblin'," did even better the next year.

Black rock 'n' roll artists were numerous in the music's formative years, from the R&B-based ones like Little Richard ("Long Tall Sally," 1956), Bo Diddley ("Bo Diddley," 1955), Chris Kenner ("I Like It Like That," 1961), and Larry Williams ("Short Fat Fanny," 1957), to the more pop-oriented vocalists like Johnny Ace ("Pledging My Love," 1954), Clyde McPhatter ("A Lover's Question," 1958), and Jackie Wilson ("Lonely Teardrops," 1958). The majority of doo-wop groups were black, such as the Penguins, Harptones, Orioles, and Ravens, and some were integrated: Frankie Lymon and the Teenagers ("Why Do Fools Fall in Love," 1956) had blacks and Puerto Ricans; the Del-Vikings ("Come Go With Me," 1957) had blacks and whites.

In 1956, via television, Elvis Presley catapulted to fame and soon dominated the market as no other entertainer had before him. The following year, the advent of American Bandstand—televised from Philadelphia and hosted by Dick Clark—showed how rock 'n' roll had changed from a minority music—based in community functions and independent production—into a mainstream industry. It was an industry that marketed three-minute portrayals of dreamy romances and adolescent frustrations: pop music, in other words.

As rock 'n' roll gained respectability and was increasingly controlled by major labels, it shifted toward becoming a music made for and by whites. This never completely occurred however, because African American performers were continuously present.

Blues remained one of the bedrocks of rock 'n' roll though sometimes the blues component was not immediately obvious to the listener, as in the Beatles' "Can't Buy Me Love," a number one song in 1964, which uses the twelve-bar progression for its verses and solos.

Elvis Presley was first recorded in Memphis by Sam Phillips, whose Sun Studio had already recorded Howlin' Wolf, B. B. King, Junior Parker, Rufus Thomas, Little Milton, and James Cotton, as well as Jackie Brenston's "Rocket 88." After Presley's impact, which was immediate if only regional at first, Sun recorded Carl Perkins ("Blue Suede Shoes," 1956) and Jerry Lee Lewis ("Whole Lotta Shakin' Goin' On," 1957) and a host of other rockabillys. Presley's debut single, considered to be the first rockabilly song, was his version of Mississippi bluesman Arthur "Big Boy" Crudup's "That's Alright Mama."

Another blues song done as rockabilly by Presley was "Good Rockin' Tonight." Recorded in 1947 by its composer Roy Brown, it was immediately covered by Wynonie "Mr. Blues" Harris. After Presley did "Good Rockin' Tonight," Pat Boone did it as pop (1959), and James Brown as soul (1967). A 1984 version, actually a cover of a sequel to the original song, called "Good Rockin' at Midnight," was a hit for the Honeydrippers, with vocals by Robert Plant of Led Zeppelin.

Los Angeles, a vibrant center of R&B, had numerous acts that managed the shift into rock 'n' roll including Johnny Otis, Don and Dewey, Young Jessie, and Richard Berry. Berry's calypso-influenced "Louie Louie" was an inspiration to a generation of musicians in the Northwest (Oregon, Washington, and British Columbia). The Wailers, who earlier had hit the national charts with a blues-form instrumental called "Tall Cool One" (1959), while still teenagers, were the first of the white bands in the region to record it. Inspired by them and by the Kingsmen's hit version of "Louie Louie" (1963), and awed by the power the song itself exerted over audiences, bands adopted it as the unofficial anthem of the region. The Northwest Sound developed directly out of R&B, and covering R&B songs became standard policy for the legions of white and occasionally integrated bands that populated the scene. Jimi Hendrix, growing up in Seattle, was influenced by this style, later commemorating a local night club (where many R&B acts performed) in the song "Spanish Castle Magic" (1967).

In the mid-1950s in the United Kingdom there was a phase for skiffle, basically American folk blues interpreted by acoustic guitar strummers and homemade one-string bass pluckers and washboard scratchers. The Beatles, under their earlier name the Quarrymen, played skiffle. By the early 1960s, a host of young musicians in the United Kingdom was using American music, particularly blues, R&B, blues-based rock 'n' roll, and the gutsy early Motown repertoire for inspiration. What the Rolling Stones, Yardbirds, Animals, Downliners Sect, Paramounts (who became Procol Harum), Them (led by Van Morrison), and others did through their energetic and often-inspired renditions was to educate the pop audience to black music, first through repertoire and then through personal connections. Both the Animals and the Yardbirds backed up Aleck Miller "Sonny Boy Williamson" on concert and on record. In 1969 Fleetwood Mac, while touring the United States, recorded In Chicago on location at the Chess Studios, joined by blues veterans Willie Dixon, Honeyboy Edwards, Otis Spann, and Walter "Shakey" Horton. On The London Howlin' Wolf Sessions (1971), Wolf and his guitarist Hubert Sumlin were backed by the rhythm section of the Rolling Stones along with Eric Clapton and Steve Winwood. Carrying on the tradition, in 1988 U2 invited B. B. King to sit in for "When Love Comes to Town."

In the 1960s and 1970s, U.K. bands resurrected many old blues songs. "Nobody Knows You When You're Down and Out," first recorded in 1929 by Bessie Smith, was done by the Spencer Davis Group, sung by Steve Winwood. Big Joe Williams's "Baby Please Don't Go" (1935), was arranged by Them, led by Van Morrison. Cream, featuring Eric Clapton, covered Skip James's "I'm So Glad" (1931) and Blind Joe Reynolds's "Outside Woman Blues" (1930). Cream also did "Rollin' and Tumblin'," recorded first by Blind Willie Newbern (1929), and popularized by Little Walter and Muddy Waters. Led Zeppelin arranged Memphis Minnie's "When the Levee Breaks" (1929). They also covered "You Shook Me" and "I Can't Quit You Baby," both composed by Willie Dixon. Jeff Beck did Dixon's "I Ain't Superstitious." Robert Johnson's songs were also popular choices: Led Zeppelin did "Traveling Riverside Blues," the Rolling Stones covered "Love in Vain," and Eric Clapton did "Rambling on My Mind" (with John Mayall's Bluesbreakers) and "Crossroads" (with Cream). The impact on American youth of the British Invasion groups and their reverence for black music contributed to the explosion of garage bands, which not only covered the repertoires of the U.K. bands but also caused some musicians and fans to research roots music themselves. Most American rock bands, from the local stars to the hit makers, had at least a couple of blues items on their song list. The band down the street likely knew something by Bo Diddley, or just copied, say, the Doors' version of "Back Door Man" (by Willie Dixon and Howlin' Wolf). In America, blues-rock was pioneered in the mid-1960s by the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, an integrated unit from Chicago. Other important early blues-rock bands were the Blues Project from New York, whose lengthy version of Muddy Waters's "Still A Fool" "Two Trains Running" was a concert highlight, the Allman Brothers from Georgia, who remade Blind Willie McTell's "Statesboro Blues" (1928), and Canned Heat from Los Angeles who put their version of "Bull Doze Blues" by Henry Thomas (1928) on the pop charts (as "Going Up the Country," 1968). Bands from San Francisco's psychedelic scene drew heavily from the blues repertoire, including the Grateful Dead, who had numerous blues and jug band pieces in their repertoire, often stretched by improvisations, and Big Brother and the Holding Company, featuring Janis Joplin, who did a version of Big Mama Thornton's "Ball and Chain."

The role of guitar hero—a flashy soloist with an impressive command of blues-based licks—was established in the mid-1960s in England. At the forefront were the lead guitarists of the Yardbirds—Eric Clapton, Jeff Beck, and Jimmy Page. Clapton left the band because he felt they were too commercial, seeking blues purity, which he found in John Mayall's band. His stay was brief, replaced by another superb blues guitarist, Peter Green. Green left also, to form Fleetwood Mac, which, in their first incarnation, was perhaps Britain's best blues-rock unit. Upon Jimi Hendrix's arrival in Britain, his outrageous stage antics and mastery of blues-rock guitar both intimidated and inspired other players. His recordings and tours created a sensation and many guitarists, including Robin Trower and Stevie Ray Vaughn, followed his lead; many still do. In America, Mike Bloomfield, first with Paul Butterfield and then the Electric Flag, was an early guitar hero. From Texas, Johnny Winter exploded onto the pop scene in 1969, the year Alvin Lee of England's Ten Years After made a big impression at Woodstock. Blues-rock remains strong and the guitarist's role continues to be central.

Rock guitarists and bass guitarists have been responsible for creating blues riffs of remarkable cultural longevity, like the ones found in Roy Orbison's "Oh, Pretty Woman," the Beatles' "Day Tripper," Cream's "Sunshine of Your Love," and the related one in Iron Butterfly's "In-A-Gadda-Da-Vida." Heavy metal carried on the project of creating blues-influenced riffs. That teenage players in the twenty-first century—not buying vinyl records but downloading digital music files—are still eager to learn the songs and styles of Robert Johnson and Muddy Waters and the great riffs from the 1950s and 1960s bodes well for the future of both blues and rock.

CRAIG MORRISON

Bibliography

- Belz, Carl. The Story of Rock. New York: Oxford University Press, 1972.
- Christgau, Robert. Grown Up All Wrong: 75 Great Rock and Pop Artists from Vaudeville to Techno. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- Escott, Colin. Good Rockin' Tonight: Sun Records and the Birth of Rock 'n' Roll. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1991.
- Gillett, Charlie. The Sound of the City: The Rise of Rock and Roll. New York: Outerbridge and Dienstfrey/Dutton, 1970.
- Miller, Jim. Flowers in the Dust Bin: The Rise of Rock and Roll, 1947–1977. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1999.
- , ed. The Rolling Stone Illustrated History of Rock and Roll. New York: Rolling Stone Press, 1976.
- Palmer, Robert. Rock and Roll: An Unruly History. New York: Harmony Books, 1995.

ROCKIN' DOPSIE

b. Alton Jay Rubin, 10 February 1932; Carencro, LA
d. 26 August 1993; Opelousas, LA

Raised in a South Louisiana family of cotton and sugar cane pickers, Dopsie (Alton Jay Rubin) got his first accordion, a push-button model, at age fourteen. Being left-handed, he learned to play it upside down. In the mid-1950s, having moved to the city of Lafayette to work in construction, he began playing clubs with Chester Zeno on rubboard. After a dancer named Doopsie made a strong impression on local club-goers, they started calling Rubin by that name (pronounced with an "oo" although he dropped the second "o"). In Lafayette, Dopsie heard lots of blues and R&B and began incorporating those styles into his zydeco act, like his idol and mentor Clifton Chenier. He recorded in 1969 and 1970 for South Louisiana producers Floyd Soileau and Jay Miller, while remaining unknown outside his native region. That began to change in 1973, when he made his first of six albums for Sam Charters on Sonet, a Swedish label, leading to European tours. His domestic visibility grew after a guest appearance on Paul Simon's 1985 Graceland album, and he became one of the top zydeco acts in the United States, recording for Maison de Soul, Rounder, and Atlantic and going so far as to claim the crown as King of Zydeco after the December 1987 death of Chenier.

Starting in the early 1980s, his band (the Zydeco Twisters) included sons Alton ("Tiger") on drums and David ("Rockin' Dopsie Jr.") on rubboard. Ex-Chenier saxophonist John Hart also joined the group. Upon his death, another son, Anthony, took over on accordion, but the band was, and continues to be, led by Dopsie Jr., a flamboyant and charismatic frontman.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin; Santelli
 Silverman, Edward R. "Rockin' Dopsie: We'll Be Rockin', Yes We Will." Living Blues no. 98 (July/August 1991): 10–15.
 Tisserand, Michael. The Kingdom of Zydeco. New York: Arcade, 1998.

Discography: LSFPROCKIN'/GLORY

Record Label (Florida, 1952–1953). Owner: Henry David Stone (b. June 3, 1921; Bronx, NY). Artists include Willie C. Baker, Ray Charles ("Walkin' and Talkin'," "I'm Wondering and Wondering"), Little Sam Davis (with Earl Hooker, "Goin' Home to Mother"), Wilbert Harrison ("The Letter"), Earl Hooker ("Sweet Angel," "On the Hook"), John Lee Hooker (as John Lee Booker) ("Lovin' Guitar Man," with Eddie Kirkland), Eddie Hope ("Lost Child"), and Joe Hill Louis (as Leslie Lewis, Johnny Lewis).

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

- Daniels, Bill. "Rockin' Records." Whiskey, Women, And . . . no. 10 (1982).
 Kochakian, Dan. "The Henry Stone Story" [part 1], Blues & Rhythm no. 171 (August 2002): 14; [part 2], Blues & Rhythm no. 172 (September 2002): 12.
 Stone, Bob. "The House That Stone Built . . . : An Interview with Henry Stone." Blue Flame no. 17/18 (1972): 19.
 Topping, Ray. "Henry Stone: The Rockin' and Chart Story." Juke Blues no. 33 (1995): 27.

Discography: McGrathRODGERS, JAMES CHARLES "JIMMIE"

b. 8 September 1897; Last Gasp near Meridian, MS
 d. 26 May 1933; New York City, NY

Singer, songwriter, and guitarist. Known as the "Singing Brakeman" and the "Mississippi Blue Yodeler," Rodgers is regarded as the progenitor of what became modern country music. He worked on the railroad until his health failed, then on the carnival circuit. Recorded by RCA field producer Ralph Peer in 1927, the second session produced the million-selling "Blue Yodel" (aka "T for Texas"). He became established as a major star (1928–1931), until depression brought a lull. Rodgers died from a lung hemorrhage caused by tuberculosis. His yodels were an integrated expressive device within his style, which drew centrally on blues (including thirteen "Blue Yodels") alongside an eclectic mix of hillbilly, gospel, jazz, cowboy, and folk influences.

KENNY MATHIESON

Bibliography

- Porterfield, Nolan. Jimmie Rodgers: The Life and Times of America's Blue Yodeler. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1979.

Selected Recordings

"Blue Yodel" (1927, Victor 21142); "Blue Yodel No. 2" (1928, Victor 21291); "In the Jailhouse Now" (1928, Victor 21245); "Anniversary Blue Yodel" (1929, Victor 22488); "I've Ranged, I've Roamed, I've Travelled" (1929, Bluebird B 5892); "Jimmie's Texas Blues" (1929, Victor 22379); "Mississippi River Blues" (1929, Victor 23535); "Nobody Knows But Me" (1929, Victor 23518); "Train Whistle Blues" (1929, Victor 22379); "Jimmie's Mean Mama Blues" (1930, Victor 23503); "Pistol Packin' Papa" (1930, Victor 22554); "Those Gambler's Blues" (1930, Victor 22554); "My Good Gal's Gone Blues" (1931, Bluebird B 5942); "T. B. Blues" (1931, Victor 23535); "Travellin' Blues" (1931, Victor 23564); "My Time Ain't Long" (1932, Victor 23669); "Ninety-Nine Years Blues" (1932, Victor 23669); "Peach Pickin' Time in Georgia" (1932, Victor 23781); "Whippin' That Old T. B." (1932, Victor 23751); "Jimmie Rodgers' Last Blue Yodel" (1933, Bluebird B 5281); "Mississippi Delta Blues" (1933, Victor 23816); "Waiting for a Train" (Victor V 40014).

RODGERS, SONNY "CAT DADDY"

b. Oliver Lee Rodgers, 4 December 1939; Hughes, AR
 d. 7 May 1990; Minneapolis, MN

Guitarist. Through 1960 he performed in Hughes, Arkansas, including recording with Forrest City Joe Pugh in 1959. After a brief time in Texas, he moved to Minneapolis, Minnesota. Rodgers had a long association with Mojo Buford, who recommended him to Muddy Waters to replace Sammy Lawhorn in 1972.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Larkin
 Wisner, Steve. "'Cat Daddy': Sonny Rogers" [sic]. Living Blues no. 42 (January/February 1979): 26–27.

ROGERS, JIMMY

b. James A. Lane, 3 June 1924; Ruleville, MS
 d. 19 December 1997; Chicago, IL

Jimmy Rogers was instrumental in creating the Chicago, urban blues sound that has become the foundation for modern blues. He was the first guitarist with Muddy Waters's band, creating a complement to Muddy's slide guitar. Rogers developed a solo career and enjoyed national fame in the 1950s.

Born James A. Lane, he was raised by his grandmother after his father was killed in a scuffle at a sawmill. She moved them often, living in several towns in several states: Tennessee, Arkansas, and Mississippi. His first guitar was a diddley bow, common in the country—broom wire nailed to the side of a house and plucked. Next was the harmonica, which was more portable than a wall, less inexpensive, and easily accessible. Soon he was playing other people's guitars. Meeting and watching Houston Stackhouse, Tommy McClennan, Robert Petway, Robert Lockwood, and Joe Willie Wilkins, and listening to King Biscuit Time on the radio, Rogers developed a solid musical foundation and earned a reliable reputation as a player.

Rogers had family in Chicago, and had been there several times before settling permanently in the mid-1940s. He found an apartment on the Near West Side, next to the Maxwell Street market, which is where he was living when he befriended a factory coworker who was Muddy Waters's cousin. From the time Muddy and Jimmy first played together, they knew they had a good sound. Rogers understood how to play bass parts and how to play licks that complemented Muddy's slide. If Muddy's playing was a diamond, Jimmy was the jeweler's black velvet that made it shine.

Initially, Rogers and Waters played with a third guitarist named Claude "Blue" Smitty. To keep the sound varied, Jimmy often played harmonica instead of guitar, until Blue Smitty left and Jimmy found Little Walter. Muddy, Jimmy, and Walter began gigging together and, on their off nights, called themselves the Headhunters, roving the Chicago club scene of the late 1940s, sitting in on other people's gigs and showing off their new, urban blues sound.

Jimmy began making his first recordings around 1946. He put out a single on the Harlem label, recording with Chicago's African American producer J. Mayo Williams, possibly around the time of Muddy's session with Williams. In 1947, Jimmy backed Little Walter for the small Ora-Nelle label in Chicago, and recorded his own single for the label about a year later. In 1949 he backed Memphis Minnie for the Regal label and cut an early version of "Ludella," which he recut in 1950 at his first Chess Records session. With "That's All Right" on the other side, Jimmy's first release became a two-sided hit. The full Muddy Waters band had yet to back Muddy on records, the label preferring the simpler sound of Muddy and an upright bass; however, Chess let the band record with Jimmy as the leader, beginning in December 1950. A year later, they began regularly recording with Muddy. Rogers continued to perform and record with Muddy, even as his solo career took off. When "Juke" became a hit for Little Walter, Muddy's band boasted a line-up with three stars. Through the early 1950s, Jimmy Rogers was on nearly all of Muddy's major hits: "Standing Around Crying," "She's All Right," "Mad Love (I Want You to Love Me)," "I'm Your Hoochie Coochie Man," "I Just Want to Make Love To You," "I'm Ready," and more.

Eventually, however, the performing group splintered. The three stars continued to work on each other's recordings as schedules allowed, but Jimmy, in 1955, also developed his own group: Eddie Ware on piano, S. P. Leary on drums, Poor Bob Woodfork on bass, and Big Walter Horton on harmonica. Other personnel would include saxophonist Ernest Cotton and, later, pianist Henry Gray. Rogers often recorded his sides immediately after a session with Muddy.

Under his own name, Rogers recorded a number of popular songs for Chess, many of which have enjoyed longevity: "That's All Right," "Ludella," "Goin' Away Baby," "Money, Marbles, and Chalk," "The Last Time," "Chicago Bound," "Sloppy Drunk," "You're the One," "Walking By Myself," and "Rock This House." Generally, Rogers's songs were upbeat and urbane. His voice was smooth and accessible, relaxed; there was a smile implied in many of his blues.

The rise of rock 'n' roll in the late 1950s made blues gigs evermore scarce. Before putting down his guitar in the early 1960s, Rogers cut several sides with Howlin' Wolf, including "Down in the Bottom" and "The Red Rooster." Eventually, he quit music and opened a clothing store. He worked various jobs through the 1960s, including occasional roles as a hired guitarist for other people's bands. He returned to recording at the decade's end, and went on to make records featuring Freddie King and the Aces for Leon Russell's Shelter label. In 1977, he reunited with Muddy for the latter's I'm Ready album. They did occasional gigs together thereafter, until Muddy's death in 1983. Jimmy also made records for Bullseye (with Ronnie Earl and the Broadcasters), Analogue (with Carey Bell), and Antone's (with Kim Wilson).

Through the 1980s and 1990s, Jimmy was recognized as one of the blues' elder statesmen. He was a hero in Austin, Texas, and worked often with members of the Fabulous Thunderbirds. After Muddy's death, Jimmy toured with members of Muddy's later bands, including Pinetop Perkins, Willie Smith, and Calvin Jones. Many of Rogers's tunes were covered by other artists; "Walkin' By Myself" was covered by Paul Butterfield in 1969 and by Gary Moore in 1990. Big Bill Morganfield, Muddy's son, cut "Trace of

You” on Ramblin’ Mind. Two of Rogers’s tunes (“Goin’ Away Baby” and “Blues Leave Me Alone”) were on Eric Clapton’s From the Cradle—one of the biggest-selling blues albums of all time. At the time of his death in 1997, Rogers was working on an album that featured many of the people he’d influenced. Blues Blues Blues was released posthumously, and includes contributions from Eric Clapton, Mick Jagger and Keith Richards, Lowell Fulson, Robert Plant, Jimmy Page, and others.

ROBERT GORDON

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Herzhaft; Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Brisbin, John. “I’m Havin’ Fun Right Today.” Living Blues no. 135 (September/October 1997): 12–27.
Forte, Dan. “Jimmy Rogers and the Pioneers of Chicago Blues.” Guitar Player 21, no. 8 (August 1987): 66–78.
Gordon, Robert. Can’t Be Satisfied: The Life and Times of Muddy Waters. New York: Little, Brown, 2002.
O’Neal, Jim, and Bill Greensmith. “Jimmy Rogers.” Living Blues no. 14 (Autumn 1973): 11–20.
Tooze, Sandra. Muddy Waters: Mojo Man. Toronto: ECW Press, 1997.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

ROGERS, ROY

b. 28 July 1950; Redding, CA

Roy Rogers has gained a reputation as a gifted slide guitarist. Since his first recording, A Foot in the Door (1976) with harmonica player David Burgin, he has recorded more than ten solo albums and performed on even more. In 1980, Rogers formed the Delta Rhythm Kings, based out of San Francisco. During the early 1980s, he toured with John Lee Hooker’s Coast to Coast Blues Band. He later produced Hooker’s albums The Healer, which included the Grammy-winning song “I’m in the Mood” (1989) and Chill Out, which won a Grammy in 1995. Rogers was a 2003 W. C. Handy Award nominee for best blues guitarist.

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

- AMG (Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli
Wasserzieher, B. “Roy Rogers: The Human Touch.” Blues Revue no. 45 (March 1999): 14–15.

Discography: AMG

ROGERS, SONNY

(See Rodgers, Sonny “Cat Daddy”)

ROLAND, WALTER

b. 4 December 1903; Ralph, AL

d. 12 October 1972; Fairfield, AL

Birth date from death certificate is 1903; an alternate birth date of December 20, 1902, was given on his Social Security documents. Roland was an Alabama pianist who shared some repertory with Jabo Williams, especially “House Lady Blues.” He recorded solo and with Lucille Bogan and Sonny Scott for the ARC labels in 1933–1935. Among his notable solo titles are “Red Cross Blues,” “Jookit Jookit,” and “Early This Morning.”

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
“Walter Roland.” Delta Haze Corporation profile, <http://www.deltahaze.com/30/wr.html>.

Discography: DGR

ROLL AND TUMBLE BLUES

“Roll and Tumble Blues” was first recorded by “Hambone” Willie Newbern in 1929 in Atlanta, Georgia, for Okeh Records (Okeh 8679). Sleepy John Estes, guitarist and singer from Brownsville, Tennessee, in an interview published in 1975 (Lornell), remembered performing with Newbern in Como, Mississippi. In view of some similarity of the “Roll and Tumble Blues” melody to “Banty Rooster Blues” recorded by Walter Rhodes and by Charley Patton, and to the “Minglewood Blues” recorded by Gus Cannon, Newbern on his record may have taken a commonly used melody from Mississippi/West Tennessee practice. The melody is in twelve measures, with an AAB lyric scheme. Over the years the title would also be known as “Rollin’ and Tumblin’.” Newbern’s guitar was tuned to open A, performing a distinctive lick on the middle four strings.

The song quickly received other treatments on 78s. Estes himself would sing the melody to the words “The Girl I Love, She Got Long Curly Hair” during his first recording session (1929, Victor V38549). A direct cover of the Newbern version, but with the rhythmic pattern in the melody altered, was “Dough Roller Blues” (Vocalion 1481) in 1930 by Garfield Akers with Joe Callicott, both of Hernando, Mississippi.

In 1936 Mississippi Delta bluesman Robert Johnson used the melody and several verses of Newburn's record as the apparent basis for "If I Had Possession over Judgment Day." While the title verse suggests an apocalyptic image, other verses may indicate now-obscure slang from Johnson's time. The performance was not released during his lifetime; in fact it was not issued until the 1961 King of the Delta Blues Singers album (Columbia CL 1654). The following year (1937), Johnson made "Traveling Riverside Blues" (also unreleased until 1961), singing with Charley Patton-like drawls; the performance suggests more Patton's "Banty Rooster Blues" than "Roll and Tumble Blues." The similarity of the three records should be noted nonetheless.

Muddy Waters was another Mississippi Delta bluesman who adopted the song, and he retained it in his repertoire when he moved north to Chicago in 1943. His early sessions for Aristocrat (later Chess) Records were of him singing and playing guitar with a bassist assisting him. In this duo format Waters recorded his first treatment of this song, as "Down South Blues" (1948, but not released until Chess LP 1511), and then a second one as "Rollin' and Tumblin'" Parts One and Two (1950, Aristocrat 412). Midway through 1950, Waters participated in a Parkway label session held in drummer Baby Face Leroy Foster's name, during which Foster, Waters, and Little Walter Jacobs recorded a two-part version of "Rollin' and Tumblin'" in the harmonica-guitar-drums combination that Waters longed to use in his own recording sessions. Then on October 23, 1950, Waters was allowed to bring his full working band to a Chess recording session for the first time, and among the songs recorded that day was "Louisiana Blues" (Chess 1441), sung to the "Rollin' and Tumblin'" melody.

Rock versions tend to follow the Muddy Waters's versions. Perhaps the best known version is "Rollin' and Tumblin'" by Cream with bassist Jack Bruce and guitarist Eric Clapton on its debut album Fresh Cream (1966, Atco). Notable also is "Drinking Muddy Water" by Clapton's former band The Yardbirds, but with Jimmy Page on guitar; the 1967 studio version for the Little Games LP (Epic) features Keith Relf on the harmonica, but the April 1968 live version (on the scarce LP Live Yardbirds with Jimmy Page, released 1971) has electric guitar slide solos from Page. Page's later group, Led Zeppelin, taped a track titled "Traveling Riverside Blues," but this has no melodic resemblance and little if any lyric reference to the Robert Johnson song of the same title, or to any other song in the "Roll and Tumble" tune group.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Lornell, Kip, and Jim O'Neal, "Living Blues Interview: Hammie Nixon and Sleepy John Estes." Living Blues no. 19 (January/February 1975): 13–19.

ROLLING STONES

After performing with Blues Incorporated, Mick Jagger, Keith Richards, and Brian Jones formed the Rolling Stones with Dick Taylor and Mick Avory in 1962. Their debut gig was on July 12, 1962, at London's Marquee Theater as a temporary replacement for Blues Incorporated. By January 1963, Charlie Watts had replaced Mick Avory and Bill Wyman had replaced Dick Taylor to complete the band. After several gigs in the London club scene, the Rolling Stones became the resident band at Richmond's Station Hotel, later called The Crawdaddy Club. Their sound was deeply rooted in the Chicago blues scene, which is evident from the fact that their band name was taken from the Muddy Waters song and their first release, recorded in 1963, which contained a cover of Chuck Berry's "Come On" and Muddy Waters' "I Wanna Be Loved."

The Rolling Stones continued to introduce blues and R&B songs, such as Willie Dixon's "Little Red Rooster" and Slim Harpo's "I'm a King Bee," to young British and American audiences. The Stones released their first album in April 1964. The album was followed by U.S. tours in June and October of the same year. During their second tour, the Stones appeared on The Ed Sullivan Show. Their appearance caught the attention of the media and established the Rolling Stones in the United States. Subsequent albums, while still influenced by Chicago blues, moved away from covers and focused on original songs written by Jagger and Richards. Their 1966 album Aftermath was groundbreaking in that it was their first album to contain only new material. The Stones continued their success throughout the next four decades and continue to record and play sold-out venues.

ROBERT WEBB FRY II

Bibliography

AMG (Stephen Thomas Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli
Bruning, Bob. Blues: The British Connection. London: Helter Skelter, 1995.
Lysaght, Alan. The Rolling Stones: An Oral History. Toronto: McArthur, 2003.
Wyman, Bill. Rolling with the Stones. New York: DK Publishing, 2002.

Discography: AMGSelected Recordings

England's Newest Hit Makers—The Rolling Stones (1964, London).
Aftermath (1966, London).
Beggar's Banquet (1968, London).
Let It Bleed (1969, London).
Sticky Fingers (1971, Rolling Stones).
Forty Licks (2002, ABKCO).

ROMEO

A subsidiary label of the Cameo Record Corporation, Romeo was introduced in July 1926 for sale through S. H. Kress & Company stores. Blues issues included sides by Viola McCoy (1926–1927). Cameo merged with Pathé in October 1927 and Romeo passed with its parent to the American Record Corporation (ARC) in July 1929. It became one of ARC's five "dime-store" labels using common issue numbers from September 1935. The labels shared an important Race catalog, including releases by Lucille Bogan and Walter Roland, Big Bill (Broonzy), Sam Collins, Georgia Tom (Dorsey), Blind Boy Fuller, and Pine-wood Tom (Josh White). All the "dime-store" labels were withdrawn in April 1938.

HOWARD RYE

Discography: DGR; Sutton

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Studio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver et al., Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
 Rust, Brian. The American Record Label Book. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington Press, 1978.

RON

New Orleans label owned by Joe Ruffino, and active 1958–1963. Artists included Professor Longhair, Irma Thomas, and Chris Kenner.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrathROOMFUL OF BLUES

Formed in 1967 in Providence, Rhode Island. The longest-running and best-known blues big band of the modern era, founded and headquartered in the unlikely blues location of Rhode Island, served as the single most productive talent incubator of the genre. The band, with more than fifty members through the years, accumulated an extensive and accomplished list of alumni, but it began as the duo of guitarist Duke Robillard and pianist Al Copely. It grew to a quartet with the addition of a rhythm section, featuring future Fabulous Thunderbirds drummer Fran Christina. By 1970 Robillard had discovered jump-blues, and a horn section featuring Greg Piccolo and Rich Lataille was added to give the group its big band configuration.

Robillard, replaced by Ronnie Earl, left the band in 1979 and Piccolo assumed command. The horn section was expanded and it recorded Hot Little Mama on its own label. Ron Levy and Curtis Salgado were added by time of the second album, Live at Lupo's Heartbreak Hotel. A trio of recording projects as a backing band, Big Joe Turner's Blues Train, New Orleans guitarist Earl King's Glazed, and an eponymous Eddie "Cleanhead Vinson" album, earned it three Grammy nominations in the 1980s. The band's W. C. Handy Award-winning horn section also recorded behind Stevie Ray Vaughan on his Live at Carnegie Hall and pop star Pat Benatar's blues effort True Love.

A 1997 Roomful reconfiguration involved five members exiting but it rolled on, recording There Goes the Neighborhood the next year, with guitarist Chris Vachon in the driver's seat, and releasing That's Right four years later.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin
 Smith, M. "The Biggest, Baddest Band in the Land: Roomful of Blues." Blues Revue no. 34 (January/February 1998): 19–22.

Discography: AMGROOSTER BLUES

Label founded in Chicago by Jim O'Neal in 1980, then moved to Clarksdale, Mississippi. Album artists include Eddy Clearwater, Eddie Shaw, Lonnie Pitchford, Lonnie Shields, and Valerie Wellington. The 45-rpm issues included tracks by Big Jack Johnson and Hound Dog Taylor. In recent years, the label has been owned as a subsidiary of Bottled Majic Music.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Rooster Blues website, <http://www.roosterblues.com/>.

ROOTS/PALTRAM/TRUTH/FOR SPECIALISTS ONLY

Record label established in Vienna, Austria, in the mid-1960s by Evelyn and Johnny Parth, producing limited-edition reissues of pre-1942 blues. Some were devoted to individual artists including Blind Lemon Jefferson and Tommy McClennan; many were collections whose programming appeared arbitrary even among the relative dearth of reissues at that time. Remastering was also inclined to be uncritical. The five issues made in a Roots Special Edition series attempted more systematic programming and improved sound. Releases also appeared on the subsidiary Paltram and Truth (for gospel) labels, while a single issue of one hundred fifty copies on For Specialists Only made available for research a number of items then known to survive only in very poor condition, including three Charley Patton titles. Contemporary recordings by Son House, Furry Lewis, and Honeyboy Edwards were issued in a series otherwise devoted to Austrian folk music. Following the proprietors' divorce, Evelyn continued trading for a time but no new issues were made after the mid-1970s.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Atkinson, Gary. "Good Night in Vienna." Blues & Rhythm no. 132 (September 1998): 14.

ROSETTA RECORDS

Historian, critic, and cultural activist Rosetta Reitz began the Rosetta label in 1980 as a company dedicated to chronicling the achievements of undervalued and/or unknown female jazz and blues musicians. Reitz not only compiled the selections for each of the albums, but she wrote extensive, informative liner notes as well. Some of the releases included definitive anthologies of the Sweethearts of Rhythm, the fine trumpeter Valaida Snow, and a superb release of Dinah Washington material. Reitz sometimes would extend her reach into debatable territory, most notably an album of Mae West numbers, but almost all the Rosetta releases are essential. They are also still predominantly on hard-to-find twelve-inch vinyl albums.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Franckling, K. "Rosetta Records: By Women Only." Jazz-Times 21, no. 6 (June 1991): 9.

Keyes, Cheryl L. "Women's Heritage Series: Rosetta Records." Journal of American Folklore 105, no. 415 (Winter 1992): 73-80.

ROSS, DOCTOR ISAIAH

b. Charles Isaiah Ross, 21 October 1925; Tunica, MS d. 28 May 1993; Flint, MI

Blues multi-instrumentalist "Doctor" Isaiah Ross grew up in a musical family and started playing harmonica at age six, inspired by his father's skills on the instrument and later by the recordings of John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson. Ross began playing the guitar several years later and took lessons from local guitarist Wiley Galatin. He served in the Army during World War II and played music in various USO shows. After being discharged, he hosted radio shows in Clarksdale, Mississippi; Helena, Arkansas; and Memphis, Tennessee. Ross recorded sporadically for Memphis producer Sam Phillips from 1951 until 1954, with issues on both Chess and Sun. Ross's powerful sound featured his hypnotic amplified harmonica and infectious boogie guitar rhythm, showcased on such Sun classics as "Chicago Breakdown" and "Juke Box Boogie." He performed throughout the tristate region with his bands The Jump and Jive Boys and The Interns. In 1954, Ross moved to Flint, Michigan, and gained employment at a local automobile plant, a job he held for the rest of his life. Frustrated with keeping a band together, he began performing as a one-man band consisting of harmonica, guitar, and drums. In 1959, after releasing a single on his own D.I.R. label, Ross recorded numerous sides for Fortune Records, including "Cat Squirrel," which would be covered by the rock group Cream in 1968. He continued to perform and record periodically throughout the United States and Europe during the rest of his life. Ross died at age sixty-seven from a heart attack while working at the plant, just three months before retirement.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Barry Lee Pearson); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
 Pearson, Barry Lee. "Doctor Ross' One Man Boogie." Living Blues no. 99 (September/October 1991): 10-17.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

Boogie Disease (1992, Arhoolie CD 371).

ROTHCHILD, PAUL A.

b. 18 April 1935; Brooklyn, NY
 d. 30 March 1995; Los Angeles, CA

House producer for Elektra label, 1963–1969. Oversaw numerous roots-oriented album projects, many featuring young, white performers, for example, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, whose influential 1965 debut helped inaugurate blues-rock. As an independent, he also produced Janis Joplin and Bonnie Raitt. At the 1965 Newport Folk Festival, Rothchild ran the PA board as Bob Dylan performed in a controversial set with an electric band.

JOHN KIMSEY

Bibliography

Larkin
 Holzman, Jac, and Gavan Daws. Follow the Music: The Life and High Times of Elektra Records in the Great Years of American Popular Culture. Santa Monica, CA: First Media Books, 1998.

Discography: AMG

See also Bloomfield, Michael; Butterfield, Paul; Elektra Records; Guitar; Joplin, Janis; Raitt, Bonnie

ROULETTE, FREDDIE

b. 3 May 1939; Evanston, IL

An unconventional though heralded blues musician, Freddie Roulette forged a name for himself as an innovator in the post-Hendrix world of guitar playing by introducing the lap-steel guitar to the blues. He absorbed the standard country music and Hawaiian styles particular to this instrument as a child, and adopted blues structures to his playing by his mid-teens. By age sixteen he had steady gigs in Chicago's South Side clubs backing Earl Hooker. He played with Luther Allison on the guitarist's first recordings from 1967 as well as appearing on various 45s by area musicians. He and Hooker toured extensively from 1966 to 1969, recording one LP each for Cuca and Arhoolie. In 1969 Roulette left Chicago, touring cross-country with Charlie Musselwhite twice before settling in Fresno, California. He joined the Pure Food and Drug Act in 1969, and its later variant, Southern Comfort. In 1973, Roulette recorded his first solo record while living in Fresno and adopted the teachings of Buddhism in that same period. A move to Berkeley in the late 1970s signals a reduction in Roulette's musical activities. Though he undertook an overseas tour in the 1980s, he appearances became restricted to local gigs and festivals, teaming up in the early 1990s with Bay Area cohort Luther Tucker. Roulette made his living as manager of an apartment building through the rest of the decade, though a comeback album in 1997, Back in Chicago (High Horse label) won awards and critical acclaim.

JOHN OTIS

Bibliography

Jung, Maureen. "Freddie Roulette's Zen of Lap-Steel Guitar." Living Blues no. 141 (September/October 1998): 30–35.

ROULETTE/RAMA

Founded in New York City in 1953, George Goldner's first R&B label, Rama, grew out of his Latin American label Tico. The label lasted until 1957, issuing blues disks by Lonnie Johnson and Ben Smith among the usual vocal group releases. After launching a pop subsidiary, Gee, in 1956 Goldner incorporated the successful Roulette label, which he then sold to producers Hugo & Luigi the following year.

DAVID PENNY

Discography

Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "Rama/Luniverse Album Discographies." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/rama.html> (accessed December 12, 2004).
 ———. "The Roost Story." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/roulette.html> (accessed December 12, 2004).
The Roulette Story (1998, Westside CD WESX 305).
The Rama Story (1999, Westside CD WESD 215).

ROUNDER

Founded in 1970 in Cambridge, Massachusetts, by a trio of friends, Ken Irwin, Marian Leighton, and Bill Nowlin, who shared a passion for rural American acoustic music. Rounder's earliest releases focused on string band, bluegrass, and folk music, including folklorist-produced compilations of blues field recordings. It grew to become a premier indie label, with a catalog of more than three thousand titles covering a wide gamut of genres.

Rounder skyrocketed in size and influence after its late 1970s LPs by blues-rocker George Thorogood went gold. Soon, the formerly acoustic label was a major presence in electric blues, with early 1980s signings of Gatemouth Brown, Johnny Copeland, and the Legendary Blues Band. Throughout the 1980s and 1990s, the label tapped the fertile musical fields of Louisiana, recording New Orleans stalwarts like Johnny Adams, Irma Thomas, Walter Washington, and the Rebirth Brass Band; zydeco artists like Boozoo Chavis and Beau Jocque; Cajun artists like Bruce Daigrepoint and Steve Riley; and rising stars of the “crawfish circuit” like Marcia Ball. Long-time in-house producer Scott Billington was responsible for many of those recordings. For a time, the label’s distribution deal with New Orleans-based Black Top Records cemented its role as a dominant force in Louisiana roots music. In 1990, under the stewardship of producer Ron Levy, Rounder launched its Bullseye Blues and Jazz subsidiary, which released new recordings by aging stars Charles Brown, Ruth Brown, Lowell Fulson, and Jimmy McCracklin while signing new acts like Little Jimmy King, Smokin’ Joe Kubek, Preston Shannon, and Michelle Willson and issuing a steady flow of CDs by blues circuit perennials like Anson Funderburgh, Luther “Guitar Jr.” Johnson, Eddie Clearwater, and Roomful of Blues. Acoustic blues continued to be represented on the Rounder roster by John Jackson, Rory Block, and John Hammond.

ROUNDER

Faced with a nationwide slump in blues sales since the late 1990s, Rounder has cut back considerably on blues in favor of Americana, alt-country, bluegrass, and indie rock. Even so, the label did release an ambitious series of vintage recordings from the Library of Congress Archive of Folk Culture and the Alan Lomax Collection.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

Rounder website, <http://www.rounder.com/>.

Selected Recordings

Various artists. Deep Blue: The Rounder 25th Anniversary Blues Anthology (1995, Rounder 8520).

ROUNDS, ERNESTINE SMITH

b. Linden, TX

Composer. Has declined to give birth date in interviews. Arrived in the Los Angeles area in 1949, and worked as sales clerk at Flash Records store from 1952 to 1957. Wrote “Stranded in the Jungle” for the Jayhawks, whose 1956 hit recording sustained the Flash label through 1958.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Propes, Steve. “Confessions of a Flash Counter Girl.” Blues & Rhythm no. 134 (November 1998): 10–13.

ROY, EARNEST “GUITAR”

b. 25 September 1958; Clarksdale, MS

Son of regarded Clarksdale guitarist Earnest Sr., Roy began playing guitar at age five and played local jukes as a teen with his father. In the 1980s, he recorded with Frank Frost and Big Jack Johnson, and released a single on Rooster that displayed his exemplary guitar skills. Roy returned to blues in 2001 after a stint in gospel during the mid-1990s.

GENE TOMKO

ROYAL, MARSHAL

b. Marshal Walton Royal, Jr., 5 December 1912; Sapulpa, OK

d. 8 May 1995; Los Angeles, CA

After working with the Duke Ellington and Lionel Hampton bands, Royal achieved renown in jazz history as musical director and a warm-sounding alto saxophonist and clarinetist for the blues-savvy Count Basie Orchestra from 1950 to 1970.

FRANK-JOHN HADLEY

Bibliography

New Grove Jazz

Burke, Tony. “Marshal Royal.” Blues & Rhythm no. 100 (June/July 1995): 33.

Chilton, John. Who’s Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.

Discography: Lord

RPM

(See Modern/Flair/Meteor/Kent/RPM)

RST/RST BLUES DOCUMENT/ FANTASY BY

Vienna-based record label of drummer Rudolf “Rudi” Staeger, which in the 1980s issued some of Johnny Parth’s compilations of prewar blues and gospel music on its RST Blues Documents and Fantasy

By Selmerphone labels, the last-named being devoted to obscure vaudeville blues artists. Shortly after transference to CD in the early 1990s, the Parth compilations were repackaged on his own Document label. RST also issued a series devoted to jump bands and other early R&B performers, and a series of reissues of AFRS Jubilee transcriptions.

HOWARD RYE

RUBBOARD

In general, the term rubboard refers to a wood and metal device commonly used for washing clothes prior to the advent of modern washing machine; also called scrubboard or washboard. Wet, soapy clothing was rubbed against the crimped metal or glass surface of the rubboard to force the dirt out, then the items were rinsed in clean water, wrung, and hung to dry.

Pried from the protesting hands of busy mothers and wives, the rubboard was a commonly used informal rhythm instrument in the blues and other American folk traditions, and it played a major role in the jug and novelty (“spasm”) bands popular during the early days of jazz and blues. Like body percussion, foot stomping, diddley bow, and the washtub bass, the rubboard provided an underlying rhythmic pulse for melody instruments such as guitar and voice. The instrumental washboard and rubboard are thought to be substitutes for West African rubbed percussion instruments such as animal jawbones, incised gourds, and carved wood or animal horns, all played by passing a stick over ridges to make a rhythmic scraping noise.

By the 1960s the term rubboard had come to refer specifically to the Creole rubboard, or froittoir, that is the rhythmic hallmark of Louisiana zydeco music. The froittoir has its origins in the icebox rather than the washtub. A forerunner of the refrigerator, an icebox was an insulated box in which a large block of ice could be stored. It contained a ridged drip tray of metal or glass on which the block of ice was placed. Used as an instrument, this tray was originally held in the lap or attached to a string and hung around the neck. The modern metal froittoir is most often seen in the form of a vest worn by the player.

Although the traditional rubboard and the froittoir serve a similar rhythmic purpose in blues and zydeco, they are held and played differently, and the sounds are not really interchangeable. The froittoir is played standing, usually using bottle openers (“church keys”), silverware, coins, or other metallic objects in an up-and-down scraping motion over the ridges to provide a continuous rhythmic pulse. The rubboard is played from a seated position, with the board held under the arm, or resting on one thigh and supported by the hand on that side. The metal surface is usually tapped in rhythm with the fingers of the free hand, the tips of which are covered with metal thimbles to project the sound and protect the fingertips.

The basic rhythm is straight eighth notes. The pattern is typically tapped or scraped on all four beats, or a combination tapped on 1 & 3 and scraped on 2 & 4. For fast charts, scraped sixteenth notes yield a continuous sound with a pulse on the first note of each beat.

In 1942, Alan Lomax undertook an ambitious program of recording Coahoma County, Mississippi, blues for a joint project of Fisk University and the Library of Congress. Among the artists he recorded is Theopolis Stokes, who played double rubboard with added metallic items that provided a wide range of sounds. Stokes’s performances on the Lomax Black Appalachia CD (Rounder 1161-1823-2) are among some of the best examples of rubboard virtuosity.

Other rubboard players include the Hoosier Hot Shots, Warren “Baby” Dodds (Jimmy Bertrand’s Washboard Wizards, Jimmy Blythe’s Washboard Wizards, Beale Street Washboard Band), Washboard Sam, Washboard Slim, Washboard Chaz Leary, Fiddlin’ Joe Martin, and James “Peck” Curtis. Cleveland Chenier is probably the best known froittoir artist.

DEBORAH L. GILLASPIE

Bibliography

- Ancelet, Barry Jean, and Elemore Morgan, Jr. Cajun and Creole Music Makers. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1999.
- Brown, Ernest D. “Something from Nothing and More from Something: The Making and Playing of Music Instruments in African-American Cultures.” Selected Reports in Ethnomusicology 8 (1990): 275–291.
- “Jug and Washboard Bands.” In Jazz on Record: A Critical Guide to the First 50 Years: 1917–1967, edited by Albert McCarthy, Paul Oliver, et al. London: Hanover Books, 1968.
- Oliver, Paul. The Story of the Blues. rev. ed. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1998.
- Wade, Stephen. Liner notes for Black Appalachia: String Bands, Songsters and Hoedowns. Deep River of Sound Series: The Alan Lomax Collection (1999, Rounder 11661-1823-2).

RUSH, BOBBY

b. Emmitt Ellis, Jr., 10 November 1940; Houma, LA

Bobby Rush, born Emmett Ellis, Jr., the son of a preacher, began his blues career in Pine Bluff, Arkansas, with guitarist Boyd Gilmore and pianist Moose John Walker. He spent his journeyman years in

RUSH, BOBBY

Chicago alongside Luther Allison, Willie James Lyons, Freddie King, and others, doing versions of popular R&B hits of the time, whether it was Chuck Berry or James Brown. Influenced by Louis Jordan's comedic approach, Rush also began to develop what would become a renowned stage show by disguising himself so that he could play the role of MC or comedian as well as the featured singer of the night.

Though he lays claim to recording for Chess in the 1950s, the first Bobby Rush record that shows up in discographies is a 1961 single on Kem, followed by 45s on Salem, Jerry-O, Palos, Starville, Checker, and ABC. His 1971 hit on Fantasy, "Chicken Heads," was a prime sampling of the style Rush originated, which he calls "folk funk," built from an amalgam of vintage blues lyrics, old folk sayings, street talk, and bedroom humor, set to an insistent, bluesy funk rhythm pattern. After a few more singles on On Top, Sedgrick, Jewel, Warner Brothers, and London, Rush finally hit the charts again when he recorded his first LP in 1979 for Philadelphia International.

Rush moved to Jackson, Mississippi, a center of soul-blues activity in the heart of the southern area that had provided most of his audience, and began recording for LaJam Records in 1982, using the by now tried and true formula that had built him a following over the years. His tenure with LaJam yielded four albums and, among other staples in his repertoire, "Sue." Rush later did albums with Urgent! and Waldoxy, and in 2003 launched his own Deep Rush label in partnership with manager Greg Preston, releasing a live DVD followed by the CD Folk Funk, which marked a return to his blues roots. His live shows began to feature more of his blues harmonica and guitar playing, in addition to the revue of dancing girls he carries with him.

Always a businessman and promoter as well as an entertainer, Rush has made sure to make his presence known to white blues festival and blues society audiences as well to his traditional black R&B fan base. The "king of the chittlin circuit" title bestowed upon him by Rolling Stone magazine after his 2003 appearance in Martin Scorsese's PBS series may be disputed by performers in the field who have sold more records and command higher performance fees than Bobby Rush, but no one works harder or is so tireless and enthusiastic a showman.

JIM O'NEAL

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Cochrane, William, Bill Ferris, Peter Lee, and Jim O'Neal.
"Bobby Rush." Living Blues no. 84 (January/February 1989): 22–32.

Lauterbach, Preston. "2003: The Year of Bobby Rush."
Living Blues no. 170 (November/December 2003): 22–35.
Pruter, Robert. "Bobby Rush: A New Blend of Music."
Living Blues no. 84 (January/February 1989): 26–30.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

RUSH, OTIS

b. 29 April 1934; near Philadelphia, MS

Born and raised on a plantation near Philadelphia, Mississippi, by his single mother Julia, influential blues singer and guitarist Otis Rush received little formal schooling, a result of having to work in the fields from as early as five years of age. Rush was exposed to the blues through both the radio and his mother's record collection, and was inspired by the recordings of Memphis Minnie, Charles Brown, and Louis Jordan. By the age of eight, he began teaching himself to play on his brother Leroy's guitar, and also learned from watching local guitarist Vaughan Adams.

After spending much of his life farming, Rush went to Chicago in the late 1940s to visit his sister, prompted by her enthusiastic reports of meeting blues musicians T-Bone Walker and Muddy Waters. He began frequenting local Chicago clubs and caught performances by Waters, Little Walter, and Junior Wells. Encouraged by what he saw, he decided to stay and began practicing guitar seriously. While holding down a day job, he started playing at several clubs throughout the neighborhood as a solo performer.

Rush formed his own band in the early 1950s and worked at various South and West Side taverns, including the Brown Derby and the 708 Club. He often teamed up with musician brothers Dave and Louis Myers and drummer Fred Below. By the mid-1950s, Rush, along with fellow contemporaries Magic Sam, Buddy Guy, and Freddie King, were developing a raucous, riff-oriented guitar-driven urban blues style that eventually became known as the "West Side Sound."

While performing at the 708 Club, Rush was discovered by famed producer Willie Dixon and he was quickly signed to Cobra Records. Rush's first release for the label was the phenomenal "I Can't Quit You, Baby" in 1956, which reached number six on the R&B charts and became a postwar blues classic. The incendiary slow blues featured Rush's tortured vocals and vibrato-laden guitar lines, both of which would become his signature sound. Rush recorded several more classics for the label over the next two years, including “All Your Love,” “Double Trouble,” and “My Love Will Never Die.” These recordings are considered by many to be Rush’s greatest sides, and are often regarded as some of the best Chicago blues of the postwar era.

Otis Rush performing at the Chicago Blues Festival, June 2001. (Photo by Gene Tomko)

After Cobra’s demise in the late 1950s, he continued to play area clubs and recorded for Chess Records in 1960, which yielded several more blues classics, including the impassioned “So Many Roads.” A session for Duke followed in 1962, which resulted in the solitary single “Homework.” Rush recorded for several different labels throughout the 1960s and 1970s, but was never able to receive the recognition, status, or success that his talent merited. In 1965, the left-handed guitarist recorded a solid set for Vanguard’s celebrated Chicago/The Blues/Today! series, and the following year he toured Europe as part of the American Folk Blues Festival package. His 1969 Mike Bloomfield–Nick Gravenites–produced release Mourning in the Morning on Cotillion yielded mixed reviews from critics.

Rush’s luck seemed to turn around for the moment in 1971 when he signed with a major label and cut the splendid Right Place, Wrong Time for Capitol Records. Unfortunately, Capitol never released the album, and it remained unissued until it appeared on Bullfrog in 1976 (and currently available on HighTone.) An inspired but uneven studio session for Delmark titled Cold Day in Hell was also released that year. The following year saw the release of the controversial Lost in the Blues on Alligator, a session Rush recorded earlier in Sweden but to his dismay was edited and overdubbed with Lucky Peterson’s keyboards by the Chicago label. Frustrated by years of self-perceived bad record deals, Rush took a hiatus from the recording studio for the next seventeen years. In the meantime, several live recordings of Rush were issued, including the stellar So Many Roads: Live, recorded in 1975 in Tokyo and released on Delmark.

Rush made a triumphant return to the studio in 1994 with the critically acclaimed Ain’t Enough Comin’ In on Mercury, which found him in excellent form both vocally and instrumentally. Another exceptional effort for the House of Blues label titled Any Place I’m Going followed in 1998. He continued to perform periodically both in the United States and abroad for the next several years, finally taking his rightful place as one of the originators of modern Chicago blues and a major influence on countless blues and rock musicians. Tragedy struck in early 2004 when Rush suffered a stroke that affected both his singing and playing, making his future as a performer uncertain.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Obrecht, Jas. “Otis Rush: Been Some Powerful Stuff Happen to Me.” Living Blues no. 142 (November/December 1998): 18–31.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

So Many Roads (1975, Delmark CD 643; reissued 1995).
Ain’t Enough Comin’ In (1994, Mercury CD 314 518 769-2).
Good ‘Un’s—The Classic Cobra Recordings 1956–1958 (2000, West Side CD WESA 858).

RUSHING, JAMES ANDREW “JIMMY”

b. 26 August 1903; Oklahoma City, OK
d. 8 June 1972; New York City, NY

Raised in a musical family in which his father played trumpet and his mother and brother were singers, Rushing took violin lessons as a child and was taught to play piano by his cousin, Wesley Manning. After graduating from the Douglass High School in Oklahoma City, he moved to California in 1923, returning home two years later to sing with the Billy King Revue, the musicians from which would become Walter Page’s Blue Devils. By the mid-1930s, after a long spell under bandleaders Bennie and Buster Moten, Rushing became the vocalist with Count Basie’s Orchestra, remaining until 1948. From the mid-1940s, although he continued to work frequently with the Basie band, he began touring as a single and recording under his own name for independent R&B labels such as Excelsior, King, Gotham, and Parrot Records. From the mid-1950s, Rushing became a jazz ambassador, traveling internationally and frequently touring Europe and Australia, both as a single and with the big bands of Basie, Buck Clayton, Benny Goodman, Harry James, and Eddie Condon, and recording extensively for the Vanguard and Columbia labels. In 1969 Rushing was featured as both an actor and a singer in the Seven Arts period drama The Learning Tree, but by the summer of 1971 he was inactive due to illness with cancer and he died the following year.

Often referred to as a progenitor of the jump-blues style of blues shouting, Jimmy Rushing was certainly one of the first band singers to have to contend with the level of noise generated by a boisterous swing band; his ballads were often performed in a slightly archaic fashion, but his jazzy blues and jump tunes were completely innovative. He became the singing hero of the early Kansas City blues singers such as Walter Brown, Gate-mouth Moore, and Joe Turner, who in turn influenced the likes of Wynonie Harris and Jimmy Witherspoon. Rushing performed—and in many cases either wrote or cowrote—the definitive original versions of such jazz blues and jump-blues classics as “Good Morning Blues,” “Boogie Woogie (I May Be Wrong),” “Going to Chicago,” “Sent for You Yesterday (And Here You Come Today),” “The Blues I Like to Hear,” “Evil Blues,” and “Take Me Back Baby,” all recorded during his tenure with Count Basie in the late 1930s and early 1940s. He remained friends with his old boss to the end of his days and, indeed, even on his solo recordings following his split with the Count in the late 1940s, he usually benefited from sterling accompaniment from bands composed from Basie sidemen, past and present.

DAVID PENNY

Bibliography

- AMG (Richard S. Ginell); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern Burke, Tony, and Dave Penny. “Stand Up & Shout the Blues—Jimmy Rushing” [part 1]. Blues & Rhythm no. 13 (October 1985): 4; [part 2]. Blues & Rhythm no. 14 (November 1985): 4.
Chilton, John. Who's Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.
Dance, Stanley. The World of Count Basie. New York City: Scribners, 1980.

Discography: AMG; Lord; LSFP

Selected Recordings in Reissue

- The Blues Singer 1937–1938* (1991, Suisa CD JZCD345).
The Essential Jimmy Rushing (1993, Vanguard CD 65/66-2).
The Blues I Like to Hear (1999, Blue Boar/Culture Press CD BB991011).

RUSSELL, TOMMIE LEE

- b. 11 September 1925; Vienna, GA
d. 1976; Atlanta, GA

First name sometimes spelled “Tommy.” Pianist born in a rural musical family. Later in life he moved to Atlanta. In his obituary, Pete Lowry described him as “a strange pianist, mostly a crude sort with little regard for bar-length, but with touches of subtlety in his playing.”

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Lowry, Pete. “Tommie Lee Russell” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 32 (May/June 1977): 6.

RYKODISC

Formed in 1980 as the world’s first CD-only company, Rykodisc has now expanded into a multi-format company issuing everything from rock and pop to blues and world music. It was created by founders Don Rose, Arthur Mann, Rob Simonds, and A&R head Jeff Rougvie, and the label’s first signee was Frank Zappa. There are now more than four hundred titles in their catalog, and some current artists include Kelly Joe Phelps, Bill Hicks, and the Thrill Kill Kult.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

- Rykodisc website, <http://www.rykodisc.com/> (accessed February 7, 2005).

S

SADLER, HASKELL ROBERT “COOL PAPA”

b. 6 April 1935; Denver, CO
d. 6 May 1994; Oakland, CA

Vocalist and guitarist. Traveled widely with different bands before settling in Oakland in the late 1960s. Recorded in Denver with his Mellowtones on Melodia (early 1950s), then in Los Angeles with Sidney Maiden for J. R. Fulbright (1955, issued on Flash), and later (ca. 1982) recorded an album for TJ.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Harris
Bonner, Brett J. “Haskell ‘Cool Papa’ Sadler.” Living Blues
no. 117 (September/October 1994): 61–62.

Discography: LSFP

See also Flash; Maiden, Sidney; Oakland

SAFFIRE—THE UPPITY BLUES WOMEN

Acoustic trio featuring pianist Ann Rabson, guitarist Gaye Adegbalola, and mandolinist Andra Faye McIntosh, performing sassy and spirited blues in clubs and festivals. Since 1990 they have recorded for Alligator Records.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin; Santelli
Skelly, Richard. “Three for the Road: Saffire—The Uppity Blues Women.” Sing Out! 36, no. 4 (1992): 18–25.

Discography: AMG

SAIN, OLIVER

b. 1 March 1932; Dundee, MS
d. 28 October 2003; St. Louis, MO

Alto/tenor saxophone, drums, keyboards, songwriter, producer, studio owner. Sain started out playing drums before moving to his primary instrument, saxophone. By the late 1940s, Sain’s family was living in West Memphis, Arkansas. As a teenager, Sain played with the Howlin’ Wolf Band in the Memphis area. At this same time, he began his long relationship with Little Milton. After Sain moved to Chicago in 1955, he briefly reunited with Howlin’ Wolf, who had since moved to Chicago. He also played with Elmore James. Sain relocated to St. Louis in 1959 to work with Little Milton. While bandleader/sax player for Milton, Sain hired Fontella Bass to play piano in Milton’s band and discovered that she could sing. Sain brought Bass and Bobby McClure to Chicago to record for Chess Records. Their duet, the Sain-penned “Don’t Mess Up a Good Thing,” was an early hit for the label. Sain opened his own studio in the mid-1960s. His only charting song as a leader was a disco hit in 1976, “Party Hearty.” During the 1980s and 1990s, Sain produced Larry Davis, Eddie Kirkland, and Johnnie Johnson.

SAIN, OLIVER

DENNIS TAYLOR

Bibliography

Larkin

Burke, Tony. “Obituaries.” Blues & Rhythm no. 185 (December 2003): 18.

SALGADO, CURTIS

b. 4 February 1954; Everett, WA

Singer and harmonica player Curtis Salgado gathered his early musical interest from his father and soon developed a deep love for the blues. In his teens, Salgado formed his first band, Three Fingered Jack, which turned into the Nighthawks in 1974.

Salgado later became lead vocalist of the Robert Cray band and spent six years with Cray before Cray achieved his international fame. It was during this time that Salgado became an influence for John Belushi’s character Jake Blues in the film The Blues Brothers. In 1979 when he was filming Animal House, Belushi saw Salgado perform in Eugene, Oregon, with the Robert Cray band, and Belushi reputedly used much of what he heard and saw from Salgado as a blueprint for his famous blues character, although this remains generally unknown to the public.

After leaving Cray’s band in 1982, Salgado formed his own group, In Yo Face, and then sang as the lead singer for the Boston band Roomful of Blues from 1984 to 1986. He eventually broke out as a solo artist in 1991, forming the Stilettos. In 1995, Salgado moved to the Priority label, which released More Than You Chew, followed by Hit It ‘n’ Quit It with Lucky Records.

Over the years, he has sat in with several heroes, including Muddy Waters, Bobby “Blue” Bland, Albert Collins, and Bonnie Raitt, and he accompanied Santana on his nationwide tour in 1995. Salgado’s charismatic singing and stylistic combination of R&B, soul, and blues make him a popular performer, especially in the Pacific Northwest.

HEATHER PINSON

Bibliography

AMG (Ankeny); Santelli

Discography: AMG

Curtis Salgado and the Stilettos (1991, BFE/JRS Records CD 35851-2).

More Than You Can Chew (1995, Rhythm Safari/Priority Records CD P253930).

Hit It ‘n’ Quit It (1997, Lucky Records CD LRS-040).

Wiggle Outta This (1999, Shanachie CD 9014).

Soul Activated (2001, Shanachie CD 9028).

SAMPLES, JOHN T.

b. 10 January 1898; Kilgore, TX

d. 13 January 1998. Kilgore, TX

Singer, guitarist, and harmonica player of pre-blues songs and early blues. Lived most of his life in Kilgore, Texas, playing parties and dances. His music was recorded and documented by Alan Govenar.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Govenar, Alan. “John T. Samples: Daddy Double Do Love You.” Living Blues no. 116 (July/August 1994): 54–56.

SAN FRANCISCO

Though the black population of San Francisco was very small up until World War II—less than five hundred in 1852 and still below five thousand in 1940—the city was a regular port of call for touring musicians and supported a thriving black entertainment district. The war saw a large influx of blacks—by 1950 the black population was nearly forty-five thousand—and the creation of ghettos near the shipyards at Hunter’s Point and especially in the Fillmore district, where there were many nightclubs, such as Jack’s Tavern, the Club Alabam, and the New Orleans Swing Club.

The expulsion of the area’s Japanese population opened up housing for black immigrants from the South, and as a consequence created business opportunities to serve their needs. As Maya Angelou says, “As the Japanese disappeared, soundlessly and without protest, the Negroes entered with their loud jukeboxes, their just-released animosities and the relief of escape from Southern bonds. The Japanese area became San Francisco’s Harlem in a matter of months” (p. 204).

But the clubs featured jazz much more than blues, and the blues artists who did appear tended to be the more uptown figures, such as Saunders King and Ivory Joe Hunter. “San Francisco mostly had a lot of dinner clubs. And in a dinner club, you didn’t hardly play the blues. Seemed like the club owners in the Fillmore was trying to get away from the blues. They wanted class” (King, p. 50). The more down-home blues artists could be found in small clubs such as the Can-Do (later Minnie's Can-Do).

Charles Sullivan made the Fillmore Auditorium (which had been the Majestic Dance Hall up until 1942) the prime venue for visiting stars such as Dinah Washington, Ray Charles, James Brown, and Bobby Bland. Records could be bought at Scotty's Radio on Third Street and at Dave Rosenbaum's Rhythm Record Shop on Grove Street and later on Sixth Street, which was also the home of Rhythm Records, the only record company in San Francisco of any significance for the blues at that time.

The growth of San Francisco in the mid-1960s as a hippie mecca led to many blues artists appearing in shows aimed primarily at a white audience, such as those produced by Bill Graham at the Fillmore Auditorium and the Winterland—and these were national rather than regional artists (B. B. King, Muddy Waters, Albert King, etc.). Some liked the area so much that they became permanent residents and part of the local blues scene—examples are Luther Tucker and Francis Clay. Solo artists such as Lightnin' Hopkins and Mississippi Fred McDowell could be found at clubs such as the Matrix. This gave opportunities for local artists to appear as opening acts, including country blues harmonica player J. C. Burris, Johnny Mars (who played harmonica in a more modern style), blues singer and guitarist Mike Henderson, and most significantly Joe Louis Walker, who was active on the San Francisco scene from 1963 until he moved into gospel in 1975.

These developments also inspired the rise of white blues (or blues rock) bands: Janis Joplin, Elvin Bishop, Electric Flag (with Mike Bloomfield), Steve Miller, Mother Earth (with Tracy Nelson), Charlie Musselwhite (who moved to San Francisco after the success of his first album), and others came to prominence at this time. There were still small clubs catering for a predominantly black audience, such as Club Long Island at Hunter's Point and Minnie's Can-Do and Dottie Ivory's Stardust Lounge in the Western Addition; however, the latter suffered a devastating blow in the urban renewal of the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Two names should be singled out for their importance in the development of the San Francisco blues scene. Tom Mazzolini founded the San Francisco Blues Festival in 1973, making it the longest enduring event of its kind. At first he relied largely on local Bay Area artists, but gradually it became a national blues festival (though he has always found space on the bill for some local artists). His radio program on KPFA has also been important in popularizing the blues and in bringing attention to blues artists working in the Bay Area. Mark Naftalin, after working with the Paul Butterfield Blues Band, moved to San Francisco in the late 1960s and has been tirelessly active since then, as bandleader, session musician, producer, radio presenter (of the Blue Monday Party and Blues Power Hour) and organizer of the Marin County Blues Festival.

San Francisco has continued to produce (or to become the home of) a host of white blues artists—a partial list would include Robben Ford, Little Charlie (Baty) and the Nightcats (with Rick Estrin), Ron Thompson, Bobby Murray, Chris Cain, the Dynatoners (originally Charlie Musselwhite's backing band), Rusty Zinn, the Johnny Nocturne Band, Tommy Castro, Steve Freund, Ron Hacker, Mark Hummel and the Blues Survivors, and many more. Clubs include Biscuits and Blues, Lou's Pier 47, and John Lee Hooker's Boom Boom Room, which cater as much for the visitor to the city as to local fans. San Francisco has been home to very few record labels specializing in the blues; Blind Pig Records has been in the business for more than twenty-five years, while Blues Express has had five years of steady progress, but most labels been short-lived and have made little impact.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

- Angelou, Maya. I Know Why the Caged Bird Sings. New York: Random House, 1969.
- Burke, Tony, and Norman Darwin. "They Had Great Entertainers Back Then." Blues & Rhythm no. 79 (May 1993): 4–7.
- Obrecht, Jas. "Saunders King: SK Blues." Living Blues no. 126 (March/April 1996): 46–55.
- The San Francisco Blues Festival website, <http://www.sfblues.com>.

See also Bishop, Elvin; Bloomfield, Michael; Burris, J. C.; Cain, Chris; Castro, Tommy; Charles Ford Band, The; Electric Flag; Ford, Robben; Freund, Steve; Hummel, Mark; Joplin, Janis; Mars, Johnny; Murray, Bobby; Musselwhite, Charlie; Naftalin, Mark; Oakland; Thompson, Ron; Walker, Joe Louis; Zinn, Rusty

SANDERS, WILL ROY "WILROY"

b. 1934; Byhalia, MS

Memphis singer and guitarist. Served in the U.S. Army in 1953–1955. Performed as member of the Binghampton Blues Boys, recording with them a single for the XL label in 1964. Performed with the Fieldstones from 1974 through the 1990s and since then as a featured artist in Memphis.

EDWARD KOMARA

SANDERS, WILL ROY “WILROY”

Bibliography

- Olsson, Bengt. “Wilroy Sanders of the Binghamton Blues Boys.” Blues Unlimited no. 70 (February/March 1970): 13–14.
- Wilmott, Sherman. Will Roy Sanders: The Last Living Bluesman. Memphis: Shangri-La Projects, 1999.

Discography: LSFP (as Willie Sanders)

SANE, DAN

b. 22 September 1896; Hernando, MS
d. ca. 1971; Osceola, AR

Guitarist active in Memphis acoustic guitar blues and jug bands through the 1950s. He made pre-World War II recordings as a member of the Jack Kelly South Memphis Jug Band and as a partner to singer/guitarist Frank Stokes.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: DGR

SANFORD, AMOS “LITTLE”

b. 7 June 1923; Arkansas
d. 29 October 1982; St. Louis, MO

Slide guitarist who learned from Robert Nighthawk and Houston Stackhouse in Helena, Arkansas. In St. Louis, he performed and recorded with harmonica player Doc Terry, Piano Slim, and other local musicians.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- “Little Amos Sanford” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 56 (Spring 1983): 40.

SAR/DERBY

Record label (ca. 1959–1965). Owners: Samuel (Sam) Cooke (b. January 22, 1931, Clarksdale, MS; d. December 11, 1964, Los Angeles, CA), James Woodie (J. W.) Alexander (b. January 21, 1916, Hamilton, MS; d. July 8, 1996, West Hollywood, CA), and Senior Roy (S. R.) Crain (b. June 7, 1911, San Augustine, TX; d. September 13, 1996, Vallejo, CA). Hollywood, California-based. Artists include Linda Carr, L. C. Cooke, R. H. Harris and the Gospel Paraders (“Pass Me Not”), Gus Jenkins, Johnnie Morissette (“Black Night,” “Don’t Throw Your Love on Me So Strong,” “Never [Come Running Back to You],” “Meet Me at the Twisting Place”), Billy Preston, Jackie Ross, Sims Twins (“Soothe Me”), Soul Stirrers (“Stand By Me Father,” “God Is Standing By” featuring Johnnie Taylor), Johnnie Taylor (“A Whole Lotta Woman,” “Run, But You Can’t Hide”), Kyo Turner, and the Valentinos (aka Womack Brothers) (“It’s All Over Now,” featuring Bobby Womack and guitarist Clifton White).

ROBERT EAGLE

Discography: McGrath

- Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. “SAR and Derby Album Discographies.” Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/sar-derby.html> (accessed December 12, 2004).

SATHERLY, ART

b. 19 October 1889, Bristol, England
d. 1986

Arthur Edward Satherly immigrated to the United States in 1913. He began working for Wisconsin Chair in or by 1914 and was transferred to its subsidiary operation Paramount Records, where through 1929 he was shellac formulator, salesman, and talent scout, including of blues talent for the Paramount 12/13000 series. In 1929 he joined the ARC labels, staying on through its 1938 sale to Columbia, scouting country music and younger blues artists Bill Broonzy and Blind Boy Fuller.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Larkin
- Cohen, Norm. “I’m a Record Man: Uncle Satherly Reminiscences.” JEMF Quarterly no. 8 (1972): 18–22.

SAUNDERS, RED

b. Theodore Saunders, 2 March 1912; Memphis, TN
d. 4 March 1981; Chicago, IL

Drummer and show band leader from the early 1930s to the late 1960s. His band backed many great jazz and blues performers while serving as the house band for the Club DeLisa (1937–1945, 1947–1958) and the Roberts Show Lounge (1958–1962), notably for Little Miss Cornshucks, Marion Abernathy, Joe Williams, Gatemouth Moore, and Dinah Washington. The Saunders band first recorded under its own name for Savoy in 1945. His most extensive recording was done for Columbia/OKeh during 1949–1953, under his own name and with such artists as Joe Williams, LaVern Baker, and the Hambone Kids. At United/States, during 1952–1953, he backed sessions for Grant Jones and Edward “Gates” White. During 1953–1956, Saunders did sessions for Parrot/Blue Lake, under his own name and backing Jo Jo Adams, Lou Mac, and St. Louis Jimmy. His band also recorded behind blues shouter Joe Turner in 1946 and 1953.

As the music changed in the 1960s to soul music, the Saunders orchestra was used as the house band in monthly packaged soul shows that appeared at Chicago’s Regal Theater, during 1960–1968. During 1963–1966, he helped lead the integration of the white and black musicians’ unions in Chicago. Saunders continued in the business until his death, working as a booking agent and doing occasional shows and recording sessions. His last session work as a drummer was backing blues legend Edith Wilson in 1973 and 1975 and blues pianist Little Brother Montgomery in 1976, both for Delmark Records.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Larkin

Calloway, Earl. “Red Saunders, a Pivotal Figure In Music.” Chicago Defender 1 (April 1978).

“Red Saunders.” Living Blues no. 50 (Spring 1981): 45–46.

Discography: LSFP

SAVOY BROWN

Led by Kim Simmonds

b. 5 December 1947; Newbridge, South Wales, England

The long-lasting blues-rock band Savoy Brown is and always has been the domain of bandleader Kim Simmonds. In his early teens, Simmonds joined many other aspiring guitarists growing up during the early-1960s English blues boom in listening intently to American R&B and blues records. Simmonds organized the Savoy Brown Blues Band in 1966, teaming with John O’Leary (harmonica), Leo Manning (drums), Bryce Portius (vocals), and Ray Chappell (bass).

This biracial band played in the Chicago blues style, with Simmonds evidencing influences such as Hubert Sumlin, Otis Rush, Freddie King on material from the songbooks of Willie Dixon, Fenton Robinson, and John Lee Hooker. They became a leading blues cover band in clubs and signed with Decca, but soon personnel changes—talented singer Chris Youlden being the most significant addition—and a shortening of the group name to Savoy Brown portended a more rock direction for the band. The first tour to America was in 1969, and several more followed in the next few years, each sizably increasing the popularity of the band stateside with rock audiences. Savoy Brown, however, was running low on creative energy by 1971 and Simmonds brought in new players, as he would again before long.

Simmonds relocated to America in the late 1970s and has kept incarnations of Savoy Brown busy touring and recording to the present day, never compromising his deep feeling for the blues. He lives in New York state and in recent years has recorded convincing acoustic blues solo albums.

FRANK-JOHN HADLEY

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG

Kim Simmonds. Blues Like Midnight (2000, Blue Wave).

Savoy Brown. Blue Matter (1969, Decca/Polygram); Raw Sienna (1970, Decca/Polygram); Street Corner Talking (1971, Decca/Polygram); Strange Dreams (2003, Blind Pig 5082).

SAVOY/NATIONAL/REGENT/ACORN

Founded in 1942 in Newark, New Jersey, by electronics expert and radio parts retailer Herman Lubinsky—with the patronage of veteran record man Eli Oberstein—Savoy Records was formed as a jazz label and was named after “The Home of Happy Feet,” the Savoy Ballroom.

Now justly famous for the innovative and invaluable mainstream jazz and bebop recordings conducted by A&R man Teddy Reig between 1945 and 1951, Savoy Records, and often Reig himself, was also responsible for many blues and R&B sessions by successful artists such as Billy Wright, Hal Singer, Brownie McGhee, H-Bomb Ferguson, Mickey Baker, Paul Williams, and the earliest recordings of Redd Foxx. In 1948, at the height of its power, Savoy Records began purchasing other label catalogs and within a short space of time had added Fred Mendelsohn's Regent Records (John Lee Hooker, Tommy Brown, etc.), and Al B. Green's National Records (Gatemouth Moore, the Ravens, Joe Turner, etc.).

The same year, Savoy opened a West Coast office in Los Angeles under the direction of Ralph Bass, who was responsible for successful recordings by Big Jay McNeely and Johnny Otis. A short-lived subsidiary, Acorn Records, was launched in 1950 and issued records by Tommy Brown and Carolina Slim. The end of the 1950s also saw the end of jazz and blues recording at Savoy, but the company prospered through the 1960s and into the 1970s with its popular gospel issues. After Lubinsky died in March 1974, the label was purchased by Arista, which implemented a sterling reissue program of the entire catalog.

DAVID PENNY

Bibliography

Ruppli, Michel, and Bob Porter. The Savoy Labels. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1980.

Discography: McGrath

The Shouters: Roots of Rock 'n' Roll #9 (1980, Savoy Jazz LP SJL 2244).

Southern Blues: Roots of Rock 'n' Roll #11 (1981, Savoy Jazz LP SJL 2255)

SAXOPHONE

History

The saxophone was patented in 1846 by Belgian-born musician/inventor Adolphe Sax. Trained in flute and clarinet at the Brussels Conservatory, he moved to Paris at age twenty eight in 1842. He first exhibited his new instrument, which he called the Saxophone, two years later, at the French Exposition in Paris—winning a silver medal.

The new woodwind featured a metal body with a conical bore and a single-reed mouthpiece with keys and fingerings similar to those of the clarinet. The saxophone was first used by French military bands. By the late 1800s it had started to become recognized by classical composers, who liked the sonorities, falling somewhere between the clarinet and the oboe. The saxophone family consists of seven members, the most common being the B-flat soprano, E-flat alto,

B-flat tenor, and E-flat baritone. They are pitched in different keys to enable the saxophonist to play all the saxophones with the same fingerings.

The saxophone was first introduced to the American audience around the turn of the century by John Philip Sousa, who began including the instrument in his compositions. By 1917 the tenor and soprano saxophones were starting to be used in larger, more orchestrated bands (on Mississippi riverboats, in vaudeville shows). In vaudeville, the saxophone was commonly used as a “comic” instrument, utilizing slap-tonguing, whinnying/laughing sounds. By 1920, the saxophone was slowly being incorporated into jazz bands, often replacing the clarinet. Arrangers loved the melodic and harmonic possibilities of the new reed instrument. Commercial dance bands began using a quartet of saxophones—a soprano, two altos, and a tenor—to counterbalance the brass.

By the 1930s, the sax section was an established part of every big band. By the 1940s, it was fairly common to have a five-piece sax section—two altos, two tenors, and a baritone.

The Emergence of the Saxophone in Blues

In the early 1900s, as the boll weevil destroyed cotton fields, wiping out the southern economy, blacks migrated from the Delta to urban cities in the South. Rural blues musicians and their style of blues met with African American styles of music already being played in the southern cities, combining elements of string or jug bands and military bands, creating a new type of ensemble—the commercial dance band.

This new musical hybrid ensemble contained a three-piece rhythm section consisting of string bass, guitar or banjo, and drums and wind instruments—coronet, trombone, clarinet, and/or saxophone. The sound of blues was transformed from solo instruments to larger ensembles. The field hollers were replaced by horns, documenting the new city life of migrant black workers. At that time, jazz was a loose, highly syncopated rhythmic music, largely unheard of outside New Orleans and a few other southern cities. A typical group featured trumpet, clarinet, banjo or guitar, string bass or tuba, and occasionally drums or piano. By 1923, Crescent City musician Sidney Bechet had taken up the soprano saxophone, preferring it to the clarinet. One of the first to play improvised solos on the saxophone, Bechet's playing was self-assured and virtuosic.

In the 1920s, touring black vaudeville performers such as Mamie Smith and Ma Rainey brought blues to a new audience outside the rural South. The sax was introduced to blues through the recordings of these women. The instrumentation on these records was influenced by the location of the sessions—primarily the urban areas of Chicago and New York. The musicians on these sessions often were accomplished black jazz musicians. This cross-pollination of rural blues interpreted by urban jazz musicians led to the standardization of what we know now as the twelve-bar blues form.

During the 1930s, the popularity of the saxophone continued to grow. Dance bands grew increasingly larger, becoming “big bands,” each incorporating twelve to fifteen members and featuring a sax section of four or five players. Big bands were often propelled by their featured sax soloist(s). Fletcher Henderson had the top band of the late 1920s, featuring the first star of the saxophone, Coleman Hawkins. Arguably one of the most influential sax players ever, Coleman Hawkins took improvised solos to a whole new level of inventiveness and technique. (At the 1963 Newport Jazz Festival, Jon Hendricks introduced Hawkins as “the man for whom Adolphe Sax invented the saxophone.”) Lester Young was the star of Count Basie’s band. The audience would come to hear his legendary sax “battles” with his section mate Herschel Evans. One of the most identifiable characteristics of Duke Ellington’s music was the unique blend of the sax section as well as featured soloists Johnny Hodges (alto), Ben Webster (tenor), and Harry Carney (baritone).

In the 1940s, wartime economics with the draft and gas rationing and the musicians’ union strike against record companies changed the face of the music scene. Big bands were forced to curtail touring and were faced with a shortage of musicians. The new R&B dance bands—two or three saxes and a trumpet and/or trombone fronted the rhythm section—served as a smaller, more economical version of the big bands. The music was blues-based with riffing horns, but with a heavier, more danceable beat.

During this era, the role of the saxophone in blues was at its most prominent. Many of the most popular jump-blues/R&B bands were led by saxophonists. Singer/alto saxophonist Louis Jordan was a major influence on small combo R&B in the 1940s. One of the first black artists to cross over in popularity, Jordan spawned a whole new genre, leading the music farther from jazz and toward rhythm and blues and ultimately rock ’n’ roll. Jordan’s songs were laced with humor and street-corner jive. From 1943 to 1951, Louis Jordan had fifty-seven charted R&B hits, including “Caledonia,” “Choo Choo Ch’ Boogie,” and “Ain’t Nobody Here but Us Chickens.” At the same time, Lionel Hampton Orchestra saxophonist—flamboyant soloist Illinois Jacquet’s style of playing, with his stratospheric shrieks, low honking, and burning on wild, up-tempo tunes, helped define the new genre of R&B. Jacquet’s solo on the song “Flying Home” propelled him to stardom and became a standard for the instrument. Other sax-playing blues/R&B bandleaders during this era include Red Prysock, Joe Houston, and Big Jay McNeely.

Mid-Century to Present Day

By the 1950s, a whole new style of blues was thriving on the West Coast. While Mississippi and Alabama migrants moved to Chicago and brought the rural Delta blues with them, Texas and Louisiana musicians, with their more sophisticated urban blues, migrated to California. The West Coast style featured a more theatrical presentation, larger ensembles with horn sections, and a hint of jazz influence in the chord progressions. T-Bone Walker, Johnny Otis, and Lowell Fulson were chief purveyors of this newest coast style of blues. From the mid-1950s to the early 1960s, funky blues-based jazz/organ combos featuring the saxophone enjoyed widespread popularity. Organist Bill Doggett’s “Honky Tonk” spent twenty-two weeks on Billboard’s top forty chart in 1956. Other top forty hits in this genre include Jimmy Smith’s “Walk on the Wild Side” and Jimmy McGriff’s “I’ve Got a Woman.”

As the popularity of the guitar grew, the dominance of the saxophone in blues waned, with it generally taking on more of a support role. Since the 1960s, the saxophone’s role in blues has been split largely between two functions—horn section accompaniment (as in B. B. King’s band, Little Milton, Bobby “Blue” Bland, Roomful of Blues) and solo saxophone (where the sax fills the same role as the harp player, running counterpoint and counterrhythms to the guitar player and filling in between the vocals, such as done by Eddie Shaw in Howlin’ Wolf’s band and by A. C. Reed with Albert Collins and Son Seals.

DENNIS TAYLOR

Bibliography

- Barlow, William. Looking Up at Down: The Emergence of Blues Culture. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1989.
- Davis, Francis. The History of the Blues: The Roots, the Music, the People from Charley Patton to Robert Cray. New York: Hyperion, 1995.
- Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Viking Press, 1981.
- Slonimsky, Nicolas. In Webster’s New World Dictionary of Music, edited by Richard Kassel. Shirmer, 1984.
- Taylor, Dennis. Blues Saxophone: An In-Depth Look at the Styles of the Masters. Milwaukee, WI: Hal Leonard, 2001.

SAYDAK, KEN

SAYDAK, KEN

b. 18 August 1951; Chicago, IL

Chicago-based pianist who got his start in the 1970s as sideman to Chicago blues artists such as Sam Lay, John Littlejohn, and Mighty Joe Young before joining Lonnie Brooks. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, Saydak fronted the blues-rock-jazz fusion band Big Shoulders. Since then, he has flourished as an in-demand session player and has played under his own name.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (John Bush)

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Big Shoulders (1990, Rounder 9023).

Foolish Man (1999, Delmark 725).

Love Without Trust (2001, Delmark 751).

SAYLES, CHARLIE

b. 4 January 1948; Woburn, MA

Harmonica player. He learned the instrument while he was a soldier in the Vietnam war, and after discharge he discovered the recordings of Sonny Boy Williamson II. He developed a rich sound and a variety of melodic hooks and phrase fills while playing in streets and subway stations. He was initially discovered by Ralph Rinzler, then an organizer of the Smithsonian Festival of American Folklife. His recent attention has come after the release of his JSP label efforts since 1990.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Harris; Larkin

Vorel, Bob. "Charlie Sayles: A Profile." Blues Revue Quarterly no. 11 (Winter 1993/1994): 39–43.

Discography: AMG

SAYLES, JOHNNY

b. 9 February 1937; Winnsboro, TX

d. 17 August 1993; Chicago, IL

Chicago R&B singer whose intense screaming style produced some of the hardest of hard soul and gospel-styled blues in the 1960s and 1970s. He grew up in Texas but in 1955 moved to St. Louis, where he sang with such St. Louis bands as Eugene Neal and Ike Turner. He returned to Texas in 1960 but left in 1963, when the Five Duttones (of "Shake a Tail Feather" fame) came through the area and he joined their revue to perform as "Little Johnny." Blues singer Little Johnny Taylor was not touring off his big hit, "Part Time Love," and Sayles along with Johnnie Taylor toured the South as Little Johnny Taylor imitators.

When the Five Duttones Revue returned to Chicago, Sayles was signed to their record company, One-derful, to record on the label's Mar-V-lus subsidiary. His recordings for the company represented some of the most uncompromisingly raw soul treatments ever performed on record. Subsequent label associations, with Chess, Brunswick, never matched those stellar recordings. Sayles's final recordings were a blues single, "Food Stamps" (1983), for Willie Henderson's Now Sound label and serving as guest vocalist on a Roy Buchanan LP on Alligator (1985). He continued to work in local blues clubs until his death.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Larkin

Pruter, Robert. "The Johnny Sayles Story." Juke Blues no. 10 (Autumn 1987): 8–11.

SCALES

A scale (from Latin scala, "ladder") is a succession of tones, normally a whole step or half step apart, arranged in ascending or descending order. A typical scalar structure consists of a defined collection of pitches arranged in order from the lowest to the highest note or the highest to the lowest note, like rungs of a ladder, hence the ladder etymology and analogy of the word. The pitches of any music in which pitch is definable can be reduced to a scale. When a pitch collection is presented in scalar form a succession of interval distances or steps becomes perceptible. This perception informs and guides the functional application of scalar material in composition and improvisation.

In virtually all music, particularly Western tonal music, scales are merely a reflection of compositional and improvisational practices and are subordinate to principles of melodic progression and the relationship of one tone to another. In blues music the term "scale" becomes a qualitative, analytical descriptor used as a means of assessing and categorizing blues melodies.

For the initiated listener blues melody and particularly blues improvisation are immediately recognized by their specific scalar content and note-to-chord relationship. For several decades musicologists have ascribed properties and technical elements such as pentatonic scales, blue notes, and uncommon modes to define these characteristics and explain part of the blues' musical import and aesthetic quality. Blues music does indeed use scales and melodic patterns that are distinctive and evocative and not found in most Western forms.

The pentatonic scale is a primary resource of blues. This melodic formula derives its name from the joining of penta (Greek for "five") and tonic ("tones") and is a five-note series as distinguished from diatonic (seven-note) and chromatic (twelve-note) scales. In the ancient cultures of Africa, China, Polynesia, and various Native American tribes as well as Scots and Celts, pentatonic scales were common. It is thought that the pentatonic scales, which are indigenous to blues music, are of African ancestry.

Pentatonic scales as used in blues music are generally of two types: minor pentatonic and major pentatonic. These scales are distinct from normal diatonic and chromatic scales in that they contain only major second and minor third interval distances and no half-step interval distances.

The minor pentatonic scale (in A; see Example 1) is spelled A–C–D–E–G with an interval structure of tonic (A), minor third (C), perfect fourth (D), perfect fifth (E), and minor seventh (G). The minor third and minor seventh tones, part of the family of blue notes, substantially distinguish this scale from major blues scales.

Example 1, Minor Pentatonic Scale

The major pentatonic scale (in A; see Example 2) is spelled A–B–C#–E–F# with an interval structure of tonic (A), major second (B), major third (C#), perfect fifth (E), and major sixth (F#). It closely resembles a partial major scale and significantly differs from minor blues scales in its incorporation of the major second and major third steps.

Subjective perceptions about the nature of minor and major pentatonic scale sounds in blues are common and unavoidable and are part of the listener's aesthetic experience. Albert King's acerbic blues improvisation generally exploits the minor pentatonic scale while Freddy King's sweeter melody of "Hide Away" connotes the application of the major pentatonic scale.

Example 2, Major Pentatonic Scale

The blues scale is similar in structure to the minor pentatonic scale. It contains a six-note pattern that in essence adds the raised fourth or flatted fifth to the minor pentatonic formula. The blues scale (in A) is spelled A–C–D–D# or Eb–E–G with an interval structure of tonic (A), minor third (C), perfect fourth (D), augmented fourth (D#) or diminished fifth (Eb), perfect fifth (E), and minor seventh (G). The inclusion of the D# or Eb (enharmonic) tones creates a chromatic series in the scale: D–D#–E or E–Eb–D. This colorful intervallic element is an attribute unique to the blues scale, among all others in common usage in the blues, and is often exploited for its piquant effect in the creation of blues melodies that exploit the tritone interval.

The blues scale is accorded its name because it contains the most active blue note, the flatted fifth. In actual blues performance the flatted fifth tone in a melody is frequently the result of a pitch bend or slur rising from the fourth step or dropping from the fifth step of the minor pentatonic scale or other scale of the moment. Vocalists and wind players "fall off" notes in performance to achieve the flatted effect, slide guitarists use a bottleneck or metal tube on the strings to slur to and from a tone in a glissando motion, and pianists often strike two adjacent piano keys simultaneously to produce a slurred "crushed note" impression. Since the days of Charlie Christian and T-Bone Walker, modern electric blues guitarists literally bend and release strings to raise and lower their pitch in order to emulate vocal inflections and phrasing.

Example 3, Major Diatonic Scale

Diatonic scales are also heard prominently in blues music. They are based on the major scale (see Example 3), also called the Ionian mode, which yields the seven-tone "do–re–mi–fa–so–la–ti" pattern of European music. In the blues repertory most diatonic melodies are derived from this source as a parental form but are generally modal in nature—that is, actually based on sounds in but not of the strict major scale. Rather they are based on modes formed by building seven-note scales on steps other than the tonic of a major scale. If a major scale is played from C to C on the white keys of the piano the related modes are generated by starting the scale on D, E, F, G, A, etc. and continuing for an octave, for example, playing D to D in the C major scale. Modal scales are endemic to medieval sacred music and have been accordingly labeled “Church modes” or “Ecclesiastical modes” in music scholarship. Two particular church modes are used with great frequency and regularity in blues melody and improvisation: the Mixolydian mode and the Dorian mode.

The Mixolydian mode is built from the fifth step of a major scale. In a diatonic context, the only scale step capable of generating a dominant seventh chord, a requisite component of blues, is the fifth step of the major scale. In the tonal center of A, if the blues piece or improvisation in question is to be played in A, the A7 dominant or Mixolydian sound is preferred and idiomatically correct.

The Mixolydian mode (in A) is spelled A–B–C#–D–E–F#–G with an interval structure of tonic (A), major second (B), major third (C#), perfect fourth (D), perfect fifth (E), major sixth (F#), and minor seventh (G). The melodic content of this mode is based on the key of D major: A is its fifth degree of the scale. Such transpositions are critical in the blues. Consider a harmonica player’s choice of a specific correctly pitched instrument for a blues song. Blues harmonica players select a “harp” based on the dominant tonal center of the parent key to produce an appropriate blues melody. Similarly, a guitarist or keyboardist in the blues hears a dominant sound when playing on the tonic I chord and responds with a diatonic mode containing the minor seventh tone (G) rather than the major seventh (G#) of an A major scale.

The Dorian mode is built from the second step of a major scale. This secondary mode (secondary to the Mixolydian mode) produces a scale used by numerous blues artists as a substitution or alternate option, essentially minorizing the Mixolydian mode. Moreover, the Dorian mode is typically the diatonic scale of choice in the minor blues context.

The Dorian mode (in A) is spelled A–B–C–D–E–F#–G with an interval structure of tonic (A), major second (B), minor third (C), perfect fourth (D), perfect fifth (E), major sixth (F#), and minor seventh (G). The important blue notes of minor third and minor seventh are contained in this scale.

The Dorian mode as a blues component can be perceived in a number of ways by performers. It is often employed as a substitution or in conjunction with a Mixolydian mode sharing the same tonic. In an A blues, both the Dorian mode and Mixolydian mode have been used interchangeably, often within the same phrase. The improviser can view the relationship through at least two distinct prisms: the Mixolydian mode with a substituted minor third or a minor pentatonic scale with an added major second and major sixth.

In the swing era the use of the major sixth tone in conjunction with the minor third of a minor mode was part of the idiomatic language and affected numerous blues compositions of the period. The theme melody of “Till Tom Special,” written by Benny Goodman and Lionel Hampton, is a case in point. Blues musicians with a tendency to favor that aspect of the lexicon have included, purposefully or inadvertently, constituents of the Dorian mode in their improvisations and themes. Moreover, the minor-tinged sound generated by the Dorian mode is favored by many modern blues-rock and postmodern blues players who cross over into rock ‘n’ roll, jazz, and popular musical forms.

An alternate pentatonic scale based on the Dorian mode is sometimes exploited in blues composition and improvisation for its unique evocative quality and specific dissonance. In A, this scale is spelled A–C–D–E–F# with an interval structure of tonic (A), minor third (C), perfect fourth (D), perfect fifth (E), and major sixth (F#). In essence, this scale replaces the minor seventh tone (G) of the conventional minor pentatonic with a sixth tone, generating a dissonant tritone interval from C to F# and in turn producing the possibility of a diminished triad (F#–A–C) within the pentatonic structure.

This particular alternate pentatonic scale has been employed by Texas blues guitarist Albert Collins as well as Larry Carlton, Carlos Santana, and Robben Ford, who are more eclectic guitarists rooted in the blues. A commonly employed mannerism found in the improvisations of these musicians, and in their composed melodies, when applying this alternate pentatonic scale is the half-step pitch bend into the seventh step of the scale from the sixth degree.

Scale combining is a tactic and strategy pursued in, but not confined to, blues composition and improvisation. In blues the term delineates certain stylistic constructs and serves to define standard melodic practices employed intuitively by musicians when speaking the music’s idiomatic language. In the course of an improvised blues solo a performer such as B. B. King or Stevie Ray Vaughan may choose to freely mix and merge the minor and major characteristics of two or more particular scale forms in a hybrid combined structure. King’s early classic “Please Love Me” (1953) exploits improvised melodies based on the Mixolydian mode, the minor pentatonic scale, and the blues scale. In other King solos such as “You Done Lost Your Good Thing Now” (1960) he will choose to combine the major pentatonic scale with the minor pentatonic scale and the blues scale, each element selected as a purposeful melodic allusion or melodic gesture indicating the blues language in action. Stevie Ray Vaughan's solo in "Tight-rope" (1989) similarly employs a hybrid melodic arrangement freely combining the standard minor pentatonic scale and major pentatonic scales. Related scale combining procedures are found in blues offshoots such as the R&B of Chuck Berry, the rock 'n' roll of Elvis Presley, and the blues-rock of Eric Clapton and Jimi Hendrix as well blues-influenced heavy metal and alternative rock.

Another common combination is the seven-note blues scale formed by merging elements of standard minor and major pentatonic scales with the specific chromatic series of the blues scale. In A this formation is spelled A–C–C#–D–D# or Eb–E–G with an interval structure of tonic (A), minor third (C), major third (C#), perfect fourth (D), augmented fourth (D#) or diminished fifth (Eb), perfect fifth (E), and minor seventh (G). This scale can also be assessed as a normal blues scale with an added major third step. In either perception the rising form with D# leading to E is endemic to countless blues themes and improvisations. Moreover, the chromatic series filling in the major third distance from C to E is a prized convention of the blues language and occurs often in the soul jazz and hard bop subgenera of music. The extracted melody (in A) A–C–C#–D–D#–E is frequently exploited as a repeated figure (riff) in big band shout choruses, in saxophone, piano, and Hammond organ solos, and in the improvised solos of jazz-blues guitarists such as George Benson.

WOLF MARSHALL

SCALES, ALONZO "LONNIE"

d. 1975; New York City, NY

Singer and guitarist in East Coast acoustic style. Recorded with Big Chief Ellis in 1949 and with Sonny Terry and Brownie McGhee in 1955. He was long elusive to researchers. His death has also been reported as occurring in 1976.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Lowry, Pete. "Alonzo Scales" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 23 (September/October 1975): 5.

Discography: LSFP

SCEPTER/WAND

Florence Greenberg founded Scepter Records in New York in 1959 to compete in the R&B market with Atlantic Records. With their biggest-selling artists (the Shirelles, Dionne Warwick, and B. J. Thomas), the label primarily relied on the songwriting and producing teams of Gerry Goffin/Carole King and Burt Bacharach/Hal David to create a "sophisticated soul" sound with crossover pop appeal. In 1961, Greenberg launched a subsidiary label, Wand, producing a grittier sound with soul acts Chuck Jackson and the Isley Brothers.

Scepter did release a few traditional blues albums, including Big Maybelle's The Soul of Big Maybelle in 1964 (Scepter 522) and two by Memphis Slim in 1966, Self Portrait (535) and Blues Portrait (536). In 1970, Wand released three significant blues albums: John Lee Hooker's On the Waterfront (Wand 689), recorded in England with a British band; the Animals' In the Beginning (690), a live recording from December 1963 with Sonny Boy Williamson II joining in; and Canned Heat's Live at the Topanga Corral (693). In 1975, both labels ceased production.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

Gillett, Charlie. The Sound of the City: The Rise of Rock 'n' Roll. New York: Dell, 1972.
Southall, Brian. The A–Z of Record Labels. London: Sanctuary, 2003.

Discography: McGrath

Callahan, Mike, and David Edwards. "The Scepter/Wand Story." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/scepter/scepterstory.html> (accessed December 20, 2004).

SCOTT, BUDDY

b. Kenneth Scott, 9 January 1935; Jackson, MS
d. 5 February 1994; Chicago, IL

Guitarist/bassist/vocalist, born Kenneth Scott. He played and recorded with numerous Chicago artists (including brother Howard and other members of the extended Scott musical family) and led his own band, the Rib Tips, for decades. In later years, he held down a weekend slot at Lee's Unleaded Blues on South Chicago Avenue; he was a beloved mentor to generations of South Side musicians.

DAVID WHITEIS

SCOTT, BUDDY

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)
Sharp, Steven. "The Nicest Man in Show Business." Living Blues no. 114 (1994), 51–57.

Discography: AMG

SCOTT, CLIFFORD

b. 21 June 1928; San Antonio, TX
d. 19 April 1993; San Antonio, TX

Tenor saxophone and R&B stylist, most famous for "Honky Tonk Part 2," which he recorded with organist Bill Doggett in 1956. He got his start with Lionel Hampton from 1948 to 1950 and worked with Roy Brown, Jay McShann, and Amos Milburn before rejoining Hampton in 1953. In 1954 he moved to New York, working as a freelancer. He joined with Bill Doggett 1956–1961. He recorded several albums as a leader for King and Pacific Jazz. In 1962 he moved to Los Angeles. He toured with Ray Charles 1966–1973 and returned to San Antonio in 1976.

DENNIS TAYLOR

Bibliography

Penny, Dave. "Clifford Scott." Blues & Rhythm no. 80 (July 1993): 20.

Discography: Lord

SCOTT, ECRETIA JACOBS "E. C."

b. Late 1950s; Oakland, CA

Soulful and sophisticated Bay Area vocalist and songwriter. She had been working in music for some years before her first single in 1988; after that, between 1995 and 2000 she recorded three albums for Blind Pig and in 2003 another for her own Black Bud label.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

"Let's Make It Real." E. C. Scott website, <http://www.ecscott.com>.
Whiteis, David. "E. C. Scott: 'I've Been an Outspoken Woman for a Long Time!'" Living Blues no. 171 (January/February 2004): 26–33.

Discography: AMG

SCOTT, ESTHER MAE "MOTHER"

b. 1893; Polk Plantation, Bovina, MS
d. 16 October 1979; Washington, DC

Singer, composer of blues and spirituals, and acoustic guitarist. From the 1910s through the 1920s, she traveled as a singer and dancer in black entertainment troupes, working with Ma Rainey, Bessie Smith, and Leadbelly. For some years she worked as a baby nurse. In the 1940s she moved to Washington, D.C., where she resumed her singing, initially in church and later in clubs, at civil rights demonstrations, and at folk music festivals.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Goren, David. "Remembering 'Mother' Scott: An Interview." Sing Out! 27, no. 6 (November/December 1979): 13–15.

Discography

Mama Ain't Nobody's Fool (1972, Bomp LP1).

SCOTT, JAMES, JR.

b. 21 January 1913; Lexington, MS
d. 18 July 1983; Chicago, IL

James Scott's early years were spent playing blues in Mississippi, learning slide guitar from Robert Night-hawk and performing with Boyd Gilmore and Snooky Pryor. He moved to Chicago in the mid-1950s, playing in West Side clubs. Often he was sideman to Eddie Taylor, Carey Bell, and Willie Williams, in addition to leading his own groups.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

O'Neal, Jim. "James Scott, Jr." [obituary]. Living Blues no. 58 (Winter 1983/1984): 42–43.

SCOTT, JOE

b. Joseph Wade Scott, 2 December 1924; Texarkana, AR
d. 6 March 1979; Culver City, CA

Trumpet, composer, arranger. Joe Scott settled in Houston, Texas, in the mid-1950s as arranger and bandleader for Duke/Peacock Records, crafting hits for Johnny Ace, Bobby "Blue" Bland, and Little Junior Parker and their label-mates, often backing them on tour.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

“Joe Scott” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 43 (Summer 1979): 48.

Discography

Johnny Ace. “Pledging My Love” (Duke).
Bobby “Blue” Bland. “Farther Up the Road” (Duke); “I Pity the Fool” (Duke); “Two Steps from the Blues” (Duke).
Little Junior Parker. “Next Time You See Me” (Duke).

SCOTT, “LITTLE” JIMMY

b. James Victor Scott, 17 July 1925; Cleveland, OH

Vocals, composer. Little Jimmy Scott developed his unique high-pitched vocal approach as a young man in the late 1940s as a result of a condition named Kallman’s Syndrome. His early singing was with jazz and urban rhythm and blues bands. From 1975 through 1985 he worked outside music, but eventually he made a welcome and long-lasting comeback to jazz and urban blues audiences. Among those he has sung with during his long career are Charlie Parker, Lionel Hampton, Charles Mingus, Ruth Brown, Big Maybelle, and Wes Montgomery.

JOHN SINCLAIR

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Discography: Lord

SCOTT, MARYLIN

Aka Mary DeLoatch; no birth/death data available. Singer, possibly guitarist, of Piedmont-style blues and Sister Rosetta Tharpe–style gospel. All that is known of her are her recordings on Lance, Regent, and Arctic made between 1945 and the early 1960s. One Regent session in 1950 was with the Johnny Otis Orchestra in New York City.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Templeton, Ray. “Marylin Scott and Mary DeLoatch: Two Faces of Black Music.” Blues & Rhythm no. 18 (April 1986): 26–28.

Discography: LSPF

SCOTT, SONNY

Flourished 1930s

Guitarist from Alabama who recorded with pianist/guitarist Walter Roland for the ARC labels in 1933. According to friend Gress Barnett of Quitman, Mississippi, Scott’s last name was Scarborough, and he was known as “Sonny” or “Babe.” Barnett also related that Scott had died just before World War II.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Wardlow, Gayle Dean. “Six Who Made Recorded History.” 78 Quarterly no. 5 (1990): 93–96.

Discography: DGR

SCOTT-ADAMS, PEGGY

b. Peggy Stoutmeyer, 25 June 1948; Opp, AL

Rhythm and blues and soul singer since 1966. From 1968 through 1972 she was in a popular duet with JoJo Benson, including the hit “Lover’s Holiday” (1968). By the mid-1980s she was assisting at her husband’s funeral home in Compton, California. New songs and recordings since 1985 were made possible through songwriter/producer Jimmy Lewis, including the 1996 hit “Bill,” in which the singer loses her man to another man.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
Carpenter, Bil. “Peggy Scott-Adams: To Thine Own Self Be True.” Living Blues no. 136 (November/December 1997): 28–33.

SCRUGGS, IRENE

b. 7 December 1901; Mississippi

Singer in vaudeville and on the TOBA circuit. She first came to notice in St. Louis, staying there in the 1920s while recording for OKeh, Vocalion, Victor, Paramount, and Gennett. Her daughter was dancer Leazar “Baby” Scruggs. In the mid-1950s, she moved to Paris, France, then to West Germany. Reports of her death in West Germany in the mid-1970s are unconfirmed.

SCRUGGS, IRENE

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne); Harris

Discography: DGR

SD (STEINER DAVIS)

Chicago-based record label issued by John Steiner and Hugh Davis in 1944–1947. Its reissue series (100–110) included blues items derived from Paramount by Cow Cow Davenport, Roosevelt Sykes, and Skip James, the latter amongst the earliest country blues reissues. The label's few original recordings are of jazz.

HOWARD RYE

Discography

Raichelson, Dick. "The Steiner-Davis Label Discography." IAJRC Journal 33, no. 4 (Fall 2000): 33.

SEALS, SON

b. Frank Seals, 13 August 1942; Osceola, AR
d. 20 December 2004; Richton Park, IL

Guitarist, singer. Despite his Arkansas birth, Seals became the personification of the modern Chicago guitar approach. His intense blues stylings, powered by explosive guitar solos and throat-ripping vocals, recaptured and updated the aggressive edge and urban energy that had created the original Windy City scene.

Seals was a well-seasoned blues veteran by the time he decided to take on the Chicago scene. His father owned a blues bar in Osceola, Arkansas, where Robert Nighthawk and Sonny Boy Williamson were frequent performers. It was natural for the young Seals to want to get involved in the music, and he first did so behind a drum kit, playing drums with Earl Hooker and Albert King while getting his first taste of touring. He also assimilated elements of their guitar styles, as well learning a few Elmore James licks from Nighthawk's performances.

Seals relocated to Chicago in 1971, attracting local attention when he took over Hound Dog Taylor's weekend gig at the Expressway Lounge but remaining under the national blues radar screen. His characteristically forceful self-titled 1973 debut for Alligator Records was therefore a revelation to fans outside the Windy City. It revealed a musically mature bluesman who effortlessly combined raw energy and advanced musicianship to create a deeply rooted but very contemporary interpretation of the blues.

Seals won the 1985 W. C. Handy Award for best contemporary album with Bad Axe and won again in 2001, the second time for best traditional album with Lettin' Go. But it was his electrifying live act, as exciting as any in the genre, that made, and maintained, his reputation.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Moon, D. T. "Son Seals: Intensity Is the Key." Living Blues no. 153 (September/October 2000): 14–25.

Discography: AMG

SEARS, "BIG" AL

b. Albert Omega Sears, 21 February 1910; Macomb, IL
d. 23 March 1990; St. Albans, NY

Tenor saxophonist. Exciting soloist, hard-blowing swing-based tenor, romping blues R&B. He first gained attention in 1928, replacing Johnny Hodges in Chick Webb's band. He played with Duke Ellington from 1944 to 1949 and was on several notable Ellington recordings, including "I Ain't Got Nothing But the Blues" and 1945's "It Don't Mean a Thing." He worked in Johnny Hodges's band during 1951–1952 and was featured soloist on the hit "Castle Rock" (released under Hodges's name, thus depriving Sears of deserved recognition). In the 1950s, he became a part of the New York City studio scene and a member of Alan Freed's Rock 'n' Roll Orchestra. He appears in the movie Rock, Rock, Rock.

DENNIS TAYLOR

Bibliography

Nelson, David. "Obituaries." Living Blues no. 94 (November/December 1990): 56.

SEASE, MARVIN

b. 16 February 1946; Blackville, SC

Singer, songwriter. Sease, well known on the so-called "chitlin circuit" of southern blues festivals and juke joints for his X-rated songs such as “Candy Licker” and “Hoochie Momma,” has made several recordings from the mid-1980s to the present.

JUSTIN WERT

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey)
O’Neal, Jim. “Marvin Sease.” Living Blues no. 134 (July/August 1997): 18–27.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Marvin Sease (1986, London 830794).
Hoochie Momma (1999, Jive 41674).

SEATTLE

(See Washington [state])

SEE THAT MY GRAVE IS KEPT CLEAN

This title is nowadays so closely associated with Blind Lemon Jefferson that the song’s opening stanza is engraved on the headstone that was erected for him in the Wortham Black Cemetery in Texas in 1997.

Jefferson recorded two versions of this song for Paramount, one under the religious pseudonym of Deacon L. J. Bates. The first version was cut ca. October 1927 and issued the following January with the title “See That My Grave’s Kept Clean,” b/w the spiritual “He Arose from the Dead” (Pm 12585). Initially, Jefferson’s recording was clearly aimed at the prospective sacred buyer, but, possibly due to its apparent secular content, it was soon withdrawn from the market. Because of its immediate commercial success, however, “See That My Grave’s Kept Clean” was remade ca. February 1928 and released in April under Jefferson’s real name, coupled with “Lectric Chair Blues” (Pm 12608), a song on the theme of the singer’s death by electrocution.

Nonetheless, the origin of “See That My Grave’s Kept Clean” is much older. Well before Jefferson immortalized it, in 1876 Gus Williams had composed a popular song bearing a similar title, “See That My Grave Is Kept Green,” hillbilly versions of which were recorded by Bela Lam and His Greene County Singers (1927) and by the Carter Family (1933). One year before Jefferson first recorded “See That My Grave’s Kept Clean,” a printed text from black tradition had been published by Odum and Johnson (p. 129) with the title “Dig My Grave wid a Silver Spade.” The latter is a collection of floating verses and has only one verse in common with Jefferson’s song. As maintained by Dan Patterson and reported by John Cowley (p. 4), it is also possible that “Jefferson’s original is an amalgamation of several earlier songs, among them ‘Old Blue’ (or ‘Old Veen’), ‘Stormalong’ (a nineteenth century sea shanty), and a number of spirituals.”

In his two versions, “Jefferson arranges the words in an AAAB fashion, using a structure of sixteen bars that is often extended by a few notes on the guitar at the ends of lines. The melody ... ranges over an octave in a pentatonic scale, on rare occasions moving a step above or below the high or low tonic Jefferson’s guitar is played in the E position of standard tuning, mostly in the bass and middle register, with his left hand not venturing beyond the fourth fret of the instrument” (Evans, p. 609). Besides confirming a pre-blues origin, this song’s slow and repetitive AAAB verse structure is in sharp contrast with its fast instrumental delivery, especially the first version.

The text of Jefferson’s “See That My Grave Is Kept Clean” describes “the nightmare of a person seeing or dreaming his own death and burial” and contains many references to sight and sound (Monge, p. 56). As often occurs in Jefferson’s lyrics, the logical and temporal sequence of the stanzas are overturned.

Subsequent black renderings of Jefferson’s influential versions have so far remained virtually unchanged. Also known as “Dig My Grave with a Silver Spade,” “Two White Horses (in a Line),” and “One Kind [of] Favor,” “See That My Grave Is Kept Clean” was recorded under one or another of the titles by—among others—Joe Evans and Arthur McClain, aka The Two Poor Boys (1931), Pete Harris, with the title “Blind Lemon’s Song” (1934), Smith Casey (1939), John Lee Hooker (1949, 1961), Lightning’ Hopkins (ca. 1951–1952, 1952, 2 in 1959, 1969), Tom Dutson (1959), Eugene Rhodes (early 1960s), Pete Franklin (1961), the Staple Singers, with the title “A Dying Man’s Plea” (1962), John Lee Granderson (1964), Furry Lewis (1967, 2 in 1968, 1969), Larry Johnson (1970), Robert Pete Williams (1972), Tom Shaw (1972), Robert Lowery (1989), John Cephas and Phil Wiggins (1992), Frank Robinson (1995a, 1995b), and Little Pink Anderson (2000).

White country versions of “See That My Grave Is Kept Clean” were recorded by the Carter Family (1935) and by The Kentuckians (1963) with the title “Sad and Lonesome Day,” by the Arthur Smith Trio with the title “A Lonesome Day Today” (1938), by Bill Monroe & His Blue Grass Boys (1940) with the title “Six White Horses,” and by Koerner, Ray & Glover (1963), Canned Heat (1968a, 1968b, 1998), John Hammond (1983), Ford Blues Band (1990), Christian

SEE THAT MY GRAVE IS KEPT CLEAN

Dozzler (1997), Randall Lee Rainwater (1998), New Legacy Duo (1999), Ben Andrews (2001), and David Evans (2001) with the title “One Kind Favor.” Other versions bearing Jefferson’s original title were cut by Hobart Smith (1959), Bob Dylan (1961, 1967, 1970), John Hammond (1964), Kelly Joe Phelps (1996), and Lou Reed (2003), the latter for the soundtrack of Wim Wenders’s feature film The Soul of a Man.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

- Cowley, John. Two White Horses Standin’ in Line. Flyright-Matchbox SDM 264, 1976.
- Evans, David. “Jefferson, Blind Lemon.” In International Dictionary of Black Composers, edited by Samuel A. Floyd, Jr., Vol. 1, pp. 604–609. Chicago: Fitzroy Dearborn, 1999.
- Meade, Guthrie T., with Dick Spottswood and Douglas S. Meade. Country Music Sources: A Biblio-Discography of Commercially Recorded Traditional Music. Chapel Hill: Southern Folklife Collection, The University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill Libraries in association with the John Edwards Memorial Forum, 2002.
- Monge, Luigi. “The Language of Blind Lemon Jefferson: The Covert Theme of Blindness.” Black Music Research Journal 20, no. 1 (Spring 2000): 35–81.
- Odum, Howard W., and Guy B. Johnson. Negro Workaday Songs. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 1926.

Discography

Jefferson, Blind Lemon. Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Volume 1 (1927) (1991, Document Records DOCD-5018); Complete Recorded Works in Chronological Order, Volume 2 (1928) (1991, Document Records DOCD-5019).

SEELEY, BOB

b. Robert Emmett Seeley, 13 September 1928; Ozone Park, NY

Pianist. Seeley began playing at thirteen. His first inspirations were Meade Lux Lewis/Pinetop Smith and later Pat Flowers, and he took lessons from Lewis. He accompanied singer Sippie Wallace in many appearances in the 1970s and 1980s. Seeley works as a solo pianist around Detroit and internationally. His playing has guts and drive, with a solid left hand bass technique.

JIM GALLERT

Discography

Industrial Strength Boogie Woogie (self issued, CD-101).

SELLERS, BROTHER JOHN

b. 27 May 1924; Clarksdale, MS

d. 27 March 1999; New York City, NY

Chicago blues, folk, and gospel singer of the post-World War II era. Sellers brought a more cosmopolitan approach to his blues, bringing in gospel and folk influences. In the early 1940s, he was mentored by gospel great Mahalia Jackson. He recorded his first blues for the Southern label and the King label during 1945. At Miracle in 1946, he waxed four gospel numbers, including Mahalia’s signature song, “Move On Up a Little Higher,” but the following year he recorded a blues session for RCA-Victor. In late 1948, as Reverend John Sellers, he recorded another gospel session for Miracle. After two Chance blues sessions in 1952 (he was billed as “Johnny” Sellers for these), Sellers moved to New York and became involved in the folk club scene, recording folk-blues albums that were the synthesis of blues, gospel, and folk stylings. From the 1960s to 1997 he worked with the Alvin Ailey American Dance Theatre.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- AMG (Ed Hogan)
- Dahl, Bill. “Brother John Sellers” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 146 (July/August 1999): 50.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

SEMIEN, “KING IVORY” LEE

b. 13 September 1931; Washington, LA

Musician and entrepreneur. Semien moved with family to Houston, Texas, in 1949. He had early success with steel guitarist Hop Wilson with the 1958 Gold-band single “Chicken Stuff.” As an associated business to his record store and TV repair shop, he established Ivory Records in 1960. He has continued performing in Houston. In 1995 he released The Bitch Done Quit Me on the Home Cooking label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin
- Lorenzo Thomas. “Ivory Lee Semien.” Living Blues no. 140 (July/August 1998): 55.

Discography: LSFP

SENEGAL, PAUL “LIL’ BUCK”

b. 1944; Lafayette, LA

Paul Senegal (Sinegal) is most well known for the fourteen years he played guitar with Clifton Chenier. He began his career with local R&B groups and later worked on Excello sessions for Lazy Lester and Slim Harpo. In 1999 he recorded his first solo record, Buck Starts Here, for Alan Toussaint’s NYNO label.

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

Tisserand, Michael. The Kingdom of Zydeco. New York: Arcade Publishing, 1998.

Discography: AMG

See also Chenier, Clifton; Harpo, Slim; Lazy Lester; Toussaint, Allen

SENSATION

Detroit label active 1949–1950, owned by Bernard Besman and John S. Kaplan. Leading artists were John Lee Hooker, Todd Rhodes, Russell Jacquet, and T. J. Fowler.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrathSEQUEL

London-based British record label established in October 1989 by Bob Fisher under the aegis of Castle Communications to exploit specialist material owned or licensed by Castle, which had recently purchased the Pye catalog. Blues from Pye/Nixa sessions by Big Bill Broonzy and Sonny Terry & Brownie McGhee and Alan Lomax’s Murderers Home collection were among early releases. Direction of the label passed to Tony Rounce in 1996, by which time artists such as Professor Longhair, Ruth Brown, and Big Joe Turner were featured in compilations licensed from Atlantic/Rhino. The label ceased to exist when Castle was purchased by the Sanctuary group.

HOWARD RYE

7-11

Record label (California, 1952–1953). Owners: Edward “Eddie” Mesner (b. 1914, New York;

d. March 26, 1963, Los Angeles), Rudolph “Rudy” Toombs (b. 1907, Louisiana; d. Harlem, New York, November 28, 1962). Beverly Hills, California–based 7-11’s artists included The Flames (aka Hollywood Flames with Bobby Day), Jewell Grant (with Desiree), The Jets (aka Hollywood Flames), Jack “The Bear” Parker (with Emmett Davis and Sadie Styn), and Jimmy Wilson.

ROBERT EAGLE

Bibliography

Burke, Tony, and Tony Watson. “The 7-11 Label.” Blues & Rhythm no. 29 (June 1987): 20–21.

See also Los AngelesSEWARD, ALEXANDER T. “ALEC”

b. 6 March 1901; Newport News, VA

d. 11 May 1972, New York City, NY

Singer and guitarist. Seward moved to New York in 1923. In the 1940s he began performing with Louis Hayes and with Brownie McGhee and Sonny Terry, later recording with each. His music was typical East Coast style, with several ragtime characteristics.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFPSEX AS LYRIC CONCEPT

When Lucille Bogan sang about a market for her meat under the title “Tricks Ain’t Walkin No More,” she facilitated combination of the sexual mores of Calvinist thought, African aesthetics, and the black American experience.

Alan Lomax stated in The Land Where the Blues Began, “[T]hose sexual expressions belonging to Africans and thereby extended to African Americans faced a marked challenge when introduced to Calvinist principles of the slave-holding South.” From the Calvinist perspective that served as the backdrop of Southern society, sex and procreation are synonymous and neither one nor the other is viewed in terms of exclusive physical pleasure. Such an understanding naturally created a response of unacceptability to the sexual nature of lyrics in blues music and helped to ensure a backlash to the sexualization of blues lyrics as well as to blacks.

However, from the perspective of many African religions, sexual pleasure is a divine gift, an enjoyable act not denied or placed in a position of shame. The sexualized lyrics of blues exemplify this belief. Blues sung in microcosmic environments cocooned from Protestant mores celebrated sexual expression. The sexual lyrics of blues music matched the implied rhythmic beats of African music. As described by Richard Alan Waterman in his 1952 article "African Influences on the Music of the Americas," "Melodic tones, and particularly accented ones, occur between the sounded or implied beats of the measure with great frequency. The beat is . . . temporarily suspended . . . delayed or advanced in melodic execution." This suggests that the African beat is in itself a sexual dance.

With the birth of the blues came the birth of the self-expression of sexual freedom among African Americans, a particular freedom that did not arrive for white Americans until the rise of Elvis Presley. Sexual expression in blues music served both as a cultural remembrance and as sexual declaration. Blacks merged the mores of both African and Calvinist perceptions of sexuality into a vocal if not a literal freedom to move beyond the extreme images of the "Hottentots Venus," the "Tragic Mulatto," and the "Black Buck." As a result, sexual expression in blues music to the black listener called for sexual celebration, even if only by means of vicarious sound emanating from an old Victrola phonograph.

PHOENIX SAVAGE-WISEMAN

Bibliography

Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Pantheon Books 1993; reprinted, New York: New Press, 2002.

Waterman, Richard A. "African Influence on the Music of the Americas." In Acculturation in the Americas, edited by Sol Tax, pp. 207–218. University of Chicago Press, 1952.

SEYMOUR

Chicago post–World War II jazz record label. Seymour Schwartz, a trumpet player who ran Seymour's Record Mart at 439 South Wabash, operated the Seymour imprint for a few months in 1950. After running both traditional and modern jam sessions in the store's loft for some time, Schwartz decided to issue some loft-taped Dixieland material (by the Jimmy James Jas Band) and to make studio recordings of singer Lurlean Hunter and some of the modern jazz artists who had participated, such as tenor saxophonist Kenny Mann and pianist John Young. In all, Seymour released five records (sides by John Young were not released and were sold to Chance). During the late 1950s and early 1960s, Seymour operated the Heartbeat label.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Campbell, Robert L., and Robert Pruter. "The Seymour Label." Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/seymour.html> (accessed May 21, 2003).

SHAD

Subsidiary of Sittin' In With label owned by Bob Shad, active 1958–1960. Based in New York City, it had Chicago artists Junior Wells and J. B. Lenoir, and from Texas, Lightnin' Hopkins.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

SHAKE 'EM ON DOWN

September 2, 1937, in Chicago, Mississippi musician Booker Washington "Bukka" White recorded "Shake 'Em On Down" for Vocalion and immortalized the phrase must I keep [or done stopped] hollering or must I shake 'em on down.

The title phrase typically refers to having sex, dancing, or both. Though the song may have been in circulation before White's recording—Calt and Wardlow state that Bo Weavil Jackson (not the Paramount recording artist) taught it to Booker Miller in 1932—once recorded, it was an immediate hit and widely copied.

In May 1938, in Chicago, Big Bill Broonzy, accompanied by a combo that included George Barnes's jazzy electric guitar, recorded "New Shake-Em On Down" (Vocalion). In San Antonio, Texas, in October 1938, Bo Carter recorded it (Bluebird). Both versions had new verses, and Carter changed the refrain to must I keep dealing or must I shuck them on down.

Bluebird released the next three: Tommy McClenan's "New 'Shake 'Em On Down'" (November 1939), Robert Petway's "Ride 'Em On Down" (March 1941; covered by Eddie Taylor on Vee-Jay, 1955), and Big Joe Williams's "Break 'Em On Down" (December 1941). The last elaborates on the gambling theme introduced by Carter. Each of these versions included some if not all new lyrics. Lucille Walker's a cappella Library of Congress recording from May 1939 (Rosetta) is a copy of White's original. Murray states that "Shake 'Em" was also part of Delta musician Tony Hollins's repertoire.

Following World War II, Dr. Ross recorded a largely instrumental boogie version for Sun (1952), and Furry Lewis (Bluesville) and Fred McDowell (Atlantic) each recorded unique renditions in 1959. McDowell performed it often and was so well known for it, in the Mississippi hill country, that locals named him "Shake 'Em."

Guitarist and barber Wade Walton's recording (1962, Bluesville), a laid-back interpretation of this typically intense song, included none of the previously recorded verses. Oster collected the song in Louisiana (1959–1960) from both Willie B. Thomas and Guitar (Robert) Welch.

White's second recording (1963, Tacoma) omitted verses concerning jelly and jellyroll and included new ones. Williams's 1964 Milestone recording covers White's original with additional lyrics from his own 1941 record. Evans recorded slide performances by Ranie Burnette (guitar) and Compton Jones (bow diddley) in Tate County, Mississippi, in 1970 (Rounder).

Sam Chatmon's 1974 recording (1999, Flyright) incorporated all new verses, while David "Honeyboy" Edwards's (1989, Blue Suit) and R. L. Burnside's (1996, Matador) used combinations of lyrics from earlier recordings. Detroit's Bobo Jenkins also recorded it (1971, Big Star). Albert King's 1971 Don Nix–penned "Shake 'Em On Down" and Stick-Horse Hammond's 1952 "Truck 'Em On Down" are unrelated.

It is significant that all of these blues musicians were originally from Mississippi with the exception of Alabama-born Jenkins, who spent time there. Jim Dickinson's Catmando Quartet, recording in Memphis (1965), produced the first Caucasian version. Savoy Brown (1967), Led Zeppelin (1970), and subsequently numerous others have recorded "Shake 'Em."

Described as a "sexy dance tune" (Lomax) and as "dance blues" with a "monotonous sing-song quality" (Calt and Wardlow), "Shake 'Em On Down" is quintessential Mississippi blues.

FRED J. HAY

Bibliography

Calt, Stephen, and Gayle Wardlow. King of the Delta Blues: The Life and Music of Charlie Patton. Newton, NJ: Rock Chapel Press, 1988.

Lomax, Alan. The Land Where the Blues Began. New York: Pantheon, 1993.

Murray, Charles Shaar. Boogie Man: The Adventures of John Lee Hooker in the American Twentieth Century. New York: St. Martin's, 2000.

Oster, Harry. Living Country Blues. New York: Minerva, 1975.

SHAKEY JAKE

b. James D. Harris, 12 April 1921; Earle, AR
d. 2 March 1990; Pine Bluff, AR

James D. "Shakey Jake" Harris acquired his nickname as a gambler shaking the dice, and he continued to hustle throughout a career as a blues singer–harmonica player, manager, producer, club owner, and record label proprietor. Raised on an Arkansas farm, Harris came to Chicago as a schoolchild and broke into the Chicago blues scene around 1949, inspired by the harmonica work of the late John Lee "Sonny Boy" Williamson and then by Little Walter, as well as by the nightlife. In the 1950s and 1960s Jake recorded for the Ping, Artistic, and The Blues labels in Chicago and did two LPs for Prestige Bluesville but turned his promotional energies toward rising young star and protégé Magic Sam, whose aunt Jake had married.

Harris performed on the first American Folk Blues Festival tour of Europe in 1962. In 1968 he moved to Los Angeles, where he recorded for World Pacific, Polydor, and Murray Brothers, ran the Safara Club, and started his own label, Good Time Records. His last hustle was making a living from selling discarded paper and cardboard products to recycling centers. After his health began to fail, he moved back to Arkansas and died in Pine Bluff.

JIM O'NEAL

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Aldin, Mary Katherine, and William Clarke. "Shakey Jake." Living Blues no. 92 (July/August 1990): 42–43.
Welding, Pete. "Gambler's Blues: Shakey Jake." Living Blues no. 10 (Autumn 1972): 10–16.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

SHAMA

Chicago soul and blues label of the 1960s and 1970s. The label was soul singer Syl Johnson's personal label that he operated out of his house in Chicago. Much of the recording for the company, however, took place at the studio at 2131 S. Michigan Avenue, operated by Peter Wright's Twinight label. Johnson worked with artists who did not interest Twinight, mainly the funk duo Simtic and Wylie and stand-up blues singers Lee "Shot" Williams and Nolan Struck. Johnson produced the acts with Twinight creative people, namely songwriters Carl Smith and John Zachary, arranger Johnny Cameron, and the bands Deacons and the Pieces of Peace. When Johnson moved to Hi Records in 1971, he closed the Shama operation. He revived the imprint during the late 1970s and early 1980s when he put out a slew of recordings of himself, much of it blues.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert. Chicago Soul. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

Discography: McGrath

SHANACHIE/YAZOO/BELZONA/ BLUE GOOSE

During the 1960s, Nick Perls, scion of a wealthy family of New York art dealers, amassed a vast collection of country blues 78s from the 1920s and 1930s. In 1968, he began transferring some of these prewar rarities onto LPs, initially naming his label Belzona (after Belzoni, Mississippi) but after five releases changing it to Yazoo (another Mississippi town) to avoid confusion with the Beltona trademark. Operating from a Greenwich Village townhouse, Yazoo issued seventy-four LPs prior to Perls's death in 1987 from AIDS at age forty-five.

Some Yazoo LPs were anthologies themed by region or style (for example, Mississippi, St. Louis, East Coast, bottleneck guitar, barrelhouse piano, or hokum blues); others were devoted to individual artists (for example, Charley Patton, Willie McTell, or Gary Davis). Many Yazoo releases featured cover art by famed underground cartoonist R. Crumb and exhaustive liner notes by guitar expert Steve Calt. Crumb and Calt also recorded for Yazoo's sister label, Blue Goose—Perls's outlet for living artists (for example, Jo-Ann Kelly, Roy Bookbinder, Larry Johnson, Woody Mann, Sam Chatmon, and Rory Block).

Shortly before his death, Perls sold Yazoo to Shanachie, a label founded in 1975 by fellow record collector Richard Nevins. Shanachie has maintained Yazoo's archival catalog on CD and added to it. Some Shanachie-era Yazoo compilations offer fascinating glimpses into the shared musical traditions of blacks and whites in the early twentieth-century South. Several of the 1990s blues reissues were compiled and annotated with the assistance of Don Kent.

Shanachie (pronounced SHA-nuh-kee, a Gaelic term for storyteller) initially focused on Irish music but has expanded aggressively into reggae, world music (especially African), jazz, folk, Americana, New Orleans music, blues, and—on its Spirit Feel subsidiary—gospel. Now based in New Jersey, Shanachie's contemporary blues roster includes Debbie Davies, Duke Robillard, Curtis Salgado, and Mem Shannon. The company also produces performance and documentary music videos and DVDs.

STEVE HOFFMAN

Bibliography

Kelp, Larry. "Nick Perls: A Tribute." Blues & Rhythm no. 33 (December 1987): 15.

Discography

"LPs Issues by Yazoo Records." Stefan Wirz website, <http://www.wirz.de/music/yazoofrm.htm> (for pre-Shanachie Yazoo and Blue Goose).
Shanachie Entertainment website, <http://www.shanachie.com> (for current Shanachie catalog).

SHANNON, MEM

b. 21 December 1959; New Orleans, LA

Guitarist, singer, and songwriter. A full-time taxi driver in New Orleans at the time of his breakthrough as a recording artist, Shannon was a natural storyteller who created a unique conversational blues style. He was also one of the very few modern bluesmen to be born and develop his music in the Crescent City. Shannon was musical at an early age, playing clarinet at eight and becoming proficient on guitar at fifteen. He formed a couple of bands, first the Ebony Brothers and later Free Enterprise, after high school but had to give up music to support his extended family when his father died unexpectedly in 1981.

In his spare time Shannon began writing songs about his taxi experiences and ultimately resumed his performing career in the early 1990s, winning a talent contest that landed him and his band The Membership a high-profile gig at the New Orleans Jazz & Heritage Festival. His debut album, A Cab Driver's Blues, was released in 1995, and it exhibited a mature talent who mixed elements of funk, jazz, and humor into his personalized blues approach. Its success, embellished by his 2nd Blues Album in 1997, meant that Shannon, who was fond of telling people he had driven more than a million miles without ever going north of highway I-10, finally got to take his blues on tour. In 1999 he released the country-tinged Spend Some Time with Me and followed it two years later with Memphis in the Morning, a more R&B-flavored effort featuring backing by the Memphis Horns.

MICHAEL POINT

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin; Santelli
Hannusch, Jeff. “Mem Shannon: ‘If I Don’t Play Something Funky, I Feel Like I Should Have Stayed Home.’” Living Blues no. 128 (July/August 1996): 42–45.

Discography: AMGSHANNON, PRESTON

b. Olive Branch, MS

Guitarist, singer, and songwriter active in Memphis, Tennessee, and a Bullseye Blues recording artist.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly and Al Campbell)

Discography: AMGSHAW, ALLEN

b. ca. 1890; Henning, TN

d. 1940; Tipton County, TN

Singer and guitarist active in Memphis and western Tennessee. His two surviving recorded songs from 1934 are touchstones of pre-World War II acoustic blues. It is believed that he was father of unrecorded but noted blues guitarist Willie Tango.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: DGRSHAW, EDDIE

b. 20 March 1937; Stringtown, MS

Alto, tenor saxophone, harmonica; equally adept at playing swing and blues. As a teenager growing up in Mississippi, Shaw backed up Little Milton and Ike Turner. He was hired by Muddy Waters in 1958 and moved to Chicago at Muddy’s request. A few years later, after an argument with band members about the sloppiness of the band’s performance, Shaw packed up his horn and walked down the block and sat in with Muddy’s chief rival, Howlin’ Wolf. Wolf hired him on the spot, thus beginning a nearly twenty-year alliance. Shaw became Wolf’s right-hand man, performing as bandleader, arranger, and road manager.

His reputation as a sideman grew with his stellar performances on Wolf’s 1965–1967 Chess recordings and Magic Sam’s 1968 release Black Magic. Shaw’s solo career began to take off in the mid-1970s and continued to gain momentum after his smokin’ performance on Alligator Records’ 1978 release Living Chicago Blues anthology. He released two solo albums for the Rooster Blues label—King of the Road (1985) and In the Land of the Crossroads (1992).

In a career that has spanned more than forty years, Shaw has played with many of Chicago’s legendary bluesmen. In addition to Waters, Wolf, and Magic Sam, Shaw has played with Otis Rush, Willie Dixon, Freddy King, Hound Dog Taylor, and Earl Hooker. He continues to tour and record with his own band, Eddie Shaw and the Wolf Gang. Shaw’s son, guitarist Eddie “Vaan” Shaw, Jr., continues the family’s musical legacy.

DENNIS TAYLOR

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Bonner, Brett J. “Eddie Shaw.” Living Blues no. 124 (November/December 1995): 26–39.

Discography: AMG, LSPFSHAW, EDDIE “VAAN,” JR.

b. 8 November 1955; Greenville, MS

Chicago-raised Eddie “Vaan” Shaw, son of singer/saxophonist/bandleader Eddie Shaw, learned guitar as a child from Magic Sam and Hubert Sumlin. He went on to tour and record with both his father and his own band, showcasing his technically proficient playing style.

GENE TOMKO

SHAW, EDDIE "VAAN," JR.

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli
Johnson, Matthew. "From the Ring Master's Knee: Eddie 'Va'an' Shaw." Living Blues no. 95 (January/February 1991): 28–31.

Discography

Ass Whoppin!! (2001, self-produced).

SHAW, ROBERT

b. 9 August 1908; Stafford, TX
d. 16 May 1985; Austin, TX

Barrelhouse pianist. Shaw performed widely in the South and as far north as Chicago in the 1920s and 1930s. He then left professional music-making until his rediscovery in 1967, whereupon he played extensively in America and Europe. Shaw had a vibrant, hard-hitting style that changed little after the 1920s.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
"Robert Shaw." Texas State Historical Society Handbook of Texas Online website, <http://www.tsha.utexas.edu/handbook/online/articles/view/SS/fsh43.html>.
Springer, Robert. "'Being Yourself Is More Than Tryin' to Be Somebody Else': An Interview with Robert Shaw, Austin, Texas, July 21st, 1975." Blues Unlimited no. 129 (March/April 1978): 13–21.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

The Ma Grinder (Arhoolie 377; original release Texas Barrelhouse Piano, Arhoolie F1010).
Robert Shaw: The 1971 Party Tape (Document 1014).

SHAW, THOMAS "TOM"

b. 4 March 1908; Brenham, TX
d. 24 February 1977; San Diego, CA

Acoustic guitarist and singer in prewar Texas styles. During the 1920s and early 1930 in east Texas he encountered Blind Lemon Jefferson, Texas Alexander, and Blind Willie Johnson. He moved to San Diego, California, in 1934; not long after, he performed on XEMO radio and in personal appearances. He met and began performing with pianist Bob Jeffreys in the 1940s. His contact with local storeowner Lou Curtiss in 1968 led to recording opportunities and occasional performances outside California until his death.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin
Curtiss, Lou. "Tom Shaw Talks." Living Blues no. 9 (Summer 1972): 24–26.

SHEPHERD, KENNY WAYNE

b. 12 June 1977; Shreveport, LA

Kenny Wayne Shepherd was inspired to begin playing the guitar after attending a Stevie Ray Vaughan concert at age seven. Shepherd soon took up the guitar under the eye of his father, Ken, Sr., a local concert promoter/deejay, who had booked Vaughan to play the Louisiana Music Festival. A native of Shreveport, Louisiana, Shepherd debuted his talents to the music world at age thirteen when he was asked to join in a jam with guitarist Bryan Lee while in New Orleans. He began to play club dates in his teens and released his first album, Ledbetter Heights, at age eighteen on Giant Records.

Deemed a guitar prodigy by many critics, Shepherd's initial release topped the Billboard blues charts. Shepherd issued his sophomore release in 1997, entitled Trouble Is ..., on Revolution Records, featuring artists such as Chris Layton, Tommy Shannon (both known as members of the group Double Trouble), and James Cotton. The album, like his debut, found widespread commercial success in both blues and rock markets. His next effort, Live On, was released in October 1999, this time featuring such guests as Les Claypool and Warren Haynes.

Shepherd's virtuosity as a guitar player has earned him frequent comparisons to artists such as Stevie Ray Vaughan and fellow youthful prodigy Johnny Lang. His success as a recording artist has been aided by an extensive tour schedule, attracting a wide array of fans, both young and old, to his approach to blues guitar.

MATHEW J. BARTKOWIAK

Bibliography

AMG (Steve Huey and Richard Skelly); Larkin; Santelli
DelGrosso, Rich. "Kenny Wayne Shepherd: The Blues Was, Is, and Ever Shall Be." Blues Revue no. 39 (July/August 1998): 14–20.
Paul, Alan. "Forever Blue." Guitar World 19, no.11 (November 1999): 82–90, 112–114.

- . “Prince of Wails.” Guitar World 17, no. 12 (December 1997): 68–70, 212–214.
 Wiederhorn, Jon. “Rolling Stone Spring Style.” Rolling Stone no. 784 (April 16, 1998): 72–73.

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

- Ledbetter Heights* (1995, Giant).
Trouble Is ... (1997, Revolution).
Live On (1999, Giant).

SHEPPARD, BILL “BUNKY”

- b. William Edward Sheppard, 20 March 1922; New Orleans, LA
 d. 2 July 1997; Los Angeles, CA

Chicago and Los Angeles record company executive. Bill “Bunky” Sheppard began working with doo-wop groups in Chicago during the 1950s, independently producing such acts as the Sheppards and the Bel Aires. He operated the Apex label (1959–1962), on which he recorded Danny Overbea, Lefty Bates, and the Sheppards, and with Carl Davis the Nat/Wes/Pam label complex (1961–1962), on which he recorded bluesman Lucky Carmichael as well as the Dukays. He was with Vee-Jay (1962–1963) and with Constellation (1963–1966). Recording the vocal group the Esquires, Sheppard operated his own Bunky label (1967–1969). During the 1970s, he moved to Los Angeles and worked for Motown, CTI, Mercury, and Capitol. He joined 20th Century Fox Records in 1978, serving as vice president until the company was absorbed by RCA in 1982.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- Pruter, Robert. Chicago Soul. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

SHIELDS, LONNIE

- b. 17 April 1956; West Helena, AR

Lonnie Shields spent his early singing years in gospel and soul music but was drawn into the blues by drummer Sam Carr, who lived across the Mississippi River from Shields in Lula, Mississippi. Carr and his partners in the Jelly Roll Kings—Big Jack Johnson and Frank Frost—mentored the young Shields, and in 1986 Shields played at the inaugural King Biscuit

Blues Festival in Helena, where he has also appeared many times since. He combines elements of southern R&B and Delta blues, with a B. B. King–influenced guitar style and soulful gospel-rooted vocals.

His first blues recordings were for Rooster Blues, a single recorded in 1987 followed by an album that won the Living Blues Critics’ Poll as Best Album of 1993. After he began to tour following the CD release, he relocated to the Philadelphia area. Shields recorded another CD for Rooster Blues and two for JSP and has continued to tour, though he has yet to make the breakthrough that seemed to beckon when he appeared on the national blues scene.

JIM O’NEAL

Bibliography

- AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin; Santelli
 Bonner, Brett J. “Lonnie Shields.” Living Blues no. 120 (March/April 1995): 46–51.
 Lee, Peter. Liner notes for Portrait (1992, Rooster Blues Records).
 O’Neal, Jim. Liner notes for Midnight Delight (2000, Rooster Blues Records).

Discography: AMG

SHINES, JOHNNY

- b. John Ned Lee Shines, 25 April 1915; Frayser, TN
 d. 20 April 1992; Tuscaloosa, AL

Influential blues singer, guitarist, and composer John Ned Lee Shines was born on a farm on the outskirts of Memphis, Tennessee. Shines’s parents separated when he was seven, and he spent the rest of his childhood divided between his mother’s home in Memphis and his father’s farm in the Marion/Mound City region of Arkansas, just across the Mississippi River from Memphis. His strong singing voice developed as a boy, and he would practice yelling in the expansive cotton fields on his father’s farm.

Around the age of sixteen, Shines moved to Hughes, Arkansas, and began playing the guitar after being shown a few songs by his brother. His playing progressed rapidly after his associations with Memphis blues musicians Eddie Vann and Willie Tango, and he soon fell under the spell of Howlin’ Wolf, whom he devoutly followed throughout north-eastern Arkansas. Shines started playing professionally at age seventeen, and his dedication to Howlin’ Wolf’s music garnered him the nickname “Little Wolf.” He continued to perform throughout Memphis and northeastern Arkansas, playing much of Howlin’ Wolf’s repertoire.

In 1934, Shines teamed up with a piano player called M&O and the two moved to Helena, Arkansas. Through M&O, he was introduced to Robert Johnson, the legendary guitarist who would become Shines's greatest influence. Shines traveled periodically throughout the South and North with Johnson from 1935 through 1937 and absorbed Johnson's masterful finger-picking and slide guitar style. The pair traveled as far north as Canada, where they appeared together on The Elder Moten Hour gospel radio show in 1937. Shines would play a pivotal role in carrying on Johnson's music and memory after Johnson's death in 1938.

The following year, Shines moved to Memphis and continued performing while working a day job for the next several years. Following a brief stay in St. Louis, Shines relocated to Chicago in 1941 and continued to work outside music. He started playing on Maxwell Street for tips shortly afterward and also began working regularly with Big Walter Horton, a harmonica player he associated with in Memphis in the 1930s. About this time, Shines fitted his Kalamazoo acoustic guitar with an electric pickup, consequently helping to shape the new sound of urban Chicago blues that was emerging in the 1940s. He continued to work in and outside music throughout the 1940s and played with the Dukes of Swing, an eight-piece jazz band.

Shines made a handful of recordings for Columbia and Chess in 1946 and 1950, respectively, but the resulting sides remained unissued until decades later. In 1952 and 1953, he recorded several postwar blues classics for the JOB label that showcased his superior electrified Delta blues and powerful, vibrato-laden vocals, including "Evening Sun," "Ramblin'," and "Cool Driver." An extremely talented songwriter, Shines's highly sensitive and beautifully crafted lyrics made him one of the most imaginative composers of postwar blues.

Discouraged by the lack of sales his JOB sides generated, Shines retired from music in the late 1950s and continued to support himself through various construction jobs. In 1965, after being urged by blues enthusiasts Frank Scott and Mike Rowe, Shines returned to music and recorded for Sam Charters's landmark Chicago/The Blues/Today! series for Vanguard. With the blues revival of the 1960s in full swing, Shines toured the United States and abroad and recorded albums for Biograph, Testament, Blue Horizon, Advent, and Adelphi during the next ten years.

Shines relocated to Holt, Alabama, in the late 1960s with wife Hattie and family, and in 1971 he appeared in the film The Velvet Vampire. In 1980, he teamed up with old friend Robert Lockwood, and recorded "Hangin' On" for Rounder Records, which was nominated for a Grammy Award. Shortly after the recordings, Shines suffered a stroke that partially affected his guitar playing. He underwent physical therapy to help regain his hand strength and coordination but because of his impaired condition, he continued to perform mainly as a slide guitarist. Still a powerful singer, his commanding vocals remained undiminished. In the late 1980s, he often performed with his current wife, vocalist Candy Martin Shines, and their Alabama-based band.

Revived interest in the Robert Johnson legacy, spurred on by Columbia's successful Johnson boxed set in 1990, renewed interest in Shines's own illustrious career, and he was featured on several Johnson tributes and documentaries. In 1991, he made his last recordings with Snooky Pryor on Blind Pig's Back to the Country. Johnny Shines, hailed as one of the most important and distinctive figures of postwar blues, passed away after a short illness in 1992, just days shy of his seventy-seventh birthday.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- AMG (Steve Huey); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 Lee, Peter. "John Ned Lee Shines: A Tribute." Living Blues 105 (September/October 1992): 42–43.
 O'Neal, Jim, and Amy O'Neal. "Ramblin' Johnny Shines Part Two." Living Blues no. 23 (September/October 1975): 22–28.
 Welding, Pete. "Ramblin' Johnny Shines." Living Blues no. 22 (July/August 1975): 23–32.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings and Reissues

- Hey Ba-Ba-Re-Bop!* (1992, Rounder RCD 2020).
Last Night's Dream (1993, Sire/Blue Horizon CD 9 45285-2).
Evening Shuffle: The Complete J.O.B. Recordings 1952–53 (2002, Westside CD 635).

SHIRLEY & LEE

Shirley Pixley Goodman (b. June 19, 1936) and Leonard Lee (b. June 29, 1936; d. October 23, 1976) were known commercially as Shirley & Lee. They are most associated with their top 1956 hit "Let the Good Times Roll" but also "Feel So Good." The "Sweethearts of the Blues" took fans on a fictional love story through the LP Let the Good Times Roll (1956), following the love and foibles within relationships. Shirley & Lee's impact on the blues music scene was carried forth by work with the famous A&R man/producer Dave Bartholomew, who, with an all-star ensemble, captured the New Orleans blues sound of the 1950s and carried it to the masses.

MEG FISHER

Bibliography

AMG (Bryan Thomas); Larkin
Clarke, Donald. "Shirley and Lee." MusicWeb Encyclopaedia of Popular Music, <http://www.musicweb.uk.net/encyclopaedia/s/S92.HTM> (accessed October 2001).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Let the Good Times Roll (1956, Aladdin LP).
The Best of Shirley & Lee (1982, Act LP 47).
Let the Good Times Roll (1997, Ace LP 751; boxed set).

SHORT, J. D.

b. 26 December 1902; Port Gibson, MS
d. 21 October 1962; St Louis, MO

By his twenties, Short had mastered half a dozen instruments and was playing clarinet in Douglas Williams's band in St. Louis. His 1930s blues recordings, accompanied on guitar and issued under a variety of names, are gripping both for their rough-hewn, jerky music and darkly comic, or just dark, narratives. The depression era-themed "Hard Time Blues" (issued as by Joe Stone) is outstanding. In the 1950s and 1960s he occasionally worked with his cousin, Big Joe Williams, playing both guitar and harmonica, and they made some exhilarating albums together for Delmark. Short also recorded solo albums.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli;
Charters, Samuel. The Legacy of the Blues. London: Calder & Boyars, 1975.

Discography: DGR; LSFP

SHOWER, "LITTLE" HUDSON

b. 6 September 1919; Anguilla, MS

Chicago blues singer and guitarist of the post-World War II era. Shower led one of the most popular club bands in Chicago during the 1950s, playing loud electric country-style blues. In 1939 he came to Chicago, but it was not until 1946 that he entered the city's burgeoning blues scene. He formed his own group, the Red Devil Trio, in 1950 and worked regularly in the clubs through the 1950s. His recordings for the JOB label are considered classics, although his most popular club number, "Shake It Baby," was never released. Shower never recorded again, but continued to play the clubs regularly into the early 1960s. In 1963 he was appearing in a North Side folk music club, the Fickle Pickle, which possibly meant that he no longer had a strong base in the black community. In 1964 Shower retired from the music business.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Rowe, Mike. "Little Hudson." Blues Unlimited no. 111 (December/January 1974/75): 17.

SIEGEL - SCHWALL BAND

Siegel, Corky

b. 24 October 1943; Chicago, IL

Schwall, Jim

b. 11 November 1942; Chicago, IL

Chicago electric blues-rock band active from the mid-1960s through 1975. Occasionally it will reunite to play a half-dozen gigs per year.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Michael Erlewine); Larkin; Santelli

Discography: AMG

SIGNATURE

A 1944–1950 record label owned by Bob Thiele and revived by him in 1959. Although mostly a jazz and popular music label, some blues talent was featured, including Walter Brown, James P. Johnson, Ralph Willis, and Arthur Prysock.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

New Grove Jazz

Discography: McGrath

SIGNIFYING MONKEY, THE

“The Signifying Monkey” most frequently occurs as a toast or narrated tale. It is derived from the African folk tale “Why Monkeys Live in Trees,” and it begins with the monkey’s signifying to the lion.

The monkey tells the lion that in a recent conversation with the elephant, the elephant was talking about how weak the lion was and how the elephant intended to teach him a lesson at his earliest opportunity. This enrages the lion, who tears through the jungle with a mighty roar, looking for the elephant. When he finds him, he insists on fighting, even though the elephant warns him off. The lion loses pitifully and, more dead than alive, drags himself back to the monkey. The monkey is jumping up and down on a tree limb, excited about the success of his scheme. He slips and falls and the lion is on him “with all four feet.” The monkey begs “with tears in his eyes,” says, “look here Mr. Lion, I apologize,” but the lion is having none of it and he kills the monkey.

This is how the tale ends in the version recorded by Hot Lips Page (1953, King 4616), but in another version, recorded by the Johnny Otis Show (1968, Kent LP 534), the monkey tells the lion he will fight him, but it has to be “fair and square.” When the lion backs off to ready himself to fight, the monkey escapes to the trees. Some commentators believe that the variation where the monkey loses is a later development and signals the weakening in importance of the trickster motif in African American folklore. These variations can be heard in the examples above and in others by Little Miss Cornshucks, who recorded it in 1948 (DeLuxe 3194), and by the Big Three Trio, who recorded it twice, in 1946 on Bullet 275 and in 1947 on Columbia 37358. “The Signifying Monkey” also appealed to more jazz-oriented performers such as Oscar Brown, Jr. (1960, Columbia CL 1577), and Sax Kari (1949, Apollo 389). “The Monkey and the Baboon” cuts by Lonnie Johnson and Spencer Williams (1930, OKeh 8762) and Big Maceo’s “Can’t You Read” (1941, Bluebird 8772) are extensions of “The Signifying Monkey.”

Essential to our understanding of the importance of this group of songs is the signal importance of “signifying” in African American culture. Signifying can be defined as a mode of African American speech wherein allusion and indirection are used to approach a potentially taboo subject for the purposes of ritual or humorous insult. The monkey was “signifying,” trying to stir up trouble by baiting the lion with alleged insults from the elephant. Musically speaking, the whole domain of call-and-response can be seen as a signifying realm: in boogie-woogie, the right hand signifies to the left hand, Tommy Johnson’s falsetto signifies to his guitar as well as his normal voice.

PAUL GARON

Bibliography

- Gates, Henry Louis, Jr. The Signifying Monkey: A Theory of Afro-American Literary Criticism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.
- Mitchell-Kernan, Claudia. Language Behavior in a Black Urban Community. Monographs of the Language Behavior Laboratory, No. 2. Berkeley: University of California, 1971.
- Smitherman, Geneva. Black Talk: Words and Phrases from the Hood to the Amen Corner. Boston: Houghton Mifflin, 1994.
- . Talkin’ and Testifyin’: The Language of Black America. Detroit: Wayne State University Press, 1986 [1977].

SIMIEN, “ROCKIN’” SIDNEY

b. 9 April 1938; Labeau, LA

d. 25 February 1998; Lafayette, LA

There are several distinct phases in the career of Sidney Simien. He began in the late 1950s playing guitar and harmonica in his uncle’s R&B band. After replacing his uncle as bandleader, he developed a strong local following but had little success with records until 1962, when he scored a hit with “No Good Woman” backed with “You Ain’t Nothin’ but Fine” for the Jin label. By the middle 1960s he had transformed into a soul singer, creating the stage persona of “Count Rockin’,” complete with a turban, and moved to Lake Charles, Louisiana, to record for Eddie Shuler’s Goldband label, but the hits had stopped coming. For twelve years he worked as lounge organist on the Lafayette circuit in the company of Lynn August and Stanley “Buckwheat Zydeco” Dural. During that time, he made a study of Clifton Chenier, taught himself piano accordion, and eventually returned to performing as the Zydeco singer Rockin’ Sidney.

He had several hits, such as “If It’s Good for the Gander,” but in 1985 he decided to record a song he had written ten years earlier that was loosely based on a French expression for a term of endearment, “my special all and all.” That song, “My Toot Toot,” became a local jukebox hit, expanded into a regional smash, and finally became an international phenomenon. Eventually, more than a million copies were sold, and the song earned a Grammy Award. The proceeds allowed Sidney to build his own studio, but he was never able to recapture the success of “My Toot Toot.”

JARED SNYDER

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Tisserand, Michael. The Kingdom of Zydeco. New York: Arcade Publishing, 1998.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

See also Goldband Records; Maison du Soul; Soileau, Floyd

SIMMONS, MALCOLM “LITTLE MACK”

b. 25 January 1933; Twist, AR
d. 24 October 2000; Chicago, IL

As a boy, Simmons played harmonica with his neighbor, James Cotton; like Cotton, he found his way to Chicago, where he put together his first band in 1955. Always an astute self-promoter, Simmons became a well-known figure on the club scene, setting up “battles” with other harmonica players and securing record deals with Carl Jones’s C. J. Records, Cadillac Baby’s Bea & Baby, and Checker. He also released singles on his own PM and Simmons labels and produced the album Arelean Brown Sings the Blues in the Loop (1977, Simmons).

His investment in a club and adjacent recording studio was lost when he was arrested and given a suspended sentence for a drug offense, a setback that lowered his profile in the 1980s, but in the mid-1990s he reestablished himself on the blues scene with albums for Wolf and St. George, and in his last years he recorded three albums for Electro-Fi. Though not an exceptional singer or harmonica player, Simmons was gifted with enthusiasm and versatility, prompting experiments with soul, funk, and country music that were almost always successful, but he was equally at home with a set of unreconstructed 1950s-style Chicago blues such as in High & Lonesome (1995, St. George).

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin
Galloway, A. “Little Mack Simmons” [obituary]. Living Blues no. 156 (March/April 2001): 98–100.

Galloway, Andrew. “The PM & Simmons Record Story: The Golden Age of Little Mack Simmons.” Blues & Rhythm 143 (October 1999): 4–7.

O’Neal, Jim, and Amy O’Neal. “Chicago Blues Today: King of the Harmonica?” Living Blues 20 (March/April 1975): 9–10, 55.

Discography: LSFP

SIMS, FRANKIE LEE

b. 30 April 1917; New Orleans, LA
d. 10 May 1970; Dallas, TX

Blues singer and guitarist. Frankie Lee Sims is a very important Texas blues guitarist who remained rather obscure because he died relatively young, at age fifty three, in 1970. Born to musical parents in New Orleans, Sims moved to Dallas, Texas, in the late 1920s. At age twelve he learned how to play the guitar on homemade instruments. In World War II Sims spent three years in the Marines. After a short career as teacher, Sims recorded his first songs for the Blue Bonnet label in 1948. In 1949 he accompanied his “cousin” Lightnin’ Hopkins on some of his records. His classic recordings, however, were made for Specialty in 1953. The first of these, “Lucy Mae Blues,” even became a local hit for Art Rupe’s label.

Sims’s music is characterized by a stomping rhythm, heart-rending lyrics, and rough vocals. In 1957 Sims recorded ten rough stompers for Johnnie Vincent’s Ace Records, of which “Walking with Frankie” is the best known. On the strength of these records, Sims even traveled to Chicago to play for a while with Muddy Waters and Little Walter. When Ace began to lose interest by 1960, Sims returned to Dallas. In 1970 a combination of heart attacks, tongue cancer, and pneumonia caused his untimely death. Posthumously, some 1960 sessions for Bobby Robinson in New York were traced that were issued on Krazy Kat.

GUIDO VAN RIJN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli Burke, Tony, Chris Bentley, and Ray Templeton. “Walkin’ with Mr. Frankie: The Complete Frankie Lee Sims.” Blues & Rhythm no. 50 (March 1990): 14–16.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

SIMS, HENRY “SON”

b. 22 August 1890; Anguilla, MS
d. 23 December 1958; Memphis, TN

Son Sims was a multi-instrumentalist around the Mississippi Delta. He recorded about half a dozen sides on fiddle behind Charley Patton in 1930, including “Elder Greene Blues” and “Running Wild.” In addition, he recorded four sides of his own at those sessions. Previously, Sims had formed a string band, the Son Sims Four, near Clarksdale in 1922. By the early 1930s, his group featured a young Muddy Waters. Sims was one of Waters’s first guitar instructors, and they often performed as a duo. Sims played reels and jigs—pre-blues—but adapted to the burgeoning style; he accompanied Muddy on his first recordings, in 1941 and 1942.

ROBERT GORDON

Bibliography

AMG (Joslyn Lane)
Gordon, Robert. Can’t Be Satisfied: The Life and Times of Muddy Waters. New York: Little, Brown, 2002.
Wardlow, Gayle Dean. “Henry ‘Son’ Sims: Farrell Blues Mama, Sho’ Don’t Worry Me.” 78 Quarterly no. 9 (1995): 11–20.

Discography: DGR

Selected Reissues

Patton, Charley. Screamin’ and Hollerin’ the Blues: The Worlds of Charley Patton (2001, Revenant 212).
Waters, Muddy. The Complete Plantation Recordings (1993, MCA/Chess).

SINCE I MET YOU BABY

“Since I Met You Baby” was written in 1956 by singer/songwriter/record producer Ivory Joe Hunter (1914–1974). Atlantic Records’ white production team—Jerry Leiber and Mike Stoller—marketed this rhythm and blues ballad with crossover appeal to an adult, rather than a teenage, and to a black as well as white audience. Although the chords of “Since I Met You Baby” were based on the twelve-bar blues progression, there were enough differences to classify the song as rhythm and blues (blues with rhythm). Instead of the typical blues structure of call and response or of small jazz/dance band arrangements, the song included sing-along stanzas/verses, lush, full orchestral arrangements with strings, as well as a popular, rather than a typical blues or gospel, vocal style.

Released in December 1956, Hunter’s own version of “Since I Met You Baby” sold more than a million copies to become gold. His original recording had sold more than the cover versions by both Molly Bee (Dot Records) and Mindy Carson (Columbia Records). (By the end of 1956 the original recording artist—usually black—was beginning to become preferred somewhat to the cover/copy recording artist—usually white.) Also in 1956, white singer Pat Boone had a million-seller in his cover version of the song. Boone’s version was an exact duplicate of Hunter’s record, from phrasing and pitch to tempo. Another million-seller of the song—this time in 1970—was by Sonny James, a country singer. Additionally, in 1970 at the Monterey Jazz Festival, Hunter received a standing ovation from the crowd, which also sang along with him when he performed “Since I Met You Baby.”

MONICA J. BURDEX

SINGER, HAL

b. 8 October 1919; Tulsa, OK

Originally a violinist, Harold “Hal” Singer, also known as “Cornbread,” switched to clarinet and alto saxophone in 1933 before adopting the tenor saxophone for work with the territory jazz bands of Ernie Fields (1938–1942), Nat Towles and Tommy Douglas (both 1939–1942), and Lloyd Hunter (1941–1942). He traveled to New York with Jay McShann’s band and appeared there with many swing artists as well as doing more blues-oriented work with Hot Lips Page and Lucky Millinder. With Page he recorded with various blues singers, notably Wynonie Harris (“Blow Your Brains Out” b/w “Lollipop Mama,” 1947, King 4226).

In 1948 he formed his own jump/rhythm and blues band, whose successful “Cornbread” (1948, Savoy 671) gave him his nickname. From 1949 to 1958 he toured widely and accompanied many rhythm and blues performers on record, including Harris again in 1957. From 1958 he worked in more jazz-oriented contexts and also studied at the Juilliard School but continued to accompany blues artists on record, including Lonnie Johnson (Blues by Lonnie, 1961, Bluesville BVL1007).

Following a tour of Scandinavia, he settled in Paris in 1965, working and recording in both jazz and blues contexts, including with visiting Americans, among them T-Bone Walker (Feeling the Blues, 1968, Black & Blue 33019), Eddie “Cleanhead” Vinson, and Jimmy Witherspoon. His autobiography, coauthored with his French wife, was published in 1990 in French. He was named Chevalier des Arts in 1992.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin McCarthy, Albert. “The Hal Singer Story.” Jazz Monthly iv, no. 11 (January 1959): 11.
Singer, Hal, with Arlette Singer. Hal Singer: Jazz Roads. Paris: Edition 1, 1990.

Discography: AMG; Lord

SINGING

Singing is the articulation of human vocal sound to melody, often enunciated with words. The art of blues singing lies in vocalizing a melody, either one in blues practice or one composed or improvised with one of the scales used in blues, while enunciating words according to one of the chorus rhyme schemes, sometimes improvising with one or more lyric techniques (see the Blues entry). The present entry discusses the importance of the singer in the blues, the physical act of singing, and the various styles, trends, and practices of singing during blues history.

The Importance of the Singer

With the melody as the basis of musical and lyrical improvisation during performance (see the Blues entry, vol. 1), and words sung to individual tones, the blues singer is the central figure of any performing group or ensemble, sometimes even a solo performer by him- or herself. Formulating and singing lyrics that may range from ballad narratives to a series of jokes, the singer will have more immediate and intelligible impact on listeners than the supporting instrumentalists, especially if the lyrics are sung with illustrative visual expressions.

In jazz practice, where the harmonic chord progression is the basis of improvisation, the jazz singer may depart from the initial melody to articulate in variations in alternate melodies, or even free improvisation, and to enunciate with vowels so as to function as an instrumentalist. Such may not be the case in blues singing, where at most the singer may introduce alternate chorus melodies as contrast, may add to or rearrange the choice of lyrics as the occasion demands, and may add vocal growls and moans as the context invites. However, many blues instrumentalists try to function as a second vocalist; whether or not the instrumentalist “tells a story” through tone without words is one measure of his/her ability in blues performance. So, the matter of singing is important to all blues musicians, singer and instrumentalist alike.

Proper classical vocal technique requires the singer to have upright posture and to coordinate various body parts. This is not always possible in blues performance. In field hollers and work songs, the singer is often walking, sitting, or kneeling in accordance with the task being done. A singer may be sitting to play a piano or be standing weighed down by a guitar, both affecting posture, breathing, and vocal production. Cultural customs and individual social function may be the source of distinctive vocal sounds. Performing with or without a microphone has to be taken into account. Sometimes a singer will sacrifice posture to walk onstage to act out a narrative lyric, or to encourage an audience response. The recording studio and its apparatus may make special demands on the singer, whether drawing away from a 1920s recording horn to avoid overload and tone bursts on the recording disc or coming nearer to the later electric microphone for softer lyric utterances. The presence of any of these factors may be elements in a basic account of blues singing.

Early Unamplified Blues Singers Through 1932

Rural (Including Field Holler Singers)

Among the early types of African American songs described on paper is the work song, especially the rowing song such as that described by Sir Charles Lyell (1849). The field recordings made by John and Alan Lomax from 1933 through the 1960s and those by Bruce Jackson through the 1960s and 1970s preserved a variety of field hollers, task songs, and work chants before they passed into disuse. The particular functions of this music were to pace the work being done, to lead other men and women in assisting the work, and to ensure safe timing of the alternating actions for tasks being done by two or more people. While black types of sacred music, dance, and musical theater contributed to early blues, field hollers have been singled out by some historians as a prominent antecedent, partly for their lack of instrumental accompaniment and partly because many southern male singers who recorded before 1940 endowed their blues singing with the field holler style, especially Leadbelly, Son House, Blind Lemon Jefferson, Texas Alexander, and Jaybird Coleman.

Not every rural blues singer of the World War II era sang like a field hand, but many still had to make much use of their lungs and throats to bellow their words and vowels, including Henry Thomas and Charlie Patton. Tommy Johnson is notable for the high falsetto phrases that he used to complete many of his blues choruses. Among Mississippi performers, John Hurt was unusual for his low, nearly conversational manner of singing.

Urban

Early singer/guitarists in southern cities sang in medium volume and register, perhaps due to their performing in enclosed spaces, whether Frank Stokes, Gus Cannon, and Furry Lewis in Memphis, Blind Blake in Georgia–north Florida towns and Chicago, and Willie McTell in Atlanta. Among southern women singer/guitarists, the best known is Memphis Minnie, always identifiable for her piercing, slightly nasal singing, but others are Geechie Wiley, Mattie Delaney, and Bessie Tucker. Also notable is Bessie Johnson, whose gruff singing—hard on the vocal cords—may be heard on many sanctified Church of God in Christ religious recordings of the late 1920s in Memphis.

Urban Unamplified Singers

The earliest blues singers to make commercial records were urban performers, mostly women, beginning with Mamie Smith in 1920 for OKeh Records. That rural blues musicians did not record until 1925–1926 was due to the fragility and susceptibility to damage of the wax recording matrix discs, the cumbersome and bulky pulley-driven recording equipment, which made portability difficult, and an apparent belief that record buyers were mostly in northern cities and were interested only in local city singers. The initial recording successes of Blind Lemon Jefferson and of Blind Blake in 1926 led to labels seeking southern musicians through 1932. This awakening of the labels to a blues genre through high initial sales was a repeat of the discovery of the potential of blues upon the release of Mamie Smith's "Crazy Blues" (1920), which led to a rush to record other urban women singers, resulting in a body of work termed retrospectively as "classic" blues.

It is wrong to think that the "classic" blues women were the originators of the blues on the basis of recording first, but it is also wrong to overemphasize the rural male blues musicians without considering the ongoing performances of city women. Both genres developed in parallel, at times casting artistic looks at each other: Son House appropriated lyrics from Bessie Smith's "Work House Blues" (1927) for his "My Black Mama" (1930), while northern singer Victoria Spivey had a supporting role in King Vidor's 1929 film Hallelujah, depicting black southern cotton culture life. While rural blues derived much of its vocal phrasing from field hollers, dances, and sacred music, urban blues came from American popular music, black theater and cabaret, and New Orleans jazz.

Unlike rural performers, the "classic" blues singers were more likely to have a little formal vocal technical training and to sing in theaters and cabarets. However, instead of a guitarist, they would have been accompanied by a considerably louder pianist or small "orchestra" of reed and brass instruments. Alto and contralto voices fared well, soprano voices less so; attacking notes forcefully from above aided enunciation of lyrics. Because of the highly organized nature of theater appearances with band arrangements, urban blues were often composed and arranged in advance, allowing little for on-the-spot lyric improvisation. There were many significant collaborations of composer/impresarios, including Fletcher Henderson, Clarence Williams, Perry Bradford, and Lovie Austin.

Today the most highly regarded singers of this "classic" genre are Alberta Hunter, Gertrude "Ma" Rainey, Victoria Spivey, and Bessie Smith. Hunter was a significant artist for Paramount Records, her sales high enough to ensure a lengthy string of recording sessions; her talent saw her through additional performing in the 1940s, with a distinguished career until her death. Ma Rainey was active on southern show circuits, and she adopted blues in her repertory as early as 1902. Her surviving recordings for the Paramount label give some glimmers of the effects of her vocal charm on her audiences. Bessie Smith is now considered as the great blues singer of the 1920s; her records having stayed in print in one form or another since the late 1930s. On her studio recordings she showed a hearty, rich contralto voice, but other aspects of her sound may be heard (and seen) in the film St. Louis Blues (1929), where she harshly inflects the flatted scale tones during the title song. Victoria Spivey's voice was not as deep and rich as Rainey's nor Smith's, but she enjoyed great commercial success in the 1920s and 1930s. In later years she wrote for Record Research magazine and operated the Spivey record label, keeping alive memories of the "classic" blues period.

There were many other singers from this time. Bertha "Chippie" Hill and Sippie Wallace made records with cornetist Louis Armstrong, then at the beginning of his career; record collectors today prize the discs more for Louis Armstrong than for the singers, who sang distinctly and expressively. Ida Cox was a best-selling artist for Paramount in the 1920s and later made some memorable records in 1939 and 1940. Virginia Liston, Viola McCoy, and Rose Henderson have cult-like status among collectors of 1920s blues records. Clara Smith is sometimes noted for having been one of the most expressive singers of slow blues.

It could be said there were three contributors to the end of "classic" blues ear singing. One was that it was supplanted entirely by new styles and melodies from 1929 onward, as is related in the next section. A second was that the labels that had widely recorded "classic" blues had folded or been sold to other companies by 1932, effectively ending the singers' recording careers and "freezing" their catalogs until rediscovery by record collectors some years later. A third reason was that many of their voices were becoming worn from frequent singing without microphone amplification. Recordings through 1925 were made with an acoustic recording horn, those afterward with an electric microphone. Records made in 1928 and 1929 sometimes show the extent of vocal wear on some singers, unflinchingly captured by the sensitive electric apparatus.

Microphone Amplified Singers (1928–1942)

Urban

Around 1920 the electric microphone was invented. It was to have two uses: in the recording studio, replacing the acoustic horn for recording sound with greater fidelity than before, and in public performance venues, amplifying sound—including the human voice—so as to be heard above ambient room noise. The electric microphone was introduced into recording studios by Victor in October 1925, and within a year most labels followed suit.

How soon electric amplification was available to blues singers remains uncertain, but it is likely it was available initially in the cities, less likely in the country, where electricity was still unavailable. It would have been quickly apparent to any city singer—even through radio broadcasts—that not only could the microphone faithfully reproduce the projected singing of the "classic" blues women, it could serve to bring out and make easily heard every subtle nuance at medium and low singing volumes, hence rendering a performance all the more communicative. White singers, including Bing Crosby, developed the "crooning" singing style. Black blues singers, too, developed various intimate styles for the microphone, identifiable to each artist regardless of whether a name could be attached to it.

Lonnie Johnson was one of the first singers to realize such a style. His first hit was "Falling Down Blues" in 1925, on which he sang and played violin. Although he made some virtuoso sides as a guitarist with Louis Armstrong and with Eddie Lang, his vocal sides were immensely popular and influential. His style was singing at medium range and volume to a slow tempo, often to a mournful melody, heard best on "Blue Ghost Blues" and "Life Saver Blues," and with self-deprecating lyrics about bad luck and lost love. During the mid- and late 1920s, he had an impact on singers in St. Louis, where he was then based, including Robert Peeples ("Fat and Greasy Blues," 1929), Specks McFadden ("Misunderstood Blues," 1929), and Alice Moore ("Black and Evil Blues," 1929). Another blueswoman from St. Louis was Edith North Johnson, who introduced the song "The Honey Dripper" on record in 1929 with pianist Roosevelt Sykes (who later was to perform the tune himself), singing in a high, light-timbred voice that was very different from, say, Ma Rainey's.

In 1928, Leroy Carr of Indianapolis, Indiana, recorded "How Long How Long Blues." The song wasn't new—Ida Cox had recorded a full-throated rendition in 1925—but his smooth, easy delivery of the words and melody was. His initial success cemented a musical partnership with guitarist Scrapper Blackwell, ensured recording sessions and steady work to keep him busy until his death in 1935, and resulted in new classic songs for the urban singer, including "Mean Mistreater Mama" (1934) and "Blues Before Sunrise" (1934). Among the singers who were influenced by Carr—or at least were willing to imitate his vocal style on records—were Bumble Bee Slim, Josh White, and Robert Johnson.

Two other important singers were Roosevelt Sykes and Peetie Wheatstraw (William Bunch). Sykes had apprenticed as a pianist in Arkansas and Mississippi, but by the time he began making rounds in St. Louis and Chicago he had developed a carefree, slightly flat-pitched singing style that fit well in urban and rural jazz and blues settings. Wheatstraw was identifiable with one melody, initially heard as “So Long Blues” (1930), and with his “ooh well well” lyric openings.

Also in 1928 Tampa Red and Thomas A. Dorsey recorded “Tight Like That,” introducing a new melody and encouraging the verse-and-refrain (four and eight measures) lyric scheme to blues practice. At the same time, the hit record heralded the hokum blues style and the 1930s Chicago blues style. One of the most prominent singers of this time and place was Big Bill Broonzy, who possessed a booming baritone voice that was versatile in all kinds of Chicago blues styles.

The effect of the microphone and the new kinds of blues melodies the singers introduced changed the nature of female blues singing. Lucille Bogan is a prominent example. She first recorded in 1923 into an acoustic recording horn and had her first significant hit in 1930 with “Black Angel Blues,” but she hit her artistic stride in 1933–1935, with the accompaniment of pianist Walter Roland and with her smart choice of new-style blues. She wasn’t a blues empress in the 1920s—her voice was too light, her phrasing and attack too lilting—but her approach to songs such as “I Hate the Train Called the M&O” is in keeping with the stylistic changes of the time.

Rural

For the most part, southern singers sang without amplification through most of the 1930s. Still, a few singers knew and made use of the microphone’s advantages. A notable early one was Skip James, who possessed a high, eerie falsetto singing voice that may have seemed faint in an empty juke joint, but through the microphone he could be heard well and with expression, judging by the eighteen surviving sides he made in 1931. Recorded evidence is scant for Mississippi bluesmen for 1934–1939—and even less so for blueswomen, save for Memphis Minnie, who became more established in Chicago in the 1930s. But it appears that these men and women sang in a field holler manner, loud, bellowing, and forceful, as may be heard in the performances of Bukka White and Big Joe Williams.

One major difference between urban and rural singing in the 1920s (and presumably before) was in the phrasing. Urban singers were likely to begin a lyric phrase on the first beat of the first notated measure of music or on the last of the preceding measure (the so-called “pickup” beat). Field hollers and work chants tended to delay the phrase beginning until the second beat of the first measure, presumably the first beat for the ax-fall, footstep, or arm motion. Any urban song can be “countrified” in a field holler manner by delaying the lyric beginning by one beat, and any rural song can be “citized” to urban tastes by starting the phrase sooner, on the “pickup” beat before the first notated measure. Few singers were recorded in the mid-1930s to capture this assimilation of city elements into rural music, but Robert Johnson of Mississippi and Blind Boy Fuller of North Carolina are notable singers in this regard. Any attribution to Johnson of rural-and-city, old-and-new synthesis has to take into account his phrasing on his various records.

The singers who began performing in the South during the 1930s developed booming voices, such as Big Joe Williams, Johnny Shines, Howlin’ Wolf, and Elmore James. Although the latter three would record only after 1945, their volume and diction come from their early years, when they may have often performed without microphones. For others, though, the microphone was a means to expression, and the 1939–1942 commercial and field recordings of Robert Lockwood, David “Honeyboy” Edwards, Muddy Waters, and Willie “61” Blackwell should be listened to in this way. In between would be Robert Petway and Tommy McClennan, who were the first to record a memorable standard, “Catfish Blues,” in rural gruffness with the distinct clarity of the lyrics.

Piedmont Carolina blues singers reflect parallel changes. Reverend Gary Davis may be described as “old school,” his blues singing reflective of his experiences listening and performing sacred music and early blues and at medicine shows and carnivals. Some elements of his early vocal style owe much to Blind Willie Johnson, a best-selling artist for Columbia Records of the late 1920s. Davis’s guitar protégée was Blind Boy Fuller, who was a popular recording artist until his death in 1941. Fuller’s singing combines elements of Bill Broonzy and Tampa Red, with melodic influences from Blind Lemon Jefferson or Blind Blake. His style was carried on by Brownie McGhee, who later broadened his repertoire to include folk music as well as blues. McGhee’s partner, Sonny Terry, was a superb vocalist who interpolated whoops and hollers between his harmonica phrases.

Gospel Transitions

During the time of changes in blues singing styles, melodies, and phrasing, a new form of religious music evolved. Thomas A. Dorsey and Sallie Martin were at the forefront as the creators of what was called gospel music. Leaving behind a blues career that included working with Ma Rainey and Tampa Red, Dorsey devoted himself to composing new songs for sacred expression, eventually composing “Take My Hand, Precious Lord” and “Peace in the Valley,” songs that influenced many young church singers. In the late 1920s and early 1930s, Sallie Martin began singing gospel music and eventually became an administrator in the National Gospel Convention.

The Dorsey gospel singer par excellence was Mahalia Jackson, who began her career in the 1930s and prevailed as the most recognized gospel singer through the 1960s and until her death. Jackson was never a blues singer; she devoted her singing to worship. Yet she applied the forceful hit-the-note-from-above attack of Bessie Smith to the new gospel melodies, inducing fervency in her listeners by emphasizing words on accented downbeats.

Another significant sacred singer of the late 1930s was Sister Rosetta Tharpe. Working more out of independent traditions—her “That’s All” (1938) is based on Washington Phillips’s “Denomination Blues” (1928)—she brought glamour, flair, and showmanship to sacred music, and she influenced some blues singers in the 1940s.

Singers and Styles of the 1940s–1970s

Three of the great singers to emerge out of the Kansas City jazz scene of the 1930s and early 1940s were Walter Brown, Big Joe Turner, and Jimmy Rushing. Brown was a singer of medium volume and range who during his tenure with the Jay McShann band introduced the blues standard “Confessing the Blues.” Turner and Rushing were blues shouters, using their chests and throats to increase their volume. Rushing and Helen Humes were featured singers with the Count Basie band. Turner initially performed with boogie-woogie pianist Pete Johnson, then with various bands. Their styles were a predecessor to jump-blues, whose singers were also shouters, especially Wynonie Harris, Louis Jordan, and Roy Milton. Jackie Brenston and B. B. King as young singers were in the jump-blues style. Something of the Leroy Carr charm with contemporary popular music crooning was combined by Cecil Gant, whose success with “I Wonder” led him to be dubbed by newspapers and magazines as “the sepia Sinatra.”

During the post–World War II years, jazz and blues singing were evolving rapidly as chromatic modern “bebop” jazz emerged. Billie Holiday is regarded more as a jazz singer, but her trademark “Billie’s Blues” theme identifies her as distinctively as the signature melodies that Lonnie Johnson and Peetie Wheatstraw used repeatedly to many sets of lyrics identified them. Jazz singers Ella Fitzgerald and Sarah Vaughan were capable of singing blues, but after the 1940s they turned increasingly to popular music standards for material. Joe Williams, a later vocalist with the Count Basie band, sang blues to scales other than the typical pentatonic scales (see the Scales entry). With jazz pushing musical boundaries and many urban musicians of the East and West coasts performing new jump-blues and ballads, the new in-between blues were called rhythm and blues in the press and in the record industry, especially in Billboard magazine.

Among the singers of rhythm and blues in Los Angeles and other West Coast cities were Nat “King” Cole, who was known for suave classics such as “Route 66” and “Straighten Up and Fly Right” before turning to mainstream popular music in the 1950s, Jimmy Witherspoon, Lowell Fulson, and Charles Brown. They followed in the footsteps of Gant, and they in turn influenced later soul and rock musicians, especially with regard to repertoire.

Among women singers of the 1950s, LaVern Baker and Ruth Brown were among the most popular on the Atlantic label roster, while “Big” Maybelle Smith scored a distinctive hit for Savoy Records with “Candy.” Little Esther Phillips and Etta James began as teenage rhythm and blues singers in the mid-1950s. Other notables of the decade include Marie Adams, Marjorie Hendricks (especially her recordings with Ray Charles), and Willa Mae “Big Mama” Thornton, the first singer of “Hound Dog” and “Ball and Chain.” Dinah Washington had a less heavy chest register to her voice than Big Maybelle or Big Mama Thornton, but she used her voice to piercing and forceful effect on jump-blues recordings of the 1950s and the early 1960s.

Meanwhile, musicians migrating from the South to Chicago were becoming distinctive artists. Chief among them was Muddy Waters, who through 1941 in Mississippi modeled himself after Son House and Robert Johnson. After moving to Chicago in 1943, he copied little mannerisms from John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson and “Big” Maceo Merriweather, eventually growing into the persona he presents in “Hoochie Coochie Man.” On casual listening, it seems that Howlin’ Wolf had strained his voice too much over time, but biographers report that his vocal cords were damaged during childhood; nonetheless, his singing was loud, resonant, and powerful, even without microphone amplification. Elmore James also reportedly had a powerful voice, regardless of how it was recorded during studio sessions. Aleck Miller “Sonny Boy Williamson II” recorded several excellent jump-blues style cuts for the Trumpet label in the early 1950s; however, his subsequent works for the Chess label show him as a skillful communicator of witty, intricate lyrics, such as in “Your Funeral and My Trial.” A distinctive singer of the times was J. B. Lenoir, whose high chirping voice may be an acquired taste for some listeners today but whose 1950s hits such as “Mama Talk to Your Daughter” helped to establish a new style for younger West Side Chicago singers.

Many of these southern transplants recorded for Chess Records in Chicago, a label that had two artists in the mid- to late 1950s who straddled blues and early rock ’n’ roll: Chuck Berry and Bo Diddley. Berry was from St. Louis, and his influences ranged from country music to jump-blues. His lyrics were narrative or descriptive, sung at medium volume and in a near-conversational register to render the words intelligible. His songs and manner of singing would be copied by hundreds of white rock singers in America and England from the mid-1950s through the 1960s. Bo Diddley made much use of urban African American cultural elements such as his booming voice, street-talk lyrics, and “shave-and-a-haircut, two bits” guitar rhythms. Even so, he had numerous cultural crossover hits with “Bo Diddley” and “I’m a Man.” Ten years later, Koko Taylor continued the Chess line of African American blues that attracted white rock fans and performers with her rendition of Willie Dixon’s “Wang Dang Doodle.” Its compilation of traditional partying toasts and word games gave structure to the lyrics, which Taylor would improvise upon each time she performed it on stage. It became her signature song.

Singers based in the South sustained their styles through the 1940s and 1950s, and they were “rediscovered” by white audiences in the 1960s. Sam “Lightnin’” Hopkins, whose melodies could be traced to the Leroy Carr blues of the 1930s, was a clever, inventive lyricist. John Lee Hooker’s low drawl on “Boogie Chillen” (1948) earned him much work in black clubs and for small record labels and later in the white folk music circuit. Professor Longhair had a fluid baritone voice and a sharp whistle that he would use indelibly in countless performances of “Going to the Mardi Gras.” Robert Pete Williams—whose prison blues are equaled only by those recorded by Bukka White in 1940—often sang in alternate pentatonic scales, which gave his singing a unique quality. In the north Mississippi hill country east of the Delta, Fred McDowell was discovered, and his brand of singing would be continued by R. L. Burnside. Among the younger singers/guitarists of the 1960s were Odetta, a classically trained contralto who turned to performing blues and blues antecedents, including ballads and sacred music, Jerry Ricks, and Taj Mahal.

White Singers in Rock Music and Folk Revival Music

“Rock ’n’ roll music” was part imitation by whites of blues and part combination of that white imitation with elements of American popular music and country music. “Rock music” may be characterized as the exercise and extension of white Anglo musicians of rock ’n’ roll, and by 1980 it was outgrowing the blues roots. Between the rock ’n’ roll and rock eras was the 1959–1974 folk music revival, in which acoustic blues elements and pre–World War II musicians were rediscovered.

Elvis Presley, the first great rock ’n’ roll singer, succeeded in singing blues in part because he understood and sang in the southern gospel tradition. Much the same can be said for Jerry Lee Lewis, who brought more of the ecstatic, if not sanctified, side of gospel music into his singing.

The folk music revival yielded several notable singers accompanying themselves on acoustic guitars. Bob Dylan recorded several blues on his early albums, cultivating his distinct nasal vocal timbre. Dave Van Ronk was an overlooked standout whose vocalism should be studied anew.

In 1963, British singers and their rock bands began performing blues; they were enormously successful with white British and American audiences from the start, although their best performances would occur later in their careers. Chief among them was Mick Jagger of the Rolling Stones, whose voice had an affected imitative drawl that by 1965 acquired a tensile sound at high register, as in “(I Can’t Get No) Satisfaction” (1965); his best and most versatile singing may be heard on records made in 1968 through 1973. Robert Plant of Led Zeppelin possessed a voice of astounding high range and volume that he pushed and overused over time, but his singing from 1968 through 1975 went beyond contemporary blues styles and set new boundaries in the rock style. In between were such singers as Van Morrison, Steve Winwood, Keith Relf of the Yardbirds, Jack Bruce of Cream, Eric Burdon, Joe Cocker, and Rod Stewart.

American singers emerged, enriching rock with new timbres. Jimi Hendrix, a blues journeyman who was introduced to rock audiences in 1967, possessed a baritone voice versatile in singing blues, soul, and rock. Canned Heat had two blues students as vocalists, Bob Hite was the closest that rock had to a jump-blues shouter, and Al Wilson sang in falsetto akin to Skip James. Janis Joplin sounded like equal parts Willa Mae Thornton and Etta James, but she also used expressively a light high shriek as a timbral contrast. John Fogerty of Creedence Clearwater Revival was and remains an appreciative student of blues and early rock ‘n’ roll, but his songwriting and singing have been among the few successful American efforts to develop past the mere imitation of blues models. Steven Tyler of the band Aerosmith had a clear, beautiful tenor voice that became raspy in the mid- to late 1970s, a change to which he has adapted to incorporate little blues and rock singing tricks and devices to keep the listeners’ attentions.

Only a very few of the most distinctive white singers in rock music can be mentioned in this short space. Yet they and their commercial imitators helped to narrow the variety of blues familiar—and acceptable—to white audiences on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean, namely, the Mississippi Delta–Chicago lineage of blues from 1930 through 1960. Meanwhile, young African American singers in the blues tradition were developing according to new sounds in gospel and soul during the 1950s, 1960s, and 1970s. When white audiences sampled contemporary blues in the wake of Robert Cray’s “Smoking Gun” hit in 1986, what they heard was different from the Muddy Waters Chicago-style blues they expected.

Soul Style Innovators Since 1960

From the 1950s through the 1960s, there was a shift in vocal technique, seemingly reaching for the pitches from below instead of forcefully from above. At the same time, new composers appeared, who devised new styles of melodies to match their vocal approach. The results would be what is known as soul music, which would be performed by and for African American audiences whether in a gospel performance or in a blues club.

Many new developments seemed to be first recorded by gospel and sacred artists. Sacred vocal quartets dated back to the Fisk Jubilee Singers touring groups organized by John Work II in 1899, if not back to the first Jubilee groups of 1871. Post–World War II groups continued to cultivate harmony, but increasingly they had a featured tenor singing lead melody. Top sacred male groups of the 1950s included the Soul Stirrers with Sam Cooke and the Dixie Hummingbirds. Among the women, a generation younger than Mahalia Jackson, were Marion Williams, Clara Ward, and Shirley Caesar. Future soul great Mavis Staples began singing with her father and siblings in the Staples Singers. Among the new composers was Reverend James Cleveland, who apprenticed as performer and arranger for the Caravans in 1954–1958. Perhaps the most famous, and certainly the most expressive and dramatic sermonizer, was Reverend C. L. Franklin of Detroit, whose daughter Aretha performed in his church. It was only a matter of time before these new sacred expressions would be applied in blues and other kinds of black popular music.

Two key singers credited as soul innovators are Ray Charles and Sam Cooke. Charles had begun in the late 1940s as an imitator of the smooth jazz singing of Nat “King” Cole and Charles Brown. In 1953–1954 he began singing in a sanctified style, accompanying himself with gospel style piano. “Hallelujah I Love Her So” (1954, Atlantic) was a signal performance. Melodic antecedents of another Charles song, “Leave My Woman Alone,” may be heard in the songs “I Was Born to Preach the Gospel” by Washington Phillips (1928) and “The Liar” by Reverend Isaiah Nelton. Before long, his backing singers the Raelettes were providing antiphonal responses to Charles on “Drown in My Own Tears,” “Lonely Avenue,” and especially “What I’d Say.” Among Charles’s associates was the songwriter and singer Percy Mayfield, whose own solo recordings are excellent in their own right. Sam Cooke was the son of a preacher, and in the early 1950s he was the star tenor of the Soul Stirrers. He established his popular music career with hits for Keen and RCA-Victor labels, and among his protégées were Lou Rawls (who performed with Cooke on “Bring It On Home to Me”) and Johnnie Taylor. Cooke’s last record before his untimely 1964 death, “A Change Is Gonna Come,” remains a unique ethical and sacred expression.

Other male singers of the 1950s and 1960s who straddled the popular and gospel music worlds were Jackie Wilson and Little Richard Penniman. Wilson’s recording of “Higher and Higher” (1964) may be heard either as a rapturous love song or as an ecstatic sacred tune. Little Richard took blues shouting to new extremes; his Specialty label performances of “Long Tall Sally” and “Lucille” are some of the loudest and most frenetic twelve-bar blues on records. Screamin’ Jay Hawkins used his low register to thrilling effect on “I’ve Put a Spell on You.” The Impressions with Curtis Mayfield and Jerry Butler were famous for “People Get Ready.” Gene Chandler remains famous to all audiences for popularizing the song “Duke of Earl,” but his studio and live performances of Curtis Mayfield’s “Rainbow” are stunning. The Temptations, the Motown label’s lead male group, recorded several blues in popular 1960s style, the grittiest being “I Wish It Would Rain” featuring David Ruffin in declamatory, preaching style. Solomon Burke set his soul stride with “Cry to Me” for Atlantic in 1962. The Four Tops with Levi Stubbs may be heard as stylistic predecessors to Melvin and the Blue Notes with Teddy Pendergrass in the 1970s.

Bobby Bland has been one of the top draws in soul and contemporary blues since recording “I Pity the Fool” in 1957. His Duke label recordings through the 1970s are influential classics of southern soul. In later years he adopted a kind of snort or gargle as ornaments, citing Reverend C. L. Franklin as his source; listeners are divided on their effectiveness.

Memphis soul music was a distinctive style, often with singers performing with trumpet and saxophone ensembles, and much of it was produced at two studios there. Stax’s great singer was Otis Redding, who modeled his early style after Sam Cooke and rapidly developed into stunning maturity: “Try a Little Tenderness” and “Sitting on the Dock of the Bay” are among the highlights of a career cut short by a 1967 plane crash. Albert King was as influential a singer as he was a guitarist, showing how to sing with a slightly gravelly baritone voice; “I’ll Play the Blues for You” and “Born Under a Bad Sign” are influential examples of his vocal style. Other performers who made significant soul-blues records at Stax were Rufus Thomas and his daughter Carla Thomas, Little Milton, and Isaac Hayes. Hi Records under Willie Mitchell’s production supervision had the wildly popular Al Green, who sang soft, intimate vocals on “Love and Happiness” and other 1970s hits. Another great Hi singer was Ann Peebles, who recorded the classic “Couldn’t Stand the Rain.”

The developments of the 1950s and 1960s were echoed in Chicago by “West Side” artists Otis Rush, Magic Sam, and Buddy Guy with Junior Wells. Magic Sam’s 1967 West Side Soul LP is a compendium of active blues singing styles, including those of J. B. Lenoir, Otis Rush, and Junior Parker, with touches of Bobby Bland and Roosevelt Sykes.

Aretha Franklin is rightly considered the exemplary woman soul singer of the 1960s and 1970s, on the basis of the quality of her performances and of how many singers have been imitating her. However, the fact that Fontella Bass’s Chess record “Rescue Me” (1965) is often confused as being sung by Franklin illustrates the common gospel roots both singers shared in the Clara Ward Singers, with whom Bass’s mother Martha Bass was a member. Franklin’s late 1960s recordings for Atlantic of songs such as “You Make Me Feel Like a Natural Woman,” “Chain of Fools,” and “Respect” were best-sellers, and Franklin’s graceful voice was a new model for young women singers. In contrast was the gritty voice of Mavis Staples (as heard on the Staples Singers’ “Respect Yourself”). Gladys Knight made many records with the Pips, including an exciting “I Heard It Through the Grapevine” and the hit about reverse migration, “Midnight Train to Georgia” (1974). One singer obviously influenced by Knight was Dorothy Moore, whose “Misty Blue” helped to secure Malaco a place as a new soul blues label.

In the 1960s, one of the leading singers on records was Vee-Jay label artist Jimmy Reed, whose slightly laconic delivery suggested irony in classics such as “Bright Lights, Big City,” “Big Boss Man,” and “Baby What You Want Me to Do.” Some elements of the latter song may be heard in George Jackson’s composition “Down Home Blues” as performed by Z. Z. Hill, a master of late 1970s/early 1980s soul blues.

The lyrics of many blueswomen since the 1970s have been as raucous as any of those of their predecessors of the 1920s and 1930s. The tunes and manners of singing may be worlds apart, but lyric themes of love, cheating, and sex remain up front. Millie Jackson, Peggy Scott-Adams, and Denise LaSalle (“Drop That Zero”) helped to revive this attitude, and Lynn White (“Home Girl”) and Barbara Carr have kept it fresh and ever-renewing.

Prevailing Vocal Styles Since 1990

Many blues vocal styles are still practiced today; however, it may be easier to identify those styles that have become extinct. Field hollers and work chants have not been heard in fields or farms since the early 1970s, except perhaps an occasional demonstration by retired railroad “gandy dancers” at a folklife festival. The “classic blues” of Ma Rainey and Bessie Smith are hardly if ever performed today, except as tributes. Singer/guitarist John Cephas is among the few to perform Piedmont and Bentonia style blues on stage. Mississippi blues outside the Charlie Patton–Son House–Willie Brown–Robert Johnson lineage, such as Bo Carter or Jim Jackson, are hardly if ever performed by current blues revivalists Corey Harris and Alvin Youngblood Hart. Bill Broonzy, Tampa Red, and other prewar Chicago stars are rarely imitated. Leroy Carr and Big Maceo live on through the imitators of Robert Johnson and Muddy Waters, respectively.

New influences have crept in. Andrae Crouch has been the gospel artist of blues influence since 1980. Prince, particularly his early 1980s albums 1999 and Purple Rain, has been important to young Mississippi singers such as Dave Malone. It is too early to tell if rap has been a direct influence on blues or an indirect encouragement of revival of African American oral arts, but Clarksdale, Mississippi, favorite O. B. Buchana has effectively fused spoken chant with soul songs.

Even so, the postwar heroes remain. B. B. King and Bobby Bland still influence southern singers, with Albert King a close third. John Lee Hooker’s influence abides in rock as well as in blues, through rock groups as varied as Z Z Top or Big Head Todd and the Monsters. White rock singers often draw inspiration from Muddy Waters, Howlin’ Wolf, and Ray Charles, although often one can tell if they are imitating Wolf or Charles only by recognizing the song being performed. Dinah Washington is a favorite model for women singing with jump-style bands.

Contemporary masters of blues abound today. Bobby Rush’s showmanship sometimes overshadows his versatile singing, which can range from brisk Las Vegas opening numbers such as “Big Fat Woman” to slow blues such as “Tough Tittie”; any singer inserting a nasal “hey, hey” while pausing briefly during onstage patter to the audience is imitating Rush. Latimore is another southern favorite, with a marvelous bass voice. Robert Cray may be underappreciated by some fans because he doesn’t sing like Muddy Waters, but his voice has a distinctive sound, and it has been well maintained by good singing technique. Big Jack Johnson sounds by turns like B. B. King and Albert King, and he is a first-rate improviser of candid lyrics on topical events. Among women, Etta James and Koko Taylor are the matriarchs. Toni Lynn Washington is one of the best discoveries of the 1990s blues revival. Irma Thomas recorded “Time Is on My Side” before the Rolling Stones, but today she is a seasoned singer—and one of the best—in New Orleans. Shemekia Copeland is a younger singer to follow in the future, and not just because her father was late blues legend Johnny Clyde Copeland.

The introduction of the electric microphone has had a lasting impact on blues singing. Today’s blues singers never had to sing field hollers, or sing without a microphone except for a high school or college theater production. What some younger singers may lack in vocal power, they make up for in subtlety and nuance.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Gardiner, Julian. A Guide to Good Singing and Speech. Boston: Crescendo Publishing Company, 1972.
- Harrison, Daphne Duval, and John Cowley. “‘Classic Blues’ and Women Singers.” In The New Blackwell Guide to Recorded Blues. pp. 125–154. Oxford: Blackwell, 1996.
- Lyell, Sir Charles. A Second Visit to the United States of North America. London: J. Murray, 1849. Cited in Marshall Stearns, The Story of Jazz, Chap. 9 (New York: Oxford University Press, 1956).
- Spottswood, Dick. “Country Girls, Classic Blues, and Vaudeville Blues: Women and the Blues.” In Nothing but the Blues, edited by Lawrence Cohn. pp. 87–106. New York: Abbeville, 1993.
- Stewart-Baxter, Derrick. Ma Rainey and the Classic Blues Singers. New York: Studio Vista, Stein and Day, 1970.

SINGLETON, T-BONE

SINGLETON, T-BONE

b. New Orleans, LA

Gospel and blues guitarist and singer in Baton Rouge. From the mid- to late 1970s he was guitarist in the regional band the Condors, performing blues and soul music. Since then, he has been ordained a Baptist minister, but he continues to write and play blues in Baton Rouge clubs and regional festivals. JSP Records released his debut CD Walkin' the Floor in 1996.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Coleridge, Steve. "A Profile of T-Bone Singleton." Blue-print no. 48 (February 1993): 16.

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

SIRENS

Record label (Illinois, 1975–1976, 2001–). Owner: Steven Barnett Dolins (b. November 2, 1956, Chicago, IL). Highland Park, Illinois–based. Artists include Barrelhouse Chuck (Chuck Goering), Blind John Davis, Detroit Junior, Erwin Helfer, Willie Mabon, Billie & DeDe Pierce, Pinetop Perkins, James "Bat, the Hummingbird" Robinson, Speckled Red, Doug Suggs, Sunnyland Slim, Jimmy Walker, and Skinny Williams. In 1975, they reissued "Primitive Piano," originally issued in 1957 on Erwin Helfer's Tone Records.

ROBERT EAGLE

SISTA MONICA

b. Monica Parker, 1956; Gary, IN

Powerful and versatile gospel-influenced vocalist who has become an internationally known artist since she began her career on the West Coast in 1992. Her first album appeared on Thunderbird (1995), and since then she has put out four albums (including a gospel one) on her own Mo Muscle label.

RAY ASTBURY

Bibliography

Sista Monica Blues Singer website, <http://www.sistamonica.com>.

Selected Recording

Alive in Europe (Mo Muscle MMRE-716).

SITTIN' IN WITH/JADE/JAX/ MAINSTREAM

Sittin' In With was founded in 1948 by Bob Shad (1920–1985), and it was operated by him in New York City as part of Castle Records, Inc. An artists-and-repertoire veteran from Savoy and various jazz labels in the mid-1940s, Shad initially recorded jazz musicians such as Chu Berry, Stan Getz, and Wardell Gray. Later he recorded blues, including rural artists such as Lightnin' Hopkins and Houston rhythm and blues artists including Elmore Nixon, Peppermint Harris, and Goree Carter. In 1951 he sold Sittin' In With to the Mercury label and joined the latter firm as A&R man; discographers note that Sittin' In With releases continued through 1953.

Jade and Jax were subsidiary labels operated by Shad during the life of Sittin' In With; both issued blues, rhythm and blues, and jazz, and Jade issued gospel, too. When he left Mercury in the 1960s, he founded Mainstream, which issued albums as well as singles. He reissued some Sittin' In With material on Mainstream, and among new sessions he produced the debut LP of Big Brother and the Holding Company with singer Janis Joplin (1967). In later years Shad was assisted by his daughter Tamara Shad, and since his death she has continued to maintain the tapes of her father's session productions.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin
Darwen, Norman, and Tamara Shad. "Bob Shad—The Record Man: The Sittin' In With Story." Blues and Rhythm no. 100 (1995): 16–30.

Discography: Larkin

SLOAN, HENRY

Active ca. 1900 near Drew, MS

Unrecorded guitarist known to have been at Dockery's Plantation while Charlie Patton was living and beginning his performing career there. The extent of his influence on Patton, if any, has been speculated on by writers such as Robert Palmer and Robert Santelli.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Santelli
Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Viking, 1981.

SMALL, DRINK

b. 28 January 1933; Bishopville, SC

Small's early career was as singer and guitarist with the Spiritualaires, who recorded for Vee-Jay in the 1950s. With the group's breakup in 1959, Small began performing blues, building a regional southeast coast following. He has grown more versatile, singing traditional blues and soul music alike. He has recorded for Ichiban and Mapleshade, as well as for a few smaller labels.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jim O'Neal); Larkin; Santelli Underwood, Tut. "Prescription from the Blues Doctor: Drink Small." Living Blues no. 104 (July/August 1992): 12–17.

Discography: AMGSMITH, ALBERT "AL"

b. 23 November 1923; Bolivar County, MS
d. 7 February 1974; Chicago, IL

Record producer for Vee-Jay and ABC-Bluesway labels. He grew up around Rosedale, Mississippi; his mother owned a barrelhouse. He learned bass in a school band. Sometime in or before 1945 he moved to Chicago, where that year he formed an eight-instrument band. His initial experience in the recording industry was as sideman, bandleader, and/or producer with small Chicago labels, including Chance, United, JOB, and U.S.A. From the 1950s to the mid-1960s, he produced Vee-Jay sessions with Jimmy Reed, the doo-wop groups The Spaniels and The Dells, Jerry Butler, and John Lee Hooker. He continued to produce Reed and Hooker for Bluesway after Vee-Jay folded. He also was Reed's manager through 1970–1971. The 1974 Living Blues magazine obituary records his blunt yet effective ways as manager and producer and his work for the benefit of underprivileged children and prisoners.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

O'Neal, Jim. "Al Smith" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 16 (Spring 1974): 5, 31.

Discography: LSFPSMITH, "BARKIN" BILL

b. 14 August 1928; Cleveland, MS
d. 23 April 2000; Chicago, IL

The self-taught Smith sang with a gospel quartet in his youth and learned blues from listening to 78s. As a young man in East St. Louis, he made his first stage appearance with Chuck Berry. In Detroit he performed the ballads of Arthur Prysock, Nat King Cole, and others in working-class taverns.

He moved to Chicago in the late 1950s and honed his skills as a singing bartender at the Cougar Club. Working at the Cotton Club at Clybourn and Weed, he acquired the nickname "Barkin'" Bill from bandmate Homesick James Williamson, perhaps for the high-pitched catch in his voice at the end of a vocal phrase, or for his comic lechery from the bandstand. Debonair and graceful despite his meager circumstances, he publicly gave credit to the women who raised him. Smith sang on Maxwell Street and for decades did the rounds of clubs, making stand-up appearances with the bands of Elmore James, Kansas City Red, Hound Dog Taylor, Little Walter, Lonnie Brooks, Eddie C. Campbell, and others, though he apparently rarely held a gig himself.

He appeared on a Wolf anthology in 1987 and reportedly recorded a single with bassist and singer Hayes Ware. Smith appeared regularly with guitarist Dave Specter and recorded on his 1991 Delmark recording Bluebird Blues, after which Smith began securing regular gigs, including one he held several years at Shaw's Crab House. In 1994 Smith returned to Delmark with guitarist Steve Freund to record Gotcha!, a fully realized collection of ballads and blues with horn accompaniment that showcased his stylish, mellifluous delivery and jazzy phrasing, which has been likened to that of Joe Williams, Johnny Hartman, and Brook Benton. Throughout the 1990s he enjoyed fairly regular work in Chicago clubs and also appeared at the Long Beach and Chicago blues festivals and toured the western United States and Canada with Sam Lay and Madison Slim.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

Santelli Sharp, Steven. "Chicago Special." Living Blues no. 115 (May/June 1994): 43;
———. "Obituaries." Living Blues no. 154 (November/December 2000): 101.

Discography

Gotcha! (Delmark DE-672).

SMITH, BESSIE

b. 15 April 1894; Chattanooga, TN

d. 26 September 1937; Clarksdale, MS

Bessie Smith was born in Chattanooga, Tennessee, to Laura and William Smith. Her birthday remains uncertain for she came from a large and poor family where records were not kept accurately.

Her father died when she was very young and her mother when she was just nine, leaving the children to take care of themselves. Bessie and her brother Clarence began performing on street corners, with Clarence, an able showman, teaching her to sing and dance. Another early influence on Bessie's magisterial style was a long forgotten and unrecorded singer called Cora Fisher. After Clarence joined the Moses Stokes Minstrel Show, Bessie continued performing for pennies with another brother, Andrew.

Then Clarence obtained her an audition with the minstrel show and in 1912, Bessie Smith became a professional dancer. It seems unlikely today—Bessie was six feet tall and weighed two hundred pounds in her prime—but she seems to have been popular and she moved on to be a chorus girl and finally a featured singer.

Also working for the troupe at the time Bessie joined was Gertrude “Ma” Rainey, an earthy and superb singer whose work was deeply rooted in the traditional country blues. Different accounts give different versions of the relationship between the two—one story even claims Ma and her husband Will kidnapped the girl and forced to her perform. It's far more likely that Ma taught Bessie some of the rudiments of presenting a song and that Bessie learned far more by simply watching the older woman carefully. In any event, when Bessie began recording, she included a number of Ma Rainey songs, and Ma's influence is clear in the way Bessie created new songs from familiar tunes or simply adapted existing ones by emphasizing a slightly different pitch than usual. Whereas Ma was down to earth and used lots of traditional material reworked for small blues band or jazz group accompaniment, Bessie added a vaudeville or cabaret element that expanded her appeal outside Rainey's core audience.

Bessie was an established name among southern black audiences by the time she moved to Philadelphia in 1921. She had traveled the South to tent shows and decrepit theatres and had her first press notice in the Chicago Defender of May 25, 1918. She was also the headliner in the revue Liberty Bell and starred with pianist Clarence Williams in How Come with soprano sax giant Sidney Bechet as a Chinese laundryman. It was then Frank Walker of Columbia Records sent Williams to sign Bessie for Columbia.

Stories persist that she auditioned for a number of record companies including Edison, Emerson, Black Swan, and Okeh, all of whom rejected her. In retrospect it seems a stunning error, on a level with British Decca rejecting the Beatles, but these were the days when the young Louis Armstrong had to be moved away from recording horns for fear his sheer power would make the cutting stylus jump. Bessie's enormous, dynamic voice and strong accent were like no other and far removed from the light theatre singers who had gone before, and the verdict was that she was too loud and rough. The usually canny Thomas Edison even declared her voice “no good.”

The discographies list one unissued title, “I Wish I Could Shimmy Like My Sister Kate” recorded for Okeh in January 1923, but it was Frank Walker who had the foresight to tie her to a one-year contract. He recalled later how she had arrived in New York for the recording sessions looking “tall, and fat and scared,” which is possibly why her first two sides were rejected.

Bessie Smith performing at the Apollo Theatre, New York City, in 1936. This is the only known performance photo of Smith. (Image courtesy Frank Driggs Collection)

But the next day she cut two songs that made up the biggest selling 78 of her career—"Down Hearted Blues," written by singer Alberta Hunter, and "Gulf Coast Blues," by the ubiquitous Williams. The coupling sold an estimated eight hundred thousand copies, and this in a market that had scarcely begun to open up. Bessie subsequently recorded around 160 sides of different kinds for Columbia but never repeated this success.

For some reason, many of Bessie's recordings were accompanied by piano only, which was, presumably, to put all the focus on the voice. But although that might have worked in live performance, on records the results were often disappointing. In so many cases, what could have been an incisive cutting-edge performances are left to Bessie's imperious vocals while the pianists—Fletcher Henderson, Irving Johns, and Porter Grainger—plod along monotonously at a funereal tempo. However, she is at her unrestrained best on the joyous "Cake Walking Babies (From Home)" (1925) with a unit from the Henderson orchestra.

Bessie Smith had a strong assertive personality and a vicious temper, and in the new freedom of the 1920s, she was a hard drinker, fighter, and regular lover of both men and women. She made no secret of her sexual involvement with chorus girls, and her niece, Ruby Walker, recalled her sleeping openly with a dancer called Lillian in early 1927. Yet in 1923, she married a man named Jack Gee, who later tried to exploit the relationship. The marriage was often violent. On one occasion, when Bessie caught Jack with a chorus girl, she beat up the girl and threw her off a train and chased Gee down the tracks shooting at him. Echoes of the relationship, which ended in separation, can be heard in the lyrics of "Please Help Get Him Off My Mind" (1928). It was recorded at the same session as her poignant lament for her drinking, "Me and My Gin."

Bessie was also utterly intolerant of racial prejudice and made no attempt to ingratiate herself into white society. She had the occasional white friend such as Walker and New York socialites the Van Vechtens, but distrusted and disliked most others. In the theaters, she was ferociously territorial, refusing to appear with other blues singers (Walker managed to persuade her to twice record with Clara Smith but her singing shows her disdain for the proceedings), and she was not above absconding with a show's props and costumes, leaving the cast and crew penniless and stranded.

Her career on record lasted ten years and she recorded with some of the best musicians around—Louis Armstrong, James P. Johnson, Don Redman, Charlie Green, Coleman Hawkins, and many more—but many of the songs are in the popular form rather than blues. Yet there were plenty of examples of the truly great Bessie in her prime—the extraordinarily intense "Hateful Blues" from 1924, the magnificent duets with Armstrong (1925), "Trombone Cholly" with Charlie Green (1927), or the way she transmutes the double entendres of "Empty Bed Blues" into a moving, nostalgic lament. And "Nobody Knows You When You're Down and Out" from 1929 could almost be seen as her epitaph. That same year she starred in the Kenneth Adams–W. C. Handy film short St. Louis Blues with James P. Johnson, Thomas Morris, Joe Smith, and the Hall Johnson Choir. It is the only film footage of her that survives.

But the classic blues era was over and Columbia dropped her in 1931. She recorded once more in a John Hammond all-star session in 1933 with Benny Goodman, Jack Teagarden, and Chu Berry and sounds as relaxed and gin soaked as on all her later records when her voice had become rougher and more passionate.

She continued to perform in the South but in September 1937 was involved in a car accident close to Clarksdale, Mississippi. John Hammond claimed she bled to death because she was refused treatment because of racial prejudice but later admitted he was wrong. In fact, she was treated by a doctor on the spot and in hospital but was too badly hurt to survive. The myth continued largely thanks to a 1959 play by Edward Albee, The Death of Bessie Smith. She is remembered in the Bessie Smith Hall in Chattanooga's African American Museum.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

- AMG (Scott Yanow); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Albertson, Chris. Bessie. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2003.
 ———. Liner notes to The Complete Recorded Works (1991–1996, Columbia/Legacy C2K-47091, -47471, -47474, -52838, -57546).
 Richter, Clifford, editor, with Chris Albertson, Gunther Schuller, and George N. Terry. Bessie Smith: Empress of the Blues. New York: Schirmer Books; London: Collier Macmillan, 1975.

Discography: DGR

Selected Recordings in Reissue

- Bessie Smith: The Complete Recorded Works* (1991–1996, Columbia/Legacy C2K-47091, -47471, -47474, -52838, -57546).
Bessie Smith: The Complete Recordings (Frog, UK, DGF40-DGF47).

SMITH, BOSTON

SMITH, BOSTON

b. 1907; Texas

d. 22 December 1989; Dallas, TX

Pianist; brother of Buster Smith. He was taught piano by Doug Finnell and was active in Dallas his entire life. His most notable associations were with Buster Smith and Lil' Son Jackson, including the latter's 1951–1953 recordings.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Burke, Tony. "Boston Smith" [obituary]. Blues and Rhythm no. 50 (March 1990): 22.

SMITH, BUSTER

b. Henry Franklin Smith, 24 August 1904; Alford (or Alsdorf), TX

d. 10 August 1991; Dallas, TX

Influential saxophonist and big band arranger. His career through the early 1940s was in early big bands, including those led by Walter Page, Bennie Moten, Count Basie, and Benny Carter. His postwar activity was mostly in Dallas, leading his Heatwave of Swing orchestra and providing accompaniment to local appearances by T-Bone Walker, Pee Wee Crayton, Big Joe Turner, and Lowell Fulson, among others.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin; New Grove Jazz

Schuller, Tim. "Buster Smith" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 89 (November/December 1989): 17.

Discography: Lord

SMITH, BYTHER

b. April 17, 1932; Monticello, MS

Byther Smith's raw, insistent blues offers no hints of the country-western he first played as a teen roustabout entertaining nearby cowboys. Orphaned as a boy, Smith was raised by an aunt and uncle before setting out on his own doing construction work at age fifteen. It was while working in construction that some neighboring farmhands taught him to play upright bass, and he found he could make money playing country-western dances. When he showed an interest in boxing, his aunt bought him an electric bass to try to encourage a career in music instead.

In 1956, Smith and his wife, Etta Mae, moved to Chicago at the urging of his cousin, J. B. Lenoir, where he found gigs playing bass in a jazz combo. By the early 1960s, he had picked up a regular job as rhythm guitarist for Otis Rush, but only after having received instruction on guitar from Robert Lockwood. In the early 1970s, he joined Junior Wells's band, and in the late 1970s, he toured with George "Harmonica" Smith and Big Mama Thornton.

It was in the 1980s that Smith finally established himself as a leader in his own right. In 1983, he recorded Tell Me How You Like It for the Grits label, which led to opportunities to tour Europe. Recording sessions in Europe built on his newfound momentum, and Smith spent the remainder of the decade touring and recording on small labels. The 1993 release of I'm a Mad Man on Rounder's Bullseye Blues subsidiary finally put Smith in the national limelight, where he has comfortably remained.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin; Santelli

Lipscomb, Mark, and Barbara Anderson. "Byther Smith: Come to Me Overnight, Something Like a Dream." Living Blues no. 97 (May/June 1991): 25–30.

Discography: AMG

Tell Me How You Like It (1983, Grits 100).

I'm a Mad Man (1993, Bullseye Blues/Rounder 9527).

Throw Away the Book (2004, Black and Tan 17).

SMITH, CARRIE

b. 25 August 1941; Fort Gaines, GA

Vocalist. Her secular career began in 1970 with Big Tiny Little. Thereafter, she performed "classic blues" extensively with touring jazz groups, including at European festivals and on recordings (for example, Do Your Duty, 1976, Black & Blue 33.103), continuing into the twenty-first century, including frequent work with Bross Townsend.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris

Deffaa, Chip. "Carrie Smith." Mississippi Rag xviii, no. 2 (1990):19.

Discography: AMG

SMITH, CLARA

b. 1894; Spartanburg, SC
 d. 3 February 1935; Detroit, MI

Singer of the 1920s "classic blues" era whose trademark was low, gloomy moans on such blues as "Awful Moaning Blues." From 1923 through 1932 she recorded for Columbia. She continued performing until a fatal heart attack in 1935.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Chilton; Harris; Larkin; New Grove; Santelli; Southern

Discography: DGRSMITH, CLARENCE "PINE TOP"

b. 11 January 1904; Orion, AL
 d. 15 March 1929; Chicago, IL

Clarence "Pinetop" Smith was born in Orion, Alabama, on January 11, 1904, and in his teens moved to Birmingham, Alabama, which at that time had a strong blues piano tradition. As a pianist, he was soon proficient enough to appear on the TOBA circuit, accompanying such artists as Butterbeans and Susie, Ma and Pa Rainey, and Coot Grant and Sox Wilson. He was discovered, playing in a Pittsburgh club, by Cow Cow Davenport, who was a record company talent scout as well as an outstanding pianist. In about 1924 he moved to Chicago where, with his wife and two children, he moved into an apartment at 4435 Prairie Avenue on South Parkway near to fellow pianists Meade "Lux" Lewis and Albert Ammons.

In 1928 he was contacted by record executive Mayo Williams, who arranged for him to record for Vocalion the songs and piano solos for which he is justifiably famous. The titles cut at his first four sessions were never issued, but Williams persevered and ultimately Smith produced eleven classic sides (including three alternate takes). Two months later, on March 15, 1929, he was dead. According to the police file, Smith was attending a dance in a hall at 10002 Orleans Street when one of the dancers created a disturbance by pulling out the shirt tails of other dancers. A fight broke out, and a shot was fired by a man selling sandwiches and pop. Smith, reputedly an innocent bystander, was hit and although rushed to Cook County Hospital, died soon after arrival. His death certificate states that the cause of death was "Haemorrhage due to gunshot wound in chest fired by gun held in hands of David Bell, now held to Grand Jury on a charge of manslaughter." At his trial Bell was acquitted, claiming that he attempted to stop the fight by firing his gun and that the shooting was accidental.

It has been suggested that Smith may have been a small-time bootlegger, like many others, hustling cheap alcohol. This may explain his "Pine Top" nickname and also the title of "Jump Steady Blues," both expressions having connections with locally distilled liquor.

It seems possible that the original title of the classic "Pine Top's Boogie Woogie" was "Pine Top's Trouble" because that is how the alternate take is introduced by Smith and that is also the title of one of his earlier unissued recordings. The origin of the term boogie (woogie is a reduplication) is obscure, although at this period it probably had sexual connotations. Although he was far from the first to play in this style, Smith's record firmly associated the word in the public's mind with the insistent eight-to-the-bar bass. It is alleged that the melody of "Pine Top's Boogie Woogie" first appeared in sheet music form in Axel Christensen's Symphonic No. 4 published in 1925, and the double-handed trill introduction closely resembles the Hersal Thomas intro to "Special Delivery Blues" by Sippie Wallace (1926). Nevertheless, Smith fashioned these elements into a timeless performance. Played with a light, deft touch, the single note eight-to-the-bar bass has a terrific swing, and Smith's commentary shows that this was music for dancing as well as listening.

The flip side, "Pine Top Blues," has many of the melodic elements of "Pine Top's Boogie" and uses a similar bass and tempo. The mood is different, however, for this is vaudeville, a blues with pathos but not intended to be taken too seriously. Of his other recordings, "Jump Steady Blues" bounces along and uses a walking octave bass to support a variety of elegant, graceful right-hand variations executed with his customary dexterity. "I'm Sober Now" is a vaudeville piece that is interesting for the juxtaposition of "gin-mill" or sentimental passages with more gutsy blues choruses.

Coming from the milieu that produced Meade Lux Lewis, Albert Ammons, and Jimmy Yancey, among others, Smith was on the brink of an illustrious career when he was shot, depriving the world of an exceptional talent.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli; Southern
 Chilton, John. Who's Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.

SMITH, CLARENCE “PINE TOP”

Hall, Bob, and Richard Noblett. “The Birth of the Boogie: I Want All of You to Know—Pine Top’s Boogie Woogie.” Blues Unlimited no. 133 (January/February 1979): 10–11.

Transcriptions

Paparelli, Frank, transcriber. 5 Boogie Woogie Blues Piano Solos by Pine Top Smith. New York: Leeds Music, 1941. (Includes “Pine Top’s Blues,” “Jump Steady Blues,” “I’m Sober Now,” “I Got More Sense Than That,” and “Now I Ain’t Got Nothin’ at All”)

Discography: DGR

SMITH, EFFIE

b. Effie Criner, 1915–1916

d. March 1977; Los Angeles, CA

Singer, record promoter. Smith sang as one of the Three Shades of Rhythm for Lionel Hampton in the 1930s. She recorded in many postwar West Coast blues sessions through 1953. In 1959 with her husband, John Criner, she had a hit comedy single “Dial That Telephone” for the Spot label. She turned to record and artist promotion until shortly before her death from cancer, and she was active in the Hollywood/Beverly Hills chapter of the NAACP.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

“Effie Smith” [obituary]. SOUL: America’s Most Soulful Newspaper (March 28, 1977); reprinted in Living Blues no. 32 (May/June 1977): 6.

Discography: LSF

SMITH, FLOYD

b. 25 January 1917; St. Louis, MO

d. 29 March 1982; Indianapolis, IN

One of the pioneer musicians of the electric guitar. Smith’s reputation was made by his debut session with Andy Kirk and His Clouds of Joy, in 1939, producing his Decca hit, “Floyd’s Guitar Blues,” which exhibited slide playing on the Gibson ES-150. Except during his Army service in World War II, Smith worked with Andy Kirk until 1946.

That year, Smith left the Kirk band and formed a trio with pianist Bill Huff and bassist Booker Collins, performing at the famed DuSable Lounge in Chicago until 1950. His trio recorded a new version of “Floyd’s Guitar Blues” for Hy-Tone in 1946. He also recorded for Aristocrat and recorded two sessions for Decca (1951 and 1952) as a member of combos led by Horace Henderson. During 1953–1957, Smith was a member of Wild Bill Davis’s highly successful organ trio. Smith made an LP in France for Black & Blue in 1972. “Floyd’s Guitar Blues” was frequently recorded by blues guitarists and was copied by Chuck Berry for his “Blues for Hawaiians” (1958).

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Walton, Charles. “Floyd Smith, Guitarist.” Chicago Jazz Institute website <http://www.jazzinchicago.org/Default.aspx?TabID=43&newsType=ArticleView&articleId=107> (accessed January 20, 2005).

Discography: Lord; LSF

SMITH, GEORGE “HARMONICA”

b. 22 April 1924; Helena, AR

d. 2 October 1983; Los Angeles, CA

George Smith began playing harmonica at age four and worked with a country band while in his early teens. He hoboed throughout the South from the late 1930s through the 1940s, frequently playing on the streets. He moved to Chicago in 1951 and worked with Muddy Waters and Otis Rush, and he patterned his exceptional harmonica style after Little Walter and pop/classical harmonicist Larry Adler. Smith was considered by many to be one of the greatest blues chromatic harmonica players. He recorded numerous sides for RPM in the mid-1950s, including “Telephone Blues.” He relocated to Los Angeles in 1955 and became an important figure on the West Coast blues scene, influencing many local musicians, such as William Clarke and Rod Piazza.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

AMG (Michael Erlewine); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli

Aldin, Mary Katherine, William Clarke, and Jim O’Neal. “George ‘Harmonica’ Smith.” Living Blues no. 58 (Winter 1983/1984): 49, 51.

Discography: AMG; LSF

SMITH, HUEY “PIANO”

b. 26 January 1934; New Orleans, LA

Huey “Piano” Smith grew up listening to blues and gospel music in New Orleans and began playing the piano at age fifteen. In 1950 he began playing clubs with Guitar Slim and quickly became a popular session pianist. He can be heard on recordings by Smiley Lewis, Lloyd Price, and Little Richard from the early 1950s. During this time Smith also worked with guitarist Earl King. In the mid-1950s Smith formed his own group, the Clowns, which included popular local blues singer and female impersonator Bobby Marchan on lead vocals.

In 1957 Smith and the Clowns signed with the Ace label and scored a top five R&B hit with “Rockin’ Pneumonia and the Boogie Woogie Flu.” It was in 1958 that Smith recorded the double-sided “Don’t You Just Know It”/“High Blood Pressure” that would prove to be his biggest hit, reaching the pop top ten and the R&B top five. In 1959 Smith recorded the original “Sea Cruise.” Seeking more pop radio play, Ace had white teenage R&B singer Frankie Ford overdub a vocal onto Smith’s backing track, which made the song a hit nationwide.

Afterward, Smith recorded a few more novelty songs in an attempt to re-create the success of “Rockin’ Pneumonia”; some even utilized the same type of illness joke, such as “Tu-Ber-Cu-Lucas and the Sinus Blues.” Unfortunately, it didn’t work, and Marchan left the Clowns in 1960 after scoring a hit with “There Is Something on Your Mind.” He was replaced by female singer Gerri Hall and male vocalist Curley Moore. After switching briefly to Imperial records, Smith returned to Ace to record one last chart single entitled “Pop Eye” in 1962. In 1964 Smith switched to the Instant label and spent the rest of the decade touring with the Clowns and other alternative groups such as the Huey’s and the Pitter Patters. By 1970, after being unable to return to the charts, Smith retired from music permanently and converted to the Jehovah’s Witnesses religion.

ROBERT SORICELLI

Bibliography

- AMG (Steve Huey); Larkin; Santelli
 Berry, Jason, Jonathan Foose, and Tad Jones. “Huey ‘Piano’ Smith and Guitar Slim.” Living Blues no. 72 (1986): 14–22.
 Cocks, Jay. “Huey ‘Piano’ Smith’s Rock and Roll Revival.” In Stranded: Rock and Roll for a Deserted Island, edited by Greil Marcus. pp. 148-160. New York: Alfred A. Knopf.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

SMITH, J. B.

b. Johnnie B. Smith, ca. 1917; Unknown location

d. Unknown

Johnnie B. Smith was perhaps the last link to the old tradition of prison songs and hollers. Mainly known as a worksong leader, Smith sang unaccompanied for folklorist Bruce Jackson at the Ramsey Prison Farm in Texas in the mid-1960s while serving a forty-five-year sentence for murder. Smith’s nine compositions—three of which were originally issued on Takoma—contain a closely knit total of 132 stanzas, which are partly new and partly traditional. The latter are often drawn from earlier blues recordings and retain a typical blues flavor.

The songs present melodies that are more or less the same but at different tempos and with a sometimes estranging yet poetically very effective ABB’A’ verse structure, which adds further meaning to the treatment of subjects such as imprisonment, injustice, hopelessness, the passing of time, and so on seen from both an individual and communal perspective. In 1967 Smith was paroled and took up preaching in Amarillo, Texas, but was later jailed again for breaking his parole.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

- Larkin
 Jackson, Bruce. Wake Up Dead Man. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1999.

Discography: LSFP

SMITH, JOHN T.

Active 1920s–ca. 1940

Texas singer and guitarist who recorded as “Funny Paper Smith” and “Howling Wolf” in 1930–1931. It is believed he was jailed for a murder, and he died while imprisoned.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- AMG (Jason Ankeny); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
 Weinstock, Ron. “Funny Paper Smith.” Alley Music 1, no. 5 (May 1970):1–2.

Discography: DGR

SMITH, LUCIUS

b. 9 November 1884; Panola County, MS
d. 18 May 1980; Sardis, MS

Self-taught traditional musician (banjo, drums, kazoo) and blues singer. Smith received banjo lessons from multi-instrumentalist Sid Hemphill (1876–1963), with whom he played for fifty-four years. They were first recorded at Sledge in 1942 for the Library of Congress and again at Senatobia, Mississippi, in 1959. After Hemphill's death in 1963, Smith had nobody to play music with, but he was recorded again at Sardis in 1971 at age seventy nine. The birth and death data here are from his obituary in the Memphis Commercial Appeal newspaper, as reported in turn in Living Blues.

Smith had removed the first four frets of his instrument, using a high bridge, fretless neck, neutral third in the tuning. His playing represents a very early banjo style with a high degree of percussion and syncopation. He employs both the downstroke "frailing" technique as well as flat finger picking with thumb and index finger, as on "New Railroad" (1971). As a vocalist Smith speaks rather than sings the words, preferring to let his banjo "do the talking."

RAINER E. LOTZ

Bibliography

"Lucius Smith" [obituary]. Memphis Commercial Appeal (1980); cited in Living Blues no. 46/47 (Summer 1980): 32.

Discography

Evans, D. Afro-American Folk Music from Tate and Panola Counties, Mississippi (2000, Library of Congress Archive of Folk Culture, Rounder Records 18964-1515-2).

SMITH, MAMIE

b. 26 May 1883; Cincinnati, OH
d. 16 August 1946; New York City, NY

Mamie Smith is credited with being the first black vocalist to record a blues song, Perry Bradford's "Crazy Blues," on August 10, 1920.

Life

Smith began her professional career while still a child in her hometown of Cincinnati, Ohio, as a member of the Four Dancing Mitchells. As a teenager, she later joined Salem Tutt-Whitney's The Smart Set. Before the age of thirty, Smith was working in Harlem as a dancer, chorus girl, and cabaret singer.

In 1920 she met Perry Bradford, a successful composer and singer who had toured nationally on the minstrel circuit. Bradford, along with OKeh Records executive Fred Hager, arranged for Smith to record "That Thing Called Love" and "You Can't Keep a Good Man Down" on February 14, 1920. Following the modest yet encouraging success of these selections, Smith went into the OKeh studios again in August to record Bradford's "Crazy Blues" and "It's Right Here for You." "Crazy Blues" was an immediate success, selling seventy-five thousand copies within the first month of its release and approximately one million within a year, making Smith an instant celebrity.

Smith capitalized on this good fortune by touring the United States for almost a decade. She also recorded approximately one hundred selections in that time. However, the financial hardships of the Great Depression left people with little money for concert going and record buying, and this put an end to Smith's touring and recording career. She attempted a comeback in the early 1940s, appearing in a few films (the most notable being Paradise in Harlem), but her efforts were largely unsuccessful.

She was known for her extravagant lifestyle, and the abrupt end to her success led to significant financial difficulty. Without a hit record since 1923 or a national touring schedule to support her, Smith died almost penniless. She was buried in the Frederick Douglas Memorial Park on Staten Island, New York, without a headstone.

Music

Despite being the first black vocalist to record a blues song, Smith was not a virtuosic blues stylist. Even her most historically significant hit, "Crazy Blues," featured a relatively simple melodic structure. Moreover, her sound comes more out of the vaudeville tradition, often noted for fine enunciation and a polished performance but also for a lack of emotional connection with the lyrics (as heard on "That Thing Called Love," a vaudeville-style ballad). Many of the female artists associated with the classic blues style of the 1920s who also had an extensive vaudeville background have been similarly critiqued. Generally acknowledged as having a noteworthy stage presence, Smith's continued success throughout the decade may have ultimately had more to do with her live performances than her recording credentials.

The musical accompaniment to Smith's brand of blues demonstrated a comparable affinity for stage performance, featuring standardized forms and polished arrangements. Even her backing bands were sophisticated, filled with professional jazz musicians from the vaudeville touring circuit (as heard on "Jenny's Ball" and "Don't Advertise Your Man"). From her earliest recordings with the Jazz Hounds (as heard on "Fare Thee Honey Blues" and "Don't Care Blues"), Smith featured talented individuals such as cornetist Johnny Dunn, pianist Willie "The Lion" Smith, violinist George Bell, and clarinetist William "Buster" Bailey. The trend of keeping her bands filled with talented musicians continued throughout her career. Among the notable musicians who backed Smith were saxophonists Coleman Hawkins and Sydney Bechet, trumpeters Ward Pinkett and Bill Dillard, cornetist Bubber Miley, and trombonist Jimmy Archey.

Influence

In addition to being the first black vocalist to record the blues, Smith's phenomenal success with "Crazy Blues" amply demonstrated the financial viability of the black recording market. This led to the widespread recruitment and promotion of black blues singers (particularly females) in the 1920s, many of whom were important figures in the development of the classic blues. Though often overlooked by historians, the success of these ladies may have paved the way for many of their male counterparts in the late 1920s.

Due to her erratic behavior in public, her extravagant spending habits, and stories of her many love affairs, Smith's turbulent and risqué lifestyle was highly publicized. She capitalized on this publicity by cultivating a lavish stage appearance replete with sequins, rhinestones, and peacock feathers. Further, through the colorful antics of her private life presented in the gossip columns and her distinctive stage appearance, Smith played a significant role in contributing to the archetypal "Queen of the Blues" persona.

JEFF JONES

Bibliography

- AMG (Richard S. Ginell); Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
Chilton, John. Who's Who of Jazz: Storyville to Swing Street. 4th ed. London: Macmillan; New York: Da Capo, 1985.
Davis, Francis. The History of the Blues. New York: Hyperion, 1995.

- Harrison, Daphne D. Black Pearls: Blues Queens of the 1920s. London: Rutgers University Press, 1988.
Obrecht, Jas. "Mamie Smith: The First Lady of the Blues." Blues Revue no. 17 (May/June 1995): 21–24.
Stewart-Baxter, Derrick. Ma Rainey and the Classic Blues Singers. New York: Stein and Day, 1970.
Wild Women Don't Have the Blues. Directed by Christine Dall. San Francisco, CA: California Newsreel, 1989.

Discography: AMG; DGR

Selected Recordings

- "Crazy Blues" (1920, OKeh 4169-A); "Don't Care Blues" (1920, OKeh 4253-B); "Fare Thee Honey Blues" (1920, OKeh 4194-B); "It's Right Here for You" (1920, OKeh 4169-B); "That Thing Called Love" (1920, OKeh 4113-A); "You Can't Keep a Good Man Down" (1920, OKeh 4113-B); "Lady Luck Blues" (1923, OKeh 4926); "Good Time Ball (1924, Ajax 17058); "Goin' Crazy with the Blues" (1926, Victor 20210-A); "Don't Advertise Your Man" (1931, OKeh 8864); "Jenny's Ball" (1931, OKeh 8915).

SMITH, MOSES "WHISPERING"

- b. 25 January 1932; West Brookhaven, MS
d. 28 April 1984; Baton Rouge, LA

A singer with a powerful and hoarse voice, Whispering Smith with his down-home harp playing has graced many sessions by fellow Louisiana swamp bluesmen Silas Hogan and Lightnin' Slim. He also recorded under his own name several sides on 45s and anthologies as well as an uneven album. He also toured frequently in Europe, drawing a strong following there.

GÉRARD HERZHAFT

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Leadbitter, Mike, and John Broven. "Behind the Sun." Blues Unlimited no. 74 (July 1970): 4–10.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

- Louisiana Blues* (1997, Arhoolie CD 9004).
Swamp Blues (1998, Ace CD 661).

SMITH, ROBERT CURTIS

- b. 1930; Mississippi

Guitarist and singer influenced by Bill Broonzy. He was discovered in Wade Walton's barbershop in Clarksdale, Mississippi. He recorded an LP for Bluesville/Prestige in 1963, and excerpts of his playing were included on the Arhoolie anthology I Have to Paint My Face. It is said he turned to religion in 1969.

SMITH, ROBERT CURTIS

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Larkin

Discography: LSFP

SMITH, TALMADGE “TAB”

b. 11 January 1909; Kinston, NC

d. 17 August 1971; St. Louis, MO

Soprano and alto saxophonist in jazz and jump-blues. His first career phase through World War II was in big bands, often with Lucky Millinder. His postwar phase was in jump-blues and rhythm and blues, recording for the United label in 1951–1957. He retired to St. Louis, Missouri, in the early 1960s. His United sessions have been reissued on the Delmark label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Scott Yanow); Larkin

Discography: AMG; Lord

SMITH, TRIXIE

b. 1895; Atlanta, GA

d. 21 September 1943; New York City, NY

Smith attended Selma University in Selma, Alabama. She moved to New York in 1915 and began a career as a vaudeville and TOBA circuit singer. From 1922 through 1938 she recorded for the Black Swan, Paramount, and Decca labels. After 1940, she performed less often, sometimes for charity benefits.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; New Grove Jazz; Santelli

Discography: DGR

SMITH, WILLIE “BIG EYES”

b. 19 January 1936; Helena, AR

Smith's influences included listening to 78s and to KFFA King Biscuit radio shows, some of which were broadcast from Helena's Miller Theater, where he saw Joe Willie Wilkins, Rice Miller, and also Muddy Waters, whose band he would later join.

On a Chicago visit in 1953 his mother took him to hear Waters at the Zanzibar, where Henry Strong's harp playing inspired him to learn that instrument. He remained in Chicago and soon formed a band with Clifton James and Bobby Lee Burns. As “Little Willie” Smith he played in the Rocket Four, led by “Big Boy” Spires.

He played harmonica on Bo Diddley sessions that produced “Diddey Wah Diddey” (1955) and “Who Do You Love” (1956), but after seeing Fred Below play drums, he switched instruments and for a time worked in Little Hudson (Shower)'s Red Devil Trio before drumming in Muddy Waters's “junior band,” which held his gigs while he toured.

In 1959 Waters invited him to record on a tribute to Big Bill Broonzy, which led to more gigs and another Waters session in 1960 before his gaining the full-time chair in 1961. He left in the mid-1960s to work to support his family, though he continued to record with Waters. During his hiatus he backed Big Walter Horton's Argo sessions that yielded the classics “La Cucaracha” and “Hard Hearted Woman.” Smith returned to Waters's band in 1968 and remained until 1980. During his eighteen-year tenure with Waters, Smith is estimated to have participated in twelve sessions yielding eighty-four tracks, contributing crisp shuffles and his strong backbeat with its seductive lag. In 1980 an economic dispute with Waters led the band to break away. During four years with The Legendary Band, Smith continued to tour internationally and appeared on six albums for Rounder and Ichiban.

In 1995 he recorded Bag Full of Blues for Blind Pig and Blues from the Heart for Juke Joint as a bandleader. Smith has won four Handy awards for his drum work, and his son Kenny Smith is also a fine drummer.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

Gordon, Robert. Can't Be Satisfied: The Life and Times of Muddy Waters. Boston: Little, Brown, 2002.

Tidwell, Emily. “Going Back to Where I Have Been: Calvin Jones and Willie Smith.” Living Blues no. 99 (September/October 1991): 18.

Discography: AMG

SMITH, WILLIE MAE FORD “MOTHER”

b. 1906; Rolling Fork, MS
d. 2 February 1994; St. Louis, MO

Gospel singer Willie Mae Ford Smith moved with her family to St. Louis, Missouri, in 1918. In 1922 she performed with her sisters at the National Baptist Convention. From there she built a career in black sacred music. An important meeting was with Thomas A. Dorsey in 1932, who asked her to assist in the organization of the National Convention of Gospel Choirs and Choruses. Her singing of her song “If You Just Keep Still” is said to have set a new standard in gospel solo performance. She joined the Church of God Apostolic, and her music began to take on a sanctified style. Few recordings of her were made, and then only from the late 1940s and after. In later years she devoted herself to evangelical work.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Discography: AMG; Gospel Records

SMITHER, CHRIS

b. 11 November 1944; Miami, FL

Singer-songwriter-guitarist Chris Smither is a veteran of the 1960s folk explosion, and although never achieving stardom, he has built up a loyal following for his bluesy acoustic music and his rough, gravelly vocals. Raised in New Orleans, Smither dropped out of college to pursue music full time in the mid-1960s. While living and performing in Cambridge, Massachusetts, he briefly shared boarding with Mississippi Fred McDowell and Son House. Smither has been more active in the recording studio since the early 1990s, which has led to his being in demand on the folk circuit.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Skelly, Richard. “Chris Smither: The Intellectual Blues Man.” Sing Out! 37 no. 4 (1993): 20–32.
Tipaldi, Art. “Chris Smither’s River of Song.” Blues Revue no. 46 (April 1999): 20–22.

Discography: AMG

I’m a Stranger Too! (1970, Tomato 2050).
Don’t It Drag On (1972, Tomato 2051).

Happier Blue (1993, HighTone 8095).
Live as I’ll Ever Be (2000, HighTone 8120).

SMOKESTACK LIGHTNING

“Smokestack Lightning,” one of the most widely known blues songs, was written and first recorded by Howlin’ Wolf (Chester Burnett) in 1956 (Chess single #161). The musicians on this recording were Howlin’ Wolf on vocals and harmonica, Hosea Lee Kennar on piano, Willie Johnson and Hubert Sumlin on guitars, Earl Phillips on drums, and Willie Dixon on bass. An earlier song with the same title, also credited to Burnett, was recorded by Muddy Waters in 1954, though it used a different chord structure and shared only a few lines.

The popularity of Howlin’ Wolf’s recording surely owes something to its aural ominousness. Played in the key of E, the song consists essentially of a single chord, delineated by a repetitive riff played on one guitar and shadowed by piano. A second guitarist plays a complementary bass figure. The main guitar riff—which starts the song and is soon joined by drums—begins on the first off-beat of each measure (that is, it begins on the first “and” in a beat pattern of “one and two and three and four and . . .”). The drummer accents the beginning of the riff each time by playing a two-beat snare fill on the off-beat, not a normal practice. An unexpected beat pattern is immediately established that makes the song seem to halt and lurch forward at the same time.

Howlin’ Wolf sings the lyrics with fury. Paralleling the instrumental starkness, he uses only a few notes, mostly E with glides down to D and B and up to G, essentially paralleling the guitar riff. Between the verses he plays harmonica, drawing out an E note and playing a rhythm that also parallels the guitar riff.

Lyricaly the song is fragmented, consisting of short verses loosely around the theme of betrayed love and the singer’s intention to hobo away. A tag is repeated after every verse, as well as a vocalized “whoa-ooo,” Howlin’ Wolf’s well-known howl that is made more ominous by being given extra reverb in the mix. According to statements made by Howlin’ Wolf, the song is about a train, which seems clear in the imagery of a smokestack and the singer’s plea,

Don’t you hear me cryin’?

Stop your train, let a poor boy ride.

The metaphor behind the phrase “smokestack lightning,” however, is elusive. Earlier recorded uses of the image also carry a train association, but one version suggests as well the tolling of funeral, rather than

SMOKESTACK LIGHTNING

train, bells. The Mississippi Sheiks' "Stop and Listen Blues" has the verses Smokestack lightnin', bells that shine like gold . . . I found my baby layin' on the cooling board / Stop and listen, hear the bell that tones; I had a sweet little faro, but she's dead and gone.

Death is also a theme in Lightnin' Hopkins's 1960s recorded version.

Interestingly, Howlin' Wolf doesn't complete the metaphor of bells in his song, only suggesting smokestack lightnin', shining just like gold.

Both the Mississippi Sheiks and Muddy Waters sing that the train bells shine like gold, as does Charlie Patton in his use of similar images and phrases in "Moon Going Down" (1930, Paramount 13014). In a song clearly depicting a train,

Lord, I think I heard that Helena whistle blow,

Patton includes the line,

The smokestack is black, and the bell it shine like gold.

This is the only recorded use of the image that does not use the metaphor of lightning, but instead gives a perhaps more sensible picture of a black smokestack set against a train's shiny gold bells. Patton's line may suggest an older version of the metaphor.

This mystery behind the metaphor is compounded by Lightnin' Hopkins's singing smokes like lightning, perhaps meaning a train speeding as fast as lightning. Nevertheless, the phrase "smokestack lightning" does conjure a picture of a well-stoked, speeding locomotive spewing live embers from its smokestack, a display that at night could have looked like flashes of lightning.

Other artists who recorded the song include Fred McDowell and Butch Cage with Willie Thomas. Howlin' Wolf's recording inspired cover versions by blues revival and rock artists, including the Animals and John Hammond. A popular live recording of the song by the Yardbirds appeared on their British LP Five Live Yardbirds in 1964.

JOSEPH A. LAROSE

SMOKEY BABE

b. Robert Brown, 1927; Itta Bena, MS

d. 1975; Louisiana

A self-taught original guitarist, Louisiana resident Smokey Babe was discovered by Harry Oster, who recorded him for Folk-Lyric (later reissued on Arhoolie), Storyville, and a solo album for Bluesville at the beginning of the 1960s.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Groom, Bob. "Smoky Babe: Hottest Brand Goin'." Blues & Rhythm no. 96 (February 1995): 8–10.

Oster, Harry. Liner notes to Smoky Babe/Herman E. Johnson: Louisiana Country Blues (1996, Arhoolie CD 440).

Discography: LSFP

SMOTHERS, ABRAHAM "LITTLE SMOKEY"

b. 2 January 1939; Tchula, MS

Smothers first played on a broom wire (see the Diddley Bow entry) before learning his brother's guitar. He traveled to Chicago in 1956 and within two years was playing and recording as a member of Howlin' Wolf's band, following in the footsteps of older brother Otis ("Big Smokey"), who had preceded him to both Chicago and Wolf's band. Also like "Big Smokey," he was briefly a member of Muddy Waters's band.

Smokey fraternized with such musician peers as Magic Sam, Shakey Jake, Bo Diddley, Otis Rush, Leo Wilson, Syl Johnson, and his cousins Lester Davenport and Lee Shot Williams. Unlike his brother, "Little Smokey" favored a jazzier sound and recruited horn players for his showband, which played the Blue Flame, Club Tay May, Pepper's, and the Playhouse.

Harmonicist Paul Butterfield joined Smother's band after sitting in at the Blue Flame and shortly after was working with them in Old Town. An Offer You Can't Refuse, released on Red Lightnin, features material recorded at Big John's in 1963. Smothers, however, in what is now seen as a gross injustice, was replaced by Michael Bloomfield before the landmark Paul Butterfield Blues Band recording for Elektra in 1965, which introduced many young whites to the blues.

Smothers continued to appear locally and toured with Earl Hooker and later with Jimmy Rogers and The Legendary Blues Band, but gave up music for a time to raise his family.

He recorded with Mojo Buford and Lee Shot Williams, but apart from a 1979 Big Bear American Blues Legends tour LP (recorded before a tour he actually missed), it wasn't until Bossman on Black Magic in 1993 that Smothers had a recording as a bandleader. In 1996 Smothers followed it with Second Time Around on the German Crosscut label.

He has been a guest on the shows and recordings of his former student and Butterfield bandmember Elvin Bishop, and in 2000 they shared billing on Alligator's That's My Partner.

Smothers is recognized as a powerful singer and an incendiary and knowledgeable guitarist, and in addition to Elvin Bishop, he has been an influence to Jumpin' Willie Cobbs, Illinois Slim, and Billy Flynn.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Larkin
Brisbin, John Anthony. "They'll Smell My Onions." Living Blues no. 112 (December 1993): 22.
Wisner, Steve. "'Smokey' Smothers: Big Otis & Little Abe." Living Blues no. 37 (March/April 1978): 18.

Discography: AMG

- Elvin Bishop & Little Smokey Smothers. That's My Partner! (Alligator ALCD 4874).
Little Smokey Smothers. Bossman (Black Magic BMCD9022).

SMOTHERS, OTIS "BIG SMOKEY"

- b. 21 March 1929; Lexington, MS
d. 23 July 1993; Chicago, IL

Chicago bluesman Otis "Big Smokey" Smothers, older brother of Abraham "Little Smokey" Smothers, was raised in Tchula, Mississippi, and was first inspired to be a musician by hearing his aunt play guitar. Although forbidden to listen to blues, Smothers would sneak off to hear Aleck Miller "Sonny Boy Williamson II" and Elmore James in local juke joints.

He moved to Chicago at age seventeen and quickly immersed himself in its vibrant blues scene. By the early 1950s, he was playing in a variety of bands, which often included Henry Strong, Good Rockin' Charles, and Joe Carter, frequently performing under the name The Muddy Waters Junior Band. Smothers recorded as a sideman for Chess in the mid- to late 1950s and in 1956 joined Howlin' Wolf's band and recorded with the group on several sessions. In 1960, Smothers signed with the Federal label and recorded some excellent original Chicago blues in the vein of Waters and Jimmy Reed. His cleverly quirky and often humorous songwriting was showcased on gems such as "Give It Back" and "I've Been Drinking Muddy Water."

Throughout the 1960s, Smothers worked as a sideman with a number of musicians, including Waters and Little Walter. A casualty of the decreasing popularity of Chicago blues during the 1970s, he worked mainly outside music throughout the decade. By the early 1980s, Smothers began gigging around Chicago again and recorded for Rooster, Wolf, and Red Beans. Unfortunately, with his career in resurgence, he was diagnosed with lung cancer and succumbed to the disease at age sixty four.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Wisner, Steve. "Smokey Smothers: Big Otis & Little Abe." Living Blues no. 37 (March/April 1978): 18–20.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

- Smokey Smothers Sings Back Porch Blues* (2000, Official CD 779).

SNOW, EDDIE

- b. 9 March 1921; Corona, TN
d. 21 November 1998; Springfield, IL

Singer and pianist. Eddie Snow was influenced by Memphis Slim, whom he heard in his father's juke joint. He began playing piano as a child, performing professionally as a teenager. After World War II he participated in the blues activities in Memphis, West Memphis, Osceola, Arkansas, and Cairo, Illinois. He recorded for Sun label in 1952–1955. He was mostly inactive in music from the mid-1960s through the 1970s, but he returned to performing in the 1980s, often with guitarist Floyd Murphy.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Baumgartner, Brian. "Partnership in the Blues: Eddie Snow and Floyd Murphy." Juke Blues no. 42 (Autumn 1998): 14–21.
"Eddie Snow" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 144 (March/April 1999): 72.

Discography: LSFP

SOILEAU, FLOYD

- b. 2 November 1938; Ville Platte, LA

Record producer and entrepreneur. Since 1956, he has owned Floyd's Record Shop in Ville Platte,

SOILEAU, FLOYD

Louisiana. He began his first label, Big Mamou, in 1957, issuing singles on the new 45-rpm disc format instead of the outgoing 78-rpm format, which attracted regional musicians to him. Speaking French and English, he has been well positioned to bring Cajun, Creole, and zydeco music to records, especially on the Maison du Soul label established in 1973. All of his labels (ten as of 1991) are managed through his Flat Town Music Company.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Tighe, James. "The House of Zydeco." Living Blues no. 98 (July/August 1991): 23–26.
Flat Town Music Company website, <http://www.flattownmusic.com/>.

SOLBERG, JAMES

b. 8 June 1951; Superior, WI

Electric guitarist. After starting in Wisconsin, he began working in the 1970s through the 1980s with Sam Lay, Luther Allison, and John Lee Hooker. His most prominent work as a sideman was as songwriter and second guitarist on Allison's Alligator CDs in the 1990s. He has recorded several highly regarded releases under his own name for the MP and Ruf labels.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)

Discography: AMG (Richard Skelly)

SOLOMON, CLIFFORD

b. 17 January 1931; Los Angeles, CA
d. 21 June 2004; Los Angeles, CA

Tenor/alto/soprano saxophonist. Solomon worked with Lionel Hampton, Charles Brown (1950–1952 and 1954–1955), Roy Milton (1956–1957), and Johnny Otis (1969–1970), for Ray Charles (1974–1987) and Johnny Otis (1988–1990). Recorded as Clifford "King" Solomon in 1953. He rejoined Charles Brown in 1990.

HOWARD RYE

Bibliography

Weinstock, Ron. "Clifford Solomon." Living Blues no. 118 (November/December 1994): 25.

SONS OF BLUES, THE (THE S.O.B. BAND)

A Chicago-based electric blues and R&B band that formed in the mid-1970s. The band was initially composed of the sons of fairly prominent blues musicians; guitarist Lurrie Bell was the son of harpist Carey Bell, and bassist Freddie Dixon was the son of bassist/composer Willie Dixon. The group also included Billy Branch on harmonica and Jeff Ruffin on drums (though Garland Whiteside played drums at the first gig in which the band performed together). The band formed partly out of a suggestion by Jim O'Neal, then editor of Living Blues magazine, to take a band to perform at the 1977 Berlin Jazz Festival.

Alligator Records included the Sons of Blues on two anthology releases in the late 1970s and early 1980s. In 1982, Billy Branch was the only remaining member of the group, as Bell and Dixon had left for other bands. Branch added bassist J. W. Williams (formerly of the Chi-Town Hustlers), drummer Mose Rutues, and guitarist Carlos Johnson to carry on the Sons of Blues name. Johnson was soon replaced by Carl Weathersby. The slightly renamed Sons of Blues/Chi-Town Hustlers recorded their first album, Where's the Money, in 1984 for the Red Beans label. In 1997, Weathersby left the group. Though the band has gone through a number of personnel changes, it continues to perform.

GREG JOHNSON

Bibliography

Larkin; Santelli

Discography

Where's My Money? (1984, Red Beans RB-004).

See also Bell, Lurrie; Branch, William Earl "Billy"; Weathersby, Carl

SONY/LEGACY/COLUMBIA/ EPIC/OKEH

Among this family of five labels, Columbia has the longest and most distinguished history. On the strength of the jazz artists signed by John Hammond in the 1930s, the company became a jazz giant throughout the 1940s and into the 1950s, at one point having on its roster Duke Ellington, Miles Davis, Dave Brubeck, and Louis Armstrong, as well as eventually signing Charles Mingus and Thelonious Monk. Okeh was revived as the subsidiary for blues, R&B, and country music, and eventually Epic also became a site for some jazz and blues sessions.

But with the changing nature of the recording industry from a leisure time entity being operated by music lovers into a multinational profit-making enterprise, Columbia has gradually evolved from being a label known for adventurous signings and ambitious releases into one that signs only polished and established performers and then helps them further that success. To that end, Ellington, Mingus, Ornette Coleman, and several others were released from Columbia during the Clive Davis years, although they made a major comeback for other labels during the 1970s. Besides the electric edition of Miles Davis, they also had on board the Mahavishnu Orchestra, Weather Report, and Herbie Hancock's Headhunters aggregation.

However, the classic albums by Janis Joplin in 1967–1970 were being kept in print, and Johnny Winter was making his early recordings at this time, including his 1969 double LP set Second Winter. During the 1980s, Columbia introduced Wynton and Branford Marsalis, helping make Wynton the most visible jazz musician of his generation and a multiple Grammy winner as both a jazz and classical performer. Meanwhile, the Epic subsidiary was releasing new albums by Texas blues guitarist Stevie Ray Vaughan throughout the 1980s.

Today, Columbia is owned by Sony and is far more noticeable in terms of jazz and blues for the magnificent reissue program being operated by its Legacy division. Legacy is reissuing the entire Columbia output of Miles Davis, has rereleased numerous classics from other label mainstays, and continues various programs devoted to jazz, soul, country, rock, and blues. Two different OKeh reissue lines have also reissued to domestic availability valuable material from Big Maybelle, the Treniers, and some other vintage artists. The most recent new OKeh album was a 2004 Keb Mo' set. Legacy also had its Roots 'n' Blues reissue series produced by Lawrence Cohn. Among those reissues are the complete recordings of Robert Johnson and of Bessie Smith and the ARC and Columbia performances of Leadbelly, Bukka White, Willie McTell, and Emmett Smith.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Legacy Recordings website, <http://www.legacyrecordings.com/> (accessed February 11, 2005).

Sony website, <http://www.sony.com> (accessed February 11, 2005).

See also Columbia; OKeh

SOUL

Introduction

The word “soul” obviously has its origins in the religious experience. Our soul is that ineffable part of our being that many understand as our core, our essence. It is the soul that churchgoing folk believe survives the corporeal part of our body—our flesh, blood, bones, organs, and brain—and that ascends to heaven upon our death. Just as the soul is understood to represent the essence of a given individual, soul music was understood, implicitly by some, explicitly by others, to represent in some sense the very essence of black culture.

The term was first used in a musical sense to refer to a style of jazz current in the 1950s. An offshoot of hard bop, sometimes later designated “soul jazz,” a few of this style's primary exponents were Horace Silver, Bobby Timmons, and Lee Morgan. The recordings of these musicians, in many senses, can be understood as a return to the musical roots of black culture in response to the increasing complexities of the bebop style originated by Charlie Parker and Dizzy Gillespie in the early and mid-1940s. Consequently, soul jazz drew extensively on techniques, gestures, and at times the repertoire of blues and gospel.

As the 1950s gave way to the 1960s, the term soul began to be used to refer to aspects of African American personality, style, or culture, as in “she's a soul sister,” “he's got soul,” “boy, was that soulful,” and, of course, as an appellation for down-home cooking, “soul food.”

In the 1960s, “soul music” came to designate a set of styles of rhythm and blues, demarcated by region, that were largely rooted in black sacred music, including gospel music that, although having antecedents in the 1950s, came to life at the turn of the decade, peaked in the mid- to late 1960s, and by the mid-1970s was supplanted by funk and disco as the most important contemporary styles of black popular music.

While many styles of postwar black popular music were clearly influenced by black gospel, in the mid- and late 1950s there appeared a handful of records such as “Please Please Please” by James Brown and “What'd I Say” by Ray Charles that in all but lyrical content might as well have come straight out of the church. At the same time, as the 1950s gave way to the 1960s, gospel artists such as Sam Cooke and Aretha Franklin were beginning to sing secular music, helping to lay the seeds for the genre of soul in the 1960s. A discussions of the soul music of the 1960s and 1970s by region follows.

Memphis, Tennessee

Home to Stax Records, Hi Records, and American Sound Studios, as well as lesser concerns such as Goldwax, Pepper, and XL Records, Memphis was the single most important location for what has come to be known as southern soul music. Stax was started in 1958 as Satellite Records, a country and pop label, by fiddler and banker Jim Stewart. The label developed into a soul music powerhouse when in 1960 Stewart relocated his operation to an abandoned movie theatre in a neighborhood whose demographic was rapidly changing from white to black. Although the company subsequently attempted to record pop, rock, and country records sporadically (in addition to jazz, gospel, and black comedy), its importance lies in the soul recordings released on Satellite, Stax, and the Volt, Enterprise, Respect, and Truth subsidiaries between 1960 and 1975.

Stax Records was for all intents and purposes the seat of southern soul. When one hears recordings by artists such as Aretha Franklin on Atlantic or Etta James's mid- and late 1960s Chess recordings cut in Muscle Shoals, Alabama, one is hearing southern soul music as defined by the sound of Stax Records.

While the influence of gospel music is manifest in all of the regional varieties of soul, gospel had a much greater influence on southern soul than it did on the northern styles found in Detroit and Philadelphia. A common southern compositional technique was to simply take a gospel song and, by changing the words, transform it into secular soul music. In the 1950s Ray Charles transformed "I Got Religion" into "I Got a Woman." At Stax, Isaac Hayes and David Porter took "You Don't Know Like I Know What the Lord Has Done for Me" and made it into "You Don't Know Like I Know What that Woman Has Done for Me."

Stax vocalists such as Sam Moore of Sam and Dave, Otis Redding, and Ollie Nightingale quite clearly made much more extensive use of gospel vocal techniques (particularly melismatic decoration and timbral variation) than did most northern singers, and Stax pianists such as Booker T. Jones and Marvell Thomas regularly employed gospel voicings while playing block chords on a triplet grid, such as one would commonly hear in church. Stax songwriters gave the gospel subdominant IV chord much more prominence than did their Motown counterparts, while in turn they regularly minimized their use of the more common secular dominant V chord. Finally, Stax recordings nearly always ended with an extended ad lib outro that would fade while reaching emotional catharsis, emulating a typical gospel recording, where a significant portion of the performance would be devoted to emotional improvising over a repeated riff and chord progression.

Just as the sound of Stax was inextricably tied to the church, the black church was inextricably tied to the Civil Rights Movement. Putting these points of the triangle together, it is safe to say that the sound of southern soul music cannot be understood except as being influenced by, and having an influence on, the Civil Rights era.

It is interesting to note in this regard that, to quote Peter Guralnick in Sweet Soul Music, the sound of Stax and the sound of southern soul in general were born out of the impulse toward integration. Both the Stax rhythm and horn sections (Booker T. and the MGs and the Memphis Horns, respectively) comprised both white and black members. While all were engaged in the creation of African American music, the racial composition of the band invariably meant that a number of pop, rock, and country influences would also play a part in the creation of the Stax sound. Most notable among these are guitarist Steve Cropper's use of open sixth dyads (typically used by country guitarists such as Chet Atkins) and bassist Donald "Duck" Dunn's tendency to craft melodic, contrapuntal bass lines (Paul McCartney being a big influence in this regard).

Precisely summing up the sound on the several hundred recordings issued on Stax and Volt in the 1960s is nigh-on impossible. One can, though, delimit in general terms the main features of the Stax sound in the 1960s, all of which stand in stark contrast to the musical practices of Detroit's Motown Records, Stax's main rival in this period. The Stax sound consisted of (1) an emphasis on bass and drum patterns; (2) the prominent use of horns, which often took the place of background vocals; (3) prearranged horn ensembles, often serving as bridges in place of the more typical "improvised" guitar, keyboard, or sax solos heard on many popular music recordings (this concept was originated by Otis Redding); (4) a "less is more" aesthetic manifested in sparse textures, the absence of ride cymbals on a lot of vocal recordings, unison horn lines, the absence of strings until late 1968, and so on; (5) a mix that placed the vocalist in the middle of the recording rather than way out in front; (6) a prominent gospel influence as heard in the juxtaposition of organ and piano, the extensive use of the IV chord, and, most important, in the deployment by vocalists at Stax of extensive timbral variation, pitch inflection, melismas, and highly syncopated phrasing, all in the service of emotional catharsis; and (7) a delayed back beat. The latter was developed in 1965 by Steve Cropper and drummer Al Jackson, Jr., while working with Wilson Pickett on "(In the Midnight Hour)," in response to a new dance on the scene known as the Jerk, and became a component of virtually every Stax recording through the end of the decade. Jackson would become a leading force at Stax until its demise in the mid-1970s.

The readily identifiable sound of Stax in the 1960s gave way to a disparate array of new and different sounds in the 1970s. Most significant of these were Isaac Hayes's groundbreaking fusion of soul, pop, jazz, classical, and rock on his Hot Buttered Soul, Isaac Hayes Movement, and To Be Continued albums. Charting R&B, pop, jazz, and easy listening, these albums transformed the political economy of the black music industry, contradicting the age-old wisdom that black LPs (as opposed to singles) could not sell in significant numbers. Hayes's breakthrough paved the way for subsequent album-oriented projects by Stevie Wonder, Marvin Gaye, Curtis Mayfield, Funkadelic, and others. In 1971, Hayes pioneered the black soundtrack with the double album Shaft.

A few blocks from Stax was the Royal Recording Studio, home of Hi Records. Hi had also started in the late 1950s but, with the exception of a series of instrumental hits by trumpeter Willie Mitchell, focused on pop, country, and rockabilly records. This changed in the late 1960s when owner Joe Cuoghi put Mitchell in charge of signing and producing R&B talent at Hi. During the next decade, Mitchell perfected an original, distinctive Hi sound on records by Al Green, Ann Peebles, Syl Johnson, Otis Clay, O. V. Wright, and Denise LaSalle (the latter released on Westbound Records) that came to define much of what was great about soul music in the 1970s.

In the wake of the success of both Stax and Hi, a number of smaller labels were started in Memphis. Of these Goldwax, with hits by James Carr and the Ovation, was the most significant. Many of the Goldwax recordings were cut at Chips Moman's American Sound Studios on the north side of Memphis. Moman and the American house band were equally adept at cutting pop, country, soul, and jazz records. Between November 1967 and January 1971, they were responsible for an astonishing 117 chart hits. These included soul records by James Carr, James and Bobby Purify, Oscar Toney, Jr., Wilson Pickett, Bobby Womack, Solomon Burke, the Sweet Inspirations, King Curtis, Joe Tex, Joe Simon, the Masqueraders, Arthur Alexander, and Roy Hamilton.

Alabama

As improbable as it might seem, outside of Memphis the most important region for the recording of southern soul music was the cluster of towns in northern Alabama collectively referred to as Muscle Shoals. Situated on either side of the Tennessee River in the dry counties of Colbert and Lauderdale, neither Florence, Sheffield, Tuscumbia, nor Muscle Shoals itself boasted a music scene to speak of through the late 1950s. That was to change when an eccentric local visionary, Tom Stafford, joined forces with two songwriters from Hamilton, Alabama, Billy Sherrill and Rick Hall, to form FAME (Florence, Alabama, Music Enterprises) Music in 1959. Quickly transforming a doctor's office located above Stafford's father's drugstore into a studio, FAME began to attract an array of aspiring white country, rock, and R&B musicians, including Donnie Fritts, Spooner Oldham, and Dan Penn. The latter two would write soul standards such as "I'm Your Puppet" for James and Bobby Purify and later become important parts of the Memphis music scene, working with Chips Moman at American Sound Studios in the latter half of the 1960s.

The FAME partnership ended in mid-1960, with Rick Hall retaining the name while building a new studio modeled on Nashville's RCA complex in an old tobacco and candy warehouse. In mid-1961 Hall produced "You Better Move On" (later covered by the Rolling Stones) backed with "A Shot of Rhythm and Blues" for local black singer Arthur Alexander, accompaniment being provided by an all-white local rhythm section including future Elvis Presley sidemen drummer Jerry Carrigan and pianist David Briggs. During the next few years Hall produced hits on a freelance basis for Tommy Roe and the Tams. In 1964, he produced "Steal Away" for local gospel singer Jimmy Hughes and issued it on his own Fame label. Shortly after the record broke into the R&B top twenty, the Fame rhythm section quit and went to Nashville. Undeterred, Hall put together a second rhythm section, heavily influenced by Booker T. and the MGs, consisting of drummer Roger Hawkins, bassist David Hood, guitarist Jimmy Johnson, and keyboard player Spooner Oldham. In 1967 when the latter headed to Memphis, Barry Beckett joined what became known as the Muscle Shoals Rhythm Section.

The first southern soul record to reach number one on the pop charts and the first hit recorded by Hall's new rhythm section was Percy Sledge's "When a Man Loves a Woman." Cut in early 1966 at another local studio, Quinvy, the record was picked up by Atlantic for national distribution. Since Stax had closed its doors to outdoor sessions several months earlier, Atlantic immediately turned to Rick Hall and Fame studios for subsequent sessions by Wilson Pickett (“Land of 1000 Dances,” “Mustang Sally”) as well as Aretha Franklin’s first Atlantic session (“I Never Loved a Man,” “Do Right Woman”). After the first Franklin session, Wexler and Hall had a falling out and no further Atlantic artists were brought to Fame. Hall next began producing hits for Chess soul singers including Laura Lee, Etta James, and Irma Thomas, for Goldwax artists including James Carr, as well as for two local artists he had signed to Fame, Clarence Carter and Candi Staton.

In April 1969, Hall’s rhythm section left to start their own Muscle Shoals Sound Studio, financing being provided by Atlantic Records. During the next several years, the Muscle Shoals Rhythm Section cut dozens of soul hits for artists such as the Staple Singers, Johnnie Taylor, Mel and Tim, Luther Ingram, Margie Joseph, Veda Brown, and the Soul Children as well as pop and rock hits for artists as diverse as Simon and Garfunkel, Cher, Rod Stewart, Willie Nelson, and Bob Seger. Over at Fame, Rick Hall was cutting pure pop hits for the Osmonds (“One Bad Apple”), Paul Anka (“You’re Having My Baby”), and Mac Davis (“Don’t Get Hooked on Me”). In 1973 alone, recordings produced by Rick Hall held the number one slot on the pop charts for an astonishing seventeen weeks.

New Orleans, Louisiana

Through the first few years of the nineteenth century, New Orleans was under either French or Spanish rule. Catholic slave masters took a very different stance from the Protestant slave masters of the United Kingdom. Equally brutal during the work day, Catholic slave masters chose to interfere very little with the recreation time of their slaves. The result was that in South America, the French and Spanish Caribbean, and the southern part of Louisiana, African cultural retentions were much stronger among slaves and their descendants than they were in other parts of the United States. This partially explains why, despite the purchase of Louisiana by the United States from Napoleon in 1803, the music of black New Orleans has always exhibited a markedly different rhythmic sensibility compared to black music in the rest of the country.

The world of New Orleans soul primarily centered around the talents of writer, pianist, and producer Allen Toussaint and the studio of Cosimo Matassa. In 1958, by the time he was twenty, Toussaint had played piano on Fats Domino recordings, released a solo album on RCA, and written and produced a local hit for Lee Dorsey. Toussaint would go on to write, arrange, and/or produce local and national hits by a who’s who of Crescent City soul stalwarts, including Jessie Hill, Lee Dorsey, Clarence “Frogman” Henry, Irma Thomas, Aaron Neville, Ernie K-Doe, Benny Spellman, and Chris Kenner. In the late 1960s, Toussaint began to use the Meters as a house band. The latter were clearly influenced by the work of Stax’s Booker T. and the MGs and similarly developed simultaneous careers as session men par excellence and hit instrumental artists unto themselves.

In addition to Toussaint, arranger Wardell Quezergue was responsible for a number of superior recordings to come out of New Orleans, including King Floyd’s “Groove Me” and the monster Stax hit “Mr. Big Stuff” for Jean Knight, cut at a single session at Jackson, Mississippi’s Malaco Records in 1970.

Detroit, Michigan

As a soul and popular music center in the 1960s, Detroit was dominated by Motown Records. Founded by Berry Gordy, Jr., Motown has a history that in many respects parallels that of Stax. Both companies were based in residential neighborhoods, both owners built idiosyncratic recording studios in preexisting buildings, both company’s utilized a “house” band and “in-house” songwriting teams, and, most important, both companies developed identifiable sounds. Motown liked to refer to its sound as “the Sound of Young America,” the sign outside their headquarters proudly proclaiming the building as “Hitsville U.S.A.”

In direct contrast to Jim Stewart and Stax, Gordy was the product of an urban, middle-class upbringing in the depersonalized North. Having experienced life on the Mercury assembly line, Gordy understood that time is money and had internalized the basic precepts of industrial capitalism, running his company accordingly from the top down in assembly-like fashion. A firm believer in vertical integration, Gordy’s Motown empire included a management company, a booking agency, a finishing school, and a choreography department, in addition to a variety of record labels, including Tamla, Motown, Gordy, and Soul, and the Jobete publishing company.

From the beginning, Gordy was determined to sell records to both white and black Americans. He consequently spent time attempting to deduce the qualities necessary to facilitate the crossing over of black records from the R&B to the pop charts. Armed with his conclusions, Gordy developed an approach to songwriting, arranging, and producing that focused on narrative lyrics that presented a problem and attempts at resolution but that were never fully resolved, maximized the use of hooks, employed lots of high register sound, and positioned the lead vocalist way out front in the mix. Gordy was also enamored of Phil Spector's "Wall of Sound" approach to production, and consequently Motown recordings, in contrast with those at Stax, tended to be extremely dense, employing at various times up to three guitarists, two drummers, strings, horns, and backup vocalists. Above all, Motown relied on an enormous beat, in-house producers such as Holland, Dozier, and Holland creating enormous composite sounds by layering handclaps, foot stamps, tambourine, and snare.

With a roster of artists that included Smokey Robinson and the Miracles, Martha Reeves and the Vandellas, Stevie Wonder, Marvin Gaye, the Temptations, Diana Ross and the Supremes, the Four Tops, and the Jackson Five, Motown became the most successful black-owned and, arguably, the most successful independent record company in history. In the 1960s alone, Motown placed an astonishing seventy-nine records in the pop top ten. In 1972, Gordy moved the company to Los Angeles. While the Motown sound of the 1960s was no longer in evidence, Motown continued to produce a substantial number of hits with funk and disco-oriented artists such as Rick James, the Dazz Band, DeBarge, the Mary Jane Girls, Teena Marie, the Commodores, and Lionel Richie.

While it made its impact on mainstream American popular music, Motown did so by developing its own style of black popular music, especially in the recordings of its male stars the Temptations, Marvin Gaye, and Stevie Wonder, that may be heard by some as a subgenre of rhythm and blues. These artists, along with the Isley Brothers and Edwin Starr, would become of high interest to northern England fans, for whom writer Dave Godin would coin the term "Northern Soul."

In the wake of Motown, dozens of local entrepreneurs attempted to start record labels in Detroit. The most successful were Golden World, Revilot, Ric Tic, Hot Wax, and Invictus, which collectively produced hits by the Parliaments, Edwin Starr, Freda Payne, 100% Aged in Soul, the Chairman of the Board, and Flaming Ember. Hot Wax and Invictus were started by Holland-Dozier-Holland after their departure from Motown in 1968.

Chicago, Illinois

The history of the twentieth century in the United States has largely been the story of the movement of people from the country to the city, from the South to the North and West Coast. Chicago was the primary destination of black Americans from Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, Missouri, and western Tennessee. With a constant flow of migrants north and family members routinely visiting in both directions, well into the 1970s most black citizens of the Windy City maintained strong relationships with southern black relatives and culture.

Pre-World War II, Chicago developed into the most important urban center for both boogie-woogie piano music and all forms of gospel. In the postwar era, as the home to southern migrants such as Muddy Waters, Howlin' Wolf, and Little Walter, Chicago became the focal point for the most influential tradition of electric blues and also could boast of a healthy vocal group scene. Given all this musical activity, perhaps it is not surprising that the Windy City played a seminal role in the development of black radio and, with Chess and Vee-Jay Records, was home to two of the most important postwar record labels specializing in black music.

Chess Records was started as Aristocrat in 1947 and, although primarily specializing in blues, also recorded gospel, jazz, rock 'n' roll, and soul artists. Among the latter were Etta James, Fontella Bass, Billy Stewart, Irma Thomas, and the Dells. Vee-Jay, founded in 1953 by Vivian Carter and James Bracken, was one of only a handful of black-owned record labels. In the 1950s the company specialized in blues, gospel, and doo-wop. Before going bankrupt in 1965, Vee-Jay went into the soul business, issuing seminal recordings by Jerry Butler, Dee Clark, Gene Chandler, and Betty Everett and serving as the distributor of the Memphis soul label, Goldwax Records.

In 1959 Vee-Jay issued "For Your Precious Love" by the Impressions. While the lead vocal was sung by Jerry Butler, the record was also notable for the contributions of sixteen-year-old guitarist, singer, and writer Curtis Mayfield. As the first important R&B artist to be born in the urban North, in the early 1960s Mayfield developed an utterly original sensibility that, for all intents and purposes, became the "sound of Chicago soul." Mayfield wrote, sang lead, played guitar on, and produced more than three dozen hits for the Impressions, many of which, such as the often-covered "People Get Ready" and "We're a Winner," he referred to as "songs of faith and inspiration."

In addition to his work with the Impressions, Mayfield wrote and produced hits for a number of other Chicago artists, including Major Lance and the Staple Singers, as a solo artist scored the influential soundtrack to Superfly, and owned three record labels that specialized in soul, Windy C, Mayfield, and Curtom. Some critics regard this trend in Chicago, with the ensuing musical development in Philadelphia, as “Uptown Soul.”

Philadelphia, Pennsylvania

An early Philadelphia soul figure was Bill Doggett, master of the Hammond B-3 organ, who introduced that instrument to soul-style keyboardists.

Inspired by the success of Motown, in the mid-1960s singer/lyricist Kenny Gamble and pianist/arranger Leon Huff decided to team up and start Gamble Records in 1966 in Philadelphia. Up to this point, with the exception of Arctic Records, the City of Brotherly Love was primarily known as the home of American Bandstand, Cameo-Parkway Records, and a plethora of artistically bereft teen idols. Gamble Records enjoyed substantial success with the Intruders. At the same time another Philadelphia writer and pianist, Thom Bell, was storming the charts with the Delfonics on Philly Groove Records. Gamble, Huff, and Bell became partners in Mighty Three Music Publishing.

In 1968 engineer Joe Tarsia took over a mediocre local studio, Sound Plus, and transformed it into Sigma Sound Studios, which would soon become the home of all sessions conducted by Gamble, Huff, and Bell. For the next few years Gamble and Huff freelanced, producing hits for Jerry Butler, Wilson Pickett, Dusty Springfield, Archie Bell and the Drells, and Peaches and Herb. In 1972 Gamble and Huff worked out a deal with Clive Davis at CBS Records. In exchange for financing their new Philadelphia International label, CBS would distribute their productions. With a label, studio, house band, and writing teams in place, Philadelphia International became the Motown of the 1970s, developing a recognizable sound that hit the charts over and over again with the O’Jays, Harold Melvin and the Blue Notes, Teddy Pendergrass, Billy Paul, MFSB, and the Three Degrees. By 1975, Philadelphia International was the second largest black-owned record company in the United States.

Gamble and Huff’s “Sound of Philadelphia,” replete with heavy duty orchestration, vibes, Latin percussion, and a flattened four-four beat, helped lay the blueprint for what became disco music.

Soul Blues

By the mid-1970s the soul era had passed as funk and disco became the dominant genres of black popular music. A few soul artists, such as Diana Ross, enjoyed substantial success in the disco era. Others, such as Curtis Mayfield and Rufus Thomas, embraced the sound of funk, but with the exception of the Bar-Kays, few former soul artists enjoyed successful careers as funk artists post-1975.

The majority of soul artists found themselves pushed to the margins of the industry, either without record contracts or signed to the tiniest of independent labels. One of these independents was Malaco Records based in Jackson, Mississippi. Started by Tommy Couch and Wolf Stephenson in 1967 as a production company, Malaco achieved early success with its productions of King Floyd’s “Groove Me” and Jean Knight’s “Mr. Big Stuff,” which it placed with Atlantic and Stax, respectively. Buoyed by their success, Couch and Stephenson restarted the Malaco label proper (back in 1967 they had issued a solitary single on Malaco before deciding that leasing their recordings to more established labels made more sense). With the exception of Dorothy Moore’s country-soul recording of “Misty Blue” and “Funny How Time Slips Away,” Malaco struggled through most of the 1970s, cutting disco, funk, early electro-beat, and uptown R&B records with little success.

Things changed substantially in the early 1980s when the company hired legendary R&B promotion man Dave Clark. Clark’s reputation and extensive contacts within the black entertainment industry enabled Malaco to sign a bevy of veteran soul singers, including Z. Z. Hill, Denise LaSalle, Latimore, Little Milton, Johnnie Taylor, and Bobby Bland. The company proved eminently successful in reviving these artists’ careers, recording blues, soul, and material that seamlessly fused the two genres.

Despite the soulful grooves that define many Malaco recordings cut in the 1980s and 1990s, at the level of radio and within trade journals such as Billboard, the majority of Malaco recording stars had become pigeonholed as blues artists. Whereas in the 1970s, Denise LaSalle, Latimore, Little Milton, and especially Johnnie Taylor were mainstream black soul stars, now they were consigned to the margins of the industry and consequently found themselves selling one or two hundred thousand copies of their biggest hits rather than half a million and up.

This reclassification of soul as blues is largely a product of the aging demographic that continued to support artists such as Little Milton and Johnnie Taylor. In the mind of most radio programmers, older black people listened to the blues. So, if an older demographic listened to Johnnie Taylor, ergo, he had to be a blues artist. The music hadn't changed all that much, but the way it was understood and consequently marketed and consumed had shifted significantly. While a number of artists such as Hill, Bland, and Johnny Copeland had at different points in their careers worked within a gray area that was part blues and part soul, the situation with Malaco artists in the 1980s and 1990s recording clearly soul-based material that was automatically classified as blues was a new phenomenon.

This was especially odd when it came to Johnnie Taylor's recordings, very few of which were even close to straight-ahead blues. Taylor came to Malaco with an impressive pedigree, which included thirty-seven charting records, fifteen of which had been top ten R&B hits. By 1984 when he was signed to Malaco, Taylor, like so many of Malaco's other artists, had found himself a relic of an earlier era, unable to find anyone interested in recording him.

With Malaco, Taylor's albums proved to be a heady mix of blues, Southern soul, urban ballads, and funky floorshakers. Despite such diversity, Taylor still found himself fighting the blues tag. As late as 1996, he was stressing in interviews "I want people to stop categorizing me. Sure, I can sing the blues, but that's not all I do. I've got nothing against the blues. But it is time that people realize that Johnnie Taylor doesn't just sing blues. Most of the hits I had were not blues."

Taylor was fond of telling the story of when he played at the Fairmont Hotel in New Orleans and walked across the street on his break to visit a local record shop. The clerk in the store didn't recognize Taylor and when the singer asked why his most recent release was in the blues section, the clerk replied without hesitation something to the effect of "Why it's on Malaco, it must be blues."

In the early years of the twenty-first century the soul-blues genre is still alive and well as Malaco and smaller concerns continue to cut records aimed at an older black demographic by artists who continue to work the southern chitlin circuit that receive substantial airplay on select southern radio stations. A handful of 1960s soul superstars such as Aretha Franklin, Al Green, and Isaac Hayes continue to record and play theaters in both North America and Europe while numerous other soul artists of the same generation, such as Booker T. and the MGs, Sam Moore (of Sam and Dave), Solomon Burke, Bobby Womack, and Irma Thomas, ply their trade for eager audiences on the festival circuit in the summer and at casinos and clubs in the winter months.

ROB BOWMAN

Bibliography

- Bogdanov, Vladimir, John Bush, Chris Woodstra, and Stephen Thomas Erlewine. All Music Guide to Soul: The Definitive Guide to R&B and Soul. San Francisco: Backbeat, 2003.
- Bowman, Rob. Soulsville U.S.A.: The Story of Stax Records. New York: Schirmer Books, 1997.
- Cummings, Tony. The Sound of Philadelphia. London: Methuen, 1975.
- George, Nelson. Where Did Our Love Go? The Rise and Fall of the Motown Sound. New York: St. Martin's Press, 1985.
- Guralnick, Peter. Sweet Soul Music. New York: Harper & Row, 1986.
- Hannusch, Jeff. I Hear You Knockin': The Sound of New Orleans Rhythm and Blues. Ville Platte, LA: Swallow Publications, 1985.
- Hirshey, Gerri. Nowhere to Run: The Story of Soul Music. New York: Times Books, 1984.
- Pruter, Bob. Chicago Soul. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1991.

SOUND STAGE 7

One of the many influential independent record labels dedicated to regionally based rhythm and blues, Sound Stage 7 was a subsidiary of Fred Foster's Monument Records, home to Roy Orbison. Foster hired Nashville's preeminent rhythm and blues deejay John Richbourg as its manager. Formed in 1963, Sound Stage 7 lasted until 1972. Among the most noteworthy artists were Rose Shelton, Arthur Alexander, and Joe Simon, whose "The Chokin' Kind" (1969), written by the prolific country legend Harlan Howard, exemplifies the recurrent crossover between country and rhythm and blues.

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

- Barney Hoskins. Say It One More Time for the Brokenhearted: Country Soul in the American South. London: Bloomsbury, 1998.

Discography: McGrath

SPADY, CLARENCE

b. 1 July 1961; Paterson, NJ

Singer, guitarist, and songwriter in electric and contemporary blues. Spady's early encouragement to perform came from family, including his father and uncle; Baptist church music was also a formative influence. He was raised and educated in Scranton, Pennsylvania, and began performing full time in 1979.

For much of the 1980s he was guitarist in the Greg Palmer Band, a north Pennsylvania group that often opened concerts for national touring soul and blues acts.

In 1981 he formed his first group, the Scranton Blues Band, playing mostly northeast Pennsylvania but with an occasional engagement in New York City or Philadelphia. In the late 1980s he also led the Shiloh Baptist Church choir in Scranton. In 1990 he joined the house band in the newly opened Blues Street club in Scranton, a stable full-time performing opportunity. In 1996 he released his first CD, Nature of the Beast (Evidence 26080), which led to greater recognition and performances nationwide and abroad.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly)
Prevos, Andre. "Clarence Spady: 'Blues Down on Interstate 81.'" Soul Bag no. 150 (Spring 1998): 10–11.

Discography: AMG

SPAIN

The blues arrived in Spain in 1953 with a performance by Bill Big Broonzy at the Capsa Theater in Barcelona. Before this, the only available blues record was an old 78-rpm disc by Jimmy Yancey. After Broonzy, no other bluesman would visit until 1957, when the great singer and guitar player Josh White played at the Coliseum Theatre in Barcelona, followed by Sister Rosetta Tharpe. The early 1960s saw a growth in the blues' popularity in Spain: a jazz club called Jamboree opened its doors, hosting the singer and piano player Memphis Slim in 1962. Meanwhile, in 1961, Jimmy Witherspoon, backed by Buck Clayton's Orchestra, played at Barcelona's Windsor Theater.

In 1965, the American Folk Blues Festival brought a group of blues legends such as Roosevelt Sykes, Big Mama Thornton, Buddy Guy, John Lee Hooker, Walter Horton, J. B. Lenoir, Dr. Ross, Mississippi Fred McDowell, Eddie Boyd, Jimmie Lee, and Fred Below to Spain. It was a great success, and Spanish audiences were able to see live performances by musicians who had never visited Spain before.

In the early 1970s, however, the popularity of blues exploded and has continued to grow. Blues performances are popular at venues all over the country, and the number of festivals has increased. Though the last American Folk Blues Festival took place in 1972, a number of jazz festivals devote time to blues performances, and other festivals dedicated to blues now occur on an annual basis; the most well known are the Cerdanyola Blues Festival (Barcelona), Roses Blues & Gospel Festival (Girona), Getxo Blues Festival (Bilbao), Antequera Blues Festival (Malaga) and the most prominent, the Festival de Blues de Cazorla (Jaen). Some of these festivals are also broadcast on television.

Blues is no longer merely an import from the United States: During the 1980s, a number of Spanish blues bands saw great success, particularly the Dolphin Blues Band, Harmonica Zúmel, the Caledonia, Ferroblues, and Tonky Blues Band. In the new century, a number of younger Spanish blues bands and musicians regularly play all over the country.

The first Spanish blues radio program was El Tren, directed by Jorge Muñoz from Madrid, which remains on the air. In addition, La Hora del Blues has been broadcast every week for more than twenty years in Barcelona and its surrounding areas.

Quartica Jazz (now out of print) was the first magazine to have a regular blues section, including record and concert reviews, pictures, articles, news, and a variety of other features about the blues. In 1985, Sólo Blues, the first Spanish blues magazine, was published in Madrid. It continued for twenty issues. Another blues magazine, Rítmico y Blues, appeared later but published only fifteen issues, the last in 2000. The city of Barcelona now has a free blues magazine, BarnaBlues, which publishes four issues per year.

Most blues albums are imported from American labels such as Alligator, Tone Cool, Telarc, Rounder, Antone's, Wolf, JSP, Fedora, Bullseye, Black Top, and Blind Pig and many other small independent labels and distributed by Spanish distributors.

VICENTE ZÚMEL

Bibliography

Papo, Alfredo. El Jazz a Catalunya. Barcelona: Edicions 62, 1985.

SPAND, CHARLIE

Active 1920s–1940s

Pianist and singer. Spand's reputation rests on the twenty-three sides he made for Paramount Records between 1929 and 1931 and the eight he made for Okeh in 1940. Little is known of Spand's life. He was born probably around 1900, possibly in Ellijay, Georgia. In the 1920s and perhaps before, he moved to Detroit, where he was resident at the time of the Paramount sessions. He seems to have relocated to Chicago by 1940. He then may have moved to the West Coast. Nothing is known of his subsequent activities.

All of Spand's recordings are piano-vocals in the standard twelve-bar format. A majority are performed solo, although the first six of the Paramount sides and the entire OKeh session are accompanied by guitar. Spand's singing style is light and intimate, with clear diction. His songs are particularly noted for their lyrics, which adapt folk elements in an original and poetic manner. Pianistically, Spand alternates between a gently rolling boogie-woogie, usually with eighth-note octave figures in the bass, and a light stride. Some of his most impressive playing is heard on "Hastings Street," recorded with guitarist Blind Blake, who was apparently a close musical associate.

Most of Spand's blues use a conventional AAB lyric structure. However, his most popular recording, lyric "Soon This Morning Blues" (1929, Pm 12790), is structurally less orthodox, and given the success of the record, it is perhaps surprising that he did not experiment more. Spand's popularity is to be inferred by his appearance on "Hometown Skiffle" (1929, Pm 12886), Paramount's sampler of some of its best-known race artists.

PETER MUIR

Bibliography

- AMG (Jason Ankeny); Larkin
Hall, Bob. Liner notes to Dreaming the Blues: The Best of Charlie Spand (2002, Yazoo CD 2062).
———. "A Handful of Keys: A Man Trying to Get Away—Charlie Spand." Blues Unlimited no. 117 (January/February 1976): 22–23.

Discography

Selected Recordings

As Soloist or with Guitar Accompaniment: DGR

- "Soon This Morning Blues"/"Fetch Your Water" (1929, Pm 12790); "Good Gal"/"Back to the Woods Blues" (1929, Pm 12817); "Ain't Gonna Stand for That"/"Moanin' the Blues" (1929, Pm 12856); "In the Barrel Blues"/"Levee Camp Man" (1929, Pm 12887); "Mississippi Blues"/"Got to Have My Sweetbread" (1929, Pm 12917); "45th St. Blues"/"Room Rent Blues" (1929, Pm 12930); "Mistreatment Blues"/"Soon This Morning—No. 2" (1930, Pm 13022); "She's Got Good Stuff"/"Big Fat Mama Blues" (1930, Pm 13005); "Thirsty Woman Blues"/"Dreamin' the Blues" (1930, Pm 13047); "Hard Time Blues"/"Tired Woman Blues" (1931, Pm 13112); "Georgia Mule Blues"/"Evil Woman Blues" (1931, Pm 13101); "Gold Tooth Mama"/

- "Hoodoo Woman Blues" (1940, OK 05757); "Big Alley Rat Blues"/"She's a Squabblin' Woman" (1940, OK 05894); "Soon This Morning No. 2"/"Gone Mother Blues" (OK 1940, 05946); "Rock and Rye"/"Alabama Blues" (1940, OK 05699).

As Accompanist

- Blind Blake. "Hastings St." (1929, Pm 12863).

SPANN, LUCILLE

- b. Mahalia Lucille Jenkins, 23 June 1938; Bolton, MS
d. 2 August 1994; Vicksburg, MS

Lucille began as a church gospel singer in Mississippi and continued the practice when her family moved to Chicago around 1952. She met blues pianist Otis Spann in the 1960s. The two began a musical collaboration and would later marry. Lucille and Otis performed regularly at college gigs and would record together, though their partnership would be cut short by Otis's death in 1970. Lucille continued to work in music and made a number of recordings including the album Cry Before I Go in 1974.

ROBERT SORICELLI

Bibliography

- Harris; Larkin

Discography: LSFP

SPANN, OTIS

- b. 21 March 1930; Belzoni, MS
d. 24 April 1970; Chicago, IL

Otis Spann was perhaps the preeminent blues sideman of all time. He played backup for Muddy Waters for nearly two decades (two-thirds of Waters's career). In addition, he maintained an active solo recording career and also recorded behind Chuck Berry, Little Walter, Howlin' Wolf, Sonny Boy Williamson II, Buddy Guy, Junior Wells, Johnny Shines, and many others. His left-hand rumble was as agile as his right-hand tinkle. He could amble on the bottom and crash on the top—without getting in the way of the vocalist.

Spann was the child of musicians. His mother, Josephine Erby Spann, played guitar and once recorded with Memphis Minnie. His father, Frank Houston Spann, played piano and preached in his hometown of Belzoni, Mississippi, located in the lower Mississippi Delta. Spann was also inspired by two local piano players, one named Friday Ford and the other Tolley Montgomery, sibling of Little Brother Montgomery. Spann won a talent contest at age eight and began playing for local vaudeville acts. He also claimed to have held regular club gigs by age fourteen.

Otis Spann. (Photo courtesy Frank Driggs Collection)

His mother died in the mid-1940s and the teenaged Spann moved to Chicago, where his father and an aunt resided. He worked a day job in construction while frequenting blues clubs at night. He befriended the smoky-voiced Big Maceo Merriweather, listening to his swinging bass hand entwine with Tampa Red's guitar; he keenly observed the rough-and-tumble piano style of Little Brother Montgomery and Sunnyland Slim. Though he was a heavy drinker, it had little discernible effect on his behavior, and his playing was always superb, intricate, and relevant.

After scuffling with Morris Pejoe and others, Spann heard from Jimmy Rogers that Muddy Waters needed a piano player. When Muddy hired Spann in 1951, the lineup for the first great modern blues band was complete: Muddy Waters, Jimmy Rogers, Little Walter, Elgin Evans, and Otis Spann. The template for the modern electric rock band was also defined: two guitars, harmonica, drums, piano.

Spann became Muddy's de facto bandleader, breaking in each new player when he joined the group. From James Cotton to Hubert Sumlin to Paul Oscher, Spann taught the new guy how to back Muddy. However, Spann never took the title of bandleader, not wanting the additional responsibilities.

Otis Spann stayed with Muddy from 1951 until 1969. His first recording with Waters was "Blow Wind Blow" in 1953, his second "Hoochie Coochie Man." He and Muddy became close friends and took to calling themselves brothers (Muddy's granddaughter thought Spann was a blood relative until, as a young woman, she asked Spann which side of the family he was on). Spann went to England with Muddy in 1958.

At Newport in 1960, Spann played a set as bandleader before Muddy took the stage. From then on, Spann enjoyed a solo career simultaneously with his role in Muddy's band. (He'd recorded a couple of singles at Chess in the mid-1950s, but Newport instigated his solo career in earnest.) He cut his first solo album as duets with Robert Lockwood and went on to make albums for Fontana, Storyville, Prestige, Arhoolie, Decca, Spivey, Testament, Vanguard, Blues Horizon, Bluestimes, and Delmark. For these, he employed, in addition to Muddy's band, Johnny Shines, Junior Wells, Johnny Young, and, later, younger white players such as Eric Clapton, Paul Butterfield, Michael Bloomfield, and Fleetwood Mac.

In addition to the myriad hits on which he backed Muddy, Spann played piano on Wolf's "Forty-Four," Bo Diddley's "I'm a Man" and "Road Runner," Sonny Boy Williamson's "Little Village," Lowell Fulson's "Lonely Hours," and Jimmy Rogers's "Walking by Myself."

In the late 1960s, Spann suffered a heart attack while on tour but insisted on continuing with his performance schedule. In an interview during the making of Muddy's Fathers and Sons album, which united Muddy and Spann with some of the younger players they influenced, Spann said he wanted to be considered one of the sons.

Early in 1970, at age thirty-nine, Otis Spann was diagnosed with liver cancer. He had only recently left Muddy's band to pursue a solo career. He died on April 24, 1970, in Chicago's Cook County Hospital. Despite his prodigious talent and extensive recording history and the respect he was accorded by other musicians, he had very little money; he had let his musicians' union dues lapse and was buried without a headstone.

ROBERT GORDON

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
 Gordon, Robert. Can't Be Satisfied: The Life and Times of Muddy Waters. New York: Little, Brown, 2002.
 Rowe, Bill. Otis Spann Discography. Amsterdam: Micrography Discographical Publications, 2001.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

- Half Ain't Been Told* (1964, Black Cat).
The Blues Never Die (1965, Prestige 739/OBCCD-530-2).
The Bottom of the Blues (1967, BluesWay).
Otis Spann's Chicago Blues (1967, Testament TCD 5005).
Live the Life (1997, Testament).
Best of the Vanguard Years (1999, Vanguard 79537).

SPANN, PERVIS

b. 16 August 1932; Itta Bena, MS

Legendary Chicago disk jockey and promoter; one of the original WVON "Good Guys." Spann left Mississippi in the late 1940s. His first radio job was a guest slot on McKie's All-Night Roundup, a show on Chicago's WOPA hosted by McKie Fitzhugh. He promoted his first concert, a B. B. King–Junior Parker double bill, at the Ashland Auditorium in 1960. In 1963, after Leonard Chess launched WVON, Spann became one of the station's most popular personalities, and he continued to promote and emcee shows in theaters and nightclubs in Chicago and, eventually, in out-of-town locations such as Memphis. He also represented and booked artists, at least on an informal handshake basis: He claims to have been influential in launching the careers of the Jacksons, Chaka Kahn, Aretha Franklin, and others.

Today Spann is majority owner of WVON, which shares its frequency with another station, WCEV. He still holds forth with his Blues Man Show from midnight to 3:00 or 4:00 a.m. several nights a week. Spann also continues to promote blues shows, usually revues featuring half a dozen or more artists. His reign as Chicago's leading African American blues promoter and radio personality has not been without controversy, and his influence is nothing like it was in WVON's heyday, but his importance in the city's broadcasting and entertainment history is secure, as is the esteem in which he is still held, especially by old-timers.

DAVID WHITEIS

Bibliography

- O'Neal, Jim, and Amy O'Neal (van Singel). "Pervis Spann, 'The Blues Man'" [interview]. Living Blues no. 65 (1985): 14–23.

- Pruter, Robert. Chicago Soul, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
 ———. Doowop: The Chicago Scene, Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.
 Spann, Pervis, with Linda C. Walker. The 40 Year Spann of WVON. Chicago: National Academy of Blues, 2004.
 Whiteis, David. "Not So Smooth Operator." Chicago Reader (January 19, 2001): 1, 21–26.

SPARKS BROTHERSAaron "Pinetop" Sparks

b. 22 May 1910; Tupelo, MS
 d. ca. 1938

Marion (or Milton) "Lindberg" Sparks

b. 22 May 1910; Tupelo, MS
 d. 25 May 1963; St. Louis, MO

Twins born in 1910 in Tupelo, Mississippi, moving to St. Louis around 1920. Both brothers were fine singers, and Aaron learned piano at school, becoming an exceptional accompanist in the St. Louis tradition. They first recorded in 1932 as Pinetop and Lindberg, creating some classic blues sides, including Milton's "4-11-44" and "East Chicago Blues" and Aaron's "Tell Her About Me." Their record careers ended in 1935, and Aaron died soon after, though Marion lived on (as Milton) until 1963.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

- Larkin
 Rowe, Mike, and Charlie O'Brien. "Well Them Two Sparks Brothers They Been Here and Gone." Blues Unlimited no. 144 (Spring 1983): 9–14.

Discography: DGRSPECIALTY/FIDELITY/JUKE BOX

Founded in Los Angeles, California, in 1945 from the ashes of the failed Atlas label, Art Rupe (b. Arthur Goldberg, September 5, 1917, Greensburg, Pennsylvania) formed Juke Box Records and enjoyed early success with records by "The Blues Woman" (Marion Abernathy) and Roy Milton & His Solid Senders. In 1946 he abandoned Juke Box Records and incorporated his new Specialty label, reissuing the old masters.

Milton proved to be one of the label's major assets, scoring nineteen top twenty R&B chart hits between 1946 and 1953. Other successful acts recorded in the 1940s and 1950s included Milton's pianist, Camille Howard, Jimmy Liggins & His Drops of Joy, Joe Liggins & His Honeydrippers, Percy Mayfield, Lloyd Price, Marvin & Johnny, Little Richard, Larry Williams, and Sam Cooke. The label also made many fine gospel recordings and a small clutch of important blues recordings by the likes of Roosevelt Sykes, Jump Jackson, Honey Boy (Frank Patt), Gus Jenkins, and, most successfully, Guitar Slim (Eddie Jones).

In 1951 Rupe bought the Fidelity label and issued records by Joe Turner, Bumble Bee Slim, Pete McKinley, Clarence London, and Smokey Hogg and maintained the label for just over a year, but by early 1953, Rupe had abandoned it to concentrate on the main Specialty imprint. Specialty did little recording from 1960 onward, although it lasted as an economically viable business for another forty years, relying mainly on its back catalog of rock 'n' roll classics. Remaining independent for more than forty years, Specialty Records was finally sold to Fantasy Inc. in 1990.

DAVID PENNY

Discography: McGrath

Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "Specialty Album Discography." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/specialty.html> (accessed December 12, 2004).

Selected Recordings in Reissue

The Specialty Story (1994, Specialty SSPCD-4412-2).

SPECKLED RED

b. Rufus G. Perryman, 23 October 1892; Monroe, LA
d. 2 January 1973; St. Louis, MO

Speckled Red, real name Rufus G. Perryman, was born in Ouachita Parish, Monroe, Louisiana, on October 23, 1892, one of the sixteen children of a local blacksmith. He was an albino and his friends called him "Speckled Red" because of his pink complexion and light brown freckles. When he was an infant, the family moved to Hampton, Georgia, where his father found work as a field hand. Subsequently his mother took him to Detroit, where he was raised, although he made frequent return visits to Hampton during his teenage years. His father played piano and may have given him early lessons. He learned to play the organ in Detroit, and from 1912 to 1917, when he was back in Hampton, he played in local churches.

His family settled in Atlanta, Georgia, in 1920, but by 1924 he had moved back to Detroit, where he began playing at rent parties, clubs, and brothels. One of his early influences was the young Florida-born pianist Paul Seminole, whose playing was firmly in the ragtime tradition. In Detroit he also met blues pianist Charlie Spand, from whom he learned "Early in the Morning." By 1927 Red was performing with the Wolverine Nighthawks, and in 1928 he joined the Red Rose Minstrel Show, which also included Jim Jackson, touring Mississippi, Arkansas, and Alabama. He played with Jackson and Tampa Red in the bars and clubs of Memphis in 1929–1930, and it was here, at the Peabody Hotel, that he made his first recordings for Brunswick.

A wild, undisciplined pianist, Speckled Red is best known for his version of "The Dirty Dozen," a traditional insult song that had been previously banned by the U.S. Army because it was the cause of frequent fights. Undeterred, Red recorded the song at his first Brunswick session in 1929, albeit in a highly expurgated version. His definitive piano accompaniment features a walking octave bass and the familiar riff, with its two-handed triplet breaks.

The "dozens," a contest between black youths in which the participants traded verbal abuse and insults in rhyme, has been extensively studied. According to McCormick (1965), it is derived from a nineteenth-century teaching device wherein children were taught to memorize a canto of twelve verses setting forth essential biblical facts. Versions had been collected by folklorists as early as 1909. Red's exuberant original recording was an immediate success, and he recorded "The Dirty Dozen—No. 2" at his next session in 1930. Other artists quickly produced cover versions, including Leroy Carr, Tampa Red, Ben Curry, Victoria Spivey, Kokomo Arnold, and George Noble. The song appeared under various titles in the following years and the game persisted, according to Abrahams (1964), until the 1960s.

Other fine tracks from Red's early sessions include the piano solo "Wilkins Street Stomp" and "The Right String—But the Wrong Yo Yo," the latter a song featuring an accented walking octave bass and a ragtime chord sequence. Several of Red's compositions are similarly in an approximately sixteen-bar format, reflecting his enthusiasm for barrelhouse and burlesque material. In addition to the walking bass he also occasionally used a solid four-to-the-bar stride bass on such pieces as “We Got to Get That Fixed.”

Although he had a considerable technique, as evidenced by “Wilkins Street Stomp,” Red often employed a rough-and-ready, two-fisted percussive approach to the piano, with abrupt stops and changes of pace. His idiosyncratic approach to bar lengths and chord sequences, perhaps resulting from his apparent lack of formal musical education, may have limited his opportunities for ensemble work and made him difficult to accompany. However, he was an able and energetic soloist, and his hard, strident voice was well suited to the noisy bars and clubs in which he was often obliged to play.

He entertained on excursion trains to New Orleans around 1931 and played weekends in Truman, Arkansas. During the depression he traveled extensively throughout the South and the Midwest, finding what work he could in lumber camps, levee camps, taverns, juke joints, and house parties. He recorded ten sides for Bluebird in 1938 in Aurora, Illinois, with a trio including Robert Lee McCoy on guitar and Willie Hatcher on mandolin. As well as “Early in the Morning,” the group recorded “Welfare Blues,” which was previously made popular by Walter Roland as “Red Cross Store.” An outstanding stomp from this session is “Do the Georgia.” The session was also noteworthy for the fine piano instrumental “St. Louis Stomp” and a guest appearance by harmonica player John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson on “You Got to Fix It.”

Red returned to Memphis in the late 1930s, where he renewed his partnership with Jim Jackson, performing in local clubs and bars. He finally settled in St. Louis in 1941, taking a job as a shipping clerk and working in local clubs, often as an intermission pianist for the Dixie Stompers. During the next twenty years, he continued to perform in traditional jazz venues and taverns, appearing at the World’s Fair Bar in St. Louis in 1953–1955.

With the revival of interest in traditional jazz he began recording again, with sessions in 1956–1957 for Tone and Delmark. He toured California in 1957 and Europe in 1959–1960, where he made further recordings for VJM, Folkways, and Storyville. He retired from regular performance in the early 1960s, although he still gave occasional concerts up until his death, from cancer, on January 2, 1973. He was survived by his younger brother, Willie “Piano Red” Perryman, also a blues pianist, who had national hits with “Rockin’ with Red/Red’s Boogie” in 1950 and “Dr Feelgood” in 1962.

BOB HALL

Bibliography

- AMG (Stephen Thomas Erlewine and Michal Nastos); Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Abrahams, Roger. Deep Down in the Jungle: Negro Narrative Folklore from the Streets of Philadelphia. Hatboro, PA: Folklore Associates, 1964.
 McCormick, Mack. Liner notes to The Unexpurgated Folk Songs of Men (1965, Raglan LP51).
 Oliver, Paul. Screening the Blues. London: Cassell, 1968.

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

SPECTER, DAVE

b. 21 May 1963; Chicago, IL

An inventive guitar instrumentalist mainly influenced by B. B. King, Otis Rush, Magic Sam, and T-Bone Walker, Dave Specter also heard blues in the playing of Kenny Burrell, Grant Green, and Wes Montgomery. As a result, his distinctive playing displays well-measured pick work, lush jazzy chording, and stylish arrangements, all rendered cool and clean with a modicum of reverberation.

He took up the guitar at eighteen and in a few years was sitting in with Hubert Sumlin, Johnny Littlejohn, and Sam Lay before joining the band of Son Seals, from whom he learned the role of an ensemble player. Still in his twenties, he toured Europe as a member of The Legendary Blues Band in 1989 with Calvin “Fuzzy” Jones and Willie “Big Eyes” Smith, shortly after which he went on his own, fronting the Bluebirds. For three years he and the Bluebirds featured the suave singing of Barkin’ Bill Smith, which led to Specter’s fine first recording, Bluebird Blues (1991, Delmark), on which Ronnie Earl guested on guitar. Five additional CDs for Delmark have each featured a different vocalist—Jesse Fortune, Lynwood Slim (with Jack McDuff), Tad Robinson, and Lenny Lynn—and a sixth, Speculatin’ (Delmark DE-744) is an all-instrumental outing featuring guest keyboard players Rob Waters and Ken Saydak.

Exploring the nexus of blues and jazz, Specter’s guitar work is earmarked by precise, economical timing and phrasing in backing up his vocalists, and intelligent melodic interplay between guitar and keyboard.

In addition to his Delmark sides, Specter has been anthologized on two Laserlight compilations and has appeared on others’ CDs. He has produced several of his own recordings plus those of Lurrie Bell, Floyd McDaniel, Steve Freund, and Al Miller.

JUSTIN O’BRIEN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl)
Raney, Dave. "Left Turn on Blues." Blues Access 34
(Summer 1998): 31.

Discography: AMG

SPEIR, H. C.

b. Henry C. Speir, 6 October 1895; Prospect, MS
d. 1972; Jackson, MS

No single person was as instrumental in the recording and, in turn, the preservation of early southern acoustic blues of the 1920s and 1930s as H. C. Speir. The owner of a Jackson, Mississippi, music store, Speir served as a talent scout for Paramount, OKeh, the American Recording Company (ARC), Decca, Vocalion, Columbia, Victor, and several other smaller recording companies. Through his efforts, Speir arranged the recording of a virtual who's who of early blues artists. Charley Patton, Skip James, Robert Johnson, The Mississippi Sheiks, Tommy Johnson, Ishmon Bracey, and Kokomo Arnold among others were all found by Speir and sent to various recording companies to record. Speir also was active in scouting white Mississippi country music talent for records, and he brought early country music legend Uncle Dave Macon to record in Jackson in 1930 for OKeh Records.

He was born Henry C. Speir in 1895, and in 1925 he opened a music store in the black district of Jackson. To attract business to his store, Speir began working as a "talent broker." There are several factors to consider when discussing how he searched for talent. First of all, it should be understood that Speir was not merely a stationary figure organizing these sessions out of his record store. He referred to himself as a "talent broker" and traveled extensively, seeking out new artists to record. He was also very adept in understanding exactly what each record company was looking for in its new artists.

Whether Speir was recording one of the many delta bluesmen who walked into his music store or approaching a street musician playing on a city corner, Speir had only a few criteria that would need to be met. He would first listen to them play and then determine whether their style would fit into any of the various blues genres that were beginning to be categorized by the record companies. Then, if he found them to be satisfactory performers, he would ask them if they had at least four original songs ready for recording. Once Speir determined that a particular artist was desirable, he would then make the arrangements for a recording session.

Speir went through this process with hundreds of performers, and had it not been for his efforts, it is doubtful whether many of the great blues performers from this era would have ever been heard by later audiences or even by audiences outside their immediate geographic area.

In the late 1930s record companies' interest in new artists was waning. The fact that they were focusing their efforts on established artists and not searching for new talent inhibited Speir's efforts. This, combined with a fire in 1942 that partially destroyed his music store, caused Speir to give up on the music business altogether. Tragically, also lost in this fire was Speir's private notebook in which he kept the names and addresses of the performers with whom he had been in contact through the years. This notebook would have proved to be of enormous value to blues historians had it survived.

Blues historian Gayle Dean Wardlow found Speir in 1964 on a tip from Ishmon Bracey, and Wardlow was able to document the history of Speir's ventures. Speir died in Mississippi in 1972.

BRYAN GROVE

Bibliography

Wardlow, Gayle Dean. Chasin' That Devil Music: Searching for the Blues, edited by Edward Komara. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.
———. "The Talent Scouts: H. C. Speir (1895–1972)." 78 Quarterly no. 8 (1994): 11–33.

SPENCER, EVANS

b. 1921; near Monroe, LA

Rhythm guitarist; learned to play at age eight. Spencer moved to Chicago in 1937, and during the mid-1950s he performed, and perhaps recorded, with Lou Kid Thomas. He assisted as rhythm guitarist for Willie Dixon on Spivey label recordings by St. Louis Jimmy Oden, Homesick James, Koko Taylor, and Sunnyland Slim. Soon afterward, he turned to church and sacred music. His activity since 1974 is unknown.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Eagle, Bob. "Chicago's Sidemen." Blues Unlimited no. 110 (October/November 1974): 13–14.

SPIRE

Fresno label, operated by Chester Lew in 1949–1950. Only a handful of issues were produced, including two by Mercy Dee Walton (whose "Lonesome Cabin Blues" reached number seven in the R&B charts) and two by tenor saxophonist Gene Morris and the Hamptones with vocals by Sonny Parker.

RAY ASTBURY

Discography: McGrath

See also Parker, Sonny; Walton, Mercy Dee

SPIRES, ARTHUR "BIG BOY"

b. 1912; Yazoo City, MS
d. 22 October 1990; Chicago, IL

Guitarist and singer. Published sources give varying birth dates for Spires, citing both October 1912 and 6 November 1912. He was born and raised in Yazoo City, Mississippi, ten miles away from Bentonia. By 1930 he had taught himself guitar, and through the early 1940s he performed at local house parties. In 1943 he moved to Chicago, studying guitar with George Burns of Lyon and Healey Music Studio and with Eddie El. In March 1952 Spires, El, and guitarist Earl Dranes recorded Chess/Checker single 752 with Spires singing; according to Larkin, "Murmur Low" from that session is based on Tommy Johnson's "Big Fat Mama" (1928). It is believed that Spires acquired his nickname "Big Boy" from this session, although it is not clear whether it was due to a similarity to Arthur "Big Boy" Crudup.

Through 1955 he took additional opportunities to record, but with the exception of a 1965 Testament label session, he worked increasingly outside music until his death. His son Benjamin "Bud" Spires is the Bentonia musician who performed with the late Jack Owens.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Welding, Pete. "Arthur 'Big Boy' Spires: A Bio-Discography." Blues Unlimited no. 28 (December 1965): 3–5.

Discography: LSPFSPIRES, BUD

b. Benjamin Spires, 20 May 1931; Yazoo County, MS
Son of Arthur "Big Boy" Spires. Spires became blind from exposure to pesticide at work and took up the harmonica to earn income. He performed and recorded with Jack Owens from the early 1960s through the latter's death in 1997.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Evans, David. "Ramblin . . ." Blues Revue no. 12 (Spring 1994): 15–17.

SPIRIT OF MEMPHIS QUARTET

Continually performing gospel group founded in 1930. The Spirit of Memphis Quartet was one of the leading professional groups in the 1950s and is still a notable presence in the early twenty-first century. The revolving roster of singers has included Jethroe Bledsoe, Earl Malone, Robert Reed, Silas Steele, William Broadnax, O. V. Wright, and Melvin Mosely, among others.

BRIAN MOON

Bibliography

Lornell, Kip. Happy in the Service of the Lord: African American Sacred Vocal Harmony Quartets in Memphis. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1995.
Young, Alan. Woke Me Up This Morning: Black Gospel Singers and the Gospel Life. Jackson: University Press of Mississippi, 1997.

Discography

Lornell, Kip. Happy in the Service of the Lord: African American Sacred Vocal Harmony Quartets in Memphis. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1995.

See also Wright, Overton Ellis "O. V."

SPIVEY, ADDIE "SWEET PEASE"

b. 22 August 1910; Houston, TX
d. 1943; Detroit, MI

Singer; sister of Victoria Spivey, with whom she toured on vaudeville and theater circuits in the 1920s and 1930s. She recorded with Henry "Red" Allen for Victor in 1929, then for the Decca, Vocalion, and Bluebird labels in 1936–1937.

EDWARD KOMARA

SPIVEY, ADDIE “SWEET PEASE”

Bibliography

AMG (Eugene Chadbourne); Harris; Larkin

Discography: DGR

SPIVEY, ELTON “THE ZA ZU GIRL”

b. 12 August 1900; Galveston, TX
d. 25 June 1971; East Meadow, NY

Singer; sister of Victoria Spivey, with whom she toured and performed. She recorded for the ARC labels in Chicago in 1937. She was inactive in music from the 1940s on.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris

Discography: DGR

SPIVEY RECORDS

Independent blues label founded in New York by singer Victoria Spivey (1906–1976) and husband, producer Len Kunstadt, in 1962. The first LPs included new recordings of Spivey’s standards (Victoria and Her Blues, Spivey LP 1002), while the fourth release, Three Kings and the Queen (1963, Spivey LP 1002), featured Victoria Spivey, Lonnie Johnson, Roosevelt Sykes, and Big Joe Williams, the latter accompanied on two tracks by a young Bob Dylan on harmonica. Widower Len Kunstadt continued the company’s recordings until 1985 and died in 1996 without issuing any CDs. The whole catalog included some forty LPs.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

Wirz, Stefan. “Spivey Records discography.” Stefan Wirz website, <http://www.wirz.de/music/spivefrm.htm>.

Selected Recordings

Otis Spann. The Everlasting Blues Otis Spann (1969, Spivey LP 1013).

Victoria Spivey. Three Kings and the Queen (1963, Spivey LP 1002).

Victoria Spivey, Lonnie Johnson, Roosevelt Sykes, and Big Joe Williams (with two tracks featuring Bob Dylan as sideman). Victoria and Her Blues (1963, Spivey LP 1002).

See also Johnson, Lonnie; Spivey, Victoria; Sykes, Roosevelt; Williams, “Big” Joe Lee

SPIVEY, VICTORIA

b. 15 October 1906; Houston, TX
d. 3 October 1976; New York City, NY

Spivey’s father was a musician and her sisters Addie, Elton, and Leona were also singers, but none obtained the fame that singer-pianist-songwriter Victoria did. She recorded nearly eighty issued sides in the prewar years and made a comeback in the 1960s and 1970s, persuading many of her old colleagues such as Hannah Sylvester, Lucille Hegamin, and Sippie Wallace to return to show business.

Spivey learned to play piano and sing when she was quite small, and by age twelve she was performing at the Lincoln Theatre, until the manager discovered she couldn’t read music. She continued to play at house parties and clubs, learning from local musicians such as John Calvin, and occasionally sharing a gig with Blind Lemon Jefferson. By age twenty, she had moved to St. Louis, where she made her first record for Okeh, the legendary “Black Snake Blues.” It was an earthy, primitive recording, full of the moans that would come to be associated with Texas performers such as Spivey and Texas Alexander, but Blind Lemon Jefferson’s recording of the song a few months after Spivey’s became the most famous version.

Spivey had a penchant for bizarre and bloodthirsty imagery and wrote songs of murder and mayhem, drugs and crime, hoodoo and disease. Some of the strongest performances from her early days, accompanied by Lonnie Johnson, were her own compositions: “T-B Blues,” “Dope Head Blues,” and “Blood Thirsty Blues.” In “T-B Blues,” the lonely patient grows alarmed at the continued absence of the nurse; in “Dope Head Blues,” the drug user becomes frankly delusional:

The President sent for me, the Prince of Wales is on my trail.

The year 1928 saw Spivey teaming up with Lonnie Johnson to record a number of double-entendre vocal duets that sold quite well, but she continued to write songs and record for Okeh until she took time off to appear in King Vidor’s film Hallelujah in 1929. When she returned to the recording studio in late 1929, she was under contract to Victor, and the sides she made under her own name, with the Henry “Red” Allen band behind her, are arguably her finest sides, both lyrically and musically. She returns to her favorite themes of disease and murder with “T. B. Blues” and “Blood Hound Blues,” but “Moaning the Blues” and “Telephoning the Blues” are superior performances.

Spivey continued to record throughout the 1930s, for both Decca and Vocalion, and as her recording career ended, she hit the road, traveling with the Olsen and Johnson’s “Hellzapoppin” troupe, owning a club in East St. Louis, and finally retiring to work in the church. But in the 1960s she came out of retirement to appear at clubs such as Gerdes Folk City and to found the Spivey record label. She was among the first to record the young Bob Dylan, and the encouragement she gave to both young and old performers was instrumental in furthering many careers.

PAUL GARON

Bibliography

Chilton; Harris; Herzhaft; New Grove Jazz; Larkin; Santelli; Southern

Discography: AMG; DGR; LSFP

Selected Recordings

“Black Snake Blues” (1926, OKeh 8338).
 “T-B Blues” (1927, OKeh 8494).
 “Moaning the Blues” (1929, Victor 38546).

SPOONFUL (A SPOONFUL BLUES)

“Spoonful” (“A Spoonful Blues”) is a family of songs with a long history in recorded blues, beginning with Papa Charlie Jackson’s version in 1925. While there are some formal differences, all of the songs have similarities in wording and in the image of a “spoonful” to suggest sex.

Charlie Patton’s “A Spoonful Blues” (recorded in 1929, Paramount 12869) shares a repeating ragtime-influenced chord progression of II, III, V, I with Charley Jordan’s “Just a Spoonful” (recorded in 1930, Vocalion 1543) and Papa Charlie Jackson’s “All I Want Is a Spoonful” (recorded in 1925, Paramount 12320). Patton plays his guitar in the key of E, tuned to an open chord (from high to low, E, B, Ab, E, B, E) and frets it with a bottleneck or knife. He begins the progression each time with a descending run of four notes—E–E–Eb–C#—begun high on the twelfth fret. This run is used in a similar way by Charley Jordan, who plays the song on a conventionally tuned guitar in the key of G.

Patton’s version, like all others, is made up of narratively isolated verses, related only in their reference to a common theme: the all-powerful craving for one’s greatest pleasure, presumably sex, suggested in the metaphor of a spoonful. Each verse ends with the word “spoonful,” though sometimes with it or its last syllable left out, perhaps a device inherent in the genre for heightening bawdy suggestiveness. Patton generally “finishes” each line by playing a phrase on his guitar to mimic the saying of the word. Patton also emphasizes, more than his counterparts, the violent aspects of this craving. It has been suggested that the “spoonful” in Patton’s song might refer to cocaine, a meaning supported by Patton’s emphasis on the most desperate and violent results of the craving.

Charley Jordan’s sprightly picked version, without the dense wordplay of Patton’s, suggests the styles of white blues guitarists of the 1920s, such as Dick Justice. Indeed, there is a passing melodic resemblance in Justice’s “Cocaine,” recorded in 1929, lending support to a drug interpretation of “Spoonful.” Overall, melodic resemblance to “Salty Dog,” “Don’t Let Your Deal Go Down,” and other ragtime-based songs with little harmonic variation often played by white performers suggests a possible history of racial crossover in the song that predates the recordings of Patton, Jordan, and Jackson.

A version with a different chord progression was recorded in 1966 by Mississippi John Hurt as “Coffee Blues” (Vanguard, Mississippi John Hurt Today), a song that gave the rock group The Lovin’ Spoonful its name. Similar to Leadbelly’s “Midnight Special” and Hurt’s “Creole Belle,” it follows a progression of IV, I, V, I. Hurt diverts attention from the sexual theme in a spoken introduction about his girl’s measuring spoonfuls of Maxwell House coffee. Though clearly sexual, his use of the conceit is characteristically gentle and humorous, as in his reference to a preacher laying his Bible down for a spoonful.

The most well-known song based on the image, however, is almost totally different in structure and was not recorded until 1960. “Spoonful” (Chess #1762), was written by Willie Dixon and sung by Howlin’ Wolf. Midtempoed and minor keyed, the song conveys a thoughtful assertiveness, with a dose of the ominous, as Howlin’ Wolf sings verses that expand the metaphor to include anything that men might crave, and the violence that some resort to in order to fulfill the cravings. The last line—noted EG,

SPOONFUL (A SPOONFUL BLUES)

EG, EG, E—constitutes the song's well-remembered melodic and verbal hook.

One of the most widely covered blues songs, Dixon's "Spoonful" was subsequently recorded by artists such as Jimmy Witherspoon and Koko Taylor. Many rock and rock-blues bands covered the song, popularly Cream in a studio version on Fresh Cream (1966) in a live version on Wheels of Fire (1968).

JOSEPH A. LAROSE

SPOONS

Spoons, which are sometimes known colloquially in blues circles as the "bones," are also historically referred to as "clappers" or "clackers."

In formal musical instrumentation categorization, the spoons are a type of concussion idiophone, where a sound is generated when two or more similar materials are struck together. Spoons are typically made from metal or wood materials, but in most blues numbers, the spoons are metal. Most commonly spoons in blues music are made of two separate metal spoons; some contemporary spoons sets are welded together at the ends.

Since primary idiophones create sound by striking two pieces of wood or metal together, the historical origins of the spoons can be traced from Africa to Europe to the Middle East.

Though spoons were played extensively during the late 1800s and with lesser frequency in the first half of the 1900s, this particular instrument is not widely recorded. Or, in cases where it may be played, the instrument is not listed on the album credits.

While the spoons as an instrument have been nearly completely absent from contemporary blues since the 1960s, they had once been a staple of blues music, with a rich heritage and tradition.

Proliferation of the use of spoons centered from Memphis, Tennessee, and Louisville, Kentucky, but was prevalent throughout the Ohio and Mississippi river valleys of the United States. Most often, the playing of the spoons was synonymous with the many blues jug or "skiffle" bands that actively toured this region from the 1890s through the Great Depression era. The spoons were a complement to the rhythm section, along with washboard, bass, and jug.

The most notable jug band that featured spoons players was the Henry Miles Jug Band. This band ended up attracting two of the most significant spoons players during its lengthy history. Both James Hardy and John "Preacher" Stevenson played for the Henry Miles Jug Band, beginning in the early 1950s.

The spoons were played by young and old alike. Louisville, Kentucky, being one of the spawning grounds for skiffle bands, had a number of "kids bands" where many young players learned their spoons technique. William Bean, for example, was one youth who started with a kids' band and later joined the Mud Gutter Jug Band in 1925.

With the resurgence of interest in folk music in the 1960s, isolated use of the spoons arose in the jug bands within contemporary folk, roots, or blues music but still remains rare.

In many music education stores, plastic, metal, or wood spoons still are actively used to teach percussion to elementary school-aged children.

MEG FISHER

Bibliography

- Barber, Sue. "The Bones: Ancient to Modern." December 22, 1997. Rhythm Bones Society website, <http://www.rhythmbones.com/ancient.html> (accessed March 22, 1999).
- Midgley, Ruth. Musical Instruments of the World. New York: Sterling Press, 1997.
- Pfeffer, Murray L. "Skiffle Bands and All That Jazz." Big Bands Database Plus website, <http://nfo.net/usa/jugband.html>.

SPROTT, HORACE

- b. 2 February ca. 1890; Sprott, AL
d. Unknown

As a child, guitarist and harmonica player Horace Sprott learned sacred and secular songs from his parents. In 1954 he was recorded by Frederick Ramsey, Jr., for Folkways and disappeared into obscurity from the 1960s.

LUIGI MONGE

Bibliography

- Harris
Ramsey, Frederick Jr. Been Here and Gone. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 2000.

Discography: LSFP

SPRUELL, FREDDIE

b. 1893; Lake Providence, LA
d. 1956; Chicago, IL

Spruell's first recordings, in June 1926, were among the earliest by an African American male blues singer and guitarist. He was then living in Chicago, where he spent most or all of his adult life. By comparison with his contemporary Blind Lemon Jefferson, he was a ponderous singer and rhythmically stolid guitarist, but his songs have a good deal of original character. Although he had no known association with Mississippi bluesmen of his era, his "Low-Down Mississippi Bottom Man" is curiously similar to pieces played by Kid Bailey and Charley Patton. He became a Baptist minister in the 1940s.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Wardlow, Gayle Dean. "Six Who Made Recorded History (1926–1935)." 78 Quarterly no. 5 (Autumn 1990): 93–96.

Discography: DGRSPRUILL, JAMES "WILD JIMMY"

b. 9 June 1934; Washington, NC
d. 3 February 1996; Fayetteville, NC

Guitarist Wild Jimmy Spruill was one of the many prolific journeymen in the New York studio scene during the 1950s and 1960s. A native of North Carolina, he appears on such well-known tracks as Wilbert Harrison's "Kansas City," Dave "Baby" Cortez's "The Happy Organ," and Tarheel Slim's "No. 9 Train." He accompanied many other minor figures, including saxophonist Noble "Thin Man" Watts and Mississippi-born B. Brown as well as cutting some stinging solo sides. Spruill's evocatively energetic picking earned him his sobriquet, and numerous both prominent and obscure sessions benefited from his talents.

DAVID SANJEK

Bibliography

Broven, John, and Paul Harris. "I Was Wild!: The Story of Jimmy Spruill." Juke Blues no. 6 (Autumn 1986): 9–12.
Peters, Margey. "You Got to Move the Soul First." Living Blues no. 115 (May/June 1994): 28–37.

Discography: LSPFST. LOUIS BLUES

Song (1914) by W. C. Handy, among the biggest hits of the twentieth century, remaining immensely popular for several generations. Handy assembled "St. Louis Blues" from bits of folkloric music and text that he had collected during his wanderings of the 1890s and early 1900s. He supposedly heard the lament my man's got a heart like a rock cast in the sea

(used in the third section of the song) while destitute in the streets of St. Louis in 1892. The second of the song's three musical sections, a habanera or tango, may derive from his 1900 visit to Havana while bandmaster with Mahara's Minstrels.

The famous opening lyric of the song,

I hate to see de evenin' sun go down, seems to derive directly from African American folklore, probably collected by Handy during his extensive travels through the South as a bandleader and musician. The third and final musical refrain is the most controversial part of the piece. Handy had used it in 1913, in his lesser-known instrumental "The Jogo Blues." Some scholars have pointed out its similarity to a piece called "I Got the Blues," which the white New Orleans musician Anthony Maggio had published in 1908. It is impossible to know whether or not Handy could have heard Maggio's piece, which had a limited circulation, and Handy was never in New Orleans during this period. However, Maggio was convinced Handy had appropriated his tune.

Structurally, "St. Louis Blues" is quite ingenious. In assembling not two but three strong thematic units, Handy created something similar in quality to one of Scott Joplin's classic piano rags. The second section, to the text is the most brilliant of the three strains. Here Handy combines the habanera rhythm with a switch to a minor key. Other published blues of this period contained plenty of blue notes and other standard features we associate with blues, but this was the first blues to contain an entire section in a minor key. Indeed, it was the only one in sheet music form at its time, out of dozens of blues and pseudo-blues published pre-1920. This synthesis of a Latin music trait with one clearly deriving from black rural blues culture is the feature, more than any other, that marks "St. Louis Blues" as a masterpiece.

St. Louis woman, with her diamond rings, ...

Early performance practice confirms the song's appearance in the ragtime era, when America was dance-mad. "St. Louis Blues" could be used as a three part dance suite, with a tango section providing variety between two sections that might have been done as “blues” dances, popular when the piece was new. No early recordings are taken at a slow tempo, and there have continued to be up-tempo renditions right up to the present.

ST. LOUIS BLUES

The countertradition, singing the song as a lament, begins with the 1920 record by white entertainer Marion Harris, a friend of Handy’s. This trend reached its apotheosis with the legendary 1925 recording by Bessie Smith, and her equally lugubrious 1929 film performance of the song. “St. Louis Blues,” of all early published commercial blues, best embodied the emotional and stylistic elements of country blues that could provide it with an extended afterlife. It has successfully adapted both to up-tempo commercial arrangements and to the slow blues performance style that would come to dominate in much commercial, and some country, blues performance of the 1920s and after.

ELLIOTT S. HURWITT

Bibliography

- Handy, W. C. Blues: An Anthology. New York: Boni and Boni, 1926.
———. Father of the Blues. New York: Macmillan, 1941.
Rust, Brian, Jazz Records 1897–1942. 4th ed. New Rochelle, NY: Arlington House, 1978.

Selected Recordings

- “St. Louis Blues” is among the most recorded pieces of music of all time. The following is only a small sampling of the groups and individuals to have recorded the song. A complete list of the recordings with their dates and matrix numbers would take up much of this volume.
- Country blues musicians and folk musicians. Leadbelly; Big Bill Broonzy; Sam Chatmon; Furry Lewis; Jim Jackson; and John Fahey.
- Commercial or city blues artists. Bessie Smith; Ethel Waters; Ida Cox; Esther Bigeou; Bessie Brown; Katherine Henderson; and Laura Rucker.
- Pre-jazz brass bands and ragtime ensembles. Ciro’s Club Coon Orchestra; Jim Europe’s 369th Infantry “Hell Fighters” Band; Prince’s Band; and Handy’s Memphis Blues Band.
- Early jazz, traditional jazz, and swing artists. Louis Armstrong; Duke Ellington; Count Basie; Benny Goodman; Fletcher Henderson; Cab Calloway; Fats Waller; The Dorsey Brothers; Earl Hines; Art Tatum; Artie Shaw; Lena Horne; Eubie Blake; Django Reinhardt with Stephane Grappelli; Gene Krupa; Jack Teagarden; Jimmie Noone; Paul Whiteman; The Original Dixieland Jazz Band; Noble Sissle; Albert Ammons; Pete Johnson; Mildred Bailey; The Boswell Sisters; Clarence Williams; Art Hodes; John Kirby; Red Norvo; Valaida Snow; Sonny Clay; Sam Lanin; and Boyd Senter.
- Miscellaneous pop musicians, novelty acts, and commercial entertainers. Marion Harris; Seger Ellis; Larry Adler; Joe Haymes; Ted Lewis; Eddie Peabody; The Washboard Serenaders; and Guy Lombardo.

Country musicians. Milton Brown and His Brownies. Modern blues and modern jazz artists. Big Joe Turner; Clarence “Gatemouth” Brown; Herbie Hancock with Stevie Wonder; Pat Metheny.

See also Handy, William Christopher “W. C.”; Memphis Blues, The (“Mama Don’ ’low” or “Mister Crump”); Smith, Bessie

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI

Two decades after W. C. Handy linked the name of St. Louis to his most famous composition, the city actually became a major center for recorded blues music, giving birth to an original range of styles that combined urban tradition and rural patterns.

Prewar St. Louis Blues

Ragtime composers such as Tom Turpin and Scott Joplin had already established the musical reputation of St. Louis at the turn of the century, and urban piano styles kept evolving in such legendary places as “Deep Morgan” around Delmar, or in the sporting district around 20th Street known as the Chestnut Valley. Early blues or blues ballads of the 1890s and 1900s were about local real-life figures such as Frankie Baker (“Frankie and Albert”), Stagger Lee, and Bob McKinney (recorded by Henry Thomas in 1927).

Most prewar St. Louis blues musicians moved from the South between 1918 and 1925, following the flood of African American migrants. The city reinforced housing segregation, confining most Africans to the Mill Creek Valley, part of the central corridor between Grand and 20th Street, south of Olive and north of Scott Avenue, and its counterpart across the Mississippi River, the East St. Louis “Valley,” also known as the red light district, which had suffered from one of the worst race riots in 1917.

Blues emerged in both cities, mostly played at private parties and, as soon as prohibition banned alcohol, in many illegal joints. St. Louis included many bars, nightclubs, and theaters but no recording studios until the 1950s, so the first recordings involving blues were made during field trips. OKeh featured Kansas City vocalist Ada Brown with Benny Moten’s orchestra in 1923, and soon such residents as Lonnie Johnson and Victoria Spivey, but the main local output was jazz or dance music, such as from Charles Craith’s Jazz’o’Maniacs, who operated on the riverboats linking the city to New Orleans.

Most St. Louis musicians were recorded in Chicago, sometimes from the initiative of local talent scouts such as record shop owner Jesse Johnson or guitarist Charley Jordan. Among the most urbanized artists were vocalists such as Mary Johnson or Alice Moore, but the number of pianists was overwhelming. Peetie Wheatstraw, Henry Brown, Roosevelt Sykes, James “Stump” Johnson, the Sparks brothers, Jabo Williams, Sylvester Palmer, and Lee Green did not define a noticeable St. Louis style but shared high professionalism and inventiveness and subtle left-hand accompaniments that could lead to a typical style of boogie-woogie, with sometimes a clear jazz influence.

Guitar styles ranged from the refined melodic approach of Lonnie Johnson, Clifford Gibson, or Charley Jordan to the rough playing of Mississippi-born Jaydee Short or Hi Henry Brown, who still inherited some local features from earlier musicians, Henry Spaulding and Henry Townsend: typical rhythmic signatures, heavy bending and snapping of top strings. Artists such as Teddy Darby, Townsend, and Wheatstraw could play both instruments, and many piano–guitar duets emerged from these early years.

A couple of St. Louis musicians kept recording during the hardest years of the depression, and the end of Prohibition in 1933 enlarged the opportunities for playing. New talents such as Walter Davis and Big Joe Williams appeared around 1935, and in spite of the repeated projects to close the Valley, East St. Louis remained a renowned place even for Chicago artists such as John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson and Robert Nighthawk.

The Postwar Years

Several blues performers, such as Clifford Gibson, were still active in St. Louis after the war, but rhythm and blues dominated the scene. Chuck Berry and Ike Turner cut their teeth in St. Louis clubs, and several modern musicians such as Albert King and Little Milton met success there.

The city stayed aside of the “blues revival” and its festivals, although the foundation of Delmark records by Bob Koester helped with the rediscovery of Big Joe Williams, Jaydee Short, and more obscure blues musicians who had not recorded before the war. Among the major postwar figures in St. Louis were pianist Johnnie Johnson and guitarist Tommy Bankhead.

Urban redevelopment cleared most of the areas that had sheltered the prewar musicians, and blues moved to the Soulard neighborhood or clubs along Broadway. Among others, BB’s Jazz, Blues, and Soups maintains the blues tradition as well as other types of popular music, and several organizations keep encouraging new talents, while the Big Muddy Blues and Roots Festival pays his annual tribute to the city’s long underrated blues heritage.

PATRICE CHAMPAROU/EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Greensmith, Bill. “Six Months in St. Louis.” Blues Unlimited no. 145 (Winter 1983/1984): 20–23.
- Ottenheimer, Harriet. “The Blues Tradition in St. Louis.” Black Music Research Journal 9 no. 2 (Fall 1989): 135–151.
- Townsend, Henry, with Bill Greensmith. A Blues Life. Urbana-Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 1999.

STACK LEE

Songs, toasts, and tales about Stack Lee (also known as Stagolee, Staggerlee, Stackerlee, and Stack-o-lee) proliferated throughout the twentieth century. He was bad, really bad. He’d kill you just for fun.

Born with a veil over his face, he sold his soul to the devil, had hooves for feet, owned a magic Stetson hat, fought Jesse James, caused the San Francisco earthquake by wrecking a saloon when the bartender was slow serving him, and took over Hell when he died. He killed Billy Lyons over that Stetson hat (Botkin, 1944).

The kernel of truth here is that “Stack” Lee Shelton did kill William Lyons in an argument over a hat (Brown, 1993; David, 1976; Eberhart, 1996). The three-syllable names by which we now know Shelton, “Stagolee,” etc., probably arose because it is hard to pronounce “Stack Lee” without involuntarily introducing an intermediate syllable.

Ironically, Lyons was the reputed bully, especially when he had drunk too much. Shelton was a small, cross-eyed man.

It happened in Bill Curtis’s Elite Club, 11th and Morgan Streets, downtown St. Louis, Missouri, late Christmas night, 1895. Shelton (aged thirty) and Lyons (thirty one), both black, were friends who met there often. They argued, possibly over politics—Shelton was a Democrat, Lyons a Republican. After each had struck at the other’s hat, Shelton took Lyons’s derby and broke it. Lyons then grabbed Shelton’s hat, perhaps a Stetson, and would not give it back. After Shelton hit Lyons on the head with his Smith and Wesson .44-caliber revolver, Lyons came after him, reaching into his pocket as if for a knife, and Shelton shot him in the abdomen. He died the next day. Before entering the saloon, Lyons had borrowed a knife from a companion.

Despite strong arguments for self-defense, Shelton was convicted of second-degree murder and sentenced to twenty-five years in the penitentiary. He was paroled in 1909, reincarcerated for robbery in 1911, and died of tuberculosis in prison in 1912. His parole was based on many pleas, including those from Thomas Turpin (ragtime composer), the judge who presided at his trial, and ten of the jurors. The foreman said that he never had “believed the verdict a just one” and had accepted a compromise verdict only because he was ill.

One early version of the ballad says that Stack Lee was a good man / One every body did love, others are sympathetic to him, and still others paint him as evil. Eberhart speculates that competing versions, perhaps politically motivated, might have originated with Lyons’s and Shelton’s friends.

“Stack Lee” may have been performed in St. Louis at Babe Connors’s famous Castle Club, a multimedia entertainment center (music, dancing, gambling, drinking, sex). It has entered many genres, having been performed and recorded by prisoners, songsters, and blues singers, popular and novelty artists, jazz musicians, and rhythm-and-blues and rock groups, using a variety of tunes, one of which is the common “Frankie” tune. The best-known tune today may be that of the 1958 Lloyd Price hit or the original melody of the Grateful Dead version, both entitled “Stagger Lee.”

JOHN GARST

Bibliography

- Botkin, B. A. A Treasury of American Folklore. pp. 122–130. New York: Crown, 1944.
- Brown, Cecil Morris. “Stagolee: From Shack Bully to Culture Hero.” Ph.D. diss., University of California, Berkeley, 1993. University Microfilms 9430407.
- David, John Russell. “Tragedy in Ragtime: Black Folktales from St. Louis.” Ph.D. diss., St. Louis University, 1976. University Microfilms 7622522.
- Eberhart, George M. “Stack Lee: The Man, the Music, and the Myth.” Popular Music and Society 20, no. 1 (1996): 1–70. Discography, ca. 200 items.
- Place, Jeff. “Supplemental Notes on the Selections. Selection 19, ‘Stackalee.’” Frank Hutchison. In Anthology of American Folk Music, edited by Harry Smith. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Folkways, 1997.

STACKHOUSE, HOUSTON

- b. 28 September 1910; Wesson, MS
d. 23 September 1980; Helena, AR

The distinguished Mississippi singer and guitarist Houston Stackhouse, who would spend virtually all of his unassuming life in the South and who would associate with many great prewar and postwar blues artists, was actually born Houston Goff, the son of Garfield Goff, in Wesson, Mississippi, located forty miles south of Jackson. He was raised on the Randall Ford Plantation by James Wade Stackhouse, who he believed was his natural father for much of his life. As a boy, he heard blues being played on the plantation by fiddle player Lace Powell as well as from his visiting uncles, who performed throughout the Jackson area.

Around 1925, the family moved to Crystal Springs, Mississippi, and Stackhouse took up the violin, harmonica, and mandolin before concentrating on the guitar, an instrument he learned from locals Floyd Patterson and brothers Tommy, Mager, and Clarence Johnson. He also studied the records of Lonnie Johnson, Blind Lemon Jefferson, and Blind Blake. From the late 1920s throughout the early 1930s, he played with many area musicians and formed a partnership with his cousin and then-harmonica player Robert McCollum (Robert Nighthawk), whom Stackhouse would also teach guitar. Stackhouse was already an accomplished slide guitar player and was responsible for shaping McCollum’s early interest in the style. In 1931, the pair met and performed with country music pioneer Jimmie Rodgers in Jackson.

Stackhouse began playing white country dances in the mid-1930s with the Mississippi Sheiks Number 2, a group patterned after the Chatmon brothers’ famous Jackson-area black string band that he often had associated with since the late 1920s. Around 1936, he met Robert Johnson in Jackson and was extended an offer to join Johnson on his upcoming recording session, but declined. He continued with the string band into the early 1940s, when he moved to Wiggins, Mississippi, to work outside music at a lumber mill.

In 1946, McCollum, now a recording star known as Robert Nighthawk, moved to Helena, Arkansas, and asked Stackhouse to relocate there to join him. Stackhouse accepted and would spend the next twenty-two years living in the Mississippi River town. He played throughout the region and on radio shows for the next year with Nighthawk’s band, which also included Kansas City Red, Pinetop Perkins, and Sam Carr.

After Nighthawk’s departure in 1947, Stackhouse began playing on Helena’s influential KFFA radio show King Biscuit Time with drummer James “Peck” Curtis and guitarist Joe Willie Wilkins. Harmonica player and singer Aleck Miller “Sonny Boy Williamson II,” who returned to host his popular show, joined them in 1948. The group performed throughout the Delta for several years, using the daily radio spots to advertise their appearances. Stackhouse also played with and influenced many blues musicians passing through Helena at the time, including Earl Hooker, Sammy Lawhorn, and Jimmy Rogers. He worked with Elmore James, Ernest Lane, Willie Love, and Roosevelt Sykes during this period as well, all the while keeping a day job at an automobile plant in West Helena.

Stackhouse resisted the temptation to move north to Chicago as Williamson did in the mid-1950s and spent the next decade playing locally and working various regular jobs. Although he had stopped playing on King Biscuit Time several years earlier because of a dispute with its owner, he agreed in 1965 to accompany Williamson, who had recently returned to Helena, on a live broadcast that was recorded by Arhoolie's Chris Strachwitz. Williamson died a few weeks after the recordings and Stackhouse continued on with another former partner who recently had moved back to Helena, Robert Nighthawk. As the Stackhouse Blues Rhythm Boys, the trio, which included drummer Curtis, was recorded by George Mitchell in 1967 in Dundee, Mississippi, just months before Nighthawk's death. These recordings were eventually released by Arhoolie and Testament Records and featured the gentle Stackhouse singing many prewar and postwar classics—most notably, those of mentor Tommy Johnson.

Stackhouse moved to Memphis in 1970 to live with Wilkins and his wife Carrie, and throughout the decade both guitarists toured together as The King Biscuit Boys. Stackhouse also appeared at many prestigious venues as a solo performer and toured overseas in 1976. His easygoing demeanor and grandfatherly presence garnered him many friends and fans on the festival circuit. Stackhouse recorded for Adelphi Records in 1972 and toured nationally with the Memphis Blues Caravan package, which also included old friends Sam Chatmon and Eugene Powell. In his final years, he moved back to Crystal Springs and rarely performed. Houston Stackhouse returned to Helena shortly before his death and passed away quietly at age sixty nine.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin; Santelli; Southern
O'Neal, Jim. "Houston Stackhouse" [interview]. Living Blues no. 17 (Summer 1974): 20–36; reprinted in Jim O'Neal and Amy van Singel, The Voice of the Blues. New York: Routledge Press, 2002.

Discography: AMG; LSF

Houston Stackhouse. Cryin' Won't Help You (1994, Genes GCD 9904).

Robert Nighthawk/Houston Stackhouse. Masters of Modern Blues (1994, Testament TCD 5010).
Various artists. Mississippi Delta Blues: Blowing My Blues Away Vol. 2 (1994, Arhoolie CD 402).

STAFF/DESSA

Staff was owned by Maurice King in Detroit in 1947, with Dessa owned by Idessa Malone. Artists included John Lee Hooker, Baby Boy Warren, Ted Buckner, and Milt Hinton.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

STAPLES, ROEBUCK "POPS"

b. 28 December 1914; Winona, MS
d. 19 December 2000; Dolton, IL

Guitarist and singer and patriarch of the Staples Singers family group.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)
Weider, J. "Sessions: The Spirit of Pops Staples." Guitar Player 30, no. 11 (November 1996): 146.

Discography: AMG; Gospel Records 1943–1969

STAR TALENT/TALENT

Labels run in Dallas, Texas, in 1949–1961 by Jesse and Louise Erickson. Artists included Rufus Thomas, Professor Longhair, and Willie Lane.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

STARK, COOTIE

b. 9 December 1927; Abbeville, SC

Blind acoustic guitarist and singer. Stark acquired his first guitar at age fourteen from his father and learned how to play from a neighbor. He moved to live with an aunt in Greenville, South Carolina, around 1943, where he learned guitar from Baby Tate and began performing for tips. He developed a repertoire ranging from Reverend Gary Davis songs to 1960s soul music. In the 1990s he was performing at festivals in the United States and abroad, and he was associated with the Music Maker Relief Foundation.

STARK, COOTIE

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Duffy, Timothy. "Cootie Stark." Living Blues no. 137 (January/February 1998): 23–25.

STARR PIANO COMPANY

The Starr Piano Company of Richmond, Indiana, founded in 1872 by James and Benjamin Starr, was the parent company of Gennett. After 1917 the name was used on record labels only in Canada, where a few vaudeville blues artists were issued, including Edna Hicks and Viola McCoy, sometimes using alternate takes. In 1925 Canadian Starr was purchased by Compo, which had always pressed the records. The U.S. company withdrew from the record business in 1934.

HOWARD RYE

Discography: DGR; Sutton

Dixon, Robert M. W., and John Godrich. Recording the Blues. London: Sudio Vista, 1970; reprinted in Paul Oliver, Tony Russell, Robert M. W. Dixon, and Howard Rye, Yonder Come the Blues. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.

STASH RECORDS

This company, founded in the early 1970s, earned initial notoriety from founder Bernard Brightman's fondness for vintage double-entendre and drug tunes, which he featured on several early Stash anthologies. The albums had mixed musical value but were historically significant because they documented a forgotten sound and lyrical direction (some argued that it might be better not to remember some of the numerous reefer and dope tunes these collections spotlighted). But Stash eventually expanded its catalog and has subsequently released vital reissues featuring some of Charlie Parker's formative and finest bop dates and outstanding contemporary sessions from trombonist Steve Turre, pianist Hilton Ruiz, guitarist John Pizzarelli, and the String Trio of New York among others. Brightman died in 2004 at eighty two.

RON WYNN

Bibliography

Leblanc, Eric. "Bernard Brightman, Stash/Jass Records founder" [obituary]. Goldmine 30 (April 2, 2004): 27.

STAX/VOLT

Founded in Memphis in 1958 as Satellite Records by country fiddler Jim Stewart, Stax Records was initially conceived as a pop and country label. It was only after renting an abandoned movie theatre in 1960 in a neighborhood whose demographic was rapidly changing from white to black that Stewart, now in partnership with his sister, Estelle Axton, began to regularly record black artists. The first black artist to record at the new location was Memphis disc jockey and former Sun recording artist Rufus Thomas, who alongside his daughter Carla provided the fledgling Satellite label with its first hit, "Cause I Love You."

While "Cause I Love You" and many other early Satellite/Stax hits, including instrumental recordings such as the Mar-Keys' "Last Night" and "Green Onions" from Booker T. and the MGs, were set in a twelve-bar blues structure, the majority of Stax vocalists sang and the majority of Stax composers wrote within the then-new style of soul music. A cursory examination of the singles released by Satellite/Stax and the subsidiary label Volt demonstrates that, with the exception of early Johnnie Taylor recordings cut in 1966 and 1967, by the mid-1960s most of the company's artists were no longer singing twelve-bar blues-based material.

By the late 1960s, Stax had blossomed into a soul music powerhouse. The label reached its commercial peak in 1971 and 1972, but due to a series of tragic events resulting from an unfortunate distribution agreement with Columbia Records, the company was forced into involuntary bankruptcy in December 1975.

During the course of the company's history (1958–1975), Stax recorded a handful of blues artists, including Albert King, Little Milton, Little Sonny, and Prince Conley. King arrived at the label in 1966 after stints recording for the Parrot, Bobbin, King, and Coun-tree labels going back to 1953. Backed for his first few years at the label by Booker T. and the MGs, King cut his finest work for Stax. Among his most notable recordings for the label are "Laundromat Blues" (1966), "Crosscut Saw" (1967), "Born Under a Bad Sign" (1967), "I'll Play the Blues for You" (1972), and "That's What the Blues Is All About" (1974).

Little Milton signed with Stax in 1971 after having already enjoyed a substantial career recording for Sun, Bobbin, and the Chess subsidiary, Checker, beginning in the early 1950s. Paired initially with producer Don Davis, Milton placed seven Stax singles on Billboard's R&B charts, the most notable being "That's What Love Will Make You Do" (1972). He also recorded two albums for Stax that included what became two of his signature tunes and blues classics in their own right, "Little Bluebird" and "Walking the Back Streets and Crying." Both King and Milton were featured in the 1972 Wattstax concert and included in the subsequent Wattstax double-pocket albums.

The less well-known Detroit-based harmonica player and vocalist Little Sonny recorded four albums and a handful of singles for the Stax subsidiary Enterprise in the early 1970s. While none of these efforts charted, they are recognized as superb examples of latter-day Detroit blues. The obscure Prince Conley was from Memphis and recorded a solitary single on Satellite, "I'm Going Home" (1961). In the 1970s Stax issued albums by blues artists John Lee Hooker and Jimmy McCracklin, licensed from Henry Stone and Willie Mitchell, respectively.

ROBERT BOWMAN

Bibliography

- Bowman, Rob. Soulsville U.S.A.: The Story of Stax Records. New York: Schirmer Books, 1997.
 Guralnick, Peter. Sweet Soul Music: Rhythm and Blues and the Southern Dream of Freedom. New York: Harper and Row, 1986.

Discography: McGrath

- Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "The Stax Volt Story." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/staxvolt.html> (accessed December 12, 2004).

STEINER, JOHN

- b. 21 July 1908; Milwaukee, WI
 d. 3 June 2000; Milwaukee, WI

Record collector and label owner. In the post-World War II years, Steiner led a revival of interest for traditional jazz and country blues. He first became involved in Chicago's jazz scene in the early 1930s while earning his Ph.D. in chemistry at the University of Chicago (1933). With Helen Oakley and Harry Lim, he founded the country's first hot jazz club, the Hot Club of Chicago. In 1940, Steiner teamed up with Hugh Davis to record traditional jazz acts, and in 1944 they founded S D Records.

Steiner and Davis released newly recorded discs on jazz artists and put out reissue discs, some drawn from the Paramount label, including blues artists Laura Rucker, Cow Cow Davenport, and Skip James. In early 1945 Davis sold his half of the company to Steiner, who then operated the imprint for the next three years. After acquiring the old Paramount label in 1948, however, he released singles and LPs on a revived Paramount imprint of jazz and blues artists drawn from the original Paramount label, S D, and other labels. Steiner withdrew from the music business in 1955.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- Whelan, Pete. "The Man Who Bought Paramount." 78 Quarterly no. 7 (1992): 30-40.

STEPHENS, JAMES "GUITAR SLIM"

- b. 4 March 1915; Pauline, SC
 d. 10 February 1991; Greensboro, NC

Piedmont blues and sacred singer, guitarist, pianist, master of black oral arts. From the late 1920s through the early 1950s he traveled around the southern United States, often with medicine shows. He settled in Greensboro, North Carolina, for twenty years, but he returned to performing in the mid-1970s at colleges and folk festivals. Recordings of him appeared on the labels Flyright, Rounder, and L+R. He is not to be confused with James "Preacher" Stephens, who recorded with the Modern label in Houston, Texas, in 1954.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

- Nelson, David. "James 'Guitar Slim' Stephens" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 97 (May/June 1991): 44.

STEPNEY, BILLIE

- b. 16 January 1930; Grenada, MS

Drummer active in Chicago since the mid-1940s; first name sometimes shown as "Billy." During the 1950s, he performed frequently for Memphis Slim and in Willie Dixon-supervised sessions for Chess and Cobra. In 1963 he performed with the American Folk Blues Festival tour of Europe.

EDWARD KOMARA

STEPNEY, BILLIE

Bibliography

Leadbitter, Mike. "Billie Stepney." In Nothing but the Blues, edited by Mike Leadbitter. p. 107. London: Hanover, 1971.

STIDHAM, ARBEE

b. 9 February 1917; DeValls Bluff, AR
d. April 1988; Chicago, IL

Stidham followed his father, a professional bandsman, by taking up saxophone. He led his own band in the Little Rock, Arkansas, area and played for a couple of seasons with Bessie Smith. On arriving in Chicago in the 1930s, however, he found that he would do better as a blues singer, a role in which he was encouraged by Big Bill Broonzy and Tampa Red. His first recording session, for Victor in 1947, produced the sleek ballad "My Heart Belongs to You," a surprise hit that he proved unable to repeat, although many labels offered him the chance to try.

Having given up the saxophone on health grounds, he learned guitar but, as albums for Bluesville and Folkways confirm, did not become adept. Nevertheless, he was astute enough as a songwriter and self-promoter to continue to garner recording opportunities into the 1970s, including dates with Sun and Mainstream. By then he had settled in Cleveland, Ohio, where, after a final album with local musicians in 1973, he effectively retired from music. Since his early recordings evinced an aesthetic unpalatable to most present-day enthusiasts, they were largely disregarded for many years, only earning a comprehensive reissue, by Blue Moon, in 2004.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

AMG (Ron Wynn); Harris; Larkin
Danchin, Sebastian. "Arbee Stidham—Our Hearts Belong to You." Soul Bag no. 100 (September/October 1984).

Discography: AMG; LSFP

STINSON RECORDS

Originally founded in 1939 by Herbert Harris to distribute Soviet recordings, this New York label was joined for a time with Moe Asch's eponymous label; in 1946, Asch broke away from Harris and started Disc Records, the ill-fated precursor to Folkways.

Stinson released several recordings by blues artists, including Sonny Terry, Josh White, Meade Lux Lewis, and Leadbelly.

MORRIS S. LEVY

Bibliography

Goldsmith, Peter D. Making People's Music: Moe Asch and Folkways Records. Washington, DC: Smithsonian Institution Press, 1998.

STOKES, FRANK

b. 1 January 1888; Whitehaven, TN
d. 12 September 1955; Memphis, TN

Frank Stokes, a burly blacksmith, can be said to have laid the foundations of what became accepted as Memphis blues with a long series of solo records and unparalleled duets with Dan Sane as the Beale Street Sheiks.

His playing was firmly rooted in ragtime rhythms, and he and Sane often recorded pre-blues songs such as "Chicken You Can Roost Behind the Moon," "Last Go Round" or "I Got Mine," and "Tain't Nobody's Business If I Do." In all he recorded some forty songs, and while his Sheiks duets are unrivalled of their kind, his other partnership with fiddler Will Batts produced some of the most beautiful and heart-tugging blues ever recorded.

Stokes had a perfect blues voice—big, dramatic, and forceful, and his guitar playing was strong and accurate. His solid yet subtle rhythms interspersed with Sane's flat pick ornamentation are among the glories of the blues. Stokes was never afraid to tackle modern issues either—political corruption in "Mr Crump Don't Like It," fashion in "Jazzing the Blues," short skirts in "Nehi Blues"—and a number of his songs refer to places in and around Memphis.

After his recording career ended, Stokes carried on playing music locally, and a young B. B. King spoke about his house parties and star guests. He died in 1955 but is remembered by a star set in the pavement of Beale Street.

DAVID HARRISON

Bibliography

AMG (Barry Lee Pearson); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli
Olsson, Bengt. "Frank Stokes: The Beale Street Sheik." Blues Unlimited no. 100 (April 1973): 25–27.

Discography: DGR

STONE, HENRY*(See Chart)STONE, JESSE

b. 16 November 1901; Atchison, KS

d. 1 April 1999; Altamonte Springs, FL

Aka Charles Calhoun. One of the greatest R&B songwriters, Jesse Stone's career in the music business lasted more than six decades. He first worked on the black vaudeville circuit and later was the leader of a jazz band that included saxophonist Coleman Hawkins. In Kansas City, his reputation began to grow as an arranger and pianist for the George and Julia Lee Bands. Duke Ellington caught his act and, impressed with his arranging and songwriting skills, recommended him to Mills Music in New York. As a staff writer, Stone wrote for the Cotton Club. Later he wrote comedy scenes, music, and arrangements for the city's Apollo Theater. During this time he advised and encouraged a young Louis Jordan.

In the 1940s, Stone led his own band, recording R&B for the RCA-Victor label. Jesse Stone joined newly formed Atlantic Records as a staff producer-songwriter-arranger. Many of his songs became hits for other rhythm and blues singers. "Coleslaw" was a hit for Louis Jordan, and "Shake Rattle and Roll," though originally written for Big Joe Turner, helped make the career of Bill Halley and the Comets. He also wrote other hit-making material for the Cardinals, the Drifters, Ray Charles, Ruth Brown, Chuck Willis, Titus Turner, and Roy Hamilton. Because many of these songs were BMI tunes, Stone wrote them under the name Charles Calhoun so as not to jeopardize his membership in ASCAP.

TOM MORGAN

Bibliography

Dahl, Bill. "Jesse Stone" [obituary]. Living Blues no. 146 (July/August 1999): 49.

Discography: Lord; LSFP

Jesse Stone Alias Charles "Chuck" Calhoun (1996, Bear Family CD 15695; reissue)

STORMY MONDAY

Aaron Thibaux "T-Bone" Walker (1910–1975) (vocals, electric guitar), Teddy Buckner (trumpet), Bumps Myers (tenor sax), Lloyd Glenn (piano), Arthur Edwards (bass), Oscar Lee Bradley (drums). Recorded 1947, Los Angeles, California (Black and White 122 matrix BW 637).

From the bold and brassy introduction: Eb9–D9 repeated over a triplet rhythm, T-Bone Walker lets us know why he is one of the kings of the electric blues guitar. Not only a guitarist but a gifted singer, songwriter, bandleader, and showman, he made unparalleled contributions to the modern blues idiom. "Stormy Monday" was an enormous commercial success; it has also been covered and adapted by many other artists over the years and is considered a classic of the genre.

Walker begins with closely reasoned midrange guitar counterpoint to his vocal musings, joined in the background by tenor sax riffs and piano filigree. One device that gets the listener's attention is his use of the chromatic passing or leading chord (Db9–C9, F#9–G9), which sounds incredibly rich (and novel for the time).

In some cover versions of this song (Bobby Bland, B. B. King, the Allman Brothers, Isaac Hayes, and countless others have recorded it), there is a chord progression in measures 7–8: I (or I major 7)–ii7–'iii7–biii7, two beats each, en route to a ii7 at bar 9. This progression does not occur in the original. The bassist plays a more conventional pattern, without passing tones. The last four bars appear to begin ii7–V7. In contrast with the country blues, "Stormy Monday," an urban blues, is very "choreographed," and the twelve-bar verses clearly marked.

Walker ends the first verse with a more intensive statement on guitar. His voice is melodic, almost like Nat King Cole's, and the intonation is near perfect, with a touch of vibrato. Buckner plays simple muted trumpet countermelodies. In the body of the second verse, Walker primarily plays low figures on the guitar, a rhythm function, ending with a flurry of linear ideas.

His twelve-bar guitar solo after the second verse remains largely in the middle register, but it contains some gems, particularly in his use of space, phrasing, and melodic development. It is obvious that he is really thinking, not playing reflexively as some musicians do. The horns play a simple, bluesy background riff in the mode of 1930s Kansas City groups such as Count Basie's.

The third and final verse is noteworthy for two things: the triplets that Walker hits so hard in the first line leading to the IV chord and Buckner's wailing plunger mute fill after the word "misery." Here Buckner conjures up the ghost of Bubber Miley, to go with his Sweets Edison–like playing on verse 2. Quite a contribution overall.

STORMY MONDAY

A clean unison ending buttons up T-Bone Walker's ageless recording. The song would enter the rock repertoire in 1971 through the Allman Brothers Band's classic live recording Live at the Fillmore East.

LENNY CARLSON

Bibliography

Santelli

Dance, Helen Oakley. Stormy Monday: The T-Bone Walker Story. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University, 1987.

McNeil, W. K. Notes accompanying The Blues: A Smithsonian Collection of Classic Blues Singers, pp. 60–61 (1993, Smithsonian Institution; four-CD collection).

STORYVILLE RECORDS

Storyville Records was founded in December 1952 in Copenhagen, Denmark, by Karl Emil Knudsen. That company released hundreds of LPs and even some 45s and EPs. Many great blues artists recorded original LPs in Storyville's Copenhagen studios while touring in Scandinavia: Big Bill Broonzy (in 1956), Champion Jack Dupree (in 1959), Memphis Slim (in 1960), Aleck Miller "Sonny Boy Williamson II" (in 1963), Lonnie Johnson (in 1963), and Big Joe Williams (in 1963). Some of those unique LPs later reappeared in the 1960s on the Los Angeles label Everest Records, in the Archive of Folk Music Series, sometimes on Folkways (USA), and occasionally in Japan on the Teichiku label.

Starting in the early 1990s, Storyville Records began reissuing material on CD and offers vintage archival footage of jazz, bebop, and blues on video.

YVES LABERGE

Bibliography

Hennessey, Mike, and Thorbjørn Sjøgren. "50 Years of Jazz and Blues." December 2, 2002. Storyville Records website, http://storyville-records.com/storyville_story.htm.

Storyville Records website, <http://www.storyville-records.com>.

Wirz, Stefan. "Storyville Records Discography." Stefan Wirz website, <http://www.wirz.de/music/storyfrm.htm>.

STOVALL, JEWELL "BABE"

b. 4 October 1907; Tylertown, MS

d. 21 September 1974; New Orleans, LA

Singer and guitarist with a wide repertoire in addition to blues. He began performing in the 1920s as part of a Tylertown group associated with Herb Quinn. In the mid-1930s, he came to know and learn the music of Tommy Johnson, who had married a local woman.

By 1957 he had moved to New Orleans, playing on the streets in the French Quarter. He became a local favorite, and he appeared at their first five New Orleans Jazz and Heritage Festivals in 1970–1974.

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Evans, David. "Babe Stovall." Blues Unlimited no. 29 (January 1966): 9–10 [part 1]; no. 30 (February 1966): 9 [part 2]; no. 31 (March 1966): 20 [part 3].

Discography: LSFP

STOVEPIPE NO. 1

b. Sam Jones, flourished 1920s–1930s

Jones was known in Cincinnati as a one-man jug band, playing harmonica, guitar, and a length of stovepipe, and recorded in that fashion as early as 1924. He also played lilted harmonica with the Cincinnati Jug Band and Kid Cole and sang pungent blues and vaudeville songs with guitarist David Crockett.

TONY RUSSELL

Bibliography

Tracy, Steven C. Going to Cincinnati: A History of the Blues in the Queen City. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1993.

Discography: DGR

STRAIGHT ALKY BLUES

"Straight Alky Blues" was composed and first recorded by Leroy Carr in 1929. It provided the melodic basis and, to a lesser extent, a lyric basis for "Black River Blues" by Roosevelt Sykes (1929) and for "Cross Road Blues" by Robert Johnson (1936).

Carr's "Straight Alky Blues" is in a twelve-measure AAB lyric form. In the opening two measures, its distinguishing opening melodic motif begins at the flatted 7th scale degree, steps up to the octave for several lyric syllables, then lowers itself down to the root tone. In the next two measures (mm. 3–4) the motif is used again to complete the first lyrical line. The high opening pitches are sung to the words

I went down to Smith Street to combine distinctively the words and music by which subsequent treatments may be identified as song descendants.

The “State Street” referred to by Carr was and still is one of the main commercial streets in downtown Chicago. The lyrics relate the purchase, preparation, consumption, and effects of bootleg liquor; prohibition of alcohol was in effect in 1929.

In Chicago Carr and guitarist Scrapper Blackwell had their 1928–1931 Vocalion label sessions. On February 15, 1929, they attempted to record “Straight Alky Blues” in two three-minute parts to be issued back to back on a single disc. This performance was likely considered unsatisfactory, as it was not issued by Vocalion, and only the first part survives (Vocalion matrix C-2966-A). A second try was recorded the following March 19, with the result released on Vocalion 1290 soon afterward, then leased to Supertone Records for issue on Supertone S 2220.

On November 16, 1929, pianist Roosevelt Sykes of St. Louis, recording in Chicago for OKeh, performed “Black River Blues” (OKeh 8787). He borrowed the “Straight Alky” melody and Carr’s moderate tempo but modified some of the lyrics. It is not clear which Black River is referred to, since no clues are evident in the lyrics, nor does Sykes call the river by name during the recording.

On November 27, 1936, Mississippi Delta bluesman Robert Johnson recorded “Cross Road Blues,” today the best-known treatment of the melody. His opening lyric appears to be an adaptation from Sykes. Instead of imitating on guitar the piano accompaniment styles of Carr and Sykes, Johnson alternated passages of slide guitar with sharply plucked tonic and tonic-seventh chords. Johnson’s first take matched the tempi of the Carr and Sykes antecedents, and it was released by Vocalion (on Vocalion 03519) in 1937. His second take was performed at a less hurried tempo and with greater care on the guitar, but it was not released until 1961 as the lead track of the LP Record King of the Delta Blues Singers (Columbia CL 1654). The first take would not be reissued widely to the general public until the 1990 Sony/Columbia complete reissue of Johnson’s recordings.

“Cross Road Blues” was introduced to white rock musicians by Cream, who included a live recording from a Fillmore East concert on their 1968 two-LP set Wheels of Fire. On it, guitarist Eric Clapton altered the third line of the opening chorus, a change that preceded a critical appraisal of this blues as one associated with Johnson’s supposed giving his soul to the devil for improved guitar playing (see especially Greil Marcus’s Mystery Train [1975], Robert Palmer’s Deep Blues [1981], and Julio Finn’s The Bluesman [1986]). Incidentally, the one-measure riff performed by Clapton and bassist Jack Bruce on the Cream live recording would be adapted to a new melody by the Steve Miller Band for “Jet Airliner” (Book of Dreams, 1975).

EDWARD KOMARA

Bibliography

Wardlow, Gayle, with Edward Komara. “Stop, Look, and Listen at the Cross Road.” In Chasin’ That Devil Music. pp. 196–206. San Francisco: Miller Freeman, 1998.

STREHLI, ANGELA

b. 22 November 1945; Lubbock, TX

Singer Angela Strehli is a longtime member of the Austin, Texas, blues community whose contributions to the blues have extended into promotion as well as performance. Strehli was living in Austin in the late 1960s as that city became a regional center of the burgeoning folk music revival. Strehli became an active part of a community of young whites who immersed themselves in the blues, similar to what was happening in Chicago and London. While Austin’s white blues community was not as immediately influential as Chicago’s (which spawned the Paul Butterfield Blues Band among many others in the 1960s), it has stayed active for much longer (through 2005, at least).

When blues promoter Clifford Antone opened Antone’s nightclub in Austin in 1975, Strehli became a regular performer in backing major touring blues artists, along with Lou Ann Barton, Stevie Ray Vaughan, Jimmie Vaughan, and Kim Wilson. She also assisted Antone and his sister, Susan Antone, in choosing artists to book and promoting the club, and when Cliff Antone started a record label in the mid-1980s, she was one of the first artists recorded (Soul Shake).

As a singer, Strehli has a warm voice and engaging style; since the 1980s, she has performed most often in a Texas-style rhythm and blues mode. While she has recorded only a handful of albums, she has maintained a busy touring schedule both in the United States and Europe. In the late 1990s, she relocated to the San Francisco area with her husband.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Richard Skelly); Larkin; Santelli Cote, M. “Angela Strehli: Queen of Texas Blues.” Blues Revue no. 48 (June 1999): 17–20.

Discography: AMG

Blonde and Blue (1993, Rounder, 3127).
Deja Blue (1998, A&M 161399).

Dreams Come True (1990, Antone's 0014; with Marcia Ball and Lou Ann Barton).
Soul Shake (1987, Antone's 0006).

STROGER, BOB

b. 27 December 1930; Hayti, MO

A resident of Chicago since 1947, Bob Stroger established himself as a first-rate bassist alongside Otis Rush, Sunnyland Slim, and Jimmy Rogers and in the band Mississippi Heat. He remained active on both session recordings and live appearances into his senior years.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Moon, D. T. "Bob Stroger: First Call Bass." Living Blues no. 158 (July/August 2001): 26–35.

STROTHER, JAMES "JIMMIE"

On June 13 and 14, 1936, Virginia State Prison Farm inmate James "Jimmie" Strother recorded thirteen songs with either banjo or guitar accompaniment. Harold Spivacke, soon-to-be chief of the Music Division of the Library of Congress, recorded Strother under the direction of musicologist John A. Lomax. Spivacke remembered the recording trip vividly, recalling that Lomax interviewed Strother for several hours. He left Spivacke to record Strother the next day, and Spivacke marveled that "All I had to do was ask him to sing one song after another and turn over the records and set the needles, etc."

Strother, a prototypical songster, played a wide range of music for Spivacke and Lomax, including dance tunes, religious music, blues, and popular songs. Probably born in the mid-1880s in the Tidewater region of Virginia, he absorbed the spirituals of the former slaves, recording "Do Lord, Remember Me" with inmate Joe Lee and "We Are Almost Down to the Shore" (also known as "Fighting On"). According to Lomax, Strother lost his sight in a mine accident, and his "Thought I Heard My Banjo Say," a version of "Cripple Creek," suggests travels in the Appalachian region.

Folklorist Benjamin Botkin recalled Strother's medicine-show background, and "Tennessee Dog" reveals that influence. Strother delivered the provocative ditty "Poontang Little, Poontang Small," protested the abuses of the harsh "contractor" Mike Hardy in "I Used to Work on a Tractor," and also integrated blues into his repertoire. "Goin' to Richmond," an eight-bar blues, reveals Strother's adaptation to that musical style and to the guitar, the preferred instrument of the bluesman.

Strother married Blanche Green in 1923 in Alexandria, Virginia, but he was living in Baltimore at the time. They soon moved to her home county of Culpeper. The 1930 census listed him as a musician employed in a dance hall in the town of Culpeper. The events that led to Jimmie Strother's imprisonment occurred on April 2, 1935. That evening visitors had been to the Strother home and after her guests retired, Blanche sat down at a table and began writing a letter. Jim Strother, armed with a pistol, approached her from behind and fired. Blanche Strother lingered for nearly a week at the University Hospital in Charlottesville before finally expiring on April 8, 1935. Witnesses attributed Strother's crime to drinking and jealousy. He was indicted and pleaded guilty to second-degree murder, receiving a twenty-year term.

John Lomax's son Alan wrote to the superintendent of the Virginia State Penitentiary in 1942 to gain Strother's permission to use several songs on Library of Congress compilations. R. M. Youell replied that the man Lomax sought had been granted a conditional pardon on September 15, 1939, and his whereabouts were unknown. Subsequent letters to the Culpeper County sheriff and other contacts in the county also failed to locate Strother. The blind musician had again become largely anonymous to history—except through his recordings.

GREGG KIMBALL

Bibliography

Bastin, Bruce. Red River Blues: The Blues Tradition in the Southeast. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1986.
Our Singing Country, collected and compiled by John A. Lomax and Alan Lomax, with music editor Ruth Crawford Seeger. New York: Macmillan, 1941.

Discography: DGR

STROTHER, PERCY L.

b. 23 July 1946; Vicksburg, MS

Born in the river town of Vicksburg, Mississippi, Strother's relatively calm and stable childhood was shattered by the violent death of his father; his mother died shortly thereafter, leaving the young Percy to choose between relocation to an orphanage and life on the road. He chose the latter, moving first to Jackson, Mississippi, and then around the South, gradually drifting north to Chicago and then to Minneapolis. During his wanderings he became an alcoholic, an addiction that would afflict him well into his adulthood. Although he was never able to hold down a steady job during these early years, it was during this period that he began to lay the foundation for his future musical career, frequenting blues clubs and occasionally exercising the rudimentary guitar technique his father had taught him onstage with local musicians.

Finding that Minneapolis offered a congenial environment and a thriving blues scene, he settled there in the late 1980s and began to develop and hone his guitar technique and songwriting skills. He recorded his debut album, A Good Woman Is Hard to Find, in 1992; several more solo albums followed, and in 2001 he released Home at Last, a tribute to the blues artists who had inspired and influenced him during his troubled, formative years.

RICK ANDERSON

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

VanCloooster, Dirk. "Percy Strother: Biography." 1998. Percy Strother website, <http://www.percystrother.com/pages/486127/index.htm> (accessed July 31, 2004).

Discography: AMG

STUCKEY, HENRY

b. 12 December 1896; Yazoo County, MS

d. 9 March 1966; Jackson, MS

Birth date also given as April 11, 1897. Considered "The Father of Bentonia Blues," singer and guitarist Henry Stuckey taught the young Skip James his haunting E-minor tuning guitar style, which James would later exemplify. The pair played barrelhouses throughout the Bentonia, Mississippi, area during the 1920s. He did not record.

GENE TOMKO

Bibliography

Harris; Larkin

Roche, Jacques. "Henry Stuckey: An Obituary." 78 Quarterly no. 2 (1968): 12–14.

"Stuckey, Henry." Social Security Death Index records, March 2003.

STUDEBAKER JOHN

b. John Grimaldi, 5 November 1952; Chicago, IL

Guitarist, singer, and harmonica player "Studebaker" John Grimaldi plays a driving, Chicago-style electric blues with his band the Hawks. He came to national prominence during the 1990s with a series of well-received albums on Blind Pig and remains a steady draw on the blues circuit, although his recorded output slowed in the late 1990s.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny)

Discography: AMG

Selected Recordings

Too Tough (1994, Blind Pig 5010).

Outside Lookin' In (1995, Blind Pig 5022).

Tremoluxe (1996, Tone-Cool 5031).

Howl with the Wolf (2001, Evidence 26112).

SUE (1)

Label established by Henry "Juggy" Murray in New York City in 1957. Blues talent included Ike and Tina Turner, Don Covay, Jimmy McGriff, Bill Doggett, and Gary U. S. Bonds. Wilbert Harrison recorded the original version of "Let's Work Together" for this label.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography

Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. "Sue/Symbol/A.F.O Album Discographies." Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/sue.html> (accessed December 21, 2004).

SUE (2)

Subsidiary of Jewel/Paula Records.

EDWARD KOMARA

Discography: McGrath

SUGAR BLUE

b. James Whiting, 16 December 1949; New York City, NY

An avant garde harmonica player raised in Harlem, Sugar Blue (James Whiting) created a sensation upon his arrival in Chicago in 1982 with his high-energy, rapid-fire harmonica attack, spinning his own innovations off the foundation of the Chicago harp masters who had come before. Prior to his move to Chicago, Sugar Blue spent several years in Europe, recording two albums in France and playing on three albums by the Rolling Stones, most famously contributing the harmonica track to “Miss You” in 1978.

His earliest work as a singer appeared on the Spivey label in New York. In the 1970s he also did session work with Johnny Shines, Louisiana Red, Brownie McGhee, and Roosevelt Sykes on the New York-based Blue Labor label. In Chicago Sugar became a crowd favorite at Kingston Mines and other clubs and toured some with Willie Dixon’s Chicago Blues All Stars. He has done limited touring on his own and recorded only two albums, both showcasing not only his technical acumen but also his songwriting skills, for Alligator in the 1990s. He has recorded more frequently as a sideman, adding Dixon, Eddy Clearwater, Lonnie Brooks, Son Seals, Melvin Taylor, Johnny B. Moore, and Rico McFarland to his accompanist’s discography.

His adeptness at melding blues, jazz, rock, and funk has brought him opportunities to record with a variety of artists ranging from Stan Getz to Bob Dylan. Sugar Blue has drawn rave reviews for his dedication to expanding the boundaries of blues harmonica, earning comparisons to such varied revolutionists as Jimi Hendrix and James Joyce. Yet he has maintained a fairly low profile in the wake of predictions for superstardom.

JIM O’NEAL

Bibliography

AMG (Jason Ankeny); Herzhaft; Santelli McCormick, Moira. Liner notes to Blue Blazes (1994, Alligator Records AL 4819).

Discography: AMG

SULTAN

Detroit jazz label of the 1940s. Morton Sultan (1921–1983) briefly operated the label in 1946. Although headquartered in Detroit, the label (a release of three 78s in June 1946) concentrated on artists who were working the clubs along Randolph Street in Chicago’s Loop. The label’s gimmick was “double-header hits,” meaning that two different artists shared each 78. Sultan recorded Red Saunders’s six-piece combo, along with the sextet led by alto saxophonist Eddie Wiggins and solo piano by Alphonso “Sonny” Thompson. Although Sultan was a commercial failure, Saunders went on to record steadily during the next decade, and Thompson moved to Miracle, where he enjoyed a huge success; subsequently, Thompson would record and do A&R for King Records. Eddie Wiggins, though praised by jazz critics at the time, never got another recording opportunity.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Pruter, Robert, and Campbell, Robert L. “The Sultan Label.” Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/sultan.html> (accessed May 8, 2003).

Discography: McGrath

SUMLIN, HUBERT

b. 16 November 1931; Greenwood, MS

Guitarist Hubert Sumlin is legendary for his wildly unbridled playing behind Howlin’ Wolf. Using his fingers instead of a pick, Sumlin wrenched a vast array of exotic sounds out of his electric guitar, and his sonic flights—full of hiccupping glissandos, extravagant vibrato, and unexpected percussive accents—inspired Jimi Hendrix, Eric Clapton, Keith Richards, Jeff Beck, Stevie Ray Vaughan, and many other guitarists.

The youngest of thirteen children, Sumlin was born on a plantation near Greenwood, Mississippi, and grew up in Hughes, Arkansas. He played drums and a one-string diddley bow as a child, and his mother sacrificed a week’s pay to buy him a guitar when he was eight years old. Inspired by the records of Charley Patton and Robert Johnson, he began playing local juke joints and fish fries as a teenager with harp player James Cotton. One night in Seyppel, Arkansas, Sumlin accidentally fell through a window of a juke joint while listening to Wolf’s band, which included blues guitarists Pat Hare and Willie Johnson. Impressed by the young man’s dedication, Wolf let Sumlin occasionally sit in with his band in the wide-open clubs of West Memphis and eastern Arkansas. In 1953, Wolf left his band behind in West Memphis and went to record for Chess Records in Chicago. The next year, he convinced Hubert to join him up north. Thus began one of the great collaborations in blues history, lasting almost twenty-five years and interrupted only twice when Hubert played for short stints with Muddy Waters.

Wolf had a gravelly, hypermasculine voice and Hubert a jagged, unpredictable guitar style: the two combined musically like gasoline and a lit match. Sumlin played second guitar with guitarists Willie Johnson, Jody Williams, and Otis “Smokey” Smothers on many of Wolf’s hits of the 1950s, including “Evil,” “Forty Four,” “Who Will Be Next?” “Smokestack Lightnin’,” and “I Asked for Water.” In the 1960s, Sumlin’s slashing lead guitar galvanized such hits as “Three Hundred Pounds of Joy,” “Built for Comfort,” “Killing Floor,” “Goin’ Down Slow,” “Love Me Darlin’,” “Hidden Charms” (perhaps his greatest solo), and many other Wolf classics. During the 1960s, Sumlin toured with Wolf all over America and Europe, even doing shows behind the Iron Curtain.

When Wolf died in January 1976, Sumlin was emotionally devastated and quit playing for a few months. Returning to music, he played briefly as a member of Eddie Shaw and the Wolf Gang and then began to establish his identity as a solo artist. During the next twenty-five years, he recorded seven albums under his own name, appeared on records with many other blues stars, and toured clubs and festivals across America, Europe, and Japan. He also became a mentor to Stevie Ray and Jimmie Vaughan, Ronnie Earl, and many other younger stringbenders. His musical sons returned the compliment in 2001 with the album About Them Shoes, featuring Sumlin with an all-star band including Eric Clapton, Keith Richards, Bob Margolin, Levon Helm, Paul Oscher, David Maxell, Jimmy Vivino, and others.

MARK HOFFMAN

Bibliography

AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Larkin; Santelli
Sumlin, Hubert. “My Years with Wolf.” Living Blues no. 88
(September/October 1989): 10–18.

Discography: AMG; LSPF

Hubert Sumlin’s Blues Party (1987, Black Top 1036).
Heart & Soul (1989, Blind Pig 73389).
Healing Feeling (1990, Black Top 1053).
Blues Anytime (1994, Evidence 26052).
Blues Guitar Boss (1994, JSP 2118).
I Know You (1998, Analogue Productions Originals 2004).
Wake Up Call (1998, Blues Planet 1116).
About Them Shoes (2001, Record Company TBD).

SUN/PHILLIPS INTERNATIONAL/FLIP

Founded 1950 Memphis, Tennessee; sold to Shelby Singleton 1969. Sun Records and Sam Phillips’s Memphis Recording Service will always be known as the place where Elvis Presley first recorded and became a star. But before Sam Phillips began using his Memphis studio to record country and rockabilly singers such as Elvis, Johnny Cash, Roy Orbison, Jerry Lee Lewis, and Carl Perkins, he had already built a successful blues studio and label. Howlin’ Wolf, Rufus Thomas, James Cotton, B. B. King, Walter Horton, Little Milton, Ike Turner, Rosco Gordon, and Earl Hooker were just some of the blues artists who recorded for Sun in the early to mid-1950s.

It was January 1950 when Phillips opened his small recording studio at 706 Union Avenue in Memphis. Initially, Phillips’s business plan was to both rent studio time to locals and to serve as an agent for musicians with more potential, licensing their recordings to labels that would release them. During 1950, Phillips sold songs to 4 Star and Modern Records. In 1951, he began working almost exclusively with Chess Records out of Chicago—including two songs that became substantial hits, “Rocket 88” by Jackie Brenston and “Bear Cat” by Rufus Thomas.

An early attempt at running his own label, Phillips, had not done well in 1950, with only one single issued. But in 1952, Phillips tried again with the Sun imprint. Although it, too, started slowly, by 1953 Phillips was ramping the label up with releases by the blues artists he had been recording. Through the mid-1950s, the preponderance of artists Phillips recorded and issued were African American blues musicians, with a smattering of black gospel and white country singers. By the late 1950s, though, Elvis, Cash, Lewis, and the other rockabilly artists were dominating Sun’s sales, and fewer and fewer blues sides were issued.

By the mid-1960s, most of Sun’s successful artists had left for the larger labels, and Sun began to lose steam. As early as 1962, Phillips was searching for a buyer. In 1969, he sold the label to record industry executive Shelby Singleton.

JIM TRAGESER

Bibliography

Escott, Colin, and Martin Hawkins. Good Rockin’ Tonight: Sun Records and the Birth of Rock ‘n’ Roll. New York: St. Martin’s Press, 1991.
Floyd, John. Sun Records: An Oral History (For the Record). New York: William Morrow & Co, 1998.
Guralnick, Peter. Feel Like Going Home. New York: Harper & Row, 1971.
———. Lost Highway. New York: Harper & Row, 1979.

Discography: McGrath

Colin Escott and Martin Hawkins. Sun Records: The Discography. Vollersode, Germany: Bear Family, 1987.
Edwards, David, and Mike Callahan. “The Sun Records Label Story.” Both Sides Now website, <http://www.bsnpubs.com/sunstory.html> (accessed December 21, 2004).

Selected Reissues

Sun Records Harmonica (1989, Rounder SS 29).
Blue Flames: A Sun Blues Collection (1990, Rhino 70962).
Mystery Train (1990, Rounder SS 38).
The Sun Records Collection (1994, Rhino 71780).
Sun Records: The Blues Years 1950–1956 (2001, Charly Sun Box 105).
Memphis Days Vols. I and II (Howlin' Wolf; Bear Family 15460 and 15500).

SUNBEAM

Chicago blues and jazz label of the late 1940s. The label was founded in the fall of 1946 by pianist and arranger Marl Young, who operated it with assistance from his brothers who were in the dry cleaning business. The studio big band that Young assembled for Sunbeam recorded a few instrumentals and backed vocals by gospel singer Bob McFerrin (father of well-known eclectic vocalist Bobby McFerrin) and blues ballad singer Little Miss Cornshucks (who hit with “So Long”). Other recordings were made of blues shouter Petite Swanson, crooner Bill Green, jazz singer Johnny Hartman, and the Bob Carter Trio. Marl Young sold the Sunbeam masters to Vitacoustic in September 1947 and moved to the West Coast. In Los Angeles he became a successful studio musician, capping his career as music director of the Lucille Ball Show.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

Campbell, Robert L., Armen Büttner, and Robert Pruter. “The Sunbeam Label.” Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/sunbeam.html> (accessed June 11, 2003).

SUNNYLAND SLIM

b. Albert Luandrew, 5 September 1907; Vance, MS
 d. 17 March 1995; Chicago, IL

A piano master of unadulterated Delta blues whose career spanned from 1920s unamplified barrelhouses to 1990s state-of-the-art concert stages, Sunnyland Slim was a commanding figure physically as well as musically and in his final decades a patriarchal figure on the Chicago blues scene.

The Early Years

A self-taught musician, Albert Luandrew began in the church, where his father was a preacher, and received some help from early blues piano stylist Jeff Morris. As a teen he played piano between reel changes at the silent movies in town. He ran away from home and an abusive stepmother, working at men’s jobs—while still a teen he played piano and hustled cards and dice at levee, logging, and turpentine camps. A piano player in these rough places required stamina, a strong left hand to beat the rhythm, and an extremely loud voice. He ably filled the bill. Harmonica player Snooky Pryor remembered in later years that Sunnyland’s voice could shatter microphones.

Not yet twenty, he met fellow pianist Eurreal “Little Brother” Montgomery in a sawmill barrelhouse where they played all night long, forging a lifelong friendship. By the late 1920s he had traveled to Memphis, where he remained for several years and briefly accompanied singer Ma Rainey.

In the 1930s he adopted the name “Sunnyland Slim” after writing the song “Sunnyland Train” about the train that barreled through the Mississippi night taking the lives of a white family and a black family in separate occurrences in the same week, an event that he later said gave him “a tender heart” toward all people.

Slim visited Chicago in 1933 and again in 1939 and for a time teamed up with John Lee “Sonny Boy” Williamson and played with Memphis Minnie and Big Bill Broonzy. During his depression-era travels he knew Honeyboy Edwards, Roosevelt Sykes, Memphis Slim, Peetie Wheatstraw, and Robert Johnson and very likely the majority of blues musicians who were out on the road.

Sunnyland Slim. (Photo courtesy Frank Driggs Collection)

A New Chicago Scene

Chicago became his permanent home during World War II. In 1946 Sunnyland brought the virtually unknown Muddy Waters to Columbia to record sides that were never issued. Perhaps thinking his growing renown had not yet reached Chicago, Slim recorded eight sides for RCA-Victor in 1947 as “Doctor Clayton’s Buddy,” imitating his friend Clayton’s piercing vocal whoop. The following year he took Waters to the Chess brothers’ fledgling Aristocrat label, where he recorded “Fly Right Little Girl” and his bizarrely violent “Johnson Machine Gun” as “Sunnyland Slim,” with Waters accompanying. Waters then played two numbers with Slim accompanying—his first recordings for Chess. For this act Sunnyland is often credited with “taking Muddy off the truck,” a reference to the Venetian blinds truck Waters was then driving, an event recognized as the first step of Waters’s unparalleled rise to the pinnacle of Chicago blues. The first four of Waters’s Aristocrat sides open with Slim’s booming chords, as would subsequent recordings by many other blues artists.

Throughout the 1950s Slim worked the South Side clubs and recorded prolifically as a featured artist as well as a sideman with Floyd Jones, Little Walter, Robert Lockwood, Lonnie Johnson, Jump Jackson, King Curtis, J. B. Lenoir, John Brim, and many others, on such labels as Mercury, Tempo-Tone, Vee-Jay, Constellation, Apollo, Regal, Hy-Tone, Chance, Blue Lake, Cobra, and JOB, of which he was part owner.

He turned to the smaller labels after a falling out with Chess and probably, too, because he might have more control over the recording issues and in addition receive cash for recording and for selling the platters out of the trunk of his car.

Recorded Legacy

Sunnyland became one of the most recorded Chicago blues musicians. It is estimated that he sang and played piano on hundreds of recordings and appeared on more than twenty LPs for a number of labels, among them his own Airway label, on which he recorded and also promoted young singing talents “Big Time Sarah” Streeter, Zora Young, and Bonnie Lee.

While none of his compositions were hits for him, he left a memorable body of work. He wrote of the electoral process in “Be Careful How You Vote,” which slyly celebrated the growth of black ward politics in Chicago and resurfaced as a vehicle to promote the candidacy of Chicago’s first black mayor, Harold Washington, and survived as a perennial tongue-in-cheek commentary on the gamut of mayoral office holders.

“The Devil Is a Busy Man,” “I Had It Hard,” “Smile on My Face,” “Sometime I Worry,” and “Patience Like Job” each wrestles with the recurring theme of his life’s misfortunes but never without a glimpse of salvation. “Every Time I Get to Drinking” is a sobering look at his own life and a personal statement of regret for past sins—a hauntingly beautiful piece of public penance.

New Audiences

It has been suggested that Sunnyland Slim did not adapt to modernization like Waters and other musically successful cohorts. Perhaps he lacked the elegance of Little Brother Montgomery and the originality and sparkle of Otis Spann, but throughout his career he consistently maintained his instantly recognizable, chiming Delta sound, his thunderous, cascading chords, and a voice that demanded attention and respect.

For a musician who had no grand ambitions beyond entertaining the Southern-born audience who shared his cultural background, Sunnyland’s fame and influence only grew among those others who recognized in his distinguished demeanor, patriarchal benevolence, and commanding musical style a poetically powerful force and a living link to an earlier time and culture.

When a new audience of mostly young white fans emerged on the heels of the folk revival, Sunnyland became a beloved regular in new clubs and on the college and festival circuits. He traveled to Europe for the first time in 1962 and in 1964 recorded behind the Iron Curtain. Shortly he became a perennial favorite on tours and festivals on both sides of the ocean. And even as he aged his strong hands and falsetto whoops, shouts, and Woody Woodpecker calls seemed to survive undiminished and to thrill new audiences.

At home his honors include the Medal of Merit from the City of Chicago (1987) and a National Heritage Fellowship from the National Endowment for the Arts (1988).

In his later years he successfully balanced his life in the blues with a return to the Baptist church, which he attended on Sunday mornings before heading up Halsted Street for the Sunday night gig he held at B.L.U.E.S. for fifteen years with The Big Four, comprised of Sam Burckhardt, Bob Stroger, Robert Covington, and Steve Freund.

SUNNYLAND SLIM

His final performance, for Chicago's annual Jazz Institute Fair, only weeks before his death, merited a standing ovation.

On his deathbed he told Burckhardt that he didn't want to keep Little Brother (Montgomery) waiting. His funeral drew hundreds of fans of all ages and races—some who had traveled long distances—and featured moving musical tributes from blues, jazz, and gospel artists.

JUSTIN O'BRIEN

Bibliography

- AMG (Bill Dahl); Harris; Herzhaft; Larkin; Santelli; Southern Brisbin, John Anthony. "A Tribute to Sunnyland Slim."
Living Blues no. 121 (May/June 1995): 50.
- Charters, Samuel. The Legacy of the Blues. London: Calder & Boyars, 1975; first American edition, New York: Da Capo Press, 1977.
- Palmer, Robert. Deep Blues. New York: Viking Press, 1981.
- Whiteis, David. "Sunnyland Slim." Juke Blues no. 36 (Winter 1996/97): 24.
- . "A Tender Heart and a Hustler's Soul." Living Blues no. 90 (March/April 1990): 14.

Discography: AMG; LSFP

Selected Recordings

- Be Careful How You Vote* (Earwig 4915).
House Rent Party (Delmark DE-655).
Live in Europe, 1975 (Airway AR-SBB 4757).
Slim's Shout (Prestige/Bluesville OBCCD-558-2 [BV1016]).

SUNRISE (POSTWAR)

New York jazz label of the late 1940s. The label was founded in April 1947 by Leonard Evans and was oriented largely toward jazz, recording many sides by Al Hibbler (who had been Duke Ellington's vocalist), as well as sides by Mercer Ellington, Earl Hines, and Johnny Hodges. Mercer Ellington produced the sessions, which accounts for the heavy representation of the Duke's men. Dr. Arthur Logan, Duke Ellington's personal physician, owned a share of the company. Sunrise also recorded the big bands of Milt Larkin and Tiny Bradshaw. From March 1948 to April 1949, Sunrise operated in alliance with Chicago-based Miracle and released records by the gospel group the Dixiaries and blues ballad singers Wini Brown and Gladys Palmer. Evans closed his Sunrise operation in September 1947.

ROBERT PRUTER

Bibliography

- Pruter, Robert, and Robert L. Campbell. "The Miracle Label." Red Saunders Research Foundation website, <http://hubcap.clemson.edu/~campber/miracle.html> (accessed June 27, 2003).

Discography: McGrath

SUNRISE (PREWAR)

